The Liberal Party at this very moment has an internal document which to my knowledge has never been made public. That document discusses the various mechanisms or tax machines the Liberal Party would put into play if it did replace the GST. I think everyone will find this quite fascinating. I know it has been spoken of in this House before. One of those is called the BTT. It is the business transfer tax. The interesting thing about this tax is that it is like the GST, but it means that every single item in the economy is taxed, including groceries.

Those members talked about it privately but they do not want to talk about it publicly. They want to play that cute little game they continually play running up into an election. Mr. Speaker, you have a good memory, particularly a good political memory. Do you remember the last two times a Liberal Party formed the government? When was it? In 1974, they formed the government. They ran through a five-year mandate and then in 1979, they went back to the people. They lost that 1979 election.

• (1620)

Mr. Bellemare: For six months.

Mr. Thompson: That is right. They were out of power for six months and I am glad the member reminded me.

Mrs. Sparrow: Nine months.

Mr. Thompson: Nine months, okay, give or take three months, what is the difference. The reason I mention that is because it is a strange coincidence but we are leading into an election. The last two elections that the Liberal Party won, as I mentioned, were in 1974, they lost in 1979 and nine months later, they were back in 1980. They won those elections on misinformation, if you wish, the big lie.

In 1974, the reason they won is that they disagreed with us, the Conservative Party, when we suggested price and wage controls. They said no, they would not campaign on price and wage controls and they did not. They campaigned against us because we suggested price and wage controls. Lo and behold, they won the election.

Remember what happened then? Six months later that famous line; "zap, you are frozen", came into play, it came into being. They did exactly what they said they would not do.

They went back to their same old tricks in 1980. It is another election. That election was on an 18 cents per gallon tax that the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans brought in wearing mukluks. Remember that one?

Mrs. Sparrow: On gasoline.

Mr. Thompson: On gasoline, right. We were going to address the debt problem. We were going to address the deficit problem. We were going to do it via an 18 cents per gallon tax on gasoline. We had a plan whereby if we implemented that tax plan, we would wipe clean our debt totally within four to five years.

It was a plan that most economist bought into, but it was a tough one because we were telling the Canadian people exactly what they did not want to hear, they were going to be taxed.

When the Clark government fell that winter evening of 1979, it fell precisely because the folks on the other side of the room, that is the combined opposition, could smell success or failure or defeat of this government because we were a minority government.

Back out on the campaign trail in 1980 they fought against that 18 cents per gallon tax and said: "The Liberal Party would never do it. We would never tax gasoline at 18 cents a gallon". We took the crack and said that it is short-term pain for long-term gain. That was the line we used.

We were not successful with that line because none of us wanted to inflict apparently short-term pain on ourselves for long-term gain. We did not see any need for it. Most Canadians quickly did the calculation. Mr. Speaker, if you buy 20 gallons of gasoline, that is $3.60, and $3.60 was a lot more in 1980 than it is today. Believe me, you know that and I know that.

This goes right back to what I was suggesting before and that is what we are debating in this House, reality versus fantasy. We were rejected because we were telling the Canadian people the truth. The fact is the Liberal government raised the price of gasoline within two and one-half years by $1 a gallon. It was $1 a gallon, not 18 cents a gallon.

After taking office in 1980 it went on a spending spree the likes of which we have never seen in Ottawa. It created the very problems that we are saddled with today. We had increases in government spending between 1980 and 1984 of 16 per cent and 17 per cent per year consecutively. When the Liberals left office the percentage of debt that they had collected or accumulated was approaching 10 per cent of our gross domestic product.

They were spending $1.31 on programs for every dollar in tax they took in. How long can a government sustain itself at that kind of a spending clip? A government cannot sustain itself spending in such a horrendous way. It was a wanton disregard of the taxpayer.

When we took office in 1984 that is what was over our heads, a huge accumulated debt of $210 billion, a debt that was piled up over the years.

On the other side, they gave us an annual deficit, that is the amount of money that the federal government was overspending on a yearly basis, of $34 billion.

Some hon. members: Thirty-eight billion dollars.

Mrs. Sparrow: It is $38 billion.

Mr. Thompson: Excuse me, $38 billion. I am off by $4 billion. Thank you, Bobbie. We were left with a structural deficit and a mountain of accumulated debt.

The line they used in 1984 when we took office was they left the cupboard bare. They left us in a position from which it would be very hard to operate the reins of government efficiently. They really did leave the cupboard bare.

What did that first government do at that time? I call it a structural deficit because some of the programs and some of the things the government bought into we simply could not cut off the tap overnight and shut them off. Those spending ways followed us for the first couple of years of our mandate after forming the government in 1984.

They are up to the same sort of tricks today in 1993, a decade away from 1983, the year the present Prime Minister took over the leadership of this party and only nine years ago after he became Prime Minister.

Despite the difficulties we inherited as a government in 1984 we have made remarkable progress. I mentioned the level of debt in relation to our gross domestic product being in the order of approaching 10 per cent. We cut that in two. As the Canadian economy has continued to grow over the years we have cut that percentage down. We cut it exactly in two.

Some of the measures we are talking about over the years in the various budgets that we have brought in as a government have been intended to do that very thing, not only bring down the level of debt but encourage investment. That is what Bill C-92 will do.

We had some members on this side of the House over the last number of days stand up and explain in detail some of the aspects of this bill, particularly in regard to trusts and the closing of loopholes in regard to taxation of big corporations, et cetera.

We have done what we have had to do. I feel quite confident that Bill C-92 if passed by this House will lead us down the road in the direction that we believe that Canada has to be taken. Canada needs a full economy, a productive economy while we continue to make the tough choices, to do the tough things that are necessary to achieve that.

I will leave it at that. I look forward to questions and comments from the members across the room.

• (1630)

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I found the speech by the member for Carleton—Charlotte rather interesting when he was trying to explain to us what good managers the Conservatives have been since 1984.

I would like to do two things. First, I wish to make a comment to clarify some figures and pose two short questions.

In the last full year of the federal sales tax, that is 1989–90, the gross take was $18 billion and the net was $17 billion. In the first full year of the GST the gross collection in 1991–92 was $30 billion and the net was $15 billion, less half a billion dollars for administration and collection, which brings it down to $14.5 billion.

Mrs. Sparrow: That's not true. Come on, Eugene, get your figures straight.

Mr. Bellemare: I have been challenged from across the way to give my source. I have just come from meetings in the public accounts committee where we had the Revenue Canada Deputy Minister and his team show up. These are the answers I was provided with. I took care to write my questions down to get written answers and these are the bottom lines that I received from the last meeting.

In other words, when the government had the federal sales tax, for every dollar it collected in 1989–90 it kept 95 cents. In 1991–92 for every dollar it collected it kept less than 49 cents. Is that good management?

My two short questions for the member for Carleton—Charlotte are these. Why did the finance department get rid of the cost benefit analysis committee just about a year ago? My second question is, what was the national debt in 1984 and what is it today in 1993?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, I will tell the hon. member exactly what the debt was in 1984, as I did in my opening remarks and I will tell you what it is today. I will not disguise the figure. Back in 1984 the debt was $210 billion when we assumed office.

Mr. Bellemare: One hundred and sixty.

Mrs. Sparrow: That is not true.

Mr. Thompson: The figure is $210 billion. We can argue whether it is that or something else, but that is the figure that I am using and it is accurate. The debt today is in the vicinity of $450 billion.

Members opposite take great delight in those numbers because they simply point at that number and say: "It went from 210 to 450, so therefore it is your fault". What they do not consider is the fact that they could not pay the groceries back in 1984. What they were running back in 1984, we mentioned the figure and the member for Calgary Southwest corrected me on it, that they had an annual deficit when we took office of $38 billion.

It means that they could not even pay interest on their debt because they were overspending to such a high degree. In other words, they could not pay down the debt because they were running a $38 billion deficiency yearly.

Since then the overspending on an annual basis which we are still caught up in has allowed compound interest on that debt to simply escalate the debt from $210 billion to $450. Every single nickel of the debt today is simply interest on the debt. It is not because of government overspending.

The thing we can take a great deal of pride in on this side of the House is that last year we had a $5 billion surplus in our operating account. That was during a recessionary year. The year before we had a surplus of over $12 billion in the operating account.

• (1635)

We apply that against debt servicing. Our goal on this side of the House is to get down to what we call a zero borrowing position so that we can actually start paying down the debt. However, when one inherits a structural deficit as we did when we took over the reins of government from the Liberals in 1984, that restricts one from doing that and it has restricted us from doing it.

We are going to crunch that number but we are not going to do it by listening to those folks across the hall because they have voted against every single item we have brought into this House and every single budget measure to reduce the level of debt in this country.

Guess what else they voted against? Look at the spending controls that we imposed upon ourselves as a federal government. Guess what they did? They voted against it. Just about a year ago it looked as if they could take office and they would love to take office with no spending controls because that is the way they run government.

The other thing we did was to create a dedicated fund for debt reduction. They voted against establishing that as well. They voted against every single measure we brought into this House to get out from underneath the burden of debt.

They cannot disagree with me on that one because I challenge every Canadian out there to examine the voting record of those folks across the hall. We will find out that it is recorded that they voted against every single measure we brought into this House in order to get our debt position under control. They made it practically impossible to get it under way any sooner.

They are prolonging this debate today because they do not want Bill C-92 to go through because it flies in the face of the kind of reality they do not want to own up to.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Briefly, Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the member for Carleton—Charlotte would tell the House why the Liberal Party is opposed to the restitution of the following: small business development bonds, the reduction in the manufacturing corporate tax rate by 2 per cent, the introduction of the home buyer's plan that allows individuals to purchase houses with RRSP money, the reduction of the individual surtax from 5 per cent to 3 per cent, measures to assist Canadians with disabilities to allow those who are supporting a disabled Canadian to deduct the unused portion of disabled deductions from their personal income tax on a tax-credit basis, the right to deduct $680 tax credit for education and have the right to have that deduction transferred to parents and grandparents, the child care credit increase from $2,000 to $3,000, the increase of the child care credit for children under seven from $4,000 to $5,000 and the provision in the bill for the rollover of family farms to working sons and daughters of those farms without the imposition of capital gains tax.

Indeed, are they really opposed to all of these corrective measures that are in this bill to make the collection of tax more fair and to block loopholes? Is that what they are opposed to? Why in his view are they just yammering about this bill?

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, that fits in very well with what I was mentioning. Not only have they opposed measures we have taken on this side of the House to reduce the cost of government—that is to reduce government spending—they have opposed some very measures in this House that would not only lead to increased productivity within the Canadian economy, but they flew in the face of some—what we would call—social measures that we have taken in this House and to which the member has alluded.

I do not know how they can take much pleasure in this debate considering their track record over the last three to four years.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of the adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Grants to municipalities; the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—Immigration; the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond—Sexual harassment; the hon. member for Algoma—Agriculture.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill C-92 is drawing to a close, and I have only five minutes to provide a summary of this bill. Since the legislation itself is far too complex to explain in a few minutes, I will concentrate on the important principles we should observe when governing a country with a population of over 27 million people.

First of all, what is essential in a democracy is the way we tax our citizens and ourselves. Nothing could be more basic. The way we are taxed and tax others should be fair and equitable, irrespective of the taxpayer's position in society. This is an important principle of democracy and responsible government, which we have inherited and which goes back for centuries. It has evolved over time, but the ultimate goal remains the well-being of our fellow citizens.

What has happened recently? We had the so–called tax reform. I know they used the word "reform", but that is not necessarily what it means. We had tax increases, but the burden of those increases was felt to a far greater extent by the middle class than by the wealthiest segment of our society. These increases came in the form of indirect taxes, consumer taxes and, finally, the GST, a tax that has created so much frustration for entrepreneurs and retailers in this country. Even today, two years later, there is still a general feeling of frustration as a result of this tax.

Reform was the order of the day. They introduced the GST, and gradually people are realizing that the GST did not deliver the expected results. People predicted there would be serious problems but they went ahead anyway. Today, the figures are coming out at various committees mentioned by the hon. member from Ottawa: a certain amount was collected by the government which had to use part of it to finance operations. Rebates had to be paid as well. All this goes to show that the net benefit of all these taxes leaves a lot to be desired.

However, what I find particularly interesting in Bill C–92, after talking about the fairness principle and the need to have a tax that is fair and equitable, is the part that deals with family trusts. Bill C–92 contains a truly bizarre provision which defies justification and flies in the face of the principle of tax equity. Twenty–one years ago the Liberal government at the time introduced amendments to the family trust provisions. It decided to adopt the 21–year rule, in other words, irrespective of the type of family trust, after 21 years the accrued value of these trusts would be taxed. It was a way to get rid of this tax shelter for the country's wealthiest families. On January 1, 1993 all trusts were obliged to pay the taxes which had accrued during those years.

The bill provides that the 21–year rule will no longer apply and that family trusts will be taxed only after the youngest member has died. In some cases this may take 20, 30 or even more than 40 years. So this is another substantial benefit.

Experts and tax lawyers appearing before the parliamentary committee argued that it was a tremendous advantage for the wealthiest families in our country.

Where is the fairness and justice in all this? I would say that of all the tax bills that have been passed in this House, this is the worst.

I think this is a disgrace. When we form the government this fall, our first responsibility will be to rescind this bill and apply the 21–year rule.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 4.45 o'clock p.m., pursuant to an order made Tuesday, March 30, 1993, in accordance with the provision of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

HEALTH

BREAST-MILK SUBSTITUTES

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider adopting as binding in Canada the World Health Organization's International Code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am most pleased to rise today and speak to this motion. There are very few subjects on which I have received so much correspondence and promotion other than this one since I have been elected.

There are a large number of people in Canada who have been trying to deal with this health related issue for a number of years. Unfortunately, to this date they have not been successful.

I want to pay tribute to some of them because their perseverance has ensured that this matter be debated within the House of Commons. People like Jack Newman in Toronto, Renée Hefti in Vancouver, Jean Geary and Elisabeth Sterken have kept this issue alive in spite of the opposition from the rather large lobbies within the infant formula companies.

Much to my amazement within the last three days when it became known that this bill was going to be discussed this afternoon, I received a number of faxes from right across Canada supporting this motion. They were from health organizations, health workers, paediatricians, nurses and others who have become interested in the whole issue of breast-milk substitutes.

I want to discuss the subject by laying out three or four areas. First, why should we be promoting breast-feeding? Second, what is the international code? Third, what has been the voluntary code that the companies claim they have been following in Canada? Fourth, what in fact is actually happening in this country?

Breast feeding is a serious health matter. We are more and more switching our concept of health to preventive health. Preventive health means that we ensure how we practise our lifestyles promotes the optimum health in people.

Information is now increasingly being accumulated that shows breast feeding has significant health improvements for infants. Breast-fed infants experience lower gastrointestinal disease rates and reduced respiratory illness. The ratios are quite striking.

There is an incidence of four to six times more gastrointestinal infections in bottle-fed infants. Respiratory illnesses are five times as high. There is indication that breast feeding reduces the incidence of bacterial meningitis.

There is some interesting information being accumulated which shows that bottle-fed babies have an increased risk of insulin dependence. Lymphomas are six times more common in babies who have not been breast fed.

We have a whole series of medical reasons as to why infants should be breast fed. There are benefits to the mother. There are medical reports that indicate there is a reduced incidence of breast cancer and ovarian cancer in women who breast feed babies. Not only is it medically beneficial to the infant it is medically beneficial to the mother.

There are also economic reasons for breast feeding. Right now the cost of infant formulas or breast-milk substitutes range anywhere from $1,200 to $3,000 a year. When you start looking at a mother who is on a low income, this represents a significant expenditure. It is particularly significant for women who are living on income assistance or women who are supporting themselves on one income, so we have an economic reason for breast feeding also.

Most literature certainly indicates that infants should be breast fed for as long as possible, six months to a year. Right now between 20 per cent and 25 per cent of babies are basically fed on formula only. Some reports indicate that 50 per cent of mothers stop nursing within three months.

If there is a medical reason or it is not possible for the mother to nurse that is one thing, but what we have is the infant formula companies convincing women that they should not nurse, that there are better ways of feeding their infants.

I hope the parliamentary secretary to the minister of health who seems to defend the big multinational infant formula companies will speak on this bill and will explain why the government is tolerating the kind of marketing practices that are taking place by the companies.

There is a World Health Organization code that has been developed to set a code as to what the marketing practices for breast-milk substitutes should be. The code is fairly detailed. I would like to read just the summary of the 10 major points: "There shall be no advertising of these products to the public, no free samples to mothers, no promotion of products in health care facilities, no company mothercraft nurses to advise mothers, no gifts or personal samples to health workers, no words or pictures idealizing artificial feeding, including pictures of infants on the labels of the products. Information to health workers should be scientific and factual. All information on artificial infant feeding including the labelling should explain the benefits of breast feeding and the costs and hazards associated with artificial feeding." There are other parts to the code but those are the significant ones that I want to spend my time addressing this afternoon.

The industry decided it would adopt a voluntary code of practice for the Canadian Infant Formula Association. I want to read some of the things it said it would do voluntarily. Its code is quite extensive but I will just read a few of the points.

It says: "Member companies recognize that the decision to breast feed or not to breast feed, to discontinue breast feeding or to supplement breast feeding should be made by mothers with the counsel and advice of other health professionals and infant formula companies should not be involved in such decisions. Product claims will only contain statements that are consistent with sound medical and scientific data".

It goes on: "Infant formula companies will not make grants or contributions to support research, educational programs, fellowships, participation in professional meetings or the like or provide incidental services or professional courtesies for the purpose of discouraging breast feeding or encouraging hospitals or health care institutions to favour the donor's infant formula products and related products".

They will not make donations in order to encourage hospitals or health care institutions to favour the donor's infant formula products or related products. The donating company will inform the beneficiary institution such grants or contributions are made free, gratis, without any commercial conditions.

There are other things. It says that: "Samples of infant formula products will be provided only to medical facilities and health professionals for their discretionary distribution to mothers".

All of these things they glowingly say they are going to do. Let us look at what the major producers of infant formula are doing in Canada. I have pages of information where they simply totally disregard their own code, let alone the much more strenuous World Health Organization code.

I want to talk about them in three general areas. First of all, they give out misleading information. I have some examples where they say: "Just what the breast-feeding mother ordered". This is what they give to mothers directly: "Congratulations. Ross Laboratories joins you and your doctor, nurse and hospital extending to you, your baby and family the best wishes and good health and happy new year", just what the breast-feeding mother ordered. They give her this with a sample.

Here is one from Carnation, misleading advertising: "A new nutritionally complete infant formula". We have a lot of medical information that there are things missing in even the best infant formulas that affect the health of the child.

Mrs. Sparrow: What happens if you just cannot do it?

Mr. Karpoff: There are women who just cannot, but for women who can why should we allow companies like this to promote misleading information that says: "It is specifically processed to be hypo-allergenic and prevent the symptoms of food allergy". That is implying that breast milk creates food allergies. What hogwash. They simply promote with misleading advertising.

One of the things that the codes clearly say is they are not to market directly to people. They are only to market to the health care professionals, but they repeatedly give out free samples.

I have lists, pages of codified violations for direct advertising to the lay public in Canadian magazines, direct advertising to lay public on computer terminals in doctors' offices, patient hand-outs being given directly to people, brand advertising and patient hand-outs saying: "Breast feeding is the preferred method of feeding for newborns", and suggesting early weaning. That is a hand-out that they are giving directly to mothers, booklets that contain sample packs and advertising, all of the things that they said they will not do. They would go to big stores and get them to put direct advertising promotions on displays to try to influence women not to breast feed but to use their infant formula.

The most disgraceful part is what they have now started to do with health care facilities in this country. They have started to systematically make deals with health care facilities against the recommendation often of their medical staff, their paediatricians, the public health nurses, saying: "We will give you a grant if you give us exclusive right to hand out our samples in your hospital and exclusively you use only our product in your hospital". They think if a woman starts using a breast-feeding substitute in hospital she will stay with the brand she has become familiar with.

This is not small or inconsequential hospitals. One of the more prestigious hospitals in Canada, the Women's College Hospital in Toronto, has within the last months signed a $1 million agreement with Mead Johnson. It is giving them $1 million for renovation so it can have access. In exchange Mead Johnson gets access to new mothers and to give out free formula.

That is in total violation of the code. This is opposed by the Canadian Medical Association. We should think about the number of free samples that are given out. A maximum of 25 per cent of mothers do not nurse in hospitals. There were 360,000 births last year. Mead Johnson gave out 300,000 samples to mothers in hospitals, nearly one for every nursing mother.

Ross Laboratories distributed 18,000 videos promoting its product in hospitals. Mead Johnson has signed a five year contract with the Royal Columbian Hospital in New Westminster, British Columbia that gives it exclusive use of its product in hospital. It immediately surrounded that area with a promotional program in drug stores promoting its product and having gift packs handed out to mothers of newborns. Carnation did a direct mail-out.

There is a little heat coming from a number of sources saying: "You are not living up to your own voluntary code". It is very clear that they are repeatedly not living up to their voluntary code.

Ross' solution is it has simply pulled out of the infant formula association. It says: "We no longer have to even bother to follow the code of practice that is a watered down code of practice. We will ignore everything and whatever we can do to promote, we will".

This has become a major problem in overseas countries but it is an increasing problem in Canada. One of the companies that we talked about here today that is closing its drug pharmaceutical plant in Windsor, Wyeth, continues to promote gift packs and suggestions for early weaning.

I see that I have only two minutes left. I want to say three things. First, this government has been less than helpful. It is on record that I asked the question in the House previously as to why it would not enact it. They sent me back a long letter of gobbledegook and a statement that said: "In 1987 departmental negotiations with the formula industry led to the industry agreeing to respect the aim and principles of the international code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes".

That is what they tell you and this is what you get.

The government itself in some of its promotional stuff discourages breast feeding. Some of the information handed out in immigration information tells immigrant women they should not breast feed in Canada in public. This is hogwash.

There is indication that the free trade agreement may stop Canada from implementing a code. However it is clear to me that the industry will not voluntary police itself. It has had a code. It has chosen to ignore that code and therefore I am asking this House to ensure that the code is followed by making it mandatory.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I truly appreciate this opportunity to say some remarks with regard to the motion before the House. I have four youngsters and indeed did nurse four youngsters.

I have to say that when I took a set of twins home from the hospital and nursed both babies three hours apart, then I was very glad to have some formula around, thank you.

What my colleague is bringing forward has to do with a health issue and it affects every new mother, there is no doubt about it, and every baby around the world and I certainly concede to that.

For many years Health and Welfare Canada has been instrumental in promoting breast feeding as an ideal and the most preferred form of nourishing babies. Since 1985 Health and Welfare Canada has encouraged all hospitals to adopt policies and to adopt practices in support of breast feeding and of the international code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes adopted by the World Health Organization.

The government as well has encouraged the industry that produces and distributes infant formula in Canada to carry out self-regulation. The industry through the Canadian Infant Formula Association has adopted a code of practice that supports the aim and the principles of the international code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes.

The declared purpose of the code of practice is to ensure that the marketing practices of Canadian manufacturers of infant formula support Canada's national goal to promote breast feeding and ensure safe and adequate nutrition for all infants.

The first sentence of the code of practice declares that breast feeding is the preferred way of feeding most infants. The code of practice goes on to describe many commitments, prohibitions and limitations on marketing practices.

Such detailed information on the claims of infant formula products will be directed only to the physician, so what they advertise goes only to physicians or other health professionals. Communication with scientific organizations and government agencies assures that marketing is in concert with their efforts to promote breast feeding, infant health and well-being.

This motion now before the House proposes that the government adopt as binding in Canada the international code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes issued by the World Health Organization. If one looks at the universal scope of this code and some of the provisions, they are neither applicable nor appropriate for implementation in Canada.

The code calls on member states to give effect to its principles and aim in the form they deem appropriate.

Canada has already done this through policies and practices which are appropriate and comprehensive. More than 10 years ago, after the adoption of the code by the World Health Organization, our Government of Canada obtained unanimous support for the aim and the principles of the code by all the provincial governments. The governments agreed that in Canada the code should be implemented not through legislation—this is all the 10 provinces plus the federal government—and regulation but through education, health promotion and co-operation.

Almost 80 per cent of the mothers in Canada start by breast feeding their babies and more than 40 per cent continue to breast feed their babies for at least three months. Health and Welfare Canada has carried out and will continue to carry out comprehensive programs that promote breast feeding such as the Breast Feeding Advocacy Kit, the National Guidelines on Family-Centred Maternity and Newborn Care, a publication called You and Your Baby and brochures such as Ten Great Reasons to Breast Feed and Ten Valuable Tips for Successful Breast Feeding.

In fact these efforts were underscored even further by the Minister of National Health and Welfare last year. He introduced an initiative called Brighter Futures that puts $500 million in new moneys for targeting areas of concern with regard to youngsters up to seven years old. Brighter Futures recognizes the vital importance of breast feeding as a means of improving the health care of all infants.

Provincial governments continue in their partnerships with promoting programs. Non-governmental organizations throughout Canada and around the world continue their successful efforts to inform and educate parents on why breast feeding is by far the most beneficial way. Health professionals recognize and they know the effectiveness that their role has in promoting and supporting breast feeding.

This co-operative approach right across our country through the provincial governments, through all the agencies, and indeed with the federal government is serving mothers and children very well. Some people out there may ask: Who is making sure that our public policies, our national goals throughout this country and the international code are being followed. Why is there not legislation, as the hon. member across the way has asked? Why are there not regulations? Who is enforcing these codes?

I am sure that almost everybody in this House is aware that more legislation, more regulation and more policing is the last thing that we need. I think that the people of Canada as individuals are very responsible and they have to accept responsibilities, and indeed it is the woman's choice. Yes, she should be made aware of the benefits of breast feeding, but indeed the choice is hers. There are other implications that we do not know that may change her attitude. Indeed, it is up to the woman and her family with regard to breast milk.

Sure we have a code and a practice with the Canadian Infant Formula Association. As I said, we will work with all the provinces and we will not implement legislation. We will educate and make people aware and work with our provincial counterparts to make sure that the youngsters have the best.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak to this motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider adopting as binding in Canada the World Health Organization's International Code of marketing of breast-milk substitutes.

introduced by my colleague for Surrey North. I congratulate my colleague for taking this initiative.

Let me start by saying that breast milk is a natural product of a woman and it is free. Let me say that the Montreal Diet Dispensary, which helps 250,000 Quebec mothers each year to eat healthier foods, encourages mothers to breast feed because it is the most nutritious way to feed babies and it promotes a strong bond between mother and child. The child feels secure and loved.

What is the need for this motion? It is the aim of the World Health Organization in adopting the code to ensure that the slick advertising by infant formula manufacturers may not prompt mothers to buy formula rather than breast feed their babies. The importance of breast feeding cannot be over-emphasized.

In September 1991 the government acknowledged, as recorded in Hansard of the House of Commons, that it supported in principle the WHO international code. It said that it had played a key role in developing and promoting the code and that the department of health obtained unanimous support for the aim and principles of the code from all the Canadian provinces.

Furthermore, the government stated that it had taken a strong position with the Canadian infant formula industry by asking it to assume the responsibilities under the international code.

Things have happened differently. There have been many instances where mothers have been persuaded to start with the breast-milk formula because of the advertising approach and because formula is given free in the hospitals. That has been shown to in fact be a very persuasive tool.

If in fact this government is committed to this code, why does it not carry it to the logical conclusion and enshrine it into law, in legislation and regulation to prove its sincerity? Why not do it all: education, health promotion and a governing regulation and legislation so that when there is an infraction of this code the necessary teeth are there to ensure that the health of our babies and the health of our mothers are protected? That is the minimum that we can do for the health and welfare of mothers and babies in this country.

A headline recently published in The Montreal Gazette dated March 6, 1993, read: "Hospital sold its soul for a $1 million grant". Dr. Haslam, president of the Canadian Paediatric Society, wrote and registered his protest to this approach. The Canadian Paediatric Society is the professional society that leads all paediatricians subscribing to the importance of breast feeding.

Breast feeding, as I said, is a natural and free product from a mother. The many medical advantages of human milk are known. It is known that breast-fed babies are not prone or are less prone to disturbances of the gastrointestinal tract. They have greater resistance to infection of the respiratory system. Breast feeding creates enhanced bonding between mother and child.

Just recently I spoke with Ms. Jean Geary of INFACT Canada who told me of her concerns as she had seen them in practice. There are no teeth in the voluntary compliance with the presently existing code in Canada. Breast feeding itself is not being protected. In fact, by the giving of free samples we are allowing those samples to be used immediately and that is known to inhibit lactation. She also told me that a video film has been produced by an infant formula company that will certainly downplay the role of breast feeding. All of these are counterproductive to the goal of ensuring that breast feeding is promoted in Canada.

I also spoke to Dr. Jack Newman of the University of Toronto Hospital for Sick Children, who is an expert in the field. He conveyed two messages to me. First, Canada has an obligation to adopt the international code. Since it has been acknowledged by the government that Canada has participated in a key way in the development of this international code, this code must be binding on all Canadian manufacturers of infant formula. This code must have teeth.

We should have regulation or enabling legislation in Canada to ensure that the intent and principle of the international code are followed in our country.

Dr. Newman related to me the many problems he had encountered in his clinical practice. Many babies become ill because of contaminated and improperly used formula. In fact, formula should be labelled as medication, just to be used only in certain circumstances. It should not be the food of choice for infants. The milk product formula was never meant to be the food of choice. Breast milk ought to be the food of choice for all babies in our country.

On this note, I would like to lend my support to this motion. I hope the government will be challenged enough to adopt enabling legislation so that the intent and purposes of the international code are truly adopted in Canada without any doubt, with all the necessary safeguards and thereby ensure the health and welfare of our newborn Canadians and of our mothers.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to speak to this motion.

I welcome the opportunity to discuss both our government's commitment to the principles of the international code and our concerted efforts to ensure that newborns in Canada benefit from the best available nutrition, their mother's milk.

All levels of care in Canada recognize and promote breast feeding as the preferred method of infant feeding, particularly in the first six months of life when infants are most vulnerable. The advantages of breast feeding include optimal infant nutrition, immunologic protection and psychological benefits.

Breast feeding had declined in many parts of the industrialized world including Canada. As a result, the promotion of breast feeding became a primary goal of the World Health Organization and Health and Welfare Canada.

In 1979, the World Health Organization and the United Nations Children's Fund proposed an international code governing the marketing of commercial infant formulas and other breast milk substitutes including bottle fed complementary foods.

Canada played a key role in developing the international code which is called the WHO International Code of Marketing of Breast-milk Substitutes. The World Health Assembly passed the international code in May 1980.

Canada has also played a key role in promoting this important code. In 1981, the year after it was passed by the world health body, the Department of National Health and Welfare obtained unanimous support from all provinces for the aim and principles of the marketing code.

At that time the provinces endorsed using educational and health promotion initiatives to implement the code rather than using a legislative and a regulatory approach. The federal government continues to endorse this position. It also fosters an encouraging resurgence in popularity of breast feeding among new mothers.

Thirty years ago, only 38 per cent of the newborns in Canada were breast fed. By 1982 that number had nearly doubled reaching 70 per cent. Recent studies indicate that nearly 80 per cent of all newborns are now initially breast fed.

Comprehensive national health and welfare approaches which are also part of the code's recommendations are designed to increase awareness of the superiority of breast milk for the health of infants.

The department widely distributes a publication for new parents called You and Your Baby. It was formerly known as The Canadian Mother and Child. For years, this has promoted breast feeding as the preferred method of infant feeding.

Also two pamphlets for parents including Ten Great Reasons to Breast Feed, Ten Valuable Tips for Successful Breast Feeding and a breast feeding advocacy kit produced for health professionals and for the public encourage hospitals to adopt policies and practices in support of breast feeding and the WHO international code.

As well, the promotion of breast feeding is an integral part of the post-partum parent support program for the parents of newborns and for the family centred maternity and newborn care. These are national guidelines.

In recent years, the department has also worked closely with a variety of health professionals and advocacy groups to raise public awareness of the benefits of breast feeding. These efforts will continue with the government's commitment to children and to their families under the child development initiative of Brighter Futures.

Current objectives of breast feeding promotions are these and I would like to emphasize them: To increase the initiation and duration rates of breast feeding, thereby improving the health of infants and to encourage and support breast feeding as the culturally accepted norm in our communities.

Moreover, the federal government recently reaffirmed its support for breast feeding as a contribution to children's help by signing the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. Signatories agree to ensure access in their countries to education about the advantages of breast feeding.

In addition, the composition and the production of infant formulas are strictly regulated under the Food and Drugs Act. Infant formula manufacturers must notify the Department of National Health and Welfare prior to making a major change in an existing formula or before introducing a new product.

Health and Welfare Canada has supported the self-regulation of the infant formula industry to ensure that the industry complies with the code's marketing objective. The department also promotes breast feeding to ensure that prospective parents and mothers of young infants are aware that the benefits of breast feeding to a child far outweigh the benefits of infant formulas.

As a result of negotiations with the Canadian Infant Formula Association, the infant formula industry agreed that education and advertising materials should not imply equivalence of the two sources of nutrition and should not discourage breast feeding. This is one of the basic principles of the international code of marketing of breast milk substitutes.

The industry also agrees to limit product promotion. The Canadian Infant Formula Association's own code stipulates that "infant formula companies will conform to the position of the Canadian Paediatric Society—which recommends that all advertising of infant formula products be directed to health professionals and not to the lay public".

Health and Welfare Canada encourages the infant formula industry in Canada to adhere to its voluntary commitment to the principle of the WHO code.

I will summarize by saying that the Department of National Health and Welfare will continue its co-ordination role in this important area, reflecting the federal government's policy of consultation and negotiation. Companies must provide information on a composition of the formula and submit the results of studies that demonstrate that the product will promote acceptable growth and development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired. I must say it must be a coincidence that we are discussing breast feeding since your chair officer and his wife are proud grandparents of a beautiful baby girl, Kathleen Elizabeth Kemp, born to us on March 30. The mother is breast feeding and both baby and mother are doing fine.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on February 11 I asked the Minister of Finance to cancel or postpone his announcement of December 2, 1992 to freeze grants in lieu of taxes paid to municipalities.

Many Canadians might ask: What are grants in lieu of taxes that are paid to municipalities? Prior to 1950 the Crown, that is the federal government, did not pay any taxes or grants to cities for their properties within those cities: post offices, airports, ports, office buildings and so on. It did not do so even though those federal buildings received services such as garbage collection, fire protection, snow removal, the roads and streets in the cities and so on. Those federal buildings received those services but until 1950 the federal government did not pay any city taxes.

In 1950 the federal government agreed that it should do so. Therefore it passed the Municipal Grants Act, which provided for grants in lieu of taxes to be paid to the cities. In that program there was a mechanism to adjust those taxes from year to year in accordance with the rates of inflation and increasing costs of the cities. The cities relied on that program as written and expected to get from year to year certain increases in those grants when there were increases in taxes.

On December 2 in the mini budget presented by the Minister of Finance he announced without any warning or consultation with the cities that he was freezing the grants to the cities in lieu of taxes at the 1992 level. He did that after many cities in Canada had already prepared their budgets for 1993.

They prepared their budgets on the basis of the agreements as they existed. As a result of that freeze the cities stand to lose approximately $80 million. The biggest loser of all the cities is the city of Montreal, my city, which will lose approximately $10 million.

A city like Montreal, having prepared its budget and having expected a certain amount of money from the federal government, now must scramble to deal with that unexpected loss. It will either have to further raise city taxes or cut out vital programs.

Some people may say that it should cut programs, but I do not think many would say that today if it was to cut out snow removal or garbage removal or whatever.

This is no way to run a country. Who else in this country can decide without any consultation or warning they are just not going to pay their taxes?

The reply from the minister to me on February 11 was that there were great increases in these grants in 1990, 1991, and 1992. He said that the amounts were very large.

That may be so, but those were large payments because they were based on the size and number of the federal government's buildings in those cities and the services that they received. The increases were based on cost of living increases and increased costs, so that is not an answer.

There may have been good grounds for the federal government to want to discuss with the cities revisions or changes in the program, but it should have done that. It should have proceeded with the discussions and then maybe after the discussions it could have arrived at a new program that would provide for lower payments if warranted. As I said, it went ahead and announced this freeze without any warning or any discussions with the cities.

I ask at least that the freeze be removed, or at the very least that it be postponed. I ask the parliamentary secretary once again to consider lifting the freeze or postponing it.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as you know, a freeze on grants in lieu of property taxes was announced in the economic and fiscal statement of December 2, 1992. Consequently, this measure is part of a broadly based expenditure restraint program designed to reduce the deficit and provide for reallocation of resources to investment in sectors that will enhance economic growth, such as the public infrastructure initiative. The December economic statement contained many restraint measures. Some of these measures will reduce program spending. Others, such as those affecting grants in lieu of taxes, will simply have the effect of freezing program spending.

It would be useful to recall the purpose of the grants in lieu of taxes program. Under the Canadian Constitution, the federal government cannot be taxed by another level of government. However, the federal government has deliberately chosen to pay equivalent amounts in lieu of property taxes. We have paid property, and continue to pay, more than $400 million annually in grants, a very substantial contribution by any standards.

Over the past few years, grants in lieu of property taxes have increased at a rapid rate. For instance, in 1986–87, the total amount of grants in lieu of taxes on departmental property was $217 million. In 1992–93, this number almost doubled, rising to $424 million. During the past two years alone, grants in lieu of taxes have increased by more than 30 per cent. Considering the federal government's financial situation, that is clearly not sustainable.

The federal government is accountable to Canadian taxpayers. It must ensure that the payments it makes voluntarily are reasonable and appropriate, considering the equivalent tax rates they represent. After all, there is only one taxpayer.

Public Works Canada is responsible for the administration of the program and has decided how the freeze will be implemented. No municipality will receive less money in grants in 1993 than it did in 1992, unless there was a change in value of the federal property or a drop in local taxes. Funding will be available to municipalities that are looking for legitimate increases. It is therefore premature to speculate on the specific impact on each municipality.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on March 17, 1993 I said to the Minister of Employment and Immigration:

> The immigration mail-in application system has been failing in Toronto for a year.

I spoke from 11 years of serving constituents in Trinity—Spadina, who are mostly foreign born. Service by the immigration department has never been so bad, never been so careless, never been so negligent, and never been so contemptuous of the customer as it has been for the past year. That continues right up to April 1.

I also said, and this is the point:

> MPs' inquiries often go unanswered for more than a month and too often the answer when it comes is there has been no officer working on that file for these months.

One example is a sponsorship that was undertaken on December 3, 1991. The constituent contacted this office in April 1992 and the office was told that there would be an answer by May 11, 1992. On May 26, 1992, the office was told that the file had not yet been processed and would probably be done in two months' time. In August the CIC said the application had not been looked at yet. "Someone is going to review original humanitarian and compassionate grounds, has not done it yet, not top priority".

By January 22, 1993 there was nothing on any answer from the Canada immigration service. On February 1 a call from the immigration service promised that the file would be taken care of. On March 9 in a call from the CIC it was indicated that the case file would be assigned to an officer. On March 15, 1993, there was a fax from the CIC and a call back to the CIC brought the information that it was not known who was in charge of the file for decision on H and C grounds.

Today, April 1, well over a year and a half after the application, the message the CIC sent was that the case file is with the assistant manager and our office should call back again in two weeks' time for further updating.

There is another ridiculous case. A lady applied to sponsor her mother in September 1991. The lady wrote to the CIC requesting an update and got no answer on the case. In December 1992, 15 months later, the CIC staff told my staff that the case was put into inventory and never looked at. They said it would be assigned to an officer with an urgent tag and if the constituent had not heard from immigration by January, the constituent should call. The constituent never heard from immigration. Two and a half years later, on February 22, 1993 a fax was sent to the immigration office requesting an update and there has been no answer as of April 1, today.

This is contemptuous behaviour toward the taxpayers who are paying the bills for this department.

My third and last example is a fax request to the department in December 1992 which was answered. This time I will have to admit it was answered later saying that they had faxed to the RCMP. The CIC had called back saying the RCMP reported that it was still outstanding. The update was requested December 4, 1992 and was not back yet. Report 27 had to be written up on the client because of late extension of visa. Then, on March 13, a fax was sent after further conversations. It states: "This client is reportable under section 27 of the Immigration Act as she did not extend her visa in time. A report has to be written by an officer. To date the report is outstanding. We will transfer the file back to the officer dealing with this case".

They are simply contemptuous of the public who pay their fees, contemptuous of the members of Parliament who represent the public. They do not do the work because the staff has been so chopped, so reduced, so demoralized that it is impossible for them to carry out their duties. I ask the minister to cancel this stupid unworkable mail-in program.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has raised a couple of issues. One has to do with client service and the other has to do with restructuring.

First, we are all aware that all levels of government are under fiscal constraints and we are well aware that we have limited tax dollars. However, the restructuring of the Canada Immigration Centre network is going to provide what we believe to be more efficient and effective client service while saving the taxpayers dollars.

The enhanced use of technology over the past number of years in the case of the processing centre is scheduled to begin in April 1994. All the efficiencies that we have gained through mail-ins are going to add up and we will save about $6.5 billion. That $6.5 billion is going to be used within the department to ensure that we have good client relationship, that we have good service and we maintain it at the highest level. We also of course will enhance the enforcement aspects of the immigration program in order to maintain its integrity and that is something we have all heard from Canadians from coast to coast.

While we are saving taxpayers dollars our strategy is mainly to maintain client service at a high level.

Of the existing 64 points of service we will maintain a community presence with full-time immigration staff in 51. It is not a rampant reduction of the inland delivery network. We are redefining the structures of the Canada Immigration Centres and we also have a presence in the smaller communities.

We will maintain client service. Because of advanced technology we will be able to utilize the data processing and the money that we—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my remarks let me take this opportunity on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada to extend its congratulations to you on once again becoming a grandfather. I do not know how many times it is exactly, three times?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Four.

Mr. Dingwall: Congratulations on behalf of our party.

On December 4, 1992 I had asked a question of the Minister of Finance with regard to the high unemployment in my district. I made reference of course to the provisions and amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act with regard to sexual harassment.

Adjournment Debate

On page 14647 of Hansard in my question to the Minister of Finance I wanted the minister to explain to the people of my constituency as to how the provisions in the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act would benefit them.

I wish to say to members opposite that the response I did receive from the minister was totally unacceptable, inappropriate and ill-advised. Indeed in some ways it was quite insulting to those who are unemployed and looking for meaningful work in my district of Cape Breton—East Richmond.

I want members opposite to realize and understand that the people in my constituency, when they get the opportunity, are good hard-working Canadians. They do not wish to be on welfare. They do not wish to be on unemployment insurance. They wish to have an opportunity to make a meaningful life for themselves and for their families and to make a contribution to their community.

I suggest that the Government of Canada has betrayed at every opportunity those individuals who reside not only in my constituency but indeed in the other constituencies of Cape Breton as a whole.

The government has made major cutbacks without consultations. It has cut back with regard to money for post-secondary education. Our health care system has many holes in it at the present time. Unfortunately the government would give the impression that somehow it is doing all sorts of wonderful things for the unemployed in this country and nothing could be further from the truth.

I think of the numerous people in Saint-Léonard, Winnipeg, in northern Ontario, in the construction industry who are unemployed. In my district it is in excess of 75 per cent.

What does this government do? Absolutely nothing. It has rejected outright the proposals we have made as a national political party. In terms of a municipal infrastructure program it has laughed at that particular suggestion.

There are unemployed Canadians all across this country, in Montreal, Winnipeg, northern Ontario, Cape Breton. All the communities of Glace Bay, New Waterford, Dominion, Reserve, Sydney River, L'Ardoise have high unemployment.

I do not seek handouts from the Government of Canada but meaningful programs to put people back to work. We need facts and honest programs from this government, not the sarcastic, ill-advised, inappropriate responses we receive on a daily basis during Question Period. We need substantive answers.

I suggest to members opposite if they are not prepared to give those substantive answers and respond to the needs of the unemployed and the individuals on welfare in our society then they should step aside. They should allow another group of Canadians to assume that responsibility to provide the leadership and the direction which this country so drastically needs. It is not fair. It is not appropriate for the government to turn its back as it has over the last number of years on the unemployed of this great country. It is not fair. They are citizens who have rights like others, and as I said earlier they wish to make a contribution to Canadian society.

I look forward to hearing from the government opposite as to what specific programs it will put in place to assist the unemployed and to tell the constituents of Cape Breton—East Richmond how the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act will reduce the frightfully high unemployment in Cape Breton. How will it do that, Mr. Speaker?

We look forward to a substantive and not a vague, wishy-washy answer that we have received repeatedly from the Minister of Finance and in particular from the parliamentary secretary who sits opposite.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there were quite a few allegations in the opposition member's statement, but I think one that he made quite clear that I heard had to do with the insensitivity or the unfair dealings at the Canada Employment Centres.

First of all, I have to say that all across the country the employees at the Canada Employment Centres are very sensitive, they do care and do work hard to get people back to work.

The member made reference to sexual harassment and I am glad he brought that up. I sat on the legislative committee on Bill C-113 and I have to say that sexual harassment was discussed for a very long time. There were some very misleading documents given out with regard to exactly what it was.

Sexual harassment is just cause, and any woman who quits her job due to sexual harassment will obtain UI. I have to say to you that the employees at the Canada Employment Centres have been trained or will be with regard to the sensitivity of sexual harassment cases. Meetings can be held in camera if the person claiming harassment so chooses. We realize this is very sensitive, but if there happens to be any issue where they feel there is not enough information, the person claiming sexual harassment will receive UI.

There is $3.8 billion in the 1992-93 budget that will go into job training for Canadians all across this country. I wish it were more, but we are working with limited funds.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to extend my warmest congratulations to you on the birth of another grandchild, Katie I believe it is, Kathleen Elizabeth, the night before last. I wish you well as a great grandparent.

I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture a couple of days ago and pointed out to him that over eight major organizations had spent five hours that day before the agriculture committee, every major farm organization and community organization from Saskatchewan, from the rural municipal groups, the urban municipal groups, the prairie pools, the National Farmers Union, all of these groups.

They are trying to impress upon the minister there is a major crisis out there, that net farm income is dropping by over 40 per cent from what it was last year, and last year was a disaster.

The response I got from the minister is disheartening because the minister is so concerned about the politics of the situation that he actually came to the agriculture committee meeting and sat there. We do not see that very often, where he is in so much political trouble that he—

An hon. member: Did he have his earmuffs on?

Mr. Foster: He must have, because I do not think he caught the urgency, the challenge, the crisis that exists. Net farm income works out to $5,000 for a family farm. An average family farm in Canada has a capital investment of $525,000. They have to have things like combines that cost $100,000.

The minister came to the committee meeting but he did not hear. He must have had his earmuffs on. The group was saying to him: There is a crisis out there. Net farm income across Canada is dropping by $1 billion this year. It is not all due to the international situation. Partly it is due to crops but also to the failure of the government's support program.

The first recommendation of the Prairie Pools Inc. was to provide immediate third line defence financial assistance to the grain and oil seed industries to offset the damage caused by seven years of the international trade war. What could be more explicit than that? Instead of saying: "Yes, there is urgency out there, seeding is going to be starting in places like Brandon, those areas that have suffered so much in the past few years".

The hon. member for Brandon—Souris knows what the problem is. He knows that the Minister of Agriculture should be responding. What does he say? Just listen to this gobbledegook. The Minister of Agriculture said:

> I say again that we intend to do what we can what we have been doing.

That is really when I got concerned because the government has been doing nothing. The minister went on to say:

> That is to work with the amount of money that is presently on the table, that is contributed by both levels of government and by the producers to see if we can design a program that will be maximum assistance to the producers. That is exactly what we intend to do.

That is the Minister of Agriculture. The problem is that the present amount of money is inadequate. There needs to be an emergency third line of defence assistance now so farmers can put their crops in the field. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will support me in making representations to the parliamentary secretary. He knows the situation and he has the power to respond here tonight and to put the money on the table that the minister did not give this week.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, let me join in the words of congratulations that have already been expressed to you and your family. We express the hope that you will be able to cope with your new additional responsibilities, I am sure in a very competent and experienced manner.

The question of my hon. friend, the hon. member for Algoma, brings back memories for me because I had the opportunity to answer his questions in the past when I was Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture.

I would like to take this opportunity to say personally I believe that both of us are retiring at the end of this term and because we may not have an opportunity for another exchange, I would like to wish him well in life after politics because I believe that there is life after politics.

Having expressed those kind wishes, however, I must say that I believe his remarks this evening are somewhat lacking in that he has failed to take into consideration the contributions which this government has made to agriculture during the course of the last eight years.

As he knows well but has forgotten to mention, this government has increased assistance to prairie farmers, indeed to all farmers, by almost 600 per cent since the level of assistance which was being made available when we came to power in 1984. Of course, without that support, many of the farmers who are farming today would not have been able to remain on the land.

Certainly the circumstances in terms of cash income are less than we would like it to be. It is down approximately to what were the 1990–91 levels. What we must do is to improve upon the programs which are already in place.

I would like to make mention of both GRIP and NISA. Quite frankly I was disappointed to learn the other day that the Saskatchewan government has decided at this point to withdraw from GRIP and I believe from NISA as well by 1995. I think what we need is the federal government, the provincial governments and the various parts of the farm sector to work at improving what is there, rather than asking us to start afresh.

We have been there in the past for the Canadian farmer. We will continue to be there in the future because the Canadian farmer, as you know very well, Mr. Speaker, as indeed do many other members of this House, continues to be the backbone of the Canadian economy, at least in my part of the world and indeed I think it is true for the hon. member as well.

Unfortunately the type of assistance which is available to us is not as much as we would wish it to be. We live in an age of required fiscal restraint but we will continue to do the very best we can.

CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY WATER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Transport.

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, as amended, be concurred in.

• (1010)

Mrs. Martin (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

She said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present for third reading Bill C-83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water. This act is intended to modernize Canadian legislation concerned with the rules of liability and compensation for damage or loss of goods during carriage by water.

The new act will make Canada's shipping laws more consistent with those of its trading partners.

I would like to thank the members of the Standing Committee on Transport for their consideration of this bill, the specific amendments which they proposed and which clarify certain aspects of the new legislation.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I too am pleased to rise on behalf of my colleagues with respect to Bill C-83, the carriage of goods by water act. This bill tabled by the government provides for the Minister of Transport to report to the House of Commons on the advisability of replacing the existing Hague-Visby rules with the Hamburg rules. That action would take place prior to December 31, 1999.

I want to say that the NDP transport critic, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, is unable to be here today. Nevertheless he was instrumental in the process that led up to the debate we are having today. He suggested to the committee and was able to convince the Standing Committee on Transport which reviewed this bill to change it to require the report by the minister be automatically forwarded to the Standing Committee on Transport and the committee have the power to "undertake a review of the minister's report and the committee shall report its findings back to the House including a statement on the advisability of enacting the Hamburg rules".

While to most people this change would seem to be an extremely minor one, it is part of the broader issue which I am also interested in of giving additional powers and responsibilities to standing committees.

Too often the standing committee is excluded from the decision-making process. While from time to time ministers refer specific matters to a standing committee, such as the white paper on freedom to move and deregulation and the National Transportation Agency Review Commission report, as another one that comes to mind, at other times the committee itself decides to embark on a review of a policy matter such as the VIA Rail cuts, high speed rail, or the St. Lawrence Seaway, for example. Nevertheless there is still a broad range of policy decision making that standing committees have not been involved in. This is one more way of involving the standing committee in a meaningful way in the policy-making process.

Many bills passed by the House have a mandatory review provision built into them. In some cases the review occurs after the act has been in place for five years like the WGTA or three years like the Transportation Safety Board. In these cases the government appoints an independent commission to conduct the work.

The NTA review commission, which was just recently completed, cost the taxpayers millions of dollars. There are those of us who believe that the Standing Committee on Transport which reviewed the original policy paper, Freedom to Move and the enabling legislation, could have done the job of the five-year review at considerably lower cost to the taxpayer and, I might say, I think with different conclusions.

The same argument could be made for the now under way review of the Transportation Safety Board Act being conducted only three years after the act was passed. The transport committee helped create the new board through its work in reviewing the original act and they could be charged with the task of seeing how well that act is working.

In any event what we have before us today is a small step for the transport committee and for parliamentary reform in so far as it affects the committee, but it is one that we are happy to see.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I was not sure it was necessary to engage in debate on this bill but perhaps in response to the remarks made by the member for Winnipeg Transcona I would like to affirm the fact that the committee in considering this legislation, Bill C-83 as well as Bill C-97, operated on a very co-operative and non-partisan basis. Amendments proposed by all three parties were accepted in the course of the discussions concerning the bill. I think on all sides our feeling was that the effort of the transport committee in reviewing this legislation improved its quality.

It was a demonstration of the fact that when presented with the task, in this case the revision of the private international law concerning carriage of goods by sea, this place can work effectively together and can contribute added value to the legislative process.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to rise in this House to speak on Bill C-83.

This act respecting the transportation of goods by water which was referred to the transport committee has brought to light an issue that ought to be pointed out in this debate at report stage. Through the transport committee, we could, without prejudice to efficiency, with members who are interested in transportation, allow this committee to get more involved in terms of recommendations and encourage government to pay attention to these recommendations.

For one thing, the transport committee could very well do the work that independent commissions are set up for. Independent commissions are created right and left to make recommendations to government, and then these recommendations are implemented, be it in transportation or other areas. What if, to save money in these recessionary times, government decided to pay more attention—which I think it did indeed in this bill—to the input from the transport committee? Then, the legislative committees could recommend that such and such amendment or item be examined at the transport committee level. This way, instead of spending thousands of dollars on independent commissions, the government could use the money to let parliamentarians—because there would not just be members of Parliament involved—play a much more interesting part in this process.

Members of Parliament, especially those with no direct connection to cabinet, regularly complain about not being involved in the decision-making process. And this is true of members on both side of this House. This is a fine example of them actually playing an active part in developing recommendations. The same should be done at the standing committee level to develop recommendations that would be taken into account by government and save the cost of independent commissions—we are talking about millions of dollars here—which end up duplicating the recommendations from the standing committee and then, in many instances, the recommendations are shelved for years.

A major point to bear in mind while debating this bill, as the NDP spokesperson pointed out, is the renewal of some legislation after five years. That colleague was saying that, instead of relying on an independent commission to renew the act for five years, the Committee on Transport could, during its regular work, make that recommendation and thus avoid duplication. God knows there is a lot of duplication here in the House of Commons, as well as in provincial legislatures, which is very unfortunate. It is necessary in times of economic crisis to reduce gouvernment spending and that seems very important to me.

We say in this bill that we must review transport safety every three years. Well, all the boards that are being set up could be monitored by the Committee on Transport instead of independent commissions hired by contract to submit recommendations.

I have an example in my riding of a lady, Mrs. Chaloux, whose husband unfortunately died at sea. She had to wait a year and a half before she got the safety report from the government.

It was during a meeting that I arranged for her and which took place on March 4 in Montreal that the board in question agreed to give her the safety report. Her husband has been dead for two years and she still does not know why he died. And how was that ship allowed to sail considering the state of its safety equipment? Several people died, and in that area of the Lower St. Lawrence, several accidents happened.

The boards that are appointed and which make recommendations to us every three years are often not as close to the day-to-day reality of things that are happening in the transportation area than are members of Parliament, who have the feeling on their side, who sit on the Committee on Transport and are involved in it. It is an example that we must follow in the future business of the House and the committees. It seems to me that on the democratic road that will guide us for the years to come, there should be an incentive, even a commitment from the government to take into account the recommendations from the standing committees, such as the one on transport, and to reduce considerably the number of independent commissions and contracts that are awarded to them which often look like patronage to reward some friends of the party or to give a few contracts to lobbyists who are a little too annoying.

In that sense we are wasting the Canadian or Quebecer taxpayers' money by disregarding the role of members, their recommendations, their observations, their contacts with the people, their contacts with groups involved in transportation or, for that matter, in other areas.

Moreover, by involving members we would realize substantial savings. I repeat that this is duplication since members already do that work on the transport committee which makes recommendations so there is no point striking an independent commission to confirm the same thing. This belittles the role of hon. members. Conversely it is gratifying to be able to act, to be the focal point for the demands of our regions, and this is a role members want to play, especially those we call backbenchers. Committee members would feel that they are doing something useful. They would feel part of the democratic process of government. Moreover, this would save money and we know how badly the government wants to control spending.

The committee which worked on this is a good example of what I am saying. It came up with interesting recommendations. As mentioned earlier, the government spokesperson underlined the fact that we came up with some sort of consensus following transport committee hearings. Thanks to the efforts of all political parties involved, the committee was able to agree on recommendations.

I am glad, as a member of the Bloc Quebecois, to say that we are going to give our support to this bill which results from a real democratic reflection and involvement of all political parties. As was said earlier about the Hamburg rule, we had a greater involvement of members in committee, an enhanced role for the transport committee, a fact which in the future might pave the way for other recommendations and a similar role for other committees. I thank the hon. member for Longueuil, the transport critic, for allowing me to say a few words on this subject. Normally he would be the one to address the House on such important matters. The hon. member for Laval is asking: "Why not today?" He very kindly let me speak first, being the House leader, but I assume he will have his own comments to add as well, considering a public statement he made recently about Montreal's two airports.

Our critic also sat on the transport committee, and he was somewhat surprised to hear that Pearson was the only airport designated as national by the Minister of Transport, the others being considered regional airports.

Obviously a review is necessary. Our position is that we are here to defend the interests of Quebec in the House of Commons. The minister decided, for instance, to help Canadian and not Nationair. I think he was right, but he should have refused to help Canadian as well. However, these decisions should have been considered within the context of a comprehensive review of air transportation in Canada and of the entire transportation sector.

We want to defend the interests of Quebec here in the House of Commons in no uncertain terms. We feel that any policies being considered by the minister should include a comprehensive review of air transport and of the entire transportation sector in this country. For instance, he should have refused to help Canadian as he refused to help Nationair, which was the right decision.

Until there is a comprehensive review our critic will have some very interesting things to say and publish very shortly in the party platform the Bloc Quebecois is preparing for the next election campaign regarding the specific role we will play in this House in securing a return on the money we pay to the federal government.

As long as we pay taxes to Ottawa we will have a return on those taxes. This is vital in the transportation sector.

My transport critic pointed out the monumental mistake made by Parliament when it decided on the location of Mirabel airport. The highway link is no longer possible because it would now cost $150,000 to go under the runways.

They should have listened to the Government of Quebec and selected a site for the airport near Saint-Jean, Saint-Hyacinthe or Drummondville. It would have been in Quebec's economic heartland and the province's economic interests would have been well served. This was a monumental mistake.

I am not saying it was the present government's fault. This was done by the previous government but it is clear the present government is perpetuating, not correcting the mistakes made by the previous government. The same applies to the deficit. The deficit was criticized for years, and now it has become intolerable. In fact, an initial deficit of $200 billion has now more than doubled under the Conservative government.

Basically nothing has changed. Increasingly Quebecers realize that they would be better off managing their own interests, their own money, both in the transportation sector and in other sectors. They would, of course, respect the rights of other Canadians and want to establish economic ties with the rest of Canada. Quebecers would like to see their taxes managed exclusively by the people and their elected representatives in the National Assembly and not by a government next door that redistributes taxes through equalization payments which it can freeze at any time, thus creating an imbalance of $700 or $800 million. This is what happened to Quebec during the past two years. The Quebec government had to take this shortfall and pass it on to the school boards and municipalities because it was not getting enough money from the federal government, equalization payments being frozen.

This is really too bad. We see this happening with equalization payments and we see the same thing in the transport sector. The Minister of Transport has sorely neglected the needs of the Montreal region. This coupled with poor decision making which has affected the transport sector in Quebec, has caused the Montreal region to suffer tremendous economic setbacks during the past ten years.

There is a pressing need for transferring authority in the transport and other sectors to Quebec's elected representatives. Under an economic union, we could have agreements reflecting the interests of the two countries that will soon constitute the territory still referred to today as Canada.

In conclusion I hope that hon. members will consider the committee's recommendations and that the report stage of Bill C-83 will be adopted as soon as possible. Very specific recommendations were made and an in-depth study was conducted by the committees which considered the bill, including the transport committee. I think the NDP critic did an extremely good job on this committee. His comments and the amendments to the recommendations he suggested impressed most committee members.

The Government was very open-minded with that bill. Nevertheless it should be amended. This study on water transportation of goods will have an important impact in terms of safety—I mentioned earlier the case of Mrs. Chaloux—and in terms of better management of water transport without increasing the cost of that mode of transportation. We know that in all departments and agencies costs have a tendency to rise not excessively but too quickly in my view when compared to Canada's revenue in these times of deep economic recession.

I do not know exactly how much time I have left, but I will conclude by saying once again that I hope other members will comment on this bill. I am surprised by the government's brief statement. One can feel it is engaging in the report stage almost reluctantly. I would have preferred a speech with definite substance that would have shown some will on the part of the Tory government to implement this bill as soon as possible and to try to get royal assent from the Senate, also as soon as possible, particularly in the matter of water safety. I am really concerned about that aspect because of my work with the Standing Committee on Transport.

I see the member for Saint-Maurice is in the House. I know how great his interests and his competence are in the area of transport. He was a member of the transport committee where he made many valuable statements and recommendations. I remember for example during conflicts and closures in Montreal, namely at Via Rail and the CN, the member for Saint-Maurice made a strong statement just by referring to some articles in the collective agreement, if I am not mistaken, making rail transport very expensive.

He is well known also for his expertise in the transportation of goods by water. I would be very happy to hear him corroborate what the NDP critic said as well as what the Liberal critic had to say. I would be happy to hear the member for Saint-Maurice, being aware of his expertise and of his talent regarding transportation as well as of the investigative mind he has always applied in this field and for which he was greatly admired by all the members of the transport committee. Actually I think that he was chairman or vice-chairman of this committee at one point.

Such expertise would certainly be very useful to the House today if he would be so kind as to share his point of view on transportation by water with us. As I said his opinion and his sound judgement in this field for which he is well known would be very useful to the House today. I am convinced that he could tell us how vigorously he had to intervene during caucus meetings to press the point that this bill was fair and necessary, especially in terms of transport safety and duplication of services.

He was a member of this committee along with several Conservative members and he did an excellent job. I congratulate him. It is said that we are more inclined to congratulate someone when we know he will not run again, but that is not the case for me. I have always had an excellent relationship with the member for Saint-Maurice in our discussions regarding transportation in the years to come and the future of the Mauricie area. I know how dear these two issues are to him and how dedicated he is to them. It is regardless of whether he runs again or not that I am asking him to intervene today on this issue in order to enrich this debate at the report stage so that when we take a vote on it, at third reading or at report stage, we will have had more in-depth participation from Conservative members. There was just one speech from the government this morning which lasted only a few minutes and I think that this is clearly not enough at report stage to highlight the last day of the final debate on Bill C-83.

I also have mixed feelings regarding the Liberal member's remarks. Somehow I know that he did a very good job in committee and, as always, his work reflected his perception of the way we should go about the democratic process in the House of Commons and particularly in committees. He worked hard to reach a consensus on that important matter and to avoid confrontation. For instance, his arguments on duplication, and particularly on security, gave transparency to the bill and convinced all political parties of the desirability of reaching for unanimity, even the independent members who showed great interest and admiration. I see that my 20 minutes are over.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, I want to thank you for allowing me to express my opinion and I want to congratulate all the members who sat on the committee.

I hope this bill will be adopted very quickly because it is in the best interest of Canadians and Quebecers.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to speak especially—

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will allow me I would just like to call the attention of the House on one thing. I have carefully listened to the hon. member for Richelieu who seems to believe, having said so a few times, that we are at the report stage. As no motion for amendment had been reported from the legislative committee, I have first put, a few minutes after 10 a.m., the motion for concurrence in the report to the House, which has been agreed. We are now at third reading. That is why the hon. member for Richelieu had 20 minutes. If we had been at report stage he would have had only 10 minutes, as he well knows since he is well aware of the procedure.

His 20 minutes at third reading are up. Questions and comments. Would the hon. member for Longueuil please tell the Chair if he is standing for questions and comments or for debate. I need to know in order to time his speech.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a few questions and make some comments on the very good speech made by the hon. member for Richelieu. It is very good because it is a substantive speech.

We have three or four different modes of transport, whether it is by water, by air or by rail, and I have always deplored the fact that there are several governments involved in that area, whether municipal, provincial or federal, and so little common interest between the different governments or even within the federal department.

The big problem we see lies in a blatant lack of dialogue. Often, for example, water transport is supported to the detriment of rail transport or to the detriment of air transport and as a result governments spend money to promote air transport while subsidizing rail or water transports which compete between themselves. Governments spend money to promote one to the detriment of the other and then subsidize the other to the detriment of the first one. This becomes a kind of vicious circle wherein governments spend staggering amounts of money only to get to the result that transport companies in general end up having deficit after deficit.

As we have seen the air and rail transport industries are faced with huge deficits mainly because of a lack of co–operation between the various levels of government.

When I was a government member, the member for Roberval, the then Minister of Transport, decided to cut down VIA's funding. I asked him if he had consulted with the public transit authorities in Montreal to see if some of the lines could be used for urban transit in the Montreal area. He said that matter did not come within his responsibility and that his only concern was with VIA. Since urban transit was an area of provincial jurisdiction it was not his problem.

When a minister shows very little interest in co–operating with other levels of government we have to realize that it is going to cost a bundle. That explains the present deficit which is $10 billion over the government's forecast for 1992.

That is absolutely unacceptable and that is why I have decided to take part in this debate today. The situation in the transportation industry is a real mess.

I would like to know if the hon. member for Richelieu agrees with me that there is a total lack of co–operation between the various transportation modes in Canada.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I see that the hon. member for Manicouagan seems quite interested by the nice comment just made by the hon. member for Longueuil, so much so in fact that I take his smile as applause. He does not want to disturb this House, even though this could be rather easily done, given the small number of members who seem to take an interest in this very important debate.

I want to thank the hon. member for Longueuil who, by pointing out what goes on at the municipal, provincial and federal levels, as well as with the different commissions, raised precisely the issue which I wanted to bring up, namely the duplication and the indescribable mess in the field of transport because of the number of offices.

This bill deals with the transportation of goods by sea. I mentioned earlier the case where we had to wait for two years to get the results of an inquiry in the death of three or four people. This is unbelievable. The situation is such because of the complexity of the administration of the different offices of the Department of Transport.

The situation is the same in the railroad sector. We discovered that a field where wheat had been sowed for 33 years still belonged, at least in part, to CN. It took 33 years before finally deciding to sell a strip of land the length of the House of Commons to the farmer who had been cultivating it for 33 years. This is an example of the mess to which the hon. member for Longueuil referred.

In my constituency there is a railway which they have just decided to abandon. The bridges linking the two regions of my riding fell 20 years ago and had never been repaired. Twenty years went by before deciding to abandon a line which was not used by any train. It took two and a half years to make the decision. The decision was made that long ago, but it will take another year before the land is transferred to owners along the railway. You can imagine the mess.

On the other hand, if the transport committee, as I said earlier, could make recommendations if not decisions which would be binding for the minister, it could ensure the review of each case of nonchalance by the offices and the various bodies which manage the transportation sector in Canada and particularly the transportation of goods by water. In the latter we know the demands made by the security officers regarding safety.

We are downgrading their services, considering them as insignificant safety officers on the same level as much lower officials. These officers have met every member of the House in the past month. The debate on it here has been incredible; they almost want to make ship inspection completely routine. That is an officer would go on the boat with a short questionnaire in which he would ask, for example, if they have a certain kind of pump or such and such a system. He would check off the appropriate box just as if you were being questioned for health insurance and are asked if you ever had a certain disease. You say no. The report is put in a drawer and that is the end of it. At the present time safety inspectors get on board and do the checks based on their training and knowledge about safety. They can do that and thanks to them we have not had a major accident in the river but a great danger is approaching. Safety conditions are deteriorating badly on Canadian vessels plying the waters of Quebec and Canada. In that respect, the member for Longueuil is quite right to talk about duplication; everyone is looking after his own interest and preventing Canadians and Quebecers from getting a guarantee of total safety.

This bill is an improvement but it could be much better. If we had a more in-depth review and if the transport committee had more power, goods would be shipped much more safely by water and other modes of transport. The member for Longueuil pointed that out when he mentioned the different levels of government involved in transportation.

This means that decisions are harder and harder to make and bureaucracy is even more cumbersome and the fragmentation of transport management means that after a disaster or after a situation is analysed, everything is turned over not to the transport committee which could act quickly, but to independent commissions that are paid millions of dollars and produce reports which are shelved as are the reports of the transport committee. Then an incident happens and another commission is charged with summarizing the old recommendations and making new ones so that it takes two or three years to come up with concrete solutions. This makes transport management more difficult. Transportation has a very big impact on Canadians and is extremely important to Quebec's economic development, especially because of the seaway. We saw that this winter when the Coast Guard made a doubtful decision about ice booms and the seaway was blocked for months. Madam Speaker, I see you are indicating that I have a minute left. I shall comply with your order immediately. I was saying that ships were directed to other ports, thus reducing business in our ports. My 10 minutes are now up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, as the Bloc Quebecois critic for transport I am pleased to rise today to speak on transport, and more specifically on marine transport.

I know that this bill is designed to improve the transportation of goods by water, to facilitate the berthing of our ships in small harbours, et cetera. I support this bill, but what concerns me most is the fact that once again the government paid particular attention to transportation by water.

I am not convinced that the government took the necessary time to analyze the negative impact which the improvements made regarding transportation by water could have on the railroad industry.

As we are well aware, the CN chairman once again came to Ottawa this week. He appeared before the transport committee and he confirmed once again there would be an additional lay off of more than 1,000 employees at the CN.

We, members of the Bloc Quebecois, met the CP president a few months ago and he told us that the big problem for the railroad industry is the fact that shipping by sea is partly subsidized. So is transport by surface, since roads are built by governments, whereas railroad companies must build their railroads themselves. The costs incurred by railway companies are enormous, given the fact that they are in direct competition with the road transportation sector for which the roads are paid and insured by governments. This means that the railway companies are at a total disadvantage and this becomes totally unfair.

This is what I meant to say earlier. There is no consultation between the various transportation sectors in Canada and in Quebec. There is absolutely no consultation. Consequently governments subsidize some forms of transport to the detriment of others, which generates unfair competition and forces governments to pay and pay all the time. Transportation companies complain about this unfairness. Consequently the government decides to subsidize this transport sector, whether it is the rail, the marine or the air industry. This is a vicious circle in the sense that the government ends up paying all the time.

This is an obvious problem of bad management, and this is why I want to take this opportunity today to deal with the transport sector because this lack of consultation is totally unacceptable. I do not understand why people who are supposedly intelligent, educated and used to working in a industrialized country which is said to be number one in the world, cannot grasp this.

I also cannot understand why there are two airports in Montreal which are not operating successfully. I cannot understand why the government does not react. Also I never understood why, when Mirabel was built, the airport was north of the runways, while the population lives south of those runways. This is beyond me. I asked that question on several occasions to the transport committee in past years. As you know, Madam Speaker, this is my ninth year here as a member of Parliament, and I have had several opportunities to ask questions to the transport committee. I did ask why Mirabel airport was built north of the runways, while the population is located south of those runways. I never got much of an answer until about six months ago when experts provided one. I do not know if it is because I now sit with the opposition that I got an answer. I was told that when Mirabel was built it was first to serve the interests of Ottawa and Montreal. Autoroute 50 between Ottawa and Mirabel was supposed to be built, as well as autoroute 13 between Mirabel and Montreal, but the airport was built north of the runways to first serve Ottawa.

That is scandalous. Today highway 13 has still not been completed because it would cost $150 million to go under the runways, with the air terminal building located north of them.

That is completely unacceptable. I cannot understand it. I am an ordinary individual who does not know much. I am not an expert on transportation or economics but some things in life are just plain logical. This situation is beyond me.

I come back to my argument that transport should be managed by the Government of Quebec in the first place. As the old saying goes, you are never as well served as when you serve yourself. The day we are served by our Quebec government we will not put an airport in Mirabel to serve Ottawa instead of Montreal. That is what happened and I have proof. Experts finally admitted to me that Mirabel was built to serve Ottawa first.

I can tell you that Montrealers have had enough of the rivalry between these two airports. While traffic at Pearson Airport is growing, our Montreal airports are barely holding their own. According to the experts this mess with two airports in Montreal costs the Quebec economy about $5 to $6 billion.

This leads me to say again that this lack of co-ordination among the modes of transport costs citizens and taxpayers huge amounts, exorbitantly high amounts for an outdated transportation system.

It is imperative that the federal, Quebec and municipal governments get together and agree on a comprehensive plan so that our marine, air, rail and truck transport can be profitable.

We know that transportation is one of the most important industries in Quebec, but the way it is managed in general is scandalous. I cannot understand how intelligent people can be that stupid.

With transportation everything is interrelated. People and goods have to be moved. Passengers travel by train, bus or car, by rail or by road. Encouraging transportation by road, for example, hurts the railway; encouraging transportation by rail hurts the bus lines.

We recently heard the Minister of Transport announce that he is restoring Via Rail service between Montreal and Quebec City.

• (1100)

That is very nice and the minister can boast that VIA Rail is running again between Quebec City and Montreal; it looks good to say such things. He has just announced another subsidy, but when the minister made that announcement he forgot to say that he was subsidizing everyone who travels on VIA Rail. I do not remember the exact amount, but I think it costs the government about $130 per passenger.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he can resume his speech when we return to Government Orders.

It being eleven o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I would like to commend Chrysler Canada Ltd. for its recent decision to upgrade its Windsor minivan plant at a total cost of some $600 million. This action speaks volumes about the attractiveness of Canada as an outstanding location for auto sector investment.

This is but one of many new capital investments in Canada announced in the past year by the big three. These investments total over $3.6 billion in value, including $1 billion at the new Ford engine plant in Windsor and $1 billion at its Oakville minivan plant, among others.

These investment announcements clearly indicate that we can compete. Canadian workers are among the world's most productive, second only to the United States and fully six and a half times more productive than their Mexican counterparts.

Ontario is close to major markets in the northeastern United States. Inflation here is lower than in most of the industrialized world and the cost of capital is becoming increasingly competitive. Our infrastructure and the quality of our labour force are vastly superior, particularly in comparison to Mexico.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, Canada's Prime Minister is off to sit on the knee of his former political masters, George Bush and Ronald Reagan, next week in California and Texas. True to form, he will mouth a major foreign policy speech while he is there.

Is it not interesting that our Prime Minister never feels the need to make such a speech in Canada? Could it be because he wants lots of applause for his efforts and realizes that his ideas are repugnant to most of his countrymen, or is it because he will clear the speech with Ron and George first to make sure it is acceptable to their Republican cohorts?

Canada needs a made at home foreign policy, not one dictated by American political has-beens whose policies have been firmly rejected by the American people.

Surely Canadians deserve to hear from their Prime Minister here in this House about what our foreign policy should be, not read about it on news wires from south of the border. Is it any wonder that Canadians feel this government has sold them out to American interests at every turn?

The Prime Minister should stay at home, call an election and face the punishment of the people that he has so richly earned.

CENTRES OF EXCELLENCE

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval-Ouest): Madam Speaker, according to one survey, Canada innovated again by establishing the centres of excellence three years ago.

Indeed, 15 centres of excellence across Canada have had a major impact on research and development, which are essential tools for the future of our country. With a $ 240 million budget, these centres have stopped the brain drain which used to happen in the past because of a lack of funds and resources.

Better still, these centres have attracted back to Canada Canadian researchers who were working abroad. That was a good move on the part of our government. We made that effort. It was bold at the beginning but what a nice success.

We must continue to do so; the future of our young people depends on it.

AIR QUALITY

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, sick building syndrome is very real. The Judy LaMarsh Building in Chatham, Ontario, is the regional headquarters for National Health and Welfare. Labour Canada officials closed the building last week and sent its 235 employees home.

Renovations to the sealed building have created problems. Air quality tests found the levels of organic compounds to be up to eight times higher than the acceptable standards. One woman was sent to a hospital by ambulance with chemical burns to her throat. Fainting and irritated eyes were common.

We must find a cure for these sick buildings. Chatham is just one example. The World Health Organization says 20 per cent of all office buildings and two million workers could be affected. Fumes and lack of proper ventilation are two reasons.

• (1105)

After hearing of the Chatham incident my office has received calls from people in Ottawa and Toronto who have suffered the same situation.

I will be presenting a private member's bill regarding air quality in buildings. We must take action on this issue. It is not just a trendy issue but a serious health issue.

NATIONAL WILDLIFE WEEK

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, on the occasion of National Wildlife Week I wish to extend an invitation to Canadians to take part in the week's activities and to team up with Canada's environmental citizens.

This week provides many opportunities for Canadians to acquire knowledge and get involved in community actions that can help wildlife throughout the year.

The government has recently instituted a number of programs under Canada's green plan to help address the problems confronting wildlife, its populations and its habitat.

An important wildlife legislative initiative recently received royal assent and regulations are now being developed to bring it into force.

While we need to remain vigilant about how our special species and spaces are cared for, much is being done to improve the health of Canadian ecosystems. National Wildlife Week is another opportunity for Canadians to get involved.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, in El Salvador the convicted killers of the six Jesuit priests have been set free by an amnesty ordered by the Arena

Party government and President Cristiani. President Cristiani, Defence Minister Ponce and the armed forces have repudiated the peace accords they signed with the FMLN and United Nations Secretary–General Boutros Ghali in which they agreed to remove military officers guilty of gross human rights violations.

Death squads continue to assassinate former members of the FMLN which did honour its peace accord pledge to disarm and disband.

In Guatemala President Serrano publicly accuses journalists, NGOs and church leaders of being subversive. Last Saturday death squads sent death threats to 24 of these leaders who are helping Guatemalan refugees to return peacefully from Mexico.

Canada's government actively and generously supported United Nations mediation in both countries. Now I call on our government to ask the UN Security Council to protect the peoples of El Salvador and Guatemala from the brutality of their rulers.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to see that the Canadian banks are finally realizing the importance of co–operating in assisting small businesses. Over the past few weeks a number of banks have announced that they will actively promote the Small Businesses Loans Act and the improvement loans.

In a statement on small business the Royal Bank said its target is at least to double the number of SBLA loans it makes to this very important sector. The Royal Bank believes small business is crucial to economic recovery.

The Bank of Montreal recently said that it will continue to hold down the interest costs on all floating rate interest loans offered under the SBLA. At least until April 1, 1994 the interest rate charged on SBLA loans will be held at the Bank of Montreal's prime rate. That is 1.75 per cent below the ceiling for these loans.

Scotiabank also announced that it will offer loans under the new SBLA at prime. The offer will extend to both new and existing SBLA customers and will take effect as of April 1.

It is good to see this kind of legislation and the reaction to it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, the report of the UN truth commission on El Salvador linked 95 per cent of the crimes against humanity during the 12–year civil war to the army. Important recommendations of the commission, such as the removal of the justices of the supreme court and the purging of the 40 military officers named, must be implemented.

The Catholic Church, one of the main negotiators for peace in El Salvador, has paid the supreme price in the civil war with the murder of Archbishop Romero, four American nuns and six Jesuit priests.

Defence Minister General Emilio Ponce and two dozen of his military officers have been directly linked to these murders. Yet within hours of the truth commission's report President Cristiani moved to grant amnesty to all those named, including the release from jail of two of those guilty of murdering the priests.

Canada must press for implementation of the outstanding recommendations of both the truth and ad hoc commissions. Canada must express to President Cristiani, to the UN and all related agencies our absolute outrage with President Cristiani's actions.

The recommendations of the truth commission are obligatory. Every avenue must be explored to prosecute the Salvadoran military officers for atrocities committed during this war.

THE ST. LAWRENCE ACTION PLAN

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, today, the Minister of the Environment, also speaking for his colleagues the health and fisheries ministers, announced that the federal government will invest $100 million in the implementation of phase II of the St. Lawrence action plan.

The first phase of the plan produced splendid results. According to a study by Cogésult, from 1988 to 1993 the St. Lawrence action plan resulted in the creation or preservation of 2,500 jobs a year and generated economic spin-offs of approximately $1.4 billion.

Furthermore, thanks to the plan it was possible to reduce by 74 per cent the discharge of toxic waste in the St. Lawrence by 50 industries considered as having priority, to preserve 5,000 hectares of wildlife habitat along the St. Lawrence, to create a marine park in the Saguenay and to implement survival plans for six endangered species including the beluga.

The secret of the success of phase I resides in the active participation of environmentalist groups, of—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but your time is up.

NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, the results are in. Voters in two Ontario by-elections have said no to the NDP and its policies.

As support for the NDP continues to decline its tactics of desperation are becoming more and more evident in the House of Commons. Its unwarranted attack on the Liberal Party over the NAFTA vote merely highlights this desperation.

Liberals have said no to this deal but unlike the NDP, which wants to build a wall around Canada, Liberals believe that properly negotiated trade deals can only help Canada's economy and prosperity.

The Ontario by-election is a statement that Canadians will not put up with an 18th century government approach any longer. The Dark Ages are gone. Ontarians have been stung once by the NDP and yesterday's results show they refused to be stung again.

PALLISER PARTICLE BOARD PLANT

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, in a recent report to my constituents I asked people in the east end of Transcona who live around the Palliser particle board plant to convey to me information about how the plant was affecting their lives, because it has become a controversial issue in my riding. People complained about odour, aggravated health problems, asthma, not being able to be outside in the summer, and a host of other problems.

This is a problem that is not just under provincial jurisdiction but also under federal jurisdiction because this plant received money from the western diversification fund.

I have written to the minister in charge of the western diversification fund because there are rumours of expansion of this plant. I asked that no more money in the form of loans or anything else be extended to the Palliser particle board plant or to Palliser, period, until such time as this problem is resolved to the satisfaction of the neighbourhood.

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, although one might not know it here in Ottawa today spring has arrived.

As a child growing up on the farm in Saskatchewan I looked forward each year to the renewal that spring represented: to the return of the geese from the south, to the birth of the new calves, and to the warming of the soil which meant that the new crop could soon be seeded.

Spring to prairie farmers represents in a real sense the beginning of the new year, and with it comes the eternal optimism for which farmers have been famous for so many years.

As prairie farmers are extremely dependent first on the weather and then on the Canadian Wheat Board's ability to sell their crops to overseas customers, today's soon to be made announcement of the renewal of grain sales to Russia is welcome news.

Although some will invariably criticize the details of today's announcement, prairie grain farmers will be delighted by the prospects of an increased demand for last year's crop. Today's announcement is as welcome as spring itself.

TAXATION

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, yesterday afternoon, April 1, government saw fit, as of necessity, not to submit the richest families of this country to the 21-year rule. It has exempted them from having to pay the income tax accrued on their trusts over the past 21 years.

This government is allowing them to keep accumulating wealth at the expense of the middle class and the poor of this country. What happened in the House yesterday is absolutely appalling. The day will come when someone will have to answer for such an act of social injustice.

BEST EVER WINTER PROGRAM

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to inform the House that the Government of Canada has renewed today its support to the "Best Ever" Winter Program.

The program will receive $31.2 million over a period of five years starting in 1993-94.

The "Best Ever" Winter Program was introduced in 1983 by the Government of Canada (Fitness and Amateur Sports) in preparation for the 1988 Olympic Winter Games in Calgary. If the excellent performance of Canadian athletes at the last Olympic Winter Games is any indication the program has certainly reached its goals since it was introduced. It has also promoted participation in winter sports and the development of a sound administrative structure to develop sports programs.

With the Lillehammer Olympic games scheduled for less than a year from now, the renewal of this important program reflects this government's ongoing commitment to Canadian athletes and for winter sports.

TAXATION

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, Windsor retirees and others have been discriminated against in the tax treatment they have received. This issue goes back to 1980 and 1981 when Chrysler workers received shares from the company in return for wage and benefit concessions.

After negotiations in 1985 it was agreed they could cash these shares, but Revenue Canada treated this as income rather than seeing the growth in share values as capital gains.

Under the leadership of the local union president, Larry Bauer, this case went to court. The union won in the end. All active employees who had signed notices of objection received their taxes back plus interest, but over 1,000 retirees and others who had not been able to sign notices received back only their taxes paid. They received no interest.

The Minister of National Revenue has a way to correct this discriminatory treatment under the government's tax fairness package. I strongly urge action.

SOMALIA

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, last month two very important conferences affecting the future of Somalia took place in Ethiopia: a national UN conference of reconstruction and a reconciliation conference of Somali leaders.

I want to say as one who participated in both conferences that I think these were important events for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of a country about which many Canadians have agonized.

In particular I want to point out the exemplary record and contribution of our Canadian Armed Forces through the airlift that has operated since last year from Nairobi that has flown literally thousands of tonnes to various famine affected people in Somalia. More recently since December over 1,000 of our troops have served particularly in the Belet Huen area in the central western area of Somalia where they have not only provided peace but have begun to re-establish a civilian police force, have helped to re-establish a school and are assisting in the reconstruction of the country which will be important for the future of those people.

I know all members will want to pay very real honour to our Canadian Armed Forces who work under such difficult circumstances and make an outstanding contribution.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

ARMED FORCES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister or whoever is speaking for the government today.

I think we are all distressed by reports of the incident in Somalia where four Canadian soldiers are being held in connection with the death of a Somali man. I want to express as well the deep concern that we have about the way in which the matter has been handled and the number of unanswered questions that are still outstanding without any response.

Why did it take so long for the investigation to get under way and for a public accounting on the matter? Why has there been no effort by the minister of defence to present the facts to Parliament? When can we expect the minister of defence to give a full accounting of what has taken place and the situation in which our soldiers are now expected to serve in Somalia?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, under the military legal system it is the responsibility of the commanding officer to immediately begin an investigation into any incident that arises. That occurred immediately.

After a couple of days of local investigation, the commanding officer felt he needed expert assistance from Ottawa. It took a couple of days to get the passports, inoculations and so on for the experts from Ottawa to proceed to Somalia to carry on the investigation.

There was no delay. The investigation commenced immediately and is ongoing.

• (1120)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister.

The problem is about three weeks ago four Canadians were involved in the suspicious death of a Somali. Why did it take so long for the investigation to get under way and why did the Minister of National Defence not state the facts in this case?

I ask the government to report to the House as soon as possible on the circumstances of that tragic incident.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as I indicated there was no delay. The investigation commenced immediately. However in the military justice system as in the civilian justice system it is not common practice or the accepted practice, for good and valid reasons which I am sure the hon. member understands, for the investigating officers to conduct, if you will, press conferences on the aspects of the investigation.

There is an investigation taking place. It is confidential, as are all investigations. It would be no more appropriate for the Minister of National Defence to stand in the House and give details than it would be for the Solicitor General to stand in the House and give details on civilian investigations by the RCMP.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I am not sure the hon. minister quite understands the implications of what is taking place.

We have close to 5,000 troops involved in 18 complicated, difficult, risky missions around the world. As the minister will remember we have raised questions many times about the lack of any comprehensive approach in our peacekeeping operations, problems of equipment, training and preparation. Instead we have contradictory, piecemeal statements. The Minister of National Defence said this week that we are going to pull the troops out of Bosnia if there is fighting, which there has been for the last two years.

Is it not time for the sake of our troops, families and Canadians that there be a regular system of reporting and accountability on peacekeeping missions so that we know exactly what mandate, what commitment and what circumstances our troops are involved in and to ensure that members of Parliament and the public will not have to learn from the media about tragic incidents such as took place in Somalia but learn, as should be the case, from the minister responsible who should be doing her job?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member has two very different subjects confused and he is trying to bring them together. They do not deserve to be brought together.

The question of an alleged criminal act is being investigated quite properly using the well established procedures that have been in place for decades, in fact since this country began.

I think the hon. member would understand that for justice to be done it is necessary for the investigating officers and the authorities to conduct that investigation without the case being prejudiced by comments made in the House.

On the question of our peacekeeping role, surely there is no mystery to the hon. member or anybody else about Canada's willingness and readiness to participate in UN sanctioned peacekeeping roles. The hon. member made a statement that the Minister of National Defence said that if there is fighting we are going to leave Bosnia and there has been fighting for the last year. That is nonsense. She said no such thing.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Yes, she did.

Mr. Andre: No, no. I am sorry. Would the hon. member listen for a moment. She said if our troops are under attack. It is part of the UNPROFOR mandate that if UNPROFOR troops are attacked they will withdraw because our troops are there in Bosnia to try to provide humanitarian aid to the Bosnians. They are not there on a peacekeeping mission. They are there with the UNPROFOR to provide humanitarian aid. If they are attacked, they will pull out along with the other UN troops there.

That is what the Minister of National Defence said, not what the hon. member alleged.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, Canadians and members of Parliament were shocked and disappointed to learn of this incident involving the death of a Somali and four Canadian peacekeepers through the media three weeks after the event.

I want to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. As a previous Associate Minister of National Defence he would be aware that the commanding officer is required to send a significant incident report to the Chief of the Defence Staff.

When was the Minister of National Defence briefed on this issue and when does she plan to inform the House? If she was not briefed, why was she not briefed?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member as a former military person would well understand that in the military as in civilian life individuals who may be suspected of having committed a crime are entitled to the normal safety measures, are entitled to be presumed innocent and so on.

In order for investigations to be conducted in a fair manner it is necessary that they be done outside the glare of publicity and done in confidence. That is what is happening.

The Minister of National Defence continues to fulfil her responsibilities as she always has. The question of what her officials have said to her and when they said it, as the hon. member will know, is really not a matter for disclosure on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, the point here is that members of Parliament and Canadians found out through the media.

When did the minister expect that members of Parliament and Canadians should find out? If it was not through the media how were we to find out? It is a significant event. I remind the minister that we have a size and scope of peacekeeping operations unprecedented in Canadian history. We have 4,800 Canadian peacekeepers involved in 18 different locations around the world. We have 10 per cent of the world peacekeeping operations under way.

Canadians and members of Parliament do not expect, neither should they deserve, to be informed of these incidents in peacekeeping through the media many days and weeks after they have occurred.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will appoint a full-time Minister of National Defence who will show leadership in the conduct of these operations and who will implement immediately a formalized regular series of briefings on these operations to the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I guess this last question indicates the real interest of the opposition. They are not concerned about justice for the soldiers involved but rather are interested in trying to discredit the Minister of National Defence.

The Minister of National Defence is fulfilling her responsibility in an outstanding manner as she always does with all of her responsibilities. As the hon. member and as all hon. members would know, the appropriate time for comment on an investigation is only after the investigation is complete.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government spokesperson on international trade.

A remarkable speech was made last Wednesday by Mr. Susumu Eto, president of the Mitsubishi Company of Canada. He pointed out that Canada had received direct investment from Japan of about $1.4 billion a year in 1989, up from $700 million a year in 1988. Since signing the free trade agreement that investment has now dropped off to $300 million a year and is rapidly diminishing.

My question to the minister is: in examining Mr. Eto's statement one finds that they have now decided to direct their investment capital to Mexico for lower wages and productivity that is equal in Canada. Is this not proof out of the words of a leading Japanese businessman that Mexico will be the attraction after we sign the NAFTA because of low wages and equal productivity?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member rises in this House and makes the same points day in and day out. He overlooks one fundamental fact, that is that 85 per cent of our imports now from Mexico are tariff-free.

There are almost no tariffs to speak of on the other remaining 15 per cent. If Mexico was going to put us out of business it could have done it ten years ago, five years ago, or last year, not because of the NAFTA. He always forgets this.

What he is raising are questions of our net direct investment in Canada.

• (1130)

I am very happy to tell the House that before the free trade agreement in 1988 we had a $2.5 billion deficit in net direct investment in Canada. More Canadians were investing more outside Canada than in our own country.

In 1992 we had a $5.3 billion surplus. There has been a swing of over $7 billion since the free trade agreement.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Of course, Madam Speaker, I predicted that response from the minister so I did not read the rest of my question until I got that response.

The rest of Mr. Eto's statement is as follows: "When Japanese investment rushed into Canada in the late 1980s there was a general optimism that the free trade agreement would bring about real free trade across the border".

He goes on to say: "This illusion burst when it was proven that one-sided protectionist action taken by the United States basically changed the precondition of business activities in Canada". Mr. Eto is saying that it is the free trade agreement that has caused them to move to Mexico because of U.S. protectionism. He then goes on to list the goods protected.

I ask how does the minister explain to Mr. Eto, please do not go away, please do not go to Mexico, we will stand up against their export enhancement program that subsidizes wheat, we will take them on in all these other areas. He does not believe it and neither do other foreign investors.

What is he going to do about it? We are losing jobs because of that stupid agreement.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I sometimes think the Japanese disillusionment recently with Canada may be because Premier Rae had just visited Japan.

I do not think the Japanese are disillusioned with Canada at all. In fact if we look at the automotive sector in particular, Canada buys 9 per cent of the big three autos that are produced in the world. We produce 18 per cent of them.

We have had a reconfirmation of Chrysler's $900 million investment in Windsor just two weeks ago. A $2 billion expansion is planned in the port of Oakville.

The North American automotive sector has been very healthy in Canada. We have been producing far more than we consume. The hon. member's party has always argued for the auto pact. We are keeping the auto pact intact and doing very well under this section of our trade with the Unite States.

Japanese investment has increased in North America on both sides of the border.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, the spokesperson for the government on international trade matters today has decided not to answer the question but to go into bafflegab.

The specific question I asked was: How does the government explain after Mr. Eto's statements that their investment up to 1989 which was $1.6 billion has now dropped up to $300 million?

Not me, not the government, but Mr. Eto is saying that they will now move the bulk of their investment to Mexico. They will produce for the United States market out of Mexico with low wages and high production. What is he going to do to protect Canadian investment and Canadian workers rather than shilling for the United States in this agreement?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, it is very important we watch who the hon. member is quoting. He is quoting an official from MITI; he is not quoting the chairman of Toyota or the chairman of Honda or the chairman of Nissan. These Japanese companies have very different plans from what he is saying.

What he also omitted to tell the House was that labour rates are only 15 per cent of the cost of producing an automobile. Why would they move to Mexico in order to take comparative advantage on 15 per cent of the cost of building an automobile? The reason why Canada is competitive is that we are competitive across the whole spectrum of automotive goods.

GREAT LAKES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of the Environment in the absence of the minister.

Yesterday three major environmental groups, Pollution Probe, the Canadian Environmental Law Association and Great Lakes United, wrote the federal Minister of the Environment and his Ontario NDP counterpart to say they are "bitterly disappointed" by the inaction of the federal and Ontario governments on Great Lakes pollution. They said an agreement on Great Lakes water quality expired two years ago and the two governments still have not signed a new agreement.

I ask the minister, will the government negotiate a new agreement immediately and stop putting at risk the well-being of the millions of people in our Great Lakes region?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to inform the hon. member and the House that the agreement between Canada and Ontario is continuing as if it was in effect. All the present programs are continuing and funded.

I would like to assure the House that the Government of Canada is ready to return to the negotiating table with the Government of Ontario as soon as the latter is prepared to do so.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, the three major environmental groups wrote that they are suspending relations with the federal Minister of the Environment and his Ontario counterpart to protest their inactivity in dealing with Great Lakes pollution.

They say the recently proposed U.S. guidelines on discharge of dangerous toxic chemicals in the United States will put these U.S. standards ahead of Canada's.

Why are the minister and the government not moving immediately to bring Canadian standards at least up to the new U.S. levels to reverse the degradation of the Great Lakes? Why will the minister and this Conservative government not stop their stalling?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to remind the House that we have a $125 million, five-year Great Lakes action plan program in place and it is continuing.

Second, we certainly welcome the decision of the federal government in the United States to work in co-operation with those states which surround the Great Lakes. We believe it is important for them to approach this in a uniform and consistent manner. We welcome the fact that they are doing what Canada and Ontario have been doing for some time.

Third, I would like to disagree with my hon. friend when he suggests on the advice of others that American standards are necessarily more stringent than those of Canada and of Ontario. That is not our opinion.

NATIONAIR

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Today some 4,000 Nationair passengers are stranded all over the place. Canada's three largest airlines are drowning in red ink.

What does the government intend to do to help solve the problems of this ailing industry for Canadian travellers? Please do not tell us you are going to recalibrate the regulatory framework because that does not get the people off the ground in airports all over the world.

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate what has happened to passengers who have been stranded.

We will find that most of the passengers are from Ontario and Quebec where there are programs in place through the travel agencies and the provincial governments to offer aid to these passengers.

The tour operators are working to get these people to their destinations, either back to Canada or to the destinations to which they were scheduled. We will be following very closely the work that the tour operators are doing to assist Canadians to complete their travel plans.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Very well, but for a year now members of this House have been asking the government to come up with a new policy on transport or should I say a policy since, as of now, there is none. We hear nothing but trite remarks from this government.

Today Canadians, and particularly those who are stranded in airports, want to know what the government intends doing. How long will these people keep going on and off grounded planes before this government wakes up and does something to save our airline industry?

[English]

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, for the last year or more, as the hon. member knows, there have been problems in the airline industry around the world, not just in Canada. There has been a downturn in the airline industries and in the tourist industry across the world.

For the last year our Canadian companies have been working very hard, especially the employees at Canadian Airlines who have done so much to help put their company back on the rails. They are working hard. Hearings are going on at the present time, as the hon. member knows, to try and come up with solutions in the private sector for the airline industry in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of immigration.

On Tuesday at 8 a.m. Canadian immigration in Vancouver will deport two unaccompanied children to the Punjab even though they have been legally adopted by a Canadian citizen in a Canadian court.

Their natural parents and the children have received repeated threats of extortion, kidnapping and even death in the Punjab. Now the natural parents cannot even be found because they are believed to be in hiding. Surely Canadians have not become so inhumane that they are prepared to see children deported to a dangerous situation where their lives are threatened.

Why does the minister condone the deportation of unaccompanied children who are the adopted children of a Canadian citizen to a situation where their lives are threatened and where their families cannot be located?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I do not.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the minister is not aware of this situation or has not been briefed on it.

Canada is a signatory to the Declaration of the Rights of the Child and the government boasts of its commitment to the protection and welfare of children. Surely a government that was truly committed to the welfare of children would not return them to a dangerous situation in India where their lives are in jeopardy.

Will the minister in this case stay the deportation order, review the case with his officials and allow the children to stay in Canada with their adoptive parents? They are the adoptive parents as a result of a decision of a Canadian court.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I do not know why the socialists stand in this House and pretend to Canadians that we have the worst refugee and immigration system in the world when in fact we have the best.

I had a meeting this morning with the official representative in Canada of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees. Again he applauded Canada's effort in trying to help people who need protection abroad. He was commenting generally on the immigration program we have, which is the best in the world.

When I hear representations like the one this morning which portrays our immigration programs as terrible, this is not borne out by the facts. Canadians can be proud of their immigration program. It is the best in the world.

OZONE DEPLETION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare my question is directed to the Acting Deputy Prime Minister.

This spring ozone depletion over Canada is worse than ever before, resulting in an increase in exposure to harmful ultraviolet radiation. We need to be concerned about kids and adults alike as we go into spring and summer.

Why is the government not warning the public of the specific health effects of being exposed to the sun this spring, such as skin cancer, eye cataracts and a weakened immune system?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, it was either a week or two weeks ago that the Minister of the Environment made some public pronouncements with regard to the ozone layer and the dangerous effects that the sun could have on the skin of all individuals. Specifically he mentioned children and people with fair skin.

There is no doubt that anyone going out in the sun will need protection. I think the responsibility is on the individual because the minister has made the public well aware of the steps they should take.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, public pronouncements by the minister do not solve the problem. That is the reason we are raising it in the House.

As the parliamentary secretary knows, ozone depletion poses a threat to human health and also to crops and natural resources.

Why has the government not launched an intensive campaign to inform Canadians, not just by way of individual ministerial statements on the steps, that they should take care both to protect their health and prevent further depletion of the ozone layer?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, first of all I would remind the hon. member that when the Minister of the Environment spoke publicly about this one year ago there were critics on the other side who accused him of scare mongering. Today they come back and ask why he is not doing more.

He was one of the first individuals to raise this issue with Canadians and to warn them they must take precautionary measures.

• (1145)

Second, we put in place a system which provides Canadians with information daily as to the level of UV rays throughout all of Canada.

Third, the budgetary provisions for UV protection have indeed risen by some 25 per cent during the course of the last two years.

HEALTH

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the minister of health.

For over four months, the Official Opposition has repeatedly asked this government to order a full-scale public inquiry into the contamination of more than 1,000 Canadians with AIDS-infected blood, nearly half of whom are now dead and the others ill. The minister has always found excuses in the answer that the government would wait for the report of the parliamentary committee.

Now that the subcommittee has concluded its hearings and even its chair from the government side has acknowledged that a public inquiry is needed, would the minister now order a full-scale public inquiry without delay? If not, why not?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, there is no doubt about it that Canadians want to be guaranteed a very safe blood supply.

Indeed, the member for Delta who chairs the subcommittee looking into the tainted blood issue has publicly stated that perhaps looking at the Canadian blood agency that looks after the safety of our blood supply would be recommended.

I have to tell my colleague, who is a member of this committee, that while the committee has heard from many witnesses, the report has not even been formed, nor has it been tabled. I know the minister of health is waiting for that and he certainly will respond when it is tabled here in the House.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, when the safety of our blood system is of concern, time is of the essence. We have to assure Canadians without further delay. Half of the victims have died and many more continue to suffer. Compensation for these innocent people ran out yesterday and the government has been dragging its feet.

I want to ask the minister, will there be further compensation? Will there be a full-scale, independent, public inquiry ordered today?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, as I said earlier, the committee has finished hearing its witnesses and it will be meeting over the next few weeks to draw up its conclusions and recommendations. We all hope that the report will be tabled in the House as soon as possible and I know the minister will react to that as soon as he can.

Also, on the area of compensation which has been a major concern to haemophiliacs, the federal government did provide some compensation. I suggest that the hon. member direct his questions to the province on that specific issue.

WYETH-AYERST

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Science today.

This week the Wyeth-Ayerst operations in Canada announced a net loss of 130 jobs as it shut down its Windsor operations. This same conglomerate had received close to $4.1 million to expand in Montreal with the last payment being made in 1990.

Is it not obvious to the minister that the Windsor shutdown has been caused by the federal government giving this $4 million to create the extra production capacity at Montreal? What will the government do to correct this mistake?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, are we to say that the provincial government's help to Chrysler in Windsor of $30 million and the federal government's help to Chrysler in Windsor of $10 million approximately in training three weeks ago is going to put automotive workers in other parts of Ontario out of work? That is the same logic.

What has happened here is that our pharmaceutical industry is becoming extremely competitive thanks to Bill C-22 and thanks to the respect we are showing for the protection of intellectual property.

What is happening is there is a consolidation of resources to make it more competitive. I regret, too, that the Windsor plant had to close. However, there have been offers to a significant number of employees there to join the Montreal operation and also to join operations elsewhere. The bottom line is that this company is becoming increasingly competitive. As a result, it will be able to hire people in the future and add wealth to the country.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I cannot let the minister squirm away from the fact that in March 1990 the last cheque for $761,000 was given to one sister company in Montreal and in March 1993 the other sister plant in Windsor is shut down. Despite all the brand-name companies' promises of expanded jobs, 130 jobs have been lost.

Why did the government not place any conditions for over-all job growth in getting this grant? Will the government now demand that this grant be returned since it has cost jobs rather than created them?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I have just been informed that the federal government did not give a grant.

I will certainly confirm this for my hon. friend opposite. If the government did not give a grant it cannot put in place any kind of conditions which the hon. member wants the House to request of the government.

I have to tell him that he should want Canada to be competitive in this area. He should want those Windsor employees to work for a competitive company. A number of them will have opportunities under the new operation.

SMALL BUSINESSES

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister for Science and Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism.

Today The Gazette quoted John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, who said that the Small Businesses Loans Act was to give the banks a bigger slice and government a bigger slice.

What about the entrepreneurs? What do they receive under the SBLA?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. friend for her very important question.

I do not know whether I have ever heard John Bulloch congratulate any government for any program it has ever done. On this one he did admit that it is a great improvement over the previous Small Businesses Loans Act.

We have increased the fee to the banks but it turns out that most of the banks are not going to take the fee. They are so competitive now. There has been a flood of announcements recently. The banks are saying that they are going to have lending rates discounts; they are going to waive the commission and so on. Therefore banks are enticed into using the program even without the commission.

For the small business people it is very important to remember that we have raised the guarantee to 90 per cent from 85 per cent. They can now cover 100 per cent of the asset with their loan.

Even more important, and this is a discipline on the banks and the lending institutions, under the new bill a banker cannot ask for more than 25 per cent personal security against the loan. This frees up the personal security and collateral to be used for working capital which is what small businesses have been asking the government to do over the last two years.

This bill should not be called the Small Businesses Loans Act; it should be called the super-duper loans act.

WESTRAY COAL MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, I too have a question for the minister of state for small businesses.

Now that the Prime Minister on behalf of the entire cabinet is spinning a phoney line that cabinet has made all documents available on the Westray mine disaster, I want to ask the minister if he is going to stand in his place today at twelve o'clock during tabling of documents and make available to Parliament, as well as to the inquiry, the 18 pages of the censored document entitled "Federal Funding of the Westray Coal Mine". I would ask the minister if he is prepared to do that today and, if not, why not?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, this government has been unprecedently open with the commission.

The Liberal government almost never co-operated with provincial commissions of inquiry into anything. We are very open because we want to get to the bottom of why the miners died.

I have to remind the hon. member that this whole issue at the federal level is just about a loan guarantee. The whole regulation of safety is a provincial jurisdiction. What we have done to date is to table 7,500 pages of documentation with the commission. I hope the hon. member heard me yesterday when I announced that thousands of more pages have been offered to the commission. It is about financing. It is about the technical aspects of the project. I think he will find in those documents the information he requires.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the minister several months ago indicated to the House and to the people of Canada that all the documents would then be made available to the inquiry. We found out yesterday and today that they have not been. We have an 18-page censored document which the minister refuses to table in this House.

In view of the fact that Parliament has not received this 18-page censored document, in view of the fact that the judicial inquiry has not received this document, and in view of the fact that the families of the deceased miners have not received the document entitled "Federal Funding of the Westray Coal Mine", will the minister now stand in his place and say: "Yes, I will table the document in Parliament" and, if not, why not?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows with respect to all the documents that we have tabled to date and will be tabling today or Monday, whenever the commission is ready to accept them, I have offered to send them today or Monday. They are almost all about the financial aspects behind the Westray decision.

Mr. Milliken: Is this one in it?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Is this one in it?

Mr. Hockin: This particular document, if it is a cabinet confidence, would not be. But I do not know if this particular document is a cabinet confidence or not. I have not seen it. If it is the communication of one minister with another minister it would not be; if it is officials giving advice to ministers it would not be because these have been cabinet confidences for decades. No government in the parliamentary system operates by making documents like that public.

In fact all those issues are essentially what will be covered in the documentation the commission has already and what it will be receiving today or Monday.

SENIORS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for seniors, I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday the minister announced a five-year funding program for seniors. The government has never lived up to its commitment to older Canadians. When the government announced a similar program five years ago it spent a little over half of what was promised.

I ask the minister why seniors should believe the government this time.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, about 17 per cent of the federal government's budget goes toward seniors, whether it is through transfer payments to the provinces or to the individuals.

Yesterday the minister responsible for seniors did announce that $170 million more would go into the Horizons programs which assist seniors in communities especially in remote areas, as well as into the independence venture program.

No doubt we all have to face the reality that our population is aging. The minister has announced this new program to strive to gain more independence for our senior citizens.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Acting Minister of Finance.

Canadians have been told to expect a budget within the next few weeks. Will the minister guarantee that this seniors program will not be cut as has happened in previous budgets? Will the minister provide older Canadians with that guarantee?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member should wait until the budget is given in the House by the Minister of Finance.

I can tell the hon. member, and I think senior citizens throughout Canada understand, that governments at all levels, whether they be federal, provincial or municipal, have funding problems. To assure that the programs we have are funded and stay in place we have to tackle deficit problems. Seniors understand that. The hon. member may not, but seniors do.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, my question has to do with the apparent intention of the government to change the Crow rate and to end the payment of the Crow benefit to the railways and begin paying this benefit in one way or another to the producers. This is something that the Conservative Party has had in mind for a long time, ever since the Liberals changed the Crow rate.

• (1200)

I would like to ask whoever is speaking for the government today on this issue why, when it knows the trouble that the railways in this country are already in with some 10,000 people designated to be eliminated from the CNR, for instance, over the next three to five years, it would proceed with this further change in policy, a policy change that is bound to be devastating to an already devastated rail industry and something that will definitely hurt the people of Winnipeg Transcona, the Transcona shops and other places.

Why would the government do this? Why would it be so cruel to an industry already in trouble?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, this whole program that is being looked at, at the present time, is not being looked at in isolation by only looking at it from the farmers' point of view. The railways certainly have been consulted and are looking at what is being done and what is best for them in their particular areas.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, the people in my riding who work for the railway remember only too well the promises that were made to them at the time when the Crow rate was changed by the Liberals and how this was supposed to be a great benefit to the railways. They know now that it has not turned out that way.

I want to ask the minister who answered for the government: Is the government looking at all the implications of this not just in terms of railway jobs and also of the environment? One of the commitments that this government made in response to the Brundtland commission was that all policy changes would be environmentally assessed.

What environmental benefit could there possibly be in moving all the grain by truck rather than rail, which will be the outcome of this possible change?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is making an assumption that grain will move by truck. He forgets that we have a seaway which is very environmentally sound that moves a lot of grain in this country as well. The environmental impact of the trucking—

Mr. Blaikie: There's no seaway in Saskatchewan.

Mrs. Martin: The environmental impact of trucks and trains. There is no decision—

An hon. member: Maybe we should be looking at some of the rivers.

Mrs. Martin: Maybe they should be looking at some of the rivers for shipping also.

LIAISON COMMITTEE

FIRST REPORT

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the first report of the liaison committee regarding committee effectiveness.

I simply want to say that this has been a very important exercise conducted after some four years of the committee's existence. With the additional assistance of the member for Winnipeg Transcona, I think we have made a useful contribution not only to Parliament but to future parliaments.

I hope all members will very carefully consider the recommendations of the committee.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF 82ND, 83RD AND 84TH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table the three following reports of the Standing Committee on House Management.

The 82nd report deals with the membership list of the legislative committee on Bill C-118. Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the Table.

The 83rd report deals with the radio and TV broadcasting of committee hearings.

Finally, the 84th report deals with the membership list of the special joint committee on Bill C-116. Pursuant to the order passed by the House of Commons on March 30 1993, this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the Table.

PETITIONS

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present 34 petitions duly certified and containing 18,199 signatures of citizens from Burlington, Hamilton, Ancaster, Dundas, Stoney Creek and many other locations in Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick.

The petitioners support Mrs. Debbie Mahaffy in her efforts to have the importation of killer cards stopped from entering Canada. They applaud the efforts of the Minister of National Revenue and his statement in support of this action.

Your petitioners request Parliament to amend the law prohibiting the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards.

TRADE

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions, most of them from east Kootenay, wherein the petitioners express concerns about the North American free trade agreement. They feel it is going to lose more Canadian jobs. If implemented, there will be further restrictions placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry, conserve Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit and advance needed social programs.

The petitioners call upon this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present petitions bearing 7,045 signatures asking Parliament and the government to take all necessary steps to ban the importation into Canada of the serial killer board game.

These petitions are in addition to 14,222 signatures that I tabled on February 19 and 10,180 that I tabled on March 12, 1993, for a grand total of 31,447 signatures asking for this ban.

I wish to thank all Canadians who gave me their assistance in this project. I invite anyone who has not yet signed such petitions to do so at the earliest opportunity.

RIGHTS OF GRANDPARENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I have an additional petition calling upon Parliament to take all means necessary to ensure that the rights of grandparents are recognized, enabling them to see the children of their separated or divorced children.

I am pleased to table this petition on behalf of several people of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and elsewhere who have asked me to table it on their behalf.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions today. They both deal with Canadian old age security pensions.

Today hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line and over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty. The 37-cent increase in old age security pensions in April 1992 is inadequate to meet the many needs of Canadian seniors.

The federal government has a primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions. These people have more than carried their share of the load over the years as producing, contributing Canadians. Now it is our turn to see they are not below the poverty line in their golden years but have some degree of dignity as they live out their lives.

TRADE

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present nine petitions, most signed by the constituents of the riding of my colleague, the member for Kootenay East, with a smattering of petitioners from Kootenay West—Revelstoke and other points throughout British Columbia.

The petition expresses the concern that the proposed North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada and that this agreement will cause Canadians to lose more good jobs.

It further points out that if implemented the North American free trade agreement will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry, conserve Canadian natural resources for Canadian benefit, and advance needed social programs.

The petitioners call upon the government and this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present petitions from several hundred signatories, mostly from places like Kimberley, Grassmere, Fernie, and Cranbrook, British Columbia.

The petitioners express considerable concern about the North American free trade agreement and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. They call upon this House to reject the North American free trade agreement and terminate the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I too have the honour to present a number of petitions. The first series of petitions has to do with the North American free trade agreement.

The petitioners call on Parliament to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement. They are also calling for a general election because they believe the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement has harmed the country.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I would also like to present a petition signed mostly by residents of my own riding having to do with the state of health care and other federal cost shared programs.

The petitioners call for, among other things, the reaffirmation of a commitment to a comprehensive national health care program jointly financed by the provinces and territories. They call for the withdrawal of Bill C–91 which gives brand name drugs a 20–year market monopoly. They call for reaffirmation of a commitment to the guarantees of the Canada Health Act, et cetera.

YOUTH

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, I submit a further petition signed by people who are concerned about the number of Canadian youth who belong to the middle and lower income families and are drawn out of school at an early age due to their present financial difficulties.

This petition goes on to call for the reformation of the income tax law to allow middle and lower income parents to claim their children as dependants if they are in full–time attendance in school, regardless of age, and allow parents to claim tuition fees that the students have incurred.

It calls for the elimination of the GST on student books and school supplies, promotion of subsidies at the post–secondary level by enhancing the quality of education through expansion of faculty and staff, promotion of price control on text books and vital school supplies, promotion of job training programs for future graduates, promotion of job creation and the implementation of assistance programs to help graduates, and provision of incentives for youth to improve themselves through better education and training by making it feasible for students to achieve their education.

It also calls for lenience by the Secretary of State toward students whose student loans are due and cannot afford to repay them because they are still taking courses and cannot find employment which would allow them to earn enough money to pay back their loans.

GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, my final petition calls on the government to promote more subsidized day care centres to assist average Canadian workers with child care expenses.

It asks the government to reform the rules regarding the eligibility for unemployment insurance benefits of employees who quit their jobs or are fired because of misconduct.

It calls for the facilitation of government job strategies that will put welfare recipients and the unemployed back into the work force.

It asks the government to promote in-home jobs for mothers on social assistance or who are unemployed to make it feasible for them to work while they take care of their children.

It asks for the employment of more public servants to have a better quality of service and monitor any anomalies more closely. It asks for the implementation of strict regulation of abuse of power or misconduct on the part of public servants and employers.

It also asks that the preparation of future budget legislation be conducted through public awareness and participation in the matter.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Questions Nos. 406, 475 and 487.

Question No. 406—Mr. Boudria:

Was a Government of Canada aircraft used to transport the Prime Minister and/or members of his family to or from the United States during the month of September 1992 and, if so, (a) what was the date, destination and purpose of each flight, (b) what was the cost of using the plane, (c) what were the other associated costs, (d) what type of planes were used, (e) who were the passengers in each case?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parlamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defense): In response to the hon. member's question, I am informed by the Department of National Defense, the Prime Minister and Privy Council Office that a DND aircraft was used to transport the Prime Minister to the United States on one occasion during September 1992, as follows:

(a) On September 11, 1992, Ottawa to Hartford; on September 12, 1992, Hartford to Boston; and on September 13, 1992, Boston to Ottawa. The purpose of each flight is deemed to be a private matter. See part (d).

(b) The cost of using the plane was $11,721.

(c) Other associated costs for the U.S. trip in September 1992, including one advance trip in early September for a tour staff person, are as follows:

PMO
	Jeff Clarke	$3,148.48
	Susan Ellacott	701.49
PCO
	Guy Legros	$2,047.72
	Ted Prusakowski	1,438.41

(d) A Canadian Forces CC-144 Challenger was used, as per RCMP directive that whether on private or government business the Prime Minister must travel on secure DND aircraft.

(e) The passengers in each case were the right hon. Brian Mulroney, Mrs. Mulroney, Ms. Ellacott, Ms. Gammad, and RCMP Inspectors Pavey and McSweeney.

Question No. 475—Mrs. Gaffney:

With respect to payments of landing fees to Transport Canada, (a) are there any airlines currently behind and, if so, which ones (b) what are the amounts owed by each airline (c) was there any measures taken by the government to recoup the money and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): In response to the hon. member's question, the information requested in parts (a) and (b) cannot be made public as it contains commercial confidential information.

With respect to part (c), to collect the accounts, Transport Canada has been following collection procedures which include sending statement of accounts and collection letters, contacting clients through telephone calls and personal visits by senior managers of the department, in consultation with the minister as appropriate.

Question No. 487—Mr. Angus:

Does the government have employees in (a) Thunder Bay (b) riding of Thunder Bay—Atikokan (c) riding of Thunder Bay—Nipigon (d) riding of Kenora—Rainy River (e) riding of Cochrane—Superior and, if so, in each case, (i) how many and what is their primary place of employment (ii) are any positions designated as bilingual and, if so, how many and what are their classifications (iii) how many vacancies have occurred in both unilingual and bilingual positions and how many of those have been filled?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): In response to the hon. member's question, the government has 748 Public Service employees in the census metropolitan area of Thunder Bay which includes the ridings of Thunder Bay—Atikokan and Thunder Bay—Nipigon. Of these 748 occupied positions, 27 are bilingual positions. Of these, one is in the scientific and professional category, 13 in administrative and foreign service, one in technical, 11 in administrative support and one in the operational category. There are 721 employees in unilingual positions. Employees are mainly located in the cities of Thunder Bay and Neebing.

There are 377 employees in the riding of Kenora—Rainy River: nine are in bilingual positions, two of which are in the scientific and professional category, four in administrative and foreign service and three in administrative support. There are 368 employees in unilingual positions. Employees are mainly located in Sioux Lookout, Kenora and Fort Frances.

There are 199 employees in the riding of Cochrane—Superior, 21 of whom are in bilingual positions, three in the scientific and professional, eight in administrative support, three in technical and in seven administrative support. There are 178 employees in unilingual positions. The majority of the employees are located in Hearst, Kapuskasing, and in the census subdivision of Cochrane, unorganized north part.

In the 1992 Public Service recruitment in Ontario excluding Toronto and the national capital region, of 1,425 new recruits, 1,328 or 93 per cent were appointed to unilingual positions and 97 were appointed to bilingual positions.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Langlois: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on Electoral Reform.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, for your information, we were considering Bill C-83. I now hear the Clerk at the Table say that we are going to consider Bill C-114. The previous speaker was not able to complete his speech on Bill C-83. Why are we proceeding right away to consider Bill C-114 even though we have not finished with Bills C-83 and C-97?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is the government's prerogative to call bills as it sees fit. Very often, when the debate resumes after Question Period, another bill is put on the Orders of the Day.

When the House returns to Bill C-83, the hon. member for Longueuil will of course have the time available to him if he is in the House then. But frankly, those are our rules and they have not changed, at least not since I have been here, which is surely as long as the hon. member for Richelieu.

Let us proceed then with Bill C-114.

[English]

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are 27 motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Motions Nos. 1, 5, 7, 9, 12, 14, 16, 19, 23 and 26, standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill, are identical to Motions Nos. 2, 6, 8, 10, 13, 15, 17, 20, 24 and 27, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt. After consultation, the motions standing in the name of the hon. member for Churchill will not be selected.

[English]

Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 3 and 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be grouped for debate. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 3 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 4. A negative vote on Motion No. 3 will require a vote on Motion No. 4.

[Translation]

Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, is identical to Motion No. 4 and will not be selected.

[English]

Motions Nos. 8 and 10, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motion No. 11, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 13 and 15, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

Motion No. 17, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

An amendment very similar to Motion No. 18, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, was defeated in committee, but after consultation the Chair has judged it to be of a significance which warrants further consideration. Therefore Motion No. 18 will be debated and will be voted on separately.

Motion No. 20, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, is identical to Motion No. 18 and will not be selected.

• (1220)

[English]

Motion No. 21, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 22, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, goes beyond the scope of Bill C-114 since it introduces a new concept. The Chair must therefore rule it out of order, according to citation 698(1) of the sixth edition of Beauchesne.

Motion No. 25, also standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, since it would amend an act that is not even mentioned in the bill, is clearly out of order, as the sixth edition of Beauchesne says in citation 698(8)(a).

Furthermore, similar amendments to Motions Nos. 22 and 25 were declared inadmissible in committee. Motions Nos. 24 and 27, standing in the name of the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt, are identical to Motions Nos. 22 and 25 and are also inadmissible. They will not be selected.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt) moved:

That Bill C-114 be amended in clause 14 by striking out lines 18 and 19 at page 9 and substituting the following therefor:

"one thousand electors who are members of the party and who combined are residents of at least fifty of the electoral districts,".

He said: Madam Speaker, I want to give the exact meaning of this motion.

The concern here is that in the bill as it is 100 people can form a party and they can all be from one community. The change that we are suggesting and promoting is that 1,000 people from 50 different ridings be required to form a legitimate party. That would reduce the possibility of a large number of parties attempting to establish themselves.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to indicate that we are prepared to support the amendment that is moved by the hon. member.

We were happy with the bill as it stands. The amendment makes some sense, however, since registration as a party is a significant act. We are quite prepared to support the position he puts forward that 1,000 electors ought to sign the party's application for registration. The geographical distribution makes some sense. We are happy to support the amendment.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I must say that my whole purpose today at report stage, as I unfortunately was not here during the debate on second reading, is to focus some attention on the plight and problems of Independent members.

This is obviously for registered parties. I congratulate the Lortie commission. I know the committee of parliamentarians has worked hard on producing this phase of the electoral reform. I was just informed by the government House leader that the second phase, which definitely has some more areas of very real critical interest, may be coming and perhaps will be a priority once we come back from the Easter break. It is really the reverse side of this amendment. I do not really have any problem with this amendment because it concerns registered parties.

I have a real problem with several sections in the present bill that are silent about the status of Independent members. The fundamental one is the inability of Independent members to give tax receipts. Members of a registered party, be they Conservative, Liberal or NDP, can and that is understandable. However members of the Green Party, the Rhinoceros Party or parties that had 50 candidates in the last election can get a receipt.

Sitting members in this House who have stated they are Independents and are going to run in the next election are not able to get a receipt before the writ is issued. This puts that Independent candidate in a very unfavourable situation against candidates who are members of registered parties.

I understand the need for registered parties. I belonged to a registered party for years. For certain reasons, which we will not repeat here, I am no longer a member of a registered party but am quite happy to be here as an Independent.

The only two negatives to that situation are getting recognized by the Chair, but I will leave that aside, and with regard to elections Independents cannot give a tax receipt as their competitors can. That puts Independents in an unfair disadvantage.

The government House leader just told me this is going to be corrected in phase two. I have been following this debate with interest. I have correspondence with the government House leader going back to 1991 on this problem, which he recognizes and the Lortie commission recognized.

I give full credit to the Lortie commission. I presented a brief before the Lortie commission and its chairman, Pierre Lortie, an eminent Canadian. He and the interesting group on his commission produced an $18 million to $20 million report that produced a wealth of changes. I am sorry that we are not going to change many more things.

I know the wish of the government and the Chief Electoral Officer has indicated to the committee that he wants this phase passed so that forward planning can be done and implemented in time for the next election. We all know that is going to come some time between now and the early fall, September or October at the latest. We are hoping to use the referendum list. Surely the government would not call an election and not utilize the referendum list that cost $125 million to produce.

We know there is going to be an election. I do not want to impede the work of the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Kingsley, who has taken over from that other great Canadian, Jean-Marc Hamel, who came into this scene as the Chief Electoral Officer almost at the time I did some 25 years ago.

I do find it difficult being co-operative this afternoon when I know the government and the committee have looked after the problems of lunatics and have looked after the problems of prisoners voting in jails, perhaps not very well, but they have not looked after the problem I have raised.

I wish I could get some assurance from the government House leader and that might change my obstinance at the moment because I understand the reason and I do not want to be difficult. Someone could say that people who are Independents must be lunatics. I suppose that might be the answer of my colleague, the government House leader. I said someone might say that. J'ai fait une blague, une petite blague.

I would like some assurance on this question because I have some problems with extending the vote to lunatics. This problem affecting Independents has been well known by the government House leader for three years. It was described in the Lortie commission which provided a remedy and in the draft bill set up a draft wording that could be used.

I am very disappointed that the committee did not recommend and the government House leader in the introduction of Bill C-114 has not dealt with the problem in this phase so that an Independent member could start to issue receipts just like some of the people he will be running against who are issuing them today.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I want to put on the record what I said to the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants privately. It is the intention of the government to proceed with phase two of electoral reform.

The reason for this is that the committee, in looking at this electoral reform in the Lortie report, concluded that because it was such a big mouthful it would be expeditious to proceed with those things that impose on the Chief Electoral Officer a large administrative burden such as these special ballots.

We decided to do that in one phase and we had thought we would have it through the House by now. The second phase would deal with the whole question of financing, limits, eligible expenses and the question of the private member's ability to write tax receipts.

I am told and assured, and I would be very disappointed if it was not there and I am sure it is there, that the report of the committee will include the amendments to the act to make it possible for private members to bring forward the bill.

• (1230)

If the hon. member wants further assurances why this would be something the government would be most interested in, he well knows that the existing limits and rules pertaining to fund raising are grossly inadequate. All of us are under pressure, so to speak, from our parties to amend the act in that regard. Therefore it is very much a government priority.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, I was listening to the leader of the government talk about pressures from the three political parties represented in this House to amend the Canada Elections Act. We in the Bloc Quebecois, and of course the independent members of this House, should also be included in there.

We must debate amendments but, as the leader of the ruling party said earlier, we would have liked to deal with the whole issue of amending the elections act. We are dealing with the first phase today, when elections are to be called by next October at the latest. Between now and then we will not have the time to look at phase two which deals with political party financing.

This amendment makes it totally impossible for an independent candidate to run except under very specific circumstances. I think that is totally unfair. It is unfair from a democratic point of view in the sense that only pre-registered parties seem to be recognized. Bear in mind that there are always people in an election who want to use a platform to promote their own views.

Obviously a ruling party can with legislation like that limit debate. As a matter of fact this government has done it and the fact was recognized again through parliamentary procedure. Time allocation can be used now pretty well as government pleases. Debate can even be stalled by the presentation of motions. Just about anything goes now.

In our opinion the amendment put forward by my colleague is perfectly justifiable. However it is restrictive, and that concerns us greatly. It is impossible to deal with this specific amendment in isolation from the bill as a whole, a bill which is being tabled in stages in spite of the fact that the Official Opposition had demanded, at the time this first phase was tabled, that it be provided with the complete picture not only the parts that suited the government first and the opposition second.

On the other hand, not all the amendments before us today come from the Official Opposition. There are also some from the New Democratic Party. Had we been invited to discuss the matter—which was virtually settled right there and then—with the traditional and recognized parties represented in this House we could have made an important contribution.

In that context I do not believe we can agree to pass in a great rush amendments to such an important bill for democracy but at the same time this bill must take into account the significant issue of political party financing.

In this connection, we all know that big multinational companies routinely make contributions to the traditional parties and that these contributions can reach hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Last night on TV, we saw the multinationals that contributed to the yes committee fund for the referendum held last October. The same thing could happen again in the next election because we will not have dealt with phase two. There will be restrictions, however, on independent candidates who will not be able to seek funding and give tax receipts because there is no provision in the legislation. A party must field at least 50 candidates to be officially recognized by the Chief Electoral Officer. As a result, the democratic principle of this bill is being truncated. It is really too bad just before the Easter holidays when members will go back to their ridings to do the job that we have to do. We are being told today that if it does not pass now the Canada Elections Act will not be amended in time for the next election, which is practically a threat.

However, if we do accept these amendments, if we do accept this phase of electoral reform, we are accepting changes that suit the traditional parties in a House that some people see as a private club. I think that is unfortunate and undemocratic.

In my own case if I decided to run as an independent in the next election campaign, I would not be able to give tax receipts to people who would like to contribute to my campaign fund. This introduces a bias in our democratic system. The traditional parties are recognized. They can accept any amount they wish. They can give tax receipts to people and companies but an independent candidate would not be able to do that.

It is unfortunate and, as I see it, practically an insult to our democratic system that we do not have all the amendments to the Canada Elections Act but only those amendments that suit the interests of the government and the Official Opposition. That being the case, we in the Bloc Quebecois are firmly opposed to the passage of Bill C-114 because this legislation totally ignores democratic principles and the democratic rights of potential candidates in the next election campaign.

In fact the amendment moved by the hon. member would be most welcome as part of a bill that would cover all phases. However, we are amending the Canada Elections Act in instalments. The first instalment is very convenient for the government because it minimizes the chances of having independent candidates and submits them to restrictions imposed by this Parliament.

That being the case, we will do our best to explain to this government the importance of these amendments, whether they are adopted today or tomorrow, but of course tomorrow the House will be closed, since we are supposed to adjourn today.

It never fails. At the end of the session we are always pressured to adopt a number of important bills, practically without warning. They want to rush this through and one, two, three, these are the bills you have to pass. We have to accommodate the government and we have to accommodate the Official Opposition. The New Democratic Party has a number of amendments and the Liberal Party has several as well, but when I see this organized attempt to push through a bill I think this contravenes the basic principles of democracy and we will not go along with this.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I will discuss the amendments tabled today in the report of the electoral reform committee. When this reform got underway with the Lortie commission, people were asked to send briefs and I did submit a rather short one on the financing of political parties.

I will admit that I was totally disappointed to see that the issue of financing will not be discussed before the next election campaign. When you look at the way political parties are financed you wonder if we live in a true democracy. In Quebec we made very important changes to the elections act regarding party financing. All companies, multinationals, law firms, engineering firms, et cetera, were prohibited from making contributions so that only a voter could make a gift to a political party.

In Quebec the limit was set at $3,000. I thought it was high but I never understood why.

In my brief to the commission on electoral reform I wrote that in a democracy the financing of political parties was something extremely important and that it is up to the public to ensure that all those who want to run for a seat in this House have an equal chance to do so. No company and no wealthy individual should have the right to make unlimited contributions to help elect a party or a candidate.

Studies have been made on this. A University of New Brunswick professor gathered data for several years. I read his doctoral thesis at that institution. This person had asked me if I could provide information. Indeed, with the help of the Library of Parliament and with questions taken from the Order Paper, I was able to provide the required information.

This information proved extremely important. Each year when people make donations to a political party they get a receipt and they are entitled to a tax credit. The administration of this system represents several million dollars.

This professor's approach, which I found to be very good, is simply that if we believe in a democratic system and if we truly want to make our system equal and fair, we should eliminate all contributions to political parties. It is up to the public, to the community to ensure that those men and women who want to be candidates have funds at their disposal.

This professor demonstrated that to set up such a system would only cost 99 cents per voter. It would only cost 99 cents per voter to ensure that we have the most democratic system, as well as the fairest.

The total amount, which would be around $26 or $27 million, would be distributed to political parties. There would be a very fair system for the splitting of that money. No company, nor any voter, even the wealthiest ones, would be allowed to make a contribution. The state would make sure that anyone who is a candidate gets enough money to campaign. Then lobbyists would not be able to influence politicians. No company, no individual should have the right to influence the decisions of this House. This is not normal. The only way to put an end to it is to make sure that no one—no group, no union, no company, no engineering firm, no law firm—has the right to exert pressure on an individual who is a candidate by telling him: We are going to finance your campaign. We are going to contribute significantly to your election. In a just and equitable system this should be illegal.

This aspect has been totally ignored. I respect the work of the commission and the efforts which were made. There were probably things to be amended but doing nothing with regard to this vital aspect, the financing of political parties, is inexcusable. Several amendments to the bill will be proposed today. We talked about it at length but we never did anything about the real problem, the financing of political parties. In my opinion the way things stand we are open to corruption. That is for sure. Proposing formulas and holding discussions is simply beating around the bush.

To conclude, I believe that with time it will come. It is inescapable. As people become more concerned, more politicized, they realize that it does not make sense to leave financing of political parties to the well-to-do of this country.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I am also pleased to rise to participate in the debate on such a controversial and questionable bill which is a mini reform of the elections act when we were expecting a full reform of the legislation.

I would like to quote what the right hon. Prime Minister had to say, 15 days before the last election, and what made the front page of La Presse. I would like the government House leader to listen instead of talking with his neighbour as he is doing right now. Here is a quote from that article: "Mr. Mulroney wants parties to be financed by the general public". That is a firm commitment he made ten days before the last election, on November 17 to be exact, which was actually only five days before the election. He made that commitment and said to the reporter: "It is important to act now since it would be unfair to change the rules just a few weeks or a month before an election compaign. That is why we will deal with this issue early on during our mandate". Their mandate is almost over and at the very last minute, contrary to the official commitment made by the Prime Minister five days before an election, they come up with a mini reform which restricts democracy in Canada and, as indirectly, in Quebec.

How can they restrict, with the amendment mentioned earlier, the very first amendment before the House? We are being told that 1,000 voters from at least 50 different districts will have to sign an application and submit it to Elections Canada. An individual who wants to bring together residents from one area to elect a member supporting their regional interests would be disqualified almost automatically. If he lives in Vancouver can he afford to go to 50 ridings and all the way to Ontario to find one person, one qualified voter, to sign the application? Can he afford to go all over the country to gather 1,000 signatures in order to be recognized?

With this amendment what treatment would the independent members sitting next to me get? What treatment would the green party on the environment get? What treatment would the social credit party get, which still exists in some areas of Quebec and western Canada? What treatment would those parties get which, for example, want to promote or oppose free trade, abortion or the right to life? What treatment would those who want to form a political party get?

This amendment would severely restrict these groups and thus would also hinder the democratic process. In fact this amendment only serves the interest of the three main political parties in this House.

This amendment creates a sort of preserve and I cannot accept the fact that no Conservative member from Quebec wants to talk on this issue. After all, these members are aware of the historic legacy left by René Lévesque who in 1977, after he became prime minister of our province, had as one of his priorities the democratization of political parties through financing by the people. Only those who have the right to vote have the right to finance political parties in Quebec.

Following this display of courage the right hon. Prime Minister had committed himself, five days before the election, to table a bill in the first few months of his term. Instead he waited until the last minute to introduce a bill which would again protect the interests of those who finance his political party, namely the big multinationals which give $100,000 or $200,000 to his party in an attempt to buy the popular vote and ensure the survival of the party.

As for the other parties, I was surprised and pleased to hear the previous speaker, the member for Gatineau, who discussed the financial aspect of this issue and who would also like to see an in-depth review of this financing which should be the intent of the legislation.

When the government talks about electoral reform it must first discuss financing. It overlooked that aspect during the last referendum by saying the same thing. According to Mr. Justice Michaud the legislation on the financing of the last referendum was anti-democratic. Mr. Justice Michaud said that it was a violation of democracy not to impose a limit to the parties involved in a referendum or an election when it comes to approaching various organizations and collecting money from them.

Mr. Justice Michaud was very clear on this. The government invoked the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as the reason not to limit the financial involvement of people or corporations. In his decision Mr. Justice Michaud said this: "It is much more harmful to let the multinationals finance at large, as much as they want, the political parties or the yes or no side during the referendum". It is much more dangerous for democracy than to limit those contributions because the "democratic process must not be influenced by money or advertising." This is what Mr. Justice Michaud wrote in the Libman decision: "It must not be influenced by an avalanche of advertising, a slew of commercial messages which could have the effect of jeopardizing the democratic process".

The Liberals and the New Democrats are accomplices of the Conservative Party in this debate by accepting such a minor reform which will nevertheless impose rather serious restrictions, especially for small political parties.

Mr. Vézina who phoned me from Toronto told me: "This reform—"

Someone is knocking at the door, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will therefore excuse me for interrupting him.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Gérard La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 2nd day of April, 1993, at 12.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Anthony P. Smith
Deputy Secretary
Policy Program and Protocol

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1305)

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on Electoral Reform; and Motion No. 2.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, we were still debating Motion No. 2 restricting the right of political parties to be born, thereby limiting the right to exercise democracy in Canada and in Quebec. It calls for one thousand electors from 50 different electoral districts. It may be warranted in some cases to limit the number of people who would want to register as members of a political party, but I think that such limitation goes completely against the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It takes us back once more to this ongoing problem in the history of our democracy, namely the power of the wealthy relative to the rest of the population.

Unavoidably when established parties like the Progressive Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party get together and agree to limit our right to exercise democracy they are protecting their ivory tower at the expense of democracy. In that context I can only oppose such a legislation.

Again the real problem requiring an in-depth revision of the elections act is political party financing. That particular question has been evaded, although the Lortie commission did mention it in its report without being too demanding. The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead did request it in a report submitted to the Lortie commission but it was disregarded. They did not even take into account in that reform the Prime Minister's firm commitment to ensure that the financing would come from the public at large, which means that only those who have the right to vote could contribute. We must fiercely protect that heritage from the days when René Lévesque was premier of Quebec. I cannot understand that the conservative members of this House do not care enough for this legacy to allow us to vote democratically without being influenced by money.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity this afternoon to speak on Bill C-114 which in no way reflects the promise of the Conservative Party for a thorough reform, particularly in the area of party financing.

I would like to quote the promise of the Prime Minister, just before the election, to bring financing of political parties by the general public. We can find it in La Presse dated November 17, 1988, and I quote: "A bill to force all political parties at the federal level to rely on financing by the general public would be passed at the very beginning of the second mandate of a Conservative government". This was the assurance given by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney during an exclusive interview to the Montreal daily La Presse.

Such a measure would be a logical and fundamental initiative to eradicate a number of potential conflicts of interest. That is what the Prime Minister was saying just before the election of 1988 with a view, naturally, of securing votes in Quebec because he knew that this mode of financing had now existed for a number of years in Quebec. It is now part of Quebec culture.

Being well aware that it was in the Quebec culture he used it just before the election of 1988 in order to win votes.

I continue my quote: "Recognizing without reservations the value of such a measure already in existence in Quebec, Mr. Mulroney said he would legislate quickly an end to contributions by corporate entities, whether companies or unions, to election funds of political parties, and a limitation to contributions by individuals. He said he would put all his weight in the balance to convince reluctant members of his own party before proceeding as quickly as possible with such a legislation.

For the outgoing Prime Minister, such a legislation on financing by the general public would fit his commitment of openness already shown by new and stricter regulations regarding conflicts of interest and an act on registration of lobbyists.

It is precisely his approach to problems of the past which, according to him, convinced Canadian voters of his commitment and of the need to minimize risks by taking the necessary measures to deal with the source of the most common errors and, among those measures, he is greatly relying on the financing of political parties by the people".

This is a formal statement made by a Prime Minister who seemed credible at the time and who got my trust. I belonged then to his party and he was then my leader. I believed in this Prime Minister and his statements, such as the one I just mentioned to you.

Moreover, the leader of the Bloc Quebecois, who was at the time his Quebec lieutenant, believed as well in the Prime Minister and in his statements on financing by individuals. He firmly believed in that. Indeed, he was one of the few in his riding of Lac-Saint-Jean to adopt, as an example, the financing by individuals for the 1988 election.

Another member from the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, was the one, and everybody in this House knows it and I know that most Quebecers also know it, who defended financing by the people in order to avoid conflicts of interest.

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead worked very hard so that we could have an honest democracy. It was the statements and the efforts that he made that led the Prime Minister to take that position. We thought then that the Prime Minister was serious.

As usual the Prime Minister in order to cover up his intentions as he did with several other projects or initiatives opposed by Quebecers or Canadians or to improve some sectors of economic or political activities because he wants to wash his hands of the issue, always ends up appointing boards of inquiry which cost millions of dollars to the Crown and to the taxpayers. It costs millions and millions of dollars. Besides the Prime Minister to gain time said that he wanted to do it at the very beginning of his next mandate. But to wash his hands of the matter he simply appointed a commission which was called the Lortie commission. This Lortie commission cost a few million dollars.

It made many recommendations, particularly one on financing by the general public as the Prime Minister had asked it to do. It did not have any choice because the Prime Minister had publicly requested that. It being the case inevitably, Mr. Lortie, who was the chairman of this commission, had to comply with that request. Now we have Bill C-114, but unfortunately the part which seemed to have priority for the Prime Minister is not in it. It was completely left aside and here we are trying to deal with a few small amendments, though important indeed, which do not solve the basic problem which is the financing of political parties.

The referendum is not that far behind us. It was held last fall, in October. The Canada Elections Act was used to establish the rules for that October 1992 referendum. Just last night, on CBC if I am not mistaken, expenses for that referendum were made public. We could see that some of the big corporations and major banks in the yes camp, most of them English speaking, contributed up to $100,000 to the yes fund and we know that those corporations receive massive federal grants. I wonder if they were in any way pressed to make those contributions. The Royal Bank gave $100,000. It was the first one to try and scare Quebecers during the referendum.

We must settle the matter of political party financing by the general public so that democracy can be free of the influence of big corporations financed by the government. The Prime Minister said so in 1988.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, so many things have been said on this amendment that I would like to have unanimous consent to speak to it once again.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1320)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 2 negatived.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 23 by striking out lines 35 to 39 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 23 by striking out lines 38 and 39 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"correctional institution as a result of a conviction and has been sentenced to five or more years in a correctional institution;".

He said: Madam Speaker, these two motions are really alternative motions. I have brought these amendments to this bill to allow the House the opportunity to express its views on whether or not inmates should be granted the right to vote.

As we no doubt are aware under the current law prisoners are denied the right to vote in the written part of section 51 of the Canada Elections Act. The words of the act that are relevant are:

The following persons are not qualified to vote at an election and shall not vote at an election:

(e) Every person undergoing punishment as an inmate in any penal institution for the commission of any offence.

There is a blanket ban under the current law on any inmate exercising the right to vote. That section of the Canada Elections Act was declared null and void by the courts under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The charter guarantees every citizen the right to vote and that right was taken away by this section of the Canada Elections Act. The courts concluded that imprisonment alone was not sufficient justification for striking down the right to vote and accordingly it struck down the section of the Canada Elections Act thereby restoring the right to vote to inmates in institutions.

During the referendum campaign that was just concluded, the right to vote was extended to inmates. In fact there was no civil insurrection or great problem because inmates exercised their franchise during the referendum campaign.

Inmates in institutions were able to vote only in the place where they actually resided, that is where their families reside or from where they had been sentenced. Residence in the institution in and of itself did not constitute residence for the purpose of determining where an inmate voted. Although there is a very large prison population, for example in Kingston and the Islands, only something like 119 inmates registered to vote in Kingston and the Islands.

In addition, inmates must apply to register. Many did not. Something like one-third of the inmates in Canada chose to register in the referendum. While it could be expected that more might register in the case of a general election, under the rules that were proposed they would vote only in the place where they live and not in the prison where they are residing at the time of their imprisonment.

The government established the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing which made a recommendation in respect of inmates voting. It recommended a double-barrelled test. It recommended that those serving a life sentence with a minimum of 10 or more years to be served not be allowed to vote, but all other inmates be granted the right to vote. The committee which was studying the report, of which I was a member, concluded that test was too broad or unsatisfactory in one way or another and came up with a slightly more detailed proposal which I will not go into. The government, when it received the committee report, rejected out of hand all the committee's recommendations. It came up with a proposal in Bill C-114 which denied the right to vote to every person who is imprisoned in a correctional institution serving a sentence of two years or more.

That disenfranchises every single inmate in a federal institution in Canada since in order to be sentenced to a federal prison inmates have to receive a sentence of two years or more. All other offenders who receive a lesser sentence spend their time in a provincial jail.

In the circumstances I feel this is harsh and unfair. Therefore I have proposed two amendments which were read to the House. The first would extend the right to vote to all inmates; the second would extend it to all inmates serving a sentence of five years or less. If they got five years or more then they would have no right to vote.

The five-year rule is designed to appeal to perhaps a wider segment of members in the House than the blanket lifting of the restriction would otherwise do. I suspect the first one might get defeated on a vote in the House; the second I would hope the government would see fit to support. Clearly if it does not, the motion is going to go down too.

I want to say something about my reason for proposing these amendments. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which is paramount in our legal structure and which creates certain rights for all citizens, does give the right to all citizens to vote. By sentencing a person to prison it is not the intent of the judge in imposing the sentence or indeed of the criminal law under which the sentence is rendered, to take away from that inmate his or her right of citizenship. Clearly it is a kind of punishment. That is why an inmate is sentenced to prison. It is not because the prisoner or accused person is being stripped of his or her citizenship.

If inmates in prisons are citizens and if we accept that our charter is the highest law in our country, then surely it follows that inmates in prison who are citizens ought to have the right to vote just as everyone else does. It does not aid in the punishment that the person not have a right to vote.

I guess I would have to issue a challenge to the government to say how it is that by sentencing someone to prison we punish the person further by taking away the right to vote. It is a right that is a free right given in a democratic society. It is freely given in our society. While it may satisfy some innate sense of justice in some of us to think that prisoners ought to be deprived of the right to vote, it serves no useful purpose either in punishing the inmate or in the rehabilitation of the inmate, which after all is part of the aim of the imprisonment process.

We sentence inmates to a jail term in the hope that at the conclusion of the sentence they will be able to come out and establish themselves in a normal and law abiding way in the community. We do not sentence them to prison with the idea that when they come out they will be committing more crimes and sent back. That is not the aim. Sometimes it happens, I agree, but it is not the aim.

Surely if that is not the aim we ought to be careful to ensure that the steps taken in respect of a prisoner in terms of denial of rights and denial of responsibilities ought to be commensurate with the sentence. While it is easy to say that a sentence of two years or more justifies certain action, like being placed in a federal penitentiary, does it really help the case to then say in addition they are not going to be allowed to vote? Frankly I expect most inmates could not care less, but as a democratic society based on the rule of law, which has as its guiding principle the notion that every citizen has the right to vote, surely we should be thinking very hard before we deprive certain citizens of that right.

The purpose of these amendments is to ensure that the right is restored in a reasonable and sensible way and not in a way that allows mass voting of inmates in the places in which they are resident; that is in prisons. The voting will take place in prisons, but the votes will be cast in the constituency in which the inmate resided or in which his family resides at the time the vote is to be cast. I think that is a fair way of doing it.

I should point out that the system I have suggested in Motion No. 3, whereby all inmates would have the right to vote, is one that is followed in Italy, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Ireland and Israel. In our own country in the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland, inmates in institutions have the right to vote. Some of the provinces have gone far beyond what the government is proposing in Bill C-114.

I urge the government to consider adopting either Motion No. 3 or Motion No. 4 in amendment to this bill in order to widen the franchise and give the right to vote where it has been taken away, in my view unnecessarily and possibly unfairly.

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands raises a very important point. We want to try and liberalize the electoral base. In other words we want everyone to be able to vote. If rehabilitation of offenders is so important, why do we deprive them of the fundamental right to vote for the candidate of their choice in their respective ridings?

When I look at phase one of the bill I get the impression it is a diversion: a few goodies here and there, a few improvements. Meanwhile there is a tendency to overlook the principle involved, which is the citizen's right to elect his or her representative. Financing is another point. Yes, this is relevant. Will I have the right to go to a prison or penitentiary and ask to canvas an inmate? He has the right to vote so he has the right to be canvassed. Will I be able to hold a public meeting in the penitentiary or prison? In fact, during the referendum campaign in 1980 I personally went with the yes group to the prison in Hull to meet inmates who had the right to vote. We wanted to explain what the referendum was all about. In society today rehabilitation is part of a very desirable process. It means not cutting them off completely from the rest of the community just because they have committed an offence and have to serve a sentence. That is what we are doing here. Yesterday during Question Period there was a reference to increasing the per diem or allowance for inmates. There is something inconsistent in all this. It does not make sense and it is totally unacceptable.

Incidentally, and we will discuss this later on, someone in California who has been living outside the country for number of years will be allowed to vote and an inmate who is in rehabilitation and will be released after serving his sentence will not have that right. There is something wrong here. I think we should go back to committee and examine this bill more thoroughly because we are creating a bias against a small, probably the most vulnerable sector of society. This is going to be quantified, it seems. Is it two years? If it is less than two years they will be able to vote. If they are sentenced to two years or more, if they are in the penitentiary and they have to serve more than ten years, they will not have the right to vote. If parole is granted and the inmate's sentence is reduced accordingly the inmate may be allowed to vote. A fellow inmate whose parole has not been approved will not be able to vote.

Madam Speaker, I know in your capacity as the Speaker you cannot endorse what I am saying because your role in this House is impartial and to listen to those of us who want to give this bill its full significance as a tool to truly renew and substantially improve the elections act.

When you start quantifying, prescribing distances and a given number of years— Take the case of someone who has been sentenced and is serving time in the penitentiary in Montreal or Kingston but under normal circumstances would have been voting in the electoral district of Hull—Aylmer. I guess that person will have to pre-register in order to be able to exercise that right.

How will that vote be posted? Will it be the same for Canadians residing outside of the country such as members of the Armed Forces who have the right to vote because they are serving outside the country under orders? At present when you are away on a trip you can register up to one week before the election date to be able to vote.

In the case of prisoners, it is quite a big clause, although a high percentage of them are so disappointed with governments that they will probably be the first ones to ignore them come an election. But that is beside the point. What we must bear in mind is that the right to vote is a democratic right that cannot be violated if we are truly seeking to extend it to all Canadian men and women.

In that respect, the amendment put forward by my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands is an improvement, an improvement that the government does not seem to want to take into consideration. Had the government agreed to take it under consideration in committee, it would simply have been incorporated. A change would have been made. A reciprocal agreement would have intervened between political formations and we would know that it is acceptable.

Instead, we will not even get to vote on this today. It will be agreed to on division because several of our colleagues are already back in their ridings. Some left last night, others this morning. There are only a few members left in this House to pass this major piece of legislation.

I cannot consent to that.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to take part in the debate at report stage of Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported with amendments by the Special Committee on Electoral Reform.

Specifically I would like to indicate at the outset that I support Motions No. 3 and No. 4 moved by my Liberal colleague from Kingston and the Islands. I would like to say that indeed it is a source of pride that we are going through this process of electoral reform of democracy.

I would like to quote from the report by the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing. It says: "The Canada Elections Act and other legislation encompass fundamental democratic rights, the obligations and duties of election officers and officials and the basic rules of electoral competition and access to elected office. Legislation affecting this matter goes to the very heart of the democratic process".

I would like to repeat and underscore that it goes to the very heart of the democratic process. Parliamentary initiatives such as reforming electoral democracy, chaired by Mr. Lortie, are laudable and can be a source of pride for all of us.

Allow me at this juncture to share another source of pride from my constituency of Winnipeg North. Recently I was reading one of the community newspapers. There was a tribute given by the Filipino Canadian community in my city to two young women, Angela Jill Guingcangco and Ma-Anne Dioniso, who played the leading roles of young Cosette and young Eponine last year in Les Miserables. These young women are sources of pride. I would like to explain how this is related to debate on the motion before us.

I do not want to boast but today I cannot help myself. At the end of May the new Princess of Wales Theatre in Toronto will open its curtain to the $12 million production of Miss Saigon. Stepping onto the stage in the lead role is Ma-Anne Dioniso, one of my constituents.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will allow me, I wonder what this has to do with Motions Nos. 3 and 4, even though I am quite enthused with the Canadian production of Miss Saigon. I am really wondering what this has to do with allowing people in penal institutions to vote or not.

The hon. member may want to explain. Maybe the Speaker lacks the knowledge of the voting procedure in show business, but after 30 years I doubt it. Please explain what this has to do with Motions Nos. 3 or 4.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I will get to that. I hope the Speaker will not begrudge me the chance to make the connection. I will do that at the end, if you will bear with me.

Ma-Anne is the pride of the Filipino community of Winnipeg and the toast of the city. Over 1,000 women auditioned for parts in Miss Saigon. This lady captured the title role, impressing Mirvish Productions with her powerful voice, dynamism and talent. The rising star was discovered in a talent contest hosted by President Tony Carta of CKJS-Radio. Since then there has been no stopping her.

I urge all members of Parliament to have some patience and to see the pride of Winnipeg who will be doing eight shows a week for the next two years in Toronto. Then I hope they will make a Canadian tour and bring her back home to Winnipeg to the people who love her so dearly.

Madam Speaker, I can see you are a little bit upset. Perhaps you cannot wait—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am not upset. I am trying so very hard to understand who in that illustrious cast is or could be in a penal institution and henceforth allowed or not allowed to vote in the next election. This is not being upset. It is just trying to make sense of it all, even though the hon. member stayed on his feet while I was on mine.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, it never entered into my imagination that a woman like this, of great talents, would ever go to a penal institution. It never did.

Yes, I understand and I understand members on the government side. I will read from this summary of government achievements. It covers 1984-93 and is from the Library of Parliament.

Mrs. Sparrow: Get with it, Rey. Today we are living in 1993 and we are talking about penal institutions.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, do we not have the freedom of speech to connect at the end?

I do not want to test the patience of the House. I will just indicate that I support the two motions and I defer to the Chair.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I just want to state we will support the extension of Motion No. 4 to five years.

• (1345)

We believe a charter challenge of two years would probably be upheld, but a challenge against the five years would be less likely.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I heard the explanation of the two amendments by my colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands. I find myself in a predicament here because that member has been one of the leading workers and members on this committee. Of course the Lortie commission also made certain recommendations. The bill we have does not quite conform to either the Lortie commission or what the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has set out in his amendments.

I agree with the member for Hull—Aylmer who spoke earlier and had some discussion with the government House leader. This is the electoral reform bill that affects all members and actually affects all people who are going to vote. It is really a fairly important piece of legislation.

I understand, in part, many of the problems a House leader has. I was in opposition for many years and frankly found Friday afternoons pretty enjoyable. A rainbow of bills came before the House. The then government House leader, whoever he may have been, found that with few members around it was easier to get legislation through. I guess that is one of the reasons we are debating this very important bill. The fact that the Easter break is almost upon us results in even fewer members here on a Friday afternoon.

I certainly believe some of these matters should get a vote in the House so members can put their votes where they say their ideologies or mouths are in terms of the rights of prisoners.

Perhaps this gets into this very new world. I do not have the knowledge of my hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands. I understand the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and used to be a practising lawyer, but as I read through the Lortie commission report and heard my friend from Kingston and the Islands today on the amendments, I found myself more in agreement with the way the government has presented these provisions in the bill.

Frankly some of my difficulty is the fact that when a person commits a crime and is sentenced to one of our institutions I think certain rights are suspended. The right to vote is there as long as the person has not committed an injury to the state, but it is in a state of suspension and the person is isolated, interned, incarcerated.

Some people such as Clifford Olson—and I do not think we are talking about him today because there are time limits involved in this amendment—have committed heinous crimes. I just cannot get excited about such people losing their rights to vote for the period they are incarcerated. If there is an election there are all the problems of organizing polls and giving those people the right to vote. I think all Canadians should know that if people commit crimes they are going to have to face certain consequences, and one of the consequences is that they are going to be in jail and will not have the right to vote.

I think the government bill and these sections are a happy compromise between the Lortie commission and certainly what my friend for Kingston and the Islands would like, but I can understand from whence he is coming.

I am glad to see the government House leader in the House. I do not want to be difficult and I am glad that hopefully there will be a chance for members to vote, at least at third reading, so this matter will receive the imprint of members. My colleague in the Bloc Quebecois, the member for Richelieu, spoke earlier today. While his remarks might not have been quite relevant, they were certainly a little more relevant than Miss Saigon from Winnipeg, with all due respect to the hard working member from Winnipeg who is one of the more conscientious members of this House.

There are some very large issues here. Apart from the rights of prisoners and the rights of society, I think this is the perfect illustration where we need a balance. I think the government has struck a happier balance in this bill in terms of what society believes than the Lortie commission and the amendments of my hon. friend.

This brings me back to what I said earlier. I frankly cannot accept the fact that the government bill is moving on prisoners, lunatics and those in hospitals and has not done anything about the rights of Independent members of this House of Commons like myself and others to my left who have declared for a certain party. There is no doubt that in an election they will have more than 50 candidates and therefore will automatically qualify to be a registered party. Of course, in an election we are all in the same boat. Once the writ is issued we can issue receipts.

I find it really difficult. I am trying to be as reasonable as I can so that we can cover all these other areas and extend rights or modify rights to different classes, yet the committee and/or bill does not reflect any redress of what I have been writing to the government House leader about for the last three years.

I know the government House leader was being frank and objective earlier, but I have checked with some people in the lobby about the draft committee report in the second phase. It does address part of the problem of Independents in the sense that any surplus moneys left over will go back to that Independent candidate through the Receiver General and not just go back to the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

This is a technical matter that does not excite too many people, but it is just another area of discrimination against Independent members and members of registered parties. My point is not so much that. I am glad there is a little movement there, but I have seen nothing in the draft report about Independent candidates and especially members of Parliament. I understand the problem about Independents at large. Independents could sprout like mushrooms from coast to to coast, and then what kind of control or accountability would they have?

It is a very simple amendment that takes care in principle of the problem of an Independent member sitting in this House who wants to be put in the same position as the member for Kent who can give a tax receipt for a donation from a good citizen. I am all for it. I voted for the bill many years ago but I cannot because I am an Independent.

The Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Kingsley, an honourable Canadian, is going to oversee all the operations when the writ is issued. All it takes is a little amendment to put the Independent member of Parliament in the same position as other members. I am not talking about putative Independents who may or may not arise from the territory east or west, but people in this House are under some obligation to have accountability so the Chief Electoral Officer can be in the same position with that Independent member who has declared to be an Independent as he is going to be once the writ is issued.

This is why I find it very difficult. Of course that leads me to the larger issue which is really not relevant to this amendment. The Lortie commission is fine. I said earlier that I have the highest respect for the way Mr. Lortie conducted that commission. He was kind enough to invite me to appear at one symposium and I gave a brief before it.

The difficulty with the Lortie commission, and this is one of the great ironies about the debate, is that it understandably helped crystallize even stronger party organization, party rule, party discipline and the whole structure of parties. We all know political parties are rather fundamental.

As other members have said, it is sort of ironic that the Lortie commission is centred on that and yet the public at large has never been more dissatisfied with parties, be they Liberal, Conservative, NDP, Rhinoceros, Green or Bloc Quebecois.

• (1355)

The public has a very real problem with parties. Yet the commission helps to bring parties together. It is ironic that the core of parties I believe is getting smaller and smaller. The uncommitted block of voters is becoming larger and larger.

We come back to the prisoners. I cannot get too excited about extending too many rights to people who have insulted the society that is supposed to give them the right. I like the government bill better than I like the amendments of my colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a few things on these motions that talk about the right to vote for those in federal penal institutions.

The member for Kingston and the Islands who has proposed the amendments has taken us through some of the history of what the Supreme Court did to section 51 of the present elections act. He also reviewed what the electoral commission recommended, that those with a prison term of more than 10 years would be denied the right to vote.

This bill recommends two years. That means that everyone in a federal penal institution would lose the right to vote. The motion tries to strike a balance, half way between what this bill is recommending and the 10 years. Therefore, put it at five years.

I would like to say something about the arguments that the member used. He used primarily two arguments. The member stressed the fact that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms says that all citizens have the right to vote. That is correct.

The member went on to say that people imprisoned in a federal institution do not lose their citizenship. That is correct. However, they do lose other rights that are in the charter. They lose the obvious right to mobility which is in the charter. They cannot move around. They cannot take up residence. They have to stay in that prison. Therefore, they have lost that right.

They also lose the right to freedom or liberty which all the rest of the citizens of Canada have. That person is deprived of the right to liberty and is now locked up for a period of time in prison. Therefore they lose other rights.

The member is saying that since they do not lose their citizenship, why are we taking away the right to vote? He is ignoring the fact that they lose the right to mobility, to liberty and other things.

The second reason why prisoners should have the right to vote is that some provinces give people in provincial penal institutions the right to vote. Some other countries do as well.

Some other countries do some weird and wonderful things. Just because they do them does not mean we have to copy them. In fact I am glad we do not copy everything that all other countries do. Therefore, that is not a good argument.

Some provinces do some things. I am glad that we do not copy everything that the socialist republic of Ontario is doing. The same is true for Saskatchewan and British Columbia. Just because some provinces do some things does not mean we should do them.

I fail to see what the arguments are. I would submit that when a person commits a crime, is convicted and is then sentenced into a federal penal institution, which means more than two years, they should lose their right to vote. Common sense would dictate that.

Is it not common sense to say: Now you have lost the normal democratic rights of liberty, mobility and freedom to vote. Until you have served that time and are out of prison, you lose those rights. One of those privileges is the right to vote.

The argument in favour of what the government is saying as to why everyone in a federal penal institution should lose their right to vote is simple common sense. They chose to act against society. They now suffer the consequences which means denial of freedom. One of the aspects of denial of freedom, to move around and be at liberty is they have lost the right to vote.

Simple common sense tells us they have lost the privileges of free, responsible citizens for a fixed period of time. One of those privileges is the right to vote. Therefore I am glad to support what the government is saying, that a person in a federal penal institution should not have the right to vote. I think that simple common sense tells us that is the right way to go.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on Motions Nos. 3 and 4. First of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for proposing these amendments. He seems to be more in touch with reality than the Conservative member who spoke to these amendments.

The Conservative member said that a person who commits a crime and is sentenced to a prison term of more than two years should lose all his or her democratic rights, including the right to vote. He must be very unhappy to sit on the Conservative side since several of his colleagues may soon lose that right.

Let us talk about the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Does it limit the right of a person to vote because of something that he or she may have done at some point in his or her life? For example, an inmate in an isolated moment of violence may have committed a crime. An inmate at some point in his life when he was young—we know that some leadership candidates admit to smoking drugs in their early years—Had they been caught then they would have been liable to a three-year jail sentence. In 1970, some people were sentenced to three years in prison just for possession of marijuana. Today those leadership hopefuls say that what they did is insignificant, that it belongs to the past and that it is not serious, and I admit that it is not serious, but it was considered serious then. Some people went to jail for that in those days. What would have happened if those candidates to the leadership of the Conservative Party had been caught and sentenced to three years in jail? They would have lost their right to vote during that period.

These leadership candidates would have lost their right to vote because they would have been sentenced or imprisoned. That is common sense.

The charter of rights is not there to pass judgment on people. It is there to protect their historic rights to live in a democratic society and to assert even more their rights to live in a democracy. To live in democracy one has to be able to elect members of Parliament by voting for the candidate of his or her choice. That is what democracy is all about, to be able to cast a vote every four or five years at the municipal, provincial or federal levels. The inmates who are longing to get back to live as everybody else, out of prison, would not have the right to vote during that period of reflection imposed to them inside the walls, during that period of repentance asked of them. For the most part, since 90 per cent do not commit subsequent offences after coming out of prison they recognize their mistake. When they are sentenced they already feel the pain of being separated from their family, their friends and their children. And those people, in prison, would not have the right to think about the political future of their country by losing their right to vote? What a mistake. Even though they are in prison, they still have the right to think of their children, to feel love for their wife or husband and to aspire to a better future for them.

And how can they provide such a better future? Often, by changing the government and being able to vote, even for another candidate. I argue not for their privileges in prison but for respecting them as intelligent people who have done wrong but that does not prevent them from desiring what is good for their families, their regions and their communities.

In that regard I think it is even frivolous to have such a debate. Would we dare to sit in judgement of those who have done wrong? Who among us can cast the first stone? No one can cast the first stone. It is said that a guilty verdict is found for only about 10 per cent of crimes. They go to prison but the others still vote anyway. Those people who pay for their crime by being deprived of their freedom would no longer have the right to vote in a democratic election. There is something wrong with that.

I do not understand the Conservative Party's attitude and the silence in this debate of Quebecers in the Conservative Party, like the member for Gaspé, for example. He is a man of great insight. He was awarded the Order of Canada, is a psychologist, a thoughtful man, who could so well understand what the prisoners feel when they are in jail. I am sure that he feels like telling them how much he hopes that they get the right to vote, but is he being held back by the party? That right to vote should never be trampled on, as the Conservative member who spoke before me says or as his party says.

There is something wrong in the kind of vision in this proposed reform, which is continually limiting democracy, democratic activity, the formation of political parties as in Motion No. 2 just now, and the ability of independents to run, since their fees would be increased. It would limit prisoners' rights as though they were perpetual outcasts from society and did not deserve consideration because they had made a mistake. What sort of government do we have? What vision do we have? This government is lost when it comes to the economy and it has been completely rejected by the people on the Constitution.

Today it presents us with its new vision of electoral reform which is behind the times. It is not forward–looking but a setback, a major setback. Five days before the election the Prime Minister said that the important thing in the reform is the financing of political parties. What is he presenting instead? The government presents mini reforms, minor amendments to limit prisoners' right to vote, to limit the existence of political parties, to limit the ability of independents to speak out. The effect would be to keep only three privileged parties in the House, three parties which have plotted together on the reforms, which plotted during the referendum and which are now plotting to have a mini reform instead of a real reform of the elections act. This party's vision is to protect the privileged. That is it. They want to protect the privileged and to keep some people who have something against the system and have a different vision from theirs from voting.

A government which is closed to democracy is doomed, condemned to a resounding defeat which it will deserve, of course. However, I feel sorry for my friend, the minister, who is pointing his finger at me. I would never dare take the floor from him and I would appreciate it if he acted the same way toward me. The hon. member for Gaspé is looking at me and is covered with shame because we are depriving our prisoners of the right to vote, because we would like to take away their right to vote if they have been sentenced to more than two years in prison. Certainly with his great psychologist talents, the hon. member for Gaspé must have comforted several Conservative members who are presently scared of spending more than two years in prison for their actions. Of course, he will be very useful to his party in that respect. After the defeat, with the pensions they will receive, they will also be able to reflect on their sins and feel sorry for not having taken part—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Plamondon: Are my 10 minutes already expired, Madam Speaker?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The 10 minutes that were allowed are expired.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I would like to move, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), that the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Fewer than 15 members having risen, pursuant to Standing Order 26(2), the motion is deemed to have been adopted.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands for the amendment he moved to this most undemocratic bill, a bill that limits the freedom of speech, particularly for prisoners.

It is completely unacceptable to deprive of the right to vote inmates who have been sentenced to more than two years in prison. Taking this right away from a group of citizens reflects an excessive conservatism or liberalism. The main freedom we can have in a country such as ours is the opportunity to decide every four to five years how our country is to be run and how we are going to secure a better quality of life.

Obviously punishment has already been meted out to prisoners but they will be free again some day. They have to keep exercising their rights since most of them will not be in prison for the rest of their life. They need their freedom of speech because when they come out of prison they will have to live in a society that will have changed. Without the right to vote they may not want to be part of a society which has changed so much.

It seems to me that someone should have the right to vote even if he was sentenced to more than two years in prison because, and I say it again, it is strictly what society wants, the right to express oneself and to change some rules in a country where we advocate the well-being of people.

There is another reason I agree with the proposal. One day that prisoner will get out of prison. I know it because I have a halfway house in my riding. A prisoner who gets out of prison can go to that house in order to re-learn how to live in society. A prisoner who spent 10, 15 or 20 years in prison is totally out of touch with the reality of life when he gets out.

The hon. member for Gaspé, who is a psychologist, should understand very well the difficulties of a prisoner who enters that new life, after spending 10 or 15 years in prison.

In Longueuil, we have a halfway house. Once in a while an ex-prisoner comes and tells me how difficult it is to be back in the real world, how difficult it is to deal with financial institutions, to learn about all the changes in society. Nowadays a generation is only five years. It used to be 10 or 15 years. To call it a new generation there has to be enough changes and now it happens after five years. Our society is changing so fast that if one is away for five years reintegration is difficult. That is the reason why rehabilitation of former inmates is so difficult even after just five years.

I say that inmates should have the right to vote because such a right would keep them in contact with society, would keep them interested. They can then listen to what is going on outside, especially in politics. They can feel that they are still somehow part of society. The day they come out may be sooner than they expected, thanks to our parole system. Rehabilitation might be faster.

I think that is a very good reason to support this proposal giving inmates the right to vote.

There is no doubt that if you consider that uncaringly, without a broad perspective, the way the Conservative member did a moment ago—and he is a real Conservative, very shortsighted—then you think that the inmate has been sentenced and must be punished. I agree that he has to be punished if he committed a crime or if he is a threat to society. At the same time we have to recognize that the inmate has the right to remain in touch with society. Otherwise, the day he comes out he will be lost and if he cannot find an answer to his problems in this society he will become a repeat offender.

The other important point is that this person will probably be caught committing a subsequent offence because he will find no other way of adapting to that society. We all know what the costs of prisoner rehabilitation are for government. It is very expensive, but it is also socially disturbing because these people have difficulty fitting in and they risk, as I mentioned before, going astray again and being sent back to prison.

In such a case, you know what the costs are. I was told it costs approximately $60,000 a year to keep an inmate in prison. Therefore, think about the cost of a second offender, the transition cost for someone who gave up on society. You must take into account the fact that this amendment, which gives a prisoner the right to vote, will also allow that individual, on the one hand, to keep in touch with society, to stay interested in what is going on, and on the other hand, to exercise his freedom of speech. For example if human rights are threatened inside the prison he will have the opportunity to express himself freely on that matter if he has the right to vote. That is why I feel it is important that this amendment be passed for all the reasons I just mentioned.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 3. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 3 will obviate the need for a vote on Motion No. 4. A negative vote on Motion No. 3 will require a vote on Motion No. 4.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Plamondon: I rise on a point of order. There is no quorum.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question had been started to be put. There is no quorum call at this time.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt) moved:

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 29 by striking out lines 27 and 28 at page 17 and substituting the following therefor:

"by the person on a temporary basis, unless that person has no"

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 29 by adding immediately after line 40 at page 17 the following:

(4) The provisions of section 59 of the Act shall not apply for interpreting this section."

He said: Madam Speaker, in both Motions Nos. 8 and 10 the attempt is to accommodate the large number of people in some cities who are homeless and consequently do not have a residence and who still should have the right to vote. Motion No. 10 would eliminate the 10-day requirement.

They are both intended to increase the opportunity of people in the situation of being homeless to vote.

I acknowledge and accept your decision, Madam Speaker, even though it seems rather strict to me. As far as all the other points are concerned, I inform you now that I intend to speak on each and every amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the member for Richelieu. To make things easier for him, I could perhaps tell him that when we say debate in English it means débat in French. The words debate and débat are quite similar, are they not? And if nobody rises, then we keep on going.

• (1430)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

Motion No. 11.

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 34 by striking out line 1 at page 33 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) Paragraphs 77(1)(c) and (d) of the said act are".

He said: Madam Speaker, this amendment to the act is to change section 77. Under section 77 as it is now there are certain persons who are declared to be ineligible to be candidates in a general election. The act provides that: "Every person who is a member of a legislature of a province during the time he is such a member is disqualified from being a candidate at an election".

The Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing recommended that this restriction be done away with. The committee of the House that was appointed by the House to study this issue unanimously recommended that this prohibition be done away with. Yet the government decided to put the jackboots to the committee report, pretended that the committee had not reported this recommendation, and struck that provision out of the bill.

The purpose of this amendment is to put it back into the bill and allow members of provincial legislatures to run for public office, for this House of Commons. They will have to resign their seats if they are elected to the House but they would be eligible to be candidates for this House and retain their seats until elected, just as a mayor of a municipality is, a counsellor or alderperson on a municipal council is, and the reeve of a township is. All these people are entitled to run for Parliament and retain their offices until elected, but members of the provincial legislature are not allowed to do so.

The commission and the committee agreed that this was an anomaly in the law. The purpose of this amendment is to remove that anomaly. That is a brief explanation. I think the amendment makes sense. If it were not so close to an election I think even the government would agree that it makes sense. However I suspect that given the unpopularity of the government there are no members of provincial legislatures who want to run for federal office for it. Therefore the government figures it might as well cut them all out because anybody with any sense who is in a provincial legislature would not run as a Tory candidate but would be running as a Liberal candidate or as a candidate of some other party, most likely as a Liberal.

That is the reason that the government did not agree with this amendment. It is perfectly clear to me, and I am sure it is clear to the hon. member who is making such a noise from her seat because if it was not she would be silent.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, this time I find myself in complete agreement with my colleague from Kingston and the Islands. I would only add that these people, while they may not run as candidates, are still going to have a vote under this act. No matter what the polls are or what the party standings are it is not going to really do much to change the results, assuming the candidate votes for himself or herself.

It would be interesting to have an explanation from the government side as to why it did not follow the Lortie commission and/or the committee report on something that seems on the face of it to be so sensible. That is what I would hope we might have in the sense that this place is supposed to be a Parliament, a place in which we are supposed to debate. It would be a very interesting to find out why the government did not follow those two recommendations.

The explanation by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands makes very good sense. I think we should support it and get on with further amendments.

• (1435)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate, the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): I thank you Madam Speaker for recognizing me so rapidly and with so much kindness in the eyes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is true that the hon. member put on his glasses but I am touched and delighted that he could see generosity in my eyes from such a distance. I will recognize him without delay. The hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Plamondon: This is too much. I thank you, Madam Speaker. You are making me ill at ease. However, Madam Speaker, you are right; what I was referring to is more the nod of your head than the approval you expressed with your eyes.

I would like to speak on that amendment. The member for Saint-Maurice wants me to open my arms and preach but you know how much I prefer substance to gesture.

This amendment is similar to the others; again, it limits the opportunity to become a candidate. I am surprised that an electoral reform, which was described as the most important measure, because five days before the election, the prime minister said that electoral reform will be our most important measure and we will implement it at the very beginning of our mandate. We are now at the end of that mandate and they are presenting minimal reform, a small reform with a leitmotiv: restrict the voting rights, the number of candidates and the number of political parties. They are afraid to lose and they want to pass legislation in order to buy votes. But not to worry; the people of Canada cannot be bought and will send them all packing.

Mr. Ricard: Are you shooting a video, Louis?

Mr. Plamondon: This is so undignified for a government member to prevent an opposition member from speaking his mind. Again it shows how their behaviour in the House is a perfect reflection of the behaviour behind this reform. This reform limits the number of parties by requiring a minimum deposit of $1,000; it limits the rights of prisoners to vote; it limits the possibilities for any member of a provincial assembly to become a candidate. Why all these restrictions? Why not let democracy prevail? Because you do not live by it, you do not understand what it is and you want to stay in office. Those are the reasons you are hiding from us.

And you Quebec Tories should be ashamed of yourselves; you should follow in the steps of great democrats like René Lévesque who did reform political parties, who did implement an electoral reform based on grass roots financing, who did it by giving the right to vote to everyone in Quebec, even allowing those who were away during an election to vote. That is what you are doing wrong. You should stand up today and defend that way of thinking, the Quebec way. That is why the Bloc Quebecois is so essential, because you are not doing your job. We had to form a political party and come here to defend Quebec's higher interests. And those interests are telling me I should say yes, the prisoners should have the right to vote; they are telling me I should say no one can limit the number of political parties nor limit or control democracy with money, as Justice Michaud said in his decision on the Libman case, nor limit the right for members of other assemblies to become candidates. By refusing our colleague's amendment you are trying to keep men and women from becoming candidates for a political party because you are afraid and that is a totally undemocratic gesture.

Let's take an example. There are, in certain provinces like Ontario and Quebec, members of the provincial assembly. They play a role as important as that of the federal members of Parliament. But in smaller provinces, Prince Edward Island for example, where there are 32 MLAs for a territory and a population the size of my riding, evidently the four federal members have much more visibility.

Of course, they have much more visibility. And we should let those people who sit in a provincial legislature be candidates in a federal election without having to resign. Thus, the mayors of Sorel or Nicolet or Bécancourt should not have to resign if they wanted to be candidates in your ridings. It is the same thing.

But no. Again, the government takes away the rights of these citizens who are members of a provincial legislature by keeping them from being candidates. That is why the amendment of the Liberal member is fair, honest and right. It is a good suggestion. We must rise above partisanship and not behave like the member for Saint-Maurice, the member for Laval, the minister opposite from Quebec, and the member for Lotbinière, who feel like prisoners of their party and are yesmen until the leadership race, until the election, and who will commit mass suicide when the election comes.

It is tragic to see such a lack of responsibility a lack of support for the sacred interests of Quebec when we talk about the constitution, about education, about job training. When we talk about election renewal we see them totally withdraw from the debate. It is intolerable. It is surprising, very surprising.

You were elected on a wave of Quebec nationalism. You were elected, remember, thanks to the famous speech in Sept-Îles. That speech was one that won over the nationalists. Which speech will you have to explain your silence today? Which speech will you have? You will have none nor will you have any vote. That is why you will be sent packing.

You betrayed as much as the former Liberal members who used to be called the 74 wimps. Remember in those days the 74 wimps of Quebec, between 1981 and 1985, who repatriated the Constitution without the approval of Quebec. They were all sent home and you will too because you too decided to serve the interests of your party before serving those of your country. That is what awaits you.

In that sense the amendment which is moved could only serve Quebec's interests, and you keep silent.

The people who are king and master and whose democratic prerogative and freedom to vote you try today to restrain by all kinds of means will prevail. They will not be influenced by your money or by the conditions you want to impose to stop the democratic process.

They will not be influenced just as they were not during the last referendum when you, members from Quebec, tried to force Quebecers to accept an immoral and antidemocratic deal which went completely against Quebec's needs and against the mandate they gave you when they elected you.

Why do you not speak up today? Why do you not rise in the House to say you do not serve a party any more? You serve your homeland, Quebec. You want to turn toward the future with Quebec. You want democracy to express itself throughout Quebec and you will not allow it to be curtailed as they try to do with this bill which is a band-aid reform instead of being a real one which deals with real problems.

The real problem is the financing of political parties and you are hiding behind the multinational companies and the big financiers who in turn are hanging on to your coat-tails to obtain privileges.

Instead of serving the community's interests you prefer to serve the wealthy minorities and because of that attitude at the next election we from the Bloc Quebecois will not fail to remind you what you did.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue exactly in the same vein as my hon. friend

An hon. member: No, do not say the same thing. At least speak English.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): No, I will not speak English because the vast majority of Quebecers do not speak English and I want them to understand me well.

An hon. member: I am not sure of that.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Too often we have heard French-speaking members from Quebec speak English here in the House of Commons when they did not want Quebecers to understand what they were saying. So, dear colleagues from Quebec, allow me to express myself in French since 95 per cent of Quebecers speak French and some 60 per cent of Quebecers do not even speak English. I am going to speak French to make sure they really understand that this Tory government is anti-democratic.

• (1445)

This is an anti-democratic government who, with this bill, is once again determined to prevent a mayor or a member of the National Assembly to become a member of Parliament. We have very competent mayors and MPP's in Quebec who want to be candidates in the federal election and they will be prevented from doing it if this bill is passed because—

Mr. Ricard: Are you talking about candidates?

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Yes, candidates.

Mr. Ricard: So we are not talking about members of Parliament.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): I do not know if the hon. member for Laval-West has seen it, but under this bill a member of the National Assembly of Quebec or a mayor cannot run in a federal election.

Right now a mayor or a member of the National Assembly does have the right to run for a seat in Ottawa. They will have to quit their jobs however if they are elected. There is quite a distinction to be made. They now have the privilege to enter the race while carrying on their duties as mayor or MPP in Quebec or any other province and keeping the salaries and the perks they enjoy.

They have the means and the flexibility to do both at the same time. Under this bill, as soon as they decide to run in a federal election, they will have to quit their jobs. One has to wonder what gives us the right to place these conditions on them even before they win. Running in an election requires enough sacrifices as it is.

Politicians who have been members of the National Assembly of Quebec for some years are probably the best persons to represent Quebecers here in Ottawa. Because of their previous experience they understand the interests of Quebec, like the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer, who was a cabinet minister in Quebec. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer would not have been able to run without quitting his job first. Can you imagine the impact this will have, Mr. Speaker?

What is also disappointing in this bill is the fact that the prime minister had promised a complete reform of the legislation on party financing. In November 17, 1988, he said: "I will undertake a full reform, especially of party financing". He said that conflicts of interests could occur under the present legislation. However, the bill being introduced by the government does not take into consideration this crucial part of the electoral reform bill.

I do not understand why the Liberal Party and the NDP seem ready to support this bill with no cry of division. They do propose some amendments but without really opposing the bill. The Liberal Party and the NDP look like they are ready to let the big corporations and unions finance their own party, which goes against everything democracy stands for.

In the last referendum we saw big corporations like the Royal Bank donate $100,000 to the Yes fund. The Association des sociétés de recherches sur les médicaments, a major research company, contributed $241,000 to the Yes fund. This is supposed to be democratic. All kinds of subliminal messages were broadcast on TV to scare Quebecers about what would happen if Quebec separates. The referendum, and especially the Yes group, was financed by the big corporations and today, the House is considering some parliamentary reform measures—a mini reform, as the hon. member said—which completely ignore what should be the basis of this reform. This is totally unacceptable.

That is why today, we in the Bloc Quebecois are taking so much time. Conservative and Liberal members from Quebec must be familiar with the Quebec principle of individual financing. In other words, only individuals who have the right to vote also have the right to contribute to political parties. I think that makes sense. This is the only way to ensure that a country is democratic and that it is not influenced either by financial interests or the big unions. I think that is the way it should be but members who we can assume are here to defend the interests of Quebec have completely forgotten what Quebecers want.

We had the Bélanger–Campeau commission, the most important exercise in Quebec's history. The commission whose membership reflected all segments of Quebec society asked the people of Quebec and the government and members representing them here in Ottawa and in Quebec City for 22 or 23 real powers, otherwise Quebec would have to go for sovereignty. That is in the report of a commission with members from every walk of life in Quebec. The report says that if we do not have those necessary powers we will have to be sovereign. Otherwise we cannot develop our full potential. What did Conservative and Liberal members from Quebec here in Ottawa do? They went against the will of Quebecers. Today they claim they still legitimately represent Quebecers in Ottawa.

Federalist members who still claim to be their legitimate representatives here in Ottawa are deceiving the people of Quebec. They have betrayed Quebecers. They want to betray them again by asking for the right to represent them here in Ottawa while they worked against them during the last referendum campaign. That is intolerable. Today I want to ask Quebecers to remember their motto: Je me souviens. I hope they will remember that the Conservative and Liberal members of this House worked against the wishes of the people, against what they asked them to do through the Bélanger–Campeau Commission.

Once again I hope that here in Ottawa there will be an end to adopting unfair and undemocratic measures which undermine the interests of Quebecers.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We cannot go on with this debate because there is no quorum.

[English]

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I would humbly maintain that for a member to call a point of order he must have been here and therefore must be one of the twenty that is counted if there is a quorum.

• (1455)

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris)): There is quorum. Is the House ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised because usually someone who moves an amendment takes a few minutes at the beginning of the discussion to explain the reasons why he presented such an amendment. We are dealing with Motion No. 13, I think, which mentions a $500 amount to be deposited with the returning officer at the same time as the nomination paper. The debate is taking place in the same context as before, that is the limitation of the democratic process which Canadians and Quebecers will have to decide upon in the next election. It is utterly unacceptable for the government to demand not $250 but $1,000 from someone who is running. Let's say a party, the Green Party for example, decided to use an election campaign to make the people aware of environmental issues, to raise the awareness of the different candidates during a debate, not necessarily to win the election.

I am surprised Conservative members are chatting in the House instead of listening to speeches that could inspire them and help them better understand the situation.

I was saying that if the Green Party decided to present a candidate in all 75 Quebec ridings for instance, it will have to spend $75,000 to present 75 candidates. The intent of the Green Party is not to have its candidates elected but simply to raise the public awareness on environmental issues during the electoral campaign. The same rationale could apply to an organization dedicated to preserving the agricultural way of life of certain areas. You could have a pro-agriculture party which would not necessarily wish to send representatives to Parliament but, as we say in Quebec, to put farm problems on the map during the election.

The Conservative Party which forms the government says: It is risky, so let's set some limits. Let's limit political parties. Let's limit interventions because the less that is said the better our chances of winning will be since we have no economic vision, no constitutional vision, no agricultural vision. We just let the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks decide what our economic policy will be; we just let them raise interest rates. That is the government's economic vision. In terms of the electoral reform, it is the same thing. It is exactly the same—

WORLD SUMMIT FOR CHILDREN

IMPLEMENTATION OF PLAN OF ACTION

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, the government should make the Declaration and Plan of Action of the World Summit for Children, held at the United Nations on the 29th and 30th of September, 1990, an integral part of Canadian international co-operation policy;

That the government should consider fully implementing the major global commitments agreed to by the 71 heads of state and government attending the summit, including domestic and international co-operation strategies for child survival and development;

That the government should consider making available adequate financial resources for these purposes, including a contribution to the additional resources required from donor countries based on Canada's historical 5 per cent share of global foreign aid;

That multinational institutions be directed to focus their efforts on the implementation of summit promises;

That the minister responsible for the summit follow-up be invited to report to Parliament once a year on the implementation of the World Summit for Children Plan of Action and the Convention on the Rights of the Child to the extent that the application of the plan and convention, at the national, regional and international levels, requires action or a contribution on the part of Canada; and

That parliamentarians around the world be invited to ensure that each country provide its fair share of the additional resources required to see that the promises of the World Summit for Children become reality.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as you and others may have noticed, Motion No. 616 is almost identical to one that was passed in this House in mid-December 1991. It had the support of all parties in the House.

The fact that these are almost the same is not a coincidence. This motion was presented to the House on November 7, 1991 in an attempt to push the government into some action on the commitments that Canada had made at the World Summit for Children.

More than one year earlier in September 1990, this House passed a motion such as the one we are debating today after waiting the year. Now two and one half years after the world summit, because this government has not fulfilled its commitment, we are again pushing the government for action.

The 1990 summit for children was the largest gathering of world leaders in history at the time. Prime ministers, presidents and kings promised two billion children a revolution. The Prime Minister was the summit's co-chairman and he invited children everywhere to "listen carefully to what we say and in coming years hold us to our commitments".

I am here today to remind the government that it has not yet fulfilled those commitments. The commitment that Canada and the 58 other countries represented at the summit made was that children would have first call on their government's resources.

Now, two and a half years later, the Prime Minister's noble words and global commitment to reduce child death and malnutrition, to reduce the number of women dying during pregnancy and to make life for all children of the world easier now ring hollow. These words have had little impact on the real world of children today.

In fact, if we are to judge Canada's efforts by the dwindling dollars spent on humanitarian aid Canada has been backing away from those commitments made over and over by this government.

The children of Canada, the children of the world, have found that you cannot depend upon this government to keep its word. Promises cannot be eaten or turned into health care.

By December 1991, 71 countries had agreed to a plan of action in a convention on the rights of the child. Canada joined that group and again committed itself to a massive move to improve the life of children.

This subject of care of children can be dealt with in two parts: domestically for the children here in Canada who have not done particularly well, and internationally for the children of the rest of the world. Canada's record is not great at either level.

I want to spend my short time dealing with the international situation. Many of my colleagues have taken other opportunities to document Canada's lack of commitment to our own children. I want to deal with our commitment to alleviating poverty and reducing the deaths of children from malnutrition and disease all over the world.

In 1992, UNICEF estimated that 40,000 children die every day from infection and malnutrition. That amounts to about 14 million children per year who die because of disease and malnutrition.

I do not want to leave the impression that Canada has not been generous or compassionate. Among the nations of the world Canada has always been among the first to provide emergency food and disaster relief when it has been asked for. Canada also has been and continues to be generous in its donations to multinational organizations such as UNICEF, the children's fund, to UNDP, the development program, and UNIFEM, the UNDP women's program, and to other multinational organizations.

My concern is that we seem to be backing away from our commitment to children, away from the alleviation of poverty in the poorest countries of the world and from the real commitment we made when we signed the Convention on the Rights of the Child in December 1991.

We are backing away from the commitments we made when we accepted sharing our future as the policy base for Canadian aid. That policy was to a great extent a product of three different parliamentary committees in this House.

Proof that Canada is backing away from its commitments is best indicated by the following facts. Canada's aid as a percentage of gross national product is now lower than it has been since the early 1980s. It has fallen so low that the OECD, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, has expressed alarm and regret that Canada's aid has significantly declined.

Children are the most affected because the weakest are the first to suffer and die when aid is withdrawn from Third World countries. This government has reduced its ODA expenditures by $4.5 billion since it came to power.

Third, this government is in the process of a further 10 per cent reduction. These reductions were started in the 1992–93 year and are carried into the 1993–94 estimates. These cuts are expected to amount to about $650 million over two years.

Fourth, in addition to the funding cuts, this government has developed plans to redirect ODA funds away from the Third World especially from the least developed countries which most need long term assistance.

Instead, the government wants to use ODA funds for trade development activities in the former Soviet bloc and elsewhere. Canadian aid to the Soviet bloc is essential, but it should not be done at the expense of ODA to poorer countries. It would be much more logical to look for those funds in our defence budget or from the private sector which will profit from it in the long run.

This government, as part of its funding cuts, is reducing the assistance channelled through non-government organizations. In 1993–94 these cuts run as high as 12 per cent for some NGOs. The average across the board is about 10 per cent we are told.

Many of these funds are matching grants to NGOs which are the agencies through which tens of thousands of Canadians become directly involved in international development.

The NGOs work as partners with the local groups in developing countries. Together they work to improve basic health care, education, nutrition, farming techniques, small business operations and a host of other enterprises.

NGOs are experienced, efficient and accountable. Women and children will suffer most from this reduction to the non-government organizations.

Sixth, the government has announced that it is abruptly ending Canada's bilateral assistance programs in east Africa and the Horn of Africa. Countries like Ethiopia, Somalia, Uganda and Sudan are some of the countries which most need development and where children are suffering and dying in the largest numbers. This is part of CIDA's reduction of aid.

Seventh, the United Nations report on development has pointed out that less than 10 per cent of Canada's aid is humanitarian. Less than 10 per cent of our aid is directed toward human priorities such as clean water, basic health care, primary education and family planning.

This works out to less than $300 million out of $2.7 billion being spent on ODA actually reaching the poorest people. The poorest people are supposed to be the main target of Canadian assistance. That is what we said when we adopted Sharing Our Future.

Eighth, Canada has supported generously the international financial institutions, but it has done it without demanding from those institutions any conditions which would ensure that the projects supported by the World Bank and its regional partners would be people friendly. As a result, many World Bank projects have increased devastation and malnutrition among those affected or displaced by the many projects which the World Bank seems to favour.

Instead, these offices along with industrial countries have increased Third World debt to the point where that debt is the greatest single deterrent to progress and development in many countries. It is ironic that those loans which were supposed to be such a great help have turned out to be the greatest deterrents to development.

To Canada's credit, we have unilaterally forgiven much of our direct debt to the least developed countries in the Francophonie and the Commonwealth.

The New Democratic Party of Canada believes that the basis of all aid of all kinds should lead to the empowerment of the people of recipient countries and should lead to their self-sufficiency and independence.

Canada and all donor countries should avoid the tendency to exploit aid as internal economic development tools. Aid can be mutually beneficial without being exploitive of the recipient. Official Development Assistance is the key to giving the world's children a hopeful chance for a full life.

• (1515)

The New Democratic Party of Canada would immediately move to increase the effectiveness and quality of Canada's official development assistance. First, we would conduct a thorough review of ODA policy. We would ask Canadians in all walks of life, recipient countries and other donor countries to be part of a review. We would call on the considerable expertise of the NGO community and the United Nations agencies to contribute to the new policy. Farm groups, small businesses and co-ops would also be involved.

I do not suppose we would greatly change the aims of our future but we would spend a lot of time making sure that we could fulfil those aims. NGOs and other political groups have also called for such a review and rededication of Canada's aid.

Second, the New Democratic Party of Canada would immediately move to improve the quality and quantity of Canadian aid that goes into humanitarian priorities such as clean water, sanitation, nutrition, education and family planning. Those are the projects which affect women and children the most. Such a move could be made without increasing Canada's deficit.

This shift to humanitarian priorities would be best implemented by increasing our utilization of NGOs, non-government organizations. As indicated earlier, the NGOs are the most effective and efficient providers of this kind of aid since their projects are usually working directly with people and partners to help them develop their skills and ability to provide for themselves as far as possible.

This is probably the ultimate manifestation of the statement: "Give a man a fish and you feed him for a day; teach a man to fish and you feed him for life". In the Third World statistics show that women provide 85 per cent of sustenance. We can make this shift to better quality without increasing the Canadian deficit.

Third, the New Democratic Party has always supported the movement of the level of ODA to the United Nations level of 1 per cent of Gross National Product. This government has reduced the level of Canada's contribution to below .4 per cent of GNP. With this year's cuts and future dilution by making the international assistance envelope cover non-ODA countries, it is likely to drop to .3 per cent of ODA. This neglect and undermining of Canada's position is going to make it exceedingly difficult for any future government to regain this lost ground in view of Canada's national debt. New Democrats would move to turn the trend around immediately in an attempt to reach the UN target as soon as possible.

Fourth, the New Democratic Party would review Canada's contribution to IFIs, the international financial institutions, and make our continuing involvement with those institutions dependent and conditional upon policy changes which would make the World Bank institutions much more sensitive to the humanitarian impact of any project on ordinary people.

Five, democracy means involving people. The New Democratic Party would aim its aid at the empowerment of people. The first step in this process would be the establishment of an advisory board for CIDA. Such a board would include representations from the recipient countries that would take part, and would take part in the general review of Canada's ODA policy. Such a board may extend its personnel to have smaller boards within regions in which CIDA now operates. Such a board would call heavily upon the development community in Canada: the NGOs, the business community, academia and the churches.

Aid to poor countries has been motivated in the past, as Betty Plewes of the CCIC, the Canadian Council of International Co-operation, stated: one part altruism-humanitarianism and four parts geo-political self-interest in the context of the cold war. As Betty points out, aid will probably go on being motivated by many intangibles.

Dr. Mahbub ul Haq, author of the UN development report, told a parliamentary committee last year that 95 per cent of the children born were born in Third World countries and 5 per cent were born in industrialized countries, which is the western countries including the Soviet bloc.

Dr. Mahbub ul Haq went on to say: "The threat to you Canadians will come not from ideological differences but from poverty. Industrialized countries are a shrinking minority of the world's population. You 5 per cent of the world's people will have to deal with the 95 per cent in developing countries. You can stop poor people at your borders but you cannot stop poverty from spreading in the form of drugs, pollution and terrorism".

We committed ourselves and Canada's resources to the children of Canada and the world. We cannot separate the welfare of the world from that of Canada. Doing all we can to make the children of the world healthy, productive and content would be a good start to a better world.

Canada's efforts to alleviate poverty among children of the world is slipping. We need to recognize that and do something about it. We need to improve the quality of our aid. We need to utilize the best people to develop that humanitarian aid. In other words, we need to work at making the children of the world citizens who can produce and benefit and be part of a good world tomorrow.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise in support of the proposed motion before us today for a number of reasons.

First, it is one step toward eradicating child poverty not only here in Canada but elsewhere around the world. Every one of us has a responsibility and a role to play. If we look at the future of Canada we cannot help but say: "If we cannot take care of our children today, how can we take care of the future of Canada tomorrow?" Children are the future of this country.

It is quite alarming that child poverty has hit an all-time high in Canada. During the 1980s we had approximately 984,000 living below the poverty line. In 1990, 10 years later, the number of people living below the poverty line is in excess of 1.1 million, which is about a 17 per cent increase over the past 10 years.

If we examine all the government policies over the past 10 years, and especially regarding child poverty, we can say in all fairness that we have failed on that front.

When we talk about child poverty we talk about poverty in general. A child is poor because he comes from a poor family. Poverty hits the single mothers hardest. According to Statistics Canada, 80 per cent of poor mothers have no high school diploma, and because they live below the poverty line their children are poor.

A lot of people believe that poor people normally do not work. That is totally unfair and untrue because according to statistics two-thirds of all poor in Canada whether they are poor families or a single parent are actually working poor.

According to 1990 statistics provided by Statistics Canada, 27 per cent of poor families work full time and another 40 per cent work part time. Only one-third of those poor families do not work at all because of lack of opportunities, because of disabilities or because of other considerations. That applies also to single people. More than 67 per cent of people under the age of 25 are also working poor and only about 27 per cent of those youth are not working.

Child poverty is an issue that concerns us all because poverty has a direct impact on the health of the nation. The reason why I say that is that if you look at children who live below the poverty line you will find that 40 to 50 per cent of those children were most likely born with low birth weight, with permanent growth retardation or restriction. There is a correlation between the health of the child and the quality of nutrition that he or she is receiving.

Also, when we talk about children who are poor, you will find that they are twice as likely to die before their first birthday. They experience a 50 per cent higher death rate than the average child. They are more than twice as likely to suffer long-term disabilities and other health problems. That is when we talk about poverty in general in Canadian society.

Child poverty is worse in our society when it comes to aboriginal people. If you look at the statistics going back to 1984, there was twice the number of youth or infant mortality among aboriginal people than in the average population of Canada. Furthermore, the aboriginal suicide rate in the age bracket 15 to 19 is almost seven times the rate of other children in the rest of Canada.

There is a direct correlation between poverty and what it has to do with the over-all health of the nation and what it has to do with the over-all future of the nation. A lot has been said about this issue.

Canada signed the United Nations Convention on the Right of the Child in 1990. The government is to be commended on that because it was a positive step forward that everyone has to recognize. We, on the Liberal side, are proud of the fact that Canada was one of the signators of that convention. Like anything else in life, however, unless you put laws into action and unless you take action, all of these words and promises will remain as promises.

Actions speak louder than words. So far, unfortunately, we have not seen a progressive action plan being put in place to deal with child poverty. As a matter of fact, we only have to look to the past to see that if this House unanimously adopted a motion by the year 2000 we would eradicate child poverty, but as I have indicated to you from Statistics Canada information child poverty over the past 10 years has been increasing, not decreasing.

There are things we must look at. We must develop legislation which expresses a positive minimum standard of care rather than negative prohibitions on parental behaviour. We must develop strategies to ensure that children taken into care receive the services they need and do not suffer from government neglect. We must look at ways to address this whole question in a cohesive manner rather than just dealing with it on an ad hoc basis.

Our party has come forward with a number of recommendations. I would like to cite a few of them that came as a result of the collective work of our critic for health and welfare from Winnipeg and our spokesperson on child poverty who is also from Winnipeg. They have recommended eight different steps that the government can take in order to deal with child poverty.

First the federal government should immediately participate with provincial and territorial governments through boards of education and in conjunction with community volunteers to provide nutritionally balanced breakfast, lunch and snack programs in schools throughout Canada. We know this will not solve the problem in the long term, but at least it is one first step that the government should look at.

Also the Liberal Party recommends that the government redesign the tax system to make it more equitable, to help families cope with the added expenses of raising children and simplifying the federal child benefits system. Everything boils down to income and expenses. The Liberal Party has moved forward to recommend that the government immediately announce its intentions to have accelerated job creation programs for students to be put in place for summertime employment.

These are some of the recommendations. I can see we are pretty well running out of time. It is Friday afternoon and I do not want to monopolize the time of my other colleagues who want to speak on this issue. However I am grateful to say that the House of Commons has unanimously adopted the resolution I introduced on behalf of my party recognizing November 20 as child day in Canada.

I will read that for the record. It says that throughout Canada each and every year November 20, being the day in the year 1989 when the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child was adopted in the United Nations General Assembly, shall be known as the National Day of the Child.

This day was designated in order to allow Canadians from coast to coast on an annual basis to celebrate the potential of children, to celebrate what childhood is all about. At the same time, that day will give us a chance to assess how far we have come as a society in dealing with child poverty and what we have done as a society in order to attack the poverty that faces children.

I know there is not one single action any government can take that will solve all of the problems, but every single step could help. We have a responsibility at every level, from the school board level, municipal level and provincial level to the federal government level, to collectively set up an action plan that will help us deal with the question of today and the question of tomorrow.

To that extent I want to put on the record that we support the motion proposed by our colleague.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, I too would like to speak in support of Motion No. 616, introduced by our colleague from Saskatoon—Humboldt. I thank him for his initiative.

In December 1991 the Liberal Party introduced a minority report on child poverty entitled "A Child Investment Strategy". It was introduced by my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre and myself as the health critic for the Official Opposition.

My colleague from Ottawa Centre has already alluded to some of the recommendations. I thought I would just remind the House that in the report we indicated that:

> We believe that the committee's report should have called for a child investment strategy that would have marked the beginning of a 10-year campaign against all child poverty in Canada. Even within that context, the committee neglected such obvious problems as education and training—perhaps the most solid investment we can make in our children.

Then we went on to note that the Subcommittee on Poverty failed to inform the House of Commons of the extent to which federal government policies since 1984 have directly and dramatically increased poverty in every region and city throughout Canada.

In contrast to the recommendation of that committee which only urges provincial and territorial governments to promote nutritionally balanced breakfast, lunch and snack programs in schools throughout Canada, the Liberal Party felt that we should immediately participate with those governments in implementing those nutritionally balanced breakfast, lunch and snack programs for schools throughout Canada.

I should also add that I published an article in The Medical Post about giving nutritional supplements to pregnant women who are poor. If we spent about $155 million on these pregnant women throughout the country we would have a return of about $350 million in savings by preventing 6,000 babies from being born underweight.

We have had a long commitment to alleviating the plight of our children, to the development of our children. In that Liberal minority report of December 1991 we also indicated to Parliament and Canadians our party's commitment to full employment.

I was just reading a summary of achievements by this government from 1984 to 1993, which was published in February of this year. I would like to quote from the section on this government's contribution to world peace and development. It says:

> Canada has an enviable international reputation as a responsible nation dedicated to the ideals embodied in the United Nations Charter. Canada has vigorously pursued the cause of international peace and development over the last eight years with a host of initiatives and programs.

While we applaud those initiatives that help the poor children in the world we have noted that the amount of aid to those developing countries has diminished.

I would like to submit that it is in the best interests of Canadians to help children in developing countries become strong, healthy and productive citizens, as we do for our own children and youth in Canada. Then those children in the developing countries will move the economies in their countries, and thus those countries would require imports from Canada thereby helping our economic development. Also, and this is very important, we will restore human dignity to all children of the world.

On that note I would like to reaffirm my support for the principles embodied in this motion. I reaffirm:

> That in the opinion of this House, the government should make the declaration and plan of action of the World Summit for Children, held at the United Nations on the 29th and 30th of September, 1990, an integral part of Canadian international co-operation policy;
> That the government should consider fully implementing the major global commitments agreed to by the 71 heads of state and government attending the summit, including domestic and international co-operation strategies for child survival and development;
> That the government should consider making available adequate financial resources for these purposes, including a contribution to the additional resources required from donor countries based on Canada's historical 5 per cent of global foreign aid;
> That the minister responsible for the summit follow-up be invited to report to Parliament once a year on the implementation of the World Summit for Children plan of action and the Convention on the Rights of the Child to the extent that the application of the plan and convention, at the national, regional and international levels, requires action or a contribution on the part of Canada; and
> That parliamentarians around the world be invited to ensure that each country provides its fair share of the additional resources required to see that the promises of the World Summit for Children become a reality.

I would like to leave this debate with one very important principle as we commit ourselves to these declarations by my hon. colleague from Saskatoon—Humboldt, which I support very strongly. It is the so-called first principle.

When the financial resources of Canada are plentiful let us think of our children and youth first. When the resources of the country are scarce the children and youth should suffer last.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this afternoon to take part in this debate on motion M-616 presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humbolt. As we know, I was vice-chairman of the Standing Committee on External Affairs in 1986-87 and I had the pleasure of working with other members of this House on an in-depth study regarding assistance to developing countries. I can tell you that I am well aware of what is going on, particularly with regard to African countries.

I had the pleasure of visiting several projects managed by Canada in co-operation with non-governmental organizations and I understand why Canada is reluctant to get involved in the issue of children's rights. I understand in a sense, but in another sense I do not. I understand because Canada's debt is enormous and theoretically we cannot afford to increase our financial aid to developing countries. But there are other ways to help those countries, and I find it sad because if I remember well it was our Prime Minister who chaired the World Summit for Children and it is that same Prime Minister who is now taking so much time to respond. He should give leadership and Canada should give leadership and fulfil the promises that have been made.

It is really unfortunate because today other countries are watching Canada that who was then a leader explaining to other countries what they should do in order to protect the rights of the child. That same Prime Minister does not do a thing. I wonder how Canada is now perceived after we made such a great fuss about the World Summit for Children and worked so hard to make it happen.

Let me tell again about those countries I had the opportunity to visit and about projects in those countries, most particularly in Africa. I did not get the chance to travel to other countries to see our assistance projects. In Africa we visited Tanzania, Senegal, Cameroon, Niger and Ethiopia. We made two visits to those developing countries to try and find a better way, to help them.

We realized that 30 years ago when we started to help those developing countries we tended to have a colonial approach. We wanted to help them, but we also wanted to help ourselves. We would undertake projects, always thinking that they would bring benefits to us. That has been the great tragedy. All the time we helped them, we were thinking of ourselves first. Of course, they got some assistance but it was a bad start because when you want to help yourself before you help others you forget the essential part, that is to help a country on the basis of its potential. In developing countries, particularly African countries, we developed great projects that they were unable to manage. A few years later everything was in shambles.

Let me list a few if I may. In Tanzania, for example, the Clark government found an outstanding potential for wheat production. Of course, they have some difficulty with wheat in Tanzania, but the then Prime Minister, the member for Yellowhead, accepted to develop a great wheat production project. Being a westerner, he was quite open to that kind of project and he knew very well this kind of development. He also thought that it could eventually help people in western Canada because they could sell equipment, for example. To make a long story short, we developed a great wheat production project in Tanzania, and I have to admit it was a success from the point of view of productivity and the volume of production. We developed that project much like we do in western Canada, with big farms, big tractors and big combines. We built garages to maintain this machinery and trained people to repair those tractors and combines. Everything was fine. This means there might be a hundred people working for this big project which pays quite a bit. What we forgot is that we could have gone with small NGOs or collaborative projects, which would have cost a lot less and would have employed more people. Thousands of people could have worked to produce about the same result. They would have learned to grow things. They would have acquired the know-how from our people. They would have had an opportunity to earn their living in an honourable way. They would have learned to cultivate. By doing it for them did we really help them? This is the question one must ask. Yes, we probably helped them, but not in the long term.

A few years later when this project was running smoothly Prime Minister Trudeau visited Tanzania. He went to Dar es Salaam and told them: "You are producing a lot of wheat, my friends. Dar es Salaam is a city of about two million people. It seems you are lacking a bakery". What did Mr. Trudeau do? He said we are going to build a bakery. And he built the most modern bakery of the time. What happened then? By producing large quantities of bread in that ultra-modern bakery we put all the small bakers out of business, the thousand of bakers who had worked at feeding the people of Dar es Salaam. We took away their jobs. We took away their capacity to earn an honest living.

Even worse, we did not put into place the maintenance infrastructure for this bakery, and the last time I went to Tanzania it was no longer operational. But between the time it started and the time it stopped producing, all the small bakers had closed shop. Did we really help these people? What I am trying to say is that with the same amount of money we could have done a lot more had we decided to genuinely help others instead of helping ourselves under the guise of helping others. This is the thrust of my speech.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Special Committee on Electoral Reform; and Motions Nos. 13 and 15.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, now that we are back to the amendments to the Canada Elections Act, Bill C-114, I am in the unusual situation I was in when the amendment of my friend from Saskatoon—Humboldt was put.

I agreed with my former colleague who spoke before we got into Private Members' hour. I was looking forward to some explanation for the amendment from the hon. member and whether he intends to participate now in the debate.

This raises some interesting questions again in this very fundamental change in our election laws, which will affect all Canadians and hon. members. This particular amendment, as I understand it, not having had the explanation from the hon. member who moved it, is a change in the government bill that says the deposit will be $1,000. This amendment is a change from the present $200. I gather that $200 has been there for some time. Neither the government clause of $1,000 nor the amendment, as I understand it, conforms to what the Lortie commission reported in the royal commission that is the basis for this phase of election reform. It made no suggestion of a dollar amount.

I certainly have filed the $200 deposit but there is the question of whether $1,000 is too much for democracy. The $500 seems to be a little more equitable for people who may want to run. Under this law we are already changing the number of people who have to sign the papers from 50 to 100, which is most likely a good thing. The nomination papers will have to be signed by 100 electors, however the real question is whether $1,000 is just a little too much.

Perhaps the hon. member's amendment is what he considers to be a compromise between $1,000, $200 and $500 and that may be reasonable. However I did not have an explanation from the member. This is an interesting question, but then we get into this whole other area of $1,000 to be allotted to third parties for advertising.

I gather from what the government House leader said earlier, the issue interests a lot of Canadians, especially Canadians who are not in this Chamber but certainly not the three registered parties in this Chamber, the Conservatives, the Liberals and the NDP. As I said, there were hon. members doing the committee report. I read what the Lortie commission said about third party advertising and trying to weigh the question of free speech. It makes sense that members and parties have restrictions on expenses. Yet third parties can come in under the present law as it has been interpreted by the courts and flood the airwaves, newspapers and post office boxes of electors if there is no restriction or limitation on the amount a third party can spend.

I do not know if I want the tax system they have in the States or these political action committees that pervert almost all the laws for election expenses. I think in most cases they are supposed to have a $5,000 limit, so they just create another committee. They can have a multitude of committees to get around their election expense laws which are really pretty horrific in terms of not really setting any limits. Thank God it has not happened here yet, but money in the United States is almost fundamental. Unless one has millions of dollars do not even think of running for an election. Certainly in the House of Representatives one needs hundreds of thousands of dollars and in the Senate in the United States it is in the millions. I forget one of the figures but I think $2.4 million was the average for Senate races. Some people spend that much in the primaries.

Fortunately we in Canada have not quite been devoured by the need for dollars for a person to participate in our political system. This comes back to the amendment of my hon. friend that $500 sounds more reasonable than the $1,000 that is in the present bill.

We do not have the numbers to put this or so many of the amendments this afternoon to a vote. I think this is a very poor reflection on the whole state of Parliament. On a quiet Friday afternoon before a long break we bring in this type of legislation where there is a lot of public interest in some of these areas that affect the people and the body politic out there. Yet we have a perfunctory debate under our rules at this stage in our debate and there are not enough members to actually force a vote on some of the amendments. A lot of this is going to slip by. Members who should be taking an interest are not here and the people really do not know where they stand.

Fortunately, with extended hours today we will perhaps conclude report stage, which we are on now, because we have fairly tight limits on it and I understand that. It helps move bills along as it should.

• (1555)

This is where we get the problem of reform of the rules to help governments move legislation along. Understandably from a government point of view on a quiet afternoon you can get a contentious bill really sliding along. Frankly, if there had not been a few members around here today, I imagine this whole bill on electoral reform might have gone through the report stage and by unanimous consent third reading and the whole thing would be over perhaps without even a cry of division.

There may have been a cry. The member for Kingston and the Islands who has been very active in this whole process of electoral reform and working on the committee says that at least there would be a cry of division.

As far as I am concerned, as long as there is going to be a vote on third reading, some of my interest on some of these amendments pales. I do not really have that much conviction on whether it is right or wrong. As I said, I think the government bill is better than some of the amendments. The problem is that in terms of the multitude of members in this thing, there is not the process to have members vote on something that gets pretty fundamental and to the core, and this is one.

I understand from the newspapers that some parties are concerned, those that can give tax receipts like the Rhinoceros Party and the Green Party. They can give tax receipts because they had 50 candidates in the last election. They are very concerned about this $1,000 deposit. In effect, if they had to put a $1,000 deposit into all the 295 ridings, this would be a very onerous financial burden that they might not be able to meet.

As an Independent, certainly as a Conservative member, even as a Liberal member, and probably even as an NDP member, I would most likely be happy as the devil to say that $1,000 should be the deposit because then you will not have as many so-called fringe candidates. Sitting where I am now as an Independent, I cannot really say they are any more fringe than perhaps some people might say that I am a fringe candidate. Therefore, I come down on the side of my friend's amendment even though he did not explain it.

That is what I really am disturbed about because at least he is here. I really think he owes it to the House to explain what he is trying to do because I may have misinterpreted what he is trying to do.

Again, there is an issue here that the House should divide on at the right time to see where we all stand on it. But I also understand the realities of life at 3.55 on a Friday afternoon with the number of members here and the rules. We most likely will not have a division on this matter, which I think is pretty important.

I hope I have not misinterpreted the member from Saskatoon—Humboldt who moved the motion. I think it is laudable and I would like to support it if I interpreted it correctly.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I thought Motion No. 13 was self-explanatory. After hearing the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants I recognize that it is. That is the exact reason behind the motion that $1,000 seems a little extreme for some people and $500 is a compromise figure.

However, I want to spend another minute on the second motion, Motion No. 15. It really is much more significant than the change from $1,000 to $500 because it suggests that the total amount is returned when the official agent files the costs after the election.

The present bill suggests that candidates get half of it back when it is filed and half later if they get more than 15 per cent. In other words, if candidates do not get 15 per cent, they lose half of it. Our concern was that the candidates should get it all returned to them when they file their official returns after the election.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu wants to be recognized. The hon. member has already spoken on those motions.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Richelieu.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I was speaking on motions 13 and 15 when the Chair interrupted me at 3 o'clock and told me I could use later whatever time I had left. I still had a few minutes.

• (1600)

Madam Deputy Speaker: I agree with the member that he still had a few minutes left. But, when we resumed debate, the hon. member unfortunately had not returned to the House. He therefore gave up his right to speak to the motion.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, once again I am pleased to rise and participate in the debate on the bill on electoral reform.

I remember the Prime Minister said that a reform of the electoral process was needed. I had the opportunity to discuss the bill on electoral reform on a few occasions with Pierre Lortie whom I have known for about 20 years because we were both members of the Chambre de Commerce des Jeunes of Montreal at the time.

Mr. Lortie told me on several occasions that the reform would make the Elections Act more democratic so that people would have a stronger voice in the process. That was the mandate given to his commission.

I find the debate we are involved in a bit absurd since the suggestions, the amendments and the whole bill are in complete contradiction with the commission's mandate whose thrust was to put more democracy into the electoral process to allow individuals to express themselves, with nothing to do with financing by large corporations or unions but to give the ordinary citizens a voice in the process.

Once again it is suggested that the deposit requested from the candidates be raised from $250 to $1,000. This seems to me to be contrary to this kind of freedom of speech we are looking for. I mean that $1,000 is a fair amount of money for some people or even for a young political party. As my colleague said a few minutes ago, many political parties are established with no intention of forming a government. In fact, we, the Bloc Québécois, do not want to form a government; all we want to do here in Ottawa is to defend Quebec's interests and we want to act freely without the shackles of a Canadian national party which would silence us. We want to be able to speak freely.

We know the meaning of freedom of speech. When the people can speak freely, things begin to change. So, as a political party, we do not want to come to power, we want Quebecers to be able to express themselves freely in Ottawa. We think that power is greater when we can speak freely instead of being caught within the establishment or stuck in a caucus where everything is confidential.

Again, if political parties have to pay $1,000 the small parties will not be able to express themselves since the candidates will often not have the necessary $1,000 deposit that would allow them to run in an election here in Ottawa.

Speaking of freedom of speech, even if I do not like to make comparisons, it reminds me of the day Mr. Gorbachev—who has been in Canada for a few days—allowed his people to speak freely. As you will know, freedom of speech did not exist in the U.S.S.R. When some one would try to speak up, he was thrown in jail. So people were given the right to speak freely.

For a number of years, we have seen the people of the U.S.S.R. express themselves as they wished. In just a few years we have witnessed incredible changes in the U.S.S.R. We saw countries become sovereign—Ukraine, Lithuania, et cetera—simply because the population was allowed to express itself freely. This is what we want to do. We want to be able to express ourselves freely, for Quebec, here in Ottawa, and it is in that sense that I say the higher we make the deposit, the more we run the risk of hindering the democratic process, because the amount becomes too high. We run the risk of not allowing the population to express itself through its representatives. This is important, Madam Speaker. It is very important, even though it may not look like it.

I find it strange. This is a very important debate. There are many amendments to discuss, yet only three members have risen. Those members are from the Bloc Quebecois.

No other member from Quebec, whether Liberal or Conservative, has debated this issue. Yet, they have been here for at least a good ten years or more and they have this democratic culture. They have learned from René Lévesque and others about financing by individuals, about democracy and about freedom of expression. Yet they remain silent. I do not understand that. I find it very difficult to understand. I see the minister of employment is here. He has not said anything either. How come no Quebecer other than those from the Bloc Quebecois is talking? I simply cannot understand that. After all, these people would be in the best position to discuss this issue. They are in the best position to understand what goes on with electoral reform. In fact, the idea of a reform came from members representing Quebec, including the Prime Minister himself, the member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, and the member for Lac-Saint-Jean, who were the first ones to propose this reform. It is they who in a sense forced the government to set up a commission of inquiry which precisely proposed a more democratic reform.

We have been debating amendments for a few hours and I have yet to see a member from Quebec participate in this debate. I have not seen any member from Quebec rise. Why? Are they ashamed? Are they ashamed to express themselves and say that this does not adequately meet their wishes? I believe, as I said earlier, that they are stuck in their caucus and were told not to discuss this issue. They are avoiding this debate because it would not be very good in Quebec. This is what is going on.

Why is it that all the Liberal and Conservative members from Quebec remain silent? It is because they are not allowed to talk. They do not have the freedom of speech. This is a clear demonstration.

The short speech I just made deals with freedom of expression. I believe that the power of a nation lies in being able to express itself. If people cannot express themselves through their elected representatives in the House of Commons or in the national assembly in Quebec, then these people do not enjoy freedom of speech. Members who are supposed to represent the people do the opposite of what the population wants them to do, as was the case with the Bélanger–Campeau commission during the last referendum. Madam Speaker, you might be shocked to hear this but, unfortunately, the members who represent Quebecers in this House do not defend their interests and their needs. They do exactly the opposite of what Quebecers asked them to do during the last referendum.

Why? It is because they cannot express themselves. They are prisoners of the British parliamentary system with its party caucus structure. It is an excellent system but, unfortunately, it does not meet the needs of Quebec, which wants to enjoy freedom of speech here in Ottawa. Those members cannot speak freely because they belong to a national party in which they are forced to keep quiet because they are in a minority every time they dare say something. Since members are ambitious and want to become ministers or parliamentary secretaries they would rather obey their leader than be left out. In other words, they put their personal interests well before those of Quebecers. This demonstrates that Quebecers are not well represented here in Ottawa and their only opportunity in that respect is the Bloc Quebecois.

Motion No. 15 negatived.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt) moved:

Motion No. 17.

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 80

(a) by striking out line 40 at page 51 and substituting the following therefor:

"Officer to be sufficient for identification but which does not create impossible criteria for many individual Canadians."; and

(b) by striking out line 32 at page 52 and substituting the following therefor:

"Chief Electoral Officer to be sufficient for identification but which does not create impossible criteria for many individual Canadians".

He said: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to relax as much as possible the identification for rural voters. In many rural areas, particularly farm and forest areas and on Indian reserves, people often do not carry identification. In fact in many cases they do not even have identification because it is not of much value to them.

Part of the reason we are supporting this portion of this bill, even if it lacks a number of other things we would have liked to have seen in the bill, is because it opens up the number of people who can vote. It seems adverse to put some technicality in the way of a rural voter who might be well known in the community but is not on the voters' list and cannot vote just because he or she does not have identification. The DRO and everybody else might know who they are and be able to identify them. They still would not be able to vote if they did not have that one piece of identification.

Since the main aim of this phase of election reform is to make it possible for any Canadian citizen who qualifies to vote, it seems rather absurd that we let a little technicality stop one, two, three, ten, twenty or one hundred people from voting just because they cannot fulfil a small requirement such as having on their person when they reach the poll some bit of identification.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, as for Motion No. 17 put forward by the hon. member, it looks like one of those motions—he has a number of them—intended to make it easier for anyone who wants in good faith to exercise the right to vote in an election, to do so. It was also the case when he moved a motion on non-limitation with regard to the number of political parties, by imposing strict basic requirements such as a $1,000 deposit in every electoral district to have someone represent the party. The same thing with the motion on prisoners that we discussed earlier.

In this case the idea is to provide members of certain cultural communities who are not in the habit of carrying on them several i.d. cards which they could produce if need be at the time of an election or at any other time a convenient means of identification. In that sense, the proposed amendment shows the closed mind and lack of good will this government has once more exhibited. An open-minded approach would be to allow Canadians from certain native communities or local communities where everybody knows everybody, as we were saying earlier, who are coming to vote in good faith not to produce identification. These people could exercise their right as it is exercised as democratically as possible in normal countries. Are we normal? Of course, we are. We have our faults, but we have also had the opportunity to right a few wrongs. I notice the hon. member for Lotbinière. I could see him support such an approach as a man of the law.

But he remains silent and, more likely than not, he will decline commenting on that. Yet with his talent as a speaker and his expertise as a lawyer he could give a voice to these people in this place and express their wishes as the member representing his riding. I think that there are even native communities in his riding that he is in contact with. There are also communities which would like to hear his advice and see him stand up for them here in this House to get the right to vote without meeting 100 per cent of the requirements of the old Elections Act. The proposals submitted are not geared toward liberalizing the right to vote, but rather limiting it. This is not a precautionary measure, contrary to what we may think.

I do not think that anyone will have anything to say against this, seeing that no one on the other side has requested to speak after me to challenge my position and that of the distinguished member from the New Democratic Party who has eloquently introduced these amendments. This amendment is also in keeping with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Nothing in the charter says that we have to carry around five i.d. cards, or a single one as a matter of fact, and to sign an affidavit in order to be allowed to exercise our democratic right to vote.

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms leans toward open-mindedness instead. As we hear in court sometimes, it is better to let a dozen guilty people walk than to send one innocent person to prison. Perhaps we should err on the side of open-mindedness sometimes concerning who has the right to vote and who does not, and let one person cheat so dozens and dozens of voters are not refused the right to participate in the democratic process.

We know why the government is once again opposed to it. It is trying to limit the democratic process in Canada because it serves its interests. Fewer ordinary people will vote, but more rich people will vote and the bigger will be their financial contribution. The government will then be in a better position to defend the interests of rich people instead of those of the majority who cannot always present identification cards when they go to the court house, the polling station, the convenience store, etc.

I appreciate very much this idea suggested by the member because it is forward looking. It is very forward looking as far as electoral legislation is concerned because it is based on the degree of tolerance and confidence which Canadians must have towards each other as well as Quebecers, and also Canadians and Quebecers, especially considering what will happen over the next two years, which will certainly result in a new economic agreement between the two countries sharing the same border.

Therefore, it is very important to establish that confidence at the individual level, as it will be important to establish it as a notion later on. This degree of trust begins when we go to the polls and have to chose between different parties, different candidates: the Tory Party that wants to serve the privileged, the Liberal Party that has not found its calling, the New Democratic Party completely out of touch with its obsolete theories; and next to them in Quebec a group of enthusiastic people with a new vision of their nation's future, of their people's future and a new vision of their relations with the rest of Canada.

Voters then have a real choice, and the choice will be easy in Quebec, of course. People will vote massively for the Bloc Quebecois. Why? Because their candidates want to serve the best interests of Quebec in Ottawa, and they want to do it as long as Quebecers will pay taxes, before going back to manage their own affairs. In that sense, to be able to vote for one of the options I mentioned is the most vital act in democratic life.

Again, as my hon. colleague for Longueuil has rightly and eloquently pointed out a few moments ago, it is a pity to see Tory members so absent from the debate. I do not mean absent from the House, it is their right, and some of them are here today, but I deplore the fact that those present remain silent in such a crucial debate, a debate on electoral reform. Indeed, on November 17, five days before election day, the Prime Minister had formally committed himself to electoral reform, to an in-depth reform in order to make the democratic process more relevant and more easily accessible to disadvantaged people. The amendment put forward is a good example.

Of course, grassroots financing would have been a major reform, the second part of the reform that the House leader was saying will come after the election. When we talked about Motion No. 2 a few moments ago, the hon. member for Gatineau spoke very eloquently on that subject but he has not said a word since. He should speak again about the rights of people who would want to have access to the democratic process. Since he belongs to one of the beautiful minorities that we have in Canada and in Quebec, he would certainly be able to tell us that in some communities it is not customary for people to carry identification papers with them at all times. It would be sad to deprive certain groups of people of their right to vote, which is the ultimate expression of democracy, simply because they are not in the habit of carrying identification papers.

The motion of the NDP member is very good and reflects the democratic vision that sustains many members in this House, the vision to improve the conditions in which we exercise our democratic right every four to five years when we elect our representatives. The fact that some people are prevented from exercising that right is contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which the House leader likes to invoke so often. When he talks about the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it is always to protect the millionaires who finance his party and not to protect the ordinary people who want to exercise their right to vote in an election. When an election is forthcoming the charter is always used to defend this or that. But when it was a matter of receiving millions, as it was the case during the referendum—$100,000 from the Bank of Montreal, $100,000 from the Royal Bank, $240,000 from the pharmaceutical industry—money was flowing in. They said then in the name of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms: My God, we must not stop corporations from donating money, to buy votes or to try to. But Canadians did not buy into that. They said no to the referendum. The same thing will happen with the election if the government restricts the right to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. The hon. member for Longueuil.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I will try to be brief, but I do want to speak to this amendment. A few moments ago I was talking a lot about freedom of speech but I really think the government is going too far by saying that someone who comes to the polling station without identification will be able to vote, provided he or she is accompanied by a witness, somebody who knows him or her. I find it a bit abusive to give that kind of freedom to people since we know there are dishonest people in any society.

We know that come election time people will try to vote twice or three times, to vote in more than one riding. This of course will not happen in small villages where everybody knows everybody else. Nobody will vote two or three times in those places, but they could go and vote in another riding. To have the right to vote a person just needs to be accompanied by a witness who will attest that it is the person's real name and address. I think it is abusive. This time, I think we are giving too much freedom to voters and we are giving dishonest people a chance to cheat.

In Montreal, for example, where people do not know one another, someone could go to a polling station accompanied by a witness who would confirm his or her identity, and that person would have the right to vote without presenting any piece of identification, without proof, without having been registered on the voters' list. To me, it is really unacceptable, and quite dangerous to allow people to abuse the system.

When something is forbidden and when there are measures in place to prevent abuses we can expect to have a fair and honest society. However if we allow people to cheat very easily, we may very well end up with a society that will become increasingly dishonest. Therefore, I believe that we cannot allow that part of the bill to pass because it gives to much freedom to voters and will allow dishonest people to abuse the system.

I know that in the Duplessis era in Quebec—and not only in Quebec but all over the industrialized world—people were very enthusiastic when they had an election. It was almost a national sport. People used to talk a lot about it in the villages, in rural areas. I grew up on a farm. My father was mayor for many years and he was involved in elections. I grew up in an environment where people just loved to talk about politics. Sometimes it would lead to heated arguments.

Still today some people have a passion for politics and they could use that freedom to vote in several ridings and in several polling stations because all they need to do is to be accompanied by somebody who will confirm their identity. It seems to me quite unacceptable and that is why I am against this government's proposal. I am even surprised to see such a proposal.

I will say once again that I support the NDP member's motion which states that a person must be able to prove his identity, must carry identification in order to be able to exercise his right to vote because it seems to me the least we should require. I agree that things must be done in the most democratic way possible that will ensure the greatest access possible. As I mentioned in all my speeches I want everything to be democratic but we must not allow people to be dishonest or allow dishonest people to take advantage of the system. That is why I strongly support the NDP member's proposal.

I think the present debate is quite abnormal. I would call for a quorum count because there are only two people listening to me here, something I find unacceptable.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: We have a quorum. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. member: On division.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is negatived on division.

Motion No. 17 negatived.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

Motion No. 18.

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 112 by striking out line 39 at page 62 and substituting the following therefor:

"ing or opposing, directly or indirectly and during an".

He said: Madam Speaker, this amendment is a fairly straightforward one. Under Bill C-114 advertising expenses are not allowed to be incurred by individuals in the course of an election campaign where they directly promote or oppose a particular registered party or a candidate if those advertising expenses exceed $1,000.

Motion No. 18 which I have moved seeks to amend that to prevent such advertising either directly or indirectly. I do not know how these terms will be interpreted by the courts, but the argument put forward by the chairman of our committee on electoral reform, the hon. member for Calgary West, is that direct advertising would be advertising that suggests the public vote or not vote for a candidate or for a party specifically, and that mentions the party or the candidate by name.

It is his view that indirect advertising is all other advertising. My view is that the $1,000 restriction ought to apply to both kinds of advertising during an election campaign where the advertising clearly is encouraging support for or opposition to a particular candidate or party. There are good reasons for this law. I know there has been some public criticism especially by the National Citizen's Coalition of the proposal that the committee has been forward.

I mentioned this during my speech at second reading of this bill. I think the arguments put forward by the National Citizens' Coalition are fallacious. Its members have failed to recognize the fact, and most of their advertisements fail to recognize the fact, that we do have limits on the spending that is allowed by candidates and by political parties.

Given the fact that we have attempted to create something of a level playing-field where parties are restricted on what they can spend and where candidates are restricted on what they can spend, it seems to me very fair that there should be restrictions on what other persons are able to spend during the same time.

If it were not so, the parties would be able to encourage others to advertise on their behalf and thereby circumvent the restrictions that are applied to themselves. An unscrupulous candidate or an unscrupulous party organization could easily go to other organizations or to individuals and say, "please run ads supporting me or opposing those other people so that I can win my election". If you can do that and thereby get around the restrictions in the Canada Elections Act, then you might as well not have the restrictions in the act. In my view it is very important that we have very comprehensive restrictions in place on what other persons can do to advertise.

I know the National Citizens' Coalition feels it has the divine right to advertise as it sees fit and try to convince Canadians that its point of view is correct. It does, and I uphold its right to advertise. But not during an election campaign if it is going to participate in an attempt to defeat candidates or elect other candidates.

This kind of amendment goes some distance toward doing that. It is far from perfect. It is not the kind of amendment that I would have proposed had I been in the position that the government was in. But the amendment that I have moved at least imposes restrictions a little more forcefully and I urge the House to adopt it.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, my hon. friend for Kingston and the Islands brought forward an amendment reflecting equity and fairness. How can government members say that indirect spending does not constitute interference in an election?

We have seen in the 1988 election large multinationals speak out for free trade for Canada. It was obvious to the whole country, because for a whole year the media talked about it, that the governing party was for it and the opposition parties against.

But various companies with vested interests put up huge resources to advertise everywhere, on television, on the radio and in the press, in order to convince Canadians that it was the best option for our country. They will deny having interfered in the election. That is utterly false. The amendment is simply to protect us. I repeat, Madam Speaker, no company or group, not even The National Citizens' Coalition, has the right to interfere in an election to choose members of this House.

Do the rich have the right to put up indirectly thousands and millions of dollars in order to convince the public to vote for a party because they think it knows what is best for the country? That is not right. As long as we want a political system that is truly democratic we must suppress all interference, especially that which can be used through today's media.

It seems simple enough to me. It is very simple, really. We live in a democracy that believes in fairness and justice. But if we persist in saying that some have the right to make their case in an election by putting up huge resources, in the millions of dollars, that is unacceptable. If they want to promote their option let them do it in between elections.

After an election is called, when Canadians have to elect their representatives to this House, nobody should be able to influence the electorate and nobody should avail themselves of the means to get the candidates to decide for one option or another. They should be completely free to choose, without falling prey to the propaganda in the media. We saw that in 1988. Hardly 20 minutes could go by on radio or half an hour on television without some loud advertising spot. The coverage was the same in the newspapers. This was literally brainwashing in favour of one option aimed at protecting the interests of large multinationals, as time has proven.

Even though this amendment is not agreed to today, it is only a matter of time before it becomes law because in the future, people will wonder. They will see that some members in this House who are the people's representatives have supported a measure allowing anybody to spend as much money as they want to influence the outcome of an election. They will wonder what they were thinking when they made that decision. Well, I can tell them that they do not think. They only reflect what the most affluent minority in this country thinks. This measure should have never been put forward. We should have understood that in a democratic country like ours, with our political system, this was fundamental.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I have the highest respect for the mover of this amendment, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, who I said earlier is one of the hardest working members in the House and has certainly been very involved in the committee.

However, showing my independent stance, while I have agreed with him on a couple of his amendments and disagreed with him on another one which he moved earlier today and felt more in favour of the government bill on an earlier matter, I can understand what he is trying to do on this one.

My hon. friend for Gatineau said a couple of things in his oration which really stimulated me to rise in debate. It is the very fact that we are in a democracy that this amendment gets into one of the most contentious items in this electoral reform bill. That is the right of third parties, people who are not members of a registered party, not Liberals, Tories, NDPs, Bloc Quebecois, Green, Rhinoceros and not necessarily multinationals, who just happen to be Canadians. They just may not be too happy with any of the parties, people, issues or candidates.

I give full credit to the member for Kingston and the Islands for moving this amendment because I can see he is trying to tighten up what is in the present bill. The present bill has no logic to it in that as long as it is not directly for or against a candidate it can be an open sesame and the money can pour in, the way my friend from Gatineau explained and as happened in the 1988 election. There is no doubt big money was behind the government move for free trade. The newspapers were flooded with supplements and a lot of advertising. That was multinational. Yes, that is an odious thing. It is the interesting red herring to move on something like this.

I just happen to have a very interesting Canadian in my riding who was basically a Liberal from a large family and very uptight on the free trade issue. I am not going to embarrass him by mentioning his name, although I do not think it would matter. He phoned me at the height of the campaign long before the multinationals became involved to try to help the polls for the Tories in the last three weeks. We all know how the polls went up and down like a roller-coaster in that 1988 campaign.

This elderly gentleman is very involved in the apple business, trucks his apples to Boston and has been doing it for years. He said: "Patrick, I am very disturbed. Yes, I used to have a heritage on the Liberal side but I believe in free trade". Quite frankly I had a lot of difficulty when I was a Conservative at that time on the free trade issue. It was the toughest election I ever fought.

I knew what free trade opened up. There was a lot of imprecise language, certainly nothing on subsidies or the question of the dispute settlement mechanism. One turkey producer in Pennsylvania produces more turkeys than all of Canada. It is the same for the vertical integration of some of the chicken farms in Arkansas, to mention a state that has become famous recently, and/or in the deep south. It makes our chicken production pale by comparison.

My farmers were very concerned about free trade, about having an open floodgate. In any event I fought the fight. I supported the party line and I had difficulty. This gentlemen wanted to put an ad in the paper and he put it.

This is why this House is almost irresponsible in debating this issue on a Friday afternoon before the Easter recess when there is only a handful of us here, and other members are doing their thing. We all know we have to get home on the weekends.

This is an issue that should be debated by all members. We know more than the national coalition. I have no love or no hate for the national coalition. Frankly I think it does focus on a lot of interesting issues affecting Canadians.

This is an issue that affects Canadians. They may not want this closed club of parties to say they are not going to be able to spend $1,000 with some friends and put an ad in the local weekly or daily and say that they are either for or against. I know this opens up perils to candidates and to members, because then we might get the single issue candidates. Let us forget about the multinationals. That was free trade, and I agree with my friend from Gatineau. Who knows, it might happen again but we have other issues in Canada.

It could be abortion, pro-life or pro-choice. It could be the gun lobby. There are many different interested Canadians who because of their frustration with the political process and because they think their members are not serving them certainly do not want this Parliament to take away their right to place an ad.

The member for Kingston and the Islands is facing the issue and points a finger not at the duplicity but at the double standard in the bill that the government has brought forward.

It says that there can be a restriction on direct advertising but if it is indirect then it is wide open. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is doing a service in that people either believe in the principle or they do not. I do not happen to believe that we should cut Canadians off from their potential choice.

For my friend from the Gatineau and members here, we are members of Parliament, members of registered parties. We have a few advantages going into an election. There is something called an incumbent advantage, an incumbent benefit. Most of us send out householders. If we do not we are rather crazy. We do that at public expense four times a year. We have free mailing privileges.

We have a lot of privileges long before the campaign begins to help plant little seeds with our constituents, our electorate, that hopefully will sprout into support during a campaign.

I really was quite surprised—and that is really what got me on my feet today, although I think I was going to speak on the motion anyway. Frankly I wish this House would adjourn, because then the House could come back after Easter when the House is full up with members.

On this basic issue members should stand up and speak and give their views. I respect their views. I know the Lortie commission wrestled with this. We have to wrestle with the rights of free speech and the fact that members and candidates in an election have limits.

How can we have Canadians come in the back door and get around the limit that confronts parties? My answer is that this is democracy. When I heard a colleague in this House say that no one should influence the electorate I was absolutely horrified. I do not think it was intended the way it came out, because that is the whole purpose of an election.

I will have propaganda and I will have subtle propaganda before an election through my householders, my mailings, and through keeping in touch with my riding. That is proper, and it is proper for every member here.

Goodness gracious to them. Kitty bar the door when the writ is issued and Canadians cannot do what they may want to do. The important point is one that the amendment does not address. Frankly, I wish the bill would address it and I think the Lortie commission debated it.

To me it is not the money. Yes, that could be a factor. I could fall by the wayside because of what I am saying here today, giving the potential of single interest groups to get involved in a campaign and still not be involved in a party.

Madam Speaker, you know from your experience the answer is disclosure. I think that is the matter in this proposal by the government for a hybrid restriction of no more than $1,000 for direct advertising against or for a candidate. If it is an issue then it is open season. Disclosure should be in that bill. If there is a supplement in the newspaper or an ad, they have to disclose who the people are who put the money up.

If it is the multinationals—and that has been raised as a bogeyman here; it was real in 1988, I agree—well then okay. Canadians are not stupid.

Madam Speaker, you sat in the chair during the referendum debate when there were about six or eight of us back here who voted no on the referendum. We know what the Canadians did. We know as of yesterday or the day before, under the Access to Information Act, $7.4 million was spent for the yes side.

An hon. member: At least.

Mr. Nowlan: That is just what was admitted. It was all by big corporations.

I must say I have not really exceeded my limit too much today on this lovely afternoon. Madam Speaker, you are telling me I am almost out of time. I very glad the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for Gatineau spoke because they got me activated and stimulated.

To me disclosure helps take care of part of the problem. The Canadian people are not stupid. They showed that in the referendum with massive advertising for yes, with the three national parties saying yes, with every political leader in this country in premierships saying yes and with the advertising heavy, the public said no.

That is the lesson I think members in this House should take to heart. They should be against any restrictions on the right of the Canadian people to get involved in their way in election campaigns.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, this is the worst thing I have ever seen. First of all, that does not coincide at all with the will of the Conservative Party. I will tell you why by quoting what the Prime Minister said on November 17, 1988. The Prime Minister on November 17, 1988, just before the 1988 election, was reported to have said: "An act requiring that all federal political parties rely on financing by the general public will be passed right at the beginning of the second term of the Conservative Party". That commitment was given by the Prime Minister yesterday in Montreal during an exclusive interview with La Presse."

The Prime Minister said that he wanted to promote grassroots financing. What is happening? If I were a Conservative member today I would be ashamed. On top of not proposing financing by the population, the government is allowing big companies and big unions to finance political parties and, moreover, it is allowing third parties to finance or promote political parties. The Prime Minister said: "I want the Canadian people, each and every one, to finance political parties".

We are far from seeing that. Beside not using grassroots financing, the government is allowing third parties to support political parties. This is serious. I did not think the government would go that far. I did not think that it took Canadians and Quebecers for idiots. There is a limit to the contempt it has for people. The government is showing complete contempt for Quebecers, particularly because in Quebec we are used to financing by the population. We are accustomed to having our political parties financed by individual Quebecers and that is working quite well.

During the last referendum, we lived an experience which was rather easy to understand. We as members of the committee for the no in Quebec were financed by the people, by the voters. I can assure you that when people are determined to be heard, they will not hesitate to pull $5, $100, $200, up to $3000 out of their pockets to defend their interests and beliefs.

It is not necessary, far from it, to ask large unions and corporations to finance parties in their own interests. Government represents the people. It represents individuals and not just businesses and industries.

Mr. Langlois: Do your friends from Longueuil agree with that?

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Everybody in Quebec does. The member for Sept-Îles or Manicouagan—

Mr. Langlois: If you are going to talk about Sept-Îles you had better watch what you say.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Yes. It is a fine city. By the way, I went to Sept-Îles many times. It is very nice, right on the shore of the Saint Lawrence Gulf.

Even people from Manicouagan will vote—

Mr. Plamondon: They are getting ready to vote for the Bloc.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): —in the majority for the bloc, as the member for Richelieu has just said, according to the latest polls.

It is nevertheless shameful and appalling. Truly appalling. I cannot believe what I am hearing. The Prime Minister, supported by the Conservative MPs, has taken a position by saying: "At the next election, there will be grassroots financing. People will contribute to the campaign fund. That way the people's interest will be protected". This is not what is happening. As a matter of fact as I have just said it is exactly the opposite.

Similarly I said that during the referendum, which I gave as an example, the people of Quebec made a choice and financed the No Committee at the grassroots level and the results were very good.

In Longueuil, for example, we were able to collect in a relatively short period of time, in the two counties making up my riding, about $50,000 at the grassroots. The highest single contribution came from an important contractor I will not name. That was a personal contribution, not a corporate one. Those are two different things.

Besides, we have seen that the Quebec Chief Electoral Officer had serious doubts as to the acceptability of subliminal publicity proposed by the federal government and financed by large companies, especially English ones. Every minute of every day, there was publicity on television, on the radio, everywhere and, strangely, it was not accounted for in election spending.

How can the Chief Electoral Officer control election spending as long as we allow third parties to promote one party or another or one economic sector instead of another? How can the Chief Electoral Officer control spending during a campaign?

I cannot get over it, especially as a Quebecer, because these things changed in Quebec a long time ago. I cannot believe that Conservative as well as Liberal members from Quebec do not object to such a thing. It baffles me since it all started in Quebec. It is Quebec that asked the Prime Minister for reform. The Prime Minister himself mandated Pierre Lortie and his commission, known as the Lortie commission, to undertake a full review in order to make our election system even more democratic. The province of Quebec started all this. Why are there no Conservative or Liberal members from Quebec here in Ottawa who have the guts and the courage to speak? Have their caucuses really asked them to keep quiet? I think so. How could it be otherwise? They were officially ordered to say nothing about this bill. How could it be otherwise? You cannot possibly believe the opposite, Madam Speaker, because it goes against the mandate the Prime Minister himself gave Pierre Lortie and his commission.

From what I see today I can understand why the country is going bankrupt. We are not logical. We have no over-all project. We always stand for personal or individual interests instead of promoting an over-all project which would allow us to go foreward. That is why the majority of Quebecers decided to withdraw from the Canadian federation. They were sick of this government in Ottawa doing stupid things and putting forward senseless projects relating to transportation, or duplication between federal and provincial departments. The same thing goes for transportation which we discussed yesterday.

Life goes on and the country is faced with a total debt of $500 billion, which is about as much as the gross national product. If you know how to count you know we are going bankrupt.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I am pleased, after the independent member from Nova Scotia and the member for Longueuil, to also say a few words on this amendment. Proposed by a Liberal member, the same member who moved a motion earlier.

This amendment is so essential to the smooth functioning of democracy in Canada that I do not understand, as my colleague the member for Longueuil was saying, how we can let it pass. Why is the government rushing this bill through, on a Friday, just before leaving for two weeks for the Easter break? The government tries to slip this by quietly, in complicity with the two other parties. Even if he moved the amendment, the Liberal member for Kingston and the Islands who is listening intently to my speech did not ask other members of his party to back it.

Mr. Milliken: It is not necessary, the amendment is so good.

Mr. Plamondon: The Liberal Party is somewhat of an accomplice to the party in office. Why does it do that? Because it does not want a vote. It is scared to vote. Because it is an accomplice it crosses to the other side. It can sit on either side of the House. It is very comfortable because it is defending the same ideas, the same interests, that is the financial interests of privileged few.

I would like to make a comparison between clause 2 that we examined earlier this afternoon and this motion. When we talked about allowing small parties to have a showing in an election, the government kept them away by requiring a deposit of $1,000 per riding for the right to make their voices heard. That is the case of the Green Party that wanted to work for the environmental cause, of the Social Credit Party and so on. Several political parties are using election campaigns in order to force candidates to take a stand on substantive issues. That is totally contrary to the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights, article 19 more specifically that I will quote.

Article 19 says: "Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media regardless of frontiers".

By refusing the NDP amendment to clause 2, the government violates the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations that Canada signed. I think that it is the Green Party's intention to ask the United Nations for a vote condemning this violation of human rights.

That is the government's position regarding the freedom of expression of small political parties. Let us now look at the amendment in terms of that freedom of expression. The amendment would limit the right of corporations to intervene by supporting a political party or, during a campaign, by paying for advertising on behalf of organizations like the coalition for something, or participate in the campaign by using unlimited advertising resources. That amendment was ignored by the government. What was its response? No, no, no. According to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, multinational companies are entitled to freedom of expression.

However, Mr. Justice Michaud in the Lipton case said that failure to limit intervention by third parties not directly involved in an electoral campaign or having private interests to protect would put democracy in serious danger. That is they intervene in the election campaign to boost the chances of a certain party in order to benefit from it later on by obtaining contracts and party favours. That is where the danger lies.

The government ignored the Lortie report which did not go very far. It fails to keep the Prime Minister's commitment of November 17 and the commitments of witnesses like the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead who gave a quite exceptional testimony at the Lortie commission when he asked: "Can the workers of my riding who barely earn $15,000 a year seriously believe that an engineering firm, a large bank or a businessman can pay $50,000 to a political party without hoping for a return on their investment? Can they seriously believe that they have as much weight as those people in the decision-making process?" To ask this question is to answer it.

Why would the big multinational companies and the big consortiums nurture political parties if they did not intend to make them fat in order to have them serve their interests afterwards? In this matter Quebec has been at the forefront by being the first province and the only North American state to table a bill which prohibits any person who does not have the right to vote from financing a political party. This eliminates unions, non-profit institutions and corporations.

The number of political contributions has increased in Quebec because political parties there have regained the support of individuals who have the right to vote. Those individuals have decided to finance them, to keep them to serve their interests. These parties now serve the interests of individuals and not those of a wealthy minority.

The Prime Minister said he understood that sentiment. On November 17 a front page article my colleague quoted from La Presse said: "Mulroney has committed himself to have the general public finance political parties. Mulroney has committed himself to put an end to all the scandals that befell the Conservative Party during its first four years in power". One of the favoured tools they are looking at is that of grassroots financing, an in depth reform of the financing of political parties. But now no mention is made of that commitment in this proposed reform. Corporations, privileged classes are allowed to take over the Conservative Party and other parties as well so they will be in a position to serve their own interests rather than the public interest.

There is no willingness to even make the change suggested in my hon. friend's amendment, Motion No. 18, whereby the vote could not be influenced directly or indirectly—and there is emphasis on the word indirectly—through major advertising and financial support to political parties partial to wealth. In that sense my colleague was right when he wondered how Quebec members in this House could turn their backs on Quebec's greatest political heritage since one of the most significant political moves world-wide was the Loi sur le financement des partis politiques allowing only voters to contribute to political parties.

This is the heritage of which we have been proud now for over 15 years, since 1977. These members should be here to ponder upon this fact and to encourage other members of their party to do the same. Unfortunately they let themselves be moulded and they fall in like sheep in this federalist line-up, oblivious to the interests of their people, their nation and their Quebec which they are supposed to protect. Fortunately, soon we will see here a group of 50, 60 individuals—men and women—willing to defend Quebec's best interests. Those who will have chosen to forget will be condemned to stay at home and spend the rest of their lives in shame and forsaken by all.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As I prepare to put the question, I will make a suggestion to the hon. member for Richelieu. He should read citation 459(2) of Beauchesne carefully. I think he will then admit that the Chair has shown patience which I would call—

An hon. member: Angelic.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would tend to call it angelic this afternoon and this whole day, in fact. Perhaps when we come to the next motion the member will keep citation 459(2) of Beauchesne in mind.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 18.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 18 negatived.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved:

Motion No. 21.

That Bill C-114 be amended in Clause 112 by striking out lines 2 and 3 at page 63 and substituting the following therefor:

"tising expenses between the date of the issue of the writ".

Mr. Plamondon: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. We are about to debate Motion No. 21, the last item unfortunately. It would be good to have a quorum for it, so that everyone clearly understands the last speeches.

• (1720)

Madam Deputy Speaker: Am I to understand that the hon. member has realized it is Motion No. 21 on page XIII.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since we have a quorum, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I would like to thank my colleagues on the other side of the House for their support and I hope that they will vote for my motion, for my amendment, because that is the question before the House.

I also want to say that it is a pleasure to see the Bloc Quebecois members here on a Friday afternoon, because they are gone almost every Friday. It is true, Madam Speaker, you—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I demand that you be as severe with him as you were with us. He must not say that any member is away from the House if that person has perfectly valid reasons. We were away for valid reasons.

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, it is exceptional, I must admit, that I agree with my hon. colleague, but I must also admit that I agree with my Liberal colleague's remark about the Bloc Quebecois attendance on Friday afternoons.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1725)

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Madam Speaker, I would like to make the members here in the House aware that, on a proportional basis the Bloc Quebecois has a larger attendance now than the members of the Liberal, Conservative and New Democratic Parties put together.

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, the members of the bloc are once again showing Canadians that they know nothing about arithmetic.

Mr. Milliken: Obviously I have struck a nerve. That is sad since I really enjoy discussing electoral matters. I spent a lot of time with the Committee on Electoral Reform and I think it is a shame that no one member from the bloc ever showed up to state his position to the committee. Perhaps one could ask to be heard by the committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Chair could put in a word on this Friday afternoon at 5.25 p.m. The hon. member for Richelieu rises on a point of order. I think everyone knows that he wants to protest against the suggestion that he should have asked to be heard by a committee. But I think that if we all took this debate a little more seriously perhaps we would be able to leave for our ridings sometime around six, seven or eight o'clock.

Therefore, I would appreciate it if hon. members from all sides would behave so that we can complete this debate in an orderly fashion that would be more respectful of this institution.

The hon. member for Richelieu insists on being recognized once again.

Mr. Plamondon: I will be very brief, Madam Speaker. It is unparliamentary to comment on attendance in the House or in committee. I wanted to say that every time we show up to a committee the three parties gang up together to prevent us from speaking. That is why the bloc is often absent from committee meetings.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order but a point of debate. The hon. member will have all the time he needs for debate in due course.

The hon. minister also rises on a point of order.

Mr. Cadieux: Madam Speaker, once again, I must agree with my colleague of the Bloc Quebecois. It is totally unparliamentary to refer to attendance in committee, to the extent of course that one is in attendance.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, it is not at all because they are bloc members. They are simply not committee members so they do not have to attend.

Mr. Plamondon: You don't want us to attend.

Mr. Milliken: I had hoped they would ask to be heard by the committee because I am very interested in their views.

Mr. Plamondon: They did not want us to attend!

Mr. Milliken: No, I never said that, and I was on that committee.

Mr. Plamondon: The committee said no.

Mr. Milliken: That's news to me. I had no idea you had requested to be heard.

The important thing is that today we can discuss the amendment I presented to the House.

[English]

I am surprised that this amendment was not grouped for debate with the other amendment that I moved a few moments ago because basically it does the same thing but in a much more forceful way. What it does is make it an offence to incur an advertising expense as defined in the act during a writ period. In other words, it would stop any expense. I believe that the amendment really gives some teeth to the proposal with respect to advertising in the government bill.

I want to make it very clear that while this amendment with respect to advertising came out of the committee as a committee report and was supported by all the members of the committee, it was because no other agreement could be arranged that would have included what I have sought to move in the amendments here today. We were not in favour of the very limited restriction contained in this bill. We wanted a fuller restriction. We pressed for a fuller restriction in the committee, but we were unable to agree on one.

I want to make it very clear that we do not think this particular restriction is going to work. We feel that in the course of an election campaign there will be opportunity for wholesale abuse of the advertising provisions that are contained in this act and that will be in place in respect of the political parties. We are very concerned about it and I will be expressing those concerns further on third reading as I did at second reading. I look forward to that debate very much.

That is all I have to say in respect of this amendment. I hope that it will be acceptable to the House.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties and under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1), I move:

> That, in relation to Bill C–114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, .1 hours shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and .25 hours to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill;
> That at the expiry of the time provided in this order any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Richelieu has the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: May I ask the hon. minister to say that again in French, or to repeat slowly? The interpreter could not keep up, and I do not know what he was saying.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Andre, seconded by Mr. Cadieux, moves that there have been discussions among the parties.

An hon. member: Could you read it in French.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not have it in French in front of me—there have been discussions among the parties—and I would not want to insult our translators who are always so very good. Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) Mr. Andre moves:

> That, in relation to Bill C-114, an act to amend the Canada Elections Act, .1 hours shall be allotted to the consideration of the report stage and .25 hours to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and
> That at the expiry of the time provided in this order any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading stage of the bill shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

• (1735)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

An hon. member: Point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Just a minute. I have put a question to the House. I cannot accept points of order once a question has been put. Those are our rules.

All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Carried on division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, the reason I am rising on a point of order, even though you did read the motion slowly, is that I heard .1 hour. I am not sure if that is six minutes or what. However, I was more interested in the third reading. How much time does the motion the House just passed provide for?

An hon. member: 15 minutes.

Mr. Nowlan: And six minutes. Absolutely incredible.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I would like to make a slight correction to what you said concerning translators. I have nothing but compliments for the interpreters in the House of Commons. I had no intention of criticizing them. All I said was that the minister spoke so fast I could not keep up with the translation of his statement.

That being said, I find that things are going too fast for the House to understand exactly what is happening. You quote Standing Order 78 which states:

> —there is agreement among the representatives of all parties to allot—

That is the condition to adopt the resolution. Now there is a party called the Bloc Quebecois which never agreed to that. I do not think we can proceed that way. The Bloc is recognized in the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member very well knows that the group represented by his political formation, the Bloc Quebecois, is not officially recognized in the House, and we are not going to change that this afternoon.

Thus, the motion is in order. I have in turn tried to read it a little slower so that it can be translated so as to allow the hon. member to understand it. At this moment the motion is agreed to on division, but agreed to nevertheless. Thus we go on to the first part.

The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Madam Speaker, I would like to know exactly what the signifiance of this motion having been agreed to is: What happens now? Will we go on with report stage? Do we go on to third reading? I am not quite clear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will finish report stage. We still have six minutes left at report stage. Then there will be concurrence and debate on third reading will last 15 minutes.

Mr. Plamondon: Is that all?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Well, 6 plus 15 is 21, I think. Six minutes for report stage and fifteen for third reading, thus a total of 21 minutes.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, my colleague from Kingston and the Islands has a second amendment on advertising during election campaigns. The committee on electoral reform—

Mr. Plamondon: It is unbelievable. This is dictatorial, Madam Speaker, just like in South Africa and other such dictatorships. It is just pure dictatorship. Gangsters would not do that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Gatineau still has the floor.

• (1740)

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, the fourth amendment from my colleague, the member for Kingston and the Islands, refers to the fact that we had asked that there be no third party publicity during an election campaign. The idea behind this is that during the 1988 campaign—

Mr. Plamondon: Point of order, Madam Speaker. We do not have a quorum.

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, may I speak?

Mr. Plamondon: Come out of hiding, you bunch of dictators.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I must interrupt the member. We must call for a quorum count. The hon. member for Richelieu requested a quorum count and I am calling for it right now. However, I would be grateful if he would use another tone.

Mr. Plamondon: I was not addressing you, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Granted, but my duty is to make sure everyone respects order and decorum in this House and by acting in such a way, you are being disrespectful towards me and what I stand for in this House.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is now a quorum. The member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, to get back to the debate, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands came back with his amendment that would prohibit third party advertising during an election campaign.

• (1745)

In 1988 there was an incredible amount of advertising in the various media expressing views on free trade, and it was obvious to the public that this type of advertising favoured the party in power which supported the free trade agreement as the best option for our country.

In fact there is always the risk and that is why we propose this amendment that organizations like the National Citizens' Coalition, for instance, and I do not mean this as an insult, might present an option that would not necessarily reflect the will of the majority. Because of their substantial resources they would be able to use—and we saw that in 1988 with free trade—TV, radio and the press to try and convince people that theirs is the best option for the country. That is where the danger lies. This amendment is intended to prevent that.

In an election campaign only recognized political parties should be allowed to set forth policies. If groups or individuals wish to take part in the democratic process they should belong to a political party and do their advertising within a democratic framework.

However, if individuals who are very wealthy or organizations with major resources are allowed to do this, the result may be a media blitz with an impact out of all proportion to the group's status. We always want to reflect the interests of the majority. But if minority groups have tremendous resources, it will be hard for them to understand what is happening in the process. That is why in an election campaign we must have restrictions to ensure party policy is reflected by the party honestly.

If they are allowed to call upon tremendous outside financial resources, it will skew the democratic process and that is why the hon. member's amendment proposes to avert this potential risk. Because our society truly believes in a democratic system that is fair and just that one day and since we are all pretty young, I am convinced we will see the day when in election campaigns third parties will no longer be able to apply their considerable resources to try to influence policy. This is up to the political parties; and those who want to participate in the process can do so through the democratic system. Political parties will express their views or go door to door.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to order adopted earlier today, it is my duty to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of the bill.

The first question is on Motion No. 21.

[English]

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 21 negatived.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Andre: moved that the bill be read for the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the process which resulted in this bill started four years ago. It all started on April 3, 1989 in the Throne Speech at the beginning of the second session of this legislature. In the Throne Speech, His Excellency the Governor General said that his government would appoint a commission of inquiry whose mandate would be to make recommendations on changes that should be brought to the country's election.

Today we have a great bill following a study by this commission of inquiry and a year-long study of the commission's report by a committee of the House which proposed a bill greatly similar to Bill C-114.

[English]

The problem is not so much what is in this bill but what is not in it. As members of the Liberal Party and members in opposition we fought very long and hard in the Special Committee on Electoral Reform to have included in this bill various items that have been omitted.

I have moved some amendments here today which have been defeated that sought to improve the bill in so far as the bill itself went. I also tried to move two amendments which were ruled out of order which dealt with the rights of women under our electoral law. They would have enhanced the ability of women to run for public office, for membership in this House and would have provided incentives to the parties to recruit and allow them to stand as candidates. This would be with a view to increasing the representation of women in the House. Those amendments were ruled out of order by the Chair. I can understand the ruling and I can see why they were ruled out of order.

When the committee made specific recommendations on one of those issues and the government chose to remove it from the bill, I found it difficult to understand why we are unable to move an amendment that the committee had proposed in its draft legislation and which is then out of order simply because the government bill does not include it.

Be that as it may, we have been unable to deal with those aspects of the electoral law in the course of this bill. The committee is continuing its work. When I say it is ad nauseam we do sit very long hours and have discussed this matter most extensively in committee, that and other matters.

We sat most of this past week. We did not sit today but we were sitting yesterday and I believe on Monday and Tuesday. We will be sitting on Monday when we resume. We are trying to reach agreement on various points but my general observation—I know the government House leader will probably disagree with me when I say this—is that in our view we are very concerned that the government is not really interested in electoral reform. What we are getting here is electoral fiddling.

This bill represents the culmination of work that has gone on since 1987 at least. Many of the amendments in this bill are ones that are not controversial. They will enhance our electoral law and were recommended by the chief electoral officer in his report which was tabled in this House in 1988.

We have not broken a whole lot of new ground. There are some new things: The special ballot rules are going to be a significant improvement and will broaden the franchise by allowing people who were previously disenfranchised to vote. The rules respecting the right to vote for non-resident Canadians is an improvement.

There are other things that are not improvements. We tried to get some of those fixed today with these amendments and failed. We will continue to try in the committee where we are pressing on with other matters.

I want to turn to some of those other matters and stress their importance in this House. By passing this bill today, I recognize that we have assisted in the passage to some extent. We have recognized that we are going to lose the votes. We have allowed that to happen without forcing standing divisions which would have held it up.

Mr. Nowlan: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. I will be very short. I listened with interest to my friend for Kingston and the Islands. I just want to say publicly and to the House that we talked about electoral reform.

We have to reform our House rules. In view of what the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands said, there has been a blot put on any further work of the committee because of the fact that the opposition has allowed such—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is an experienced member. He knows very well that he got into debate on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: I regret the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants feels that he is sort of responsible. The hon. member knows perfectly well he has had plenty of opportunity to debate in this House this afternoon. The hon. member knows perfectly well he has had plenty of opportunity to debate this. He did not come to the committee.

Mr. Plamondon: Hypocrites.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's language is quite deplorable.

Mr. Plamondon: Hypocrites. Carry on with your dictatorial way, as they do in South Africa.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Really.

Mr. Plamondon: This is an abuse of power, Madam speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member with the big smile knows as well as I that it takes two to tango. I too have my glasses on. I see as well as the hon. member.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I would like to go on with my remarks concerning this bill because I think we can adopt it today so that the Chief Electoral Officer may continue to work towards implementing its provisions.

[English]

If the Chief Electoral Officer is not able to proceed with the special ballot rules promptly he will not be able to have them in place in time for the next election.

We are agreeing to passage today because we believe it is in the best interest of the Canadian public to have this bill in place in time for the next election.

That is the only reason we are doing so. It is not because we think everything in this bill is great. We have told the House and we have told the country what we think is wrong with this bill.

• (1800)

We will have another opportunity to debate the electoral law of Canada in this House when phase two is presented to this House, as it will be in the next few weeks. When phase two comes here concurrence in the committee report can be moved. If the hon. member is so keen to debate it why does he not move concurrence in the report of the special committee which is before this House right now and is still sitting there and has not been concurred in? He can have a debate for a morning any time he likes on the committee report and I invite him to move a motion of concurrence. He can do that.

Mr. Plamondon: We want to participate.

Mr. Milliken: There is no need for the hon. member to sit and squawk today and say his rights are being taken away. There will be another report and he can move concurrence in that report and debate the electoral law, too. That is two mornings at least before the government can shut it off. If he is smart and moves it on a Wednesday afternoon he can have the whole afternoon to debate it until the government moves adjournment of the debate. I invite him to do that.

As for me and my party, we have our regrets about this bill and we have made those very clear, succinctly but clearly, in the course of the debate today. I regret that this is being pushed through on a Friday afternoon and I had asked the government House leader to give time for this bill earlier in the week. Unfortunately he said he was unable to do that, which I think indicates the priority the government places on electoral reform. Nevertheless, we are faced with it today.

We have to proceed with something in order for the Chief Electoral Officer to get this in place for the next election. I think most Canadians will be well served by those provisions that will be put in place, specifically the changes relating to the special ballot rooms which will enable more Canadians to vote than has been possible in the past.

[Translation]

The hon. members represent Quebec. In that province the elections act already gives voters the right to vote even if they do not reside in the province. The rules are not the same for the country, and we would like all Canadians to be able to vote during a general election regardless of where they live.

Mr. Plamondon: We agree with that. We will debate on that.

Mr. Milliken: I am pleased to see that the hon. members agree with that. However, if we do not pass this bill today, it will be impossible to complete the necessary arrangements and have these sections in effect on time for the next general election. I hope that all members in this House will support this bill, because it is an important measure for all Canadians. Even if we disagree over some clauses, we can still support this bill today, even though all our motions were defeated.

[English]

The hon. members in this party have their grave regrets, as I have said. We are not very happy with what is not in this bill, but we are reasonably happy with what is in it. That is what we have been talking about. That is what we were restricted to talking about and that is what we were restricted to voting on today in this House. It is only what is in it and what we might add to what is in it that we can talk about. We cannot talk about or vote on those things that are either not in it or that cannot be added to it because they are not already dealt with in the bill.

I have referred to the two amendments that you have ruled out of order, Madam Speaker. We regret that. We wish those things were in the bill. We wish there were many other things in the bill that are not there. But given that we have what is here on this piece of paper and that is what we have to vote on today, as an opposition we are prepared to say that is what we will go ahead with. We believe it is in the best interests of Canadians even though we wish there was a lot more in it. It is not there however and we are stuck with having to proceed with what is here. We are reluctantly agreeing to this today in order to allow for more Canadians to participate in the election, whenever it is held.

I think I speak for most Canadians when I say that we want an election at the earliest opportunity. Canadians are most anxious that there be an immediate election. I would invite the Prime Minister to go to Rideau Hall tonight to dissolve Parliament and call an immediate election so that we can have it over with. Then the leadership convention my hon. friends opposite are having could be deferred to a later date. We could have the election and then they could choose their new leader. I think Canadians would appreciate the opportunity to express their views on the current government's position and its failures in the last eight years.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the order agreed earlier today, pursuant to Standing Order 78(1), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of third reading of the bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Bill read the third time and passed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REVIEW OF SALARIES, ALLOWANCES, BENEFITS AND PENSIONS OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND SENATE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should contract an independent non-government agency to review all salaries, allowances, benefits, and pensions of members of Parliament and senators and make recommendations on these to the House.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak to Motion No. 660 today. It has been a number of years since the compensation of members of Parliament—the salaries, pensions, and tax free benefits—has been reviewed. I feel very strongly about this.

When I was first elected to this House in 1984 I was unaware of how the pensions were calculated for members of Parliament and it truly shocked me that they did not parallel those in private enterprise.

In 1952 under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act we started laying down the rules and guidelines with regard to pensions for MPs and how these were applicable. Since 1981 members of the House of Commons have contributed 10 per cent of their sessional indemnity plus 1 per cent, making a total of 11 per cent, into the pension fund. The House of Commons contributes 11 per cent.

A member of Parliament must serve six years in order to be in line for a pension after he or she retires or is defeated. Sometimes members of Parliament can be extremely young after six years of service. I feel very strongly that our pensions should be reviewed again taking a look at private enterprise. Any pension that is due to an elected member of Parliament should come after a certain age, be it 55 years of age plus the number of years of service equalling a certain number.

Some people are age 30 when they come here and after working very hard choose to retire after six years. Therefore they are age 36 when they take a pension. That does not seem right to me and I am very pleased that this motion has come forward so I can express my concerns and the concerns of the constituents in Calgary Southwest.

Four or five years ago I wrote a letter to the Speaker—not to you, Sir, but a previous Speaker—requesting that an investigation and study be done in this particular area. I wrote a letter to the Board of Internal Economy. I even wrote a letter to some of my colleagues in the House in all parties stating that I felt it was time that members' pensions be looked at.

Are members of Parliament contributing enough or not enough? Should the House contribute an equal amount? Should we be able to take a pension after six years of service no matter what our age may be? Should members of Parliament who go on to another career in the Public Service be allowed to double dip? That means they could collect a pension from the House of Commons and be employed by the Public Service, getting a wage and a pension at the same time. These are all areas that need to be studied very carefully.

I did not get very far. I decided I would table a private member's motion which I did a year ago last March. As all of us are well aware it sometimes takes a period of time for these motions to get drawn.

I did not give up there. I spoke to the President of the Treasury Board who is the minister responsible for members' pensions and the legislation. I encouraged him to have a total review. I also worked with many of my colleagues throughout the House stating we simply had to come into line with private enterprise.

After two or three years of hounding the President of the Treasury Board he announced the first week of February that he would appoint an independent actuarial company to examine the entire MPs compensation package. This is good. The total package will be reviewed, not only the salaries, but also our allowances, any benefits, any perks, any contributions to the pension fund and the tax-free portion.

Today MPs have a basic salary of $64,800 which is earned income and on which we pay tax. Also, members of Parliament receive a tax-free per annum of about $21,400. This is non-taxable and helps many of the people in the House with their expenses.

A lot of things people right across Canada do not understand is that when many of us have to go from one building to another such as over to external affairs, to fisheries and oceans and indeed over to visit the people at Environment Canada, we take a cab and that cost comes out of our pocket. There are many parking expenditures. We attend many day and evening functions. Some we are obligated to attend and some we do quite of our own volition. We have many expenses which are not really listed and it is very difficult for people across the country to understand.

I could honestly say that just this past 10 days, the two weeks we were home in our ridings, it cost me between $500 and $600 for parking tickets, gasoline and the various functions that I attended. This comes out of the tax free portion of our compensation package.

It can be argued that maybe the tax-free portion should be dismissed and our salary increase and we be compensated on a receipt presented for all our expenses. That may be a way but before we ever decide, we would have to take a look at how much the administration of such a system would cost the taxpayers.

There is an average throughout the country of how much MPs spend with regard to making things available within their riding, being accessible and attending certain functions. I am very pleased the President of the Treasury Board went ahead and said we would review the whole package.

As I said earlier, the basic salary today is $64,800 which is taxable. We will review the non-taxable portion, which is $21,400. We will review the amount of money which each member of Parliament contributes to the pension fund. We will review how much the government puts into the pension fund. We will review whether there should be double dipping and at what age a member may draw his pension. All these are very important, there is no doubt about it, but we have to come in line with private enterprise so that everybody across this country is treated equally and fairly.

There has been a lot in the papers over the last number of years concerning the pensions of members of Parliament. According to them, everyone is going to get the maximum amount. That is not true. Over 50 per cent of the members will not collect a pension because they will not have sat the six years required. Second, of the 50 per cent of the members left, probably around 5 per cent will collect the maximum, which means they will have served for 15 years or more. We are looking at a very small portion of members of Parliament who will serve the full length of time required and receive a full pension.

Having checked the pension fund last week for members of Parliament I found it was in a surplus position of about $30 million. It takes the members of Parliament working today to create the funds for the members of Parliament who retired yesterday or before.

I am very pleased after three, four or five years of working with my colleagues and working to get the President of the Treasury Board to review our compensation package and put it out to a non-government actuarial firm. Of course, the recommendations would have to come back to the House so we could have a full debate on that specific issue.

I thank my colleague from South Shore who seconded the motion today. I know he has been an active person concerning the fair treatment of pensions.

An hon. member: He is a good Canadian.

Mrs. Sparrow: Yes, he is a good Canadian and he represents his constituents in Nova Scotia extremely well.

Whether the recommendations that come back to the House say the salaries should go up and the pensions go down, or our contributions should be less than 7 per cent, will have to be reviewed.

The other part of it is indexation. Pensions are not indexed until the members receiving them reach the magic age of 60 and then they are indexed according to the CPI that has been involved since the time of retirement.

While I recognize that there is a lot of controversy, I do want the people of Calgary Southwest to know that this is now on the table and will be reviewed. Once the statistics and the criteria are set down, we will understand that pensions have to come in line with private enterprise and that is what we are hoping for.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate this morning, on our first day back in Parliament.

[English]

I must say that when I first saw the motion on the Order Paper I wondered why we were debating it because I thought it had already been decided by the President of the Treasury Board. If it has been decided, why is it necessary to adopt a motion that has already been decided? Nevertheless, it makes for interesting conversation in the House for no other reason than it states again our commitment to doing what the motion says.

The member for Calgary Southwest said some moments ago that the President of the Treasury Board had agreed to establishing a commission to review the salaries and benefits of members of Parliament. To this date I have no knowledge of who is to sit on that commission. Perhaps the members have been appointed. If they have I do not recall a press release or a media advisory announcing that members of the commission had been appointed.

Perhaps the purpose behind this motion is really to incite the President of the Treasury Board to do that which he promised; not to just announce the commission would exist, but to actually appoint the commission and get it going.

I am not trying to put words in the mouth of the hon. member across the way. Perhaps she is trying to push the minister along to get him to appoint that commission. That is a good idea and I have no difficulty with that. I am not ashamed of the salary I make as an MP and neither is the hon. member from Calgary. She is a very hard-working member of Parliament, as are the vast majority of MPs in the House of Commons.

In terms of accountability, it is not a bad idea to get an independent commission to review it. I would guess that at this point whatever commission is appointed will likely recommend that MPs' salaries be increased but then we will not do it. That is usually what happens. Every time one of these commissions has been appointed, the recommendation has been to increase MPs' salaries when people thought that the recommendation would be to decrease them. Because the recommendation is to increase salaries no one dares do it particularly because economic times are tough and nothing happens. So be it. At the very least we will be able to confirm that what we are doing and the amount of salary we are getting for doing our jobs here is appropriate if that is what the commission decides. Now we are getting into the business of pensions and so on.

There is an organization, which really is a business calling itself the National Citizens' Coalition. It has nothing to do with being national, has nothing to do with being a citizens' group and is not a coalition. It is a business. This business raises funds by sending out huge flyers which include a little block at the bottom telling Canadians to send it their dough and it will continue to fight to lower MPs' salaries, cancel their pensions and whatever other things happen to go through its mind at the time and whatever will work to generate funds.

Right now, because politicians are not always seen in the best of light, particularly in an economic downturn, we have become a fair and easy target for that business calling itself the National Citizens' Coalition. Of course, nowhere does the National Citizens' Coalition ever say that MPs pay $7,000 or $8,000 a year in premiums for their pensions.

If those premiums were invested in a five-year GIC, a member of Parliament like the member for Saint-Denis would never recover the interest on his contributions toward the plan let alone the capital outlay he has contributed over the years. The same is undoubtedly true for the hon. member for Windsor West, or the hon.

member for Victoria—Haliburton who will be retiring shortly. I do not want to make him sound any older but he is a senior. All things being equal, he will probably not draw from this pension for as long as others will. Yet he has been a member for two or three decades and has paid the full premium.

The hon. member for Burlington is here in the House as well. He has been a member for a long time. I am not sure whether he will be a candidate again. I do not know whether he has announced that he will be running again. In any case, many members have paid the pension off fully. They have made hundreds of thousands of dollars of capital outlay and have forgone interest in their pensions and they will never collect.

However, that does not make news for the National Citizens' Coalition. What makes news is the fact that the hon. member for Shefford retired last year and it has added everything that he will draw from his pension. It forgot to put in the contributions he has put into the plan. The National Citizens' Coalition made an arbitrary decision based on how long it decided the hon. member for Shefford was going to live and attributed an amount of money to that. Actuarially, that does not make sense. It is not counted that way.

The chief actuary for Canada has indicated that the MPs' fund is not at all in a deficit position the way some organizations have portrayed it. As a matter of fact it is in a surplus position. When it talked about unfunded liabilities of the plan, that only works if there are three basic assumptions: that every member would retire today; that they will all live to be 75 years of age; and that no new member will ever be re-elected. Presumably, that would make this place a dictatorship and no one would ever contribute toward the plan again. It starts off with those three assumptions and then attributes a cost to all of that. That is sheer and utter nonsense.

The commission we are going to have is welcome. I am glad the minister is doing this but I wish he would appoint the members forthwith, announce them and choose a firm of unimpeachable integrity, such as a firm of actuaries. Let us do it. Maybe we can put this issue to rest at least for a little while until the National Citizens' Coalition thinks up another new scheme to raise funds for itself.

At least the money spent on this commission will make Canadians aware. Whatever recommendations it comes up with I will be ready to live with. If it thinks our salaries are too high, which I doubt, fine. If it thinks they are too low, I know we will not raise them. They will probably stay the same and that is fine too. If it decides that our pensions are too generous, we will have to live with that as well. However the story is a little different from what has been told.

I would like to take only two minutes to talk about occupational salaries. The Statistics Canada publication The Daily of April 13, 1993 lists a number of occupations. I will read a few of them into the record. I will not say that MPs should make the same as the highest paid Canadians. Obviously that would not be correct. It should be remembered as well that notwithstanding the way some people are trying to portray it in the media, others certainly make salaries that are as high or higher.

I can give the example of a dentist who makes on average $95,000 a year. Physicians and judges make $102,000. General managers and senior officials of companies make on average $67,000 a year. Airline pilots make $64,893. Chiropractors make $64,299. Engineers make $63,000 and university teachers make $62,000. Therefore, when MPs are paid $65,000 it is certainly a good and handsome salary. However Canadians should not be misled into believing that MPs are of the highest income order because that certainly is not the case.

In any case, I support the motion of the member opposite and I hope that the government will appoint members of integrity to this commission so that Canadians can feel reassured once and for all on this issue and we can talk about something else.

In this Parliament we have spent as much time talking about this subject as we did about national issues. I think we have been getting nowhere on it and we have better things to do. Let us appoint that commission, get it over with and turn the page so that we can talk about other things which would be more important for most of our constituents.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, before I commence my remarks I want to advise the House that my colleague, the hon member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, will be sharing time with me and we will have approximately five minutes each.

I am pleased to rise and support the motion before us today. I want to point out that in theory the motion is not needed because the government has already indicated it is prepared to act in this way. I want to put a couple of things on the record.

On February 24, 1992 the President of the Treasury Board in a debate on government Bill C-55, the Public Service Superannuation Act, said:

> At the same time I know that hon. members share my concern that some members of the public have criticized the current pension plan as too far out of line with general practice.
> To be credible, a review of parliamentary pension arrangements must also provide for specific input from the public. I have already indicated that the views of those independent of Parliament will be actively solicited in this study.

On that same day I was sitting beside my leader, the hon. member for Yukon, who devoted most of her second reading speech to the question of compensation of members of Parliament and senators. In that speech she said the following:

• (1135)

> I also believe that the time has come to establish a non-partisan, independent commission to deal with the issues of MP pensions; not ex-members of Parliament, as has been the case before, as many of the provinces have, to look at the whole issue of members of Parliament pensions.

She followed up on that comment in the House. On March 17 she wrote to the President of the Treasury Board as follows:

> I noted with interest your speech in the House of Commons on February 24 where you indicated an openness to establishing a committee to study changes to MPs' pensions. I urge you to act immediately to set up such a committee.
> The committee should be arm's length from Parliament and the government and be comprised of individuals with expertise in the area of pensions. The individuals should not be ex-MPs or senators. The committee should be empowered to examine all aspects of the MPs' pension plan.
> I believe it is crucial that this issue be dealt with expeditiously. I propose that the committee be required to report to Parliament within six months of being struck.
> I look forward to an early reply.

On June 12 the following reply came from the President of the Treasury Board:

> Thank you for your letter of June 11, 1992 concerning the promised inquiry into MPs' pensions.
> I did not think it appropriate to formally commence the review of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act until after Bill C-55 has received Royal Assent. However, at this time I am developing final proposals on the terms of reference for and composition of the ad hoc group which will undertake this review. There is no question in my mind that all aspects of the MPRAA must be examined and that the study group should be made up of individuals with expertise and public credibility in the area of pensions and compensation. Although I understand your position on the independence of the study group, I am sure you would agree that the review process must fully take into account the views and interests of existing MPRAA plan members and pensioners. Pensions are, and will continue to be, a significant element of the remuneration package which is certainly a factor in enabling individuals to seek public office.
> I am sorry that you did not receive my reply to your letter of March 17, 1992. I am enclosing a copy for your records.

That was back in June of last year. All the while the hon. member's motion has been sitting on the Order Paper waiting to be debated until today and no action. There was no public announcement or any indication that the Governor in Council had struck a group, whether it was ad hoc or otherwise, to do the work the minister promised.

On December 3, 1992 my leader again wrote to the President of the Treasury Board:

> Further to your letter of June 11, 1992 I would like to know what progress has been made concerning a review of the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.
> In your letter you indicated that a formal review of the MPRAA would not be possible until Bill C-55 had received Royal Assent. Your commitment to a review of the MPRAA is unequivocal since you state: "There is no question in my mind that all aspects of the MPRAA must be examined". Since Bill C-55 received Royal Assent on September 29, 1992 I have seen no indication that you are prepared to fulfil your commitment to this review. I hope that your silence on this issue does not mean you have abandoned your decision to review the MPRAA. I am therefore formally repeating my request that a committee be struck immediately and proceed with a review so that it can report to Parliament next spring.
> I would like to reiterate my belief that this is a very crucial issue and should be dealt with immediately. In my opinion, a committee reviewing the MPRAA should be at arm's length from Parliament and the government, and should be comprised of expert individuals who are not members of Parliament or senators, current or former. In addition, the committee should be empowered to examine every aspect of the MPs' pension plan.

In quick conclusion, before I turn this over to my colleague, the government has failed to live up to yet another promise. I hope this motion passes today in order to send a message to the government that it has to listen to Canadians. It is time for an independent review.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the remarks made by my colleague, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, especially as he pointed out the role of the hon. member for Yukon, the leader of our party who has pressed for a review of MPs' pensions.

I must say that while I support the motion and acknowledge the MP who is presenting it today, I smell a little politics here. Could it be that the leader of the Reform Party is running—

Mrs. Sparrow: This was long before he became active.

Mr. Waddell: Oh, so this is different. I see. Perhaps I should put my own view on the record.

Mr. Mills: This is where the Reform Party got the idea.

• (1140)

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the pension benefits of members of Parliament should be brought into line with those available to other Canadians. It is as simple as that.

I was walking around my riding in the last two weeks going door to door and meeting constituents, as many members have done. People seemed very pleased to see me and to have the opportunity to talk with a member of Parliament. People said their concerns were about jobs, taxes, or transit in the local areas.

I represent a beautiful suburb of Vancouver that is nestled up against the coast mountains. People said they were concerned about clean air, crime and especially youth problems.

A gentleman I saw yesterday in Citadel Heights, an area of my riding, said: "There is something that sticks in my craw". I asked him what it was and he said it was MPs' pensions. We had a discussion about that. He was unaware that the leader of the NDP had raised this in the House of Commons. She said on February 24, 1992: "In short, I believe the time has come to recognize that these pensions must be brought in line with the general work force. The time has come to bring pensions for members of Parliament into line with the pensions of other Canadians".

We do need an independent commission to look at this. I stress independent. We should look at what age pensions should vest. Should it be age 55? Is six years enough or too much for people to get pensions? We should have a look at that in a fair-minded manner. We should get the statistics on how many MPs have actually collected after that period.

We should look at the issue of double dipping. That is when one gets a pension from the House, leaves the House and takes another government position, such as being a judge, and receives more money from the government. Should one be allowed to collect the pension and the other salary? Those are the kinds of things that the commission should look into.

We in the NDP support good pensions for people. We have always done that in the House of Commons. However we want them to be fair pensions.

These are very tough times for the average citizen. We have to cut back. We have to pay our fair share of taxes. We have to look at everything.

I am a Scottish Canadian and am accused of being a bit cheap occasionally. I do not believe that but some of my friends believe that. If I had my way I would cut back even the little things.

While some of us may say that the pension amount is a small amount we still have to consider that, so that there can be more money available for health and education. We have to look at all our expenditures.

While we are doing that we should look at pensions for senators. If I had my druthers I would just abolish the Senate completely and we could save a heck of a lot of money there. At some point the government might get around to considering that.

Let me sum up by saying that we MPs should be no different than average citizens. We deserve fair pensions but should not place ourselves on a pedestal and be different from average citizens. What is good for the average citizen should be good for MPs and vice versa. That is why an independent commission should have another look at MPs' pensions.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the debate on this motion urging the government to contract an independent, non-governmental agency to review all salaries, allowances, benefits and pensions of members of Parliament and senators and make recommendations on these to the House.

Clearly this is a matter of some importance to all members of this House. I would first like to direct hon. members' attention to what the government has already proposed be done regarding a review of members' pensions and benefits.

When the President of the Treasury Board spoke last year in this House on the second reading of Bill C–55 he outlined the approach the government intended to adopt regarding a review of this nature. The President of the Treasury Board said the first priority was to bring the MPs' pension plan in line with the requirements of the Income Tax Act and regulations by enactment of an amendment contained in Bill C–55.

However, he stated that the government was aware that pension arrangements for members of Parliament had been subject to public scrutiny and therefore all aspects of the plan would be re–examined, including those features which have been criticized as being too generous.

The President of the Treasury Board made it clear that the views of hon. members would be a key element in this review since the government is very much aware of the importance members attach to their retiring allowances as part of their over–all compensation packages. Nevertheless the President of the Treasury Board added that he was aware hon. members shared his concerns and some members of the public have been vocal in their criticism that MPs' pension plans are too far out of line with general practice.

Therefore the President of the Treasury Board told members of this House: "To be credible a review of the parliamentary pension arrangements must also provide for a specific input from the public and the views of those independent of Parliament will be actively solicited in this study". I should add that this approach is quite in keeping with the government's intention with respect to the broad review of Public Service pension arrangements announced by the President of the Treasury Board in December 1991 and reiterated when Bill C–55 received second reading. That review closely involved the major stakeholders in pension plans as well as many other interested parties.

To return to the motion before us, it must be said that there is strong agreement in principle with the motion of the member for Calgary Southwest. While the government recognizes the position of some hon. members that the review agency should be independent and non–partisan I am sure hon. members would agree that the review process must also take into account the views and interests of sitting and retired members of Parliament who are pension plan members and pensioners. I know hon. members attach great importance to their pensions as a very significant element in their compensation package.

A truly independent non–governmental agency will be able to provide us with an objective assessment of our present compensation package in relation to our duties and responsibilities as members of Parliament. It will also examine all elements of our benefits package in relation to the benefits packages of others who serve in public life, such as provincial MLAs and those serving in the legislatures of other countries such as the United States of America, the United Kingdom and so forth. Once this data has been gathered and analysed we will be in a position to determine the most suitable vehicle for examining whether adjustments should be made and the nature of those adjustments.

Finally, I could put on the record the fact that it would appear most hon. members from all sides of the House, while aware of public criticism of their pension arrangements, see their pension plan as an important part of the over–all compensation package attached to their jobs as elected representatives. Such pensions make it possible for all Canadians, including those of modest means, to consider running for public office. I am aware of a number of hon. members for whom the pension plan was a critical part of their decision to seek elected office. These pensions are, in part, intended to compensate for the sacrifices involved in public life, including the lost career opportunities and the lack of controlled retirement planning which is part and parcel of that life.

We all recognize that some former members have gone on from parliamentary careers to hold other public offices, but there are many more who have returned to private life to attempt to re–establish themselves. It might also be mentioned that about half the serving members never receive any pension at all, since members must be elected twice or be here for six years to qualify for a pension. A member contributes 11 per cent of his salary toward the pension, a feature of the plan that is not mentioned very often by critics. There are many out there who believe that we do not contribute anything at all to our pensions.

As was evident from the debate in the House during the passage of Bill C-55, I have in mind particularly the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, many members do not believe that their pensions are excessively generous. They look at pensions in the context of the member's over-all compensation and in the context of the sacrifices inherent in public life. Many members do not believe that the citizens' coalition has the support of most Canadians.

Nonetheless the government is on record as favouring a review of MPs' pensions and will be soliciting and seriously examining concerns of the public in that context.

I know that all members will be eager to make their views known and that the government may expect co-operation from all members in this process.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise in support of this motion put forward by the member for Calgary Southwest. I will be splitting my time with my colleague from St. Boniface.

I am a member from the downtown Toronto area. We see and hear most often the advertisements from the National Citizens' Coalition which buys full-page advertisements in The Toronto Star, The Toronto Sun, and the odd time in The Globe and Mail. The theme of this particular campaign of analysing the pensions of MPs is to basically discredit the system and discredit members of Parliament.

I have a background in the private sector and have been exposed to many successful entrepreneurs in this country and can honestly say, having had five years' experience as a member of Parliament, that I have met very few entrepreneurs in this country who worked as hard as 90 per cent of the MPs I have met and worked with in this House of Commons. In fact some of the hardest working entrepreneurs in this country, who are making $300,000, $400,000, $500,000, or over $1 million a year, do not in any way, shape or form do the same amount of travelling, put in the hours, give out their private telephone numbers and are not on duty almost seven days a week, sometimes 24 hours a day.

This campaign put forward by the National Citizens' Coalition is a total sham in that it does not accurately portray what really goes on in the Parliament of Canada, in committees or in constituencies, which is too bad because it puts a stain on each and every member and ultimately does not do anyone in this country a service.

However I, as the member for Calgary Southwest stated in her motion, have enough confidence, as do most members in this House, that what we are saying should not be analysed by a committee of the House. It should go to an independent body which should analyse salaries of MPs, their so-called benefits, and their pension plan. As the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said earlier today, very few people realize that the existing pension plan is not something that is gifted to MPs but is something they pay into. They pay a very generous sum of money. If the independent analysts say it should be deferred until the age of 55 or 60 is reached so be it. If they want to do that type of analysis I am sure every member of Parliament would support whatever recommendations they have.

The point I want to make, besides acknowledging that independent analysis is necessary, is that the problem we have is timing. We are about to go to the people of Canada in an election.

I think this independent committee should be set up immediately. We should not have a report back in six or eighteen months. This is something that can be done in 90 days. There is no need for this study to take an extended period of time. It is something that should be put to rest before it becomes an election issue, not created by the NDP, the Liberals or the Conservatives, but created by a third party because we have not dealt properly in this House with third party advertising.

I ask the member to urge her colleagues to put this motion to the House and ask for the report back within 90 days so that all of us in this House can vote on it.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this particular motion this morning. Colleagues will perhaps recall that this is the third time I have had an opportunity to speak on the issue of MPs' pensions in the House of Commons during the last four years.

I do not want to suggest I have been the only one because I have been joined by colleagues such as the members for Winnipeg St. James, Edmonton Southeast, Winnipeg North and others.

The basic issue here is that irresponsible statements are being made about MPs' pensions. It is also linked to another basic principle, and that is the fact that we make those rules. In order to make sure that there is some fairness and objectivity brought into this highly sensitive issue at this particular point in time, it is particularly important to make sure it is an independent third party that makes those kinds of decisions.

After having reviewed I would suggest not only MPs' salaries, pensions and other benefits but those of members of the Senate, legislative assemblies, councils, the private sector and other organizations, we will see if there is a pattern.

Surely what we all want is an element of fairness. I believe even those who have been critical want us to be remunerated and benefit in a fair way. Until it is we who make the rules, until it is we who continue to decide what it is we are going to get, we are going to have this kind of difficulty. In fact we are open to attacks such as my colleague has just mentioned where people make unfair statements.

There are a number of MPs who because of their decision to run for Parliament—and it was their decision—will be getting less money from their pensions. There are numbers of individuals and I happen to be one of them. I am not at all being critical of that. It was I who decided to run but I am not the only one. It is rather interesting when you are attacked. It is always the examples of the extreme situation. I would very much like to have an independent third party commissioned to review this plan.

There are a number of anomalies and I will mention them very briefly. We cap at 75 per cent and the general public, normally 70 per cent of our salaries. People do not like that. If my memory serves me correctly we do not have to work nearly the same number of years to get the 50 per cent pension. That is held in high esteem by many people.

There is the issue of double dipping, getting a job once one has in fact resigned from elected office or has not been re-elected. That annoys a lot of people. There are provisions for early retirement that are enjoyed nowhere else.

I really believe that this independent commission could in fact look at each one of these issues, address them in the context of what is happening in terms of pensions in the private and public sectors and then render a verdict of which we would have to take cognizance.

I could say a lot about it. As I just said, this is the third time that I have had an opportunity to speak on it. What I want above all is some fairness. We are being attacked now—and I understand that there are some grounds for it—but some things are being exaggerated as well. This does not mean that some things should not be changed, because I think that some things here should be altered. However I would like to have a review carried out by an independent non-governmental organization.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the item is dropped from the Order Paper.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS ACT

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications) moved that Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, almost 84 years ago the Right Hon. George Percy Graham, the Minister of Railways and Canals, rose in this House of Commons to introduce the Railway Act. It was a well crafted piece of legislation and in it were many of the principles that guide Canadian transportation and communications policy to this day.

I recently leafed through some of the debates on the Railway Act and found it most compelling that the members were concerned about the very things that concern members in this House today.

In the early days of this century the railroad was vital as both a tool of communication and a major commercial venture. As a result, early legislators recommended that the government exercise some control over this key sector while encouraging competition wherever possible. They proposed establishing a federal body to regulate the railways, which is an ancestor of the CRTC which regulates communications today. They also raised concerns about how to manage new technology and regulate telephone rates, especially long distance charges.

Robert Borden, who did not yet carry the title right honourable, described his approach this way: "The government has adopted the system of private ownership with public control. Of that system it may be said that it is very much better than private ownership without public control". It was a good principle then and it is still sound now.

Times have changed and legislation designed for steam engines and Morse code is not well suited to a world of satellites and microchips. In 1908, space travel and modern telecommunications were confined to the literary world of Jules Verne. In 1992, Canadian astronauts Roberta Bondar and Steve MacLean circled the earth in a space shuttle well beyond the imaginings of those early science fiction writers.

Telecommunications has progressed from being an infant industry to one of the fastest growing sectors of our economy. Our recent history demonstrates just how impressive that growth has been. From 1988 to 1990 the Canadian economy grew by 4.6 per cent, 2.6 per cent and .3 per cent respectively. During those same years the growth rates of the telecommunications industry were 9.6 per cent, 14.2 per cent and 8.6 per cent, impressive numbers by any standard.

The telecommunications industry is almost wholly Canadian owned and 90 per cent privately held. It is an essential instrument of our economic development, not simply because it is a dynamic and growing industry but also because it acts as a catalyst to the competitiveness of many other industries. Without a telecommunications system that is on the front edge of modern technology, our banks, transport companies, retail industry, financial services and countless others would not be able to compete in international markets.

It is no longer possible to seek future solutions in past practices. This fact has not been lost on our trading competitors. The Japanese have targeted telecommunications as a prime interest and the Europeans have made it an essential part of their 1992 market unification. The Americans, our chief trading partners, have already completed a telecommunications reform which has given them a highly competitive system at both the domestic and international levels. We ignore these facts at our own peril.

Business, think-tanks and government studies alike have concluded that a modern legislative framework is crucial to Canada's ability to compete in telecommunications. Unfortunately, we do not have modern and efficient legislation. While Robert Borden and George Percy Graham are long since gone, our telecommunications industry is still governed by the Railway Act of 1908, which is so dated that it is not even used to regulate the railways any more.

[Translation]

The Railway Act was designed for a world of small, fragmented markets that adopted new technologies very gradually. That world has disappeared for good.

• (1205)

Anyone who doubts this should look at how the way new technologies are implemented has changed.

The first camera did not come on the market until 112 years after it was invented. It took 56 years for the first telephone, 35 years for radio, 15 years for radar and only 12 for television.

In the case of transistors, it took only three years, and only two for solar batteries. In microelectronics, the lag is now less than 18 months.

Because of this development, to be competitive today, a business must be able to determine, target and penetrate new markets faster than ever before.

The road to success is difficult and challenging, and the last thing our businesses need is to find their path strewn with regulatory barriers.

Nevertheless, reports, commissions and studies have told us repeatedly that Canadian businesses are faced with an overwhelming number of regulatory barriers. One of this government's main objectives has been to take down those barriers.

In his 1992 budget, my colleague, the Minister of Finance, announced a full review of government regulations in order to simplify procedures as much as possible.

The CRTC became part of this process last summer, when it completed the most thorough review in its history and announced its decision to allow competition on the long-distance market.

[English]

It must be clear to everyone here today that the Railway Act, which was designed to control monopoly activities, is not compatible with an ever changing competitive marketplace.

The telecommunications industry has been restructured to accommodate competition. We still have legislation in place which inhibits competition. For the restructuring to make sense we need new legislation. We simply cannot have one without the other.

Three years ago the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that members of Telecom Canada fell within federal jurisdiction. Since then we have successfully concluded agreements with six of the seven provinces affected. Now we need to build on those agreements. We must pull the current patchwork of legislation into one bill designed to encourage efficiency and excellence and help us compete in international markets.

Bill C-62 will do exactly that. It will eliminate the barriers which fragment our internal market, leaving us with one unified telecommunications market. It will establish a coherent policy for the entire country that will be co-ordinated by one regulatory agency, the CRTC.

Bill C-62 will give us a more regulatory framework, allowing the CRTC to forbear from regulating in those areas where the marketplace is already competitive. It will promote Canadian ownership and control of telecommunications carriers, thereby contributing to Canadian sovereignty. It will permit the government, which is responsible through Parliament to the Canadian public, to make broad public policy decisions by issuing directives to the CRTC when it is appropriate to do so.

This bill will guarantee sensitivity to regional needs, giving people who are far away from Ottawa an unprecedented degree of participation. Finally, it will give the CRTC new powers to protect consumers from invasions of privacy such as the transmission of unsolicited advertising by telephone or fax.

Most members are already aware that I am very concerned that as we embrace new technology for its benefits we must also be aware of its limitations. Cellular telephones, for example, give callers incredible range and mobility, yet offer little more protection than simply shouting across the street.

Automatic telephone dialing equipment can give business a competitive edge, but it can also lead to a proliferation of unsolicited and sometimes intrusive telemarketing calls. No one knows this better than our colleagues from the Toronto region where the problem is especially acute. They have scores of written complaints to prove it.

Fax machines have revolutionized the exchange of printed and graphic information, but they have also opened a new channel for junk mail. Unlike its posted equivalent, the junk fax has the added disadvantage of arriving at the expense of the recipients. It uses their paper and ties up their phone lines and machines when others may want to use them for legitimate purposes.

Because of such concerns, I have explicitly included privacy in the policy objectives of Bill C-62 as well as a section which deals specifically with unsolicited telecommunications.

These provisions will give the CRTC the regulatory authority required to ensure the greatest possible level of privacy protection for Canadian consumers. By addressing privacy concerns, the bill goes hand in hand with changes we are making to the Radiocommunications Act and the establishment of the private sector telecommunications privacy protection agency.

Both the industry and consumers will benefit when Bill C-62 is adopted. In fact, the bill has met with widespread support across the country, because it will improve market conditions for both users and suppliers.

However, we must not forget it is not easy to develop legislation to adjust to a rapidly evolving sector, and it should come as no surprise that a number of questions about the intent and scope of the bill have been raised.

Some people feel that Bill C-62 would give cabinet too many powers, questioning the need for issuing directives. The philosophy behind this power is based on the principle that decisions on basic government policy should be made by the government, not by the regulatory body.

The purpose of this particular section is not to involve the minister in specific matters of regulatory procedure. Such matters come under the jurisdiction of the CRTC. However, I believe that decisions on basic government policy should be made by elected representatives, not by appointed administrators.

There are people who believe the bill gives the government too much leeway, and there are as many who believe the opposite. Others doubt the market will function in a responsible manner.

Although in my opinion this is a balanced piece of legislation, I am open to suggestions for improvement. In fact, a number of interesting proposals have been made so far.

[English]

In particular, I am thinking of the pre-study of Bill C-62, which was conducted by the Senate Committee on Transport and Communications last spring. I was pleased that the committee approved the three main objectives of the bill: to increase the competitiveness of the telecommunications industry; to promote Canadian ownership and control; and to ensure that Canadians have access to reliable and affordable services.

I appreciate the thoughtful and non-partisan changes the senators suggested with the view to strengthening the bill's effectiveness. As I indicated to the Senate committee, the government is always open to improvements, provided the basic principles behind this legislation are not compromised.

I have carefully studied comments made with respect to the proposed licensing regime: regulatory forbearance; the terms of federal-provincial consultation; the bill's objectives section; ways to improve regulatory efficiency; and other key issues.

The government will be proposing a number of amendments to Bill C-62, which are strongly influenced by the Senate committee's recommendations. I will speak to these amendments early during the House committee's considerations.

There has already been much said and written about Bill C-62. Some groups have expressed specific concerns, but we have also heard almost universal support for the goal of updating a legislative framework which is over 80 years old. Bill C-62, which is the product of many years of consultation, is the best solution.

Industry will win by having one national market, national standards across the country and a simplified and more flexible regulatory system. Provinces will win by having more productive businesses and more input in setting policy than ever before in the history of our country. Canadians as a people will win because we will be able to build upon the strengths of our one great winner in the high-tech field. Canadians as individuals will benefit by having guaranteed base levels of service across the country no matter where they live.

For most Canadians telecommunications regulation is a fairly arcane business. At first glance it appears to be of great interest to only a few select people who are active in the industry. However this bill is not only important to telephone companies. It will mean benefits for banks, hospitals, airlines, the transport and retail industries, and a host of other businesses. Since we all use these services it means that every consumer in Canada will be affected in a positive way.

The bill means jobs because it will help Canada's premier high-tech industry to become more competitive than ever before. It means new and better services will come to market more quickly as we strip away excessive regulation and encourage research and development.

Finally, this bill means that each and every one of us can expect first-class affordable service in our homes or at our businesses.

Back in 1908 our predecessors in this House of Commons showed extraordinary vision in passing the Railway Act, a law that would remain in place for the better part of a century. Today a new century is on the horizon. Bill C-62 is a worthy successor to the Railway Act. In passing it we will do more than simply place an eminently useful law on the statute books. It will enable Canadians to face the telecommunications challenges of the year 2000 with confidence.

I believe it is a challenge that is worthy of each and every one of us in this House of Commons. When we talk to Canadians today we find that they recognize that we benefit in Canada from the best telecommunications industry anywhere in the world. Industry says that we need to ensure that innovation can continue and that the conditions are in place to allow competition to improve services for consumers and to allow new goods and services to be brought onto the market as quickly as possible. That is the challenge that faces each and every one of us.

As I indicated earlier, the government has very closely listened to suggestions for improvements to the bill. Today I repeat to my colleagues on the opposition side of the House that we will continue to take an approach that is consultative and open. We welcome input from them and other Canadians with regard to improvements that can be made to the bill.

However we are also prepared to act. As I indicated earlier in my remarks today, when the bill goes to committee we will be prepared to place before the committee at an early date substantive amendments to make improvements to the bill as a result of the hearings that were held before the Senate committee.

What is required now is for this House of Commons to act quickly to permit this bill to go to committee, to allow the government to table those amendments before the committee, to allow improvements to be made to the legislation and to allow us to put this legislation in place for the benefit of every Canadian. This legislation is modern and will bring benefits to every single region of Canada, ensure that Canadian industry becomes more competitive, better protect the privacy of Canadians, and help to protect and enhance the productivity of our country and create a wealthier society in which Canadians can live in the future.

I call upon all members of this House to give their speedy, favourable consideration to this legislation. It deserves the support of every member of this House just as it deserves the support of every Canadian from one coast to another.

Mr. Speaker, there has been consultation among the parties in this House and I believe that you will find consent for the following motion. I move:

> That a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture be authorized to consider Bill C–62, an act respecting telecommunications, and report thereon directly to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the terms of the motion. Is there unanimous consent to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, we certainly agree with the moving of this bill into a knowledgeable committee that will listen and understand its complexities and at the same time reach the goals so clearly enunciated in the speech that has just been delivered by the minister, in which he said we will have better jobs, new competitive services, and increased research and development, if and when substantive amendments are brought forward.

• (1220)

That is all very well and good and I am looking forward to that reality. To date that reality has only been a series of promises. As we all know, the devil is in the detail and the proof is in the pudding, so I wait with a great deal of interest to see what the minister intends to bring forth under this Bill C–62 with respect to the amendments he has so comfortably spoken about intending to present.

It is very true that as the member representing Mount Royal, in which there are some important telecommunications companies, I have had the privilege of looking out into society and recognizing that telecommunications is certainly the highway, the railroad of today and tomorrow and that changes absolutely must be made. Of this there is no doubt.

There is doubt in my mind about how this government is prepared to stand here today and call for the speedy convening of the standing committee to study this matter and the speedy forward movement of this bill given the fact that this bill has had an incredibly long history. It was drafted in 1987, and here we are now in 1993 looking at something in a field in which technology has changed so dramatically.

The minister even reminded this House about the spaceships that are circling the world. He did not mention, but I will, the Canadarm, which was made in the Montreal area, and Roberta Bondar, of whom all of us are very proud. We are very proud of those changes, but they have taken place within the last blink of an eyelash. It is more than time that this government, which made all kinds of promises in 1984, brought this bill forward.

I agree that we need to deal swiftly with this bill but I would suggest that we have some serious problems with this bill. Although the minister has said that he will speak to and bring in a series of substantive amendments I would like to bring to the attention of the public and the industry the concerns that were raised at the Senate hearings. The briefing book of what was said at those hearings is on my desk. I intend to quote from it and I hope that the minister, and I will take him seriously when I hear the amendments presented, has really and truly listened.

This whole procedure has not been as I envisaged the process. It has not been a constructive and open process. This is not the kind of process that even the candidates today are saying we need. We need a more open process. I doubt that it should be rushed through per se. It should be rushed through if and when it becomes an improved bill. From the indications of the minister, which I will take as given, those changes, if constructive, certainly will allow the quick process.

I want to bring to the attention of this House and of Canadians an excerpt from the brief of the Civil Liberties Union to the Senate, in which it said: "It is necessary to be able to discuss the evolution of telecommunications in open debate conducted by an independent specialized regulatory body. This is even more necessary because new developments will increasingly involve issues of rights and freedoms. Unfortunately, it seems that in the bill as now written, the privacy tree hides the forest of rights and freedoms in question and that practical measures for their consideration are lacking. Mechanisms for the social, legal and economic evaluation of major projects are an assurance of democratic control over the evolution of our telecommunications system."

• (1225)

I think that is an avertissement of importance.

The Liberal Party takes telecommunications issues just as seriously as it does the parliamentary process. We are not a rubber stamp to approve a flawed bill. It is not the opposition but the minister and his government who are responsible for coming in here at the eleventh hour with this bill saying:"Trust me on the amendments". My trust goes only so far to the concrete act. It becomes very difficult for anyone to support a bill going to committee about which the minister himself has raised questions and indicated change.

Having said that, we do put the interests of the Canadian telecommunications industry above that of the minister, the House leader and the government. The messy handling of this bill should not constrain the industry. We should move forward in the standing committee as quickly as possible and make the necessary amendments to clean up this bill.

Let me address for a moment the question of why this bill is so important. The landscape has truly changed. Telecommunications is now Canada's electronic railroad of the 1990s. It employs more than 100,000 Canadians and generates over $20 billion in revenues. I appreciate the minister's updating of certain financial factors and I will look at that with a great deal of interest.

It has emerged as an important and strategic industry for our entire economy and it can help us create the knowledge intensive, value added, high technology jobs of the future. It can help Canada locate these jobs where people are, often outside of traditional business centres and particularly in our regions. It can be an economic tool for growth and employment.

All of this cannot happen by itself. As an industry that remains highly regulated the telecommunications sector requires the appropriate government policy, legislative and regulatory environment in which to succeed. While there is private ownership the need for ongoing public control is apparent.

This is why Bill C–62, with proper amendments and improvements, is a fundamentally important bill. It is also why we are so disappointed that it took nine years for the government to produce this bill and almost another full year before it got around to second reading. These delays say a great deal about this Conservative government's commitment to telecommunications. The delays and inactions going back to 1984 were not only poor public policy choices at the time but over time have contributed to a closed door, behind the scenes decision-making process which in the end led us to this flawed bill.

In addition to these flaws the government's failure to lead a national discussion on telecommunications policy means Canada has never developed a clear strategy in consensus with Canadians.

This government never sat down to look at the telecommunications industry, study how its various component parts work together, and come up with some very clear directions. It may well have done this behind the closed doors of the minister's office and around the table with the interested industry, but did it hear from the Canadian public? Not to the degree it should have. This is the approach that should have taken place. It is a view that would have been supported by large numbers of witnesses that came before the Senate pre-study hearings on this bill.

Once the strategy had been developed the government opposite could then have proceeded to the hearings, because at least it moved to have the pre-study hearings for which the minister deserves a thank you and some appreciation. Why did the minister not take the next step and move into a consultative mechanism when he noted that so many flaws were found in that bill by so many different sectors of the industry?

Unfortunately we are now stuck with the results: no national strategy and a flawed bill that needs a lot of work. There was never a white paper, a green paper, or any thorough public review of telecommunications issues. This government never asked the people of Canada what their goals were, what they wanted to see in their telephone system, what their privacy concerns were, or whether they were being met. Over the last nine years we never saw an open process that invited the business community to come on in and have its say and put its comments on record.

Let us go before the public before we draft the bill, not after. Once the bill was drafted, then amendments were needed, so let us see if the amendments suit. It would be a far easier mechanism and would certainly reflect what the public is saying which is that they would like to have a say in major areas of this nature.

As a matter of fact I believe the Minister of Communications had a very important study done on cable and telephone convergence and their networks. Even this study was done behind closed doors. There was never any public discussion about that convergence. Not one part of this bill reflects the thinking or the findings of that study. In fact cable is left almost outside the bill. I do not think it is the best way to move to a new vision about telecommunications which could be reflected both in the role that the private sector would have and in the public policy that would be brought forward.

Despite the glowing words from the Conservative ministers, the Minister for International Trade, the hon. member for Frontenac and Flora MacDonald, they have never produced a vision to match the rhetoric.

Let us briefly review these commitments. We can go as far back as a statement of the Minister for International Trade in 1984. In the economic statement he said: "There is a clear need for a national telecommunications policy to take advantage of the opportunities presented by rapidly advancing technology and the growing demand by Canadians for new telecommunication services". He then added: "Through the regulatory reform, the government can spur innovation and provide a major stimulus to the Canadian economy". Yet there was never a bold strategy leading to Bill C-62.

We can go to the speech of the member for Frontenac to the Canadian Bar Association on February 12, 1986 where he stated: "The fundamental revision of the policy and regulatory framework which allows the telecommunication industry to realize its potential has thus become a priority for me and for the government. I tackled reforms head on while establishing the basic principle that should inspire it". We never ever heard about those basic principles; no strategy paper, no green paper, no white paper, no paper of any colour. Here we are today with detailed legislation before the House.

Then there was Flora MacDonald's paper in 1987, "Communications for the 21st Century". She said: "In spite of our past achievements in communications, Canada has not reacted to the changes that are taking place in our own economy and the larger world in the same way as other advanced industrial nations. We have been content to rest on our laurels to cope with the challenges of the new environment. It is time to call this complacency into question". This was in 1987 and she drafted her type one and type two memo.

Now we have the present minister, who tabled this bill in February 1992, who four months later at the Senate pre-study said: "To delay its"—that is Bill C-62—"implementation would be to slow the growth of an industry which is vital to the Canadian economy". I could not agree more strongly with his comments.

Here we are over a year after introduction and after the Senate report and this bill is only now coming for second reading in the House of Commons.

Canadians can see that the government left this industry in a substantial policy vacuum while pillars of the sector were developing extremely rapidly. The government never kept up with the pace of changes, never addressed how the environment was progressing and therefore never demonstrated a clear understanding of what needed to be done. That is why we have this flawed bill which was deposited last February.

The Senate pre-study held promise and yet the minister has let it lie on the shelf for almost a year. Now he has alluded today that there will be changes. Other than the allusions, I sincerely await with almost bated breath to see if the changes will be brought forward.

In essence the government left Canada labouring under century old legislation and a long series of ad hoc decisions affecting the pillars of this industry. That is the onset of competition, the privatization of Telesat and Teleglobe, tremendous advances in technology and services, the problems around cellular telephones, all with no coherent or co-ordinated approach from government, something the Liberals called on this government to produce for years.

What do we have in Bill C-62 and what should be the goals? I would suggest that it must provide a fresh direction for the telecommunication sector so it can maximize the benefits to every Canadian of the world-wide information revolution in terms of learning, literacy, education, training and communicating. It must bring the marvels of this revolution from our biggest cities to our outermost communities.

The bill, which was introduced last February, is far from what the country needs. If the government truly wishes to enhance the efficiency and competitiveness at the national and international levels of Canadian telecommunications, the lack of clarity, the ambiguity in many sections of the bill will prove a hindrance in this pursuit and many companies will be spending a heck of a lot of time in the courts of this land in costly litigation trying to disentangle this very tangled web. This is counterproductive.

Let me turn to a number of issues in this bill which are very serious. First let me deal with how the bill addresses the question of acting on the Supreme Court ruling in the Alberta government telephone case.

Liberals supported the bill's attempt at unifying national jurisdiction over telecommunications. We supported the Supreme Court in August 1989 when it ruled on the AGT case which largely found in favour of federal jurisdiction over telecommunications. We believe Canada needs harmonized rules and regulations governing this sector if all Canadians are to have equal access to the benefits of the information revolution and that we do not have interruptions as a result of interprovincial wars and concerns.

How the transition rules will work and how regional sensitivities will be taken into account certainly need to be studied in committee where restructuring is needed. Through the CRTC we need to have real competition, not pretend competition.

With respect to definitions, I had mentioned that there was a serious list of concerns that perhaps were going to end us up in the courts with a lot of litigation. Right within the definition section alone there is concern from the Canadian Bar Association on the definition of rate. What is and how do you determine a rate? The suggestion made was that the word charge in the definition of rate be replaced. There was a series of concerns around how the word rate is used.

Under the telecommunications common carrier, we have concerns with respect to how this term is to be defined. I suggest the following observations made by Fonorola although there are many that are made in exactly the same language.

Fonorola would like to ensure that resellers are not covered by the definition contained in clause 2 under the heading telecommunications, common carrier, that is a person who owns or operates transmission facilities used to provide the telecommunications services to the public for compensation. Since there is more than one category of resellers, it would be important for Parliament to exclude specifically those businesses operating in the field.

Another point of view was the Canadian Satellite Users Association. It felt it was vital to its members that the minister's statement that resellers are not included in this bill be unambiguously reflected in the language of the legislation.

The Government of Saskatchewan had a series of concerns. "No one has any idea where the reseller business in Canada is ultimately headed" it said. However, regardless of this, the bill takes pains to ensure they are permanently excluded from any form of regulation, contrary to what the others have said.

Telesat says: "A telecommunications regulatory regime sufficient to ensure the CATV industry competes fairly with other common carriers has to be devised". That is only with respect to telecommunication carriers.

The radiocommunications industry says: "Our members are already regulated by the Department of Communications under the Radiocommunications Act". There is an obvious question of overlapping jurisdiction.

Just in the field of telecommunications common carrier there is concern. Under teletransmission facility in clause 2, the CRTC says that of particular concern to them is the ambiguity of the critical definition of transmission facility which is woven into the other definitions in question.

The commission recommends that the ambiguity in the definition be removed by clearly setting out what is meant to be included and excluded. Telesat says that the company finds the definitions of telecommunication facility and transmission facility cumbersome and confusing. The confusion must be corrected through redrafting.

The Communications and Electrical Workers of Canada say that a certain exclusion such as wiring and other matters will prevent the CRTC from exercising its full regulatory powers over telephone apparatus and indoor wiring. This would force telephone subscribers to buy and service their own indoor wiring. The exclusion could also affect the CRTC's rate determination process with respect to installation and service charges as well as telephone set rental rates.

I suggest there is a problem around transmission facilities that needs to be cleared up. The Canadian Bar Association has a problem with that definition. It says: "If resellers are not in fact captured by the legislation, entry into the resale market will be entirely free under Bill C–62 regardless of the citizenship or nationality of the reseller. Given the uncertainty as to the application of the bill to non–facilities based resellers, in our view it would be most useful if the government's intentions were clarified directly in the bill". We need this for greater clarity.

The Canadian Bar Association adds, and I bring this to the minister's attention in case he has not had the opportunity to read it: "This is not something we have discussed with the rest of the section but it seems that it would probably be more useful to focus on exactly what kind of activity it is the government wishes to trigger in the legislation rather than any particular technology, not least because the technology change is so fast in this business".

We can then look at the definition of a Canadian carrier. The Canadian Labour Congress brings to our attention it is very important that we may not be able to regulate someone outside of Canada. How does the minister intend to handle this particular issue?

The Government of Newfoundland says that generally the definitions of transmission facility, Canadian common carrier, common carrier facility service are confusing, that it is a jungle.

The CBTA in the discussion of exclusive federal jurisdiction and Communications Canada has said: "We want a clear statement from this government that federal jurisdiction over telecommunications is not on the table. Further that jurisdiction over the sector will be held inviolate from provincial encroachment in the future".

Fonorola has said:

"Fonorola would like to note that it is in favour of a single statute and a single regulatory agency in the field of telecommunications because this is a field where fragmentation plays against all Canadian and Quebecois businesses. The U.S. commission, the FCC, covers the 51 states, and the size of our country does not allow for scattered jurisdictions. This would be counterproductive and run against current international trends in the sector."

[English]

Rogers has said the lack of unified regulatory jurisdiction over Canada's major telephone companies have in Cantel's case resulted in significant provincial trade barriers and has inhibited the development of the national cellular service.

I would suggest that the lack of uniform regulatory jurisdiction, whether through negotiations with the provinces or through the CRTC being divided up in regional councils, needs to be looked at very carefully because we do not want to have de facto what cannot be done in any other way.

The government did establish the power of direction providing for broad policy directives to be issued by a Governor in Council as guidance to the CRTC in the broadcast act. Having that power in this bill for telecommunications matters is not a surprise but it raises a red flag of concern when the minister is establishing this new power of direction in telecommunications matters and maintaining the power to vary and rescind CRTC decisions at the same time.

In essence the minister and the cabinet will be able to intervene both at the front end and the back end of the process, effectively turning the CRTC into a rubber stamp. To paraphrase what the Royal Bank representatives had to say when they appeared before the Senate, the minister and the Governor in Council will have so much control over the process that it is of concern.

The Canadian Bar Association says there is too much potential for political interference. It points out: "To grant to the government both of these powers would signal a significant departure from the principle of the independence of specialized administrative tribunals".

Clause 9 goes into exemptions. The question of the Governor in Council giving itself the broad power of exemption must be examined very closely. I agree with the Senate report that the CRTC should deal with the exemptions when they come up.

The CRTC said: "We think that the exemption power as proposed in the legislation opens the door in that area too widely, that it could be proscribed to ensure that we achieve the objectives that the drafters of the legislation obviously had in mind without opening it up to enable all types of carriers to be exempt. It would simply be a matter of rewriting the legislation to narrow it to specific classes, categories or sizes of carriers so that the smaller carriers that the government would like to relieve of some of these regulatory requirements could be accommodated and the major carriers that move and shake this industry in this country would not be exempted. They would continue to have to comply with the regulatory regime". Therefore, the CRTC believes it is much broader in scope and it needs to be defined and constrained so as not to be used to totally exempt any carrier, including Bell Canada.

I agree with the Senate recommendation that the Governor in Council vary or rescind power should be substituted with the set aside and refer back power now in use in broadcasting and that a timetable be established for cabinet to deal with appeals. I also believe it is worth considering the Canadian Bar Association's suggestion that clause 13 be amended so that the cabinet in making its decisions must exercise this power in a manner consistent with the purpose and objectives of the bill.

With respect to provincial consultation, in this transition to uniform national regulation in telecommunications, because of the Supreme Court's 1989 AGT ruling it would be useful to have a mechanism for regional input. However, clause 14 dealing with provincial consultation must not create an open-ended, almost veto power with provincial consultation over federal decisions that would inhibit the working of an effective national telecommunications policy. Exactly what limits are appropriate under this clause must be carefully examined at committee.

I note with great interest the minister's new power to set technical standards in the bill. I suggest there are pros and cons to this matter. In the matter of setting national and international standards for interconnection, we would have to look at this clause because I gather that it is not so clear.

With respect to the minister's licensing carriers in clauses 17 to 23, the Liberal Party and I have already expressed great difficulty with the minister grabbing so many new powers in this bill, particularly in the area of licensing carriers. We have never been convinced of the benefits of licensing at the same time as there is the CRTC regulating telecommunication carriers. The question really is: Why would one want to politicize entry into this market? Why give the power to issue, renew and revoke licences, if the licence in the minister's opinion furthers the bill's telecommunications objectives for Canada, when the CRTC would still have to do the regulating anyway? It just seems strange and adds another layer of red tape which is not helpful. It places the minister, regardless of party, in the middle of a process that should be left up to the CRTC.

These straightforward arguments have been made clear to the government. Had it bothered to undertake an open public dialogue on these issues long before depositing the bill before us it would not have to be here with all these interventions. The minister should really have announced the removal of the licensing power which he gave himself right here in the House today.

On the Canadian ownership rules, if the minister is set to remove licensing from this bill then we will need to know how the criteria and objectives of the licensing regime will be met. Canadian ownership and control is one of the key areas. The minister stated so as he talked about increased competition and the need for local phone services.

We believe that we need to do everything we can to foster a strong, dynamic Canadian telecommunications system. We need to make sure that our own people, our own workers, our own researchers and scientists, our own manufacturers, our own software and hardware designers, all have a chance to prosper and remain on the leading edge of technology.

Let us make sure that there are sufficient safeguards in place so that Canadian interests are protected and when foreign companies come here net benefits to Canada are the top priority. Scrutiny will definitely be necessary as to how the 80 per cent domestic ownership requirements work, how the grandfathering will work, and how future ownership changes of any other company will fit these new rules.

It is who sits on that board and the percentage of their power that really makes the decisions. In short, we want to make sure what the intent of these domestic ownership provisions are and most important, that they work effectively in the national interest of Canada. We also want to see how this translates in terms of resellers and the so–called hybrid companies that need to be looked at.

There is merit in the Senate's suggestion on clause 29 which is that the minister is going to be permitted to define Canadian through regulations. The Senate found this provision to be unnecessary and I tend to agree with it on the face of it.

Forbearance is a major issue in this bill. In terms of the new forbearance power in those market segments where there is effective competition, where we are assured that it exists and continues to exist there is no problem. However, we must have the ability to come in and challenge if there is the least hint that the question of competition is being diminished or constrained. That is why we have to be very sure how we use it. It is not only its intent but the way it works in the public interest at all times.

I now understand that the CRTC agrees with it, but it must have the power to revisit and review. That is the responsibility of government where there is private ownership with public control. For Liberals, we know the concern out there is to avoid wholesale deregulation through an improperly worded forbearance clause. We want it confirmed that there are sufficient safeguards in place to protect consumers when this power is used and that situations can always be revisited.

On competition policy, let me echo something that the Senate alluded to and something I have been concerned about since the privatization of Telesat. That is the need for the competition bureau to have a more explicit role in the consultations with the CRTC and to give regular advice when it is needed in the regulation of the telecommunications industry. Concentration of ownership is a concern in our telecommunications sector.

I therefore concur with the Senate suggestion that the role of competition policy be addressed either directly by the director of the competition bureau or indirectly through a consultative mechanism being put into place in this bill between the CRTC and the competition bureau. The Senate referred to this being a need before the exercise of exemption and forbearance powers at the CRTC. I would go one step further to allow the competition bureau to be brought in on a general matter where its advice, counsel and expertise in the exercise of any of its powers is needed.

I would like to address the matter of the unsolicited telephone communications and telecommunications the minister talked about. Those are the junk phone calls and faxes. We have all been concerned about these phone calls and faxes for some time. The problem has always been in figuring out how we legislate an end to practices. I know they are a nuisance to seniors, families and individuals. We want to make sure that this bill does something concrete about this problem.

So far there are concerns that clause 46 addressing privacy does not go far enough. On the other hand, the serious telemarketing groups also want to make sure their livelihood continues. I expect that the committee will have some very serious testimony on this issue.

While on the subject of privacy I must say that the minister's bill may not be doing all that needs to be done, but neither then are some of his other announcements. He announced the creation of a paper tiger, the telecommunications privacy protective agency, funded by the same industry that generates many of the consumers' complaints. That is like putting the fox in charge of the hen house. We have yet to see something concrete. I am looking forward to seeing what the minister has to offer in this regard.

Concerning the subject of this great big headline "Dial-a-racist phone system thriving in Canada", and the method in which the minister sees the ability of the CRTC to handle these newspapers, telephone lines and faxes spreading their daily message of intolerance, today, the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising, is a good time to remember what intolerance can do. Bosnia-Hercegovina is another example of what happens when intolerance is allowed to be promoted through these telephone lines and faxes.

In conclusion, the Liberal Party will support this bill recognizing that amendments are needed. We are prepared to work to that end with the minister on the standing committee in the interests of Canada, regardless of the fact there has been a slow and messy approach to arriving at this particular moment. This is an historic moment and I am sure the minister deserves some credit. I just wish he had been a little quicker on his feet at the leadership level too.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in debate on Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications.

Bill C-62 proposes sweeping changes to the framework surrounding the telecommunications industry. Those changes reflect the Conservative government's insistence to deregulate and privatize wherever conceivable. We saw these kinds of things taking place when the Liberals were in government and tried to deregulate the airlines. I can remember going to those committees with our member from Regina and telling the government, the Liberals at that time, that it was the wrong thing to do. However, they persisted and we now see what has happened to the airlines because of the deregulations that took place then.

There is no doubt in the New Democratic Party's mind that this is another deregulation step because of the free trade agreements made with the United States. It is the patent drug legislation all over again, making it accessible for others to compete in Canadian markets.

While my colleagues and I have called for an updated telecommunications act to drive Canada into the 21st century, this is not the right vehicle. Canada's telecommunications industry generated $21 billion in revenue last year. It employs 125,000 people.

I will argue that this bill should not be passed at second reading for four main reasons. I understand that again the Liberals are prepared to go along with the government.

The first reason is very simple. According to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, second reading is the most important stage through which the bill is required to pass for its whole principle is then at issue and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House. According to the Minister of Communications this bill will undergo substantial amendments during the committee stage.

At one time the Department of Communications was asked to redraft this bill to take into account the substantial amendments recommended by the Senate transport committee which engaged in a pre-study of this bill. The minister alluded to that during his speech.

It is clearly not correct for this House to pass a bill in principle which will be altered fundamentally at committee stage. Government members may argue that the principle of this bill remains unchanged, but this bill contains seven sweeping policy objectives. Changing any of these policy objectives would undeniably alter the principle of the bill.

The Senate committee recommended changes to those policy objectives. How can any member of this House pass a piece of legislation in principle when the true form of the legislation will not be clear until the amendments are made? Yet that is what the Liberals have said they are prepared to do. They will follow along with the government's proposals.

The second reason this bill should not be passed is clear to anyone who pays a phone bill. In June 1992 the CRTC decided to open up the long distance market. It accepted Unitel's application and assertion that long distance competition would not cost consumers more. If this deregulation experiment fails, the CRTC's hands will be tied. Under this legislation every decision the CRTC makes must diminish regulation and at every turn increase competition.

According to what this government says, the more deregulation we have, the more Canadian consumers will benefit. According to the CRTC local rates would not increase as a result of long distance competition. Yet less than a year ago, after the CRTC decision, telephone companies across this country applied to the CRTC for rate increases left, right and centre.

The telephone companies are asking for these increases for one simple reason. The name of that is cross-subsidization and it is what has put our Canadian telephone system leagues ahead of foreign competitors.

Before the CRTC's June decision every long distance telephone call made by a consumer, small business or multinational corporation cross-subsidized local rates. I hope if this bill does go to committee that the minister will ensure that some pensioners will be able to come to that committee and express their concerns of what could happen to their rates and to their very vital, important communication with other groups. Our long distance rates were higher than they had to be, but for a reason. That was to offset the cost associated with local telephone services.

Local telephone services in Ottawa, Vancouver or Calgary can cost the telephone companies up to 10 times less than providing service to remote locations such as in northern and rural areas. Yet people living in those areas are not paying 10 times more than people living in Toronto, Vancouver or Calgary. It is because of cross-subsidization, which is what has made 92 per cent of Canadians say that they are happy with the telephone service.

Cross-subsidization has given more Canadians phone than in almost any other country in the world. Ninety-eight per cent of Canadians have a telephone. That is a higher penetration rate than in the United States and most European countries.

Bell Canada recently applied to the CRTC for a rate increase. If its application is accepted, local rates will jump as much as 65 per cent.

BC Tel has also asked for a substantial rate increase as well. It wants not only the recent rate increase in its local rates, but also increases in directory assistance, charges and service calls.

Alberta Government Telephones has applied for a 30 per cent increase on its local rates. Ron Liepert from Alberta Government Telephones said in February of this year: "Long distance rates have decreased by 40 per cent". This action means that the proposed 30 per cent increase in local rates is the other side of it.

Both BC Tel and Bell want to charge more for service calls and for directory assistance. These proposed increases all fly in the face of the government's continuing insistence that deregulation and competition will bring rates down.

Two separate reports have indicated that charges for local calls have increased world-wide when governments have accepted to reduce long distance rates through competition.

According to the Brussels based European Consumers Organization the gap in the cost of service is widening between small and large users in most nations.

This report that was released in early 1992 said that Canada is one of the most successful models of competition. It is important to note that this report was completed before the CRTC announced its decision to deregulate the long distance market and before this bill was passed.

It is obvious that we used to do things right. According to this report, countries that introduced competition the earliest have the largest gap in cost between small and large users.

A conclusion must be drawn that competition does not help consumers or small businesses. According to the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development, before long distance competition was introduced in Canada, our businesses paid less for their local calls than businesses in the U.S., France, Italy, Belgium, West Germany, Austria and Britain.

Again, before long distance competition was introduced, long distance rates for calls within Canada were 15 per cent below that of the OECD average. Prices for international business calls were 17 per cent lower than the OECD average.

The government's own briefing document which discussed the effects that long distance competition was likely to have states: "Competition will require gradual decreases in cross-subsidization and therefore increased rates. This will hit residential and small business users hardest while big business users will benefit". That is exactly the point we are trying to make. We do recognize that for many people in the outer areas the costs are greater and that the big users across the country should help subsidize those areas to ensure that they are available to them. However, the government seems to turn a blind eye to that.

This is according to the same government that keeps on spinning the same tired line that deregulation is going to save consumers money. We can rest assured that it is not going to save money for the average consumer in the small, remote areas.

In the same briefing document the Department of Communications quoted a Peat Marwick study that suggested that local rate increases over five years of between 13 per cent and 93 per cent would be required on a year-by-year basis. This represents 2 per cent to 12 per cent per annum. These increases correspond quite nicely with the increases requested by BC Tel and Bell.

Again, according to the government's document, the annual drop-off rate due to such changes could amount to 2,500 to 7,500 subscribers across Canada.

The chapter goes much further and limits the terms and conditions that Canada will be able to impose in the future. Specifically, legislators will be required to ensure that prices charged for telephone services are based on the economic costs directly related to providing such services.

Although NAFTA will allow cross-subsidization between our existing telephone companies to continue, we will not be able to require resellers to make the contribution payments that are necessary to support universal service. Again, this falls right in line with the government's free trade agreements.

This bill does nothing to prevent this erosion of cross-subsidization.. This bill actually encourages deregulation regardless of its effects on consumers and small businesses in Canada. There is no compassion for our seniors, many of whom cannot get out of their homes and the telephone is their vehicle by which they can communicate with their families. There is no compassion whatsoever.

Again I say to the minister that I hope seniors will be allowed to come to this committee to have their voices heard.

I have with me an advertisement from AT&T in The Wall Street Journal that says: "In 1993 this border will no longer be a barrier". The border they are talking about is the Canada-U.S. border.

This bill prevents foreign companies from owning more than 20 per cent of the telephone company. We think that this provision should have been put into legislation a long time ago.

The problem is that this provision is the only protection Canadian telephone companies are going to get with this legislation. The bill opens the door to resellers and AT&T could be considered a reseller under this legislation. AT&T has enough excess capacity to simply swallow all of Canada's telephone businesses within a hiccup.

In the United States, long distance service is subsidized by local rates. High local rates and local measured services are a fact of life for many Americans. That is why many Americans need telephone welfare or subsidized telephone service to be able to afford a telephone. That is the kind of service this legislation would bring us closer to.

Another reason that this bill should not be supported at second reading is that this bill as it stands now jeopardizes the arm's length relationship between the government and the CRTC. Not only does the legislation eliminate any semblance of independence between the CRTC and the government, this bill also makes a mockery of the process of public hearings.

This bill puts a collar around the neck of the CRTC and hands the leash to the government through regulations. Not only will the government have the power to review the CRTC's decisions but the Governor in Council will be able to direct the CRTC on broad policy measures. The Governor in Council will be able to exempt any class of carrier from the regulations contained in the act. We in this party are not prepared to give that kind of authority to government.

This bill will make the CRTC no more than an advisory body to the Governor in Council rather than an independent watch-dog of public interest. During the pre-study of this bill, the Senate committee noted that forbearance lies at the heart of Bill C-62. Indeed it does.

This government shamelessly promotes competition simply for competition's sake. This bill will ensure that the CRTC has no choice but to follow the government's lead. If this bill is passed, consumers will be at the whim of an industry trying to maximize its profits. The public will be put once again on the back burner.

Look at what is taking place right now regarding some of the things that have happened because of decisions that were made. On April 15 Alberta Government Telephones, AGT, announced over 1,000 job cuts. The president, Don Lowry, said that the job cuts to be phased in over nine months are largely in response to the bid by Unitel Communications to compete in the lucrative long distance market.

Look at the job cuts in BC Tel. Brian Canfield, president of BC Tel, announced on April 16 that his company was working to reduce staff size by 4 per cent this year through incentives. BC Tel has already seen 422 employees accept voluntary separation packages. BC Tel earned $205.7 million last year, which is up $2.3 million from the year before.

Mr. Canfield said: "The entry into the Canadian market of U.S. phone giant AT&T which bought 20 per cent of Unitel after the CRTC last year approved Unitel's entry into the long distance field added weight to BC Tel's argument that inflated long distance rates should not be used to subsidize artificially low rates".

There we have the kinds of things that are already taking place in the telecommunications industry. If we allow this government to proceed with this piece of legislation in its present form or with the procedures that it is trying to follow through deregulation and competition, then only the people of Canada will suffer.

This is especially so in the remote areas where people with their ordinary telephones are trying to communicate with each other. They will be the big losers. The big multinational corporations that this government seems to want to support to bring about these kinds of changes would get ahead.

Also, this would give the government the authority to override the one very historic area that it has had: the CRTC. The CRTC was an independent group. As much as we may have seen the weaknesses in it, it was a group that would hear submissions, make decisions and bring them forward.

We will not have that if this piece of legislation is passed. We are opposed to this legislation. We will do everything we can to ensure that proper and adequate witnesses are brought before the committee and their views are heard.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I was not quite prepared to intervene at this point but I will certainly take this opportunity to say a few words regarding Bill C-62, a bill dealing with the telecommunications industry in the Canadian economy.

We are dealing today with an aspect of the Canadian economy that has been on the cutting edge of change and dynamic development for many years. We have been world leaders in a variety of areas of telecommunications. It has been a Canadian growth industry and continues to be a growth industry. It is a great employer. The telecommunications industry directly employs 125,000 people in our country and accounts for up to 8.6 per cent of our GDP after inflation.

Change in terms of its legislative mandate has been in the offing for many years and for many years we have called for a modern day approach to the development of telecommunications, recognizing that our telecommunications industry is currently governed by the antiquated Railway Act. We have called for the government to change this.

Over the years we have heard various ministers give their views on what the change ought to be. Today we are beginning a discussion on Bill C-62, which is this government's effort to fill the policy vacuum when it comes to the very dynamic field of telecommunications.

To say this is long overdue is not really selling the point very adequately because subsequent ministers have been promising this action. I want to at least acknowledge that the present minister of telecommunications has actually brought forward legislation. It was first introduced in the spring of 1992, many months ago. Now we are beginning the debate at second reading as this session of Parliament begins to essentially wind down in anticipation of the general election.

This legislation takes the telecommunications sector and places it on the sacred altar of privatization and deregulation. We have seen a number of other sectors placed on this altar for sacrifice such as the trucking business in Canada a few years ago. The feeling was that if we deregulated and privatized the trucking industry we would see a dynamic sector emerge. Jobs would be created and the Canadian trucking companies would prosper and benefit.

At that time a lot of us had contrary views. Many people in the trucking industry had contrary views and wondered how a deregulated environment that was being proposed, as well as the privatization that occurred in the transportation sector generally would be helpful. The result has been that literally hundreds of Canadian trucking companies have gone bankrupt over the last number of years and tens of thousands of drivers and others associated with the industry have lost their jobs. It has become a much less competitive industry.

The airline industry is one of the more recent sacrifices on the altar of privatization and deregulation. Once again it was proposed that a deregulated environment would result in increased competition, better service to the consumer and reduced fares and rates. The result is that an airline has just announced in the last few hours that it is going out of business because it is bankrupt. The two major carriers in Canada are in bankruptcy stages of one kind or another and unable to compete in this deregulated environment.

If I can use my own community of Kamloops as an example, two airlines are now competing head to head for service. This was welcome news because we thought it would result in a greater variety of services and an abundance of departure times to Vancouver. The result is that two aircraft fly into the Kamloops airport at the same time and leave for the same city at the same time.

There is head to head competition but no increased opportunities for travellers and we have seen the rates increase month after month. Any citizens who wish to fly from Kamloops to Vancouver or Calgary should forget about it unless they are independently wealthy or have some kind of business expense account. No one can afford the kinds of rates the airlines are now charging in this new competitive environment.

The Minister of Communications is saying the telecommunications sector is our new sacrifice to lay upon the altar. Who will benefit from this? Surely someone must benefit.

My colleague for Kootenay East has made an excellent presentation as to why he feels this initiative is inappropriate. On many occasions I have listened to my colleague for Okanagan—Shuswap explain to anyone who would listen why this initiative is not in the best interest of Canadians. One has to ask who will benefit from this.

I think it is fair to say that Canadians generally will not benefit but some large transnational telecommunications company will. AT&T will eventually be one of the main beneficiaries of this initiative. Those companies that are now prepared to come in and cream off a very lucrative long distance market will be the beneficiaries.

The average Canadian and the average small business operator in Canada will be the losers. I want to explain why that is the case but before doing that I would like to read a few figures into the record. We are not leaders in this matter of telephone and telecommunications deregulation. Other countries have done this before us and we need look no further than the United States.

Some of the leading political voices in the United States said a number of years ago it would benefit the average American if they deregulated the telephone industry, which they did, but the average consumer did not benefit from this initiative.

In the United States, residential telephone rates have doubled in some cases and tripled, quadrupled or increased five times in others. I will give an example as of today and use my own community because it will vary somewhat across the country.

In Kamloops, the basic residential rate for telephone use is $10.05 per month. Naturally, the cost of other services is added to that amount. In other communities it is less. I know in Thunder Bay where there is a private telephone company, the rates are less than $8 per month. We have enjoyed a regulated environment in Canada for many years and we are viewed world-wide as having one of the more sophisticated telephone systems found anywhere.

Recent surveys have found that 92 per cent of Canadians are very satisfied with their telephone service. This goes back to the old adage: If it ain't broke, don't fix it. If there is a 92 per cent satisfaction rate with just about anything in the country today, I think it would probably be a good indication to just keep our hands off and stay out of it. Obviously the regulated telecommunications telephone business in Canada has been working very well and 92 per cent is not bad.

Obviously the government has decided to work on behalf of somebody in our society to change this. Let us make some comparisons. The Kamloops basic rate per month is $10.05. Let me just randomly pick out a number of American centres. In Jacksonville, Alabama they pay $43.48 a month; in Phoenix, Arizona, they pay $24.36; in Little Rock, Arkansas they pay $32.01 and in Denver, Colorado they pay $32.39 a month. In Wilmington, Delaware, they pay $22.30 a month; Fort Lauderdale, Florida, $29.10 a month; Twin Falls, Idaho, $28.56 a month. Here is a good one, in Indianapolis, Indiana, they pay $47.40 a month; in Sioux City, Iowa, they pay $36.60 a month; in Louisville, Kentucky, they pay $47.76 a month.

I think you get the idea, Mr. Speaker. I have a list here of dozens and dozens of communities from a small survey that was done to get some idea of what has happened in American communities as a result of deregulation. I think it is fair to predict that a few years from now the people of Kamloops will not be paying a rate of $10.05 a month. They will be probably paying $34 a month as in Tulsa, Oklahoma, or $37 a month as in Eugene, Oregon. That is the reality.

Let us be clear what we are doing here. The government has opened the door to allow companies to ask for rate increases so the average consumer in this country, the average small business operator in Canada will see their rates double, triple or quadruple over the next number of years. That is the obvious direction we are taking.

In the Wall Street Journal a little while ago there was a full page ad by AT&T, the big multinational telecommunications company, which included a map. The ad said: "Here's a map of North America with a border presently between Canada and the United States". As soon as this legislation goes through we can take an eraser and erase this border because Canada and the United States are going to be simply one happy integrated area as far as AT&T is concerned. In other words this is another way of describing the free trade agreement.

Now the North American free trade agreement is accompanying this legislation, Bill C-62, through Parliament. They are going side by side in a parallel process through Parliament. We know that the NAFTA agreement includes Mexico.

Let me make another projection. Not too many months from now when we dial the operator to get information or dial the telephone company to check out the nature of our bill, the person responding will say something like Buenos dias, senor, because that operator will be operating out of northern Mexico. After all, if a telephone operator in Canada is paid $16 an hour and the same operator with the same skills is paid 60 cents an hour in the Maquiladora zone in Mexico, why on earth would an unregulated company not simply take advantage of the lowest labour costs possible?

AT&T is not an unintelligent company when it comes to making a profit. When it can pay a telephone operator or someone working in its operation in whatever capacity 60 cents an hour or less, I suspect there will be a tendency for it to do just that.

Rates for the average Canadian will increase and those people presently employed in the telecommunications sector of our economy here in Canada will lose their jobs in the future because they will not be able to compete with 67 cents an hour out of northern Mexico. Or let us be very generous and talk about an operator or employee of a telecommunications company in Canada competing with a person with the same skills making $6 an hour in Tennessee, Louisiana, Texas or New Mexico. It simply cannot be done. Not only will fare increases escalate, but job losses will also escalate as a result of this initiative.

We oppose this legislation to say the least. We, as New Democrats, have long felt, as many ministers over the years have suggested, that the way to develop our telecommunications industry, create world technological leadership in this sector and be on the leading edge of change, growth and dynamic development is through a regulated sector of telecommunications. In other words, there must be sophisticated, progressive, updated regulation of this very critical sector. That is the way to proceed and not what we see in Bill C-62.

There are many reasons why we do not want to proceed at this point with Bill C-62 at this second reading stage. Second reading stage is when we talk about and debate the principle of the bill and whether or not we want to proceed even with the principle that is being discussed and introduced here in the House of Commons. The Minister of Communications and his staff have been very generous in being straightforward with the people of Canada because they have indicated that this bill will undergo substantial amendments during the committee stage. The work of the other place points out a whole number of shortfalls so the minister has been very generous in his comments and said that, yes, major changes must occur.

Will these major changes result in changes to the principle that we are debating here today? What are these major changes? What is this wide array of amendments that the minister wants to present and propose?

Not knowing what they are, one can only assume that perhaps what we are discussing here is not going to be what is in the final bill or what the government plans to proceed with. Therefore the process is open to some question. We believe that the minister should be a bit more forthright in explaining just what it is the government plans to change and to what extent it plans to alter the provisions of this legislation.

The other reason that we oppose this—I rather tangentially referred to it earlier—is the fact that this will result in significant rate increases for Canadians.

I wonder if this is the time when the Government of Canada should be passing legislation that it knows will result in additional costs to Canadian consumers and Canadian citizens generally at a time of a call for restraint, when governments are calling for cutbacks in budgets and when governments are calling for all Canadians to tighten their belts. A lot of Canadians do not even have a belt left any more. They have tightened them so many times there are no notches left.

The government comes along and says: "At a time when we are calling for cuts, restraint and thought in terms of the small business person, we are introducing legislation that is going to definitely result in cost increases". It seems that the minister has not been privy to discussions concerning what one hand is doing or saying obviously because here with this initiative we will see additional costs for the consumer.

There are other reasons why we oppose this legislation. My colleague from Kootenay East explained in some detail the value of cross-subsidization. The charges for the users in those areas of Canada where the intensity of telephone use is very high help offset the cost to the more rural or small town user. In other words, in order for people to have relatively similar access to telephones, there is cross-subsidization so that the heavy users subsidize those where the costs are increased.

This has served Canada well. We are the second largest country in the world geographically. We are spread out between three major coasts. We have one of the highest rates of telephone usage in the world. One of the reasons is that people living in the small towns and rural areas of Canada were subsidized by those living in the urban areas or the more urban corridors of communication within our regulated environment for so many years. This has served our country well. However, this will no longer be the case as a result of this legislation. That principle is being eroded here and that is another reason why we oppose it.

You have given me a signal, Mr. Speaker, indicating that my time is now limited. I simply want to conclude by saying that traditionally we have had in Canada an excellent telephone system. We have an excellent history in terms of the development of telecommunications. It has served us well. Ninety-two per cent of Canadians like the present system. I think many of us have had many reasons to be proud of the developments within our telecommunications sector for many years. We have hard-working men and women in this sector. There are tens of thousands of them who would like to keep their jobs and continue serving Canadians in this particular profession and line of work.

For that reason we will oppose this legislation when it comes to a vote and encourage the Minister of Communications, the minister responsible for this particular legislation, to take this back to his caucus and cabinet colleagues. He should say that this is not the time to increase rates across the country or to introduce legislation that would result in job losses to so many more Canadians, but that this is to be set on the back burner permanently.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this certainly is a bill whose time has come. Unfortunately it is also a bill that is quite seriously flawed.

The previous speaker for the New Democrats stated unequivocally that they will be voting against the bill. While I understand that, I say that from our point of view we believe the bill must go to committee where it can be reviewed and substantially amended to reflect the needs both of industry and of the people of Canada.

This bill has taken rather a long time from its own introduction well over a year ago by the hon. minister or from the first statement from this government in 1984 when the then Minister of Finance, in an economic statement, said there was a clear need for national telecommunications to take advantage of opportunities presented by a rapidly changing technology and a demand for Canadians for new telecommunication services. As I said, it has been nine years since that statement. The phrase labouring and bringing forth a mouse comes to mind because in nine years this bill is the best the government has been able to come up with. This bill, as already stated by my colleague from Mount Royal, is seriously flawed. Consequently, in our party we are prepared to allow the bill to go to committee at this stage. However, I say in the wake of the member for Mount Royal that we serve notice that we expect to see major amendments in committee.

Bill C-62 would establish in law a Canadian telecommunications policy, extend the regulatory authority of the CRTC to provincial Crown corporations and provide new powers with respect to the regulation of telecommunications. It is designed to give the force of law to a Canadian telecommunication policy, consolidate and modernize existing statutes and respond to the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in the Alberta Government Telephones Act with regard to the AGT clause.

It is necessary, of course, to put forward some regulation in today's ever changing telecommunications industry. Telecommunication industries employ over 100,000 Canadians and generate over $20 billion in revenue. In essence, this industry is one of Canada's key links to the globalization of markets and the world of high technology. It is, of course, also an area in which Canadians can be justly proud of the developments that are home-grown in Canada.

I am reminded of a visit last year that the Subcommittee on the Status of Women made to the United States when we were doing our study on breast cancer. We were visiting the Office of Women's Health in Washington and a conference was set up with the Centre For Disease Control in Atlanta. It was a teleconference. There was a large television set at one end of a boardroom table where we could see the people from Atlanta and there was a similar set-up in Atlanta. After the meeting was over, one of the Americans said to me: "How do you like our technology?" I noted the Northern Telecom logo on the television set and I said: "You will have to excuse me, but in actual fact that is our technology". I think it was something that all of us there felt very happy about.

However, it is not enough to rest on our laurels in the area of telecommunications. The industry and Canadians deserve the best bill available. They deserve the best law that reflects what the industry needs and what the population needs. This is not happening.

We support the bill's attempt at unifying a national jurisdiction over telecommunications. A new and stronger piece of legislation would affirm the essential role that telecommunications must have in the maintenance of Canada's identity and sovereignty. These things are only sensible. They are so self-evident that they almost go without saying. However, I have learned in over four years in this place that very little tends to go without saying. It affirms Canada's commitment to the industry as well as the industry's role to provide a world class product and service to Canadians.

I will get into the specifics of this bill. Clause 2 attempts to define the various players or carriers and transmission facilities in the telecommunications industry. My party and the Senate pre-study report, which was presented in June 1992, believe that more consideration should be given to these definitions to clear up any ambiguities. One such example is how a common carrier, or one that relies on a Canadian carrier, should be dealt with.

The CRTC submitted this during the Senate hearings: "The ambiguity in the definition must be removed by clearly setting out what is meant to be included and excluded".

Clause 14 of the bill makes it necessary for the federal government to consult with the provincial government when a decision "would have a substantial impact on a Canadian carrier that was the principal telecommunications carrier in that province". This clause of the bill must not allow either level of government sufficient power to paralyse an effective telecommunications policy.

Part II of the bill makes provisions to establish the criteria a Canadian carrier must meet in order to be eligible to hold a licence to operate. Any policy direction taken by the federal government with respect to this must again ensure that it contains a strong commitment to the telecommunications industry's future. In its commitment to the telecommunications industry's future, it must ensure that it is a Canadian future.

Under this proposal the communications minister would have the power to decide who will be licensed. My party does not agree that the minister should create for himself as many new powers as he does in this clause. This move essentially adds further steps to the regulatory process and would in effect slow the process down. There is also no requirement for the minister to give reasons for licensing decisions. Far be it from me to suggest that the current minister would ever make such a decision without giving the best, clearest and most well-explained reasons at any given time. Here I am complimenting him all over the place and he is not even listening. However, I think that the requirement for reasons in licensing decisions is absolutely essential.

Part III of Bill C-62 would establish the framework with which the CRTC would be authorized to regulate the telecommunications services offered by a Canadian carrier. One of the main powers assigned to the CRTC by the bill is that of forbearance. The CRTC would be able to exercise forbearance only after it had determined that a sufficient degree of competition existed to protect the user's interests.

Again, in my party we want to make sure that this new power does not result in the deregulation of our telecommunications industry. Now that competition among carriers is on the increase it must be recognized that the consumer must not end up the loser or bear unnecessary inflated charges.

Clause 46 of Bill C-62 allows the CRTC to prohibit or regulate any type of unsolicited telecommunications, unsolicited telephone calls and faxes. The key object of this clause must be to recognize that telemarketing companies have a right to do business while at the same time protecting Canadians from unwanted phone calls.

Clause 46 does not go far enough to reconcile these two conflicting points. The key objective of any comprehensive telecommunications policy should be reliability, affordability, quality and accessibility for all regions of this country.

I put emphasis on the question of accessibility because accessibility and level of service in the telecommunications industry is something of which Canadians can be justly proud. It is also something upon which Canadians depend and depend upon very strongly.

Every one of us in this Chamber knows that we are unlike almost any other country in the world because of our huge geography and small population. The telecommunications industry probably more so than almost anywhere else on earth is a true lifeline for literally hundreds of thousands of Canadians.

It is essential and will remain essential to the country's development, yet it has taken the government over nine years to finally act. The nine years of labouring has not brought forth the kind of a bill that makes anyone in this House want to stand up and cheer. I suppose a few of the people on the other side want to stand up and cheer but I have not seen them do it.

We in the Liberal Party want to make sure there are no more delays in the establishment of a national telecommunications policy and in the legislation to build it up, but it must be the right legislation.

This bill needs revision and further clarification. It is too open ended and too ambiguous in many of its sections. It needs fundamental revision. For example, clause 14 makes it necessary for the federal government to consult with the provincial government when a decision would have a substantial impact on a Canadian carrier that was the principal telecommunications carrier in that province. The difficulty is that the bill is not strong enough to prevent one level of government possibly paralysing an effective policy.

The difficulty is that in the history of federal and provincial relations, the possibility of this taking place is not particularly far-fetched.

In establishing a policy of telecommunications, we are all aware that certain expectations have been set and that there are certain areas in which Canadians have such a vested interest that to leave them with a bill that is too broad and too ambiguous does the kind of disservice that we just do not need to put up with.

As I said before, we support this bill going to committee but at the same time we want assurances that changes are planned. Virtually every person in the telecommunications industry that has made a comment has said these changes are necessary. Since the bill was introduced, these changes have not been forthcoming.

We have had problems with the fact that the minister and the government delayed the bill for well over a year. It was the government that delayed the bill, not the opposition. The minister has had the opportunity to build agreement on a national level and he has not done so. Various and sundry other projects and reports have been done and been available but no action has been taken on them.

Consequently in the time since this bill was first introduced in February 1992, we feel that a lot of time has been wasted and a lot of water has gone over the dam which could have been used in making it a better mix and a better reflection of what both the industry and the people of Canada would like to see in a national telecommunications policy. A bill which could do that would have been good for the industry, good for business and good for Canadians as a whole.

We are not talking about delay. Indeed the opposition has not in any way attempted to delay the bill. If anything, we have been urging from the sidelines faster and better policy development in this area. Had we wanted to delay it, given this government's fondness for the use of closure, the best we would have been able to do would be to pipe dream a delay. That is not the response here.

The telecommunications industry is a serious and important industry to the make-up of this country. We are not going to sit here as Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition and give approval to something which we think is inferior.

We believe that the parliamentary process can create something better. We on this side of the House, led by the hon. member for Mount Royal as our senior critic, are prepared to do everything we can to ensure this bill is the best it can be. We would like to hear from the government and most particularly from the minister that it is the intention of the government to clear up some of these problems. In the 14 months since the bill was first introduced, we have waited in vain for some small indication that this was going to be the response of the government. It has not happened.

Again I say we are serving notice that in committee we will be seeking these amendments. I cannot say or else because unfortunately the system is such that we do not have an or else. I think in the interests of the country and in the interests of the telecommunications industry it is the very least we can expect from the government.

The telecommunication industry is vital to the way this country works. It is vital in the employment of tens of thousands of Canadians. It is vital in the revenues in the billions that it generates. It is clearly a strategic industry for the Canadian economy. It is clearly part and parcel of the new Canadian identity as we face a globalized economy and as we face competition in international markets.

We are entering the age of communication as we are told by experts in all fields on any given day at any given time. Therefore, it is even more essential we not walk into this new age of telecommunications covered with the shreds of inferior legislation. What we need is the best legislation that the Government of Canada can produce for the industry and for the people.

I will close by saying this. The telecommunications industry is so much a part of what makes Canada the country it is and what will make Canada the country it can be that we on this side of the House serve notice to the minister and the government that we will be coming to committee prepared to battle down to the wire for every one of the amendments we believe to be utterly crucial.

I expect to be there holding the coat of the member for Mount Royal who is a formidable opponent in these matters. She will be our major spokesperson. I can only say that if these amendments do not pass, if these amendments are not brought into law, if the government does not see that its bill is flawed and makes it better legislation for Canadians, then the sorrow will be not just to the industry and the people of Canada, it will be very much to the sorrow of the members of this House.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C–62. I must begin by complimenting the Minister of Communications for this bill. In fact as I was reading the over–all objectives of the bill, I said to myself that I wished over the last few years the stated objectives of this bill had been used as the guiding principle for some of the other policies coming from the government. It is quite out of character with other legislation that has been put forward by this Conservative government.

I believe it is important for Canadians to understand the over–all objectives. I want to read directly from clause 7 of the bill which states:

> It is hereby affirmed that telecommunications performs an essential role in the maintenance of Canada's identity and sovereignty and that the Canadian telecommunications policy has as its objectives
> (a) to facilitate the orderly development in Canada of a telecommunications system that serves to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, social, political and economic fabric of Canada;

We have had many other bills brought before the House in the last while which talk about national standards and national objectives. I think of the specific bill referring to our CBC and the national emphasis was actually removed.

The other objectives:

> (b) to render reliable and affordable telecommunications services of high quality accessible in both urban and rural areas in all regions of Canada;
> (c) to enhance the efficiency and competitiveness, at the national and international levels, of Canadian telecommunications;
> (d) to promote the ownership and control of Canadian carriers by Canadians;
> (e) to promote the use of Canadian transmission facilities for telecommunications within Canada and between Canada and points outside Canada;
> (f) to foster increased reliance on market forces for the provision of telecommunications services;
> (g) to stimulate research and development—

(h) to respond to the economic and social requirements of users of telecommunications services, including the protection of the privacy of individuals.

I do not think anyone in this country would argue with any one of those stated objectives. My concern is that the actual stated objectives will be carried through in every aspect of the bill. I noted that my colleague from Mount Royal has said that in committee we are going to be going over every aspect of the bill to make sure that the various sections meet those objectives.

So often in the past few years this government has dismantled national institutions, dismantled the federal presence in favour of the regional force being a much stronger force. In the exercise of doing that we have decentralized the national government to a point where the regional forces are now causing it to be very difficult to govern this country.

Our telecommunications system, our technology, has been the envy of the world for many years. I think of the Middle East and what the Bell telephone exercise has been in Saudi Arabia and other places there. We have always been on the leading edge. One of the reasons why we have been on the leading edge is that we have had strong centralized, organized control of this sector of our economy. There is great hope for new job creation in this sector, but if the minister does not follow through in every aspect of this bill with the over-all stated objectives, then he will know that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition—

THE BUDGET

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has an onerous task ahead of him as he completes his budget. He is to be commended for the extensive pre-budget consultation that he has held across Canada.

It is a major challenge to reduce and eliminate our deficit. The problem is not just ours within this Chamber, all Canadians must share the challenge of balancing our wants with our needs and both of those with our ability to pay. If we learned nothing else from last year's referendum we should have learned that Canadians think for themselves and want to be involved in decisions that affect them.

With this in mind I invited the people in my constituency to offer suggestions on the budget and they responded. In a random but extensive survey they told me that they want restraint and no tax increase. I was told that transfers for health care, education and seniors' pensions are too important to be reduced, while regional development, special interest groups, unemployment insurance, Crown corporations and even farm aid need to be re-evaluated.

I have a strong message from Red Deer, one that tells me Canadians are ready to accept the tough decisions that must be made.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, last week, three separate reports showed how severely the Montreal region has been affected by the recession.

First, according to Statistics Canada, Montreal has now set a new record, with more than 22 per cent of its citizens living below the poverty line. Second, a report by the World Health Organization states that the living conditions of street children in Montreal are similar to those in the Third World. As if that were not enough, a study by a committee that included experts from the city of Montreal indicates that 40 per cent of the city's thousands of homeless people are under 18.

In a statement about the intolerable situation in this country today, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops said that society's moral fibre was undermined as a result of the Conservative economic policies of the past 10 years.

No matter who wins at the leadership convention, Canadians will massively reject the Conservatives who are responsible for all this suffering.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, 30 years ago this spring John F. Kennedy was President of the United States, Harold Macmillan was Prime Minister of Great Britain, John Diefenbaker was Prime Minister of Canada and the Toronto Maple Leafs won the Stanley Cup.

I would like to bring to the attention of this House that yesterday marked the 30th anniversary of the first election of the Leader of the Opposition to this House. I am sure all members will join me in congratulating him on his many years of service to his party and to our country.

During those years this hon. gentleman has held many high offices, none higher than the one he holds today. There is one higher that has eluded him. Alas, my sense of history tells me it will continue to elude him. I must tell you, Mr. Speaker, I am a great prognosticator so you should listen to that point.

Nevertheless, as we approach the election that will, I suspect, mark the twilight of his career I invite all hon. members to join me in paying tribute to the leader of the Liberal Party on this auspicious anniversary.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, taking barley sales to the United States out of Wheat Board jurisdiction is a return to the bad old days of grain marketing. A Conservative–Liberal union government created the first single–desk Wheat Board during World War I largely to save grain traders who had sold more paper than there was wheat. Farmers quickly learned the benefits of single–desk selling but the government took that privilege away for another 15 years until a dying Conservative government introduced a voluntary board in 1935.

The voluntary board clearly did not work and was made compulsory in the early 1940s for wheat, oats and barley. I know the Minister of Agriculture and the Conservative Party have never liked single–desk selling. To even consider taking barley sales to the U.S. away from the board demonstrates that. When I see the government deliberately undermining Wheat Board marketing power, which means lower barley prices to farmers, I can no longer believe the government's protestations of support for the Wheat Board, supply management or farmers. Its actions speak louder than its words.

BARRIERE LAKE ALGONQUINS

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, in 1991, a trilateral agreement was reached on an integrated management plan for renewable resources, covering forestry and wildlife in an area of about 10,000 square kilometres, partly located in the La Vérendrye wildlife reserve and surrounding area in Quebec.

• (1405)

The Barrire Lake Algonquins were proud of the work done by all parties to this agreement and, personally, I see it as a good example of how they and both levels of government were able to co–operate to ensure that aboriginal people can look forward to a better future and do so within the context of a new relationship.

Today, the Algonquins have former Liberal Environment Minister Clifford Lincoln as their negotiator. On April 16 Mr. Lincoln said this went beyond the question of logging operations in La Vérendrye Park. Now the First Nations are involved.

What a fuss about a 20 or 60 metre strip of forest.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, where is the minister of fisheries hiding? For months he has been promising that by April there would be a federal compensation package to support communities in eastern Nova Scotia devastated by last December's quota cuts. April is more than half over and there has still been no announcement.

A task force from the Nova Scotia government proposed a plan to him a month ago. Now not even his Nova Scotia counterpart, Mr. Legere, can get him on the line.

Yesterday more than 200 fishermen and plant workers gathered once again at a public meeting in Canso to call for an end to this uncertainty. Their patience is wearing thin. Fishermen need to know whether there is any point in putting their boats in the water. Plant workers need to know what the future holds for them. They want the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to come to Canso and explain what his government has in store for them.

The minister knows what needs to go into this plan. Will he end the uncertainty gnawing away at this community and at so many other communities in Atlantic Canada so they can get on with their lives?

NIAGARA GREENHOUSES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, the beauty and fragrance of fresh flowers have returned to Niagara regional council chambers. More than 200 plants and cut flowers filled the chambers for the introduction of the Greater Niagara Greenhouse Growers' Directory and Buyer's Guide, a Niagara Region Development Corporation project.

The industry employs almost 2,200 people working under more than 11 million square feet of glass and generates multimillion dollar amounts of revenue. Niagara greenhouses grow 17 species of cut flowers. In addition, growers are recognized for their excellence in producing millions of poinsettias, vegetables, nursery stock and landscaping plants. Major markets include the Niagara region, southern Ontario, Quebec and the northeastern United States. Annual sales are $160 million.

Seven Niagara greenhouse growers have been in business for more than 50 years and two-thirds have been growing in Niagara for more than 20 years. Congratulations to the growers in Niagara.

WARSAW GHETTO UPRISING

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, April 19 serves as a testimony to bravery in the face of barbarism and the triumph of the human spirit over mass oppression, starvation, disease and the evil perpetrated by the Nazi movement.

The Warsaw ghetto uprising took place 50 years ago and today we recognize the heroic members of the Jewish resistance who rose up in defiance of cruel tyranny. Jewish resistance fighters, with support from the Polish underground, fought a desperate battle with no hope of winning. This tragic revolt is a reminder that we must never again tolerate regimes based on racism or ethnic cleansing.

In honour of those who died in the Warsaw ghetto I call upon the international community to oppose institutionalized oppression in all its forms, regardless of race, religion or ethnocultural background.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to this week, April 18 to 24, as it is National Volunteer Week.

This is an opportunity for all of us to express thanks and to join communities across Canada in giving recognition to the more than 13 million Canadians who volunteer their time, skills and energies. Volunteers have become an essential and vital part of Canadian society and a major economic resource.

Volunteers often fill gaps by performing indispensable tasks that would not otherwise be done. Organizations, such as hospitals, libraries, schools, food banks, community associations, and a whole variety of both domestic and internationally concerned organizations, would all suffer greatly without this volunteer support. The average volunteer devotes 191 hours a year to volunteer work. Altogether Canadians give more than one billion hours of their time to voluntary organizations. The collective value of volunteer time is more than $13 billion a year.

It is appropriate for us to say thank you to everyone who works for or supports a volunteer organization. Through their work volunteers build a more caring and compassionate Canada. Their generosity assures that many organizations, programs and activities continue because without volunteers' commitment they would falter or cease to exist.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, there is a new tour that is going to occur shortly. It is called the "Hire Me, Here is My C.V. Tour" of the Prime Minister. Guess who will foot the bill for this tour? You are right, Mr. Speaker, it will be Canadian taxpayers again.

In 1991 the Canadian taxpayer sponsored the Asian tour at a cost of $1 million, or $80,000 a day. This new tour is going to be at bargain basement prices. It will cost only $50,000 a day.

Tour organizers are said to be working hard to improve the show of the advance performance in Florida last week because the Prime Minister did not meet expectations when he met Mickey Mouse.

Canadians are sure glad to know our present Prime Minister is finally on the way out and they will not have to sponsor tours again because rumour has it that the next tour would have been named the "Fly Me To the Moon Tour", in honour of the spaced out colleagues in his caucus who are seeking the Tory leadership.

NATIONAL DEFICIT

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my constituents have made it clear that they see government deficits as the major issue for all levels of government to address.

Recently, several provincial governments have announced measures to reduce expenditures. These steps are similar to those taken by the federal government over the past number of years.

Based on comments I have received throughout Wild Rose, the federal government must continue on a path of fiscal responsibility to become even leaner and more efficient.

WATER QUALITY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, more than a tonne and a half of persistent toxic chemicals daily enter Lake Ontario including more than a tonne of lead, 400 kilograms of arsenic and more than a kilogram of PCBs.

For the Niagara River it is no longer adequate just to study how to cut toxic contaminants in half by 1996. Action is needed. The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency has introduced tough regulations aimed at protecting human health and the ecosystem. Unfortunately there is little progress on Canada's side.

Two years ago the agreement between Ottawa and Ontario to implement the water quality agreement expired. The government has not renegotiated this agreement. We urge this government to conclude negotiations on a new federal–provincial agreement respecting Great Lakes water quality. This is the minimum required to match action with rhetoric.

DENTAL HEALTH MONTH

Ms. Nicole Roy–Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to remind the House that April is dental health month.

Good dental health is important for our well–being and our looks. Bad teeth and gums affect our ability to eat properly and lower our self–esteem. We know that we must see a dentist every six months, but do we really know everything that must be done to keep our teeth in good health?

During dental health month, the Canadian Dental Association and its provincial chapters will help us increase our knowledge of dental health with exhibits in shopping centres and other health promotion activities.

So please join me in wishing the Canadian Dental Association and the provincial dental associations a very successful dental health month.

WARSAW GHETTO UPRISING

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on April 19, 1943 Nazi forces entered the Warsaw ghetto to kill or remove all of its occupants. Rather than surrendering the Jews in the ghetto rose up against the Nazi forces determined to fight the inevitable for as long as they could. After 27 days the uprising was crushed. Most of the ghetto's 60,000 people were killed and the few thousand that survived were sent to death camps.

Fifty years later the Warsaw ghetto uprising and the heroism of the men, women and children who stood up against the attacking Nazis remains as an unforgettable example of human courage in the face of unspeakable evil. It was only one event in the nightmare of the Holocaust which saw the murder of six million Jews. The Warsaw uprising continues to serve as a powerful reminder of that systematic, terrible slaughter.

In commemorating the Warsaw uprising we must reaffirm our commitment to human rights. This 50th anniversary must not only be a time to remember but must also be a call to action. We must translate "never again" into concrete anti-racist action. We must redouble our efforts to fight racism and anti-Semitism in Canada and wherever it occurs throughout the world.

PEACEKEEPING

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, on Good Friday in Victoria I was honoured to take part in welcome home ceremonies for the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry returning from peacekeeping duties in Croatia. Local residents are extremely proud of the work our peacekeeping forces do abroad.

Yesterday 135 Canadian soldiers received a hero's welcome in the war-torn city of Srebrenica. Canada's peacekeeping forces in Bosnia have entered the besieged city to evacuate injured Muslims and disarm the government garrison.

Our hearts are with these brave soldiers working amidt a tenuous ceasefire in this bitter conflict. While the ceasefire holds in Srebrenica, the fighting continues unabated elsewhere in Bosnia. Once again Canada's peacekeeping forces are front and centre on the world stage doing their best to protect and save lives.

I know all members of the House will join me in wishing our peacekeepers a safe and secure return to Canada at the end of their tour of duty. We are proud of the work they do on behalf of us all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Last week, the Minister of Finance published a document announcing for the 10th or 12th time that the government's priority was to reduce the deficit, when we know very well that, for the last nine years, the government has run up deficits of over $30 billion a year on average.

In presenting the budget in the next few days, does the government intend to cut a $5.8 billion program to buy helicopters for the cold war with the Soviet Union when the Soviet Union no longer exists? Will the government accept the opposition's opinion and not buy these helicopters?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister did release a document that talks about economic policy in a world of change and about the deficit.

We know that under our friends, the deficit started from nearly zero and grew to $38.5 billion, an increase of 300 per cent. Under this government, it has been cut in half, in terms of the gross national product, and has remained at $30 billion or $32 billion, but that is still too high. We have made very substantial progress in reducing the deficit and we did so by reducing the increase in program spending. Over a 15-year period, program spending had risen 13.8 per cent a year on average. This was reduced to 4.1 per cent over eight years and it is now 2.8 per cent. This is a spectacular turnaround.

Hopefully, this will continue with the finance minister's new budget, the deficit will eventually be eliminated and there will be a reasonable and effective approach to maintaining and reducing the national debt. That will not happen tomorrow but we are now going in the right direction.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has refused to answer the question concerning helicopters.

I would like to point out the Minister of National Defence last week said that if one asks the Department of National Defence, it will give programs it will cancel first before cancelling the program for helicopters.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister why there are some programs within the Department of National Defence that make even less sense than buying helicopters to fight the cold war. When will the government act on these programs, if they exist, to ensure that the Department of National Defence or other departments are not spending money like drunken sailors?

An hon. member: If anybody knows about that it is you.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, given the record of my hon. friend in spending government money I would not want to offend any sailor, drunken or otherwise. My hon. friend should be careful.

An hon. member: Very careful.

• (1420)

Mr. Mulroney: I say this with respect. His record, for example as President of the Treasury Board, is probably the worst fiasco in public spending in the history of Canada. The figures are there. We would be happy to table them and have a debate precisely on that.

With regard to the expenditures of the defence department, we have had the debate—

Mr. Dingwall: More sleazy appointments?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says "more sleazy appointments". We just appointed—

Mr. Dingwall: By you?

Mr. Mulroney: By me. We just appointed Lucie Pépin, a former Liberal member of Parliament, to a 10–year appointment to the National Parole Board.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Again the Prime Minister is evading the question. I asked him a very simple question.

Last week the Minister of National Defence said that she might reduce the number of helicopters from 50 to a lower number. A month ago she said that we should not cut one of these helicopters.

I want to know from the government when it will scrap this program. We do not need it at all. It is $5.8 billion of waste. We need the money to cut the deficit or do something to create some growth in Canada.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the things that this project does is create 45,000 person–years of employment in Canada in an area of high technology.

I would point out to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that the Department of National Defence has had its budget cut by $12 billion since 1989. Clearly the government has set priorities in expenditures and the Department of National Defence has cut back.

It is also important to point out that the choice is not between spending this money on the helicopters and zero; it is between spending this money on helicopters of 1990 technology for Canadian men and women in the services and throwing away $2.5 billion to extend the life of 40–year old helicopters after which time, five or ten years at the maximum, we would have to face the question of replacing them.

If that is Liberal economics, Mr. Speaker, I do not think we want any on this side of the House.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

His Minister of National Defence has said she can eliminate the deficit in five years. His Minister of the Environment has said he can do it in only four years. I want to ask the Prime Minister who does he agree with, the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of the Environment? Or does he agree with his Minister of Finance who said only last December that "if you shut the whole government operation down you would not balance the deficit"?

Does anyone in that gang over there really know what they are doing?

Mr. Edwards: Herbie, you are leading with your chin again.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is entirely accurate that it can be done in five years as the Minister of National Defence says, or in four years as the Minister of the Environment says. I do know that after 25 years of Liberal government it cannot be done by any of them in a quarter of a century. That we know.

My hon. friend knows full well that when this government took office the deficit was $38.5 billion. It is now down to $32 billion. As a percentage of GDP it has gone from 8.7 per cent to roughly 4.7 per cent or been cut approximately in half. The deficit as a percentage of GDP is the only internationally accepted criterion for evaluating the impact of deficits. It has been cut in half. It is 5.1 as a result of the recession and scheduled to go back down again to under 4.5. I did not say it was zero, I said it has been cut in half as a percentage of GDP.

I certainly agree with the objectives set out by my hon. friend and my other hon. friend, both of whom will do a much better job running the public finances of Canada than the former President of the Treasury Board who was worse, second only to that President of the Treasury Board.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Prime Minister, in boasting about his record, did not boast about how in only nine years he doubled the public debt to $450 billion, more than happened in all the years since Confederation.

I am surprised that record is not on his mind. Also he has not told us what he thinks of the words of his Minister of Finance who said only last December: "If you shut the whole government operation down, you would not balance the deficit. You would save $15 billion or $16 billion and the senior citizens of this great country and the veterans would not be receiving their cheques".

I ask the Prime Minister this. In the new budget of the Minister of Finance, is he now targeting the old age pensioners and the veterans in terms of cuts in their benefits? If that is the case, why is that a priority rather than cancelling his farewell trips and saving the country millions of dollars?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am offended by my hon. friend. I am making a farewell trip to Windsor to say goodbye to him personally.

My hon. friend from Windsor is deeply troubled, as he should be, by a national debt that has doubled. He is quite right.

Mr. Boudria: Tripled.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend sitting behind is wrong. The hon. member from Windsor is right. It has doubled. The argument that it has doubled exclusively as a result of compound interest on the debt that we inherited is there—

An hon. member: Every penny.

Mr. Mulroney: —every nickel of it, but I will not invoke that argument today.

I would like to know this. Given his indignation in regard to a government that has doubled the debt, what does he have to say about a government that caused the national debt to increase 11 times as the Liberals did when last they were in office?

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Listening to the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister both arguing over who has done the worst job, there is only one alternative and that is my party.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. McLaughlin: Last week the government released a document called "Changing the Economic Course in a World of Change".

What this has really meant for Canadians is double digit unemployment, doubling the debt and having the greatest number of bankruptcies ever in the history of Canada. Nowhere in this document does it address the issue of unemployment. Nowhere in this document does it address the cost of unemployment. Nowhere in this document is there the cost of the loss of tax dollars because of unemployment.

I want to ask the Prime Minister this. He has one final chance to bring a real change of course with the next budget. Will he do that? Will he bring in a budget based on a full employment policy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is fighting for the title of which party can do the worst job. She will have to fight pretty hard with her colleagues in Ontario because they are doing a pretty good job.

My hon. friend refers to the document "Charting the Economic Course". She quite properly points out that unemployment remains too high in Canada.

The fact that 48,000 jobs were created last month is a very encouraging sign. The fact that 202,000 new jobs have been created since last August is also encouraging. Perhaps more encouraging is the fact that inflation is now at its lowest rate in 30 years, that interest rates are at their lowest in 20 years and that mortgage rates are at their lowest in 30 years.

I think this is good news for the economy. It promises the kinds of job creation that all members of the House in all political parties want for Canada.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

For the almost 3.9 million Canadians who do not have a job or who are underemployed, I have to say to the Prime Minister that the course that this government has taken Canada on for far too many Canadians has been a shipwreck.

The pain in this country caused by unemployment was again drawn to the attention of Canadians by the message last week from the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops that condemned Canada's combined unemployment and underemployment rate with one in four Canadians looking for adequate work. We will never be able to address the deficit and the debt if we do not get Canadians back working. It is something that we have been proposing for some time.

Will the Prime Minister look seriously at the proposals the bishops have made in terms of looking at unemployment and take this opportunity to really get Canadians back working?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we always look very carefully at proposals from all areas, including the Catholic bishops. We have obviously considered what they have put forward.

I point out to my hon. friend that today in a story it is reported that Canadian manufacturing order books were overflowing in February as the outlook for industry continued to improve. Statistics Canada reported Monday that unfilled orders jumped by 5 per cent from January, the largest monthly rise in five years.

The Royal Bank predicted last week that real growth in Canada would be 3.5 per cent and 4 per cent in Quebec this year, and that the rest of the decade would continue to see steady growth, low inflation and healthy job growth.

The job creation is worrisome here as it is in the United States. In the United States they are referring to it as a jobless recovery. Jobs are being created but the number of people entering the work force continues to exceed that.

All industrialized countries are concerned by it, which is the result of enhanced productivity, greater investment in people and in equipment and therefore the capacity to sell products internationally. It is a double-edged sword that is before us and that we are working with very closely, which explains the programs by the Minister of Employment and Immigration to create new jobs in that sector while allowing the private sector based on exports to do the principal element of work in creating new jobs.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The fact remains that the government has choices. One is to cancel a helicopter program that we do not need, that Canada does not need.

But I would repeat that, in their pastoral message, the bishops say:

> Such widespread unemployment undermines society's moral fibre and must be eliminated. It deprives workers and their families of the income required to meet their basic needs. It also deprives people of their dignity and their self-esteem.

When will this government understand the damage done by its policies, change direction and table a budget to help Canadians and their families? It is very urgent at this time and I would like to ask the Prime Minister this question.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I just said in English that the number of jobs had increased by 48,000 last month, the eighth month in a row that employment grew.

This comment from the Royal Bank of Canada is very significant: "An increase of 48,000 jobs is very encouraging. The Canadian economy has turned the corner. The annual rate of job creation has reached 1.3 per cent, the highest since the recession began". This renewed optimism led 85,000 more people to look for work last month and the number of jobs has increased by 200,000 since August.

This is not a miracle but sustained, steady, impressive progress that will achieve my honorable friend's social objectives.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, two weeks ago the government House leader stood in the House and defended the government's handling of the unfortunate incident in which the Canadian public learned through the media about the death of a Somali involving five Canadian peacekeepers three weeks after the event.

My question is for the Minister of National Defence. Why did the minister not inform the House of this incident as soon as it happened?

• (1435)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the incident was made public the day after it happened by a press release from the Department of National Defence in theatre. I have here a copy of the press release that was issued March 18 of this year.

The event was made public immediately. There was some confusion because a copy of this press release was not communicated to the Department of National Defence in Ottawa and I have instituted a revision of our communications policies to ensure that does not occur again.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, last week the military announced that the Somali death of March 16 should have been announced as soon as it happened instead of waiting. They announced there is an error.

The DND director of public affairs said that delay was a result of confusion over two separate incidents occurring over two separate days.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of National Defence who should know it is ultimately the minister's responsibility, and the minister's alone, to inform Parliament and the Canadian public. Why is the minister allowing departmental officials to take flak over this issue and why does she not admit to exercising poor judgment in this case?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, events of this sort are always communicated in the same way directly to the press. There was another event that happened at a similar time that was picked up by the press. This one was not. It is not the custom to always announce these things in Parliament as that hon. member knows well from his experience in the military.

As I have said it was an unacceptable mistake that this was not communicated to defence headquarters and I have taken steps to ensure that error would not happen again.

HELICOPTER PROGRAM

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence who has been running around the country saying politicians have to listen to Canadians. At the same time she ignores the fact that four out of five Canadians oppose her helicopter project.

She is prepared to spend billions of dollars to prop up an Italian firm, Agusta, even though that company is at the centre of the corruption scandal which is rocking democracy in Italy. The president of the firm has been arrested on charges of bribery and corruption. There is an arrest warrant outstanding for the director general and the police are searching for other executives of the firm.

Does the minister really think she is listening to Canadians when she is spending billions of dollars of Canadian taxpayers' money to do business with a company that is rocked by scandal?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, even if I were not Minister of National Defence, I was Minister of Justice and I am a lawyer and I am someone who has respect for the law and the rules of evidence. I would never institute a judicial inquiry for a circumstance under which there is not a scintilla of evidence to suggest any wrongdoing or any impropriety with respect to a contract entered into by the Government of Canada.

I think it is one of the shoddier examples of political rhetoric I have seen in my life in politics to hear what is being said by members on that side of the House about this particular matter.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Canadian politicians did not arrest the president of the company who was under suspicion for bribing the Italian government; the Italian police did.

I would therefore like to ask the minister whether she thinks that she is taking good care of Canada's finances when she does business with a company involved in a national scandal in Italy.

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for the truth. The truth is that an individual, not the company, was charged. There is no relationship between the actions of this individual and the company. That is the truth and the hon. member must admit it.

[English]

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The minister has rejected a judicial review of the helicopter purchase, yet the minister herself said on April 9 in Sarnia: "We might want a review of how many we are purchasing for the navy".

Will the minister agree that we need a review not only of how many helicopters the government should be purchasing but why the government is proceeding with this purchase in the first place?

• (1440)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, the original plan for the purchase of ship-borne helicopters was to buy 45 helicopters and as a result of the changes brought about by the end of the cold war that estimate of the number of helicopters required for ship-borne service in the Canadian navy was reduced to 35.

I believe as minister of defence that our department should continue to review these things in light of changing circumstances, although I see no indication in the short term that there should be a change in that.

I am looking forward to the work that the standing committee is going to be doing in the coming weeks looking at the helicopter purchase. Quite frankly I was very much affected by the unanimous report that the committee of which he is a member gave in November 1990 where it urged the Government of Canada to replace the ship-borne helicopters as planned with the EH-101 and to do it as soon as possible to avoid costly interim measures.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, as the minister knows, the committee did not in fact specifically recommend the purchase of these particular helicopters.

Mr. Mulroney: Yes, it did.

Mr. Brewin: But that was in 1990.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brewin: The defence committee is prepared to look afresh at this and I would suggest that the government when it is spending $5.8 billion of the public's money should be flexible enough to review it.

I ask the minister this question. Given that the helicopters are being made by a company that is in deep financial trouble, whose president is facing charges of corruption and that one test flight has already crashed killing four people, why is the government persisting in being a participant in a project that may itself never fly?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, because in the wisdom of the committee of which that hon. member was an active member—and I might add he had a minority report that did not dissent on this particular point—and in which that member participated fully it recommended that we proceed with this purchase. It did recommend specifically this particular helicopter and I am in the hands of the committee.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin: Well, let us give him a chance.

Last week, the minister announced he would get rid of the deficit in four years. Aside from cutting social programs, he was not very specific about how he would do this, probably because it would be too hard on his cabinet colleagues.

That being said, perhaps he could tell us what he intends to do about his own backyard. I am getting to my question. Will the minister confirm that he intends to make cuts in his own department and, if so, where? For instance, would there be more cuts in the green plan?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard for his question. I would be delighted to send him a membership card so that he can vote for me on June 13.

I was also glad to hear he is taking a keen interest in our party's leadership campaign and in commitments I made about reducing the deficit and the public debt, commitments which were supported by members of my own party. I proposed a five-point plan which covers all aspects of federal spending.

I can give the hon. member the assurance that, as Prime Minister of Canada, I intend to review all public spending, as all prime ministers must do when they take up their duties.

[English]

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): I am not sure, Mr. Speaker, that I would like a card in his party. On the other hand, I am not sure he would want my advice on leadership races.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance or whoever is replacing him. Last week the Minister of the Environment stated that he would erase the deficit in four years. This minister has been a member of this government throughout much of its term. The question therefore is: Has he been keeping the tremendous insights into fiscal policy to himself over the years? If not, why has the government not adopted his plan?

I speak to the Prime Minister. As the national debt has ballooned under this government over the last decade, why has Canada been deprived of this new-found voice of fiscal rectitude?

• (1445)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I do not know.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The Prime Minister may want to continue, but it might be a good time to stop. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: I will think about it.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

NATIONAL PARKS

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of the Environment.

As the chain-saws rev up to cut into the hearts of centuries old trees in Clayoquot Sound on Vancouver Island, environmentalists around the world are mobilizing to save this example of one of the earth's largest unlogged temperate old-growth forests. The Liberal Party has asked the minister to preserve this global treasure by including it in the Pacific Rim National Park.

Has the minister taken any action to save Clayoquot Sound? Will he take any action?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I received a letter written by the hon. member and the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard on the issue of Clayoquot Sound. I think they would have done well to also send a copy of the letter to the Government of British Columbia given the fact that these lands belong to it and that this is first and foremost a land management issue in the province of British Columbia itself.

The hon. member will know that through the green plan the government has established an approach by which we want all 39 natural regions in Canada represented in our national park system. We now have 23 of them represented including that area. We are now trying to move as rapidly as we can to have the 16 additional regions also represented in the national park system.

Our priorities, of course, are going into areas where we do not already have representation.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister. I certainly hope he can move faster than the chain-saws.

Months away from a general election and perhaps a new government in Canada, the Minister of the Environment is failing to do his duty to preserve Clayoquot Sound for future generations.

I ask the minister, how can he preclude this option for the future? How can he stand silent while the forests that have stood for centuries face destruction? Is this the kind of legacy he wants to leave? Is this the kind of leadership he wants to give?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know that the Government of Canada has moved to include many regions of Canada in our national parks system. For example, we created South Moresby National Park. We created two new national parks in the last year. We set lands aside in North Baffin Island and also signed an agreement for the park on Banks Island in the western Arctic.

We have met our commitments to include some lands in our national parks system. We are striving now to include all regions in the country as we move along with this initiative.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

In response to an Order Paper question I put forward on March 18, 1991 the parliamentary secretary to the Prime Minister responded that correspondence and calls received by the Office of the Prime Minister regarding the Westray coal mine project were noted and forwarded to the Ministry of Industry, Science and Technology.

Yet in reading an access to information response we found that Stanley Hartt and Peter White, the chief of staff and principal secretary of the Prime Minister, on October 16, 1988, on October 17, 1988, October 26, 1988, November 7, 1988, November 14, 1988, January 6, 1989, January 9, 1989, February 4, and February 8 were directly involved in the funding arrangements. Often they were involved in phone calls and often they were the only representatives of the federal government present.

Why was there a cover-up? Why was that information kept from Parliament?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows we have already tabled over 7,000 pages of documents and more will be forthcoming.

He should know too if any mine were going to be established in a region where unemployment was high and regional economic development was needed that the mayors, the reeves, the municipalities and so on of that region would be pressing for it and would be knocking on every door. They would knock on the doors of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. They would do everything they could to bring the project to fruition. The people who were against it would probably do the same.

There is nothing in this that should alarm anybody who knows how governments work.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, if that information is what the government wishes to portray, why did it not say that in answer to my question long before the disaster?

On March 18, 1991 again the correspondence was noted and forwarded. Evidently, from what was available through the access to information request, the Prime Minister's office was involved directly and heavily. The chief of staff and the principal secretary of the Prime Minister often were the only federal government representatives involved in the negotiations.

If that is a proper course, why did the government not come clean then?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's facts are wrong and he knows they are wrong. Just about every key department of government was involved in that decision. People were debating it on both sides.

Let us take Churchill or Thompson, Manitoba where the hon. member is from. Let us say that somebody wanted to start a major regional economic expansion there. All sorts of presentations would be made to the Government of Canada. They would knock on every government department door possible in order to see this happen. That is what happened in Nova Scotia as well.

BARRIERE LAKE ALGONQUINS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In 1991 a trilateral agreement was reached on an integrated management plan for renewable resources, covering forestry and wildlife in an area of about 10,000 square kilometres located partly within the La Vérendrye wildlife reserve and surrounding area in Quebec.

What does the minister intend to do about supporting the efforts of the Barriere Lake Algonquins to protect the environment in the La Vérendrye wildlife reserve? Today, the Barriere Lake Algonquins want to erect barricades to prevent logging companies from entering the forest, saying they want to protect the fauna and flora. They want to maintain a 60-metre buffer zone, not the 20-metre zone which meets current standards under Quebec law.

Hon. Pierre H. Vincent (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the hon. member for Abitibi on his work on these issues, and also the hon. member for Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle, who has been been involved in this matter for some time.

As the hon. member for Abitibi pointed out, a trilateral agreement was signed in 1991 on the management plan, and a working agenda was drawn up by the Government of Quebec and the Algonquins. I recently met Chief Matchewan, who is trying to persuade the Quebec government which withdrew from the negotiating table to come back to the table and resume negotiations on the management plan. As pointed out in the agreement, the federal government is involved in a trustee role, and my department will continue to act in that capacity.

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The legal counsel for the Westray inquiries said on March 30 that if he did not receive the documentation necessary for a proper investigation he was going to commence legal actions. Our records show that at least 80 pages of this documentation have been censored including 60 pages from the Prime Minister's own file.

Will the government and particularly the Minister of Justice provide to the inquiry uncensored copies of those pages, yes or no?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member could know what is missing and what has been changed because the commission has this information. We passed thousands of pages to it on April 8. It has all these documents and it is going to keep them confidential until the judicial proceedings on criminal charges are dealt with.

How could the hon. member know whether there are 60 pages, 6 pages or 6 words missing?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, all members of the government when questioned on this said as long ago as last May that they would co-operate fully with the inquiry. This includes the Prime Minister and the House leader. In fact on June 9, over 10 months ago, the government House leader said: "The government has been forthcoming with all the background documents necessary for the people to examine what has occurred and reach their own conclusions".

• (1455)

As the minister in charge of the documentation to the inquiry, why has he and his predecessor held back 11,000 pages of documentation which was only sent to the inquiry last week?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the pages we sent to the inquiry were at the express request of the inquiry itself and the commissioner.

Does the hon. member want to complicate another process, which is the criminal process, by releasing documents that this commission has? We have to wait until the commission is done with them and until the judicial inquiry has reached the proper stage. He knows that.

We have been very open right from the beginning. There are thousands of pages. We have sent documents to the commission that even the commission did not know it had, claimed it did not have and then found it had them. We have been very open. We will continue to be open with the commission because we, hopefully like the hon. member, want to get to the bottom of this safety issue. It has been regulated by the province. It is a provincial commission of inquiry and we want to help it get to the right answer.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

As a result of the government's economic mismanagement, poverty has become a permanent feature of urban life across Canada. In fact over 10 per cent of Toronto's population have had to rely on food banks at one time or another. Over 66 per cent of those individuals have lost their jobs recently, thanks to the Tory recession.

Given that the rising dependence of food banks in our country has become a chronic epidemic, when will this government finally drastically alter its economic course so that people can regain their jobs as well as their dignity?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I read with great interest the report that came from Statistics Canada showing the excellent track record of this government including family incomes, particularly women's incomes.

Real average incomes grew by 9 per cent over the 1985–90 period and almost all family types and all regions experienced this increase. Women's incomes which should be of particular interest to my hon. friend are catching up with men's. Their average wages grew 11 per cent between 1985–90 while those of men grew by 3 per cent. We are making progress and we expect this to continue as the economy improves over this year and next.

As the hon. member knows, the OECD, the World Bank and the IMF all predict that Canada will lead the G–7 in growth both this year and next year. That is extremely important for job creation and the wealth of Canadians.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the government just does not get it. Last year over 75 million pounds of food were delivered to needy Canadians by Canadian food banks. Those are Third World statistics.

How can these Canadians have any hope with this government's sense of priorities when the federal government is spending $1 million on a final farewell tour by this Prime Minister?

I challenge the Prime Minister and I ask: Will the government instead donate $1 million to the Toronto Daily Bread food bank? This would allow it to provide 700,000 meals to needy Canadians and would really be putting Canadians first rather than the gratification of this Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the boys are getting jumpy over there. I can see they are really getting worried and they have good reason to be worried.

An hon. member: They do not like those polls.

Mr. Mulroney: This is the kind of scurrilous question which slanders Canada in regard to calling us a Third World country. We have problems in this country but Canada treats all of its citizens better than any other country in the whole world. Do not say that you have the right to sneer.

• (1500)

The minister has put together an unprecedented package to assist people in need and children in need. There are billions of dollars that have been increased some 20 per cent over the last term in regard to helping people in Canada who need the help most of all.

On that point my hon. friend is right. We have been working very, very carefully and very well. But it is to do a dishonour to Canada to suggest that we find ourselves in the company of Third World countries which unfortunately find themselves in a league totally different from ours. That is unfair and inaccurate.

With regard to my trip, I point out to my hon. friend that he was very eulogistic in 1984 when his former leader on the way out went to Czechoslovakia, Switzerland, East Germany, Romania, Moscow, London and Paris. Where was he then?

GREAT LAKES

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

As reported in a recent news account, a senior official with the Canadian Coast Guard stated that it lacks equipment or plans to deal with a major chemical spill from a tanker in the Great Lakes.

My question for the minister is this: Is that report true? If so, what does the minister intend to do about it?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that next to safety of life, prevention of marine pollution including marine spills is the Coast Guard's first priority.

We take great pride in the fact that over the past years with the help of people from environment and the Coast Guard all chemical-carrying tankers must now comply with stringent construction and operating standards. Many are double hull as he probably knows.

By regulation the industry is required to have the capability to respond to spills of over 300 different types of chemicals. The Coast Guard's primary role is to ensure potential polluters are able to respond. I think they are doing an excellent job and will keep improving the situation.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that we will begin with a question of privilege from the hon. member for Churchill. I will follow that with a ruling which I am obliged to bring to the House.

Following that, and I want members to know this, there will be a tribute to a former colleague of ours from British Columbia, Alex Patterson. I think the hon. member for Fraser Valley East will speak first and I understand other hon. members will want to say something.

To begin with, the hon. member for Churchill on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, on December 8, 1990 before the mine disaster occurred at Westray, question No. 437 was placed on the Order Paper on my behalf. The question read: "Were any calls or correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister's office and any person or organization inside or outside government regarding the Westray coal mine project at Pictou, Nova Scotia? If so, on what dates and with which parties?"

I placed that question on the Order Paper recognizing it was one that required detailed study by government because I wanted a detailed answer. I recognized at that time that government officials had many questions about the funding of the Westray project. We were curious to know exactly what the role of the Prime Minister's office was with regard to that particular project.

On March 18, 1991 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister responded to me stating in part: "Correspondence and calls received by the Office of the Prime Minister regarding the Westray coal mine project are noted and forwarded to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology".

During the break I had an opportunity to read the information the government had to file as a result of the access to information request put forward by the Halifax Chronicle-Herald on this very issue.

As I noted during Question Period, there were a number of times when either the principal secretary to the Prime Minister or the chief of staff of the Prime Minister, Peter White and Stanley Hartt, were directly and personally involved in these discussions. They took phone calls, made phone calls, attended meetings with government officials and attended meetings with representatives of Curragh Resources.

I know if there have been a number of rulings by speakers one cannot really argue about an answer; if one does not like the answer it is a matter of argument and not privilege. However I would ask you to review those past precedents, because in this particular case—and I would like to point out that my questions were asked long before the mine disaster—I was asking for specific information. I was following the rules this House sets forward to get specific information. On a number of occasions I have heard various parliamentary secretaries to the government House leader say: "These answers require extensive work; they require expensive work".

That is the purpose of these types of questions. From the correspondence and calls I received that are noted and forwarded, it is evident to me that the answer I received is a very inaccurate one.

I asked that question on behalf of a number of Canadians who had approached our offices on this issue. By giving them this information, which came from the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister, I was giving them false information. As a member of Parliament, I took the information that was given to me, which was false, and forwarded it to other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, my appeal to you and my question of privilege is this: How do we get accurate information and how do we serve our constituents and other Canadians if the information we receive from government ministers and their parliamentary secretaries is false?

Mr. Speaker: I think it should be noted that no member is rising so at the moment I am going to consider the intervention of the hon. member. If by any chance anyone wishes to say anything, then they should indicate that to me.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister for Science and Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): I would like to briefly respond to that.

I find this point of personal privilege quite difficult to understand. Frankly we have—

Mr. Speaker: Just a moment. I am faced with that dilemma often. I indicated to the House that I would look carefully at the intervention of the hon. member. I have invited the minister to respond if he wishes. If he wishes to take advisement on the matter and come back to the House when he is prepared, I will certainly hear him.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, if you would like to take it under advisement fine, but my answer during Question Period is the same answer I would give today. Within the Government of Canada all sorts of departments are constantly spoken to when regional industrial projects are being promoted.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to say to the minister that one of the reasons I want to take it under advisement is that I was listening very carefully to the exchange earlier in Question Period. I will report back and let the hon. member know when it is appropriate to do so.

PRIVILEGE

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: I have a ruling which I am now prepared to share with the House on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River regarding the tabling of Order in Council PC 1992–2715, pursuant to Section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff; and the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre regarding the tabling of the government response to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade report.

Members will remember that when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre raised the matter, which he did, I advised him that a similar matter was before me and I would try to deal with them both at the same time.

I would like to advise all hon. members that I am now ready to rule on the question of privilege raised on Wednesday, February 24 by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River regarding the failure of the Minister of Finance to table an Order in Council pursuant to section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff.

Regrettably this issue is not new to this House, having been raised by the hon. member just over a year ago. I would like to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to the attention of the House again and the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance for the response.

I will deal as well in this ruling with the question of privilege raised on March 29, 1993 by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre concerning the late tabling of a government response to a committee report from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

In presenting his claim for breach of privilege the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River explained that on December 29, 1992, pursuant to section 59(2) of the Customs Tariff, the Governor in Council adopted Order in Council 1992-2715.

The hon. member's question of privilege concerned section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff which explicitly states: "The Minister of Finance shall cause a copy of any order made pursuant to subsection 2 to be made before Parliament on any of the first 15 sitting days after the making thereof that either House of Parliament is sitting".

Pursuant to this statute, the order referred to by the hon. member should have been tabled on or before February 15, 1993. However as the hon. member noted, the Minister of Finance failed to do so.

For the information of all members I would like to note that the document cited was tabled subsequent to the question of privilege being raised on February 25, 1993. Nonetheless, this eventual tabling of the order does not correct the situation or resolve the fundamental problem.

Let me begin by saying that I find this situation particularly disheartening because of the striking resemblance it bears to the situation which gave rise to the question of privilege raised a year ago. In both cases the Minister of Finance was required by section 59(5) of the Customs Tariff to table an Order in Council within a prescribed time.

I am not making any of these comments in any personal sense and members will understand that but there are people in departments who know these rules and are supposed to ensure they are carried out.

In both of these cases the government failed to do so until after the matter was brought to the attention of this House.

[Translation]

The key element of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River is based on a statutory requirement. That is, the ministry was legally obliged to table a copy of an order made by the Governor in Council within a time limit determined by the Customs Tariff.

[English]

I find it necessary to also repeat the hon. member's statement of one year ago that, and I quote the hon. member: "It is difficult to conceive of any command of this House that could have more legitimacy than one contained in a law passed by this House".

As the hon. member succinctly stated when this very issue was raised in February 1992: "Subsection 59(5) of the Customs Tariff is a statutory provision and statutes are the highest form of command that can be given by this House. In my view the disregard of that legislative command, even if unintentional, is an affront to the authority and dignity of Parliament as a whole and of this House in particular".

It is an opinion that I share and that I expect to prevail in this Chamber. The statutory laws which have been agreed to by members of this House do serve a purpose and are meant to be respected.

[English]

As a servant of the House of Commons it is my duty to uphold the dignity and authority of this place. It is an obligation of the Speaker with, of course, the support of the members. At the very beginning of a Parliament every speaker addresses the Crown as represented by the Governor General, by claiming all the rights and privileges, in particular that members may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to His Excellency's person at all seasonable times and that their proceedings may receive from his "Excellency the most favourable construction".

In the present case it is not merely an order of the House that has been violated, but a law duly assented to by the Crown as a constituent part of Parliament. The delegate of the Crown has not met the exigencies of the law of Parliament.

As I have said before, Canada is not an executive democracy nor an administrative democracy, but a parliamentary democracy. If the Speaker has to remind the Crown formally at the opening of every Parliament then those who serve it should take note.

As members are well aware, the tabling of documents constitutes a fundamental procedure of this House. It is a part of our rules and ensures that members have access to the information necessary to them to effectively deal with the issues before Parliament.

In addition, as I mentioned a year ago, the rules of the House specify that all reports, returns and papers to be laid before the House in accordance with the requirements of the statute are automatically referred to a standing committee, pursuant to Standing Order 32(5). Consequently, ministers and departmental officials must ensure that required documents are tabled so the House has a copy for the information of members and for review by one of its committees.

The requirements contained in our rules and statutory laws have been agreed upon by this House and constitute an agreement which I think all of us realize must be respected.

There has been a growing number of complaints raised by members in the past year about responses to petitions not being filed within the required time and answers to written questions being answered late. I understand that we live in an imperfect world. Nonetheless, what I refer to is all on the record and today I am dealing yet again with a document not being tabled within the legally prescribed time period.

In addition, the member for Winnipeg South Centre raised the issue on March 29, 1993 that the government was in breach of Standing Order 109 by not presenting the comprehensive response to the report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on the future of Canadian military goods, production and export to the House within the 150 days required.

Members cannot function if they do not have access to the material they need for their work and if our rules are being ignored and even statutory instruments are being disregarded.

[English]

I believe the House management committee should be given the opportunity to look into this whole question of late tablings. I am therefore prepared to find a prima facie case of breach of privilege and allow the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River to move a motion referring this matter to committee.

In this way I am allowing the House to decide whether or not it shares my concern about the growing severity of this problem. The House may then decide whether or not it feels the House management committee should be tasked with considering the issue.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for a ruling which I believe will fortify the rules and procedures which will enable Parliament to better reflect the will and franchise of Canadians. Accordingly, on behalf of all the members of the House, I move:

> That the matter of the non-observance of the tabling requirements for Order in Council PC 1992-2715 and other documents in the House of Commons be referred to the Standing Committee on House Management.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE ALEXANDER BELL PATTERSON

Mr. Speaker: I am very grateful that many hon. members have remained. Our colleague, Alex Patterson, who was well known to many of us in this place, and certainly well known to all of us from British Columbia, has passed on. This is our first chance since that happened to speak appropriately of Alex and give our proper sensitivities to his family. I am going to ask the hon. member for Fraser Valley East to commence.

• (1520)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour today to say a few words to note the passing of Alex Patterson, a former member of this House of Commons and my predecessor as the member of Parliament for Fraser Valley East.

Alex Patterson spent most of his adult life working on behalf of the people in Fraser Valley East. He represented the riding in Parliament for most of the period between 1953 and 1984. In that period he earned a reputation as a hard worker and served as an MP for both the Social Credit Party and the Progressive Conservative Party.

Alex generated a good reputation in the riding not based solely on his ties with the Social Credit Party or the PC Party but more as a hard working gentleman who emphasized being involved at the grass roots level in the community.

Alex Patterson was born in 1911 in Raymore, Saskatchewan, a prairie boy like myself, and moved to Abbotsford in 1951. It was in the early years, while carrying out his responsibilities as a minister of the gospel in the Church of the Nazarene, that he was approached to run in the 1953 federal election. His background and training in the church gave Alex a very clear view of right and wrong. He tried to emphasize these positions in his speeches during his first election campaign and continued to do so as the member of Parliament.

Alex was first elected in 1953 and then defeated in the Diefenbaker sweep of 1958. He was re-elected in 1962 and was defeated in the Liberal victory of 1968. He was then asked to serve under the Progressive Conservative label instead of the Social Credit label and accepted that challenge. He was elected in 1972 and served in this House until 1984 when he announced his retirement and I was nominated to stand as the Progressive Conservative candidate.

It was my privilege to attend, along with my wife, the funeral services held in Abbotsford on April 6 and to express the condolences of my wife and myself to his wife Charlotte, their four children and their spouses and his many grandchildren who were there. They are a credit to Alex and Charlotte's life together. I want them to know that this House appreciates the contribution that Alex made not only to the community of Fraser Valley East in British Columbia but to Canada in his service in this House of Commons.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition it is an honour to pay tribute to our late colleague and friend, Dr. Alexander Bell Patterson.

There are many things that might be said about the former member for Fraser Valley, subsequently Fraser Valley East. Which member of this House, except for the member for Parry Sound, like Alex won fully nine of the eleven elections he contested over more than a 30-year period?

In 1965 Alex was acting national leader of the Social Credit Party. In 1972 he changed parties and was elected again. As a friend, Ewald Rempel, noted the other day: "Regardless of what party he ran for he would have won. He was very popular".

People might dispute why he was so well loved. Having known him between 1979 and 1984 I think his success had much to do with his religious values and deep personal honesty. He saw elected office as a stewardship, an extension of the church ministry. He would never put himself ahead of his constituents. He cared about all of them without favour and without fear. He worked hard for farmers, small business people and all others in the Fraser Valley.

This is not to say that our colleague, while often low key, could not be blunt. Members will perhaps recall what he once said about the Trudeau government: "It has destroyed the confidence of the international community in Canada's economy. It has destroyed the confidence of Canadians". Similarly, he once described the CBC as: "One of the foremost purveyors of anti-social, anti-family, amoral philosophy, contributing to the undermining of the moral fibre of this nation". He was concerned with more important issues than political correctness. Pierre Trudeau campaigned twice during six months in Fraser Valley East before the 1974 election in an effort to beat him but Alex was re-elected.

I must not close without making reference to his beloved family, his wife Charlotte and his four children, Lawrence, Ruth, Goldie and Wayne.

In summary, Alex was a strong family man who both inspired and instilled traditional values and commitments to one's calling. The early years, when MPs were allowed one train trip for every three-month period, were often difficult but he was committed to doing the best job possible and working for the constituents of the Fraser Valley riding he represented for nearly 24 years.

Columnist Allan Fotheringham said prior to one election: "The Fraser Valley is definitely Patterson country". Community was important to him and he enjoyed the charity work carried out through his long-time association with the Kiwanis Club and the Chamber of Commerce. He was a good man who served full time in the Christian ministry for over 20 years before he was persuaded to run for Parliament. A colleague commented that his experience in the pulpit made him one of the easiest speakers to listen to in this House. Though his voice was strong and authoritative in the House his firm Christian faith was quiet and always consistent. His background in the ministry served him well in encouraging what he thought was the ethical fibre needed in parliamentarians.

When a secretary passed away and no funeral was planned several staffers asked Dr. Patterson to lead a memorial service for those who wished to remember and pay their respects. It was not unusual for colleagues and staffers from various areas of the Hill to drop by his office to discuss a difficult time or ask for a word of encouragement and advice.

Following a stroke in early March of this year our friend was in hospital for four weeks when family members were able to gather. He passed away peacefully in the arms of Charlotte, his loving wife of 56 years, with his children at his side. Alex is fondly remembered, deeply missed and will always remain so to his family, friends and colleagues here. He will remain a perfect example of a faithful husband and father.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic caucus I would like to extend our condolences to Mr. Patterson's family and to join in remembering him and his service here in the House of Commons.

I remember him personally. We shared five years together here. Although I did not have the opportunity to work with him in committee and therefore did not get to know him very well the overriding image I have of him is that of a real gentleman. He was a fellow whom one could speak to in the elevator, the hallway or the House, and although members said he could be forthright he was the kind of person one felt one could talk to. Sometimes those things do go together. I want to express our condolences.

Looking over Mr. Patterson's career before I came to this House I noted that he was defeated twice and re-elected. That is not something that happens to a lot of members. It is an unusual thing for someone to be twice defeated at different intervals and then re-elected. It shows his commitment to the House of Commons as a place where he wanted to live out his commitment to his understanding of reality.

I note also that he was a minister in the Nazarene Church and I appreciate that element of his vocation as well. Although as a fellow Christian I may have come to different conclusions about how we express our Christian faith in political life that is something I also want to take note of and to respect.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, I want to join my colleagues in paying tribute to a man everyone here respected. He was a man of whom it is easy to speak well because he was a good man. He was thought well of in the party, in the entire House of Commons and obviously by his constituents.

I remember my former colleague, the former member from Capilano, told me once that when Alex Patterson was speaking he would come down from his office and listen to him in the House. That says something about the quality of speaker that Alex Patterson was. It was good oratory but it was also good content. He was a good member of Parliament.

I think the members of the opposition also recognized that while he spoke in opposition he did not speak in malice. There is a great deal of difference between the two. We in the House of Commons need to learn lessons like that from a man like Alex Patterson.

Obviously he was also a good member for his constituency. As members who have spoken before me have noted, he was a man who was constantly re-elected. As my hon. friend from Winnipeg Transcona has mentioned, he could also be defeated but was re-elected. That does not happen too often.

He was re-elected under changing circumstances for his riding. If one compares the boundaries of his constituency in 1953 to what they were in 1984 one recognizes that there were many changes in his constituency both in its size and in its constituents. Yet he commanded the respect of the people all through those years. At the outset it was a constituency that was probably entirely agricultural and certainly rural. By the end of his career it was changing and becoming light industry and commercial. Certainly today that constituency is enjoying a different kind of change. Through those changing circumstances he always enjoyed the support and respect of his people.

I guess one could say that with Alex Patterson you could get old and maybe even old-fashioned, in the best way of interpreting that word, but he was never an old fogy. Old-fashioned in the best sense of the word, he maintained the values that have given Canada strength and made it the country that it is today.

We pay respect to him because he could be a pillar but he could also be pliable. That speaks well of him.

I want to join others in that respect. He was always in touch with the people. One could not be re-elected the way he was without being in touch with the people.

In the words of the book of Acts it was said that Barnabas was a good man. The same could be said of Alex Patterson.

I would like to add just one anecdote which does not come from his political career or the Chamber but his family life, which he has passed on to the next generation. He was a man of Scottish descent. As other members have noted, he was a minister in the Nazarene Church. One of his children went into the ministry and decided to go for further training in the United States south of the Mason-Dixon line. The grandchildren were put in public school in kindergarten.

On the first day home from school his grandchild came home all enthusiastic. He came home and said: "Mom, I have a terrific teacher. She looks just like you". The mother was pretty excited about this and could not wait for parent-teacher night to arrive so that she could see this teacher who looked just like her.

The night came and she went to visit the school to see her son's teacher, and she was black. Here is a teacher teaching a child who did not see the colour. That did not happen by accident. That was not a casual incident. That happened because the parents learned from their parents that all men are created equal and they are created with dignity by their creator. They learned that everyone deserves the respect of everyone else regardless of who they are. That is the kind of a heritage that Alex Patterson passed on to his children who then passed it on to their children. That is the lesson all of us need to learn from a man like Alex Patterson.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank hon. members for their commentary and I advise the House that the proceedings will be sent to Alex's family immediately.

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is a privilege to present a petition which I am told is signed by approximately 47,000 Calgarians with respect to reforming the Young Offenders Act.

• (1540)

The petition begins with a reference to the late Ryan Garrioch, an honours student of 13 who I understand was killed by a 15-year old fellow student in his school yard. The petition concludes that the Young Offenders Act should be replaced with a measure having a maximum age for young offenders of 13 years instead of 18 years as it is now.

In closing, this is the largest petition by far that I have ever had the honour to present. I should note the anguish of Ryan's parents, Stu and Marg Garrioch, when they came to Ottawa recently with this petition. It is an honour as a fellow Albertan to accept their invitation to present it today.

HIGH PARK PHARMACY POSTAL OUTLET

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am tabling additional petitions to those already tabled from constituents living in the High Park area expressing their opposition to the closing of High Park Pharmacy postal outlet No. 166.

The petitioners state they are very satisfied with the service and the location of sub-post office No. 166 located in High Park Pharmacy. They call upon Parliament to urge the government to keep postal outlet No. 166 located in the High Park Pharmacy operating in its present state and location.

The users, by the thousands, are very pleased with this postal outlet and cannot understand why the government wants to close or move it.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Amos, Landrienne, Rivière-Héva, Saint-Mathieu and Val d'Or, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they are conducive to greater violence.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that when reporting acts of violence, freedom of the press should be restricted, and that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may incite others to engage in similar acts of violence.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

WATER EXPORTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents as well as a number of residents of the Salmon Arm, British Columbia area.

They point out their very grave concern in that they consider the North America free trade agreement is opening the door for the future sales of water from our rivers and lakes to the United States and northern Mexico. They point out that NAFTA does not have water as an exempt category as raw logs and unprocessed fish on the east coast are identified. They are asking that water be identified as an exempt category and simply that we should not sell our Canadian water to the United States or Mexico.

CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a group of three petitions all relating to the subject matter of child pornography.

The petitioners are from all over British Columbia but I specifically note the petitioners from my own riding. They are people from Port Moody, Port Coquitlam and Coquitlam, British Columbia. The petitioners ask that anyone selling materials relating to child pornography be held punishable by law.

I am pleased to table this group of petitions on behalf of these petitioners.

Question No. 465—Mr. Dingwall:

> From 1985 to the present, with respect to the Department of Supply and Services, how much did it spend on procurement in each province and territory?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): The statistics in this report do not cover all goods and services purchased by the Government of Canada. Supply and Services Canada (SSC) procures only 55 per cent of the total goods and services bought by the federal government.

SSC neither awards contracts nor maintains contracting statistics on the basis of electoral or other boundaries. To produce the following listing, SSC sorted its procurement data base by postal code.

The statistics do not necessarily reflect the origin of the goods and services purchased. More often a contract is listed in the area where the contractor is located and does not reflect any subcontract work or other services carried out elsewhere. For example, fuel puchases from Esso are part of a total $249,678,000 government purchase from Esso Petroleum Canada through its office in Nepean, Ontario, but the fuel is not refined in Nepean. Nor does the oil come from Ontario. Nepean is a point of billing only.

Finally, many contracts are multi-year in nature and are accounted for only in the year of award (i.e. major Crown projects such as large shipbuilding contracts).

Question No. 478—Mr. Barrett:

Since January 1, 1990, have there been any inquiries made of the government or any of its agencies, boards or Crown corporations regarding a possible sale, lease or other disposal of Royal Roads Military College, its lands or buildings and, if so, who made the inquiries and which departments did they contact?

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Since January 1, 1990 the Department of National Defence has received inquiries regarding a possible sale, lease or other disposal of Royal Roads Military College. However, according to the Privacy Act the names of persons who made these inquiries cannot be divulged to a third party.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Beatty that Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

• (1545)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to continue the remarks I began before Question Period.

The central point I was dealing with was the fact that Bill C-62 was putting forward policy objectives. Those objectives designed a telecommunications system and policy which asserted clearly that the national government's direction was going to be the overriding, ultimate authority for telecommunications policy in this country.

For the last seven or eight years this country has witnessed a government that year after year has worked against the principle it is enunciating today. Our national institutions, national programs and Crown corporations have served every region of our country, especially those regions that were very difficult to serve. We have had a total dismantling of many of those programs and institutions.

I have never hidden the fact that I am a strong centralist. I believe passionately in a strong national government. When I read the opening section of this bill, clause 7, I could not believe it. It read like Liberal policy. This is a government that has been advocating constitutional arrangements time after time. Just recently the referendum was on a document that promoted a massive decentralized system. When I read this bill and found it approached our Canadian telecommunications policy in a comprehensive way where the national government had clear-cut authority, I was very pleased.

I must say that I believe this is what Canadians want. When we get to committee if every aspect of this bill meets the test of supporting the over-all broad policy objectives then I think this bill will have little difficulty in getting through this House.

Another point I want to make about the bill and about which some people are concerned is that there is definite direction in this bill for the cabinet or the Governor in Council to intervene from time to time to give direction to the CRTC. I personally have no problem with that.

One of the problems this country has is that there are too many instances where the bureaucracy has more control or gives more direction to the agenda than the elected politicians. Ultimately we are the ones responsible for the laws of this land. We are the ones responsible for the decisions that are taken in every region of this country and at every level of a particular department. Therefore, if from time to time the Governor in Council has to intervene and give direction on a certain aspect of our Canadian telecommunications policy I have absolutely no difficulty with this. It will be held accountable in this House of Commons or in committee if a decision is faulty. Ultimately it will be held accountable with the electorate.

I suppose the natural concern when dealing with an agency like the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission is that we would be concerned about patronage opportunities. That type of accountability is the easiest to define and watch and thus cause the government to be answerable for its actions.

The other aspect of this bill that I thought I would touch on was clause 46. This is a very controversial clause and it is a very hot issue in my community and in urban areas right across the country. It has to deal with unsolicited telecommunications. "The commission" means the CRTC. Clause 46 reads:

> The Commission may, by order, prohibit or regulate the carriage of any class of unsolicited telecommunications on the telecommunications facilities of a Canadian carrier to the extent that the Commission considers it necessary to prevent undue inconvenience or nuisance, giving due regard to freedom of expression.

I have had personal experience with this particular aspect of the law referring to the automatic or assisted dialling systems that certain companies use in our community. They use them in terms of the telephone and they also use them in terms of the fax machines.

Mr. Speaker, I have to tell you and through you the House that I have used such a system myself. About a year ago I heard about this system. It was a new technology. I could have my voice on tape and could give it to someone who had most of the phone numbers in the community on a computer. The computer would be programmed in such a way that my message could be delivered repeatedly.

About a year ago I used this system to promote the single-tax debate. I believe that tax reform is a fundamental issue in this country that needs review. I could not touch everyone in my community directly and certainly not everyone in my city of 2.5 million people so I hired one of these automatic dialling companies and within a month I talked to over 500,000 people. I did not personally talk to them. The person would be sitting at home and the telephone would ring. They would pick it up and there would be a taped voice. I started off the conversation by saying: "Hello, I am Dennis Mills, the member of Parliament for Broadview—Greenwood. I would like to take a few seconds of your time to talk about tax reform. If you do not have the time all you have to do is hang up the phone".

Something that most people do not realize is that one is not forced to listen to the message. One is obviously forced to answer the phone if one is home, but if one is not interested in tax reform one just hangs up the phone and the message ceases.

I was able to communicate in about a 30-day period to about half a million people. I must say that I did get probably 10 to 15 complaints a day and people did say it was not a very polite way to communicate. However, I must say that I received at least 40, 50 or 60 phone calls a day from people who wanted more information and who wanted to get involved in the debate on tax reform.

I used it for only a month because I did feel there were aspects of it that were in poor taste but the idea of getting a very simple message to a number of people in a very short time is a very innovative technology.

I know there are police forces that use this automatic dialling service to give out emergency numbers and to warn people about crisis situations in their community. They will have all the numbers of a particular community on their computer and they will push the button and all of a sudden the police will communicate an emergency message to everyone in the community. That is a good use of the technology.

• (1555)

There are other times when it is in the public interest to use that technology. I think when we are examining this part of the bill that we are going to have to bring in some of the controversial people that have been cited for using this service. I think specifically in my city of the gentleman by the name of Marvin Fine who I am sure has caused a lot of fuss. I think he was the originator of this service and he has been using it for a lot of experimentation. I have told him directly that not all of his work is something that I agree with but he has used it for community work in a very effective way as well.

When we are analyzing this particular section of the act we have to be very careful how we define it and how we give regulation to it.

The same thing happens with fax machines. I have used the fax system myself to send out messages. Some days one gets people who thank you for the message. They like it. Then the next day one gets someone who will call in and say: "I want a cheque for 7 cents for the fact that you used my fax paper without seeking my permission". I know that clause 46 of this bill is a hotly contested part of the legislation.

The point is that the public at large has asked us to take a look at every aspect of the telecommunications policy in this country. The minister responsible for culture and communications has in fact taken up that challenge in this bill. Quite frankly, I think he has done a pretty good job.

My colleague from Mount Royal, our lead critic in this area, has said that in committee we will be rigorous in making sure that the policy objectives as stated in the preamble are followed through in the interpretive sections. We are totally supportive of those aspects of the bill where we encourage Canadian ownership. We are totally supportive of the aspects of the bill that encourage more research and development. We are totally supportive of the aspects of the bill that use the telecommunications industry to promote our sovereignty and give a sense of binding the regions and making sure that the rural regions have the same access for the same price as the major urban areas.

Over all, I am in support of this bill. I hope that the minister will be receptive to the amendments that once integrated into this bill will make it a piece of legislation that all of us in this House can be proud of. Ultimately it will be something that will enhance and support a sector of our economy, the telecommunications industry, which makes us the envy of the world.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on behalf of the New Democratic Party on this bill.

The member for Okanagan—Shuswap is our party's critic on this bill and will be speaking in the debate. I am the former critic of some time ago so I would like to speak on this. Some of the things I said when I was party critic now seem to me to be coming true.

The last member who spoke said that we in Canada are known for being one of the great countries in the world for telecommunications.

• (1600)

I could not agree more. Telecommunications and transportation is how we have created modern Canada. That is how we have created a modern, democratic and somewhat equitable Canada.

We are in the process of losing not only our lead in telecommunications but the old notion that we could have the best telephone service in the world for the average person. We had a regulated system that worked and now the government is changing this for ideological reasons. It is changing something that worked.

This bill reflects the Conservative government's insistence to deregulate and to privatize wherever conceivable. It is pure ideology and it is not the way to good government in my view.

While my colleagues and I have called for an updated telecommunications act to drive Canada into the 21st century, this is not the right vehicle. Make no mistake about it, this is a hugely important industry.

Canada's telecommunications industry generated $21 billion in revenue last year. It employs 125,000 people and it accounts for 8.6 per cent of our gross domestic product after inflation. It is currently governed by an antiquated act called the Railways Act. We govern our telecommunications by an act better attuned to railroads than to electronic superhighways, which we now have in Canada.

I will try to give an example of what I mean by the problem of deregulation, ideology and so on. I asked a question last year in the House of the present Minister of Communications. I was asking a question about Bell Telephone and about how the government had now allowed competition by Unitel and other companies with the telephone companies and the result of what that would mean to the phone service in Canada.

The Minister of Communications got up and said to quite a smiling House: "There is the NDP member defending the phone company. Wow, I have never seen anything like this". Everybody laughed, it was a great joke and so on. I thought at the time how little we have really thought through this matter.

The phone company, specifically Bell Telephone, is the largest company in Canada. Its real competition in North America is with American telecommunications where it is about eighth or ninth largest. That is where the real competition is.

Smart countries like Germany or Japan in their economic policies would start helping their major company. That would mean protecting their major company and not hurting it. The major company of Bell Telephone could in fact compete where it really competes. It could compete with strength in the North American market.

What does this government do? It deregulates in the local Canadian market. It allows competition in long distance calls. It forces the phone companies to compete and to lose money in putting up lower long distance rates and to become in many ways less competitive in the international scene where it really counts for Canada.

I ask the government to think a little bit ahead to the real competition. I find it ironic that it should have to come from an NDP member to tell the government what real competition means in the world. That is what it means.

We do not think this bill should be passed at second reading for a number of reasons. The first reason is simple. According to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms that you are an expert on, Mr. Speaker: "The second reading is the most important stage through which the bill is required to pass for its whole principle is then at issue and is affirmed or denied by a vote of the House".

Therefore this is a vote on the principle of this bill. However, according to the staff of the Minister of Communications, this bill will undergo substantial amendments during the committee stage. At one time the Department of Communications was asked to redraft the bill to take into account the substantial amendments recommended by the Senate Committee on Transport which engaged in a pre-study of this bill. It is clearly not correct for the House to pass a bill in principle which will be altered fundamentally at committee.

Government members may argue that the principle of the bill remains unchanged but this bill contains seven sweeping policy objectives. Changing any of these policy objectives in committee would undeniably alter the principle of the bill. Indeed we might not even be able to change them in committee, it would be out of order. The Senate committee recommended changes to these policy objectives. How can any members in this House pass legislation in principle when the true form of the legislation will not be clear until the amendments are made?

We have precedents for this. The gun bill, of which I was a member of the committee, had quite a bit of disagreement concerning the original draft. The minister sent it to the justice committee of the House of Commons, not the Senate, the real committee where the real people are, for study and when we reported back another bill was drafted. The procedure actually worked.

This is what the government should do here. It should not ask the House to send the bill to committee while at the same time telling the House it is going to make major changes in the committee. It is not the right parliamentary procedure and a proper opposition should not vote for a bill like that.

A second and more substantial reason why it should not be passed is clear to anybody who pays a phone bill in Canada. That is a lot of people. I am talking about what has happened to people's phone bills. Have you looked at yours recently, Mr. Speaker? Phone bills are going up, just like cable rates are going up. But wages are not going up. Cable rates and phone bills are sure going up and they are going up pretty fast and pretty substantially.

They are going up for a number of reasons. In June 1992 the CRTC, the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission which supposedly regulates phone and cable companies decided to open up the long distance market. It accepted Unitel's application and assertion that long distance will not cost consumers more.

Let me pause a little bit and discuss Unitel. Unitel is Mr. Rogers and the cable people. Mr. Rogers, when he is the cable industry, has a monopoly and he milks it for all it is worth in increases in cable fees. He takes the money from the protected monopoly and he cream skims that monopoly, the cable industry, then he goes to the CRTC and he cries like a baby saying:"Boy, these phone companies have a monopoly here. I should be allowed to compete". He called it a communist, Leninist, Stalinist system. He said that we have to have competition. Of course he had the communist, Stalinist, Leninist system in the cable industry with the lack of competition but that is okay. He cream skims that, puts the money into Unitel and then starts competing with the phone companies.

What is the problem with that? Whatever Mr. Rogers and his friends want to do is fine except when it starts hurting the average Canadian consumer. Not only do they put it to the average Canadian on cable rates, then they take all that money, go into the phone industry and compete in long distance rates. The result is as I predicted until I was blue in the face in this House, in committee, before the CRTC that it would force local rates up and here is why. We have a system in which long distance rates subsidize local rates. We have higher long distance rates and lower local rates.

There have been two recent studies. One study was in Europe by the European Consumers Association. Another study was by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, the OECD, showing that Canada had lower rates.

We had a subsidy system and what happened? Who were the winners and losers? The people who made long distance calls had to pay a bit more, not a lot more because we are competitive according to the OECD but they had to pay a little more. Who are these people? You and I and the people who make the occasional long distance call, but by and large it is the big corporations who make the most long distance calls.

Who makes the local calls? It is the ordinary person. It is the local people and small business that make most of the local calls. Since we have had deregulation through the CRTC and through the ideological position of the government, we are now getting pressure to have higher local rates and lower long distance rates.

The phone companies say they cannot have lower long distance rates and still keep the same rates for our local calls. They have to survive somehow so they put up the local calls. Long distance calls come down, local calls go up. The winners are big companies; the losers are small businesses and individuals.

We told the CRTC until we were blue in the face and it still went ahead and did it. I challenge members of this House, both Liberals and Conservatives, to rebut this. Show me where competition has made the prices go down for the average person.

Bell Canada has applied to the CRTC for a rate increase. If its application is accepted, local rates will jump as much as 65 per cent. BC TEL in my neck of the woods in British Columbia has asked for substantial rate increases as well, not only in their local rates but in directory assistance charges and service calls. Alberta Government Telephone also applied for a 30 per cent increase in local rates. I could go right across the provinces—up local rates, down long distance rates.

I want to say something to the unions that were involved in this. I worked in the past with the TWU, the Telecommunications Workers Union from British Columbia with my friend Rodney Hiebert and the people at that union. I addressed them directly on this. I also addressed the CEP, formerly the Communications Workers Union of Canada, which is the Bell union based in eastern Canada. We worked together. We told these unions and they told us that this would happen, that local rates would go up, long distance rates would go down and the average consumer would lose out.

They tell me that there is a B.C. corporation—is it B.C. Rail—involved with Unitel. They wonder what an agent of the British Columbia government, which after all is a progressive government, is doing with Unitel. I wondered too, quite frankly. What is it doing with Unitel? It is going to force up local rates for ordinary people. There is no way out. If long distance rates are lowered local rates have to be raised or the phone companies will go out of business. It is hurting the average individual. We should not have allowed the competition in long distance rates. People say it is inevitable and it had to be done. Nothing is inevitable.

We have a system in Canada where 98 per cent of people use the phone. We have a system where we have equality, where people in the north have more or less the same prices as people in the other areas. We will have a future system where the beneficiaries will be some big businesses in the major cities. The people in the rural areas and in the north will be paying more money. I predict that is what is going to happen. It is going to be the same with long distance rates.

When are the Canadian people going to wake up? They have seen what deregulation of the airlines did. The post office was practically deregulated and we have seen what that has done. Now we have seen what deregulation of the telephone industry has done and that is going to mean higher prices for the average Joe. That is what it means.

I also see that according to the government's own report—I love the way this is put: "The annual rate due to such changes"—that is the rates going up—"could amount to a drop-off rate of 2,500 to 7,500 subscribers across Canada". A drop-off rate of course is a nice way of saying that your aunt cannot afford her phone any more. Ninety-two per cent of Canadians were satisfied with their service.

I do not know but maybe I am too much of a conservative. I guess that is my problem. I believe if something is working, if it is not broken, why fix it? Why fix it so Mr. Rogers and his big business associates who contribute to the Conservative Party in a big way get their share? That is what it is. Who suffers but the average Canadian consumer?

• (1615)

We are not going to let this bill go so easily to committee. People want to know. People come to me in Coquitlam, Port Coquitlam and Port Moody in my riding, to my friend from northern Ontario and my friend from Nanaimo and say: "Look at these bills. My cable rates are going up". I showed them how they could say no, that they did not have to take the cable rates, but Rogers was not going to tell them that. Their cable rates are going up.

Now they are coming to me and saying: "My phone rates are going up but my pay cheque is not going up, and I am paying more in taxes. What is going on?" I will tell you what is going on. It is a pay-off to the friends of the Conservatives in this place. They say it is globalization and so on.

There is another reason why this bill should not be allowed second reading and it has to do with the North American free trade agreement, NAFTA, the agreement that the government is about to enter into without any real support from the Canadian people. It is a very smart government, is it not? Basically the free trade agreement fails because we lose employment, so what does the government do? We will sign another one with Mexico. Now that takes real brains, but the government proposes to do it.

The North American free trade agreement will grant foreign companies access to or the use of Canadian telecommunications networks and services "on reasonable and non-discriminatory terms and conditions". That is the phrase, reasonable and non-discriminatory terms and conditions. When I see a phrase like that I worry. In other words, on terms and conditions no less favourable than those accorded to Canadian companies.

The chapter goes much further. It limits the terms and conditions that Canada will be able to impose in the future. Here is the kicker. Specifically legislators will be required to ensure that prices charged for telephone services are based on the economic costs directly related to providing such services. Although NAFTA would allow cross-subsidization between our existing telephone companies to continue, we will not be able to require resellers to make the contribution payments that are necessary to support universal service.

This bill does nothing to prevent the erosion of cross-subsidization. The bill actually encourages deregulation regardless of its effects on consumers and small businesses. In fact it takes us even further. We get into the free trade agreement which will make it impossible for any future government, any progressive government that may happen to be elected to make changes, any government that wants to come to the defence of the Canadian consumer.

We need a system where we pay attention to the universality in services. This is a big country and it is a northern country. That means we have to serve the people in northern and rural areas. They have to have communications. We have to keep the cost as low as possible.

We have to take our big companies like BC Tel and Bell and help them compete in the international scene where it really matters for Canada. That is the basis for a communications policy that is different than the policy of the government. That is why we in the New Democratic Party differ with the government on this bill.

I could go on and give other reasons why the bill should not go to committee but I have finished. I will close by making a plea on behalf of the poor consumers of Canada who are getting it put to them on cable rates and phone rates. I ask the government to please listen to their voices. Cut this ideology of deregulation and stop harming a very good phone system by this nonsense of helping your friends in Unitel and the other places and putting it to the Canadian consumer.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam. He now has the pleasure of being the critic in matters of justice but he was the critic in telecommunications and culture prior to that. I know he has some very strong feelings about the role and place of cable and what we should be doing with respect to cable and the question of convergence with regard to cable and telephony. I am curious to know if he is satisfied with the covering of the concerns of the cable and telephone industries. Why does he consider this bill to be a total deregulation? I believe the most important aspect of this bill is to provide a universal, affordable and accessible telephone system for Canadians at the local level. Protection of that service is inherent and must be pursued. While we are interested in telecommunications as the most forward-moving technology for the pursuit of improved jobs and job creation, it is not at the cost in any way, shape or form of a universal, accessible and affordable telephone system for all Canadians.

If the hon. member thinks this is under threat and a total deregulation, I wonder if he would pursue that matter somewhat or clarify it at least.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I must acknowledge the expertise of my colleague, the member for Mount Royal who is the Liberal critic in this area and has consistently followed this issue in the committee. I pay tribute to her for that. She is a very keen observer of this area.

May I just take a moment in responding to this? The hon. member has difficulty with my riding. I used to represent the riding of Vancouver—Kingsway. Due to redistribution and the movement to the suburbs I now represent a riding called Port Moody—Coquitlam, which is an eastern suburb about 30 kilometres from Vancouver. It is snuggled up against the west coast mountains and is a very beautiful, booming and dynamic community. Port Moody was the terminus of the transcontinental railway where the first train came until, of course, the real estate developers thought they could make more money in Vancouver and moved the terminus into Vancouver, according to Pierre Burton. That is the riding, Port Moody—Coquitlam. Coquitlam means salmon in Indian. It is a very nice name. It is a very fast-growing area with lots of cable subscribers and lots of telephone users.

I too am committed, as I think the hon. member is committed, to an affordable system, universal and so on. In my speech I was pointing out the dangers. I pick up principles in this bill that extend and use the wording again of deregulation, of the kind of neo-conservative agenda of government. I think that is a real concern in communications. I think it will lead us in the wrong direction.

There is an area for competition in communications. There is also an area for working with our stronger companies and using regulation and sometimes restraint of trade to help them. I am thinking of Bell. I took a lot of flak by saying that in the House. I tried to explain it today on the basis of building up the strongest companies and then competing at the international level where the real competition is.

As I said, the hon. member is more of an expert than I am with regard to cable. I will listen carefully when she speaks further on this matter here and in committee. However, it seems to me that the wording of the bill and some of the phrases lead into this deregulation language. That again leads to the problems we had in communication, which can be specifically seen in how we have a system where cable is half regulated and other parts are not. There is an 8 per cent increase and then a 300 per cent increase in the area that is not regulated. The phone seems totally regulated, but there is a push to get more money for local services. It seems to me we are putting ourselves into that bind.

I think we have to look at the fundamental principles before we can vote on the principle of a telecommunications bill like this.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can just make a comment and then ask the member a quick question. Clause 7 of Bill C-62 states:

• (1625)

> It is hereby affirmed that telecommunications performs an essential role in the maintenance of Canada's identity and sovereignty and that the Canadian telecommunications policy has as its objectives

(a) to facilitate the orderly development in Canada of a telecommunications system that serves to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, social, political and economic fabric of Canada;

At the same time I look at the Wall Street Journal of Tuesday, February 9, 1993 and see the AT&T advertisement essentially saying that in 1993 the border between Canada and the U.S. will no longer be a barrier.

AT&T has purchased an operating interest in Unitel, the corporation directly responsible for the breakdown and deregulation within the telecommunications system. I wonder if the member would comment on whether he thinks this act protects Canada's identity and sovereignty. Will the culmination of the free trade agreement, the North America free trade agreement and this bill further erode the sovereignty in the areas of communications and transportation within Canada?

Mr. Waddell: The problem is that we will not be able to require resellers of services to make the contribution payments necessary to support the universal service, in other words to cross-subsidize the local rate. The resellers will be people like AT&T.

AT&T, American Telephone and Telegraph, the largest company in the world could swallow the Canadian market in a hiccup. Its advertisement in the Wall Street Journal said: "In 1993 this border will no longer be a barrier". In other words, these companies will be allowed to come into Canada under this legislation as resellers. They will not have to cross-subsidize the lower markets. This will erode the first principle of the bill the member read and will lead to increased foreign control of our Canadian market just as we are doing in the airline industry.

Soon we will not have the Canadian border at all. It will be gone and these large companies will come in. If we want to have an independent country we have to fight for it. If we want to continue to have legislation and deals like this we are going to lose this country. That is what we are saying and why we are opposing this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before resuming debate it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough—Veterans Affairs; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Montreal Economy; the hon. member for Don Valley East—Cyprus; the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity-Conception—National Defence; the hon. member for London East—Municipal Taxation.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in this debate on Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications. It addresses so many concerns and complaints I have been hearing at the constituency office, town hall meetings as recently as last week, and from just talking to businesses and individual residents within Parkdale—High Park.

The concerns that have been raised fall into about five categories which are CB radios, unscrupulous advertising between post office and Bell telephone, unscrupulous telemarketing techniques, the PC Cops computer automated dialing program, which I want to share with the House and junk mail.

I agree that this is a very important bill. The direct advertising industry employs 100,000 Canadians. There are a lot of jobs in the high tech area. It generates over $20 billion in revenues. It truly is the railway into the year 2000 and beyond. This bill will probably start laying the rails and the new super tracks for this direction.

Our critic for the Liberal Party stated the importance of this bill when she said: "Canada needs a harmonized set of rules and regulations to give all Canadians equal access to telecommunications and the information revolution". That sums up the importance of this bill.

Let us look at the process this bill has undergone. I recall when the former Minister of Finance addressed this issue in his 1984 budget. I am looking at the date by the table officers. It says April 19, 1993. Where have we been since 1984?

Other budgets have addressed this. Then the Minister of Communications introduced the bill on February 27, 1992. Today it is April 19, 1993. Where has the minister been for 14 months? For 14 months the bill has not been touched. I can lay it two to one that before the debate is over on this bill, the minister will probably bring in closure or time allocation limiting debate on this important and extensive bill.

Let me begin with the first set of concerns my constituents have been calling me about, which is the whole area of CB radios. When we were in government an owner of a CB radio had to buy a licence. It was registered so it was known who the owner of that radio was, the serial number of the CB radio, et cetera. Then the Conservative government came in and in its almost psychotic move to deregulate everything, deregulated the need for CB ownership and use. Now anyone can go into a store, a child of eight or nine or any person, purchase a CB radio and go on the air with no regulations and no holds barred.

I had a problem with two organizations competing for the same airwaves and running quite a feud over the airwaves so all the rest of the people could listen in. If it was just innocent listening I would not mind but there was a blockage of the airwaves. They would set screechy noises up to the radio microphone so no one could hear what the words were.

Then came the swearing and cursing. This was not language fit for the airwaves. I addressed this to the former Minister of Communications and the present minister. To date, nothing has been done. I must give some credit to the bureaucrats. They came to Parkdale and tried to bring some peace to the airwaves but they could not.

Then came the harassment of women. I thought I had heard everything, but I have never heard such foul language as I heard on the CB airwaves in my own riding. The foul language was harassing women. What some of these men on the radio waves did to debase women is not what I want in Canada. I see the minister shaking his head. That is not what he wants for Canada. We want standards in Canada for the telephone, the radio airwaves and in the press. This is why Canada was named the number one country by the United Nations last year. It is because we did have standards, whether those standards concerned TV, radio or telephone.

However, two ministers could not eliminate the kind of harassment some of the women in my riding of Parkdale—High Park are still putting up with. I am not pulling this out of the air. I asked people who were harassed to send me copies of the tapes. One person did. I shared some of those copies with our critic and then sent them directly to the minister.

This has been going on since I was re-elected in 1988. We cannot clean up the CB airwaves. What kind of a government are we? If we cannot clean up this kind of harassment of women in our society, we are not fit to govern. I hope the minister, who although he is not sitting in this House I am sure is watching this debate on TV, will take it to heart. Hopefully this bill will also assist in helping us to clean up the airwaves for the CB radios.

The second group of complaints I have been getting and which this bill addresses concerns the unscrupulous uses of advertising. I am not talking about the strict telemarketing techniques. I am talking about what is going on between a Crown corporation, Canada Post, and Bell Canada.

The postal person delivers flyers to people's homes. I am sure it does not happen only in my riding where unemployment is so high. It is the first time in history that the unemployment rate in a large city like Toronto is higher than the national average. It is heart-breaking to see these people, who have used up their unemployment insurance and do not want to go on welfare, come begging for jobs. They get a flyer delivered to the door and what does it read? "Employment opportunities. Make up to $500 a week, guaranteed $15 an hour". Who would not jump at that? If I were unemployed and using up my UI and did not want to go on welfare would I not read this flyer? Would I not do what this flyer instructs me to do?

What happens with this flyer that is delivered to our homes by the post office? Someone who is unemployed will pick up the phone and call, all excited because there is a job waiting, but it is a scam. By making that call the person has to pay $10 minimum. The person is unemployed and has used up his or her UI. Some are on welfare and some do not want to go on welfare. However, we get these jokers pulling a scam like this on hundreds and thousands of Canadians. Is that what Canada is all about? Are those the standards we want in our country? Is that what we are all about?

The scam is that $10 is paid but there is no job in the end. There is a special 1-900 phone number to call and they are asked to send a résumé. They send a résumé but they do not hear from these people. A whole year goes by and still there is no job. It is a scam. I do not know what else to call it.

The poorest of this country's poor are being taken because of this government's psychosis to deregulate everything. "Private enterprise can do it all. Government has no role. It should not interfere." It is time that someone does interfere to clean up the mess the Tories have got this country into over the last nine years. I would hate to think what would happen to Canada if they were in government for another nine years.

I apologize for speaking with such strength and almost anger. When one sees how these people have been taken it does make one cry.

Let us look at the telemarketing advertising techniques themselves, which are increasing. Most of the complaints I receive are about these. The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood admitted that he had used this technique himself to promote his single tax system. At least he was polite enough to tell the listener very early in the message: "If this message is not for you, please hang up".

It still does not stop the phone from being in use. Last week I had appointments in my constituency office. The other lines were busy but I thought the main line was open. I picked it up and there was a telemarketing message. I had to wait 10 minutes before I could use my own telephone. Because my telephone is controlled by the computer, it tied my constituency line up for 10 minutes. I really have a question of privilege because my duties as a member of Parliament were being denied. My carrying out my role and calling my constituents was hampered by this technique.

There is no need for that. CRTC can set a time limit on these messages. They do not have to be 10 minutes. They could be one-minute messages or maybe two minutes maximum. If you cannot say what you want to say in one minute then do not say it. We make a lot of statements before Question Period in this House of Commons and they are one-minute statements. I think we say quite a bit in that one minute.

One complaint I received from a constituent was that she was trying to get a doctor but could not because her phone was tied up with a telemarketing message. Someone complained because they could not get a 911 number during an emergency. Let us say there is an emergency and a child is suffocating or someone has a heart attack and minutes count. Seconds count. One cannot wait 10 minutes for that telemarketing message to finish before dialing 911 or phoning emergency.

Is that what we want in our country? Are those the standards we want? I say no. Then there are the complaints I get from the owners of cellular telephones. They are in the car and get a telemarketing message. They do not like it so they hang up but the message goes for 10 minutes. What do they pay for, one minute? No, they pay for 10 minutes. Is that fair?

I understand the bill is going to address some of these problems. If it does, I will support this bill. This bill can address a lot of the issues I am raising here. They are people issues. They are not fictitious issues. They are day-to-day people issues, issues affecting people daily.

That is why I am so pleased we have such a strong critic on our side. Any time I received one of these complaints and referred it to her she followed it up. I see a lot of those concerns brought in to the bill. Whatever the committee was doing or saying, I think someone has been listening.

Let me give an example of where this technology can be useful. I am not blocking modern technology or future technology, no. That is the route we have to go. I think that is where the jobs are for Canadians in the future. We should address this as a nation.

The problem with our education system is that it comes under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but who sets the direction for the country for the next 20 or 50 years? It should be the federal government laying out clear goals for the next 50 years. Then the provinces could build their curriculums based on these goals. Then we would have direction and would not be stuck with the 1.5 million jobless we have today.

I promised to give an example of how this technology can be used positively. The Metropolitan Toronto Police, No. 11 division is in my constituency and has introduced the PC Cops computer system. Groups such as the Neighbourhood Watch programs, the Sunnyside and the Swansea rate payer groups, High Park, Runnymede and Jane Street rate payers associations, Roncevalles, Bloor West Village, the Junction Business Association and the local Villager newspaper, all co-operated with the police on the PC Cops computer system.

This system asks people to register if they would like to be on this telemarketing system. It is a computer phone system. Everyone registered gets the messages. What kinds of messages are sent by computer? Messages if there is a missing child, if there is a break-in in the community, assaults. Everyone who is registered gets this call by computer. If there is any kind of criminal activity in the community, the whole community is notified and it does not take 10 minutes. The message is only one minute. If this bill were to do anything to limit telemarketing messages to one minute then it would be doing a great service. These messages go through in 60 seconds. The introduction by the Metropolitan Toronto Police of this PC Cops computer program is an excellent use of this modern technology.

I do want to raise the concerns of Robert Morie and Ed Radonic from my riding. They have small businesses and they say their businesses are being interrupted with junk mail. The fifth issue I said I get a lot of complaints about is the junk mail on the fax machine. It really affects a small business when the fax machine is tied up continually with junk mail. We get faxes in Ottawa but again it is appropriate use of the fax machine. In the morning I see piles of fax sheets all the way down to the floor but they are about the present crisis in the former Yugoslavia where people have relatives and friends. They fax me messages because they are concerned about their relatives. Again I am not knocking this modern high technology. I think it is good, but let us put it to positive use.

I am glad the minister came in to the House. I am sure he will take the concerns of my constituents in Parkdale—High Park and address them in the bill so we will have a good bill in the end.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been in the House to hear what the hon. member has had to say. My colleague always brings some very interesting and serious concerns to the attention of this House. He is obviously one who listens very carefully to his constituents.

I was quite interested in what he had to say about what seems to be a serious abuse of this new technology. I think it could work in a very positive way in the interests of the consumer and the business world. I do not think they are necessarily mutually exclusive goals. I do think there should be informed consent and he put it best by saying to put the names on a list, something of that nature.

I was intrigued while I was listening to the hon. member speak. I must say that some of the things he clarified in his presentation came as quite a surprise. I went back to see what the Privacy Commissioner had to say. He shares a lot of the hon. member's concerns, but he makes three fundamental points which are very important. I would hope the hon. member's constituents in terms of the concerns he has brought to my attention and to the attention of the people of Canada through his remarks today would find comfort in the observations of the Privacy Commissioner. Of course there has to be freedom of expression in this country. It is fundamental in the Canadian charter and is balanced by what is reasonable and justifiable in section 1.

The Privacy Commissioner said that the first ingredient would be that of informed consent. In other words, you know what you are asking for, you put your name on the list and therefore you agree that your name could be used. If you do not agree then they have no right to use it. The second was that it would not be costly. There would be a cost neutrality.

The hon. member talked about the fact that this was not cost neutral. It was an awful teasing. It was an unpleasant and unjust experience where people were looking for work and this fraud took place. There has to be some way in which it is cost neutral and we have a way of verifying what is the content in the message that is to go out. You cannot hide behind the fact that you do not know what the content is. I think that is the message the hon. member was giving. That would be found in the third agreement which the member says should be open and transparent.

I would like to ask my hon. colleague a question. If informed consent, cost neutrality and openness or transparency were in place, would the hon. member agree that this new technology could be in the interest not only of the telemarketer but the constituents who would want to use this new technology?

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we need. There will be many bills related to and affected by this bill. If all that is put into place as recommended by the Privacy Commissioner, it would go a long way in satisfying the concerns of my constituents.

I mentioned the PC Cops program. Everyone knows they are registered. The police asked for contributions but they also stressed very clearly that they do not have to make a contribution to participate in the program. A financial contribution would be appreciated but it is not required for participation.

Many of my constituents have difficulty with English as new Canadians. They will call and unknowingly they are charged the $10. The $10 is in fine print down at the bottom. They phone looking for a job and then they get a $10 bill because it is hidden in small print. My constituents would certainly be very pleased if as our critic said these issues could be guaranteed.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given the opportunity to address this particular piece of legislation. Most Canadians who have been listening to my colleagues will by now have no doubt noted that this is a major piece of legislation. We are talking about an electronic railroad, something of which Canadians can be very proud in the future.

We are talking about a major industry. Over 100,000 individuals are affected in terms of jobs by the communications industry and there are over $20 billion of expenditures. It is really what one could consider a strategic industry for the future, for Canada, for Canadians. It will have good jobs, I hope long-term, well remunerated positions for young people and those who want to change employment.

I say that because I think it is particularly important we take the time to discuss this thoroughly. As I indicated it is a major piece of legislation.

[Translation]

This bill is very important in several ways. It is not only about the future but about good, well-paid, long-term jobs.

• (1655)

This is something that should be considered very seriously and carefully.

[English]

Some people are going to be asking why though. If my information is correct this was introduced over a year ago. It appears to have been stalled in terms of going to the legislative committee for some time. Why is there a big rush at this particular point in time? I mean people will be asking the inevitable question: Was government not thinking this through? Did it not plan appropriately? I suppose some will say that there does not appear to be any particular raison d'être, planification, rationalisation. Why the rush at this particular point in time?

There are some positive features in this bill that my colleagues have spoken about in an attempt to come to grips with a major industry in Canada, something that is growing and something that is here today and has been with us for some time but opens tremendous opportunities for the future.

Some concerns have been voiced. For example, I have received calls and correspondence from individuals who have wondered and have asked whether or not the local rates would in fact be affected as a result of the legislation. Will they increase and, if so, by how much? I have received some calls from seniors. These individuals sometimes want to use the telephone rather extensively because of limited mobility and what have you. I also received some from poor families, people who already have a great deal of difficulty meeting their objective to meet the daily needs of their families with their meagre resources.

Of course among those poor are single parent families most often headed by mothers. If local rates are going to be affected, if they are going to increase, if there are going to be substantial increases, we really need to be particularly concerned. I have assured them that I believe this is not necessarily the case. I hope what I have said is in fact correct. I certainly would like to have some confirmation of it.

Some other individuals have asked whether or not this is in fact a bargaining chip being used by the government in terms of its North American free trade agreement. Just to make sure that I reflect their views correctly, I want to quote what was said to me. They believe that this bill would lead to the selling off of our telecommunications industry and of course the loss of Canadian jobs, particularly today when we are in a recession and there are many people unemployed, well over 1.6 million people. There are great difficulties being experienced by Canadians who want to work. This is of great concern to those particular individuals, not only those who are unemployed but those who still have jobs and really want to be able to maintain them.

There again I would hope that this is not—and I believe it is not; if I am wrong I hope someone will correct me—an attempt to take the first step toward making sure that Americans can buy into this particular industry which I consider very Canadian. We happen to be in the forefront. We happen to be world leaders and I want us to stay there. I want to make sure that whatever progress is made can be made in co-operation with other countries, that we retain the leadership and that we continue to make the discoveries that are going to benefit Canada and Canadians generally.

[Translation]

As I just said, there is opposition from some people, and I mentioned two areas. Some people believe that residential telephone rates might go up. Of course there are those who wonder if this would lead to the selling off of our telecommunications industry or if the government as a result of a risky involvement with the United States might lose control of an industry which is perceived as "belonging" to Canada.

[English]

One thing these people have asked is: "What are you people going to be doing with this bill? Will you be supporting it?" Yes, we will, providing certain conditions are met. I just want to share with my colleagues and people who may be listening some of the concerns and some of the things we want.

Liberals continue to believe in a strong Canadian telecommunications system that provides universal, affordable, reliable and modern basic telephone service for Canadians from coast to coast. This is particularly important in a large country such as ours where often there are small communities isolated from larger centres and where there is a need to communicate.

As a result of our desire for this type of system, my colleagues in the Liberal Party and I agree that complete deregulation of this sector is not really in the public interest.

We also agree that Canada must have a regulatory system that meets Canadian goals. I think that is very important. It must meet Canadian goals and should not be weakened through either the North American free trade talks or the GATT talks. I think that is of exceptional importance. We can still be involved with NAFTA if that is to be the case and with GATT, but we need to make sure that whatever happens we protect our own particular interests.

My colleagues and I also believe that this bill should provide a fresh direction for the telecommunications sector so it can maximize the benefits to every Canadian of the world-wide information revolution in terms of learning, literacy, education, training and communicating.

Let me just very quickly dwell on a few of the problems that have been brought to my attention. Some people would suggest that there needs to be some major changes. There are problems with the definitions clause, clause 2, for example how hybrid companies will be dealt with. On the power of direction, the government did establish power of direction. However it has also maintained the power to vary or rescind CRTC decisions at the same time which mitigates against that.

There are also concerns with respect to exemptions. For example, some of my colleagues and I are not convinced that exemptions for certain classes of carriers should be in the bill itself. As well the vary or rescind power by Governor in Council should be replaced we believe by the set aside or refer back power now in use. We believe this latter alternative is superior.

As well there are concerns about provincial consultation, tactical standards, ministerial authority to grant licences to carriers, and those are but some of the examples. I should point out that there are also no provisions in this bill for Canadian ownership and control of our telecommunications system. Although I understand there may be an ideological difference between the government and this party over that, there ought to be provisions for Canadian ownership and control of our telecommunications system.

I want to make the following point which I consider equally important. As this legislation proceeds I shall and so will my colleagues be working with colleagues from all parties for changes in the bill to ensure we maintain a telecommunications system which is Canadian owned, which enhances the international competitiveness of Canadian industry and which serves as a unifying communications link among all Canadians at this difficult time in our history. As I indicated before, I want to stress that while there are a number of positive features in this bill there are a number of opportunities to improve it. I do not pretend I have identified all the major concerns, but certainly if one looks at my remarks and the remarks of my colleagues that have been made in this House I think we can have a better final product.

[Translation]

As I just said, the government has taken some positive steps in certain sectors, but there are still some flaws that should be corrected. I would really like the minister and his government to listen not only to what I am saying but to what all of us have said in order to try if possible to correct, the situation, to be more responsive to Canadians' needs to ensure that it remains our system, that we can improve it, that we will keep the best jobs for Canadians and that we can remain leaders in this critical sector for Canada's future.

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Bill C-62 I should point out that part of the problem those of us in my party are having with this bill is that the minister in his remarks this morning made it very clear that the bill is going to need substantial changes. Yet it is difficult for us to be able to determine whether at second reading stage this bill should be allowed to go forward as is with the idea that there will be other perhaps substantial and substantive changes in the direction of the bill without knowing ahead of time exactly what those are.

I have a question for the House and for the minister. If there are substantial and perhaps substantive changes to be made to this bill it might make more sense to simply withdraw Bill C-62 or leave it where it is until the time comes when the bill can in fact be set out to the House in the terms and direction in which the government wishes to take the bill.

It would certainly be handy from our point of view, if there have been substantial changes already drafted, to be able to look at some of those changes with respect to the bill before us. I say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that I think it would be of assistance to those of us on this side of the House to know the direction in which it is going. Perhaps if there are going to be substantial changes the minister might want to consider at this stage withdrawing the bill and putting forth the bill as it will ultimately be put forward.

In speaking directly on the bill I would like to refer to clause 7 of the bill. For the purposes of those watching the debate and for the purposes of those who will perhaps want to look at Hansard as bedtime reading in the future I would like to read clause 7 and make comments on it. It is the Canadian telecommunications policy and objectives.

> It is hereby affirmed that telecommunications performs an essential role in the maintenance of Canada's identity and sovereignty in that the Canadian telecommunications policy has as its objectives
> (a) to facilitate the orderly development in Canada of a telecommunications system that serves to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, social, political and economic fabric of Canada;
> (b) to render reliable and affordable telecommunications services of high quality accessible in both urban and rural areas in all regions of Canada;
> (c) to enhance the efficiency and competitiveness, at the national and international levels, of Canadian telecommunications;
> (d) to promote the ownership and control of Canadian carriers by Canadians;
> (e) to promote the use of Canadian transmission facilities for telecommunications within Canada and between Canada and points outside Canada;
> (f) to foster increased reliance on market forces for the provision of telecommunications services;
> (g) to stimulate research and development in Canada in the field of telecommunications and to encourage innovation in the provision of telecommunications services; and
> (h) to respond to the economic and social requirements of users of telecommunications services, including the protection of the privacy of individuals.

With the advance of technology, particularly transportation and communications technology, it is essential that we have an updated and upgraded telecommunications bill. We must have a bill that looks at what is in the present, learning from mistakes of the past, but with a view to the projections of what will or might occur in the future.

Certainly from the perspective of one who is not well versed in telecommunications matters, but like everybody else in Canada is well aware of how telecommunications has weaselled its way into our everyday living, the Canadian telecommunications policy appears to be a policy set out that can well do the job if in fact we set out our policies and our legislation as laid out in those eight particular subsections that I have read into the record.

Let us just analyse what has happened in Canada and what is happening at present. We can perhaps have a projection of what probably, as a result of the past and the present, will happen in the future.

Look at the policies of this government and the policies as set out in Bill C–62 coupled with the policies that it set out in the past through the free trade agreement and the North American free trade agreement. Are these going to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, social, political and economic fabric of Canada?

If we look at the direction that has been taken I question whether the sovereignty of our communications systems is being protected. Look at the over–all pattern of deregulation that has been a trademark of this government for the past eight and a half years in the transportation system and the privatization of such things as Canada Post. Have we protected our sovereignty within these areas? Have we enriched our social, cultural and political fabric?

I would suggest that we have not. If we look at the bill and at what is happening within the North American free trade agreement, then it appears that NAFTA would grant foreign companies access to or use of the Canadian telecommunications network and services on "reasonable and non–discriminatory terms and conditions". In other words, this would be on terms and conditions no less favourable than those accorded to the Canadian companies.

I look with some concern over the bid and I have spoken on this before. I have presented petitions on behalf of hundreds of constituents within my riding on the successful bid of Unitel to enter into the long distance market essentially on the backs of companies that developed and cross–subsidized local rates within the telephone network.

Here is what happened with Unitel. AT&T, the giant telecommunications network, has purchased a 20 per cent interest in Unitel and is using it as a method of getting into the Canadian telecommunications network.

This is of some concern to me. The bill itself protects Canadian companies in the situation where it will only allow 20 per cent of the telephone company to be owned by a non–Canadian or foreign company. That is positive. However, if we look at the advertisement of AT&T, it appears to show us that it considers this as a method of breaking down the border between the two countries. In fact, it is their first foot in the door. Their excess capacity in a corporation of that size is so substantial that it could swallow up the whole system within Canada without blinking an eye or without having to swallow particularly hard.

Let us look at clause 7 where it says:

> to render reliable and affordable telecommunications services of high quality accessible in both urban and rural areas

This brings up the problem of what has been called, within the area, cross–subsidization. It is the provision that allowed companies to use increased long distance rates in order to subsidize and ensure that regional disparities, where it cost more to take telephone lines into a rural area, are made reasonable so that everybody within that area has telephone service available to them. This included companies such as BC Tel in my home province, Alberta Government Telephone in Alberta, Bell Telephone in Ontario and in some of the other provinces as well as Sask Tel in Saskatchewan.

However, it also deals with local rates for basic telephone service. My colleague from Kamloops pointed out what was occurring in his area with respect to telephone rates. He pointed out in his speech a number of cities within the United States where there has been deregulation and what the local rates are there.

If one recalls, the rates varied from something like $26 up to $47 in various parts of the United States for local telephone rates. However, in most areas in British Columbia the local telephone rates are anywhere in the area from $11 to $14 or $15.

It is interesting that this debate should come up at this time because on April 12 I received a letter dated April 1, 1993 from the BC Tel Company signed by E.L. Patterson, the executive vice-president and chief operating officer. In the first paragraph he said: "Today BC Tel announced its intention to file an application with the CRTC early this summer for a general rate increase. We also applied today for interim local rate increases. The proposed interim rate increases range from $4.05 to $4.15 for residential customers and $3.05 to $4.15 for business customers".

During the debates and in the petitions that I presented to the House and that others in my party presented to the House, we constantly reminded the government of some of the experiences in the United States with deregulation within the communications networks down there and the probability that there would be a loss of jobs as well as increased local rates for telephone users.

If I go on with this letter from Mr. Patterson, I would quote two paragraphs within the body of that letter. He points out: "Historically telecommunications in Canada has been regulated by social rather than economic policy considerations. Local rates have been subsidized by long distance revenues in order to provide universal access to the telephone. In fact BC Tel cross-subsidizes local service with 60 cents of every dollar of long distance revenue. To achieve this subsidy the price of long distance service has been kept artificially high.

With the introduction of long distance competition this historical balance has been changed. Competition brings many benefits to customers. However, as competitors claim an increased market share, the subsidy available for basic service diminishes. While some competitors are required to contribute to local service, their contribution is significantly less than BC Tel. As well, few people realize that BC Tel is currently required to subsidize our competitors' entry into the market; competitors which now include AT&T, the world's largest telecommunications company".

If I go on and look at that one side it is obvious that the rates of local service are going up, as we predicted. If we look at one of the government's studies we can also see that there will be rate increases not only to consumers but to small businesses as well.

A briefing document from the Department of Communications discusses the effects of long distance competition. It says that the competition will require gradual decreases and cross-subsidization and therefore increased rates. This will hit residential and small business users hardest while big business users will benefit.

In the same briefing document the Department of Communications quotes a Peat Marwick study which suggested that local rate increases over five years of between 13 per cent and 93 per cent would be required. This would represent 2 per cent to 12 per cent per annum. It is interesting to note that this government document also mentions a drop-off rate and states that the annual drop-off rate due to such changes could amount to 2,500 to 7,500 subscribers across Canada.

What is a drop-off rate? It is simply a nice way to tell Canadians that this is the number of people who are no longer able to afford to have a telephone in their own home.

It seems that the affordability that is looked for in this legislation is slowly slipping away from not only the regular consumer but from the small business person who will have added costs as a result of this.

From the point of view of employment it is interesting that on April 16 Brian Canfield, the president of BC Tel, announced that the company is working to reduce its staff size by 4 per cent this year. It has already seen 422 employees accept volunteer separation packages.

In a news release Mr. Canfield said: "The entry into the Canadian market of the U.S. phone giant AT&T, which bought 20 per cent of Unitel after the CRTC last year approved Unitel's entry into the long distance field, added weight to BC Tel's argument that inflated long distance rates should not be used to subsidize artificially low local rates. It is ludicrous that BC Tel should be put in a position where we must indirectly subsidize AT&T, the world's largest telecommunications company".

It appears that what is happening with the direction of telecommunications legislation and the telecommunications network in Canada is that it is becoming less affordable for Canadians and we are losing jobs as a result of the policies that have been set out. I hope the direction the government chooses shores up some of what has already been lost in ensuring that Canadians are granted sovereignty over their telecommunications systems and that Canadians are assured of affordable telephone and telecommunications systems within Canada.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest to the member's speech. One of the areas of concern that he has flagged is the situation as it relates to how employees of the different companies that are involved in telecommunications will be treated under the new legislation.

I am very interested in knowing from the member and his party how they feel this particular piece of legislation will adversely affect the working men and women who are involved in the telecommunications field.

• (1725)

In looking at the bill it seems to me that what we are doing is standardizing regulations in a broader sense. Instead of having all these different provinces being able to do their own thing they will have more consultation with the federal government and have a system that goes across the board. It is hoped that in the long term, it may not be so obvious in the short term, this will put in work rules for individuals across the board and give them the opportunity to be heard, and of course at the same time give them the kind of work rules we would like for our workers in Canada.

Being one of those people who advocates national standards and national rules, and I had assumed that the member who just spoke and his party felt the same way, I would be interested in knowing why the hon. member's party seems to think that this would be a step backward for workers in this particular industry instead of a step forward, as I think it is.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to look at the bill itself. I think the remarks I made at the start of my speech made it very clear that the direction in which the government wants to go is so foggy that we cannot actually see where we are ultimately going to be as a result of the legislation.

I made suggestions that perhaps, as was done with the UI bill, this bill should simply be allowed to die. The direction the government wants to go should be put into a bill to give us some direction as to where it intends to take us in this legislation.

I agree with the member who posed the question that changes must be made in the legislation. There is no doubt about that. We are now in a situation where things have changed so substantially just within our lifetime that it is not good enough to try to depend on old legislation that is out of sync with what is happening nowadays.

If we look specifically at the regulation of the industry we can see that this legislation appears to be dumping off some of the responsibilities we have given to the CRTC in the past back into the political field. Every decision the CRTC will make from now on will be diminished with respect to regulation.

I am somewhat sceptical about whether it will help or hinder the proper regulation across Canada if we have constant interference of the politicians within the system as opposed to regulation by the CRTC.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in his remarks the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt spent some time discussing the problems that some of the provincial telephone companies are having with government legislation relating to the forced integration of those companies' infrastructures into national services provided by competition from outside and inside the country.

We have a government that is very taken with maintaining the right to intellectual property under the GATT and has provided legislative changes in this Chamber up to and including extensions to copyright and patent legislation and eliminating our licence system for patented drugs. Can the member enlighten us as to why the government is pursuing that range of proposals securing the right to property and to systems that are in existence yet is attempting to create competition through the imposition of AT&T and Intertel, et cetera, on the provincial telephone systems? They are in effect being told to permit these people to use part of their lines and systems so that people can rent their long distance charges.

Why does the member suppose the government has fallen off its very clear ownership set of principles in this case? Does it simply hate government-owned and provincially owned monopolies so badly that it is willing to close its eyes to that principle?

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very interesting question. One has to wonder whether the member did not give the answer himself in posing the question in that what we have seen over the past eight and a half years has been a government interested in privatizing everything, whether it be Canada Post, Petro-Canada, Air Canada or almost anything we want to name. It has tried to take away and denationalize everything and put it out into the private sector.

Dealing with intellectual property, it seems that the agenda has been somewhat controlled by large transnational corporations such as AT&T. Is this another situation like that of the drug patent bill where the large transnational drug corporations wanted to ensure and assure their profits for a longer period of time. Similarly, do the AT&Ts of the telecommunications world want to get their fingers on to a pulse which they see as being more lucrative and more profitable?

I would suggest to the member for Mackenzie that this is a projection of the policies we have seen of this government to break the backs of the small Canadian companies and allow the AT&Ts of this world ample access to the telecommunications network of Canada, including the research and development aspect of it.

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you first of all that I will share my time with the hon. member for York—Simcoe.

Canada's history illustrates the importance of communications as a means and condition for the nation's economic, social and cultural development. In fact, telecommunications is the first Canadian high-technology industry and provides an essential infrastructure for the economic development of the country.

Canada now has three main communications systems, those of Stentor, Unitel and Telesat Canada; two mobile cellular telephone systems; one overseas telecommunications system, Teleglobe Canada; 49 other telephone companies, located mainly in Quebec and Ontario; about 200 radio communication companies providing mobile radio-telephone and paging services; and finally more than 22 companies specializing in the resale of services.

The whole industry—that is, the above companies as well as the equipment manufacturers—does $23 billion of business and employs over 100,000 people and is one of the fastest growing sectors of the Canadian economy. More than 98 per cent of Canadian households have a telephone and public surveys invariably show satisfaction with the quality of service. The telecommunications industry has grown essentially in a monopolistic framework. The telecommunications company had a monopoly and provided all the facilities, services and equipment, from sophisticated transmission and switching facilities which were the very base of its system to the ordinary residential or business telephone set.

However, regulation by the various governments was extremely fragmented. It was based on a series of different regimes involving only one level of government: seven provinces regulated 30 per cent of the Canadian market, while the federal agency regulated the rest. Thus major interprovincial trade barriers made the Canadian market smaller and more fragmented than it should have been.

A decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in August 1989 clarified and simplified the sharing of jurisdiction. The court concluded that the main telecommunications companies in Canada, namely telephone companies in the Stentor system, come under federal jurisdiction. This ruling thus paved the way to an open Canadian market.

In the past few years, we saw the emergence of a very complex technological and economic environment contributing to the gradual elimination of traditional boundaries between telecommunications markets thus calling into question the traditional monopolistic approach.

The diversity within the Canadian telecommunications market, together with the requirements of globalization and stiffening international competition, made inevitable a re-evaluation of government policy and regulatory practices.

I would first like to say that the present world trend in telecommunications is toward gradual liberalization of market regulation and privatization of state owned telecommunications companies.

In keeping with this trend and given the small size of our domestic market compared to the markets of our main trading partners and the complex fragmented regulatory structure, the Canadian government thought that the country needed a policy that could apply to the whole territory and a more flexible regulatory regime that could encourage innovation and the faster development of our leading high-tech industry.

The foundation of this policy was laid in 1987 and is the framework for Bill C-62.

The CRTC's recent decision to allow competition in the long-distance market makes new telecommunications legislation even more necessary.

[English]

In conclusion, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) I move:

> That the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications.

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-62 at second reading.

Canada today faces many great challenges. Technology and global economic forces are exerting a pervasive influence on all aspects of our lives. They are changing the nature of the goods and services we produce and the markets in which they are sold.

Globalization is also affecting the kind of jobs we have and the way we make a living. To an increasing degree the goods and services we produce are exported and the companies and workers we compete with are in foreign countries. These global economic and technological forces are making every country look more to trade for economic growth and the creation of new sources of wealth and jobs.

We can no longer afford to depend solely on our resource industries to carve out a place for ourselves in the new world economy. In the decades ahead we will have to depend on our educational institutions, our highly skilled work force, our creativity and our ability to innovate to ensure that we continue to grow and prosper.

Telecommunications now plays a central role in many of these global economic and technological developments. We cannot hope to compete in the world information economy of the nineties and beyond without a strong telecommunications industry and a modern and efficient telecommunications infrastructure.

A critical step in this process is to update our outmoded telecommunications legislation and streamline the regulatory and policy making processes. The Railway Act, the principal statute by which the telecommunications industry is currently regulated, was enacted some 84 years ago in 1908 long before the computer, the microchip, the satellite, the optical fibre or the laser were invented. This gives you an idea why Bill C-62 is so important to all Canadians.

Bill C-62 provides a comprehensive legislative and regulatory framework for telecommunications that will ensure Canada keeps abreast of improvements in productivity and industrial competitiveness in the future.

This legislation will provide the industry with a more modern and efficient regulatory process by establishing a single, national legislative framework. The bill will streamline the regulatory process by giving the CRTC an important new tool, the power to forbear from regulating services which are subject to fair and equitable competition and is in the public interest. It will also provide a power to issue directions to the CRTC on general policy matters to support and enhance the principles laid out in the telecommunications policy objectives.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I apologize because I did not understand the motion tabled by the hon. member for Ahuntsic. It is moved by the hon. member for Ahuntsic that pursuant to Standing Order 26(1), the House continue to sit beyond the normal hour of adjournment for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Will those members who object to the motion please rise in their places.

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As fewer than 15 members have risen in objection to the motion, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1) the motion is adopted.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, this bill will provide power to issue directions to the CRTC on general policy matters to support and enhance the principles laid out in the telecommunications policy objectives. The bill will also empower the Governor in Council to review, vary or rescind CRTC decisions as is presently the case. It will safeguard Canadian ownership of one of our most important industries.

Finally, it will provide for the establishment of technical standards for telecommunications facilities and require the CRTC to give effect to such standards. I just want to comment that Bill C–62 is important legislation that enjoys strong and far–reaching support from both the industry players and consumers. It has implications for the competitiveness of our companies and industries as well as for job creation and economic renewal. I would urge all members in the House to give it most serious consideration.

While I am on my feet I would like to move:

That the question be now put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion is in order.

• (1745)

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to rise on behalf of my constituents in Sudbury to discuss proposed legislation and to scrutinize it on behalf of all Canadians.

Bill C–62 is an important bill. New telecommunications legislation is absolutely essential and has been needed for some time. It is also extremely important this legislation be done right because it has taken a very long time for it to come forward. We certainly do not want it to be handled in a willy–nilly fashion in order to push it through this place without it being appropriate.

As the 21st century approaches, Canadians find themselves in a world changing more rapidly than ever before. Global competition is upon us. We realize that successful nations in the years ahead will be those that understand and take advantage of the changes taking place.

The rapid growth of international trade and capital flows have created the so–called borderless world and Canada must find ways to ensure it is a winner in this new global economy. For this reason we on this side of the House will continue pursuing policies of reform here at home, reforms that will make Canada stronger, more united, and more competitive around the world.

The changes in the world economy are nowhere better reflected than in today's changing telecommunications industry. Global networks and players are changing the telecommunications universe and reinforcing the idea of a global village. If communications created the global village then telecommunications today is shrinking the global village.

Not only is this industry's own structure evolving, it is also playing many new roles. New technology, new protocols and new services are letting individuals and corporations use telecommunications services more and more often, whether it is a fax machine, automated bank teller, toll free phone call or computer sharing information on a network. Small, medium and large corporations use telecommunications to link offices, reach customers, and move billions of dollars of capital around the world daily on an instantaneous basis.

In short the age of our telecommunications system serving for simple phone calls is over. It has become an important building block in Canada's competitiveness and the unifying communications link among Canadians from coast to coast to coast.

The telecommunications sector is an essential tool for building vital economic and social links, marshalling industry, social, educational and cultural forces into an efficient national system of communication among Canadians of all regions.

Telecommunications can boost the competitive position of industries in all regions by making it possible to locate knowledge-intensive and service sector enterprises of the future in all parts of Canada. It is especially important in a country such as ours which is far-flung. Some communities are looking for ways of participating in the 21st century.

Let us look at what we are seeing today in Bill C-62. It appears as if the minister would like the House to deal swiftly with the bill which he introduced over a year ago on February 27, 1992 and which he is only at this time advancing for second reading.

We in the Liberal Party have supported this bill going to committee but we said at the outset we wanted assurances that the minister planned changes to the bill as virtually everyone in the telecommunications industry has said are necessary. Until today and for 14 months that has not been forthcoming.

I wonder why the minister has not made some amendments to this bill. We are all very much aware they are needed, as is everyone in the industry. I have very little understanding why absolutely no changes were made to this proposed legislation.

We have some serious problems with the fact that the minister and his government have delayed this bill, not the opposition. The minister has had the tools at his disposal for over a year to build a national consensus on this bill and he has not done it.

The minister has had a very useful senate pre-study report in his hands since June 1992 and has failed to act on it. The minister has failed after 14 months to undertake a serious constructive effort that would have built a consensus on this bill and enabled it to come forward in a way that would have been good for the telecommunications industry, Canadian business and Canadians. That is how I see this process.

It should be a constructive open process and not one of delay. I want the record to clearly show that the government controls the agenda in this House. The opposition does not. Let the responsibility for this bill languishing on the back burner be on the minister's shoulders.

I certainly hope we do not start hearing outside this place that somehow the opposition has been responsible for the mishandling and delay of this bill. The minister was unwilling to bring it forward. I want that to be absolutely clear.

We take telecommunications issues just as seriously as we do the parliamentary process. We are not a rubber stamp here to approve a flawed bill. It is not the opposition but the minister who is responsible for coming in at the eleventh hour with his bill asking us to trust him on the amendments. It becomes very difficult for anyone to support a bill going to committee when the minister himself raises questions about it.

Having said that, we put the interests of Canada above the minister's messy handling of this bill and we want it to go to committee. Why is this bill important?

Let me address for a moment why this bill is important. Telecommunications is Canada's electronic railroad for the 1990s. It employs more than 100,000 Canadians and generates over $20 billion in revenues. It has emerged as an important and strategic industry for our entire economy.

The bill can help us create the knowledge and intensive high technology jobs of the future. It can help Canada locate these jobs where people are, which is often outside traditional business centres and particularly in our regions.

All this cannot happen by itself. As an industry that remains highly regulated, the telecommunications sector requires the appropriate policy, legislative and regulatory environment in which to succeed. This is why Bill C-62 with proper amendments and improvements is a fundamentally important bill. It is also why we are so disappointed that it took nine years for the government to produce this bill and almost another full year before getting to second reading.

These delays say a great deal about the Conservative commitment to telecommunications. The delays and inaction going back to 1984 were not only poor public policy choices at the time but over time have contributed to a closed door, behind the scenes decision-making process that in the end led us to a flawed bill.

In addition to these flaws, the government's failure to lead a national discussion of telecommunications policy means Canada has never developed a clear strategy. This government never sat down, looked at the telecommunications industry, studied all of its various component parts, compared how they worked together and came up with some clear directions.

That is the approach that should have taken place. It is a view that was supported by a number of witnesses to the Senate pre-study hearings on this bill. In our view, once a strategy was developed the government opposite could have taken directions from that for drafting a bill. Unfortunately we are now stuck with the results.

We have no national strategy but we have a flawed bill that needs a lot of work. Never was there a white paper, a green paper, any coloured paper or any thorough public review of telecom issues. Never did this government ask the people of Canada: "What are your goals? What do you want to see from your telephone system?"

Never over the past nine years did we see an open process that said to the business community: "Come and have your say. Let us put your comments on the record before we draft a bill, not after".

The worst part is that despite glowing words from Conservative ministers, from the Minister for International Trade and the hon. member for Frontenac to Flora MacDonald and the Minister of Communications, they have never produced the vision to match the rhetoric.

• (1755)

Let us briefly review these commitments. We can go as far back as the trade minister's November 1984 economic statement when he said: "There is a clear need for national telecommunications policy to take advantage of the opportunities presented by rapidly advancing technology and the growing demand by Canadians for new telecommunications services". He added: "Through regulatory reform the government can spur innovation and provide a major stimulus to the Canadian economy". Yet there was never a bold strategy leading to this Bill C-62.

I can keep going back but I will not because it just repeats itself and we will see over and over the lack of strategy and over-all planning that has gone into producing this bill.

Our present minister tabled Bill C-62 in February 1992. Four months later he said at a Senate pre-study: "To delay its implementation", and he was referring to Bill C-62, "would be to slow the growth of an industry which is vital to the Canadian economy".

Yet it is over a year after introduction and this bill is only now coming forward for second reading in the House of Commons. Canadians can see that this government has left this industry in a substantial policy vacuum while pillars of the sector were developing extremely quickly. The government simply never kept up with the pace of changes. It never addressed how the environment was progressing and therefore never demonstrated a clear understanding of what needed to be done. That is why we have a flawed bill before this House today.

In essence this government left Canada labouring under century old legislation and a long series of ad hoc decisions affecting the pillars of this industry, the onset of competition, the privatization of Telesat and Teleglobe, and tremendous advances in technology and services, with no coherent or co-ordinated approach from government, something we have called on this government to produce for years.

What are we left with in Bill C-62? What should the goals of this bill be? The bill must provide a fresh direction to the telecommunications sector so that it can maximize the benefits to every Canadian of the world-wide information revolution in terms of learning and literacy, education, training and communicating. It must bring the marvels of this revolution from our biggest cities to our outermost communities. However this bill, as introduced last February, is far from what the country needs.

Let me turn to a number of issues raised in the bill, just some of the issues raised in the Senate's report because we cannot address them all today. Let me deal first with how the bill addresses jurisdiction.

We support the bill's attempt to unify national jurisdiction over telecommunications. We supported the Supreme Court in August 1989 when it ruled in the AGT case largely in favour of federal jurisdiction over telecommunications.

Liberals believe Canada needs harmonized rules and regulations governing this sector if all Canadians are to have equal access to the benefits of the information revolution. How the transition rules work and how regional sensitivities are taken into account certainly must be studied at committee.

Clause 2 concerns definitions. In terms of definitions there was much study in the Senate on this question. I believe it is worth examining more closely how resellers are treated in this bill in terms of whether they should be included in the bill but then be considered for relief from the act where appropriate through either the exemption or the forbearance provisions. That must be explored.

We also need to see how the so-called hybrid companies will be dealt with. They are companies that may be part reseller but own some facilities and are therefore part carrier. This too must be cleared up at committee. As the CRTC said in the Senate the ambiguity in the definition must be removed by clearly setting out what is meant to be included and excluded.

As for power of direction, the government did establish a power of direction providing for broad policy directives to be issued by the Governor in Council as guidance to the CRTC in the Broadcasting Act. Having that in this bill for telecommunications matters is not a surprise. It raises a red flag of concern when the minister is establishing this new power of direction in telecom matters and maintaining the power to vary or rescind CRTC decisions at the same time. We do not want the CRTC becoming a rubber stamp for the minister if he has so much control over the process. That is our concern.

The question of exemptions from the act must be examined very closely. I agree with the Senate report that the CRTC should deal with exemptions when they come up. I am not convinced that specific exemptions for certain classes of carriers should be in the bill itself. If certain classes of carriers are worthy of exemption then the CRTC can certainly deal with this appropriately. Why do they have to be permanently in this bill?

On provincial consultation, in this transition to uniform national regulation of telecommunications, because of the Supreme Court's 1989 AGT ruling, it would be useful to have a mechanism for regional input. However, clause 14 dealing with provincial consultation must not create an open-ended, almost veto power over federal decisions that would inhibit an effective national telecommunications policy from working. Exactly what limits are appropriate under this clause must be carefully examined at committee.

Under clauses 17 and 23 concerning the minister's licensing of carriers, I have great difficulty with the minister grabbing so many new powers in this bill, in particular his idea of licensing carriers. First, we have never been convinced of the benefits of licensing at the same time that the CRTC is regulating communications carriers. The question is: Why politicize entry into this market? Why give the power to issue, renew and revoke licences if the licence in the minister's opinion furthers the bill's telecom objectives for Canada when the CRTC would still have to do the regulating anyway? It adds a layer of red tape that is not helpful and places the minister in the middle of a process that should be left up to the CRTC.

Again these straightforward arguments would have been clear to the government had it bothered to undertake an open public dialogue on these issues long before depositing a bill before Parliament. They are heavily supported by a number of interventions at the Senate hearings on Bill C-62. The suggestion to remove licensing altogether or to move it to the CRTC requires further attention.

What are extremely important are our Canadian ownership rules. If the minister is set to remove licensing from this bill then we will need to see how the criteria and objectives of the licensing regime will be met. Canadian ownership and control is one of the key areas. We believe we need to do everything we can to foster a strong, dynamic Canadian telecommunications system. We need to make sure our own people, our own workers, our researchers and scientists, our own manufacturers, software and hardware designers, all have a chance to prosper and remain on the leading edge of technology.

Putting Canada first is not the right way to put it, nor is closing the door to having Canada telcos participate in global alliances. We cannot stand in the way or stop globalization. What we say is let us make sure there are sufficient safeguards in place so that Canadian interests are protected so that when foreign companies come net benefits to Canada are top priority.

Security will definitely have to be paid to have the 80 per cent domestic ownership requirements work, how the grandfathering will work and how future ownership changes of any other company fits these new rules. We have to ensure that this bill serves Canadians and the Canadian telecommunications industry. It is absolutely essential that this be the best possible bill we can put forward to serve the future needs of Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is that the question be now put. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

During the ringing of the bells:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the opposition Whip to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the recorded division on the question now before the House stands deferred until after Question Period tomorrow, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[English]

It being 6.08 p.m., the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill S–17, an act to amend the Copyright Act, the Industrial Design Act, the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act, and other acts in consequence thereof, without amendment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition on behalf of a large number of constituents who recognize that the Government of Canada is joining with the governments of Mexico and the United States in establishing and negotiating side agreements to the North American free trade agreement. They are asking that the Canadian government ensure that an agreement is negotiated which will state that nothing in the Canada–U.S.–Mexico free trade agreement applies to Canada's water resource in other than bottled form and that large–scale exports of Canadian water, whether it is through diversion, pipeline or other means, shall not be conferred by any of these agreements.

Again, in terms of the North American free trade agreement and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement, they want water to be excluded.

VIOLENCE

Mr. Guy Saint–Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition from residents of Lebel–sur–Quévillon, Val–d'Or, Senneterre and Barrante, in the riding of Abitibi, who say that films depicting violence on television are dangerous and therefore unacceptable because they are condusive to greate violence.

The petition also says that all toys that incite children to play violent games are unacceptable and their manufacture should be banned. It is also pointed out that when reporting acts of violence, freedom of the press should be restricted, and that the repeated broadcasting of news about acts of violence on television, on all channels, and on radio may incite others to engage us similar acts of violence.

Therefore your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to pass the appropriate legislation in order to eliminate violence in our society and thus protect our children and give all citizens a better quality of life.

[English]

FREE TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to introduce a petition to this House signed by constituents from Ottawa, but most of them from my home district of Regina, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners ask the government to not proceed with the North American free trade agreement until after the election, an election that has to occur this year. The petitioners call upon this House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in my first petition we have petitioners who are concerned about the government's tax on books and reading materials. They indicate that there has been no such tax since the beginning of this nation and they point out that there are no other countries in the world which have such a tax.

These petitioners point out that it is counter-productive to increased productivity and to literacy, which are goals which we seek in our society.

BILL C-93

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in this petition I have people who are objecting to the government's Bill C-93, the proposed merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. They suggest that the government is neglecting it completely, that it is going to be wiping it out. They ask the government to rescind, to put away this particular bill, to re-think it. They point out that in their opinion the government has not proven that there will be savings to Canada and that there will be increased efficiency.

Question No. 494—Mr. Fee:

For each fiscal year since 1968 to date, how much did the federal government spend on capital expenditures?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and minister of State (Finance)): The answer is as follows:

Capital Expenditures since 1968
($ millions)

1967–68	$750.6
1968–69	$719.2	1980–81	$1,753.0
1969–70	$663.9	1981–82	$2,174.5
1970–71	$560.0	1982–83	$2,621.7
1971–72	$686.0	1983–84	$3,565.0
1972–73	$664.0	1984–85	$4,810.8
1973–74	$875.0	1985–86	$4,471.0
1975–76	$1,207.5	1987–88	$4,604.3
1976–77	$1,375.3	1988–89	$4,654.2
1977–78	$1,552.2	1989–90	$4,676.6

This table represents federal government capital expenditures from Expenditure by Standard Object tables, Public Accounts. This includes all spending on construction and/or acquisition of land, buildings, works, machinery and equipment over $1,000. Minor capital expenditures under $1,000 are not included. These figures represent all capital expenditures: those with outside parties as well as capital expenditures internal to the government. These expenditures are as reported in Public Accounts and have not been restated to reflect any conversions of departments to Crown corporations.

Point of Order

POINT OF ORDER

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order regarding the question of freedom of speech.

• (1015)

This is not the same question I raised as a question of privilege on March 11, but rather a point arising from public reaction to the actions of the majority of the members on the Bill C–113 legislative committee and to the ruling on that action.

The rules in this place are interpreted by you, Mr. Speaker, acting as judge of the court of Parliament on what is or what is not allowed according to the rules of this place. Like a judge in a court, you interpret the rules set down by the legislature. It is not within your jurisdiction to change them no matter how unfair or damaging the ultimate result may be in a particular case.

As you stated in a March 31 ruling on another matter and I quote:

> The Chair is constrained in what the Chair can do by the rules which this House has passed. It is not surprising that sometimes the hon. members or even the members of the public feel that the rules we have set for ourselves may in some cases be unreasonable or even worse. However, it is extremely important, I think, that the Chair be bound by those rules until the House decides to change them.

It follows then that if there is a problem with the rules, the rules must be changed. Legislatures have consistently acted to amend legislation when courts have interpreted it in such a way as to create an outcry among the people who must live under the laws and their interpretation.

This is what I am asking you to do here today, Mr. Speaker. It is clear that there is a great deal of public concern about the possibility of future committee witnesses being arbitrarily silenced by a majority of a committee who do not like what they have heard from those witnesses.

A number of editorials and columnists have spoken out against the possibility of arbitrary censorship.

This place has been under attack from many different quarters for lack of democracy and lack of relevance. Some criticisms are more valid than others. However it is vital that we as parliamentarians pay attention to the voices of the people and do the best we can to make this place work in the interest of all the people of Canada, not just those whose views we find soothing or acceptable.

We have a section in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which guarantees the fundamental freedoms of Canadians, including freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression. This right is subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. Freedom of speech is no less important in this place. Beauchesne's sixth edition, citation 75 states:

> Freedom of speech is both the least questioned and the most fundamental right of the Member of Parliament on the floor of the House and in committee.

Beauchesne's also states in citation 109:

> Witnesses before committees share the same privilege of freedom of speech as Members.

It is vital that we as parliamentarians bring our guarantees of freedom of speech into line with those enjoyed under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Freedom of speech is not unlimited but the limits on that freedom must be very explicit. That is the state of the supreme law of Canada. The supreme law of this place should also reflect that fundamental principle. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask you as a parliamentarian who shares my concern for freedom of speech and respect for this place to refer this matter to the House management committee to study and recommend changes to the rules.

These changes must address the need to guarantee freedom of speech in clear and unambiguous language while balancing this right against the legitimate need for decorum and order in committees. By acting quickly and decisively on this important issue, I believe we can take a significant step toward restoring the reputation of Parliament among the people of Canada.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I believe that what the member for Timmins–Chapleau has requested that you do is to take to the House management committee a request to review the rules governing freedom of speech in committee.

I am rising on that request. We in this place have already set limits that occur for members of Parliament on what they can say.

• (1020)

In fact, in the presentation by the hon. member he says: "Freedom of speech is not unlimited but the limits on that freedom must be very explicit".

As you know, we in this House are bound very clearly by what we can say. Similarly, witnesses and members of committee are bound by those same rules in committee although they are under the control of committee.

I believe that the rules governing freedom of speech were appropriately applied in the instance that has caused this point of order to be raised. Any time a member of Parliament or a witness appearing before a committee levels accusations of fraud or corruption against any member of this place, that member's freedom of speech has exceeded the bounds.

I would suggest that if the member is adamant that this should be reviewed there are other methods for him to do so. I do not believe that you, Mr. Speaker, as our representative should act on my behalf to request a change. I think the rules as they stand right now are adequate.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order raised by the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, I would like to submit to the Chair that this does not constitute a point of order, as the hon. member did not refer to a Standing Order that would have been breached. In my opinion this is the same point of order the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau raised before this House on March 11, on which the Chair has ruled.

Standing Order 10 clearly states that, once the Speaker has decided a point of order, no debate shall be permitted on such decision and no such decision shall be subject to an appeal to the House.

In responding to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Timmins–Chapleau on March 11, you said that it is up to the committees to decide whether they want to report all of their proceedings or only parts of them.

Furthermore, I would like to submit that it is not the place of the Speaker of this House to make rulings on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms; it is up to the courts to decide.

I humbly submit that this point of order is inadmissible.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to be very brief in my intervention in support of my colleague from the New Democratic Party. He has put forward a very fair and equitable suggestion to the House.

In listening to my learned colleague across the way, the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader, I want it to be very clear that my colleague from the New Democratic Party is not revisiting. He is not asking you to re-rule or revisit your decision of March 11. He makes that very clear.

He does raise, however, a fundamental issue of considerable importance to all members of Parliament and the public as well, which is the right of freedom of speech, including where that may not take place.

My colleague has made that argument in a very succinct intervention. He is requesting that the Chair not adjudicate negatively or affirmatively on the subject matter which is in question. That is not the remedy he seeks.

My colleague seeks to have the subject matter, which he believes to be of sufficient importance, referred to the House management committee so it can examine what the hon. member and other hon. members have to say with regard to the right of freedom of speak.

I hope that on the basis of simple fairness and equity this will in no way reflect badly on the Chamber. In fact it will reflect very favourably on the Chamber if such a subject matter can be referred to the House management committee.

I might add that this committee has representatives from all three political parties and is open to other members of Parliament who wish to participate. They may go to the committee and debate. I support my colleague in the remedy he seeks, which is to have this subject matter referred to the House management committee.

• (1025)

Mr. Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to emphasize what was just said. This is a procedural suggestion rather than a substantive one. It has to do with referring a particular matter to the Standing Committee on House Management, which is the standing committee of this House charged with looking into matters of procedure and parliamentary rules, et cetera.

I think this is not innocuous because that is pejorative word but I think this is harmless. We should not worry that it is simply a way of revisiting a question that is otherwise not revisitable. I do not think that is what is going on here. I think there is a truly legitimate attempt to try to get something before the Standing Committee on House Management through you that deserves to be looked at.

It is not just a question of the same limitations on freedom of speech that apply in committee applying in this House. We are not free to say anything we like here. We can say things which will bring chastisement or perhaps even more serious measures from the Chair. We can be named. We can even be thrown out of the House for things we say.

To my knowledge things are never stricken from the record here. There is a new dimension here and, Mr. Speaker, you felt the rules only permitted a certain way of dealing with the question when it came before you in the form of a previous point of order. You do not make the rules. The House makes the rules and sometimes it makes them as a result of deliberations in the Standing Committee on House Management. That is where the House deliberates as the House with respect to the rules of the House.

What could be more appropriate when there is an obvious controversy than to have that body, which is charged by the House to deal with these very matters, look at them? That is all that is before us here, I say to members on the government side. There is no judgment involved here on a previous ruling of the Speaker. There is no judgment involved here on the previous behaviour of a majority of the committee that originally gave rise to this controversy. There is no judgment involved here at all. This is simply a matter that ought to be looked at by the Standing Committee on House Management.

I think that in all fairness it is a suggestion that ought to be supported by members on both sides of the House and I hope also by Mr. Speaker, so this can be dealt with in a way that on future occasions there will be some guidance from the House on this matter.

Mr. Nelson Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a very brief intervention to add to the comments already made.

I support the arguments that would call for a reference to the standing committee as a way to resolve this issue. I want to add that there are others, other than members in this House, who are calling for this.

Many of us reading the press over the last number of weeks have been struck by the number of editorials and columnists who have written about this particular act; the fact that a record was removed of something that took place in an extension of this House.

I think the important thing is that we are concerned here. We want to maintain the integrity of this institution. More than that, the public is also now asking us to take some action on this issue.

For that reason I appeal to my friends on the government side to be open to an examination and a resolution of this issue. It is not simply being called upon by those of us here. Others across the country are now looking at this institution. They are puzzled by this type of action. I think it would be in the best interest of the institution of Parliament that we resolve this. This is a suggestion of at least one way to do that.

• (1030)

Mr. Speaker: First of all I want to remark that the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau has made it very clear that in raising this point of order in the House he is not, nor do I take it that anybody else is, challenging the ruling which I had to make at least as well as I could, given the constraints under which I am operating here. I think that is accepted.

I would not ordinarily invite a question of order on a matter like this. I did not invite it but the hon. member, out of courtesy for the Chair and to this place, let me know that he wished to raise it. This was several weeks ago and I said I would hear it.

The issue of the degree to which a Speaker ought to interfere with the workings of a committee is an important issue. Obviously if every time something did not go the way some people would like in a committee they could come and ask the Speaker to intervene, the implications would be considerable. Our jurisprudence is very clear. For the most part the Speaker should be very cautious about interfering with what goes on inside a committee and for good reasons, based on experience.

The hon. member has brought forward to members on both sides of the House a matter which concerns him and clearly has concerned some others, as other members have commented.

However I am very conscious of what the hon. member for Manicouagan has just pointed out.

[Translation]

—It is very important that a debate such as this one, serves to resolve the matter at hand. The Speaker is not commenting on the actions or decisions of the committee.

[English]

I understand very well the concern that has been raised by the hon. member. I want to be very careful that I do not do or say anything which is going to create difficulties for the House, committees or others.

I think we have to recognize that the Standing Committee on House Management has, according to the rules we have set for ourselves, certain ongoing powers. I know that the hon. member who is chairman of the committee knows and understands this.

I am reading from the rules: "The House management committee shall include in addition to the duties set forth in Standing Order 104 and among other matters". Subparagraph (3) says: "The review of and report on the Standing Orders procedure and practice in the House and its committees".

I am bringing this to the attention of hon. members because this is an ongoing thing. It is not something that is only there as a consequence of a motion of this House. There is no need for a motion of the House.

I would hope that at the moment anyway the better course would be that hon. members on both sides, and I fully appreciate they are always concerned about our rules and about how we conduct business on behalf of all Canadians who send us here, had a discussion. At this moment I think it would be wise if discussion took place between the hon. member for Timmins—Chapleau, the hon. parliamentary secretary, the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Ontario who has spoken here, and others. It may well be appropriate that members go to the committee and discuss it. There is no harm in that. I would prefer that we approach it that way instead of putting it to a vote of the Chamber. It is a matter that has caused some distress, we all know that.

There are two sides to the matter, and I am not going to get into that. That also has to be recognized. I think that the appropriate way to deal with it, now that it has been raised in the House, would be for members on both sides to discuss it among themselves. Perhaps they would find agreement to take the matter to the committee where a further discussion could take place.

I think that is better than putting it to a vote of the House. This is a matter we have to deal with among ourselves and in the most civilized way that we can. I would hope that hon. members would find that approach appropriate under the present circumstances.

I thank hon. members for their representations.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are 67 motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1 to 20, standing in the name of the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, will be grouped for debate and the vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to the remaining motions.

[English]

Motions Nos. 21 to 23, 27, 28, 30, 31, 33 to 37, 39 and 41 to 64, standing in the name of the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, Motions Nos. 24, 25, 26, 29, 32 and 40, standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface and Motion No. 38, standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Finance, will be grouped for debate and voted on according to the following pattern:

First, a vote on Motion No. 21 will apply to Motions Nos. 22, 23, 27, 28, 30, 31, 33 to 37, 39 and 41 to 64.

Second, an affirmative vote on Motion No. 21 will obviate the need for votes on Motions Nos. 24, 25, 26, 29, 32, 38 and 40 and a negative vote on Motion No. 21 will require votes on these motions as follows:

A vote on Motion No. 24 will apply to Motions Nos. 25, 26 and 29. Motion No. 32 will be voted on separately. Motion No. 38 will be voted on separately. Motion No. 40 will be voted on separately.

Motion No. 65, standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 66, standing in the name of the hon. Minister of Finance, will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 67, standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface, will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

I will now propose Motions Nos. 1 to 20 to the House.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before we proceed with the debate on Motions Nos. 1 to 20, I have read and listened carefully to your decision in terms of the grouping of amendments with regard to report stage and I accept the ruling. I must express my disappointment, however.

I am wondering whether the Chair could assist me in satisfying my concerns by indicating to me whether or not the Chair and the Table took into consideration that this particular bill, Bill C-93, affects a number of different federal statutes of the House of Commons, in particular Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, and that this goes back some years. It goes back to 1987 when the government of the day under the auspices of Bill C-103 established the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

The Chair should know that at that time in the other place there was a motion made to divide the bill which was ruled against by the majority. The Chair should know that on Bill C-103 the opposition raised that very issue and as a result voted against Bill C-103. When Bill C-93, which is the bill that we have before us today, was entered for the purposes of second reading at the first opportunity members of the opposition put forward to the Chair that the bill ought to be split due to the fact that it involved a good number of different subject matters and that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation should stand alone in terms of the furtherance of our debate.

I am wondering if the Chair has taken all of those factors into consideration. The amendments we seek here today, particularly amendments 1 through 20, go right to the heart of that particular statute in terms of trying to, as members of the opposition, re-establish Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. Although I accept the ruling, the Chair knows of my grave disappointment in allowing a mere 10-minute debate at report stage on an important aspect of public policy. I want to know whether the Chair has taken into consideration all the factors I have outlined.

It now stands, Mr. Speaker, that members on this side of the House will have a meagre 10 minutes to discuss and debate over 20 amendments which affect, and I am sure other members on this side of the House would agree, the economic life of an island that has been depressed for a considerable period of time under the administration of those opposite.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to what was said to you about grouping Motions Nos. 1 to 20 presented by the hon. House leader of the opposition, but on reading the proposed amendments the House will realize that what the member proposed is simply to delete all the clauses concerning the merger of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation with ACOA. No new idea was proposed. Therefore your decision, Mr. Speaker, to group the motions together and to give the speakers 10 minutes seems to me quite justified, given the lack of substance and of ideas in the motions presented by the House leader of the opposition.

• (1045)

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, then to be fair and reasonable perhaps the hon. member opposite would conclude that since there are 20 amendments if one were to multiply 20 by 10 minutes that would take us for an extended period of time.

I am wondering whether or not the hon. member would accede to my request that instead of just 10 minutes for 20 amendments the hon. member would want to allow opposition members to have at least a minimum of 30 to 40 minutes.

Mr. Robitaille: No, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I wish to reassure the hon. House leader of the opposition that the Chair understands very well the disappointment to which the hon. member refers. But again, what guided the Chair in its decision is respect for parliamentary rules and traditions whereby the Speaker seeks to maintain proper control over the debate on report stage of a bill.

Since amendments 1 to 20 do not make changes in the substance of the bill but delete clauses from it, in order to exclude for all practical purposes the part affecting the region of the country represented by the hon. member, there is a common thread and that is what guided the Chair in its decision to group this kind of motions together.

Once again, the Chair wishes to reassure the hon. member that it understands his concern and disappointment very well, but that again, in full conformity with the tradition of this House, the Speaker sought to group together the amendment motions, keeping in mind that they all have more or less the same effect with respect to the impact of this bill on the region represented by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I interpreted you incorrectly. You are not suggesting, as the hon. member has alluded, that the doing away of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and the amendments members of the opposition have put forward to re-establish and maintain Enterprise Cape Breton are not substantive. Do I understand the Chair correctly?

Is the Chair suggesting to members of the opposition that this is not substantive? It affects a region of this country where unemployment, as demonstrated by government departments, is in excess of 28 per cent. I hope that I have misinterpreted the Chair when he alleged that this is not substantive. I would like to hear the Chair's comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps there was a misunderstanding. I just said that there was a lach of substance in the amendments in that they were proposals to simply delete of clauses in the bill. In that regard, I am sorry if some interpreted that to mean that the Chair was saying that the amendments proposed by the hon. member were unimportant. I am sorry if it was the interpretation given but it is not what the Chair meant.

All amendments are always considered very carefully by the Chair, which considers them all to be important. It is simply a matter of grouping together, as the Standing Orders provide, the clauses pertaining to a similar topic or with the same end in view. The Chair made its decision with this in mind, as I think the hon. House leader of the opposition will understand.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I think it is becoming clear that the amendments you have before you are deemed to be substantial.

The amendments are succinct and to the point in calling on the Government of Canada to curtail its craziness in doing away with Enterprise Cape Breton, that is what all of the amendments allude to. That in itself is substantive. If I understand the Chair to be saying that or concurring with that intent, I will be happy to leave the matter there and proceed with the debate on the various amendments Nos. 1 through 20.

• (1050)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We could go on debating all morning but the fact remains, as the hon. House leader of the opposition who is so respectful of the traditions of this House knows full well, that you cannot appeal the Chair's ruling. In that regard, I can assure him that in making this decision the Chair was guided only by the procedure usually or normally used at the report stage of a bill.

Again I understand his disappointment but I reassured him and, this ruling having been made, I think that we should now proceed.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, recognizing the prerogative of the Chair to group motions, which I of course bow to, I do wish to place on the record my disappointment in the groupings of the motions that I will be introducing.

The intent of all my motions is to have part III of the bill deleted. Part III calls for the Canada Council to include in the future the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the International Culture Program. The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the International Culture Program are two distinct organizations.

Personally I would have preferred to have seen separate 10 minute debates on each one of these measures.

Again I wish to place on the record my disappointment in only having 10 minutes to address the very serious concerns that I and all members of this House have as well as the academic and research community in this country. To see it all reduced to just a little 10 minute debate in this House I think, to say the least, is disappointing to many.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think that the hon. member's comment was duly noted by the House. We can now proceed to the consideration of Motions Nos. 1 through 20.

• (1055)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in this debate and I am happy that I have an opportunity to address myself to some very substantial amendments which affect the economy of Cape Breton Island and which directly affect the people who live in that part of Canada.

The sole purpose of these substantive amendments is to stop the Government of Canada from winding up Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and transferring its functions and staff to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. That is the substantive purpose of all of these amendments which affect Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

What is Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation? It is a Crown agency of the Government of Canada, put in place by the government opposite to enhance economic development on the island of Cape Breton.

There has been a long tradition going back to the late sixties of the Government of Canada taking an active role in enhancing economic opportunities in Cape Breton. We had the establishment of the Cape Breton Development Corporation which had two divisions: a coal division which is still in existence as well as an industrial development division. It is that arm, the industrial development division, which is the focus of our debate here this morning.

In 1987 the then minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency did away with the industrial development division of Devco. In its place he told Parliament and the people of Cape Breton: "We shall establish Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation which will take the place in all of its substance and consequences of that of the industrial development division, a new agency, set apart, situated in Cape Breton to foster economic growth".

It should be noted the then minister responsible for Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was none other than Senator Lowell Murray who said on May 18, 1988 on page 3431 of the Senate Hansard that it was a nation building measure.

That is what it was, a nation-building measure. That is what he said. Today in 1993, when conditions are unparalleled in that part of Canada in terms of its unemployment, in terms of the lack of infrastructure which is needed for our sagging steel industry and other resources, what do we have the government doing? It is removing a nation-building measure from that part of Canada. I express with great vigour my disappointment with the procedural aspects of this debate but more important with the substance of this debate. I find it shocking. I find it despicable that the minister responsible, the federal minister for Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Central Nova, has not said one word in defence of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. I find it more despicable that the premier of the province, the Hon. Don Cameron, has been as silent as anyone could ever be with regard to a tool that can be used for the purposes of economic development.

We know a lot about the premier of Nova Scotia when it comes to economic developments across our province and particularly in Cape Breton.

I want the record to show that the people of my province will have an opportunity to cast their judgment with regard to Don Cameron's activities in the province and also with regard to his lack of activity when it comes to supporting economic development agencies whose sole purpose and demonstrable track record has been to enhance economic opportunities in Cape Breton.

I want the House to understand that those of us who live in eastern Canada are not looking for handouts. We do not want to go cap in hand to Ontario or to Quebec looking for money, but we are looking for fairness. In seeking fairness, there is a real role for an activist government to enhance those economic opportunities. The Government of Canada could have done that if it had maintained Enterprise Cape Breton but it has decided to do away with it.

Its argument will be, as I am sure members opposite will say, that all of the functions of Enterprise Cape Breton will now be carried out by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. That is just not so. A few will but most will not.

I need not share with my constituents for they know where I stand and where my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys stands with regard to Enterprise Cape Breton.

Let us ask ourselves these questions. If it were a nation-building measure in 1988 with unemployment in excess of 28 per cent, with young people migrating from our area at a phenomenal rate, with older workers with little if anything to return to or to refer to after having been displaced, with our steel industry sagging, our fisheries in a crisis, our coal industry having declined dramatically, our forestry without direction, is that not a crisis? Should we not want to maintain a nation-building measure to try to counter some of those difficulties? Is this act to do away with this corporation done out of a spirit of meanness by the federal minister for Nova Scotia and the premier of Nova Scotia, Don Cameron?

The assistant secretary for the Treasury Board, which my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys brought to my attention, said the following about Bill C-93: "Seen in this light Bill C-93 proposes to amalgamate certain programs which the government wishes to continue but which can be delivered more effectively by combining with existing organizations".

It is a modest proposal if you like from a savings perspective.

• (1105)

It is not being done to save money. It is not being done to amalgamate and assure effectiveness. With the greatest respect, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to members of this Chamber, it is being done for solely political reasons.

It is being done because the Premier of Nova Scotia, Don Cameron and the federal minister responsible from Central Nova have determined that area of the country has Liberal representations and therefore they will choke them off.

You may think that is a cynical view. I assure you that view is real and is shared by a vast majority of the residents of the island of Cape Breton. We will see their disdain in the provincial election which has been called. We will see demonstrable signs of their disdain when a federal election is called because they will vote against the Tory administration both provincially and federally.

I urge hon. members in this Chamber, on the basis of fairness and economic opportunity to Canadians who live in a poorer region of this country, to come to their senses, re-establish and reinstate Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what was said by the opposition House leader, who gave us a good demonstration of his talents as a public speaker. It is too bad he did not use those talents to properly inform his constituents. Perhaps I may set the record straight. All services offered by the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will be maintained. What we are talking about here in Bill C-93 is the administrative integration of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation into the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Motions Nos. 1 to 20 standing in the name of the opposition House leader are dilatory, their only purpose being to waste the time of the members of this House. We saw how this strategy failed at the report stage of Bill C-63 which concerned the measures to streamline government operations announced in the February 1992 budget.

These motions propose to delete, clause by clause, part II of the bill, without offering valid alternatives. As you said Mr. Speaker, they offer no substantial changes to existing clauses. They offer no valid alternatives because there are none.

Perhaps I may take a few moments to examine the reasons for the government's decision not to eliminate the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation but to intergrate it into the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, better known as ACOA.

Since 1988, the Atlantic region has enjoyed the benefits of the economic development programs administered by ACOA to support small and medium-sized businesses. Aware of Cape Breton's special economic development needs, the federal government provided additional programs through the Crown corporation known as the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

As a Crown corporation, Enterprise Cape Breton was able to develop programs adapted to the island's changing economic conditions. With reference levels totalling nearly $10 million, the corporation has offered loans, equity participation and non-refundable grants to help various sectors of the local economy.

The corporation has always maintained a close relationship with ACOA.

As a matter of fact, the enabling legislation put the corporation under the control of the minister responsible for ACOA and stated furthermore that the president of ACOA should also be president of the corporation and chair of the board of directors.

By integrating the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation into ACOA, the government is taking steps to streamline administration costs related to economic development assistance in Cape Breton and dispelling the confusion regarding the programs available to small and medium-sized businesses on the island. What does the opposition have against maintaining the functions and services offered by the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation while cutting administration costs and making the programs more efficient? What can possibly be wrong with trying to improve the way these organizations are managed, save money and ultimately reduce the taxpayers' burden?

As you no doubt recall, Mr. Speaker, part II of Bill C-93, which deals with ACOA and the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, ensures that no aspect of the federal government's commitment to Cape Breton will be lost. So stop making the people of Cape Breton and the surrounding area believe that we are in the process of getting rid of this corporation. It is not true and it is regrettable that the opposition is once again playing petty politics for partisan and local reasons, making people feel insecure.

There are provisions calling for specific initiatives to meet the needs in Cape Breton, on top of those already available under ACOA. The proposed measures are in fact programs presently administered by the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. In addition, the bill transfers the functions and powers of the corporation to ACOA.

All in all this move does not eliminate any services or weaken the federal government's commitment to Cape Breton. That is probably why, unlike the hon. member who spoke earlier, Premier Cameron did not raise a fuss.

The end result of the decision will in fact be to put an end to overlap and duplication of programs. The people are fed up with us not doing what must be done to save money for all taxpayers and those who contribute to the financing of the programs. They have had it with us not making an effort to terminate and eliminate unnecessary duplication.

As the only economic development agency, ACOA's Cape Breton office will administer more efficiently the programs and services previously offered by the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. The full integration of the corporation in the ACOA network will make it easier for the Cape Breton business community to access the full range of programs and services offered by the agency. What can the opposition possibly have against that?

My colleagues on the other side of this House are perfectly aware of the benefits of such an initiative and they have nothing better to oppose it than these filibustering tactics to waste our time. The next thing you know they will complain that they do not have enough time to debate NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement. They will complain about never being allowed enough time to debate. Just look at what they are doing today to make us waste our time.

Mr. Speaker, let me remind you also that in the documents tabled with the federal budget on February 25, 1992 the Minister of Finance stated that the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was in essence the local expression of the expanded mandate of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. In order to eliminate overlap and duplication and to streamline administration the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will not be eliminated but rather merged with ACOA. This merger will thus save the taxpayers the administrative costs of two very similar programs offered by two separate federal agencies.

Finally, the services remain, nothing has changed, but instead of having two entities there will be only one. So there will be less space to rent and lower administrative costs. What can the opposition have against trying to save public funds?

In merging these two organizations, the minister responsible for ACOA urged his departmental officials to preserve the strong points of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and maintain the flexibility of its programs.

Bill C-93, I repeat, seeks to maintain the programs of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation through ACOA in Cape Breton.

Let us recognize these motions for what they really are: delaying tactics with no other purpose than to slow down government business and disappoint the citizens of this country who have urged us to act and told us that they have enough of waste, mismanagement and duplication and demand that we do something. We are doing something and I find it unfortunate that again the opposition shows no sensitivity in managing public funds.

Therefore I ask all members of this House to join us in rejecting these futile proposals.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to speak on this bill.

I cannot believe the insensitivity of the government and the misinformation of the member for Terrebonne. He stood before the House presenting this legislation and did not even know it is not the Cape Breton Development Corporation that ACOA is going to take over, but Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. We lost the industrial division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation before the last election five years ago. The government assured us through its spokesperson in the Senate, Senator Murray and the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond that everything would be fine in Cape Breton. Senator Murray said this was a nation-building measure.

I want to tell you how nation building this has been. Today in Cape Breton the unemployment rate, as reported by the government's own propaganda agency, Statistics Canada, stands at 29.4 per cent. You know that is not going to be the maximum.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, for your benefit and the benefit of the member and the House, I want to make clear that throughout my statement, I spoke of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and not Devco. I think there has been an error in translation here in the House. Throughout my speech, I referred to the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and ACOA. I made no reference to what the member is saying.

[English]

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, if that is what the hon. member stated I will accept it. Certainly that must have been a mistake in the translation.

I want to refer to what the hon. member for Terrebonne said. He said this is merely an administrative change; a money saving operation. That is not true.

The fact is that the economy on Cape Breton Island is in a devastating situation. As I mentioned, the unemployment rate right now as stated by Statistics Canada is 29.4 per cent.

I want to refer to one section of this bill. That is subclause 18(b) where it states that we are now going to, and I quote:-

• (1120)

—promote and assist, either alone or in conjunction with any person or the Government of Nova Scotia or any agency of the Government, the financing and development of industry on Cape Breton Island to provide employment outside the coal producing industry and to broaden the base of the economy of Cape Breton Island.

Mr. Speaker, I want to tell you about the Government of Nova Scotia. Since 1978 there has not been one industry established on Cape Breton Island with the help of the Government of Nova Scotia or by the Government of Nova Scotia on its own. It has not done one thing on Cape Breton Island.

Not only that, but if you were to travel to Cape Breton Island and stop at a tourist bureau on the mainland, one of the remarks you may get is "well, you do not really need to go to Cape Breton Island". In fact, the minister of tourism for Nova Scotia a few years ago, who was a cabinet minister on Cape Breton Island, had responsibility for a federal-provincial agreement on tourism, of which $14 million was to be applied to the mainland of Nova Scotia and $14 million to Cape Breton Island. This Cape Breton minister in the Nova Scotia government spent the $14 million allotted for the mainland of Nova Scotia on the mainland of Nova Scotia, but the $14 million allotted for Cape Breton he sent back to Ottawa. Imagine that. That is the co-operation we have been getting from this Government of Nova Scotia. We are being asked in this House to throw our lot in with those desperadoes. Come on. The only hope we have is that this government is going to lose the provincial election. Otherwise, it is going to be more of the same.

I will give another example. We have a university on Cape Breton Island of which we are very proud. It is in the constituency of the member for Cape Breton—East Richmond. It is one of the hopes of bolstering the economy of Cape Breton. We are dependant on the innovation that we can get through this university. I want to say that the average student allotment by the province of Nova Scotia to the University College of Cape Breton is $4,300. The average in Nova Scotia is $6,800. Even if we got the average on Cape Breton Island we would have an additional $4 million of assistance for the University College of Cape Breton.

This is the treatment we have been getting on Cape Breton Island. And this government is continually eroding any assistance to this area which so desperately needs the support of its federal government. Now it is taking away the one independent agency that was left to work for Cape Breton Island. It says there is not going to be any difference, that it is going to be an improvement. That is not so. We are losing a great deal.

Let me just give one example which is all I have time to give in the time allotted. Under the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency there is no provision to own land. There was and there is at the present time under the Cape Breton agency. Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation does have the right to own land. Where is the industrial park that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation has going to go? What is going to happen to it? The government has made absolutely no commitment or provision for that.

We have a demonstration farm on Cape Breton where we are trying to work on new agricultural methods, new agricultural procedures that are distinctive to the soil and to the climate of Cape Breton which is different from mainland Nova Scotia because mainland Nova Scotia goes north-northeast. It is colder, the soil is different and we need this demonstration farm. Because ACOA cannot own land, we cannot foresee how this demonstration farm is going to be able to be maintained. Is the federal Department of Agriculture going to take it over? No. Is the provincial Department of Agriculture going to take it over? No. What is going to happen to it?

That is another loss that is going to be factored into the doing away with Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

• (1125)

With regard to the fishing industry, there are no groundfish off northern Cape Breton. No groundfish. The fishing industry is in tatters and we are told you can wait, do not worry, the fishermen are not going to go on unemployment for a while. The fishermen in my riding are going to go on unemployment on May 1. This is April 20 and there is still no package for the fishermen on Cape Breton Island.

The steel industry is down from 3,700 people 15 years ago to 600 today. The mining industry is down from 4,200 people to about 2,000 today. The tourist industry has been reduced largely because of the GST which this government put in. The fishing industry is reduced because of a stupid fishing policy that this government brought in. In fact it now does not even care to subsidize the fishermen it put out of business. It has been one problem after another as a result of the policy for Cape Breton.

Now this government is taking away the one distinctive agency that could do something on Cape Breton Island if it were allowed to function by this government, but obviously it is not. I ask the government to reconsider this idiotic provision in taking away Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise first of all in support of the amendments that have been introduced by the Liberal Party.

A lot in Bill C-93 is commendable. I think the opposition parties, both the Liberal Party and certainly my party, the New Democratic Party, have no problem at all in seeing greater efficiencies in government, in seeing government waste being reduced.

When you set about the task of reducing government waste you have to do it in an intelligent manner. You have to do it in a way that when you change agencies, when you restructure, you do it in a way that makes common sense, that uses intelligence, that involves consultation and then through a consensus process you proceed with the changes. There is much in Bill C-93 that illustrates this government has not done any of these things.

Certainly this clause that will roll Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation into the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is a unilateral action undertaken by this government without the proper consultation with the people that these agencies are supposed to serve.

We tend to think that in this day and age the message is coming out loud and clear that this type of arbitrary bureaucratic government is not only wasteful but should be ending.

We hear members of the Conservative Party who are running for their leadership talk and proclaim about a new type of democracy, a new type of open government, a government that is responsive to the needs of the people, a government that consults people.

Yet when you look at what this government is actually doing despite the lofty statements of those who aspire to be the leader of this government, you know that it is business as usual.

The government claims that with this measure we are going to save jobs, that it is going to make things more efficient. We heard the spokesman for the government loudly proclaim this fact and accuse the opposition of stalling, of being opposed to these measures that would cut government waste.

The government and the government spokesperson does not understand, does not hear what we are saying. We are saying that this measure will not achieve greater efficiencies. It would not reduce the deficit of this government. That is what we are trying to hammer home to this government, that what it is doing in several of the clauses of Bill C-93 is the very opposite to the aim and the lofty purpose that it proposes in this House.

For example, under the access to information the Canadian Federation of the Humanities obtained the study by Treasury Board as to the savings of items recommended under Bill C-93. We looked at Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and what the savings will be. Over five years it will be minus $1 million. In other words, it is not going to save. It is going to cost $1 million over five years.

How many personnel reductions will there be? There will be 24 less person-years over a five-year period. It will mean that in the year 1993-94 six positions will be saved, which is true for the next four years. In a five-year period it is going to cost an extra $1 million to do the transfer and in the end it is going to save 24 positions. That again is over five years. That is the best case scenario in terms of savings.

Therefore, when this government stands up and says it is doing this to save the taxpayers money and to increase efficiencies in government, the fact of the matter is that is not so. It is smoke and mirrors that this government is introducing to us.

Let us remember that the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was established in 1987 by separating the industrial division of the Cape Breton Development Corporation from the coal division of the Crown corporation. At that time we were opposed to the measure. We were opposed because prior to that the focus for economic development in Cape Breton was an integrated form. The general economic development as well as the economic development for coal were brought together. We sensed in our opposition that we needed an integrated approach in order to focus on the tremendous problems of Cape Breton.

At that time the government justified its action by saying this would create again "greater efficiencies". Let us have a look at the record. In March of this year Cape Breton Island had an unemployment level of some 29.4 per cent. Indeed only 33.9 per cent of the adult population had some kind of job at all.

Let us compare that with 1987 before the government attempted to make things more efficient. When the corporation was created the unemployment rate in Cape Breton Island was only 19.3 per cent with a participation rate of some 54 per cent. That is quite an accomplishment to drive up the unemployment rate to 29.4 per cent from 19.3 per cent in 1987.

When we look at the projects that have been funded under the regime this government introduced in 1987, what do we find? A report in 1991 on Enterprise Cape Breton found that those projects which had a total cost of $1 million or more had a failure rate of some 71 per cent. Enterprise Cape Breton was a participant in a number of spectacular fiascos on the island, everything from Technitread, which was a $2.1 million loss, to WCN Communications which was a $4.1 million loss.

The study also indicates, and this is very important—I think there is a lesson to be learned in this—those projects costing less than $100,000 had a success rate of 72 per cent which states that those smaller efforts at economic development had a much better chance of succeeding.

We opposed the separation of the industrial division of Devco in 1987 and we are opposed to having the corporation rolled into ACOA today. In 1988 we proposed an amendment to the legislation creating the corporation and ACOA which would have required that after two years—that is in 1990—a review would have been undertaken by the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology to determine whether separating the industrial division from Devco had been a success or failure. Unfortunately at that time the government opposed the amendment.

We have heard the government spokesperson talk about the opposition being motivated mainly by political considerations. That is not true. We want to see an effective program. That is why in 1988 we introduced amendments to ensure that there would be a proper review of what Parliament had done in 1988.

The government could have accepted our proposal instead of playing politics. However because the suggestion came from the opposition the government automatically, in a knee-jerk reaction, opposed it. It could have accepted our amendment as a well-intentioned amendment aimed at allowing a review after two years to make certain that what we had done in 1988 was the correct thing, and if it was not, to allow us an opportunity to redirect and correct any mistakes we made. No, the government was opposed.

In the absence of any other alternative a full review of the success or failure of that amalgamation should have preceded the abandonment of that corporation and the rolling of its activities into ACOA. What we are asking for is a proper review.

The government is saying that we are wasting time. Is it a waste of time to make certain that the review is done right so that moneys can be saved, so that the purpose of this exercise, economic development on Cape Breton, can be done in the most efficient way? That is what we are trying to do and what we are trying to seek.

We are not trying to score political points. We want to make certain that what we do as a public body we do in the best way.

What it comes down to is local control. The people of Cape Breton Island should really have ultimate control over their destiny and economic development. They are the people who know the best. What the government is doing today is taking control further away from them. It is a pigheaded and stupid move on behalf of this government that makes no sense.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the set of motions by my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond, which attempt to prevent the rolling into ACOA of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. They attempt to preserve the single agency left on Cape Breton Island that can plan the economic future of Cape Breton Island as a whole.

The provision in Bill C-93 to eliminate Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation can only be described, if one regards it in the historical context of this government's activities with respect to Cape Breton, as one of astonishing cynicism.

If we go back to the beginnings of this government, back in 1984-85, and examine the record of the government in terms of promoting development on Cape Breton Island we see a government that had a few ideas initially but has totally given up. It has decided that Cape Breton Island is a place where it has no support and there is no point in even investing a modicum of energy or resources in an attempt to create an economic future for that part of Canada. It has written that part of Canada off.

When Devco was created back in 1967 as a federal Crown corporation to run the coal industry in Cape Breton the industrial development division was added to Devco in order to promote alternatives to coal and steel and create a diversified economy on Cape Breton Island. We realized then and we still realize that it is a long-term, ongoing prospect. The government of the day considered Cape Breton Island as an economic entity that required a focus, a focused plan of development and a focused agency to promote the opportunities of the island and to try to find by trial and error alternative economic opportunities for the island.

In 1988 when this government took the industrial development division of Devco, broke it off from Devco and created the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, this party saw then that the intention of the government was ultimately to terminate that agency whose mandate and focus was to promote economic development on Cape Breton Island. We saw it in the words of the government leader in the Senate when he said in introducing Bill C-103, which was an act to create ACOA, that this was a nation building measure. Creating Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation as a separate agency from the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency was a nation building measure.

In another part of his speech he said that the purpose of this organization was to: "Promote and assist in the financing and development of industry on the island of Cape Breton in order to provide employment outside the coal mining industry and to broaden the base of the economy of the island". That was what the purpose of the industrial development division was. He said that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation would do this on its own and in conjunction with others, whether individuals, governments or government agencies.

We knew at that time that the government's ultimate plan was to eliminate the industrial development division of Devco, to eliminate a separate agency to promote economic development on Cape Breton Island and to roll it in with the rest of the hodgepodge of programs it has created and which have had no focus and no effect. The government has literally thrown money at Cape Breton and at the rest of Atlantic Canada but it has had no effect in terms of promoting some kind of focused economic development in that part of the world.

At the same time the fundamental resource based industries that we have, such as the fishery which is in a state of collapse all around our shores through no fault of the people involved in the industry but largely because of its mismanagement by this federal government and the coal and steel industries which have been struggling for generations and for which we are still striving to find some ways of providing some alternative, continue to be all that exists to sustain the people of Cape Breton, those who are willing to stay in that part of the island. We still need a focused agency to come up with alternatives and find the natural opportunities that exist in Cape Breton to create meaningful, long-term and stable employment for our citizens and our young people for the future.

The measures that have been created, the programs of loan guarantees, interest buy-downs and investment tax credits which the government has lobbed in our direction and then taken away, altered and changed at a whim and a moment's notice, have actually undermined more than anything the entrepreneurship and natural business acumen of the people of the island.

It had them chasing grants, loan guarantees and interest buy-downs. It had them chasing smoke stacks from other parts of Canada who have come with no reason to stay on the island. We have had to live with this over the whole period of this government.

Here we are in the dying days of a Tory administration that has lost all sense of purpose and all sense of commitment. It has no ideas and has bankrupted any solutions for this part of the country. It is taking away the only agency which, small though it was, was trying and was in a position to focus and deal with the problems unique to Cape Breton Island.

That is what this government is doing with Bill C–93. That is why the members of Parliament who represent that part of Canada are so opposed to this bill.

In 1988, just before the last election when the government created ACOA, we had a flurry of announcements of businesses starting up all over Atlantic Canada. In Cape Breton Island the people had money forced on them. Many businesses were started up prematurely. I know because they are in my riding. They gave up their life savings to set up corporations induced by these incentives given by the government just before the election. After the election the incentives disappeared and the businesses struggled on. Many of them went bankrupt.

The life savings of some of those people went with them. We had the situation of a few months ago, and I do not want to let this go by, in which Premium Automotive Tanks Inc. in Port Hawkesbury, after five years of taking this government's money and taking the talents and dreams of the people of Port Hawkesbury, closed its doors overnight.

Yesterday I discovered three employees of that company who for some reason were not on the list to get their severance payments and are being denied their severance payments by that company. Now that the company has its assets out of Port Hawkesbury it does not need to care and does not care about the employees who are there and who are trying at least to get a severance package so they can begin to rebuild their lives.

That is the legacy of this government on Cape Breton Island. That is why it knows that it will get absolutely no support provincially or federally in the next election.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given the opportunity to talk about this series of amendments because this particular activity is probably one of the worst initiatives that the government has ever undertaken.

It has been a botched job right from the beginning. In fact, ce sera appelé l'opération malmenée.

I already have graduate students who are contacting me to do theses at the masters and doctoral levels. They want to do a case study of something that has been particularly badly done by government. This is the one that they are zeroing in on.

Why is Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation being axed? It raises very fundamental questions if it is going to be done away with, as it will be. What is next? The more important question is why did the government decide to do that?

I have maintained right from the beginning that it was to try to respond to the right wing of its party, the reform agenda. I suppose that because I am from this side of the House people might say that is what I would say. I would like the ladies and gentlemen in the House to cast their eyes on an article in The Globe and Mail from February 27, 1993 by a well-known writer by the name of Hugh Winsor.

He was interviewing a senator by the name of Finlay MacDonald, who is a senator from the government's side. While talking to him this is what the good senator had to say. He saw this whole exercise as the government's attempt to thin the public perception that chronic deficits are caused by waste and mismanagement as it allows the public to believe there is a painless way to solve our serious financial problems. That is one comment which the senator made. The other one is equally effective and I find it more interesting. The whole exercise might be nothing more than a symbolic act to protect the party's right flank from attacks from the dreaded Reform Party and cause sufficient pain and spill enough blood to impress the voters. If this is true it might be good politics in the short term but it is not good public policy in the long term.

I did not say that. Senator Finlay MacDonald said it. It is available to anyone and everyone. I would be delighted to carry it to them personally.

Let us look at the contentions that the government made. It is going to save money. I will speak to that later. It is going to increase efficiency and effectiveness. I will speak to that later.

I say to the government side that is why it is such a botched operation,

[Translation]

It was botchedry because no studies were ever made. Can you imagine the government introducing a bill of this magnitude, winding up some agencies and consolidating others, without any preliminary studies to determine whether it will save money or increase efficiency.

[English]

Where is the proof? Give me the proof and I will reconsider my position. I contend it was nothing but a blatant political act.

In the interest of fairness I want to quote from some of the testimony that was given by those representing the government. Bill C–93 is a modest proposal if you like from a savings perspective. In one particular case they point out that the changes will cost government additional money. Can you imagine that? That is what they say.

Let me quote again from one of the government witnesses: " But we have no particular studies on costing on the savings". When I asked where the increased effectiveness would be they said it may well be possible by putting organizations together that work well together to find better ways of delivering services in addition to the strict cost economies that are provided. Those are not estimated in the numbers, of course. That is what they have done.

I wanted to get that on the record and make sure people understand that whether we happen to be talking about Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation or the removal of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council by consolidating it with the Canada Council, or any number of features of this particular bill, we are not talking about saving money. We are not talking about increasing efficiency or effectiveness. We are talking raw politics.

Why am I saying that? I gave a quote and pointed out there are no studies. There will be no money saved. There will be no additional effectiveness. If the government was really serious about saving money and doing something to increase efficiency and effectiveness it would have called those organizations together and told them how much it needed to save. It would have told them the effectiveness or efficiency it wanted to realize.

Did it do that? Oh, no. There are brave soldiers on the government side. We have to admit that. They sent their civil servants to the slaughter house. It was terrible. I felt very bad. In fact I went in there angry and finally had to back off because those poor souls had been sent by those insensitive politicians on the government side. Now those elected officials on the government side are doing their best. They have been sent out of the trenches without any protection. There are no savings. There is no increased efficiency. This is a political act. The government is trying to get close to its kissing cousins, the Reformers.

I am going to wager any odds that it is not going to work. Find me one responsible person who says these are good ideas in terms of saving money and increasing effectiveness, besides elected Conservative officials who may be under tremendous pressure to do what their political masters ask them to do, and I will reconsider my position.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1155)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

(2) The committee referred to in subsection (1) shall, within a year after a review is undertaken under the subsection or within such further time as Parliament may authorize, submit a report on the review to Parliament including a statement of any changes the committee recommends."

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

Motion No. 38.

That Bill C-93 be amended in Clause 47 by adding immediately after line 26 at page 18 the following:

"47. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following section:

22. (1) In the sixth year after the coming into force of this section, the Council shall, in consultation with the artistic and social sciences and humanities research communities, undertake a comprehensive review of the operation of this Act and shall submit a report thereon, including a statement of any changes that the Council would recommend, to the member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada designated under subsection 21(1) and that member shall forthwith cause the report to be laid before both Houses of Parliament.

(2) The report laid before both Houses of Parliament pursuant to subsection (1) stands permanently referred to such committee of the Senate or of the House of Commons or such joint committee as is designated or established to review matters relating to the arts and to research in the social sciences and humanities."

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of the motion for the amendments that have been moved in my name, let me at the outset point out to the House that we have worked very closely with the Liberal Party as well.

The amendments that stand in my name that were dealt with in the legislative committee that considered Bill C-93 I suggest and suspect represent the feelings and the thinking of a lot of members in this House from all parties.

Basically what does it do? What my amendments ask for is that part III of Bill C-93 be dropped entirely. This is the part that attempts to fold the Social Sciences and the Humanities Research Council and the International Cultural Program into an expanded new entity consisting mainly of the Canada Council.

We heard in committees members of the academic community, the arts community, the research community, university administrators, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the whole academic, research and arts community of this country totally and unanimously condemning this section of Bill C–93.

As well in committee we heard from members of the Treasury Board, the finance department and even from the PCO that there will be no savings at all in this measure. If anything it is going to cost the government money.

Here we have another example of where in the name of deficit reduction the government is actually going to increase its deficit. Here we have an instance in which the government claims it is going to increase efficiencies. We have the officials of Treasury Board, the finance department and PCO admitting that it is not going to increase efficiencies. In fact what we hear from the academic community and arts community is that it is already creating increased inefficiencies.

The attempts to bring the people who work in SSHRC and in the International Cultural Programs into the Canada Council is causing a whole host of problems. There are financial costs and personal costs. This makes no rational sense whatsoever and government members know it.

They say it is to increase efficiencies. Let us have a look. The Social Sciences and the Humanities Research Council administrative cost in 1978–79 was 13.1 per cent. Now it is 8.7 per cent. Great efficiencies.

What else does this motion do? Without any prior consultation with the academic community, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and other research bodies, absolutely no consultation whatsoever, a small group of bureaucrats decided that they were going to unilaterally move the clock back.

Up until 1978 the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council was part of the Canada Council. The Lamontagne committee report on sciences in this country still stands out as one of the best reports ever produced on science policy. It recommended that the Social Sciences and the Humanities Research Council be recognized as a separate entity to receive funding for research. It was important to the social sciences and to the humanities to be recognized as a body of scientific research, that it was a legitimate forum of scientific research on its own, that it was not part of the arts but that it was a scientific research entity on its own.

When SSHRC was separated from the Canada Council it was an important and fundamental recognition for the social sciences and the humanities. This government, through the actions of a few bureaucrats, has decided that this is now not the case and it is going to roll the social sciences and the humanities right back into the Canada Council. The arrogance of it.

It is the arbitrary nature of this that is the most disturbing of all. What is happening to democracy here? In committee I kept asking why the government was doing this. I kept asking government people and bureaucrats from the departments why they were doing this. Nobody was able to come up with a rational answer in front of the committee. I suspect the government is doing it for entirely political reasons. It wants to show the right wing nuts in the Reform Party that it is macho and tough and that it is cleaning up government when in fact it is doing the opposite.

What has happened to the whole notion of rational policy making? What has happened to the whole notion of appropriate and intelligent actions? When you are attempting to reduce the deficit and increase efficiency the first step is to study the situation, consult and then take appropriate common sense actions. In this case of course none of this occurred.

In the leadership race for the Conservative Party we hear all of the contenders talk about the new type of politics, the politics of inclusion and politics that allow ordinary members of Parliament to function more independently and effectively in committee. Here is the test. I challenge all of those leadership contenders and their supporters to stand up in this House today and vote against part III of Bill C–93 because it is not the politics of inclusion. It is arbitrary politics. It is politics that has totally upset all of the researchers and social scientists across this country for no valid reason whatsoever. There are no savings, there is no inclusion and there is of course no consultation.

If the government is going to have the new politics then let us see it demonstrate it today. Otherwise those members who talk about new politics, aspiring to be leader of their party, will demonstrate clearly that all they are talking about is a bunch of smoke and mirrors and that they have no intention and no idea what real, new, inclusive politics is all about.

What we are finding is an abuse of power and macho politics, the worst type of politics that the people of this country are sick and tired of.

I and most Canadians assume that six months from now this group will be gone and that the arbitrariness of this government will be gone. I would suggest to all those who are responsible for implementing part III of Bill C-93 treat this as an academic theoretical exercise, that they keep track of where every desk, file, typewriter and computer comes from so that when the political reality of this country is changed in six months we can unscramble what is being done today and we can restore the Social Sciences and the Humanities Research Council to its proper role as a separate, scientific organization administering itself on its own so that the international cultural program can again be put back in external affairs where it properly belongs. Let me advise all those who are in charge of implementing this policy that it is not going to be a policy that will last for more than six months. Both the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party are on the record as being committed to restoring the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada and the International Cultural Program back to where they are now.

Let it be a suggestion to all those involved in implementing Bill C-98, part III, to do it with a fair amount of care and to keep track of where everything has come from so that we can unscramble this mess that this government has created in the most efficient way possible.

I make an appeal to government members who do believe in the politics of inclusion, who do believe not in arbitrary government bureaucratic action but action based on consultation and common sense, to stand up for those principles in the House and vote in favour of the amendments I have introduced today.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to commend my colleague for his address that I thought to be very thoughtful and in fact very useful.

I had considered motions to rescind, which means having the whole section deleted. It may be of interest to know and I certainly will not put the finger on anyone but at one particular point in time we entered into discussions with members of the government side who understood how vulnerable they were and how badly the work had been done here. There was the fact that there were no studies or consultation, there would not be any money saved and there would be no increased efficiency or effectiveness.

We thought there was an opening or a possibility that we might co-operatively work together to rescind that particular section of the bill. It was coming along well but the big hand of some particular minister no doubt came down: "No, one must not do that because if one did that then obviously what will those naughty Liberals and New Democrats do next?"

Of course what we would have done next would have been to simply look at the bill in an objective kind of way to try to determine if there was something worth saving. I was hopeful on that particular day that we might have had an agreement so that we might have been able to rescind that.

I had high hopes, when I saw some members who are experts on the subject, that we would be able to rescind this section.

[English]

Unfortunately it was not possible. I deplore the fact, as do my colleagues, that there was no consultation. None. Can one imagine? We are talking about all of these national organizations that are staffed with some of the finest people in the land and that represent some of the major groups who keep this country together and make it work. There was no consultation. There were no studies to show that what the government was contending would save money. Can one imagine that? There were no studies to show increased effectiveness or efficiency. Can one imagine that?

I cannot believe that a government would be so insensitive, that it would be so gauche as they say in French.

I think that is a very apt expression. It made a monumental mistake with this bill, and it will pay a very high price for doing so. My hon. colleagues know it is too late. The government had its chance. If it had been willing to rescind this section, it would have been perceived as a government that can listen. However, because it was uncomfortable about the whole thing, it said to itself that it would go ahead, even if it was a bad bill. Well it will pay the price.

There is another point I would like to make, and I want my hon. colleagues to listen very carefully. Just try and find someone who represents these agencies, someone who has credibility, who will tell the government:

[English]

"We think that this merger is a great idea". Find one credible individual. We heard testimony from the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, social scientists and the Canada Council, et cetera. There was not one individual who thought this was a good idea.

In fact the government was so badly prepared that it was embarrassing. It was even embarrassing for me as a member of the opposition who normally likes to see the government get what it deserves, particularly when it has done a shoddy job.

It was so bad that I wanted to say to people: "Please back off". It cannot find one single person in the whole land who would say: "This is a good idea". That is how bad this project really is.

What were these people asking? Were they saying: "Stop it."? No, they were making a very reasoned response. They said: "Delay the decision. Defer that decision. You do not have to stop what you are doing if after consultation and after study you still believe that this is a good decision. However, please consult, study and reflect and then make your decision".

What an approach.

I would have thought that the government would welcome this proposal with open arms.

[English]

Therefore, that is why I am really quite disappointed today. I think my colleague's motions to rescind, obviously, would have been the best. I had hoped as I said earlier that this would have been possible. Unfortunately it is not. The government has chosen to go forward in spite of all the evidence that this is going to go down in the history of this Parliament as one of the worst, if not the worst blunder ever made by this government.

I never thought this government would have been so shortsighted, so clumsy that it would have stumbled so badly.

[English]

Once again I want to extend a word of appreciation to those brave civil servants who went out knowing that there was nothing there to protect. They knew there was nothing there to protect.

There are the politicians who still today in spite of the evidence will stand up for the government. If nothing else, there is loyalty there.

I have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I think you will agree with me, that loyalty without reflection and common sense is extremely dangerous. This is what we are faced with today.

[Translation]

This is a bill that should be withdrawn altogether and completely revamped, instead of being pushed ahead regardless of the consequences.

[English]

I am sorry that this is happening. In fact we could all redeem ourselves if we were to say that this series of amendments makes so much sense that we are going to accept them. I see a smile on the face of one of my colleagues. We could set aside partisan politics, study this and then decide what is the right thing to do.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr Speaker, I welcome the oportunity to join the debate at report stage on Bill C-93.

Since the bill was reported back to the House on February 25th, the government has had the opportunity to reflect on a number of additional proposals which members opposite have put forward and has also observed the need for certain technical amendments to facilitate implementation of the bill at the appropriate time.

I will be dealing with these matters in detail in a few moments. First, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with some of the mischief which has resulted from the efforts of my friends opposite in the legislative committee and the subsequent media coverage and editorials.

The opposition has tried, I believe, to characterize Bill C-93 as a smoke and mirrors exercise, not worth the candle from the perspective of the small savings it will generate over time. In this regard, a significant amount of their efforts and the media follow-up have been focused on part III of the bill, the proposed establishment of a reconstituted Canada Council for the arts and for research in the social sciences and the humanities.

In the legislative committee the hon. member for Mount Royal adduced a February 20, 1992 Treasury Board document dealing with forecasts of savings related to the wind-up and merger measures announced in the February 1992 budget. The reference to dollar savings for a "new single cultural agency" showed a figure of zero for 1992-93 and the four outlying years.

This document was also included in the public submission to the legislative committee from one of the cultural organizations which testified on February 22, 1992. Although officials attempted to explain that this figure merely represented the fact that no firm targets for savings here had been established, my friends opposite have been successful in persuading the press at least that the figure means that no savings would result and that the merger is therefore not a sensible idea.

It must be said that before 1974 these two bodies were combined. The government in the 1974 Speech from the Throne announced the creation of two new granting councils: the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, separate from the Canada Council, and the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council, separate from the National Research Council.

It is interesting to review this development because the split between the Canada Council and SSHRC in 1978 was criticized for mostly the same reasons for which the merger is now under attack.

There were concerns about the independence of the new council, dissatisfaction with administrative costs related to the separation, anxiety over inadequate funding and nervousness about the impact on the humanities.

In fact at second reading in the other place, Senator Hicks said, and I quote: "I am very much concerned that this bill, rather than helping the problem of underfunding, will only add to the administrative costs and diminish the sums of money that may be available to carry out the purposes for which the councils are being created".

I believe he was right, since the information on hand indicate that the administrative rate of this body increased by 200 per cent between 1978 and 1992.

I would remind the House that part III of Bill C-93 proposes to consolidate three existing organizations with a combined annual appropriation for fiscal year 1993-94 of $217 million and a combined administrative overhead of about $35 million.

You will appreciate that with an undertaking of this size it is difficult to be precise in anticipating savings over four or five years. This merger is unlike that of smaller agencies in the bill where the smaller size of those entities makes it possible to be more definitive.

Nevertheless, I am pleased to advise the House today that once the transition to the new organization is complete, it will result in ongoing annual savings of about $5 million, probably as early as in the third year of operation of the new Canada Council for the arts and for research in the social sciences and humanities.

As announced by the Canada Council in its March 13, 1993 press release, the Council will be undertaking as part of its strategic planning process a comprehensive organizational and program review in order to increase administrative savings through a streamlined program structure, simpler procedures and reporting obligations and more flexible financial management primarily through the creation of a multi-year assessment and funding process.

In general terms, we would expect savings to result from colocation with the use of less space at lower costs, from grants awarded on a three-year basis rather than annually, from the reduced costs of the combined council and from streamlining of the financial, personnel and information systems.

There will be some technological improvements to data bases and we expect that some functions might be cheaper to perform in-house which are currently contracted out.

Allow me to comment briefly on Motion No. 40 tabled by my colleague from the opposition.

• (1230)

Of all these amendments to part III of Bill C-93, Motion No. 40 is the one which the government is most ready to accept the spirit of. It is desirable to provide for a review of the new council's activities after a reasonable period of transition and stabilization. On the other hand, the government believes that a mandatory legislative review of the new council by Parliament at a prescribed date in five years is not necessary. In fact, such a review might not be appropriate for the government in place then, which will have its own agenda and which will have to face the pressing issues that the future may hold.

For this reason, the government proposed instead Motion No. 38, which provides for a review during the sixth year of activity of the council. This review would be conducted by the council itself in consultation with the concerned communities and would be independent of Parliament's activities, albeit in conjunction with the latter. The results of these reviews would be presented in reports tabled before Parliament, which would follow up on these as it would please. For these reasons I sincerely hope the hon. member who tabled Motion No. 40 will take into account the government's motion and withdraw his own motion.

In conclusion, it is important to remind ourselves that we are dealing at present with an established Crown corporation and that will be the organizational form of the new council once Bill C-93 is adopted. Therefore it is not for me or for the government to tell you precisely how these savings will be realized.

Indeed it would be inappropriate for me to venture to do so if we are to respect the arm's length relationship to the government that Crown corporations enjoy. Suffice it to say, management has given us its best forecast of the prospects for savings at this early stage of the reintegration.

We on this side of the House accept that. It will be up to the board of directors and management of the new council to determine precisely how these savings will be realized. However, I do think that roughly $5 million annually is a significant amount of money to be generated from a government streamlining measure.

I hope that will put an end to the line of nonsense my friends opposite have been spouting that there are no savings to be achieved from part III of Bill C-93.

In concluding, I must deplore the fact that my colleagues from the opposition, both Liberals and New Democrats, show so little concern for a healthy management of public funds and the fact that we can make relatively important savings for Canadians who these days must make their own budgets and constantly try to make ends meet. In that context, $5 million is an important amount.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. We just heard the government member make all sorts of claims in this House about savings. We also heard him say that the administrative costs for one of the agencies went up some 200 per cent. I heard him say this measure is going to save $6 million. Later I heard him say it is going to save $5 million. He is referring to figures and studies that we as members of Parliament do not have access to.

Is the hon. member prepared to table before this House any studies whatsoever that he or the government has that show any savings?

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): To my knowledge, the member did not read a document here in the House. Therefore I am rather puzzled by the member's request. I do not believe that his request is in order. In any event, this is not a point of order but a matter of debate on which opinions may differ.

• (1235)

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, am I correct in assuming that since the hon. member did not quote, the figures he introduced in the House are unsubstantiated?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think it is a matter of debate and not a point of order.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the interesting remarks made by the parliamentary secretary. I want to thank my colleague, the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, who noted the interesting group of figures presented in this very emotional and historical recall of the history of the Social Sciences and Humanities Council and Canada Council, forgetting the fact that when they were brought together it was not an harmonious marriage. That particular relationship could not even be saved through marriage counselling. Two mismatched organisms had been brought together, so the divorce took place. Then the forced remarriage was brought about by this government through poor rationale and reasoning. Part of that poor reasoning was the supposed saving of money.

There were never any new facts brought into those committees for which I did not have documentation. I wish I had the documentation here in the House to refute those kinds of observations as I did in committee. I was quite fascinated to see that the documents which had been received at that time through access to information did not seem to stun the bureaucrats who were in the committee at that time. If the various groups who were concerned with this particular matter reacted and accepted the materials which I tabled in committee it is because the source seemed to have been right.

They say they bought my information. I am sure the members of the Canadian Federation for the Humanities looked into it. I know that various other groups examined it very carefully. I have before me a press release from the Canadian Federation for the Humanities that was released on February 17 1993. It stated: "For a year we have been led to believe that the government's decision to collapse the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council into the Canada Council had everything to do with a desire to save taxpayers' dollars. This merger, we have been told again and again, is a necessary part of the streamlining of 46 federal agencies that will net the taxpayers $22 million annually".

I talked to the few mergers that were intelligent in there, on copyright and other issues, but most of them were very poorly thought through. The first 20 amendments that were debated earlier today are a perfect example of the ACOA situation. Certainly the amendments my colleagues, the member for St. Boniface and the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, have brought in here add to the intelligence of the need for some change.

Dr. Robert Nadeau says, and I quote: "This is ludicrous. It has become clear to us that the Canada Council merger saves us no money at all. The only saving indicated in the document dated February 20, 1992 is a minuscule 10 person-years. The government's decision to throw research in the humanities and social sciences into the chaos of wholesale reorganization for the sake of 10 person-years in our view is completely irresponsible". If the government is trying to tell me that by putting these three groups together it is going to save $5 million on 10 person-years, I would like to know what kind of salaries it is referring to.

"The deficit made us do it" is the other thing the government has been saying in its defence from the start. Now it is perfectly clear that the government embarked on the SSHRC and Canada Council merger with absolutely no concern for either real savings or real cost to the taxpayers. We already have the lean, mean machine the government says it is busy creating. It is really taking it apart. The Canadian Federation for the Humanities urges the government to excise part III of Bill C-93 presently being studied and now before the House because the merger does not save money. It is likely to waste both time and money and should not be part of this bill at all.

I remind this House that I put a motion before this House on December 4, 1992 which would have suspended this bill. It would have read that an act to implement certain government organization provisions be not read now a second time but be read a second time six months hence. That was defeated by this government. It was a votable motion and this government did not care to listen. This is the government that says we must be more caring, more concerned and listen to the people. It did not consult with Canada Council. It stripped, cut and hurt Canada Council and paid no attention to the needs of the artists. It actually has shown little concern for the fact that this is one of the most fundamental organizations we have in Canada. Its financial clout has been able to develop cultural activity and growth in Canada.

I suppose that is not of interest because certainly this government's rhetoric has been displaced by the kind of cuts it has administered to Canada Council. It was not interested in the Canada Council's side and it certainly was not interested in the science and humanities research side because if it was, it would not be cutting this right now. It would be doing everything in its power to find answers to what is going on in Montreal, for example. It would be looking at the questions of the fundamental problems with employment, schools and the drop-out rate of our children out of high school.

It would be looking at the reasons why people now have to use food banks and why youth are sleeping in the streets. That is the kind of research it could be doing. It could be coming up with some creative answers in terms of the debt, deficit and the other balance on the scale; fair, proper, social policies that could answer the crying needs of the everyday people out there, not the people who have been designing these disastrous kinds of policies that are of no avail to either the Science and Research Council or Canada Council.

I asked for a six-month hoist to give the government the opportunity to consult which it did not do. Now the government has the nerve to come in here and say I misquoted certain facts and information in committee. It said it is going to save $6 million and then it is going to save $5 million—a little correction in the middle of the text. It is going to be done in five years—no, now it is going to be done in three years. Then the government praises the Science Council because it is going to do some very careful and creative work to make this merger a far less costly organization, administratively. It talked about $217 million and the potential for saving $35 million in its operation.

The Canada Council has no choice because the government has cut its grants. What do you expect it to do? It has to chop, chop, chop. It does not know where the budget is coming from or what the extent of the budget really is. It only knows this government is not committed to the well-being of the scientists and the research that needs to be done. It is not committed to supporting the arts and artists. It would be best if this section were totally removed—that would be the real world. That is what I expected the government would do if it had put this aside for six months and consulted, which it did not do.

[Translation]

Stubborn as the government is, it continues on the road to ruin. I believe it is a mistake, a serious mistake. The comments and options put forward by the member for Regina are very sensible. I was hoping that the government would listen but unfortunately I do not believe that it did.

[English]

With respect to the sunset clause which was referred to, I asked for a sunset clause. I am delighted that my colleague, the member from Winnipeg, placed a sunset clause in for debate. If the minister feels his sunset clause at six years is better than our sunset clause at five years, I will leave it to discussion around this table on the floor when we get to my colleague's Motion No. 40. Then we will look at which is the better option; six and five, yes or no. It is a matter of at least going back with a sunset clause because this is a ridiculous motion in the first place.

• (1245)

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak on behalf of the amendments put forward by my colleague, the member for St. Boniface.

I think it should be stressed here this morning that I think the government is in error by not going along with the suggestions that are being made. What we want here is the best result possible. There are some things that have more or less fallen between the stools as far as this legislation is concerned that could be corrected.

As I said earlier, I am opposed to the doing away of the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. However, leaving that argument aside, I want to see some areas that are strengthened here.

One thing that bothers me and has obviously bothered the member for St. Boniface is that the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is going to be losing its designation. That is why he made Motion No. 24. He is suggesting that the name of the organization to be created not just be the Canada Council but be known as the Arts and Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada. It is important to have this designation so we can indicate to people that we have an organization whose activities are reflected in the name. To do otherwise really gives short shrift to the arts and social sciences and to the humanities. I think this can be corrected by changing the name as suggested by the member for St. Boniface in Motion No. 24.

I also think it is important to look at the composition of the board of directors. The board of directors, according to this legislation, really does not have to have its membership from any particular designation of the sphere of influence that this board is to oversee. All the members could be from one area as opposed to another area. There could be those from the arts but not enough from the social sciences or the humanities. I think there should be something in this bill that designates that all of the spheres of influence of this new board are to be represented properly by adequate representation on the board of directors. These people should not be political patronage appointments by the government. They should be people with the proper, requisite knowledge to do the job that is required to be done.

I think we have a tremendous record in this country in the area that is going to be taken on by this new board. The fact that they have a tremendous history to live up to is going to require them to have the proper representation.

It is also important that the areas involved be reflected. In these various areas of the arts, social sciences and humanities, the only way we can show appreciation and convince the Canadian people that each area is getting the proper attention is by giving each the proper representation on the board of directors.

It has been very short-sighted of the government to say that the funding for this board will be reflected in one vote. I think that is wrong. I think what we are doing is really cutting the legs out from underneath this board by doing that. I think the government, upon reflection, would have to agree to this. For the sake of a minor change, frankly, we can have the proper accountability, the proper reflection of the activities of this board by saying that instead of the one vote there would be three votes. There would be a vote for the social sciences, a second vote for the arts and a third vote for administration. I think it is in the interest of all members of the House, certainly in all the areas and spheres of influence reflected by this new organization, that the actual allotting of financing be reflected properly. I ask the government to consider that very carefully.

I think the member for St. Boniface has made an excellent point by saying that we really should not include in this new board the academic relations section of external affairs. This is to me totally incomprehensible. Why would we be bringing this group into this new organization? I do not understand it. Certainly there is no cost saving involved. In fact, there may be additional expenditures as a result. We are talking about Canadian students studying abroad. We are talking about foreign students studying in Canada.

With the present arrangement, when they are part of external affairs these students have the whole department as a support system. They have External Affairs representation in various countries, embassies, consulates and so on. They also have the proper representation that can link very well with this particular section. To say that foreign students will be now in a separate body apart from the rest of external affairs is counterproductive. I think this should be changed and I would ask the government to reconsider this and leave the academic relations section with external affairs.

I also want to mention Motion No. 40 with respect to the review. The previous speaker already mentioned that. I think the government's acknowledgement that a review is necessary is correct. I think the proposal in the suggested amendment by the member for St. Boniface is much superior to what the government is suggesting. The reason I say this is that Motion No. 40 put forward by the member for St. Boniface gives the provision teeth. It says that the review is to be conducted every five years, but the review is to be conducted by Parliament and the study goes back to Parliament for decision making.

I think that is vital because it involves Parliament in the whole process. I think that is certainly what the component parts of the new organization would want. I think that is what Canadians want.

We are talking about an organization that is part of the fibre of our country. I think that if we are going to make these changes then we should make the changes as meaningful as possible. We should reflect the component parts as much as possible and we should allow Parliament to have the input that it needs. Do not forget for a moment of course that Parliament represents every part of this country. We want to make sure that every part of this country has its views and its aspirations reflected in this new organization. Therefore, I think the review by Parliament is very important.

This is too important an area to let go and just to pass over. I want to ask the government to give very strong consideration to those amendments made by the member for St. Boniface because I think they will greatly strengthen what is intended.

• (1255)

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, rather than split my intervention into two, four and six minutes you might find consent to recognize it as one o'clock.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): If I understand correctly, the member is asking the Chair not to notice when it is one o'clock. Is there agreement with that?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Then the hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has up to 10 minutes.

[English]

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, the essence of democracy is that a government governs with the consent of the governed.

We have just had a dissertation by the member for Terrebonne which indicates that that is the least concern of this particular government at this time. None of the points that he put forward had anything to do with the people who are involved with the Canada Council and the humanities, arts and social sciences areas and do not have any real impact on these decisions.

In other words there was no consultation of any kind as far as the governed were concerned. These are the people who are going to be affected most. In other words democracy is the least worry of this particular government at this particular time. Maybe it is because it is just going into an election and it does not expect to be here after the election.

The essence of democracy is the consent of the governed. There has been no consent of anybody who is involved in these particular changes.

The essence of the amendments that we are debating today concerns something that the Canada Council people, the university people and the academics asked this government to look at. It is for the whole of part III to be dropped in its entirety.

They used as part of their argument for the dropping of Part III the fact that within the information provided to the committee and to the arts group that there were no savings except for 10 members of the government who probably would not lose their jobs anyway and who would be moved some place else. There would be no actual savings in the operation of the two councils if they are merged into one.

In the process of looking at these changes, there is no efficiency being indicated at all and there was no consultation with any of the bodies affected.

It has come to the point where I do not know why the government party which calls itself the Progressive Conservative Party does not delete the "Progressive" from its name. That is because what they are actually doing here is going back to what they had before 1978. The decision to change the council into two councils is a regressive move.

Consequently, I never did understand what Progressive Conservative meant. I think probably we should say once more—as my colleague here from the Liberal Party suggests—that we should change the name to the Regressive Conservative Party because that is what the party seems to be doing in this particular operation.

There was no consultation. In fact there was probably exclusion. There was no discussion on the changes that were going to be made in this by Part III of this act.

• (1300)

We recognize that after eight years in power the government is a little hesitant about using consultation. It has given consultation a bad name. It pretends it is going to consult, calls people together, seems to listen and then goes its own way.

That is the kind of consultation it has been carrying on. I suppose maybe we should not blame it for not having consultation in this instance. Nobody believes that any consultation this government has done in the last few years has been of any value to the people who are being governed by its changes.

I can give you specific examples of consultation which has not been to the benefit of the people who are being governed. We have had thousands of hours of consultation relative to agriculture. None of that was taken into consideration when the decisions were made in agriculture. The decisions were made by the bureaucrats and in some cases by the members opposite.

The same thing is happening right now in development. The minister of development is here at the moment. There are a lot of changes being made in development that have nothing to do with the people who are being governed, the people of Canada.

We should be following the recommendations that have been made by the people who are most affected and not disorganising the provision of grants or the process by which we support research, the arts and so on in Canada.

We should look at part III, eliminate it and do a very basic and thorough study of what is necessary to perhaps save more money than we are now. The essence of democracy is only democracy if it happens with the consent of the governed.

I want to spend a couple of moments putting before this House some of the feelings of the people who are most affected by part III of Bill C-93.

For instance, the Canadian Association of University Teachers says that no prior consultation with any of the SSHRC's stakeholders was conducted and no convincing rationale has ever been offered for this measure.

It goes on to say:

> All that is being offered to date is a promise that the merger would be conducted among equal partners in a wholly new agency so as to ensure that the federal support for research in the social sciences and humanities would remain independent.
> That is only a promise which none of the people involved really believe. It did not work before 1978 when these two agencies were separate and it is unlikely to work well in the future.

A second group is the federation representing the social sciences. It said almost the same thing:

> After having carefully studied the proposed legislation, we remain very concerned about the future of social sciences in this country.

Again, there was no consent from or consultation with those people who are being governed.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and the university teachers said:

> Lumping the social sciences and humanities with the arts does not make much sense.

They show how ridiculous it is to be regressive and go back to before 1978 without having a plan that is going to work and without saving any money. They go on to provide several quite workable alternatives which should be used instead of putting part III through.

This is an attack on the very essence of democracy. By going through with part III of Bill C-93, the government is not allowing the people who are most affected to have a say in the legislation which is going to be passed in this House.

Mr. Robitaille: I rise on a point of order, I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. Further to my statement on information about potential savings of $5 million, which members wanted to find out more about, let me give some details for the benefit of this House. This information on the potential savings was provided by Canada Council management in discussions with Treasury Board. At this preliminary stage of the merger—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the only request from the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle was to produce a document if one exists. Does the hon. member have a document to table?

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, if you give me the opportunity, I will conclude very shortly.

These estimates made by management are based on the 10 per cent cuts that the Canada Council made further to the last budget. What I could table in the House is the official press release setting forth the policies under which Canada Council management can give the approximate figure of $5 million.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 1.08 p.m., I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

The House took recess at 1.08 p.m.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at the proposals for parliamentary reform made by the Minister of National Defence in her bid for the Progressive Conservative leadership. What is striking about the proposals is not the proposals themselves but rather that the minister's so-called new politics represents one more instance of people laying claim to certain ideas, such as more free votes among other things, as if they were the first to ever suggest them.

The minister has borrowed without attribution from a recent report of the Standing Committee on House Management, just as the Liberals borrowed without attribution in January from a subcommittee of that same committee, just as the government copy-catted the Reform Party on free votes in its throne speech of 1991, and just as the Reform Party pretended that more free votes was somehow its idea.

The fact is that in recent history the idea of more free votes in Parliament was made in 1985 by the McGrath committee, and was advanced even earlier than that by members like myself when we were considering the LeFebvre report on changes to Parliament.

This is just a little history lesson for the candidates and any other pretenders to reform who do not have the decency to footnote their work.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on April 17, 1993 the newspaper Les Affaires published an article entitled: "The regions' autonomy arrives in the nick of time".

According to that article and to an interview with the federal minister responsible for regional development in Quebec, Mr. Benoît Bouchard, Ottawa supported an impressive number of initiatives between 1988 and 1992. Mr. Bouchard was particularly proud to say that the contributions of his government to projects in Quebec amounted to $5 billion. "When we can clearly define the roles and give detailed explanations on the approach we want to follow, people are impressed" said Mr. Bouchard.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members of this House, Abitibians, I am proud of Benoît Bouchard's work. As he said: "The federal government delivered the goods".

In the name of all the people of Abitibi, I wish to thank him sincerely for the great support he gave Abitibians in the promotion of their regional development projects.

TAXATION

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it is both tax time and budget time again. I want to call the attention of the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue to an area of injustice in the tax system.

One of my constituents writes:

Many women (and some men) across this country, who are custodial parents following marital breakdown, are required by law to report receipt of child support payments as income and then pay taxes on this money.

In my opinion child support payments are not income but rather reimbursements for expenses incurred in raising children.

She goes on to say:

I receive what I consider to be a fair amount of money as child support but in reviewing my income tax returns for the past two years that I have been a single parent, I realize, with horror, that over 40 per cent of what I receive has been lost to me through increased income tax and lost child tax credit.

Without having expressly addressed the question of deductibility of the support payments from the payers' income, I contend that taxing the custodial parent is a major cause of single parent poverty and contributes to the hunger and misery of thousands of children in a country that is relatively affluent.

With a view to the upcoming budget I ask the ministers involved to review this piece of oppressive tax legislation which so viciously discriminates against the custodial parent in a broken marriage situation.

NATIONAL ORGAN DONOR AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to remind members of the House that April 18 to 24 is National Organ Donor Awareness Week.

Professional and voluntary organizations encourage families to discuss and make a decision about organ donation before a tragedy occurs, and urge health professionals to examine how they might participate in the organ donation process.

I invite Canadians everywhere to consider organ donation and to sign a donor card or the consent portion of their driver's licence if they have not already done so. Decisions should be discussed with family and friends so that in the event of death the potential donor's wishes will be followed.

By doing this we can all give, and encourage others to give, the most valuable gift of all, the gift of life.

I wish everyone involved with National Organ Donor Awareness Week a very successful event.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, time and time again we are reminded that the federal agencies and departments are not respecting the Official Languages Act. Twenty-four years after the adoption of this law minorities must still fight for their rights in provinces and in the federal government.

Recently the Canada Labour Relations Board issued an important decision in French only, failing to provide English translation until days later for anglophone workers in Labrador who were most seriously affected by this decision.

• (1405)

Such an action by any federal body is unacceptable. The Conservative government should put its foot down and ensure that all federal agencies and departments respect the rights given to official language minorities to have this federal government serve them in their language.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the financial returns for Air Canada and Canadian Airlines each show massive losses for the last fiscal years and there is no indication that either of these airline companies have done anything in a structural way to change their impossible red-ink balance sheets.

The minister knows there is far too much air service available in Canada and the current competitive nature of service means that neither airline can make a profit from their monopoly of Canadian airspace.

If we are going to have in effect a monopoly arrangement in Canadian airspace with all of the flight patterns between Canadian cities controlled in favour of Canadian Airlines and/or Air Canada then surely the minister has an obligation to ration service so the carriers do not destroy themselves in stupid competition.

Viable Canadian-owned air carriers are important to Canada's long-term well-being.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, the recent tragic death of well-known South African activist Chris Hani has sparked a new round of violence that threatens to undermine the struggle of the people of South Africa to end apartheid.

The continued violence, which has resulted in further loss of human life, must not be allowed to escalate. The government of Mr. de Klerk must thwart the efforts of those who wish to sabotage the forces of democracy and he must take the responsibility of finding ways to rekindle the positive attitudes that seemed to characterize events just a few weeks ago.

The relatively peaceful environment on the occasion of Mr. Hani's funeral was a tribute to his calls for peace and his commitment to negotiate a change. The majority of South Africans want peace and full democracy, and a majority of South African people want to create a better South Africa for all.

We in Canada must do all we can to support both those in government and opposition.

It is right that existing sanctions be continued until irreversible steps to the democratization of South Africa are taken. We recognize that the challenges are great but the opportunities and rewards for peaceful reform in South Africa are greater.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, last Friday evening I attended a meeting of some 150 part-time fishermen organized by the South Shore Independent Fishermen's Association. These fishermen fear that DFO's stated intention with respect to the definition of professional fishermen will exclude them even though some of them have been fishing for over 40 years.

They recognize the need to reduce the groundfish harvesting capacity of the Scotia-Fundy region. What they do not understand, and with some reason it seems to me, is why they who harvest only 1 per cent of the available resource have apparently been targeted for elimination.

Since they have not been the source of the problem why should their elimination be deemed to be the solution? DFO has not satisfactorily answered this question.

If the status or future of part-time fishermen is to be altered in any way there must be full and thorough consultation with those to be affected. To date that has not happened.

SOUTH AFRICA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, South Africans continue to mourn the brutal murder of Chris Hani, a respected leader and official of the African National Congress and the South African Communist Party.

Mr. Hani was one of the most vigorous opponents of the racist system of apartheid, fighting it from exile for three decades.

More recently he placed his faith in a shared future for all South Africans and worked in favour of a negotiated settlement. His assassination is one more senseless and tragic loss of life in a country where a whole generation of black leaders has been lost to violence.

His murder sparked widespread violence and rioting among South Africans and the fallout could threaten the process of reform.

I urge the Canadian government to make a strong statement condemning the assassination of Chris Hani and all violence in South Africa, particularly the continued activities of the security forces against black South Africans and the rise in white extremist violence.

As well we should urge the Government of South Africa to accelerate the timetable for free and democratic elections in that country.

Finally, I join many Canadians in hoping that the events of the last few weeks will prove to be one of the last times that apartheid claims the lives of the courageous men and women fighting for its disappearance.

On behalf of my colleagues we extend our deep condolences to the family of a true hero, Chris Hani.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, everyone recognizes the important role women's groups and associations play in our society, that is everyone but the conservative government which has cut the Secretary of State women's program funding for several years now, under the guise of austerity measures.

Meanwhile, those who hold the purse strings for this government supposedly elected to stabilize the public finances have provided for an additional $221 million in the last budget for the national defence department.

While the budget of the women's program is being reduced by 10 per cent, the government poor management is costing hundreds of millions of dollars. That is what we were told in November 1992 by the Auditor General.

Although women's groups are asked more and more to help fill the voids left by the state, the government unscrupulously continues to cut their financing.

When will the Conservative government respect the rights of half our population?

NATIONAL CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate all those who participated in National Citizenship Week.

Last week thousands of people took the oath of citizenship in ceremonies from St. John's to Victoria. Many were Canadians who participated in ceremonies that reaffirmed their Canadian citizenship. Most of these were young people born in Canada, and for them reaffirmation of their citizenship expressed their commitment to Canada.

New Canadians taking the oath took on a new citizenship and also embraced the values that Canadian citizenship represents: freedom, justice and respect for diversity.

National Citizenship Week provides us with the opportunity to take pride in our citizenship and generally take it to heart.

YOM HASHOAH

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, on Yom Hashoah representatives from Jewish communities around the world, along with many non-Jewish neighbours, marked the 50th anniversary of the Warsaw ghetto uprising. Their horrible memories of this unspeakable moment of history have marked their lives yet their presence bespeaks their final triumph over evil, of survival, and of the continuity of the Jewish people.

The Holocaust was a war of genocide against the Jews. Six million, among them one million children, were murdered by the Nazis or their accomplices for no reason other than the fact of who they were. The uprising exemplified the courage not to submit to Nazi victimization but to live with dignity and fight for life, not to be led like sheep silent to the slaughter.

Their tenacity of spirit was also a form of resistance. The memory of this bravery is scorched on our minds and in our hearts.

Today we must do more than remember. We must take up the challenge to affirm justice and humanity for all people, particularly now in Bosnia. We must assure that the perpetrators of war crimes are brought to justice. Our own progress appears to have faltered. We must redouble our efforts to eliminate the scourge of racism and anti-Semitism from our world.

In so doing the fight to the death for human dignity of the ghetto fighters will not have been in vain.

YUKON

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to Yukon First Nations, successive Yukon territorial governments and all Yukoners who for the past 20 years have worked toward one goal, the passing of the Yukon land claim and self-government legislation.

This is no ordinary achievement. At a time when the world is full of conflict and strife the recent passing of these agreements in the Yukon legislature shows us what can be done in the name of justice, equality and a better future for all people.

These agreements are the foundation of a new era of co-operation and goodwill, a new era that rejects the inequities of a painful past and a troubled present and holds out hope for a future based on respect.

This is indeed a great achievement that will be celebrated and supported by each member of this House. I therefore call upon this government to introduce this historic legislation in the House of Commons and to ensure its quick passage.

CANADIAN CANCER SOCIETY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the House that April is Cancer Month.

I think everyone is aware of the devastating impact of cancer in our society. It is not one disease but a group of diseases that have one aspect in common and can affect individuals of all ages, although the elderly are affected to a greater extent.

The Canadian Cancer Society is trying to beat cancer and to improve the quality of life of people with cancer. The society educates the public, creates healthier environments by supporting changes in legislation, provides emotional and practical support for patients and their families and conducts fund-raising campaigns.

We wish the Canadian Cancer Society and its many volunteers every success with their activities during Cancer Month.

BANKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the government has steadfastly refused to have banks assume their proper responsibility in the national economy.

One of the most often repeated complaints we hear from businesses and the manufacturing, development, construction, restaurant and retail sectors is that despite having been long and loyal customers, now in their moment of greatest need they find they cannot get the time of day from their banks.

During this recession the banks have been holding such a tight grip on credit that they are choking economic growth and job creation. Despite the banks' repeated claims that it is small and medium sized firms which create the bulk of new jobs, according to the Canadian Banking Association less than 25 per cent of business loans go to those firms.

The main banks should not be making small and medium sized businesses pay for their lending mistakes with South America, Campeau and Olympia and York. If the banks remain unwilling to change their practices, as our leader has often urged, it will be incumbent upon Parliament to change the statutes that provide banks with this privileged position in Canadian society so that they too can help Canada back to work.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In a confidential report the IMF told this government that it has to put its finances in order. Earlier today the Minister of Finance said that he agreed with the IMF report. It is something that we have said to this government for years, that it had the wrong priority.

As there is now pressure on the government from outside to have the proper priorities, will the Prime Minister change his mind and cancel this infamous program of buying helicopters that we do not need any more, at all? As a gesture of good will for the nation and to show that he wants to save taxpayers' money, will he cancel his royal trip to Europe where he is going to four capitals to distribute his CV to find a job?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was going to compliment the Leader of the Opposition on his 30 years in Parliament yesterday and tell him that he apparently does not get more elegant as he gets older in his job.

My hon. friend refers to the IMF report which indeed quite properly points to all industrialized governments in regard to making certain that debt is reduced, that deficits to the extent humanly possible are eliminated, that privatizations occur, that interest rates are kept low, and that inflation and productivity are dealt with as well. All of this is further to what we have been seeking to do, and so we take good notice of important reports such as those brought forward by the IMF.

My hon. friend neglected to mention that the same IMF report complimented the federal Government of Canada on its actions to get its finances in order: "The IMF has also said that the restructuring and the fiscal consolidation that Canada is going through have laid the groundwork and the foundation for a solid sustainable recovery". As others have pointed out, in many respects the report is quite complimentary of the efforts made at the federal level.

At an appropriate time the Minister of Finance will bring in another budget that will deal with the matters raised by my hon. friend. Perhaps at that time the Liberal Party will be able to rise, for the first time this session, and vote in support of one measure designed to reduce the deficit.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I asked two questions. I asked the Prime Minister a question about the helicopters and he is still stubbornly refusing to reply to the question. On my second question on cancelling his trip we heard nothing at all.

But it is not only the IMF. The Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops says that at this time the total number of both unemployed and underemployed in Canada is close to a staggering 3.9 million people.

When will this government reorganize its priorities and rather than spending money the way this government is spending money try to use that money to create jobs for these 3.9 million people who are either unemployed or underemployed in Canada?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has made quite a leap from the Catholic bishops to the IMF. He will have to let us know which has ecclesiastical dominance in his mind and which deals with the economy.

The same IMF report says directly, and I quote this for my hon. friend: "The foundation has been set for a lasting improvement in Canada's economic performance. Structural reforms and fiscal consolidation efforts at the federal level should sustain a healthy rate of growth once the recovery gains momentum. With the decline in inflation, monetary conditions have eased considerably and are expected to ease further and support the recovery".

Indeed the bank rate dropped 10 basis points today, down to another low level, and it is with low interest rates, low inflation and high investment rates such as were indicated in the IMF report that we are going to create the jobs that all Canadians including the Catholic bishops seem to want.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see what the Prime Minister has to boast about, after heading a government that in nine years, since 1984, has accumulated $280 billion in debt. He is going to use taxpayers' money to travel around Europe, while one 1.6 million Canadians are looking for jobs and 2.5 million would like to have full-time instead of part-time jobs.

My question for the Prime Minister is this: When will he make decisions that would be welcomed by Canadians, such as cancelling this ridiculous helicopter program and staying in Canada and paying his own way to Europe in July?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is indignant about the fact that the national debt doubled under the Conservative government. What about a national debt that under his government was multiplied by 11—not by 2, 3, 7 or 10, but 11—as a result of the worst case of mismanagement of the economy in Canada's history. You were Minister of Finance, you were President of the Treasury Board, and your—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for LaSalle—Émard.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Twenty-two per cent of the population of Montreal are living below the poverty line in one of the most industrialized cities in this country. The reason is obvious, Mr. Speaker. According to Canada's bishops, it is because of this government's laissez-faire policies. The Prime Minister does not like these references to our bishops, so according to Quebec's minister of industry, it is because the federal government has no policy for industrial growth. Here is my question: Who is wrong, the bishops and the Government of Quebec, or this government, which refuses to act responsibly?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no axe to grind with either the Catholic or the Protestant bishops. They are entitled to their opinions. However, I may remind the hon. member that last week the Royal Bank indicated that economic growth in Quebec, starting with Montreal will be the highest in Canada, and that Canada's economic growth will be the highest of any industrialized country in the world.

The hon. member knows perfectly well his party voted against the drug patent legislation that creates thousands of jobs in Montreal. It voted against every plan to create jobs in Montreal. And today he has the nerve to stand up for Montreal's interests. I think he should pay a little more attention to what his own party is doing. Vote for Quebec and Montreal once in a while instead of always voting against Quebec's and Montreal's interests.

• (1425)

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, I remember a time when the Prime Minister was more interested in the bishops than in the Royal Bank.

Let me cite from the bishops' proposal for job creation. They do not call just for cutbacks. They call for a comprehensive industrial strategy. They call for the renewal of public infrastructure. They call for research and development to developing industries and they call for enhanced programs for worker retraining.

That is what we on this side of the House have called for. We are proud to stand with the bishops and not the Royal Bank. It is also what millions of Canadians are calling for.

How much more suffering must the Canadian people endure before this government begins to act?

Mr. Chrétien: Repent.

Mr. Harvard: Repent and recant.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend stands with the bishops. We stand with the humble parish priests and the Royal Bank.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: That is just to prove that our tastes are small c catholic.

The numbers last month showed an increase of 48,000 new jobs. The numbers today show a decline in the bank rate by another 10 basis points. Inflation is now at its lowest in 30 years.

The Royal Bank and other important institutions indicate that Montreal, Quebec, the province of Quebec, will lead Canada in economic growth next year. It indicates as well that Canada will lead the industrialized countries.

With all the respect that I have for the Catholic bishops and the Anglican bishops and others, these are the realities. Where Canada is making solid progress the IMF says that it is number one in the world in terms of these fundamental growth factors.

I would like to do a little better. Obviously we would appreciate doing better. That might take some help from the Catholic bishops, a little more than we have been able to receive. But we are grateful for them, their advice, their prayers and their help. We look forward to making greater progress as a result of their advice.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance.

Although I must say it is interesting that 10 years ago it was former Prime Minister Trudeau who said of the Catholic bishops' statement that they had no business making a statement on this country's affairs, the Liberals seem to have changed their tune.

[Translation]

In his document called "Charting the Economic Course", the Minister of Finance stated, and I quote: "In all my pre-budget consultations with Canadians, the main theme has been deficit and debt reduction".

We have also been in touch with the Canadian Labour Congress, anti-poverty organizations and the Canadian Council of Catholic Bishops, and that is not what they told us.

Can the Minister of Finance or his spokesperson tell us who exactly indicated that debt and deficit reduction should be a government priority? Where is this consensus the minister is referring to?

[English]

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party will be interested to learn that over 90 groups from all walks of life in Canada have submitted briefs.

The Minister of Finance received letters from hundreds and hundreds of Canadians who had specific recommendations for the budget. He has listened to all this advice including the advice from the bishops of Canada. That advice is studied and we will see the results in the budget when the Minister of Finance brings it down later on.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the reality is that there is a huge deficit in Canada. Every party is concerned about that but the discussion is about how we address that.

For millions and millions of Canadians the major deficit in this country is a jobs deficit. Unemployment and poverty continue to cost the Canadian economy $80 billion a year.

• (1430)

The government has said it wants to make cuts. The government has choices. The government can cut corporate Canada's $1 billion business expense deduction. The government can cut offshore interest deductibility for corporations which cost hundreds of millions of dollars to the Canadian economy. The government could have stopped the bill for tax-free family trusts which cost up to $600 million a year. Nowhere in the minister's statement does he suggest these kinds of cuts.

Will the Acting Minister of Finance ask the wealthy and profitable corporations to pay their fair share?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I think the record will show that this government has done a great deal to cut out the loopholes in the tax system, the extras that were allowed to be charged by the previous administration.

When my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, was Minister of Finance, he brought in major changes to the tax system that cut out a lot of those loopholes.

I remind the hon. member, however, that the suggestions she is making today would place our industries in an uncompetitive position with those others that they deal with around the world. We are a trading nation. We must compete on a relatively level playing field with other industries in other countries if we want to remain competitive.

The hon. member's colleagues support the Canadian Restaurant Association. At least they are at its receptions all the time eating its food. Yet they want to wipe out a deduction that is allowed for entertainment expenses which the restaurant association opposes. They cannot have it both ways, although the NDP likes to try.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I suggest the minister ask Canadians whether they would rather have first-class universal health care or pay for boxes in the SkyDome, which they think is more important and which choices the government should be making.

To say that family trusts would hurt business in this country is absolutely ludicrous. There are choices that this government can make and there are cuts that this government can make.

The Prime Minister could choose to cut his farewell tour. The government could choose to cut the purchase of $5.8 billion worth of helicopters.

I want to ask a question of the acting finance minister. Over and over the government has chosen the privileged over those who have the least. It has chosen to punish those who have the least over those who have the most. Is the acting minister going to be prepared in the new budget to make sure that everyone pays their fair share and not just those who have the least?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I am sure Bob White would be very interested in the hon. leader's comments on the Dome since he is very involved in the Dome in Toronto. I think the NDP government appointed him president. I am sure he enjoys his box in the SkyDome as well. I am sorry he has not invited you to a ball game yet. It is good fun there. You should try it some time.

Ms. McLaughlin: I do not ask Canadians to pay my way. I will pay my own way.

Mr. McDermid: The NDP is talking about job creation all the time. Yet it wants us to cancel the helicopter project that is going to create 45,000 man-years of high-tech work in areas in this country that need that type of work like Halifax, Nova Scotia.

I want her to tell the aircraft workers in Halifax that she is going to cancel that helicopter project because that will put them out of work and I do not think they want to see that.

We are creating jobs through the creation of helicopters that are required by our Armed Forces to protect our sovereignty in Canada and to provide search and rescue.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, in Question Period yesterday the Minister of National Defence made reference to a theatre press release issued in Somalia on March 18, two days after a Somali died while in the custody of Canadian Forces peacekeepers.

My question is for the Acting Minister of National Defence. When the theatre release was issued on March 18 to whom did it go? Why were members of the Canadian media who were on the scene at the time and who raised questions on the issue kept in the dark?

• (1435)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the press release was issued as is customary in theatre, in this case in Mogadishu.

I understand some reporter who was in Somalia but was not in Mogadishu said he did not get the report. I do not know why that happened. An earlier incident on March 4 which was reported on March 6 in the same way, in theatre through a press release, was widely reported in the world media. Why that did not happen on the other incident I do not know. You would have to check with the media.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I think there is something terribly wrong here. The incident occurred on March 16. The Minister of National Defence was informed on March 17. A notice was issued on March 18 in Somalia and was pinned on a notice board, as the hon. House leader has suggested, 260 kilometres from the scene where it happened.

The Canadian media on the scene at the time asked questions and were kept in the dark. The Canadian public did not find out about it until two weeks later, and not from the Minister of National Defence but from an investigative reporter and in response to questions from the Official Opposition.

My supplementary question is: Why did the Minister of National Defence not follow up on her knowledge of this incident on March 17? Was it because the minister is incompetent or was it because the minister simply did not want the Canadian public to know?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the minister pointed out yesterday in fact the press release issued in Mogadishu was not sent immediately to DND headquarters, and as she indicated that is a weakness in the system. She has put in corrective measures to make sure that does not happen in the future.

The reality is there was no cover-up; there was no secret. The headquarters for Canadian operations are in Mogadishu. The officers charged with responsibility of producing the press releases and so on are in Mogadishu. When the incident occurred as all other incidents that have occurred, and I think there have been three, they have put up the press release.

This one uniquely out of the three was not widely reported. That is not a cover-up. It is in fact an acknowledgement that perhaps other means need to be looked into for disseminating information. That is what the minister of defence acknowledged yesterday. She indicated that she had put in place the measures to make sure in fact that information is available at DND and Canadian press can have access to it.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow this issue up with the Prime Minister. It smells an awful lot like the Al-Mashat affair.

The Minister of National Defence publicly blamed her own peacekeepers yesterday for failing to advise her about the death of the Somali. We now know that within 24 hours the minister was advised and the minister made a decision not to make any public statement here in the Parliament of Canada about the death of the Somali specifically referred to.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister to explain why his Minister of National Defence would blame our peacekeepers in Somalia when she obviously decided to keep this whole issue secret herself.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member as usual is making wild, unsubstantiated accusations and indeed misrepresenting what the minister said.

The reality is, as I have just indicated in answer to a question from her colleague, that in each and every incident the next day in theatre the officers responsible issued a press release. What the Minister of National Defence acknowledged yesterday is that procedures did not automatically mean that these press releases were transferred to DND. They go up through chain of command. The hon. member continues to talk from her seat and will not be dissuaded by facts if she can throw a little mud even though it is not justified.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the Minister of National Defence is using today the same logic that the government applied in the Al-Mashat case.

The truth of the matter is that her own spokespersons admitted that within 24 hours the minister herself knew all about the death of a Somali. She took it upon herself to keep this information from the Canadian people. I would like the Prime Minister to tell us why his minister, instead of taking her responsibilities actually put the blame on officials in Somalia?

• (1440)

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in respect of this. The press release that was issued on March 16 simply said that a man had been retained after trying to infiltrate the Canadian compound at night and had died in custody. The officials there turned the media away from the facts which only came out after it became public that Canadian officials treated this as a homicide and that Canadian soldiers were being investigated under that charge.

It is clear there was a cover-up in Somalia and it is now clear from the minister yesterday admitting outside the House that she knew about this a day after it happened.

Will the government not concede therefore that the minister has aided and abetted the cover-up and yesterday simply told at best half truths to the House of Commons?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is certainly an expert in half truths.

The reality is that the statement of facts was issued in Mogadishu and an investigation commenced as is proper and the investigation carries on. That is the circumstance.

The hon. member seemed to be suggesting that in fact it is appropriate and once an investigation is commenced by the Judge Advocate General's office or his staff that in fact the minister come into the House and give all details of the investigation. That would be absurd as he knows.

There is nothing to cover up for goodness' sake. An incident happened. The military through its legal system is investigating it.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister has had more than ample opportunity to come before this House and lay out the facts for the Canadian people and she has persistently refused to do so.

Today we have another announcement from DND in respect of another killing on March 4 of a Somali civilian by Canadian forces in Somalia and the media advisory, as it is called, leaves many more questions open than it answers.

Will the minister tell the House whether any Canadian forces personnel have been charged or disciplined, whether there are any criminal activities involved in respect of this incident, where was the Somali when shot, and above all whether DND is treating this as a homicide. Why did the Minister of National Defence when she was expressly asked yesterday to give the House the facts on this not take that opportunity? Was she covering up on this as well?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the particular incident in question occurred March 4. On March 6 a press release was issued in theatre in Mogadishu that was widely reported in the Canadian media. If you check the files you will find that. Some cover-up.

An investigation by DND was undertaken by the officials on site. The report has reached headquarters. On the basis of that report the Department of National Defence has sent investigators from DND to Somalia to continue the investigation. On the advice of the Judge Advocate General the Minister of National Defence was asked not to comment until they are on site. They are on site as of yesterday. That is why the press advisory today. The hon. member is digging, looking for dirt in a place where none exists. This has been upright, handled properly and the hon. member should try to ask some decent questions about issues of importance to Canadians.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

We know that a reporter from Pembroke was at the base in question within 48 hours of the incident that is now being discussed before Parliament. We know that reporter put direct questions to base officials.

The reporter in question has been quoted and the transcript has been available to radio. It said directly that when questions were put no answers were given. The reporter in question, Mr. Jim Day, has said that no notice was posted.

• (1445)

I want to ask the Prime Minister why, given the important and tragic nature of this incident, a decision was taken to keep this information from the people of Canada and from the Canadian press contingent on the ground at the base. Surely the Prime Minister does not believe that a piece of paper posted on a bulletin board 260 kilometres away represents a press release. A press release must be released to the press if it is to be valid.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as it has been handled in every incident that occurred, the headquarters' staff deals with the media and issued a press release in Mogadishu away from theatre.

The investigation officers who are part of the Judge Advocate General's group have been conducting the investigation. Assistance has subsequently been provided by Ottawa.

The fact that soldiers in northern Somalia, away from headquarters, who were charged with the responsibility of keeping the peace and distributing food and so on would not answer questions about an investigation into a homicide being conducted by the Judge Advocate General's office is hardly a shocking thing. In fact the persons responsible operate under the Judge Advocate General's office.

I want to ask the hon. member what kind of an answer a reporter would get if he came up to an RCMP officer and said: "I would like the details of your investigation". He would probably be told to get lost and that is probably what happened to him.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just caused himself some serious difficulty. He has taken great pains to say to Parliament and through Parliament to the people of Canada: "We are hiding nothing. We issued a press release within 24 hours". Now he is telling us that it is not unusual that a reporter would be told to get lost when asking about what is going on.

The fact of the matter is that we have a public acknowledgement by a member of the minister's staff that within 24 hours the minister of defence was briefed. The minister was briefed on March 17.

Why for two weeks did the minister of defence, who was in this House on many of those days in the intervening period, choose not to report to Parliament and choose to keep this information from the people of Canada? Why was there a cover-up under way?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there was no cover-up. A press release was issued stating an investigation was under way. It is no more appropriate for the minister of defence to come in and talk about details of investigations under the Judge Advocate General's department than it is for the Solicitor General to come into the House of Commons and talk about details of investigations by the RCMP.

I understand the hon. member went to law school. Did they not teach him there that it was inappropriate to talk about details—

Mr. Tobin: I didn't go to law school.

Mr. Andre: Well, he is not a lawyer. I'm sorry I maligned him.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps we should move on.

AIDS

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the minister of health.

The Toronto Hospital for Sick Children has issued an alert that 17,000 former patients may have been tainted with AIDS blood, a medical and social tragedy that the federal government failed to prevent and continues to fail to trace the victims.

Will the minister make a commitment today to initiate a national strategy to trace all victims? Will he also make a commitment today to compensate those victims and their families as soon as they are discovered?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we have been informed by the Government of Ontario that the children's hospital in Toronto is making an investigation into the cases that my colleague referred to. The Department of National Health and Welfare is working with the Government of Ontario to find out exactly what happened.

If there are any measures that have to be taken they will be. However, we have to give the Government of Ontario the opportunity to follow the investigation and make a report before making any further decisions.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister.

The minister knows that the question of blood supply is a very pressing problem in the country. Since the minister was originally asked about this several months ago in the House it has gone from being a problem in one or two provinces to a problem across the country. I ask the minister again, on behalf of the Official Opposition, what further information does this government need before setting up an independent, public, judicial inquiry into the safety of the blood supply for all Canadians?

• (1450)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have to make the point first that cases referred to before by the member from Winnipeg refer to children at the children's hospital in Toronto between 1980 and 1983. He knows very well that the AIDS issue came forward in 1983.

Second, the committee of the House of which I believe the member is a member is working on a report at the present time which normally would be given to me where recommendations will be given about all the questions on tainted blood.

I have already said in the House that if there is any serious recommendation which would trigger the necessity for an inquiry, I will do that. The hon. member will agree that normally we wait for the report by the committee before making any decision about what the committee will recommend.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

The minister yesterday made public a report recommending that Canadian barley sold into the North American market no longer be marketed by the Canadian Wheat Board.

In view of the fact that there are other studies which conclude that barley should stay under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board and in view of the fact that many farmers and farm groups want a plebiscite before any changes are made to the Canadian Wheat Board, will the minister confirm today that in fact no changes will be made to the Canadian Wheat Board without first holding a producer plebiscite?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first of all the member is not accurate. He should know better than that.

There has been no suggestion that barley be removed from the Canadian Wheat Board. What is being analysed is the question as to whether in fact there should be some freedom of choice by producers who choose to grow and market barley. He should get his story straight.

There is no recommendation or no analysis by anybody that I am aware of, certainly nothing that was said yesterday by Dr. Carter in his report, that suggested in any way that barley should be removed from the Canadian Wheat Board. The suggestion that was made was that in the continental North American market there should be some opportunity and some choice by producers as to how they choose to market their product.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that what he is talking about is making changes to the marketing of barley that is going to reduce the efficiency of the Canadian Wheat Board and change the way that barley is marketed in this country.

The minister will know that the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, Unifarm, the National Farmers' Union, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta wheat pools, Keystone Agricultural Producers and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture want to see a plebiscite, a vote, before any changes are made to the marketing of barley. As well, a poll conducted by Anderson Fast Marketing Research found 88 per cent of producers in Saskatchewan want a plebiscite as well.

The question is simple. Will the minister clearly state that there will be a plebiscite before any changes are made to the way that barley is marketed in the North American continent? After all, the Canadian Wheat Board is there for the producers in western Canada, not at the wish of the government or the minister.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are several producer groups on the prairies, including United Grain Growers and many other farm organizations that have direct membership that are in favour of a dual system.

If in fact there was consideration or there was an examination of removing barley totally from the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board then I think the member has a case. But if in fact we do take a look at it and decide that it is in the best interest of the producers to have a dual system which gives choice, then the producer who chooses either to market through the Canadian Wheat Board or on his own has a plebiscite and he will operate that plebiscite every time he chooses to market barley.

The answer is under the present scenario that is being examined, there will be no plebiscite when the government makes up its mind.

FOREIGN AID

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister for international development and external relations.

The minister will recall in 1986 she led the Canadian delegation to the special UN session on Africa, followed in 1987 by the CIDA report and policy which identified the poorest of the poor as a centrepiece of our foreign aid.

In view of recent decisions to cut not by 10 per cent, but by a total amount, aid programs to countries in Africa which are among the poorest of the poor and the hardship this is creating both for these African countries as well as their Canadian partners, what steps is the minister taking to try to ameliorate that situation and to assure that all of the headway that has been made since 1986 is not now going to be lost?

• (1455)

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, allow me first of all to congratulate my hon. colleague and to commend him for his untiring concern and dedication to Africa.

That being said, I must tell you that since the economic statement was tabled on December 2 we have had to make do in the Canadian International Development Agency with a budget reduced by over $200 million. Major decisions and hard choices had to be made. I based my choices on the regional concept recognized by NGOs as well as the UN.

In answer to the question about what I intend to do regarding Africa, I will say that Africa will continue to receive 45 per cent of our bilateral assistance, and humanitarian assistance as well as food aid will be maintained. Our support to UNICEF, NGOs and institutions is also maintained. In addition, Africa will receive $4 to $5 million a year, on top of the $10 million to $20 million to promote economic ties. So, it is totally wrong to claim that Canada is turning its back on Africa. We are still supporting efforts through a regional development concept or philosophy.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of fisheries.

Fishermen across eastern Nova Scotia and the Gulf of St. Lawrence are at their wits end as they gear up for the 1993 fishing season. For months they have been waiting anxiously for some kind of details on a comprehensive compensation plan to help them through this crisis, a crisis which has been created largely by this government's mismanagement. For months this minister has been stonewalling them.

When will he finally announce the details of his compensation plan so they can begin to prepare for their future?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, on December 18 I believe it was, I announced what the total allowable catches would be with respect to certain fish stocks in the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the south and west coasts of Newfoundland this year. There had to be severe reductions because of problems that all members of the House know about.

All of the regular programs of the Government of Canada are in place to assist people who may be affected by the diminution and the amount of fish that they can catch. We are reviewing now and are preparing to supplement those programs with respect to people in Atlantic Canada who do not live in the northern cod area but who are affected by these quota reductions.

I am very concerned about this as is the government and there will be an announcement as soon as possible.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, these delays are unacceptable. The minister has known for months that the quota cuts that he has announced will not allow fishermen to have a season in 1993. Thousands of fishermen will not have a season. As well there will be plant workers who will be thrown out of work as a result.

There is no need to keep them in this uncertainty any longer. When will he announce this plan so they can plan their future and we will know how long this crisis is going to last?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I might say that this is a crisis that has been building up over a period of years, certainly since the year 1977. This is not a sudden crisis that has just come upon us.

There will be fishermen who will not be able to earn sufficient UI stamps this year because of the diminution in the stocks of fish that they have to catch. There will be plant workers who will not be able to get employment. For that reason the present programs may not be sufficient and may not be all that is necessary. The government is developing a plan to deal with that and it will be announced. I cannot give an exact date for that but it will be announced in time to assist those people who are going to need assistance.

The fishermen are eligible for unemployment insurance up until May 15. There will be a plan in place when it is needed.

Mr. Dingwall: Before the election.

Mr. Crosbie: We are not Liberals; we don't bother about elections.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and it also relates to the Carter report on the issue of the marketing of barley.

• (1500)

That report has already been roundly condemned. The Canadian Wheat Board describes it as disappointing and unacceptable. The outgoing president of Sask Pool says the report is "just torching the very institutions we have here".

We want to know where the government precisely stands on this report. Is the Minister of Agriculture refusing to take the advice of his very own wheat board? Will he not listen to a voice of farmers?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the report was commissioned as a result of an analysis we did of all regulations in the Department of Agriculture, one of them being to further analyse how barley should be marketed in North America.

We appointed a round table. That round table hired a consultant, Dr. Carter, to whom the hon. member referred. He just made his report public yesterday in Alberta. We will be hearing from all the participants on their concerns. Once that happens the Department of Agriculture will then make recommendations to the government as to how we will proceed.

Before he goes too far in quoting the chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board, he should also refer to the letter that he wrote to Dr. Bjarnasson wherein the chief commissioner pointed out that Canadian farmers would increase their revenues in changing to a dual system by about $35 million. That is not bad in terms of increasing farmers' revenues from the sale of barley.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice.

People from across Canada including two candidates running for the leadership of the Progressive Conservative Party are in favour of lowering the maximum age for young offenders. I would like to ask the minister: How can we get this change into effect while this House is in session?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question.

Obviously the question of young offenders is a very important one. So far I mentioned a couple of weeks ago, or maybe one month ago, that we will get back to the House with something on that subject within a month.

This question and others are being contemplated for the moment as other amendments to the legislation. We amended this legislation last year in Bill C–12, which is a great improvement to this legislation.

I thank the hon. member for her question. We will make sure the House will be aware of our intention within a month.

POINT OF ORDER

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been on the waiting list for two days to ask a question on the Young Offenders Act.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You asked for the nays and the Leader of the Liberal Party rose in his seat. If there was any agreement between the parties, we did not hear about it. So we thought the Liberal Party voted against it and the NDP as well, and we did too. That is exactly what happened. If I am wrong, Mr. Speaker, that is how you put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Accordingly pursuant to Standing Order 61(2) the next question is on the main motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to a subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Pierre Blais (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Blais (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on third reading on Bill C–102, which contains the legislative amendments to implement a number of excise tax and tariff measures announced over the past 20 months. Many of these proposals have already been implemented through notices of ways and means motions tabled at the time of their announcement. Among the measures are tariff changes to reduce cross–border shopping and a range of initiatives to address the problem of tobacco smuggling and tax evasion.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that the growth in tobacco smuggling over the past few years has had a profound economic and social impact. Domestic sales of tobacco products have fallen significantly over the last year and a half, particularly in some parts of the country. The result of falling tobacco sales has been a substantial loss in business for those in the wholesale and retail trade.

Criminal organizations are becoming increasingly involved in the packaging of tobacco products and are using the profits from illegal sales of tobacco to finance other criminal activities.

Tobacco smuggling and tax evasion have also had a serious impact on the fiscal and social policies of the federal government. Revenues from tobacco taxes have declined as Canadian smokers switched to contraband tobacco products. This decline in tobacco tax revenues, which are used to fund important government programs and services, has considerably outpaced the decline in overall tobacco consumption. As well, government health policies to discourage smoking are being undermined by the availability of inexpensive tobacco on the black market.

Without strong action by the government, the level of smuggling would continue to increase, with the resulting costs for the public and private sectors alike. This concern was the basis for the enforcement and control measures announced by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue last spring to deter tobacco smuggling. Bill C–102 provides the legislative authority to implement these measures, which can be summarized as follows: tighter controls on the distribution and sale of duty–free tobacco products in Canada; improved markings on tobacco products to better identify duty–free tobacco products; the addition of "proceeds of crime" provisions to the Excise Act and the Customs Act to enable law enforcement agencies to seize the profits made by organized crime from tobacco smuggling and tax evasion; and significantly higher criminal penalties for people caught smuggling tobacco into Canada or selling contraband tobacco products in Canada.

On this last point, I would like to note that amendments were proposed during consideration of this bill by the legislative committee to further increase the penalties for the smuggling and illegal sale of tobacco products under the Excise Act and Customs Act. I am pleased to report that these amendments were approved by the committee and are included in Bill C–102 for consideration by hon. members today.

I should add that over the past year the government has allocated substantial new resources to Revenue Canada and the RCMP to enable these agencies to strengthen their enforcement efforts both at the border and within Canada. These additional resources, together with the higher penalties, new controls on the sale and distribution of duty–free tobacco and the addition of "proceeds of crime" provisions in this bill are vital components of the government's measures to address the tobacco smuggling problem and will improve the government's enforcement efforts in this area considerably.

This bill also implements the excise tax on tobacco products for export or for sale through duty–free shops that was announced in February 1992.

The purpose of this tax was to reduce the incentive to smuggle by narrowing the price differential between Canadian tobacco products for sale in the Canadian tax-paid market and those sold in other countries.

While the tax was effective in reducing the supply of contraband tobacco products in Canada in the weeks following its introduction, it quickly became apparent that its effectiveness would be severely limited in the longer term once suppliers in the U.S. were able to obtain Canadian-type tobacco products outside of Canada. The government therefore suspended collection of the tax in April 1992, when it announced the introduction of additional tobacco enforcement and control measures, which are among those I described a few moments ago.

Bill C-102 also addresses another difficulty Canadian wholesalers and retailers have had to face: cross-border shopping.

Last year the Minister of Finance indicated to the Canadian Retail Council's National Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping that, to help deal with this serious problem, the government would be prepared to remove tariffs on imported consumer products that are not made in Canada and are purchased by cross-border shoppers, where the tariff contributes to higher prices in Canada.

The task force identified a number of products and after consultations with all interested parties it was determined that the tariffs on about 25 products could be removed. These tariff removals represent approximately $1 billion worth of annual imports and about $60 million in duty. Examples are video cassette recorders, microwave ovens, sewing machines, cameras and telephone answering machines.

Canadian consumers benefit as lower prices for these imported goods are passed on by the retailers and wholesalers. The retailers and wholesalers, and the economy in general, benefit as these measures encourage consumers to shop in Canada.

The response to this initiative has been very positive. Department of Finance officials are continuing to work with Canadian industry and the Retail Council of Canada to identify other consumer products on which tariffs can be removed.

I would also like to touch very briefly on some of the other excise and tariff measures contained in this bill.

Hon. members will recall that in the 1992 budget the Minister of Finance announced the elimination of the 8.5 cent per litre excise tax on the ethanol and methanol portions of blended fuels. This measure, which will be enacted by Bill C-102, will encourage the development and use of ethanol and methanol fuels made from renewable feedstocks. The use of these fuels provides a number of environmental benefits, such as a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions.

The bill also contains a number of other tariff changes. Most of these are technical but some of them remove duties in response to requests from Canadian businesses. These amendments cover a variety of products such as peach trays and light bars for emergency vehicles but in my view the most significant change is the extension of duty-free entry to materials and parts imported by manufacturers who make goods that are incorporated into other products that are exported.

Previously those manufacturers could only get a refund of duties after the finished products were exported. Immediate duty relief was restricted to manufacturers who were both importers of the parts and materials and exporters of the finished goods. The extension of this privilege to intermediate producers is a big step in improving the competitive position of those producers.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize the importance of the provisions in Bill C-102. In particular, this bill contains important measures to address the cross-border shopping problem. As well, the measures that will be enacted by this bill to combat tobacco smuggling will ensure that Canadian enforcement agencies have the proper means to go after and dismantle the criminal organizations involved in the illegal tobacco trade.

I therefore ask hon. members to support the passage of this bill on third reading.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today on Bill C-102.

Basically this bill responds to the cross-border shopping problem and provides additional measures to counteract tobacco smuggling. I think everyone here recognizes the problems of cross-border shopping and tobacco smuggling. We as legislators have been asked by the Canadian people to do something about this problem. I know that we all feel that not enough is being done to attack this epidemic and not enough is being done to attack the whole problem of contraband cigarettes.

This bill was introduced in consultation with the tobacco industry. It is aware of the seriousness of the problem of cross-border shopping and smuggling and understands that it has a role to play in doing something about this problem. However, while this bill takes a first step to deal with the problem of smuggled tobacco by changing packaging rules and imposing stricter penalties for those who deal in these products it does nothing to address the root of the problem, which is high tobacco taxes.

Today as we study this bill I would like to speak specifically about the major problem of smuggling tobacco products in this country because it greatly affects my area of Haldimand—Norfolk. My argument is this: I believe that excessively high taxation on tobacco has created a prohibition-like environment in which otherwise law-abiding citizens are either selling or buying smuggled tobacco.

People from every walk of life, young and old, professional and welfare recipients, are in on the illegal action. All feel that they are over-taxed and for this reason have convinced themselves that buying or selling illegal tobacco is socially acceptable. They think that taxes on cigarettes are too high and that it is not a crime to buy or sell them. Many ordinary Canadians feel no compunction about buying or bypassing this tax-related law. Canadians now wink at cigarette smugglers the same way as Americans winked at the American bootleggers of the 1920s.

Smuggling is dividing communities. It is dividing native communities, inspiring the creation of criminal conspiracies, increasing violence for retailers, and goes hand in hand with the drug trade. In fact, organized crime is turning its attention to the illicit trade of tobacco because the profit from illegal tobacco is much greater than that of drugs and the penalties are not as severe.

There is no dispute in this country over the root cause of smuggling. It is high tobacco taxes which have become such a large component of the product's cost and price that they may offer a massive potential profit margin to those who are able and willing to acquire and trade in cigarettes on which no tax has been paid.

It is difficult to understand why a government would allow something illegal to occur right under its nose because it is politically correct to do so. In other words, because of pressure from non-smoking groups and my friend here in the NDP both federal and provincial governments are afraid to deal with the tobacco taxation problem. They would rather continue with their high taxation policy, which we all know is only conducive to smuggling.

One would think that the federal government, knowing that it has contributed to a billion dollar organized crime industry, might start taking seriously this whole problem of the sale of illegal tobacco. What I find so frustrating about this whole situation is that the solution is simple. We should roll back the taxes. This answer was not arrived at in recent days or recent weeks. The tobacco industry and many Canadians have been offering this government a clear solution. The rolling back of tobacco taxes is not only a peaceful solution to the problem but one which makes sheer common sense.

The fact of the matter is that the RCMP can no longer deal with the problem because the problem is just too big. The RCMP concedes that enforcement is not effective in curbing smuggling. It says what is even more problematic is that enforcement efforts will just drive the illicit tobacco trade underground and into the hands of organized crime, which I think for all of us is really a frightening thought.

• (1600)

After all, Canada has taken a lot of pride in the fact that it has been regarded as the number one country in the world in which to live. According to the UN, one of the reasons why it achieves such high marks is that it offers relative safety to Canadians. The nurturing of organized crime in Canada will not keep us at number one for very long.

To conclude, I would like to offer some facts about the industry and about tobacco farmers and how tobacco taxation has come to the attention of this House. I believe that they all should be very carefully considered.

The contraband tobacco trade has a street value of over $1 billion. The tobacco black market is costing federal and provincial governments an estimated $1.4 billion a year in lost tax revenue robbing Ontario's 1,200 tobacco growers of nearly $20 million in lost markets. It really jeopardizes 60,000 Canadian jobs.

Smokers pay up to $47.13 for a legal carton of 200 cigarettes of which the manufacturer gets $7.79. Distributors and retailers get $3.38 and the remaining $35.96 goes to federal and provincial coffers.

Illegal cigarettes can be had for as little as $22.50 a carton. A single pack which sells for as much as $6.50 legally can be bought for almost half at $3.50.

High taxes are not turning people off cigarettes. They are simply sending them underground. These high taxes are only costing governments.

The tobacco industry supports directly or indirectly the jobs of some 60,000 Canadians in growing, manufacturing, distribution and in the retail sectors.

The large increases imposed by the federal and provincial governments in the 1980s were primarily responsible for the loss of some $5,000 tobacco-related jobs and the closure of four manufacturing plants.

Most of those jobs were in my area of Haldimand—Norfolk. Over the last 10 years, cigarette taxes have increased some 620 per cent. Let me repeat that. In the last 10 years, cigarette tax increases have come to around 620 per cent.

This figure compares to an alcohol tax increase of just 68 per cent, a personal income tax increase of 66 per cent and a corporate tax increase of very little.

The RCMP believes that higher Canadian taxation has meant bigger and better organized crime groups getting involved. Enforcement is never succeeded. It seems that the tighter the regulations become, the more organized and sophisticated the smugglers become. The RCMP describes the situation as "out of control".

The rural economy of an entire area is at stake and it is not just the farmers. Many small businesses depend on the viability of the tobacco industry especially in my area. It is obvious that tobacco products will continue to be used in Canada.

The government must now face whether it wishes to export Canadian jobs through the tobacco industry and through a misguided taxation policy that disadvantages Canadians and allows American farmers and manufacturers to take over legitimate economic activity.

It is shameful that the government has fostered a tax policy which will devastate our domestic tobacco industry while pushing the economic benefits of producing this legal product across the border.

Of greater consequence, governments continue this taxation policy that has created a sophisticated smuggling network that the RCMP admits it cannot curtail. Surely, we as legislators must re-evaluate our taxation policy on tobacco. It is time we rolled back these taxes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We are in third reading here. I think because of the little recess we had that the House is a little mixed up.

We are in third reading. There are no questions or comments on the first two speakers. Then we go to the third speaker for 20 and 10.

I have to say that there are no questions or comments on the hon. member's speech. The hon. member initially would have had 40 minutes with no questions or comments. Yes, it was 40 minutes with no questions or comments.

• (1605)

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank you for bringing us up to date on that.

I know my friend in the NDP is just itching to ask me a question. Is there a possibility of getting unanimous consent for a five-minute question for my friend?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will ask for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent to ask a question?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): No.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-102. That previous speech by the Liberal member was shocking. I kept asking him whether he was actually speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party and whether this was their total policy.

Mr. Speller: I always speak on behalf of the Liberals.

Mr. Karpoff: That is nice to know. This is the official stand of the Liberal Party. They support the tobacco industry in Canada and oppose health measures that have significantly reduced the use of cigarettes in this country and the incidence of death from tobacco.

An hon. member: It is not like the NDP that goes with marijuana.

Mr. Karpoff: We have to start to talk about what the consequences are in this country of the use of tobacco products.

An hon. member: Why not just talk about the bill?

Mr. Karpoff: What is obviously known is that 55,000 Canadians die every year because of illness related to tobacco use. If the Liberals think that is funny then one should talk to 55,000 families that have lost their husbands, wives, sons and daughters because of tobacco consumption.

This is one of the most serious health problems facing the industrial world and is being pushed and pushed by tobacco companies into the developing world. Sales are being aimed at children in Canada and sales are being aimed at children in the Third World countries.

Over the last number of years, the federal government, in conjunction with the provincial governments, has initiated a national campaign to reduce the consumption of tobacco. It is one of the better things that this government has done. It has done it based on two or three kinds of policies.

First of all it did it by increasing the taxes on cigarettes. Every time there has been a dramatic increase of 25 cents to 50 cents on a package of cigarettes, 100,000 Canadians quit smoking. It was done by an educational program that has educated people about the dangers of smoking. It did it by bringing in programs that insisted that cigarette products contain health warnings.

This bill that was brought in some time ago also contained an ability to put an export tax on tobacco products. What we have learned in this country is that most cigarettes that are exported are illegally smuggled back into the country.

Mr. Boudria: It is 90 per cent.

Mr. Karpoff: It is 90 per cent and even more. Last year the government put an $8 export tax on a carton of cigarettes and took the profit away from smuggling. There was no profit to be made in bringing those cigarettes back into Canada because one had already paid one's taxes on them. One could not bring them back in tax free.

In March 1992 there was an export of 164 million cigarettes. Then the government was lobbied by people like Vista. The Liberals wanted to make sure that one could increase the sale of cigarettes. There was lobbying by the tobacco industry and the manufacturers' association. This included such lobbyists as Bill Neville who is the Prime Minister's former chief of staff. There were threats. The tobacco industry said it would stop buying tobacco in Canada and would close all of the manufacturing plants in Canada. The federal government capitulated and withdrew the tax.

Here is what happened as soon as it withdrew the tax. The export and therefore the illegal smuggling of cigarettes back into Canada jumped dramatically. In March 1992 there were 164 million cigarettes exported. In May 1992 after the government capitulated and withdrew the export tax, that figure jumped to 958 million cigarettes, which is an increase of 650 per cent.

We all know that these are exported and then smuggled back into Canada. All the government did was to make it profitable again to have cigarettes smuggled back into this country.

In March 1992 there were 39 million kilograms of fine cut tobacco exported because there was the export tax making it unprofitable to smuggle these cigarettes back into Canada. In May 1992 after the government had capitulated and given in to the hardball tactics of the tobacco industry, the exports jumped from 39 million to 366 million kilograms of fine cut tobacco. That is an increase of 938 per cent.

The government said: "We will now again make it profitable for the smugglers". It had an impact. The federal government lost $800 million in tax revenue that it could have collected and the provinces probably lost a similar amount.

When the government was playing around with putting in the export tax the industry must have had tremendous anticipation. They somehow knew what was going to happen. When the government announced that it was going to put in an export tax, one company knew in advance somehow to ship out of Canada 50 truckloads of cigarettes before the tax was implemented.

We do need a level playing field. The Liberal solution is obviously to make our taxes lower on cigarettes and comparable with that of the United States.

Mr. Boudria: Who said that?

Mr. Karpoff: That is what your colleague says. That is what he is advocating. Cut the tobacco tax.

Of course we know that if we reduce the price of cigarettes then the consumption of cigarettes will simply go up.

In Canada we have developed probably the most effective program to combat tobacco consumption of any country: education, high taxes and warning labels on cigarettes.

The tobacco industry said it would co-operate with the government if the government dropped the export tax on cigarettes. I want to just point out what has been done for that co-operation. Immediately afterward there was a code to be put on cigarettes so that if they were smuggled back into Canada we could trace where they came from.

However the tobacco companies knew that they did not want to be traced. They might have been exporting cigarettes to a particular wholesaler and then these were being smuggled back into Canada.

• (1615)

All the tobacco companies got together and now export all their cigarettes to one warehouse in Syracuse, New York. If cigarettes are smuggled back into Canada they can only be traced to that warehouse in Syracuse, New York.

Because it is outside Canadian jurisdiction, we have no ability to control it or insist on information. That is the type of co-operation the tobacco industry has given us to reduce the problem of cigarette exports.

For the last two or three years the industry has fought dramatically through the courts to try to stop the proper labelling of cigarettes with health warnings. It has tried to ensure that the labelling required on cigarettes and inserts that warns about the health problems of cigarette consumption is not effective. The industry does not want to have nice, bold colours. They are too contrasting and easily readable. The industry has held it up in the courts for the last couple of years and has lost.

The government is now in the process of bringing forward new regulations which are going to make the labelling more stringent.

I want to talk about an issue that has been raised about farmers. We in this party have repeatedly said that instead of helping farmers grow a product that kills people worldwide, the government has a responsibility to assist tobacco farmers change to other types of crops. That is a solution. We cannot continue to support an industry that kills 55,000 Canadians a year. We cannot abandon the farmer and take away his livelihood. We must develop adjustment programs to help that farmer move to other productive crops.

In Canada, when we look at who is calling on the government to do certain things and whose side they are on, we very quickly realize that the people who are working in the best interest of Canadians are calling for the government to find its courage again and put an export tax on tobacco. These are people in organizations like the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Cancer Society and the Heart and Stroke Foundation. Every medical group across this country says tobacco kills 55,000 Canadians a year. That is half a million Canadians between now and the turn of the century.

People are standing up and advocating that the government should not continue with its program that has been effective. It should roll back taxes so cigarettes become cheaper which would increase consumption. Remember, every time the price of cigarettes is increased from 25 cents to 50 cents a package, 100,000 Canadians stop smoking.

There is another reason why my party and I side with people in organizations like the Canadian Medical Association. It is because the cost to taxpayers in terms of health care is horrendous. It is estimated that 10 per cent of all our acute care hospital beds are taken up with people who have smoking-related illnesses. If we could suddenly save a minimum of 10 per cent of our acute care dollars in this country we would be able to do something far more effective. We would have lots of money available for adjustment programs to help farmers move into other kinds of crops.

I want to finish by talking about the morality of the tobacco industry. Confidential documents were brought forward over the last couple of years which show that the tobacco industry deliberately aims its programs and advertising at minor children. It knows that 80 per cent or more of people who start smoking start before they are 18. If they have reached the age of 18 and are not smokers they are not going to be smokers. In spite of its denial, the tobacco industry has done life-style advertising and promotions aimed at getting younger and younger people to smoke.

In the Third World countries where there is no legislation to control the advertising of tobacco, the industry is even more blatant. It openly aims its products at 12 and 13 year-olds. It hands out free cigarettes to minors in Asian countries, Pacific rim countries and Thailand to promote them because its share of the market in North America has gone down.

Why are the tobacco companies so frightened about what is happening in Canada? They see that other countries are starting to look at our success in reducing the consumption of tobacco. They see it is a three-pronged success based on increasing taxation, continuing a level of export tax to make it unprofitable to smuggle cigarettes back into Canada, education about the dangers of cigarettes and labelling.

I hope this bill will go through without coming back to this House to reimpose the export tax on cigarette products. Is this government on the side of the big tobacco producers or on the side of the 55,000 Canadian families who lose their loved ones each year. Which side will we be on?

The government and the Liberals must have the courage to stand up and be on the side of Canadians. We must say we will reduce tobacco consumption and be on the side of those 55,000 Canadians who will lose their husbands and wives each year. We must reimplement the export tax.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I want to let the hon. member know that the Liberal Party of Canada is firmly behind the Canadian farmer and will continue to support the Canadian farmer.

He suggested in his speech that he knew how to solve the problems of tobacco farmers, which is clearly NDP gibberish. He has probably never been to see a tobacco farm. He is probably not aware that the government came out a year ago with a $32 million program to help the Canadian tobacco farmer. Do you know how much of that money has gone to the tobacco farmer? None. Absolutely zero. The government announced with great fanfare that it was going to help them diversify into other programs and then cancelled the AEI program to help them get into other areas.

Canadian tobacco farmers, knowing the future of the industry, have gone to the government to ask it to be involved in NISA. The hon. member may not know what NISA is, but NISA would give these farmers an opportunity to be like the corn and grain farmers in our agricultural community. It would give them the opportunity to invest in their future and help them get through the highs and lows. But the government has not allowed them into this great program.

• (1625)

The hon. member speaks a lot about the Liberal Party supporting the tobacco farmers that he refers to as murderers. He knows I have not spoken in this House on behalf of the tobacco manufacturers. I have spoken on behalf of the Canadian tobacco farmers and our tobacco communities that depend on these farms.

Is the hon. member aware that every time he gets up and talks like that, sending out this misinformation to Canadians, it hurts Canadian farmers and specifically Canadian tobacco farmers in our communities and our small business people who depend on these farmers?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that question because I think it goes to the heart of the issue. This member is saying that if it is profitable and kills people it is just too bad for those 55,000 people. He is determined to continue this profitable business that kills people.

I am sorry but the member cannot have it both ways. Yes, as tobacco consumption goes down tobacco farmers are going to be hurt. I have no doubt about it. That is why my party and I have called upon the government to put in realistic programs to help tobacco farmers switch to other programs. We should not continue to provide programs to help them through the highs and lows and allow them to continue to produce a crop that we know is dangerous.

If we have to make a choice on this issue—and I guess being in government is all about making choices about whose side we are on—I think it is fairly clear. Research over the last 25 years has clearly and unequivocally shown that the use of tobacco products is dangerous to a person's health and in fact causes death to 55,000 people a year.

Somebody said there are 5,000 tobacco farmers in Canada. Is that 10 deaths per tobacco farmer?

We have to ask ourselves what position we should be supporting. Should we support the continued escalation of the use of tobacco knowing its cost to the health care system and to individuals in terms of their life expectancies and health, or do we take steps to systematically reduce tobacco consumption?

I applaud this government because it has consistently, until it backed off on the export tax, had an integrated policy to allow for a gradual reduction in tobacco through education.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley): Mr. Speaker, we heard a spirited defence just a little while ago of the merits of the tobacco industry and the consumption of tobacco. I wonder if the health critic for the Liberal Party agrees with the position of the spokesman for the Liberal Party on the consumption of tobacco.

• (1630)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question has to be directed to the hon. member for Surrey North.

Mr. Volpe: Is he going to answer the question, as the former health minister?

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, how he describes the tobacco industry is accurate. Experience, and bitter experience, teaches us that. On the one hand, it says it does not want young people to smoke but on the other hand it promotes smoking for young people.

I think we can say that Canada today is a leader in the anti-smoking crusade. We have had difficulty, for example, with tobacco farmers. I disagree with the hon. member that it is easy for tobacco farmers to switch over to other crops that are at least as financially beneficial to them as is tobacco. The land in the Delhi area is possibly not as suited to replacement crops. That is a reality we face.

Having said that though, there is a bottom line. I believe the tobacco industry is an amazing industry. It is the only industry that promotes death, destruction, fire, health loss, illness and a shortened life span and makes it glamorous. It is the only industry that is able to do that. It has a phenomenal marketing ability.

If one listens to my words they sound very harsh but they are absolutely accurate. Take a look. What next step does the member feel that Canada should take to promote public health policy, and particularly the reduction of smoking, especially among young people in Canada?

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I welcome that question. I would also say that the member's words do not sound harsh at all, they sound honest.

We have advocated that the next step is probably to stop the tobacco companies from promoting cultural and particularly sports events and using their names in doing so. Australia has simply stopped them from promoting any kind of events that they use their name in.

The other thing is to continue and maybe even escalate the health education programs that the government has initiated to inform people about the dangers of tobacco, particularly to inform young people and counteract the idea that to smoke is glamorous, macho and makes young women very attractive. We have to be able to counter the kind of glamorous image the tobacco industry likes to portray.

I agree with the hon. member very much that it is the only industry in the world that glamorizes its product knowing that it creates death.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-93

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. An agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) or 78(2) in respect to the report stage and third reading of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days and hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages of the said bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Essex—Kent it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Budget; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration; the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville—Child Pornography; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Violence against women; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Softwood lumber.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak on Bill C-102, which is a very complicated bill for a lot of different Canadians.

• (1635)

I have very mixed feelings about the bill and certainly I can understand what many other Canadians have said. There certainly is a health problem with regard to smoking. Everyone in this House and everyone in this country recognizes that to be a true fact.

We also know that smoking is very tax-high revenue for the government. As mentioned earlier by my colleague, taxes have gone up some 600 per cent in the last 10 years. This shows that maybe the wrong focus has gone toward smoking and I would say alcohol as well. We look at a government that is promoting through taxation smoking and alcohol, in fact deriving the greatest share of the revenues through both, and yet many in this country would say we question the value of cigarettes and alcohol.

My colleagues on the far left of the House, the New Democratic Party, have suggested that there are extreme health problems. From hearing my colleagues from the NDP and as well some of the colleagues from across the way I have to ask why the policy is not to ban smoking in this country. It seems to me that if the health problem they are presenting and they are saying they will end the smoking issue, then it would be a logical step to ban smoking in this country. I certainly do not think that has been done either by the government side or by the NDP, who purport to be the great saviours in terms of health problems.

An hon. member: Because they are hypocrites.

Mr. Pickard: There is a major economical question involved with this bill. Absolutely no one will debate that $34 per carton of cigarettes is a very healthy revenue for the government. It has escalated so much in the last 10 years that it has become a law enforcement problem. That problem then starts to stem out into organized crime which is smuggling cigarettes into this country, causing a second social problem which is the illegal use of cigarettes in the country.

Many people in the RCMP as well as in customs and excise have compared it to our prohibition days with alcohol. Now many organized crime groups are bringing cigarettes in by the truckload and distributing them throughout the country. These illegal cigarettes are raising revenue in this country of as much as $1 billion annually. That is a tremendous problem for our law enforcement agencies. I would say that part of this bill does deal with that problem and corrects some of that. The imposition of fines of up to $200,000, the extra fines that would be imposed on people who bring illegal cigarettes into the country, is good. That portion of the bill is going to stop Canadian-made cigarettes from going over to the United States and then being brought back into Canada.

The real crux of the problem is the fact that we have escalated the cost of a product that many people in this country legally use, are addicted to and have chosen to use. We have escalated the cost of that product so much that people from every walk of life in Canada, from every sector of our society, are purchasing cigarettes illegally and at the most economical prices. It is a tendency that I see happening not only in the tobacco industry but in all facets of Canadian life.

In talking with people over the last few years I have found that they are very upset with tax increases. People are very upset with the high cost of living in this society, whether it is income taxes, taxes that have been imposed through goods and services or taxes that are coming through our excise areas.

We know that the tax record of increase, increase, increase has taken money from the Canadian consumers' pockets and increased their costs as much as 50 per cent, 60 per cent, or 70 per cent in the last eight years.

We know that this is a major problem for Canadians in tough times. Canadians are looking at the amount of money they are putting out in taxes and saying that it is far too much.

I am watching the Tory leadership campaign going on and I certainly understand from it that we have a problem. Everybody is saying: We can stop the extra spending in this country. We can stop the huge tax increases. We can slow down the debt and the deficit.

This is a situation that has developed dramatically over the last eight years. It is a problem that every Canadian speaks about in coffee shops. It is a problem they speak about in homes when they are sitting around the dinner table. It is a problem we as a nation have to face.

Is the government overtaxing to a point that is causing a lot of normal law-abiding citizens to purchase articles that should not be for sale? They should not be taxed as high as they are. I think it is causing another crime situation in this country.

With regard to the health issues, the crime issue, the excessive cost of cigarettes and the tax issue, we have very mixed up, in terms of its concerns, legislation coming forward that does not seem to be consistent.

If I take what my colleague across the way said about the fact that cigarettes must be stopped or what the member from the NDP said, I would assume they are going to step forward to ban cigarettes in this country. Then we will have a real undercurrent of growth because people do choose to smoke in this country.

It is our responsibility to make sure that the interests of all Canadians are treated fairly. I do not believe that high taxation on cigarettes, the way it has been, and the laws that we are coming down with are resolving the core problem. The core problem here is another matter of taxation and enforcement.

I support stopping the illegal entry of cigarettes into the country and punishing those who do it. That is a good measure. However, we have missed the core point in this issue which is overtaxation.

[Translation]

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the various speeches about the tobacco industry and the rest, I must say this is something we could talk about for a long time. People want to put a stop to youth directed advertising by cigarette manufacturers. They want to restrict cigarette smoking generally, but after all, people are free to choose and if they want to smoke, there is not much we can do about it.

There is another aspect we should consider. Recently, the tobacco industry has become a criminal element in our society. How did it get this way? In the past few years there was an incredible increase in excise taxes on tobacco and cigarettes and now taxes are so high that people have started to smuggle. In other words, excessive taxes have created a smuggling industry.

The hon. member from Toronto told me that last year the federal government lost more than $750 million.

• (1645)

Taxes have created a smuggling industry and the only logical way to deal with the problem is to cut taxes, if only for a year or two, in order to stabilize the situation. Then we can see how we can stop the smuggling and prevent this industry to engage in criminal activities.

Representatives from my riding, including Mr. Denis Savard, came here to discuss the problem. Mr. Savard showed a lot of common sense in what he said.

We would have to reduce taxes on cigarettes, if only temporarily, to deter smuggling and prevent the cigarette industry to engage in criminal activities. That is the real problem. We have to deal with this problem first and then we can find ways to stop smuggling altogether.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today on Bill C–102. I want to speak very briefly on the issue of taxes and tobacco smuggling.

I want to put on record first of all that I too am very concerned about the volumes of tobacco being smuggled. About one pack in six that is consumed in Canada is indeed smuggled. It represents about $1.6 billion in federal and provincial tax revenues. Smuggling profits are estimated to be about $800 million. This represents 48 million cartons of cigarettes, eight times that of 1990, an increase of 650 per cent in smuggling in two years.

This is primarily because governments kept insisting they were going to raise the taxes on cigarettes and tobacco at both federal and provincial levels. Of course in doing so, on the pretext that it is a health risk, and we admit that it is, they have created a whole new underground economy in smuggling. That underground economy applies not just to tobacco but also applies to alcoholic beverages.

The tax rate in Canada for example is 67 per cent, compared to the United States which is 30 per cent. In Europe it is 75 per cent. The difference between the price of a carton of Canadian cigarettes in Canada versus the United States is about $35 per carton. It is not much wonder that there has been a vast increase in the volume of smuggling.

These tax increases have indeed created an underground economy, just as the GST is contributing to an underground economy based on cash being paid for services. That in itself is becoming a very serious problem in this country. We warned the government during the GST debate that this would happen, but of course it turned a blind eye.

The legislation as originally drafted would have unfairly penalized Canada's land frontier duty free shop industry in an attempt by the government to correct problems created by the government's regressive tax regime and lax enforcements. The original clause 73 would have regulated the sales of duty free shops. In terms of correspondence, one operator who lives close to my riding said: "Presently all Canadian duty free shop operators are adhering to a one carton, two tin limit on all sales of cigarettes and fine cut tobacco".

The reason for this is that these duty free shop operators recognized the problem and did not want to be part of it. They voluntarily, as an organization of their own people, put on a limit of what they would sell to people moving out of Canada, whether it is tourists from the United States or Canadians going to the United States.

The question then is why proceed with legislation limiting the sales from Canadian duty free shops if it has been demonstrated and recognized by the Department of Finance that the Canadian duty free shops are not part of the smuggling problem. At a time when the Canadian duty free shop industry as a whole is facing significantly increased competition from the United States, the only consequence of such a restrictive action would be to provide United States retailers with an additional competitive advantage and the subsequent loss of millions of dollars in tourist revenues.

The Canadian duty–free shop industry plays a key role in the Canadian economy through its employment of hundreds of Canadian workers and the generation of substantial tax and revenue dollars for the federal and provincial governments. The vast majority of the duty free shop industry is composed of small to medium sized businesses owned by Canadian citizens.

• (1650)

I had the privilege of being on the steering committee as a co–chair of that original committee that set up the Canadian duty free shop criteria. I am very proud of what these people have done. I am proud of the leadership they have shown in this regard and certainly I am very pleased that they voluntarily took the lead to try to control this terrible problem.

There has been an amendment passed in committee that recognizes their concerns and clause 73 no longer includes these duty free shops. Of course that means recognition of the fact that they are not part of the smuggling problem.

Over the last 10 years federal tobacco taxes have increased by 18.7 per cent per year on average and provincially 18.1 per cent. In 1980–81 the federal government collected $811 million in tobacco taxes. In 1990–91 the federal government collected $2.25 billion in taxes from tobacco. It has increased the taxes by 47 per cent since 1988 alone. Total tobacco sales by producers in 1991 totalled $310 million of which the federal government collected $2.25 billion in taxes. The entire Department of Agriculture budget could be paid for on the tax collected on tobacco alone in this country.

A producer producing 90,000 pounds of tobacco will earn about $180,000. The federal government will collect $10 million in taxes on that particular producer's crop alone. It will yield well over $5 billion in taxes at the two levels of government in 1991–92 not including the GST.

Gradually the police and law enforcement people are in fact getting control of the situation. They are doing it slowly but surely. The LCBO, the Liquor Control Board of Ontario, estimates that one of every ten bottles of liquor consumed in Ontario is being either smuggled or bootlegged. The cigarette industry indicates that one in nine cigarettes obtained in Canada has been obtained illegally.

The Canadian Tobacco Manufacturers Council collected discarded cigarette packages after events last month and discovered that about 37 per cent of them had been smuggled. The LCBO estimated that Ontario residents spent more than $700 million for illegal liquor last year or about 13.5 per cent of the province's total liquor sales.

Meanwhile the revenues or the sale volume of LCBO has dropped by $60 million. This shows you the magnitude of the problem that has been brought about by the increased federal and provincial taxes. The RCMP said tobacco seizures have almost doubled in the last year. The force made about 3,000 seizures last year, which is up from 1,570 in 1991.

In a London Free Press article of March 20, 1993 the Quebec minister of revenue hinted that Ottawa and the provinces are considering lowering taxes on tobacco in a bid to curb the growing contraband cigarette trade. The Quebec revenue minister gave the figure that one in every three cigarettes sold in Quebec, Ontario and the west is contraband.

However although the Quebec minister may have seen the light, the federal government in Ottawa certainly has not. The article goes on to quote a senior official from the Department of Finance: "We are not at this point considering cutting taxes, certainly not actively".

The Tillsonburg Independent is a weekly newspaper in Tillsonburg, Ontario, which is the heart of tobacco country. The editorial of March 23, 1993 quotes the mayor of Tillsonburg's testimony before an Ontario legislative committee. He states that high taxation merely increases the already burgeoning share of the market that is in the hands of the smuggling industry.

We recognize the seriousness of the smuggling industry and we certainly hope that this will help relieve that problem. In terms of the health issue as spoken to by others earlier here today, I want to just point out the double standard we have here about the serious health issue as it concerns cigarettes.

I submit and I have submitted before in this House that the use of MMT in gasolines is an equal health risk. I call on the government to ban the use of this substance because there are alternatives available to MMT that are environmentally friendly and are not health risks. Surely if the government is serious about the use of tobacco and the risk to health, it has to be equally as serious about the use of MMT in gasoline where the victims are the young children of this nation.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few minutes to comment on this afternoon's debate. First of all the bill before us today is many-sided. On the one hand, it will benefit the ethanol industry to some extent, and I am sure that I speak for all parliamentarians in this House when I say that it is about time we came up with such an initiative.

My colleague from Stormont—Dundas and myself have met with our local seaway group. They want to go about setting up an ethanol plant in our area. By our region I do not mean my riding or his because they are still unclear as to the specific location. One way or another the entire community will benefit.

The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex has been an advocate for the ethanol industry for a good long time in this House and I want to congratulate him as well.

I would now like to take a moment to address the cigarette smuggling issue.

[English]

Prior to the passage of the bill, prior to this bill being introduced, the fine for illegally importing cigarettes was nothing more than a joke. I complained in this House some two years ago about the effect of the absence of meaningful laws to curb smuggling.

As an example, under the present act a first offence right now for illegally importing cigarettes is a $50 fine. That must be very discouraging. That is about the profit on two cartons of cigarettes. For each subsequent offence the fine is $200.

Now we have fines not exceeding $10,000 and 12 months in jail. That is starting to make a bit of sense toward curbing the illegal importation of cigarettes in Canada. There has to be more done.

First I want to join with others who have said that there must be meaningful assistance for tobacco farmers in Canada to aid them in their transition to other crops and in recognizing all the difficulties that entails.

Second, I want to talk about the necessary increase in border patrols. The community of Akwesasne is partly in my riding and has something like 18 or 19 RCMP officers assigned in that area. If you count three shifts a day, seven days a week, one needs five people in order to have one on duty at any one time. That means there are all of three people at the best of times when there are no holidays on duty to patrol that area where the smuggling is going on.

It would be a mistake to pretend that is a native-only problem. That is wrong. Gangs from Montreal and Toronto have virtually taken control of the smuggling in our area.

Finally, the union representing the customs and excise employees issued a statement last week condemning the government for cutbacks in customs employees when we should be increasing them in an effort to curb that contraband. That is what we need to do.

In terms of whether or not an export tax works, I am not sure. The bill contains that provision. I am not personally against it.

However, there is a problem and it might as well be stated. At the present time there is nothing that prevents Canadian tobacco manufacturers from establishing a plant using the same product name and the same everything else in a package that looks virtually identical right across the border. It can then export those cigarettes to Canada in packages that look virtually the same as the ones that are shipped to the United States and that are smuggled back in at the present time.

Those are kinks and problems that the government will really have to work hard on. With that we have pretty well reached the hour of five o'clock. I will end my remarks for today and I will continue at the next sitting of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It was my understanding that there was some sort of an agreement. If there is no agreement that is fine.

It being five o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I have another item to put before the House before I recognize the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

I have received a written notice from the hon. member for Hamilton East that she is unable to move her motion during Private Members' Hour on Wednesday, April 21, 1993.

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of position in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(a). Accordingly I am directing the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), Private Members' Hour will thus be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it prior to the Private Members' Hour.

SECURITIES

CREATION OF NATIONAL REGULATOR

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a National Securities Regulator should be created to address the issue of overlapping federal and provincial securities regulation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my motion today calls on the government to consider the creation of the establishment of a national securities regulator.

The purpose and the reason given in my motion for establishing this is to address the issue of overlapping federal and provincial jurisdictions. Thirty years ago the royal commission on banking and finance recommended that the federal government take the lead in encouraging the development of "high and uniform standards of security legislation and regulation in Canada" by establishing a federal regulatory agency. That was 30 years ago.

Mr. Stupich: Were you here 30 years ago?

Mr. Rodriguez: I was not here 30 years ago. I could not be here and be as young looking as I am today. The arguments and the conclusion of that royal commission are as relevant today, probably even more so today than they were 30 years ago.

What has happened over the ensuing 30 years of course is the revolution in communication technology. There is the deregulation of financial institutions that has taken place. There is the internationalization of credit. There are all sorts of challenges and yet Canada among all the of the industrialized nations of the world is the only industrialized nation without a national securities regulator. The royal commission of the day had reasons to recommend that there be a national securities regulator. I also had reason to mention it in my motion. One reason was to eliminate much of the duplication and the lack of uniformity in regulations.

We have to understand the structure. The provinces are responsible for regulating security systems, so we have 10 provinces with 10 sets of regulations. Where the institution comes under federal jurisdiction there is a set of federal rules as well. There is a jungle of jurisdiction out there, often overlapping and often with no uniformity. It seems to me that having a national securities regulator would lead the provinces to establish a very high set of federal standards. That should be uppermost in the minds of legislators.

If there were a national securities regulator it would increase the standard of regulation across the country in light of the ability of Canada to interface with other jurisdictions that have national standards of security regulations such as the United States, for example. The United States has the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The U.S. commission has no counterpart in Canada with which it can interface. It has to interface with provincial regulators, and of course in each jurisdiction there is a different set of rules.

It is important to begin establishing a set of rules that we can project internationally. It would be setting the rules as large borrowers attempt to avoid the intermediation of banks and go to the international market for their funds. They often do that by selling securities directly. There must be a way to establish some sense of uniformity and some sense of standards.

I can give an example of a case where there was an overlapping of jurisdiction among the provinces. In this case it was between two provinces, the province of British Columbia and the province of Ontario. My colleague is from British Columbia. He will remember the Bennett–Doman case. It was a perfect example in which the former premier of British Columbia, Bill Bennett, and his brother Russell had been charged with insider trading in the stock of Doman Industries Limited. The defendants resided in B.C. but Doman's shares were traded exclusively on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The alleged illegal trading was effected through the Toronto Stock Exchange computer assisted trading system, a national communications system.

The B.C. government and the Ontario Securities Commission both laid charges against the Bennetts in early 1989. They were acquitted in the B.C. provincial court in May 1989. The Ontario Securities Commission dropped the charges in Ontario. The argument was that the legal principle of double jeopardy prohibited another trial on the same offence and set of facts.

The commission decided to proceed with a regulatory hearing into the case, but that case had to be abandoned the following year when the Supreme Court of Ontario ruled that the OSC could not compel the Bennetts to provide testimony. Justice Steele stated in his judgment that the court had no power "to assist the tribunal outside Ontario". It is a perfect example of where the national securities regulator could have brought the Bennetts to heel, if we had had a national securities commission with standardized rules. I thought I would use that one example to clearly illustrate the lack of uniformity and of a sense of continuity across the country with respect to a national securities regulator.

• (1710)

We are almost there. We have global markets for securities, bonds and equities 24 hours a day. Interprovincial and international trade in securities are growing in importance. The key reasons are the growing importance of the securities markets and the allocation of credit. I mentioned that borrowers, large corporations, can now avoid the intermediation of banks and go directly to the markets by floating securities.

According to the Toronto Stock Exchange chairman Michael Edwards, cross-border equity trading surged from $73 billion U.S. in 1979 to $1.44 trillion U.S. in 1990. In these circumstances it is fairly obvious a system organized around provincial boundaries, a regulatory system based on provincial boundaries, is fairly well anachronistic and inadequate.

Mr. Blenkarn: Right on.

Mr. Rodriguez: I am starting to wonder about my position now. The hon. member for Mississauga South says: "Right on". That scares me because he is a friend of the trusts.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is right, and you are a friend of the big banks.

Mr. Rodriguez: He is the original trust buster.

There is increased pressure to improve and harmonize disclosure requirements to get rid of inconsistencies. Regulators need it to do a better job and investors want it because it facilitates their understanding and decision making. It would also result in a cut in the cost and paperwork involved in registering the same security in several provinces.

A second reason is that only a federal securities regulator would prevent competitive deregulation wars between provincial regulators. Competitive deregulation would harmonize trade in securities to the lowest common regulatory factor and ethical standard. Even if provinces succeed in fully harmonizing the rules to the highest common factor, they would still be subject to different interpretations by different provincial regulators. This is why a federal regulator is needed to set national standards and to enforce these standards.

I am glad that my friend from Mississauga South is here. Not so long ago he was in full support of deregulating the financial institutions. We have pillars. Our system was built on pillars and we regulated the financial institutions by pillars; not pillars of salt, pillars. We had banks as one pillar. We had trust companies as another pillar. We had insurance companies as a third pillar. We had security brokerage houses as a fourth pillar.

In 1986 we knocked the brokerage houses down. That pillar went down. It probably saved a lot of them from bankruptcy. Immediately that pillar went down—

Mr. Blenkarn: They are still there.

Mr. Rodriguez: They were having some problems. Some of them were having problems. The member would admit that. Would my friend admit that?

Mr. Blenkarn: They are still there.

Mr. Rodriguez: The banks quickly moved in and bought the pillars, took the pillars over. Now each bank has a security brokerage pillar inside the stable. Of course we cannot have them communicating freely and openly so we put up Chinese walls. They call them Chinese walls. I call them picket fences because I think we can still move back and forward over them.

• (1715)

To some extent we have been cheating, have we not? We have been using a federal regulator, OSFI, through the back door. It is responsible for regulating banks and financial institutions and through the back door has been doing some regulation of brokerages.

Last year we completely knocked down the other pillars, all of them. They are all gone now. They are eating each other up as we predicted. Have you not seen it lately, Mr. Speaker? The banks are eating up the trust companies. The trust companies are going to be eaten up by insurance companies. Then the banks will eat up insurance companies because now banks can own insurance companies.

If we extrapolate that, the banks can now own their own securities firms. Banks now have accounts combining bank stock and trading services. Bank trusts and insurance companies can offer investment counselling and portfolio management services without having to set up a subsidiary reporting to a provincial securities commission as was previously the case.

They are pushing this very lucrative, fee generating business. Since the regulation of banking, federally chartered insurance and trust companies falls on the federal jurisdiction, the federal regulator must be allowed to monitor the spectrum of activities. A strong federal presence is inevitable. It has to come.

I mentioned insider trader and I mentioned the Bennett–Doman case. It was a classic example of the inability to deal with an alleged problem because it spanned two jurisdictions, B.C. and Ontario. I would argue that my proposal would deal with problems like that one.

I would suggest that another reason for a national securities regulator is the fact that the federal government is already involved to some degree in securities regulation. Insider trading, takeover bid and other provisions of the Federal Business Corporations Act overlap provincial securities law. The Criminal Code includes provisions on stock manipulation and other forms of securities fraud. There is already some federal responsibility.

Another reason is more an argument to allay fears. It seems to me there are no significant constitutional impediments to an expansion of the federal government's role in security industry regulation. The federal trade and commerce power should impose sufficient authority to regulate securities trading.

I am not the only one who has argued for a national securities regulator. In the previous throne speech the Prime Minister put the following question: "Do we really need three separate securities regulators when all over the world countries are moving to a much more centralized regulatory regime?" It had even been included in the Charlottetown accord.

In terms of where we are headed that is what we have to do. I propose we should create a federal Canadian national securities exchange commission, CNSEC, along the lines of the Securities and Exchange Commission in the United States. CNSEC would be run by an independent board of directors. I personally am not in favour of developing a parallel federal system of securities regulation. This would only it would seem to me add to the confusion to have a parallel federal system and a provincial one.

The mandate of this commission would be: one, to create an integrated national system of securities regulation, that is create one securities regulatory regime by integrating the provincial securities commission into CNSEC; two, I believe we should set accounting norms and technical and ethical standards for trading in securities which would be one of the functions of CNSEC; three, to supervise the sound and efficient functioning trade in securities, bonds and equities; four, to supervise the international flow of capital and investment into and out of Canada; five, investigate abuse and apply sanctions; six, to represent the national financial interests vis–à–vis the international forces currently working to create one global financial market.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member's time has expired. I have given him an extra two minutes.

Mr. Rodriguez: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In conclusion, the hon. member.

Mr. Rodriguez: In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the House to support this motion. Hopefully the government will have the courage before this Parliament dies to introduce legislation that would establish a national securities commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to participate in this debate.

The motion before us today calls for the creation of a national securities regulator to address the issue of overlapping federal and provincial securities regulation.

I do not see the use for such an organization. The present system is working relatively well and is flexible enough. Why change so radically a system that is working?

[English]

Let me provide you, Mr. Speaker, with some background on this issue. Securities markets have traditionally been regulated by the provinces. Under the financial institution reform enacted last year most securities activities remain outside the business powers of federally-regulated financial institutions.

Even though there is a different regulatory regime in each province, the Canadian capital market works well. The provincial securities commissions co-ordinate their regulatory activities through the Canadian Securities Administrators.

[Translation]

I would like to point out that there is very little overlapping of federal and provincial securities regulations. When overlapping has occurred, discussions were held between the two levels of government to settle the matter.

The Hockin-Kwinter agreement for instance which was signed by the federal and Ontario governments in 1987 specified the division of powers and regulatory responsibility between the two levels of government with respect to securities.

The financial institutions legislation passed last year identified those securities transactions that federally chartered financial institutions could make. I understand that discussions on this issue are presently under way between the two levels of government.

The House will recall that the same legislation also reformed the statutory and regulatory framework for federally chartered financial institutions in Canada.

Barriers between the pillars of the financial sector, namely the banks, insurance companies and trust and loan companies, have been eliminated, allowing more direct competition between financial institutions.

The reform of financial institutions has benefited consumers through increased competition and a widening of the range of services provided by these institutions. The reform also increased the protection for depositors and insured persons and it strengthened the ability of Canadian financial institutions to compete here and abroad by providing them with new opportunities for growth. Banks, trust and loan companies, as well as insurance companies can now go outside their traditional sector and diversify their activity by owning institutions in other fields of the financial services industry. For example, banks and insurance companies can own trust and loan companies; moreover, trust and loan companies as well as banks can own insurance companies. Thanks to this opportunity for diversification, financial institutions can now offer consumers a wider selection of goods and services.

• (1725)

The reform also gave greater powers to financial institutions. For example, trust and loan companies can enjoy the same internal powers as banks, including full authority to give credit to businesses and consumers. Also, insurance companies can now make loans to consumers and businesses.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to go back to the motion which is the subject of this debate. The federal government repeatedly said that it was committed to reducing duplication and overlapping.

Given the significant progress made regarding securities, and given the ability of the provinces to regulate this sector properly, I do not see the necessity of creating a national body to regulate the securities industry.

However I would like to take a moment to discuss more in detail the jurisdiction conflicts between the two levels of government, as well as some of the changes which have occurred in the eighties regarding the regulation of securities in Canada.

Given the importance of this industry for our economy, both the federal and the provincial governments are interested in establishing efficient securities markets.

I already said that in Canada these markets were traditionally regulated by the provinces. Provincial authorities are responsible for a good part of the day-to-day regulation of the securities markets.

As for the federal government, it looks at the internal operations on securities of federally chartered banks as well as trust and insurance companies. It also looks at the presence of foreign institutions on Canadian markets.

[English]

Further, the federal government is involved in the securities market through the takeover bid, insider trading disclosure and related provisions of the Canada Business Corporation Act. This act is administered by consumer and corporate affairs. The federal government also has an interest in preserving the over-all efficient functioning of Canadian capital markets.

[Translation]

Both the federal government and the various provincial governments are involved in regulating certain aspects of the securities markets. However, responsibility is the operative word and responsibility lies mainly with the provinces.

Both levels of government agree that the basic division of supervisory responsibilities should not be modified. However, they acknowledge that problems have surfaced from time to time and that maintaining a system that works well requires considerable co-ordination and co-operation.

The federal government believes that by setting up a discussion process in which both levels of government would participate on an equal footing would be the best way to deal with the problems of overlapping and duplication. The changes we saw in the eighties with respect to the regulation of securities in Canada have shown the benefits of this approach.

The changes that took place on securities markets a few years ago have had two major effects on the sector. They promoted competition and encouraged international integration.

• (1730)

I would like to give a few examples of these changes and the effect they have had. When fixed commission rates on our main securities markets were either dropped or substantially reduced the industry started offering more competitive prices. The securities market expanded and became more sophisticated.

It seems I have only two minutes left. I will conclude my speech. There is a lot more I could say about the subject.

I have tried to provide a summary of what we have done to deal effectively with the pressures of competition by decompartmentalizing the securities industry, thanks to policy changes co-ordinated at the federal and provincial levels. That is something we must not forget.

We must remember that the changes in the securities industry were brought about thanks to the co-operation of both levels of government. Further changes would have to be made the same way.

The existing system in this country has worked well. If changes are necessary there are many ways to make these changes without modifying the existing federal and provincial framework. Unilaterally creating a national securities regulator would not fit in with this approach.

I therefore advise hon. members against supporting this motion.

[English]

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker,I would first like to compliment the hon. member for Nickel Belt with respect to the motion before us because it does illustrate some of the problems that we have been seeing in the subcommittee on financial institutions. I must say that I am disappointed to see that the representative from the government side is indicating a reluctance.

We saw in the number of things we looked at as we went through the financial institutions legislation a lot of overlap. We saw a lot of duplication. I will give an example of one situation. The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation provides deposit insurance but because of provincial regulations on certain institutions it had to go to the provincial government first to request permission to go into that province to do something and to check out that particular institution. It seems to me that when you have a federal organization like the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation that you should have the right to go in and investigate to make sure that taxpayers' dollars as well as depositors' dollars are not in jeopardy.

We see this type of breakdown between provinces and the federal government in a number of areas dealing with the regulation of financial institutions.

We also see a situation in which the new legislation which has been introduced has created a new atmosphere, an atmosphere in which there is a blurring of the pillars within our financial institutions, and a competitiveness which we encourage. At the same time, as I am sure you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, with competitiveness also comes a need to protect. Consumers have to be protected, the systems have to be protected. We have to try to find that right balance. I believe that as we look at financial institutions and what is going on in that whole process, we must have what I would call national standards. This motion, which probably does not go far enough when you look at the over-all area of financial institutions, at least is a move in the right direction by having a regulator to deal with national securities types of situations.

We are in a global economy. We all recognize that. We also see what is happening in the European common market. We see where those financial institutions are going to be working in any of the different countries of the common market and they are going to have the same types of regulations and problems that we face in this country, but they are doing something about it by having national standards and, as far as the European common market is concerned, national regulations.

We are saying on this side that there is a need. We have OSFI which deals with some aspects of financial institutions but again, we in Parliament are concerned.

I know the chairman of the subcommittee is concerned because we are having difficulty getting information concerning the collapse of two trust companies. The Superintendent of Financial Institutions is taking the position that information should not be brought forward to our committee. There are things that need to be looked at and aired. There has to be at least a minimum standard in this country as far as securities are concerned but also with respect to all financial institutions.

We recognize of course that NAFTA is another aspect that is going to have implications on our financial institutions and where we go in that area. Again that is going to require us as a country to have strong national regulations. If we are going to be competitive in the international markets, which I believe we are, then at the same time we must have those protections so our financial institutions are sound. People who invest in our financial institutions and carry on business with them must have the security of knowing that those institutions are regulated and there are at least some minimum standards.

For that reason, as I have indicated, we feel there is an opportunity to go further with this particular motion and encompass some other aspects. I am hoping that our subcommittee of financial institutions will take on a supervisory role in the sense of looking at what has happened to a number of our financial institutions and determining for sure that the proper protections are in place.

We face a very critical test at this particular time with respect to finding out what went wrong with Central Trust and Standard Trust. There is a reluctance on the part of the superintendent to give us that information. It is my view that Parliament has a role to play here to make sure that those financial institutions are sound and Canadian taxpayers' dollars are in financially sound institutions.

If we carry this motion one step further and provide a regulatory oversight dealing with national securities matters, I think a regulatory oversight with Parliament involved in the process is also a proper direction for us to be taking. In that sense our committee must exert its influence in making sure the demands for information from OSFI are brought forward.

I think the motion put forward goes in that direction to some degree, but as indicated earlier I do not believe it goes far enough.

I would also say that listening to the government's position, it looked at all sorts of different pieces of legislation and all sorts of different bodies that are regulating one aspect or another of financial institutions. If we are going to harmonize the things that are going on in this country in the area of financial institutions, we have to consolidate them under one or two regulatory agencies rather than have this proliferation of different agencies looking at different aspects of our financial institutions.

I think that is the thrust, in part, of this particular motion. In that regard we are supportive of the direction and concept, but recognize that in typical fashion the NDP members have not gone far enough. They are hesitant and timid in their approach. As the chairman of the subcommittee has said, they are the lackeys of big banks and big banking institutions and therefore are reluctant to really jump into this and do the job properly.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I want to say I am very pleased to join the debate today and I am delighted that my friend from Nickel Belt has brought this motion forward. I think the motion cuts to the heart of one of the major problems we have in this country. When we started as a country at Confederation we had different banks in different parts of the country issuing the currency. We did not have a national currency and we did not have national markets.

As a consequence, issues like security, trading and so on became under the purview of the provinces. For a long time the whole concept of judging the validity of securities, what is in a security, how it is regulated and who can sell securities has been a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

I suppose that was fine as long as a security dealer only raised money from the local community to start a business in the local community where the security dealer was. It was perfectly fine. So we developed stock markets in Toronto and Montreal and security dealers operated in those markets. By and large those markets dealt with companies that dealt only in Canada. They floated issues for Canadians wanting to raise money to build enterprises in Canada.

After a while new markets were developed in western Canada and we developed stock markets in Vancouver and Calgary. Alberta and British Columbia also developed detailed security regulations.

The other provinces of course developed security regulation systems to deal with the registration of non-transferrable securities and debentures.

The trouble is that we are growing and the world is growing and our dollar is traded today in every market in the world, 24 hours a day.

It used to be that the Minister of Finance would not read a budget until eight o'clock at night after all the markets had closed. Today it does not matter when he reads the budget because there are markets trading our securities everywhere in the world. In a sense we ought to have some sort of world regulator of these institutions, but that is not possible so at least we should have something done nationally.

It is a matter of constitutional negotiation. It was at the Charlottetown accord group and was not dealt with there. It should have been dealt with there.

Dealing with trust companies, for example, we have a situation where provinces regulate these companies and so we had the obscene situation in the province of Alberta where the province licensed Principal Trust. Principal Trust could not get a licence to operate in Ontario because the Ontario regulators smelled a rat. It could not get a licence to operate in Quebec because the Quebec regulators smelled a rat, so it operated in British Columbia, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland where it got registered. People lost their shirts in those provinces because there was no over-all regulation. They thought they were depositing with Principal Trust which was covered by CDIC when they were in fact buying a Principal land deal or a Principal mutual fund or a Principal somewhere else and getting no principal back. That is the problem with securities.

We saw the Bennett-Doman case brought forward by my friend where fast and loose action was pretty much condescended to in Vancouver but objected to in Toronto, so no satisfactory result came in that matter.

We cannot run a country with markets that are designed to raise money for national and international projects and a market system that is supposed to handle the trades of securities issued in other jurisdictions if we do not run those markets on a national and consolidated basis.

• (1745)

There is no great advantage to a province in regulating securities. It always shocks me that provincial treasurers see the regulation of securities as something they ought to keep together and close at hand. They think that perhaps if they keep the security business in their province they will somehow attract money into the province.

We have seen the kind of money they attract. They attract the bad deals because the bad deals which cannot be registered elsewhere go to where the regulation is the softest and where the regulation is the softest we wind up with the frauds and with the wash trading. We wind up with the fast dealers and with Canada receiving a bad reputation as a place where people can invest their funds.

We need a lot of funds in this country. We have a big country to build. We have needs for massive amounts of investment and we cannot raise all of that investment here. We have to raise it around the world. We cannot raise investment around the world when we continue to threaten investors with sloppy and incompetent regulation that has existed in at least two of the markets in this country.

Mr. Rodriguez: A myriad of regulators.

Mr. Blenkarn: My hon. friend from Nickel Belt says a myriad of regulators.

It is about time that we rationalize this business. It is about time that the governments of this country recognized the fact that there is no merit in soft and sloppy regulation. Soft and sloppy regulation hurts everyone in Canada and does not give the province that facilitates soft and sloppy regulation any advantage at all.

You do not make any marks by having your citizens get burned. You do not get any marks by having other people's citizens get burned because they remember and they will not be back.

I say that this resolution has a great deal of merit to it. Does it go far enough? Does it do the right thing? I certainly say that it does not because it really is not a question of duplication. It is a question that security regulation is virtually, totally and completely a provincial matter. We really have no federal security regulator at all. While the federal government may regulate the banks that have security licences, indirectly in that sense it controls the solvency of the banks. It does not control how the security operations are conducted, how registration is conducted or what prospectuses say and so on.

All of these very important matters are not regulated nationally. What we have is a situation where we have only provincial regulations. Really if this resolution had been corrected, it would have said that we instruct the federal government to immediately start negotiations with the provinces to reorganize this Confederation and take over certain things that really ought to be national.

We do a lot of things here nationally that ought to be provincial. There is no reason whatsoever why we have a federal Department of Forestry. There is no reason whatsoever why we have a federal housing minister. Absolutely not.

Housing for example, foolish. We cannot subdivide land here. We cannot organize building permits here. We cannot direct housing regulation here. We cannot do anything in the housing market. We ought to leave the housing market to the provinces. They can do it. We are not needed here. But we are needed where the real problems are in this country and those real problems are in the money markets of this world where we have a Canadian dollar, Canadian securities, Canadian opportunities and we ought to make sure that those opportunities are governed, directed, controlled and developed in a national system.

• (1750)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes to speak on this motion.

I commend the motion to the House and I congratulate the member who put it forward.

The member for Mississauga South says perhaps the resolution should have read that the federal government be empowered or something like that or directed to consult with the provinces and so on in regard to creating the office of the national securities regulator. I suppose there are many ways in which one can make any motion better than it was originally drafted. That is not the point.

The motion when passed will I assume become the subject matter of deliberations in a committee. The committee is not restricted to doing precisely and only the things that are written in the motion. The committee looking into the issue subsequently could broaden that mandate and obviously do that which the member for Mississauga South asks.

In addition it is implicit in the motion in any case that if there is overlapping at the present time, and if we were to eliminate overlapping particularly in an area that involves provincial jurisdictions, we would have to consult the jurisdiction which is presently charged with that in order to eliminate the overlapping. The argument of the member for Mississauga South is not quite accurate, I say respectfully. I know the member for Mississauga South who is listening very closely to this debate now that he has finished his remarks will take note of that.

The member for Mississauga South said a number of things that I agree with nevertheless. When talking about such things as trust companies and the way they are registered at the present time and the fact that different provinces have different rules involving trust companies, most Canadians investing right now in trust companies do not know whether the trust company they are investing in is federally or provincially chartered and regulated. It is not obvious at all at the present time which ones get their directions from which agency of government. That is just one example.

Notwithstanding this there is still a need to ensure or to at least attempt to provide if not guidance, if that word is too strong, then at the very least co-ordination so that there would be at the federal level at least a repository of the different rules that apply in each province so that provinces can attempt to have rules that are similar.

I will use another example to make a parallel. Inside the Department of the Secretary of State there is an agency—I forget the name of it for the moment—which is charged with co-ordinating educational programs. We all know of course that education is strictly the prerogative of the provincial level of government. Nevertheless, the Secretary of State I believe has an official there or at least a group within that department and the purpose of this group is to co-ordinate as best it can. I know the members are going to say it is not nearly co-ordinated enough because there are still vast differences between the educational standards in various jurisdictions in Canada. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, you will understand what I am indicating to you here, namely that such agencies exist at the present time to co-ordinate provincial power in Canada or co-ordinate areas which fall under provincial jurisdiction.

Just as what we said is true in the area of education, and the member for Mississauga South indicated it is equally true in the area of regulating the trust industry, it is also true in the securities industry generally.

• (1755)

Without putting too fine a point on it, stock exchanges in this country are not exactly the same in terms of how they deal with certain speculative ventures and the like. A particular province seems to have made quite an industry. It is into more speculative stock than other jurisdictions, which is fine I suppose. However, if we were at least sure that the way in which we measure these things is uniform across the country then investors would be better assured that when they take a risk on more speculative stock they would be doing so with the full knowledge that the rule by which the level of risk is measured is uniform everywhere.

I see nothing wrong with having this motion adopted by this House, sent to a parliamentary committee and there amended and corrected. At the very least we should provide for some co-ordination between the various provincial jurisdictions in Canada.

There is a wider debate in all of this. The member for Mississauga South raised the issue of whether or not some provincial powers should now be federal and federal powers should now be provincial and so on. After the debacle of the Charlottetown agreement last fall I am not sure that Canadians are willing to get into a very heavy debate of this kind at this time. In the future these things will inevitably come up again. If we wait for the next round of constitutional negotiations before we address any of these issues we will probably wait a very long time.

Meanwhile, I do not see why we should not proceed with this motion, why it should not be passed by the House and referred to a Parliamentary committee which could, at the very least, enable us to try and implement some of the principles or some of the proposals made today by the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. André Harvey (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the New Democratic Party would make such a proposal because I must say, with all due respect for my friend from the NDP and those who support him, they always seem to go against the flow and in this case against the new pattern responsible governments are trying to develop.

In 1984, we realized that we could not go on setting up new agencies for the benefit of the regime's friends. What we implemented was a new system based on what we called privatization.

Since 1984 privatization has meant the disappearance of scores of Crown agencies or corporations, with some 90,000 employees assigned unproductive tasks. The result was that instead of increasing by 14.8 per cent a year, as was the case before, spending increased only by 3 per cent to 4 per cent a year. This is very significant, because if spending had continued to increase at a rate of 15 per cent a year, we would have a debt of $850 billion instead of $450 billion, and the deficit would reach $82 billion this year instead of $34 billion. Technically we would be bankrupt. Clearly, the example not to follow is Ontario, where the deficit has tripled.

With these proposals, we would be interfering in provincial jurisdictions. There is close co-operation between the various levels of government in the area of securities—as in many other areas—and doing away with all trade barriers between provinces is an excessively important goal of our government. We will try to finalize within a year a free trade agreement encompassing virtually all areas of the Canadian economy to have the same openness between provinces we now enjoy with the United States and will shortly enjoy with Mexico.

In conclusion, this proposal seems to me totally unacceptable as it goes against streamlining and spending control.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on March 11 I asked the Prime Minister of Canada to tell us why his government was refraining from tabling a budget and showing Canadians the real financial situation of our country.

The Conservatives often say they want to present to Canadians, on a regular basis, a budget depicting the real economic state of our country. For partisan reasons only, the Minister of Finance has decided to break that promise this year so that candidates for the leadership of the Conservative Party are not embarrassed by a somewhat tighter budget.

To hear candidates for the leadership of the Conservative Party talk non-stop about how they will reduce the annual deficit of the Conservative government, freeze taxes, cut government expenditures, et cetera, is absolutely absurd. One has to wonder why these people, who in some cases have two, three or four years of experience as members of the cabinet, did not share their ideas with their government before. Why did they keep their views to themselves and wait for a leadership campaign to disclose them? We wonder about that.

Mr. Boudria: They did not think about it.

Mr. Gauthier: They did not think about it, as the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said.

Did all those bright ideas come to them as soon as the Prime Minister announced he was quitting? We have to wonder. Could it be that the candidates are coming up with all those ideas only to impress Canadians in pre-election time? You only have to recall all the broken promises made by the Conservative government during the last two election campaigns to realize how weak its commitments are.

Our country is in deep financial trouble and this is not a game of Monopoly. It is the duty of the Conservative government to advise Parliament of its plans, objectives, policies and the economic future of our country.

During the last nine years the Conservative government has doubled Canada's public debt to the appalling level of $450 billion. At a time when some provinces are working wonders to minimize the negative impact of the cuts in federal transfer payments, Conservative leadership candidates are standing by a project as indefensible and as extravagant as the purchase of helicopters at a cost of $5.8 billion.

It is important to know if the government will keep going on and develop other projects as crazy as this one which drain such important programs as social, education and health programs, or if it will finally invest its energy in stimulating the economy and give back some hope to the 1,537,000 unemployed and 2.3 million people on welfare.

The government had indicated that a budget would be tabled in the week following the Easter recess. This is now and we have no budget. We do not even have a date when it will be presented. Until now no date has been set and it does seem to have as a priority to set one. Although we cannot expect much from a government such as the one we now have and that is driving the country into bankruptcy, we will at the very least have the chance to know the truth about the financial situation if the government summons the courage to table a budget for Canadians, a budget that could boost our economy.

I repeat the question I asked the Prime Minister a few weeks ago: What is the exact date of the budget we are to get in order to really know the true face of the Conservative government policy and also the country's financial situation so that we can correct it after the next election?

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we find it hard to believe that the member for Ottawa—Vanier would ask us to debate the question about whether we are going to have a budget or a financial statement. He has unfortunately not paid attention to Canadian media coverage for the last six weeks. It is not like him.

The government is getting ready to bring down a full budget very shortly and, as you know, Mr. Speaker, the government has been consulting widely with Canadians. It has listened to their concerns. Above and beyond all, Canadians want the government to eliminate the deficit and reduce the burden of the debt.

The finance minister reported on his and our pre-budget consultations in the document released last Friday, entitled "Charting the Economic Course in a World of Change".

• (1805)

In its upcoming budget the government will be concentrating on actions to control spending and bring down the deficit. The economic recovery is now gaining momentum and the budget will take action to bring our fiscal problems under control and ensure that we sustain that recovery and create jobs.

I trust that the member for Ottawa—Vanier will be paying close attention when the minister presents his budget.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on March 15 I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration to do two things: first, to table amendments to the Immigration Act in order to make gender persecution a specific ground for refugee status and, second, to admit those women into Canada who had been victims of gender persecution but turned down by the Immigration Refugee Board before the new guidelines of March 19, 1993.

Under the present law and the international treaty on refugees, a refugee is defined as a person who has a well founded fear of persecution for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership in a social group or political opinion. Gender is not included in the definition although there are situations in the world where, first, women are by law relegated to an inferior position and prohibited from doing certain things and are persecuted if they disobey such laws. Second, women in many countries are not protected by the law from personal maltreatment, abuse and violence. Third, where women are subject to persecution as I have described, if they speak out or campaign against such laws they are persecuted as well.

On March 9 the chairperson of the Immigration and Refugee Board issued instructions to the Immigration and Refugee Board members that they should interpret the definition of refugee to consider gender persecution. She said on that occasion that these instructions were not binding and that the gender persecution was not to be a ground of refugee status in itself but must be linked to one of the existing grounds such as race or religion and so on.

It is for these reasons I asked the minister on March 25 to go one step further to make gender a distinct ground for refugee status and make it binding by putting it in the law. The minister answered on that day that he could not do it because it would go beyond the international convention on refugees. To that I say that the convention is only a floor, not a ceiling. Nothing prevents Canada from having a larger, more generous definition of a refugee, but we cannot do less than the convention we have signed.

I have also asked the minister to admit on a humanitarian and compassionate basis those victims of gender persecution who were rejected by the board before the new instructions were promulgated. I understand there are over 35 such cases.

In conclusion, I would hope that the government would respond to this request in a more positive manner because I know many Canadians would support such a policy.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this question once again with us.

I want to tell the hon. member that the guidelines on gender based persecutions issued by the chairperson of the Immigration and Refugee Board on March 9 are intended to promote consistency in decisions of refugee claims. They are consistent with the interpretation of the definition of a convention refugee proposed in the 1985 resolution of the executive committee of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees which Canada supported. This allows decision makers to consider women refugee claimants as members of a social group.

These guidelines were the first issued pursuant to the authority of the chairperson contained in recent amendments to the Immigration Act, Bill C-86. There is no reason to believe these non-binding guidelines that respect the independence of decision makers and that were developed in a consultative process will be less effective in promoting consistency than binding direction on the interpretation of the convention definition.

Persecution against a woman based on any one of the five grounds delineated in the refugee convention can result in that woman being recognized as a refugee. If the persecution is solely the consequence of the fact that the individual is a woman or is directed against a particular subgroup of women, the claim can be accepted on the basis that she is a member of a particular social group. The process of evaluation of a refugee claim would not be any easier if the definition of a convention refugee were amended either within Canada or internationally to include gender.

I hope this answers the member's concerns.

Adjournment Debate

CHILD PORNOGRAPHY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, tonight I am standing before my colleagues in the House of Commons to discuss once again the issue of pornography and the urgent need for legislation to outlaw the possession of pornographic materials.

When I last discussed this issue in the House in December I was assured by the Minister of Justice that child pornography legislation would be introduced early this year. Since we now have a new justice minister I would like to know whether introducing this legislation is a priority for the new minister.

Hard core pornography degrades the women and children who are portrayed in these submissive, subordinate and often violent pictures. These videos, magazines and pictures demean our entire society.

We currently have laws that make it an offence to produce, manufacture and sell pornography in Canada. Last February the Supreme Court ruled on pornography in the Butler case. This case concerned obscenity provisions in the Criminal Code. The Supreme Court decision upheld the existing obscenity provisions. The Butler ruling is an important one. In it Canada's highest court has recognized what women and many concerned Canadians have been saying for years. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the harm that pornography's demeaning and dehumanizing depictions of sex can cause to society in general and to women and children in particular. The Butler decision was also important in that it expanded the scope of the existing anti-obscenity law which referred to child pornography.

Pornography is a dangerous and degrading weapon being used in the war against women and children. It reflects the perception that women and children are inferior and available to service the sexual needs of men.

As elected officials we must make sure that legislation is introduced in the area of possession of pornography. We must also make sure that the existing legislation which outlaws the production, sale and manufacturing of pornography is effectively enforced.

In closing I want to say that as a society we have been far too tolerant of pornography. We have the facts. We see the images of young children and women who are our mothers, daughters and granddaughters being beaten, raped and murdered. We have read the evidence showing the link between hard core pornography and the violence against women and children. We must get on with effective legislation in this important area.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Markham has asked the government to address the very urgent need to create an offence for the possession of child pornography, and the government could not agree with the hon. member more.

Let me assure the hon. member that the Minister of Justice recognizes the need to prohibit the production and possession of child pornography to protect children from the harmful effects of sexual abuse and sexual exploitation.

The minister convened more than 250 people at a national symposium on community safety and crime prevention which was held in Toronto in March and clearly indicated that it is his intention to introduce measures in this House as soon as possible which will specifically prohibit the possession, production, distribution and sale of child pornography. This will be done in the very near future.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, back on December 9 I had the opportunity to question the minister of trade on a very important trade matter between Canada and the United States, specifically the softwood lumber tariff dispute.

• (1815)

My question at that time concerned news reports that information on the review of this dispute by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade had been made public, in particular that GATT had made a split decision on the softwood dispute. On the one hand it had ruled that the United States, while using special procedures to launch this harassment, this countervail action against our softwood exports, was proper in doing so. On the other hand it ruled in Canada's favour on the question of whether the United States was right in its continuing to collect the 15 per cent lumber export surcharge or tariff that our own government and country had disavowed. I asked the minister that day in the House to confirm whether this was in fact correct and the news reports were right from GATT that it was dealing with this particular issue. I wanted also to pursue this question. If in fact the ruling had come down as it did and the United States and its officials owed Canadians some $15 million, what kind of assurances and what kind of work was the government going to do to ensure that we would get our money back?

I understand now from discussions that my staff have had with officials that the GATT subsidy committee will be meeting on April 28 to officially review this case. I hope that the government in responding will give an indication of the success that we have had to date in getting our $15 million back and also the direction that we can expect and what preparations the government has for the eventual decision from GATT and of course the ongoing panels on subsidy and injury that are dealing with this issue.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we will respond to the question the hon. member asked in the first place. I am delighted to do so and to clarify the GATT report on the U.S. actions against softwood lumber exports in Canada.

The report contains two major findings. First, it found that the U.S. was not justified under the GATT subsidies code to have placed temporary bans on imports of softwood lumber from Canada between October 4, 1991 and March 12, 1992.

The panel has therefore recommended to the subsidies committee that the U.S. refund the cash collected as a result of this action. Second, Canada challenged the initiation of the investigation in the first place. However, the panel found that the Department of Commerce had met the standard for sufficient evidence toward the initiation of countervailing duty investigation into provincial stumpage pricing practices.

Notwithstanding this, the panel specifically noted that it was not deciding whether Canadian stumpage pricing practices were in fact subsidies.

Also raised was the question of whether the GATT panel made a decision with regard to Canada's export of raw logs. The panel found this issue to be outside its terms of reference even though we pressed to have the issue addressed.

Finally, the question of access to the U.S. market for our softwood lumber producers is of course of very great importance. Canada is contesting the final decisions of the U.S. on subsidy and injury on Canadian softwood lumber through two chapter nineteen panels established under the free trade agreement.

We are also examining the option of pursuing the softwood lumber case further in the GATT.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this week, April 18 to 24, is National Volunteer Week.

This is an opportunity for all of us to express our heartfelt thanks to the more than 13 million Canadians who volunteer their time, skills and energies to enhance the quality of life in their community.

We cannot repeat often enough how much we appreciate their commitment and the services they provide. Volunteers have become an essential and vital part of Canadian society and a major economic resource.

Through their work, volunteers have made a major contribution to this country. We have everything to gain as a society by maintaining this tradition of generosity and caring.

I suggest we take this opportunity to urge people to join those 13 million volunteers across the country. Since this is their week, I think it is appropriate to say how proud we are of what they do, and I want to say: thank you.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the former Minister of Justice, the current defence minister, promised additional amendments to the Young Offenders Act. We never saw them. The new minister suggests that some young offenders be publicly identified. However in a letter to a victim's family he says just the opposite, that publication of the young offender's identity may foster an illusion of public safety.

Canadians are tired of empty promises and illusions. They demand substance. The village of Belcarra in my riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam wants a full review of the youth justice system, a national and public gathering of those who have something to say about youth crime and a frank discussion of what is wrong with the act. So far 124 B.C. municipalities agree.

I support this effort. We need to know the full extent of youth crime and what is happening with present youth court sentencing, post-custody supervision and rehabilitative programs before we can make improvements to the act.

• (1405)

I hope the Minister of Justice is listening to the village of Belcarra and the other voices in Canada that are calling for a review of youth crime and our response to it.

POVERTY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, there are now over four million Canadians living under Statistics Canada's low-income cut-off line.

A woman from my riding is one of those Canadians forgotten and ignored by the current administration. The woman in question was disabled in a car accident two years ago. Since that time she and her son have had to face the horrific reality faced by 47,000 Manitobans, the horrific reality of poverty.

This includes having to make do on less than $20,000 annually for a family of two; being forced, in her case, to cover the cost of medication not covered under Pharmacare, in excess of $1,000 a year; and facing financial barriers to post-secondary education, where she could do more for herself and her son. That is not to mention the emotional problems and stress involved in trying to get by with so little.

[Translation]

On top of that, Tories in Manitoba are blindly imitating their federal counterparts and making irresponsible cuts in programs targeted to the neediest in our society.

It is time Canada and this government showed they are prepared to fight poverty and the very serious problems it generates.

EARTH DAY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, April 22, is Earth Day. Earth Day reminds us of the precious living treasures we share in our common home, Earth, and that although we have a right to use these gifts there is an equal responsibility to preserve and improve the earth and the quality of life it supports.

Earth Day 1993 is dedicated to a tree planting theme. It is a fitting theme, as the planting of trees is symbolic of environmental awareness and commitment.

In the words of the dedicated individuals of the Earth Day Canada Organization:

> The image of putting down roots and contributing to the future gives us a feeling of well-being and a connection with nature.

In addition, the tree planting theme is a good complement to the government's Tree Plant Canada program initiated under the green plan. The $75 million, six-year initiative is designed to foster and encourage the planting of up to 325 million trees in Canada.

Those involved in making this year's Earth Day theme a reality deserve our thanks and the thanks of generations yet to come.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, in the very near future the Minister of Finance is expected to present a new budget in the House.

What do Canadians have to show for nine years of Conservative economic management? Thanks to unending tax increases the average middle class family now spends almost $2,000 more per year than it did in 1984. That family now spends 44 per cent of its income on taxes and real after-tax income has declined.

Conservative economic management also gave us the worst recession since the Great Depression. We now have over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, 2.2 million on welfare and 2 million relying on food banks.

We have lost 325,000 manufacturing jobs since 1989 and over 200,000 people and small businesses have gone bankrupt.

It is clear it is time for change.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw attention to a case of great concern to thousands of Canadians and more specifically to people in the Fraser Valley.

Two young Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, have been serving time in a Brazilian jail since 1989. These two people were arrested for their involvement in the kidnapping of a wealthy Brazilian businessman. They denied knowledge of the kidnapping but were convicted and sentenced.

I know the government, specifically the minister of external affairs, has maintained a strong interest in this case and made efforts through diplomatic channels on behalf of these two Canadians. As well, a treaty between Brazil and Canada to facilitate prisoner transfers is completed and awaits ratification and implementation.

There have been reports of terrible conditions in Brazilian jails. As well, there are indications that sanitary conditions in some jails are below adequate standards. I realize that information from the media does not give the full picture but it does raise concerns.

Considering the conditions that Lamont and Spencer find themselves in and the unfinished nature of the prisoner transfer agreement I ask if there is any further assistance the minister and her officials can give these people.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, Mexico's lack of financial resources makes it necessary for the government to ensure that NAFTA, if implemented, works to improve the environment through environmental standards that would be enforced in Mexico as well as at home and in the U.S.A.

One approach would be to impose trade sanctions. A better approach would be to launch funding initiatives such as creating a North American development bank. It would provide Mexico with funds to construct sewers, sewage treatment plants and water purification systems as well as finance programs to reduce pesticide use, increase energy efficiency, improve public transportation and reduce pollution.

The bank could trigger private sector financing with the result of substantial benefits in the form of improved human health and quality of life, a clean environment and a healthy economy.

Will the government adopt this approach or accept the indifference shown so far by the Minister for International Trade?

AIR TRANSPORT

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, the National Transportation Agency is now holding public hearings on the acquisition of 34 per cent of Canadian International shares by American Airlines, the U.S. giant.

By approving this transaction, the government would sign the death warrant of the Gemini reservation system, and any chances of having a genuine Canadian transportation network would be doomed.

In its push to promote competition at any cost, the Tory government is about to turn our Canadian carriers into mere northern arms of major U.S. carriers.

Last summer the Minister of Transport openly sided with PWA against Air Canada, with Calgary against Montreal, by spending enormous sums to subsidize Canadian. He has opted for competition regardless of the cost, to the detriment of the civil aviation industry in this country.

If he really wants to let the market decide, the minister should stop giving in to pressure from the west and allow the creation of a genuine Canadian monopoly with international stature. Most major countries in the world have this kind of system, something they can be proud of.

GOVERNOR OF THE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, here is something to crow about.

I quote from an article in The Globe and Mail entitled "Confidence in Mr. Crow". It says:

> Mr. Crow has scored an impressive hat trick: low inflation, low interest rates, and a lower exchange rate. He has achieved all three, however, because he had just one goal in mind: low inflation. It is useful to think what would have happened had he not been so single-minded. As inflation rose, Canada's creditors would have sold our bonds, and gone on selling until interest rates rose enough to compensate them. Foreigners dumping their Canadian dollar holdings would have set off a cascading decline in the exchange rate, far overshooting its long-run value. With the prices of domestic and imported goods rising, workers would have demanded higher wage increases, and we'd be off on another inflationary spiral. Without confidence, all is lost.

That is the Crow rate. To the opposition I say: "Let them eat crow."

Oral Questions

MANUFACTURING INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, since the Conservatives took office Canadian manufacturing productivity has grown at only two-thirds the rate of the G-7.

Over the past four years Canada has lost 365,000, or 18 per cent, of its manufacturing jobs. To help reverse this decline and increase our competitiveness the Canadian Manufacturers' Association is proposing to introduce ISO-9000 quality standards, already adopted in Europe and Japan, to Canada.

The CMA has even offered to run this program for the government and can do so for less money than this government spent on its still-born prosperity agenda.

Now that the government has the opportunity to do something really practical, it refuses. Other governments work co-operatively with their manufacturers but not ours. It is little wonder we are mired in 11 per cent unemployment. We urge the industry minister to reconsider his refusal to co-operate with our Canadian manufacturers and introduce this ISO-9000 program.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Volunteer Week.

I would like to remind members of this unique national program sponsored by the Department of National Health and Welfare. This program recognizes the enormous contributions of volunteers to their communities and to their country as a whole.

Since 1977 hundreds of caring and committed Canadian volunteers have been recognized through the Canada volunteer award program. Each year the department presents Canada volunteer award medals and certificates to those Canadians who have made outstanding voluntary contributions toward improving the health and social well-being of their fellow citizens.

• (1415)

I invite all people, all members of this House, to promote volunteerism within their communities and to recommend worthy individuals for next year's awards.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has been told by the Chamber of Commerce to cut social programs, unemployment insurance, and federal support to Canadians and their families. This approach of forcing the burden of paying off the huge debt that the Liberals and Conservatives have created onto the least affluent in Canada has been a disaster.

Statistics Canada tells us that 94 per cent of our debt is a result of high interest rates and tax breaks to the rich and profitable corporations and only 6 per cent is a result of government program spending, all spending not just social spending. Yet this government insists on trying to solve the problem by attacking social programs.

The contrast to deficit control measures of provincial governments is striking. The New Democrat approach in Saskatchewan has the support of a substantial proportion of the population and has been one of compassion so as to spare the least affluent as much as possible.

There is a better approach. Before the Minister of Finance finalizes his budget I hope he will contact the minister of finance of the New Democratic Government of Saskatchewan to get her advice on how to actually reduce the deficit and do so without attacking the most vulnerable in our society.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EUROPEAN BANK OF RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

We learned this morning from the press that there is a fantastic story developing in Europe in relation to the European Bank of Reconstruction and Development.

We are told of unbelievable expenditures there for staff and of millions of dollars for marble, furniture, bars and dining rooms. They spent two-thirds of the money on themselves and one-third of the money to help countries in need.

According to the British press there was only one director who stood against the wishes of the bank's president, Mr. Attali, and it was Mr. McCutchan, the Canadian representative. We have learned that he has been called back to Canada.

We would like to know why a Canadian who takes the interest of the taxpayers not only of Canada but of many other countries into consideration, who is doing his job, has been called back at the request of the Canadian government.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost this is not a new story. It is about 10 days old. It is interesting that the Leader of the Opposition is now getting engaged in it.

Let me say at the outset that the Government of Canada fully supports the goals, objectives and aims of the EBRD, particularly with respect to the reform process, the privatization process, and particularly as it relates to developments in central and eastern European countries and the countries of the former Soviet Union.

The fact is that our director did take issue with the expenditures on the advice of the Government of Canada. We have a policy that is consistent throughout—

Ms. Copps: Why did you fire him?

Mr. Mazankowski: Why did we fire him? This is the kind of nonsense, babble and drivel that is misleading to the Canadian people.

This person is an employee of the Department of Finance. There is a normal rotation process. We have just recently rotated the personnel out of the IMF and Mr. Scott Clark, who was with the IMF as Canada's representative for two and a half years, has been called back to Canada. This is part of the normal process. We continue to fully support the position taken by Mr. McCutchan because it is consistent with government policy as it applies at home and as it applies abroad to other IFIs.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, he took exception to what was going on there and the director general of that organization was under heavy criticism in Europe.

I would like to know from the Prime Minister why he called Mr. Attali to give his support. I quote what Mr. Attali said in his defence: "Brian Mulroney has just telephoned me to express his support".

Mr. Attali cannot get support anywhere in Europe. The only support he is getting is from the Prime Minister of Canada when the Minister of Finance of Canada and the director he had appointed had expressed dissatisfaction with the attitude of Mr. Attali. Why is the Prime Minister double-crossing his Minister of Finance?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with comments like this it is no wonder that yesterday John Munro, a former Liberal cabinet minister, was calling for the resignation of the Leader of the Opposition.

The issues were entirely different. The minister said that Mr. McCutchan acted under the instructions of the Government of Canada which he did. He is a nominee. He is an employee of the Department of Finance. He operates pursuant to instructions of the—

Ms. Copps: What did he promise you?

An hon. member: Why does she get special privileges of talking?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to try again.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. McCutchan is an employee of the Department of Finance. He is a nominee of the Department of Finance. He operates pursuant to instructions of the Department of Finance.

The budget that was brought forward by the EBRD was voted against by Canada, the only country, pursuant to a decision of this government to instruct its nominee to cast a ballot against that budget. It was because we had questions in regard to some of the administrative practices of that budget.

The question that my hon. friend refers to involves a commitment by the Government of Canada to support

Mr. Attali in the policies that he is pursuing as chief executive officer of the bank in regard to its development in eastern Europe and Russia where it is widely recognized that it has performed a tremendously useful series of actions and Canada supports those. I support and my government supports Mr. Attali as he pursues those objectives.

We have clearly supported him and those objectives and we have voted against any abuses in public finances as we would hope the member here would vote against any abuses in public finances in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister cannot have it both ways. He tells us that what Mr. Attali did is completely unacceptable.

Why is the only head of government in the world that Mr. Attali is using to justify himself, the Prime Minister of Canada? If Mr. Attali is incompetent, as the Minister of Finance says, the Prime Minister of Canada had no obligation. On the contrary, he should have called Mr. Attali and asked him to resign.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are two completely wrong statements in what the Leader of the Opposition said.

He said that I found what Mr. Attali did completely unacceptable and he also said that the Minister of Finance referred to Jacques Attali as incompetent. That is completely false. The two statements are wrong.

I clearly explained that we supported Mr. Attali as chief executive in pursuing important policies of the bank for Europe and Russia, but that we had instructed our agent to vote against a budget where there were administrative abuses. The two are perfectly reconcilable and there is nothing wrong there. Let us stop dealing in gossip and talking nonsense like the Leader of the Opposition.

[English]

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, let us try to understand from the minister's reply the situation as it is today.

Back in January we had an expression of concern from the Minister of Finance to the President of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development about the way in which the bank was being administered.

Then the Canadian director was instructed by the government not only to express further concern about the administration of the bank but to vote against the 1993 budget. The Canadian director was the only director who did so.

Then the Prime Minister, according to the London press and the president himself, called the president and said he had the "continued support" of the Canadian government. The Prime Minister today says the Canadian support relates only to the activities of the bank in eastern Europe. It does not relate to the administration of the bank. We voted against his administration we criticized the bank's administration. Which is it?

Are we dividing our support for the bank? Are we saying on the one hand that the administration is no good at all, we agree with the British and others on that but on the other hand it is doing all right in eastern Europe?

Would the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance please tell the House what the Canadian policy is vis-à-vis the bank.

• (1425)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to respond to that because I know the hon. member would understand that when we apply a policy we apply it consistently across the board to all international financial institutions.

In that regard, in January I sent a letter to all of my G-7 colleagues expressing concern about the expenditures by all international financial institutions, including the World Bank, the IMF and the EBRD. As a matter of fact in part I said: "We are all attempting to minimize public service costs and constrain wage expectations and in comparison recent increases in IFIs, international financial institutions, administrative costs appear to be definitely out of line". I went on to say: "In my view IFIs should not be exempt from the realities facing the private sector and the governments of each of our countries."

What was happening was that our director was following through on government policy and voted against what he considered to be an excessive budget, as we have voted against excessive pay increases in other financial institutions as well, and so the policy is consistent right across the board.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I think we should pursue this chronology a little further.

The minister says that the Canadian representative was carrying out the instructions of the government, as well he should. Then within days of voting against the 1993 budget, of voting against the administration of the president, our director is pulled out of London. He is brought home, but the minister says this is merely regular rotation in the foreign service.

I was in the foreign service. I know what regular rotation is. This is not regular rotation. Mr. McCutchan had not finished his regular three-year term at the bank.

Mr. Mulroney: He did not have a three-year term.

Mr. MacLaren: The government brought him out against the background of the Prime Minister's statement that the president still has the "continued support" of the Canadian government despite the abuses that we have seen.

Let me ask the minister this. The Minister of State for Finance is replacing him next week at the annual meeting of the bank. Is it the minister's instruction to pursue the lines that Mr. McCutchan has pursued and if so, why is Mr. McCutchan being withdrawn?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has indicated that in the normal course of events, as my hon. friend knows, there is rotation for all representatives in the—

Ms. Copps: That's not what he said.

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says three years. That is false, absolutely false. The representative for the IMF has just been returned after about two years.

Ms. Copps: That's what he said. Two years.

Mr. Mulroney: And they vary from institution to institution.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney: This is the normal course—

Mr. Speaker: I think it might be wise if when a minister is answering or a member is putting a question all members gave that member the courtesy that should properly be extended to them. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): How about a few manners?

Mr. Mulroney: And so I want to just tell my hon. friend—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Maz, don't heckle Sheila.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we could get on with it. The right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Mulroney: Sheila, don't heckle Maz.

By way of illustration and in response to the substance of the question of my hon. friend, the Government of Canada has registered personally and in writing very strong disagreements with the United Nations, for example, about the administrative practices of the United Nations, where we have sought reforms. We have voted against budgets because we thought they were in disagreement with the objectives that we ought to be pursuing. That did not mean that we did not support the United Nations or the objectives that it was pursuing or that we did not support Perez de Cuellar at the time. We supported him actively while disagreeing with administrative practices in his organization. That is exactly what has taken place here.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The finance minister claimed last week that the dominant issue facing Canadians was the deficit and that the way to tackle this deficit was to continue the failed Tory economic policies that we have had over the last nine years. I might add that the same failed policies have more than doubled the debt since this government came into power and have resulted in this government being $10 billion over its target for deficit reduction had been.

It is clear that the government's economic policies have failed Canadians, have failed to reduce the deficit and have failed to reduce the debt. Will the minister consider changing course, making the choices that will address both the fiscal deficit and the tragedy created by increasing unemployment in this country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, most Canadians believe and hopefully some day the leader of the NDP will believe in the concept that deficit reduction and control of the debt are key to growth in the economy, key to the creation of jobs and key to confidence in the economy. Even her friend, the premier of the province of Ontario, is starting to realize that.

Clearly the premier of Saskatchewan realized that fact when he brought in a very tough and difficult budget. That budget can clearly be termed as nothing other than being a tight-fisted budget, a budget that is touting austerity as the headline in The Financial Post alluded to this morning.

I know that there is a fundamental difference in economic philosophy as it applies to the government and the New Democratic Party, but I think we are on the side of Canadians when they have clearly registered in massive numbers their concern over the deficit. We hope to address that in the budget when I bring it down.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

There is no question of the concern that everyone feels about the deficit and the debt. There is a real debate about how we address that and whether we address it by creating unemployment and more unemployment as this government has done or whether we address it by reducing unemployment so we can create more taxpayers to truly address the debt and the deficit.

This government's policies have cost Canada over 400,000 manufacturing jobs. Not only do we see the loss of jobs, but we also see the loss to communities and individuals. Today we have representatives from 2,500 workers who will lose their jobs if GM closes its foundry plant in St. Catharines. This is the human face, the real face of unemployment, the real result.

If the minister wants to convince somebody about changing opinions he should talk to the one in four Canadians who are looking for jobs because they know that is the real problem.

Since the Minister of Finance is going to be bringing in a last budget before the election, will he really begin to address those 2,500 workers from St. Catharines and the 1.5 million other unemployed and those 2 million underemployed and provide some hope and work for Canadians so we can truly address the debt and the deficit?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. leader of the NDP got so wrapped up in her rhetoric she has now got the unemployment at 25 per cent. That sort of misleading nonsense does not augur well for creating confidence in the Canadian economy.

I remind the hon. member that we have had eight consecutive months of employment increases. As a matter of fact there have been 202,000 full-time jobs created since August.

Mr. Langdon: Tell it to the gallery.

Mr. Mazankowski: If the hon. member from Essex wants to ask a question I will answer it. I would hope that he would give me the courtesy of replying to his leader. The fact of the matter is that there are a number of policies that we have put in place that are showing signs of promise. She mentioned the manufacturing sector.

• (1435)

Mr. Barrett: How many Tory senators have you named?

Mr. Mazankowski: Just the other day it was reported by Canadian Press—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we could move on to the next question. The hon. member for Yukon.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the government is always repeating that Canada must be competitive internationally, so there will be no program to put people back to work.

The European Community has just agreed on a huge program to put Europeans back to work and the same thing is happening in Japan and the United States.

When the only thing that Canada seems able to create now is unemployment, how can this government say that it wants to make the country competitive with the present unemployment rate?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can complete the answer to the earlier question.

I guess the NDP had a bad caucus today. Those members do not want to hear any good news. The Canadian Press reported yesterday or the day before that Canadian manufacturing order books were overflowing in February as the outlook for the industry continued to improve.

Statistics Canada reported today that unfilled orders jumped by 5 per cent from January, the largest monthly rise in five years, to reach $22.6 billion. If that is not a sign of confidence and if that is not a sign that our policies and programs are working, I do not know what is. I do not know what more evidence they want.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Why has the minister been unwilling until now to give us a firm date for his next budget? Is it because the political well-being of the Conservative Party is more important to him and his government than the economic well-being of Canadians and their need for a lot more jobs and a lot more economic growth than they have had so far?

I ask the minister, will he give us a firm date for his next budget today and in fact right now?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): I want to assure the hon. member, and he knows and I know he will believe me, that I always will place the interests of Canadians and the interests of the Canadian economy first and foremost, and I will do it on this occasion as well.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the House and Canadians will note that the Minister of Finance has still not given us a firm date for his next budget.

I again ask him to do so. If he cannot do so today would he explain why he cannot do it since we have been waiting since last February. Why can he not do that and give us an undertaking that his next budget will be different from all his other budgets so that unlike those other budgets, they will create a lot more jobs and a lot more growth for Canadians? Why can he not give that commitment and give us the date for his budget today at the same time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in December I issued an economic statement which I think was well received across the country. A number of those initiatives are being put in place.

I can assure the hon. member that I will give him the date of the budget today.

MONTREAL ECONOMY

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Tonight, the candidates for the leadership of his party are meeting in the Canadian city that is suffering the most from his government's policies, namely Montreal. As we now know, these candidates have nothing to say about how a government must ensure that there is economic growth.

For a long time, the city of Montreal and the Quebec minister of industry have been demanding a real national industrial policy as a precondition for recovery in Montreal, but they have had no answer from the federal government.

How many more jobs and how many poor families must be sacrificed before this government and its candidates see that they are right?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member for LaSalle—Émard takes a much too simplistic approach to what the federal government is doing in Montreal and in Quebec as a whole. He knows very well that of the $8.5 billion invested by business and government in Quebec and in Montreal, $5 billion is from the federal government. He knows that I personally signed a $300 million agreement with the person he named, the Quebec minister of industry, who said then that the co-operation between Quebec and Ottawa was the best Quebec had seen in 20 years.

• (1440)

The federal government, through agreements and particular programs, is active in all sectors of the Montreal economy and I think the Government of Quebec and Quebecers are aware of it. Nevertheless, we must face the economic problems that confront all countries of the world. In co-operation with the Government of Quebec we have done our job and we will continue to do so.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec minister of industry stated very clearly in Davos that the big problem is the lack of a national industrial policy and that the federal government was to blame for that. He was right.

The Prime Minister and the minister continue to give trivial answers while thousands of people are suffering in Montreal.

In view of the obvious lack of economic vision of the Tory candidates, can the minister at least assure us that in its next budget the government will finally bring forward positive measures, not only cuts but specific measures to support the small and medium sized businesses in Montreal, Quebec and Canada, to provide training for single mothers and to create jobs and employment opportunities for young Canadians?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard accuses the Canadian government of being trivial and nonspecific in its actions with respect to the greater Montreal area.

I have an article identifying Montreal as the heartland of research in Canada. It reads as follows: "The Montreal area is a centre of attraction for pharmaceutical research in Canada. This high-technology industry employs 8,000 people in Quebec, where 47 per cent of total spending on research and development in Canada is made".

That is a vital action in a critical area of our national life, in Quebec and in Canada. It is important to note that the bill that generated such extraordinary employment in the Montreal area was opposed by the hon. member for LaSalle—Émard. In fact, every Liberal member of this House voted against that bill, which is so crucial for the future of Montreal.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): My question is for the Prime Minister. It deals with the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. This bank, I might remind you, Mr. Speaker, as of last month spent twice as much on itself as it spent on the reconstruction of eastern European economies.

In the answer to a previous question the Prime Minister said that Canada often complains about the administration of the United Nations through its ambassador. However I do not recall shortly after an ambassador to the United Nations complained about the administration of the UN us pulling the rug out from under the feet of our ambassador and recalling him.

The fact is that Mr. McCutchan voted against the 1993 budget and he publicly criticized the profligate spending habits of Mr. Jacques Attali.

Will the Prime Minister not agree that he is sending the wrong message to Canadians when he recalled Mr. McCutchan for doing the job for which he was sent to this bank to do, to be a watch-dog for Canadian tax dollars?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend. Mr. McCutchan, who is our nominee and an employee of the Department of Finance, voted against the budget. He did not wake up in the morning and decide he was going to vote against the budget. He consulted with the Department of Finance and received instructions from the Minister of Finance to vote against the budget.

All he was doing was doing his job because there were administrative problems there that left us dissatisfied as a government. Obviously he was fulfilling the wish of the Government of Canada, as we have recently conveyed our views to the IMF and the World Bank with regard to salary increases there and as we have to the United Nations in the past. He was doing his job and he did it well. He reflected the interests of the Government of Canada.

• (1445)

The rotation is one that takes place in the normal course of events. I do not know why my hon. friend fails to recognize and acknowledge that.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. This has to be the only government that treats somebody who does his job with recall.

It was reported that Mr. McCutchan's recall came shortly after the Prime Minister had a meeting with Mr. Attali in a Canadian forces jet.

This is a time when the government is telling Canadians that they have to tighten their belts, that we have to reduce the debt and the deficit, and that they have to make sacrifices.

My question is for the Prime Minister. When the Prime Minister had a choice to make between the responsible actions of Mr. McCutchan and the extravagant Gucci tastes of Mr. Attali, why did he once again opt for the life-style of the rich and the famous?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have never had a meeting with Mr. Attali on a Canadian forces jet.

Ms. Copps: You just brought him over.

Mr. Mulroney: No, we did not bring him over on a Canadian forces jet. Wrong again. Wrong, wrong and wrong again. It might be good if you got your facts straight.

Mr. Riis: Tell her the facts.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to go back to the Prime Minister on the European bank scandal.

The Prime Minister speaks about administrative problems. The fact is that instead of helping the people of eastern Europe the president of the bank, Mr. Jacques Attali, has helped himself to $5 million for custom door frames and wall panelling, $2.5 million for an Italian marble floor, $1.5 million for Italian marble for the bank's elevators, more than $1,000 each for 600 desks, nine private dining rooms, and a private bar with 70 designer chairs. The whole project is being personally overseen by Saddam Hussein's architect.

Mr. McKnight: I don't know why they voted that way.

Mr. Beatty: Even Chrétien has a hard time keeping a straight face.

Ms. Copps: Why did the Prime Minister recall the only person with the guts to stand up against this outrageous extravagance?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend lays out the administrative problems in the bank and the allegations there. Now she knows why we instructed Mr. McCutchan to vote against the budget.

I know my hon. friend would like to hold me responsible for a lot of things but even she will give me a break on Saddam Hussein's architect.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Prime Minister.

Given the outrageous extravagance of the President of the European Bank, why did President Attali himself say: "Brian Mulroney has just telephoned me to express his support?" Why does the Prime Minister give his support to the President and send home his own representative at the European Bank?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Jacques Attali is a senior French civil servant. He was François Mitterand's chief of staff for 10 years and he was highly respected throughout Europe. He was the unanimous choice of the heads of government of Europe, of the President of the United States and of the Prime Minister of Canada and his government to assume these new responsibilities. He was given the mandate of establishing an international institution in the heart of London in a very short time.

• (1450)

In retrospect, there is no doubt that some administrative mistakes were made. It is for this reason that we instructed Mr. McCutchan to vote against it. However, we totally reject the implication that Jacques Attali is incompetent, as the Leader of the Opposition claims, or dishonest. Mr. Attali is an honest and upright man who is doing an important job in Europe. We can correct the management errors not by destroying the bank or by unduly tarnishing the reputation of Jacques Attali, as the hon. member is doing.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister may try to twist and turn but the reality is that Canadians are not amused. At a time when they are being promised a tough budget we know that $129 million U.S. of Canadian money has been committed to this bank. We know that over twice as much money has been spent on headquarters, extravagance and payroll as has been spent on reconstructing and rebuilding eastern Europe.

We know that a representative of the Minister of Finance who sits to the right of the Prime Minister has confirmed that Mr. Attali had asked for Mr. McCutchan's removal. He had complained about the fact that he had opposed extravagant expenditures and as a member of the board had voted against the budget of the bank.

Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance confirm that the president of the European Bank had indeed asked for and petitioned for the removal of Mr. McCutchan?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is no.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Finance again. I want him to understand because he looks decidedly uncomfortable sitting to the right of the Prime Minister today.

Mr. Beatty: It beats sitting to the right of Sheila.

Mr. Tobin: Will the Minister of Finance verify that the president of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development oversaw more than two times the amount of money being spent on extravagance and waste as was spent on rebuilding eastern Europe?

Is he telling us that there was no word of complaint whatsoever from the president or his representative to the Canadian government about the fact that Mr. McCutchan was the only official who stood up and said no to the extravagance at the European Bank?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I answered no to the first question, because the hon. member suggested that President Attali asked for the removal of Mr. McCutchan. The answer to that question was no.

In so far as the actions of Mr. McCutchan are concerned, he carried out instructions pursuant to our policy. As far as I am concerned the record stands and his record clearly speaks for itself.

The fact of the matter is that this is part and parcel. I am not aware of any complaint made by Mr. Attali.

Mr. Tobin: Or?

Mr. Mazankowski: Or who?

Mr. Tobin: Or his representative.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not aware of that. The fact of the matter is that there is very clear knowledge that our director, one of the 23, voted in the manner in which he did consistent with the policy of the government, as we have in the case of other international financial institutions.

The reference to the letter I wrote to my G–7 colleagues is part and parcel of the policy we have been following as a government.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, today I received a highly credible report.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1455)

Mr. Brewin: I would ask the government to take this report seriously because the reputation of Canadian peacekeepers is at stake. I am prepared to share the details of it with the government.

In February an unarmed Somali civilian was shot by Canadian forces in Belet Huen. That is one item in the report. The second is that the Somali who was killed on March 4 was unarmed. It was in fact a deliberate homicide against this unarmed Somali. Along with the March 16 homicide which the government has conceded is a homicide there was a persistent and deliberate cover-up of these incidents attempted, at least by the Canadian commanding officials in the area.

Was the government aware of all this? Will the government agree that there should be an immediate independent investigation of all this by the government and a report back to the House as soon as possible?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am absolutely astounded, Mr. Speaker, that the member for Victoria would malign and slander the Canadian Armed Forces in the way he has just done.

Those incidents, every one that he has talked about, were announced by way of press release in Mogadishu in theatre as is customary. In every single issue there is an investigation started. Until now everybody else in the House, except apparently the hon. member, recognized the presumption of innocence until the investigation is complete and the courts have ruled.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the families of the Canadians involved have been asking for the facts to be made public. They do not know what is happening and the government refuses to tell them. The public does not know what is happening. The Canadian forces do not know what is happening.

I agree the rights of individual Canadian soldiers have to be covered, but beyond that there must be a concern for the relations between Canada and the Somali community and for Canada's peacekeeping reputation. It is a reputation which has led to these reports coming to us.

Would the government not agree that there should be a public inquiry into what is happening and that the Minister of National Defence should be held accountable for her administration of Canadian forces in Somalia?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, what is happening and what every hon. member in this House except apparently the hon. member recognizes is that anybody under investigation is completely innocent until a court decides otherwise.

As has been the custom in this House for as long as I have been here, every hon. member has respected the tradition of not interfering with investigations particularly dealing with criminal matters.

There is no limit to the level the hon. member in his anxiety to despoil the reputation of the Minister of National Defence will stoop.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Clément Couture (Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

After extensive consultation by the government concerning the 1993-94 budget, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance at this time and after a second question has been asked if he has completed all his investigation and consultation. Would he be ready today to announce the date that he is going to be presenting the budget to the House?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that very sensible question. I advise him that I have completed the formal consultations. I have completed all the logistical and technical aspects of the budget. I am pleased to inform the hon. member and announce to the House that—

Mr. Martin: Next Tuesday?

Mr. Mazankowski: No, it will not be next Tuesday. I will be bringing a budget down on Monday, April 26.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of fisheries perhaps I could put a question to my good friend the minister of employment.

He will be aware of the problems in the Atlantic fishery with the quota cuts and the plant closures and so on. I wonder if he would indicate to the House whether he knows if his colleague the minister of fisheries, who admitted yesterday that present programs are not quite enough, is going to be making that announcement about a new compensation package today, or how soon we can have that package for the people in Nova Scotia, the Gulf of St. Lawrence generally and Newfoundland?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, soon.

PRIVILEGE

HON. MEMBER FOR SAINT-HUBERT—DIVISION ON BILL C-62

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Hubert): Mr. Speaker, today I am raising a question of privilege concerning the manner in which division No. 458, held yesterday on Bill C-62, was tallied and reported in Hansard of April 20, 1993.

Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate being able to make myself heard.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I ask the co-operation of all members to give the hon. member the time and atmosphere to present her question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mrs. Venne: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, I am raising a question of privilege with respect to yesterday's vote. I will now continue my remarks.

Yesterday at 3 p.m. the Acting Speaker called in the members to put the question on Bill C-62. After the bells rang for 15 minutes, the Acting Speaker read the motion and asked all members who were in favour of the motion to rise. After all Conservative members had voted, the Acting Speaker rose and asked all those opposed to please rise. The Liberal leader rose, with all Liberal members present, as did the members of the New Democratic Party, and we in the Bloc Quebecois did the same.

Subsequently, the Acting Speaker rose and again asked those opposed to please rise. We in the Bloc Quebecois immediately voiced our disapproval of this procedure, which created considerable confusion in the House and led me to rise on a point of order. My point of order was not allowed until after the Clerk had read the results of the vote, which was 223 yeas and no nays.

My point of order was duly reported in Hansard of April 20, at page 18183. In my point of order, I mentioned to the Acting Speaker that we had voted against the motion. However, the Chair did not bother to reply or even comment but instead proceeded with the question on the main motion.

I have a video of what happened yesterday during the vote. If you wish, I can leave this copy with you as evidence.

My colleagues and I were quick to express our disagreement even before the results of the division were read. Beauchesne's fifth edition, citation 223(5), page 76, has this to say:

> An error noted during a division may be corrected before the total is announced.

• (1505)

As I said before, I raised a point of order immediately, as indicated in the same edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 78, citation 235.

Consequently, I ask that division No. 458 be recorded in Hansard to reflect how the members of the Bloc voted, which was "nay", and that Hansard of April 20, 1993 be corrected accordingly. I ask this only on behalf of the members of the Bloc Quebecois, since the Liberals and the New Democrats did not ask me to speak on their behalf.

However, Mr. Speaker, if you think that my question of privilege is a reflection on a vote of the House in the meaning of Standing Order 18, I would ask that Division No. 458 be rescinded.

[English]

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to have a long intervention but my colleague has made some comments which I think have to be given due consideration.

I remind the House that there is such a thing in law as an innocent mistake. I do not wish to dispute the facts my colleague has referred to because I think, by and large, she is almost completely accurate.

Yesterday there were two votes. The first vote was that the motion be now read and the second vote was that the motion be now referred to the appropriate committee.

On the first motion, members of the government stood and when the last member of the government sat down, the Leader of the Official Opposition stood in his place. At the same time, and this is where I think the innocent mistake may have come in, the Chair assumed that the Leader of the Opposition would be rising in his place to oppose that motion. I think that was where the mistake was made. We hollered and raised our voices to the Chair and the Chair understood and proceeded by taking those names, which has led to the conclusion my colleague has made reference to.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if there is an actual question of privilege here, but you might want to review the tape my hon. colleague has made reference to and perhaps comply with her request. I think it was evident from the Bloc Quebecois' subsequent to it that the Bloc Quebecois were opposing both the motion that it be now read, which is the procedural aspect, and the second motion which was to the substance, that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

I am not standing to support the members' cause. I am not standing to say their cause is not valid but I hope the Chair, under the guise of fairness and because it was an innocent mistake, will take a look at this and report back to the House at his earliest opportunity.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I would especially like to have the attention of our colleagues on the majority side. I did witness the situation yesterday and quite an innocent error was made, but we could correct it quickly. Everyone admits that there was a mistake and I respectfully submit to you that if the House desires, we could resolve the problem immediately. We do not have to put it off till tomorrow, but do it immediately, not by recognizing that there was an error but by strongly suggesting that the votes of members who were really caught by surprise yesterday be considered as votes against. We could immediately end the incident now.

[English]

I hope we can end this immediately by simply recognizing that yesterday, without a shadow of a doubt as my hon. leader said so well, an innocent mistake was made. Instead of referring that to you, Mr. Speaker, for your consideration, perhaps the House would be kind enough to give unanimous consent so we can correct that vote right now. By saying that the vote it attributed to the bloc yesterday as having supported would simply be opposed, that would be the end of the incident. Otherwise he will have to review it as it was put by the hon. member for Saint-Hubert and then come back for a final decision.

• (1510)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I listened carefully to the representations made to me by the hon. member for Saint-Hubert, the House leader of the opposition and the member for Saint-Denis, who I thank for their advice and opinions.

I think it prudent under the circumstances for the Chair to take this matter under advisement and review the video tape and Hansard, to be able to suggest to the House as soon as possible a way to resolve this question to the satisfaction of all members of this House.

CURRENCY ACT

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (for the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-124, an Act to amend the Currency Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Valcourt (for the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-420, an act to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Immigration Act and the Narcotic Control Act (marijuana legalization).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have the opportunity to bring before the House a bill to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Immigration Act, and the Narcotic Control Act, as well as the Psychoactive Substance Control Act.

I have two brief quotes I would like to put on the record before providing a quick understanding of the three clauses. In 1923 in this Chamber without a single member speaking, marijuana was criminalized and in fact since then we have seen the penalties increase to the point that some marijuana offences now carry life imprisonment as the sanction in this country. It is the strongest sanction outside Malaysia and Thailand where people are executed.

Emily Murphy, a judge in Alberta in 1922, wrote in the book The Black Candle the following, which I think explains why many Canadians took an unusual view toward marijuana for a long time:

> Persons using this narcotic smoke the dried leaves of the plant, which has the effect of driving them completely insane. The addict loses all sense of moral responsibility. Addicts to this drug, while under its influence, are immune to pain and could be severely injured without having any realization of their condition.
> While in this condition they become raving maniacs and are liable to kill or indulge in any form of violence to other persons using the most savage methods of cruelty without, as said before, any sense of moral responsibility. When coming under the influence of this narcotic these victims present the most horrible condition imaginable. They are dispossessed of their natural and normal willpower and their mentality is that of idiots. If this drug is indulged in to any great extent, it ends in the untimely death of the addict.

• (1515)

That was 70 years ago. The legislation that is still before this House is based on that. Let me just say that the three clauses are called: the Campbell-Charest clause, which is an amendment to the Canadian Human Rights Act; the Clinton clause, a reference to President Clinton, which is an amendment to our Immigration Act to allow people like President Clinton to come back into Canada; and the final clause which includes the amendments to the Criminal Code and the Narcotic Control Act that are called the "smoked meat amendments" in reference to Hughie Segal. I hope this bill passes soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Mr. Fulton moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

SHOP CANADA DAY

JULY 4, 1993

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House the government should proclaim Sunday, July 4, 1993 Shop Canada Day to keep consumer dollars in Canada and to support Canadian retailers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, after consultation with all parties and the independents, and having reached some agreement, it is my pleasure to bring this motion before the House.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wish to acknowledge that there have been consultations in terms of being able to encourage Canadians to support Canadian producers, retailers and manufacturers. This is certainly a step in the right direction. Unfortunately, it seems to me, if my recollection is correct, that under the North American free trade agreement this type of policy would be impossible. That is why we are opposing the NAFTA.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I wish to table a petition signed by close to 1,000 residents of Canada who state that approximately 200 Polish immigrants have been waiting in Greece for over three years to emigrate to Canada under the former self-exiled designated class.

The Canadian government cancelled this program while these immigrants were awaiting issuance of visas to Canada and these Polish immigrants have severed all ties with Poland and are stranded in Athens through no fault of their own. Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Canadian government to allow these Polish immigrants to emigrate to Canada as quickly as possible.

SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition requesting that the government defer its intention to merge the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council.

These petitioners are not convinced that there will be any saving of money or increased efficiency by the government's intended move. They ask that this be deferred and studied. Then a decision can be taken.

• (1520)

I fully support this fair request.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by over 330 people in British Columbia.

It says that the two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison have suffered a miscarriage of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

The riots in the same compound where they are held have demonstrated that there is a real threat to their health and safety in prison. The only relief available from such severe punishment is for Canada to request their expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Prime Minister to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada in accordance with Brazilian law.

We have not forgotten Christine Lamont and David Spencer and we are going to do our best to get them out of that Brazilian prison.

TRADE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several residents of Canada mostly grouped in and around Edmonton.

The petitioners point out that more than 400,000 Canadian manufacturing jobs have been lost since the free trade agreement became law in 1989 and that, if implemented, the North American free trade agreement will cause even more Canadian jobs to be lost.

They say that the current Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement sharply reduces the power of all Canadian governments to develop the Canadian economy and point out that Canada's interests are best protected and promoted by cancelling the FTA and the NAFTA.

Therefore they call on the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the FTA's termination clause to end the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty today to present a petition in accordance with Standing Order 36 from 138 residents of Toronto, Guelph, Scarborough, Sutton West, Whitby, Rexdale and Don Mills who wish to draw the attention of the House to the following.

They say that the proposed North America free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada and that it will therefore cause Canada to lose more good jobs. It would also result in further restrictions placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry, to conserve natural resources for Canadian benefits and to advance needed social programs.

Therefore the petitioners call upon the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

IMMIGRATION

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of quite a number of people from Vancouver who still express great concern about amendments made to the Immigration Act in Bill C-89.

They oppose the provisions that allow decisions to be made retroactively that would cause many individuals and families who have already relied upon an earlier decision to be affected in a serious manner. They call for the government to withdraw these amendments.

FIRST NATIONS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and indeed an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents.

First, a number of Indian and native reserves throughout my constituency point out that Canadians generally wish to designate a date of recognition of Canada's original inhabitants. They suggest that June 21 is the most appropriate day to recognize the First Nations.

They are calling upon Parliament to enact Bill C-268, an act respecting a national solidarity day for the aboriginal people of Canada. They are asking Parliament to consider that.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter the petitioners are by and large from central British Columbia. They simply indicate a whole set of reasons why they oppose the exportation of fresh river water and lake water to the United States and Mexico. They are of the opinion that the North American free trade agreement will facilitate this.

They are asking the government to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that our rivers will never be diverted to the United States.

• (1525)

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by approximately 75 individuals regarding section 745 of the Criminal Code which is a provision that would allow for the reduction in the number of years of imprisonment for people convicted of either second or first degree murder.

The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to remove section 745 from the Canadian Criminal Code thus resulting in the situation where those convicted of first and second degree murder would in effect serve the minimum as prescribed by the Criminal Code.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER REPORT AND THIRD READING STAGES OF BILL C-93

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I move pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

That, in relation to Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of report stage and one sitting day to the consideration of the third reading stage of the bill; and

That, 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for Government Orders on the day allotted to the report stage consideration and on the day allotted to the third reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted, if required, for the purpose of this order and, in turn, every question necessary to dispose of the stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate or amendment.

Some hon. members: Shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 20, consideration of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 21 to 64.

• (1615)

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. You will remember in the debate yesterday the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization purported to demonstrate in the House that there would be savings. Yesterday I rose during the debate to challenge the member to table in the House those documents that purported to show that the amalgamation of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council into the Canada Council would in fact save money.

The parliamentary secretary did table a document toward the end of the proceedings yesterday afternoon but it did not show any savings at all in bringing the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council into the Canada Council. What he tabled was a press release from the Canada Council showing how it was going to cope with a 10 per cent mandatory reduction that the government has imposed on the Canada Council. It did not demonstrate at all that the amalgamation was going to create greater efficiencies or savings.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Of course, I had to listen to the point raised by the hon. member, but on reflection I must conclude—and I recall the incident very well—that it is a document which was not officially tabled. The hon. parliamentary secretary simply offered to table a document to which he alluded in his speech and the Chair does not have to make a judgment on the value of that document.

Therefore, I cannot accept this point of order. This is part of the debate and if the hon. member makes a judgment the Chair will take note, but it does not have to judge this document itself.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I deferred to the member for St. Boniface and thank him for giving me this opportunity to speak on the motion before us which reads:

> Resuming consideration of report stage of Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

In debating this issue I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues two or three amendments that my colleague from St. Boniface has introduced to improve the bill. It would otherwise not be supportable because it is unfair to our social scientists and to our scientists involved in the humanities.

The amendments will ensure that there is security of funding for the social sciences and humanities and will secure the identity, integrity and importance of these disciplines. If this bill is passed as improved with these amendments there will be accountability to Parliament.

Motion No. 32 proposes that the separate mandate of the new agency, which will include research, arts and international cultural relations, be funded through separate budget appropriation votes in the House of Commons.

The importance of this approach is to ensure that not all of them are taken right away. We must not forget one very important segment of the total, and that is the social sciences and humanities review. We would like to ensure that funding for this discipline is continued and have shown the value of this discipline.

Having practised medicine for some time before entering politics, I know the importance of the social and humanities discipline even in the practise of medicine. We need our social scientists if we are going to take care of the whole patient. Their importance can be multiplied many times in other disciplines as well.

• (1620)

On the second point, the security of identity of this discipline, Motion No. 24 would reflect, if accepted, a change of name from Canada Council for the arts, research, social sciences and humanities, to the arts, social sciences and humanities Research Council of Canada. In essence, this proposal would truly reflect a merger of the two and not the abolition of one and the retention of the other.

An hon. member: You got that right.

Mr. Pagtakhan: It is human nature that in order to give importance and recognition to any group, its identity has to be retained and recognized. Recognition of its identity and integrity is an important tool in ensuring and enhancing its continued productivity. I do not think this government is prepared to tell the House of Commons and Canadians that this discipline is no longer important. If it is not it ought to be reasonable and accept this very reasonable proposal.

The government has argued that the rationale for merging the two agencies is to develop efficiency and effectiveness. Critical in any measurement of efficiency and effectiveness is the important need to have a tool to monitor the program and ensure accountability. Motion No. 40, as proposed by my colleague from St. Boniface would reflect this need for accountability and monitoring of whatever new changes are made. We would like a parliamentary review committee to review the function of the new entity and agency five years after the legislation comes into effect. It is a reasonable proposal that this government can truly ill afford not to adopt.

There are many more issues that I would like to address. In the interest of maintaining the importance of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council as well as the Canada Council, I think our proposals are very reasonable. The proposed amendments strike at the heart of the concerns that these groups have brought to the attention of this government.

On December 2, 1992 the Canadian Association of University Teachers made a very useful observation when it indicated, and I quote: "Its profound disappointment with the government's decision to merge the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council without any consultation with the stakeholders involved." Lately we have been hearing from the leadership candidates in this government that they would like to consult with Canadians. Here is a golden opportunity. I challenge them to come forward and say they would like to consult with Canadians, listen to their views and not just hear without listening.

The Canadian Association of University Teachers has indicated as well that a convincing rationale has not been offered for this sort of consolidation. We have to respect the Canadian Association of University Teachers. This is its field. We have to give it respect for its expertise.

On that note I would like to say I am disappointed that this government is still hesitant to adopt the proposed amendments by my colleague from St. Boniface.

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to clarify a number of issues but I want to begin by saying that what we are doing here is simply combining two organizations to save administration costs. Today people are concerned about tax dollars and where they are being spent. I think they would applaud this kind of streamlining move which really just reduces some of the overburden and additional cost of carrying two administrations. Let me break this down a little bit.

• (1625)

First of all, there was reference made in an article to a figure of $1.5 million suggesting that that would be the net savings for five years. That is not correct. The savings will actually be $5 million per year.

I think that is a worthwhile number of dollars to attempt to save through the combining of two administrations. The savings that will accrue to us because we have taken that step. That $5 million will kick in probably starting in the third-year operation of the council.

One will notice in other streamlining procedures in the private sector that it is usually two or three years down the road before one begins to see the net savings. There is an upfront cost associated with this. However, we think $5 million a year is worth the effort. We know that this is what the figures will be because we have had advice, contrary to what my hon. friend opposite said, from the boards themselves. We talked to the Canada Council, SSHRC and the Treasury Board.

Let me just give an example of how these savings are realized. For example, we will have a streamlined program structure. We will have much simpler, more flexible financial management to deal with. We will only be dealing with one location. Instead of paying two rents we will be paying one. We will have rationalized common services. For example, we will only have one personnel manager, we will only have one financial manager and we will only have one council instead of two.

All of this makes sense for a savings of $5 million a year, at a time when we have to find more innovative and efficient ways to deal with our tax dollars and the expenditures that are putting such pressure on our debt and the deficit that we have to contend with.

I think it is important also to remember that these two councils operated as one for over 20 years, so this is not new. It is not a tremendously unusual departure from what was normal. For 20 years they worked as one council. That is an important point.

We will remember that the council developed a structure that had adapted to two clienteles. It had no trouble with the creation of an academic advisory panel as a parallel to the advisory arts panel, and the establishment of a separate administrative staff to deal with the academic community.

At that time the differentiation of the roles between the two was fully understood and accepted by the two bodies and their relationship was characterized by mutual respect. I say this to my hon. friend across the way.

I think we should also note that in its appointment of the new council the government of the day, which was the Liberal administration, took the Canada Council as its model and gave the new body, SSHRC, the same kind of composition in terms of its board and similar budgetary and expenditure practices.

These two organizations are very similar and they have a long history that goes back to a time when they were actually one. We are not creating any hardship here for anybody in the community. As a matter of fact, the government is committed to keeping the three budgets separate for each of the council's clients so there will not be any confusion about who gets what or whether or not the humanities people will get their fair share of the funding or the grants. That will not be a problem because they will be kept separate.

The Treasury Board has already met with the management of the two existing councils to see how this can be achieved administratively and to iron out the technical details.

Also, Bill C-93 says:

> The government shall have regard to the importance of maintaining a broadly representative membership that reflects the function of the Council.

What this means in practical terms is that the council will represent the interests not only of the artistic and academic communities, but of all Canadians. That is what we want. We want the agencies that we fund in Ottawa to reflect the broad interests of all Canadians. If we can save money at the same time I think we are accomplishing what most Canadians would like us to accomplish.

I might also mention that some points were made yesterday that perhaps require some clarification. There was a discussion, for example, of the calculation of the percentage of administration overhead. As a matter of fact, it was the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle on page 18158 of Hansard who used some percentages that I think were intended as an expression of the administrative costs in relation to total costs.

• (1630)

In other words, the dollars that we spend on grants and the numbers of dollars that have been distributed will rise as they have done over the years. However, the administrative costs are fairly standard. One cannot make comparisons of the administrative costs today with the administrative costs of yesterday because obviously the costs today would be lower because the grants are higher. The costs are still significant. As we see, $5 million can be saved by streamlining the administration of the two.

Another comment was made about 200 per cent CPI inflation. When the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance mentioned this, the hon. member for Terrebonne, he referred to the 200 per cent increase in the administrative costs. What he was talking about was nominal dollars. He did not in his speech discount for inflation in that period.

What we are saying is that as a point of comparison, the growth in the administrative costs since 1977-78 have actually exceeded the rate of CPI inflation. That is where we are going to realize those savings by reducing the administration and streamlining and actually saving a total of $5 million a year which is not, as one will agree, an insignificant amount of money. It certainly underlines the necessity of combining these two agencies so that Canadian taxpayers could realize the benefit of a far more efficient and streamlined operation.

The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada people will be looked after. Their interests will be protected. They will continue to receive grants and be able to continue the work that they do which is so important to the country. However, we will be saving money overall because we are taking a more practical and efficient approach to the way we deal with these agencies.

I also want to point something out about voting. We are not saying that there will be one vote for appropriation purposes. The ministers and Treasury Board will decide how many votes there will be. They will doubtless take into account the wishes of the management and the views of the two boards. There will be input from the people who are most impacted and most affected in spite of what my hon. colleague for Winnipeg North said a few moments ago.

Finally, I want to point out that $35 million will be the combined administrative overhead for all three of the agencies. It is included in the $217 million which is a total of all the funding, including the overhead, the grants and so on for all three sectors.

Again, just to underline what I have said before, when we combine these agencies there will be a net savings of $5 million a year starting in the third year. Those are significant dollars. If we take a look at it over a 10-year period, it will be more than $5 million because obviously inflation on an annual basis will have taken those administrative costs well beyond that.

I hope I have clarified things. Thank you for the opportunity to speak on this today.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South did not clarify neither for the benefit of the hon. member for Winnipeg North or for the members of this House of Commons. This is because she talks about $5 million in savings that would be accrued by merging the two organizations that we are debating today, yet we really do not know where she pulled those $5 million statistics from.

She is now leaving the Chamber. I wish she would hear this so we could perhaps clarify her mind on the situation.

My colleague for St. Boniface who has been doing a yeoman's job for our side on this particular committee has said in the debate, both in committee and in the Chamber, that no such reports, findings or studies have ever been produced by government members or by civil servants who have come forward before the committee.

One would think, if there was any truth to the suggestion that there would be savings of $5 million plus, then at some point during the committee stage some bureaucrat, minister or government member would have put that testimony before the appropriate committee or in fact documented that particular study. To date, no official has ever shown any study proving that there will be savings.

• (1635)

We know and we have heard from various officials themselves that there will be a $1 million start-up cost. I do not think it should be simply a given and automatic for one to say that collapsing two different houses that provide roofs over these organizations into one bigger house with one bigger bureaucracy will save dollars.

No one has a monopoly on trying to be fiscally responsible in this Chamber. In the end we all represent that same taxpayer with the dollars. One of our functions is to spend those moneys wisely and frugally.

It is not good enough to have this member of Parliament or this government thinking, without any evidence and with simple assumptions, that it will save all sorts of dollars by collapsing two homes into one.

Second, there has not been one study or report that shows that the one new organization would either be more efficient or effective. Once again, in committee, when challenged, no officials were able to point to any type of evidence that would suggest that on an effectiveness and efficiency factor the new organization would be superior to what is being produced now.

Third, some government members and officials only a while back were actually considering withdrawing their proposal for an amalgamation of the Canada Council with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council because they knew that they had not proven their case. Notwithstanding that, they continued.

We heard the story before that government members have come to us to try to approve some types of different organizational structures or promises on the grounds that it would save Canadian taxpayers all sorts of dollars. That case has yet to be proven in a very tangible and substantive way.

The other factor that I think is a particularly hurtful one in this equation is that there has been little or no consultation with the affected personnel in either division. That speaks to the type of governance that we have had for nine years. Perhaps that is the type of talk used by one of the ministers in the leadership race when speaking about the new style of politics. This comes because people are tired of the Conservative brand of politics in terms of the politics of inclusion. Here is a perfect case in point where scientists, researchers and academics were not even consulted with respect to the possible merger of these two organizations.

In fact, I received a copy of a letter from the Association of University Teachers. It was addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister and in its opening paragraph it says:

> I am writing this open letter to you to express our profound disappointment with your government's decision to merge the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council without any consultation with the stakeholders involved.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a a point of order. I apologize for interrupting the hon. member but before five o'clock I have to indicate that tomorrow will be an allotted day.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that we have in this country over 100 universities, 13,000 to 15,000 social scientists, over 200,000 people represented by the arts community and close to 30,000 Canadian academics. That is a fairly impressive and significant constituency.

When one talks about two councils that directly impact on this significant constituency one would think that it would be normal, prudent and logical for the government to consult the stakeholders of that constituency.

However, when those individuals come before the committee and write to the Prime Minister of the country to say that they have not even been consulted, what kind of decision making do we really have?

• (1640)

If we are truly concerned with the output and substance of the work those two councils do and if we are serious about the work they produce on behalf of Canadians then clearly and surely one would think that a government before moving to combine the two organizations would not only make a convincing argument based on fact, and not based on perception, but would also consult the various stakeholders. That is without even talking about the best interests of Canadians at the end of the day.

From these vantage points my friend from St. Boniface and others who have been engaged very seriously and in detail on this bill have moved a series of amendments that would speak to that accountability, that would speak to providing the facts rather than perceptions and myths.

I do not think it was too much to ask in those amendments for a greater accountability by the government rather than dropping figures loosely on the floor of the House of Commons and then going somewhere else to speak to the actual facts in the matter.

We have been somewhat disillusioned because the significant constituency I quoted moments ago has not even been consulted; because no official, minister or government member has had the foresight to document their arguments on effectiveness and cost savings, and because we are actually trying to make it more accountable with Motion No. 40, put forward by my colleague from St. Boniface, which tries to make it more accountable than the government is suggesting as we wish to have an accountability review every five years rather than the longer term suggested by this government.

We do not need to be lectured or preached to in terms of who is more accountable. We all have to be fiscally responsible but we do not accept as a given arguments that are based and founded on political quicksand rather than on hard scientific facts.

Therefore, having been refused at the committee stage we are appealing through the Chair to the government during this important report stage of Bill C–93 to listen once again to those arguments, not for our sake but for the sake of the important constituency that is out there working on behalf of Canadians and our country and enriching that vibrant life which is part of this Canadian mosaic.

On behalf of members of a very important constituency who surely cannot all be wrong, at least give those people the time of day to listen to their arguments. After all, as I quoted from the letter, they are the real stakeholders in this case. It would lead to better government if we practised the politics of inclusion rather than the reality, which is to exclude everybody else except the government.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. For your information and that of the House, in his speech the hon. member challenged the facts presented by my colleague from Winnipeg and myself concerning potential savings of $5 million. I would now like to conclude, if I may, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I cannot accept this point of order because it is really a matter of opinion and opinions can differ. The rules of debate are very strict and this is not a point of order per se.

[English]

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to say a few words regarding report stage of Bill C–93. I want to make my comment in the context that we all acknowledge the fact that we are in a knowledge–based economy in which education, training and research is critical and paramount in terms of future positive economic growth in Canada and full employment for Canadians. That is why most of us are shocked, and that is putting it mildly, to see that the government is determined to proceed with part III of Bill C–93.

• (1645)

Why do I say that? I say that simply because my hon. colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle has put forward a set of amendments which essentially delete part III of this act. He has acknowledged that to reduce government spending and wasteful government expenditures is something that he and we enthusiastically endorse and support.

When the government launches something that is regressive, that will ensure that the arts and social sciences in Canada will not proceed in the same way as they ought to, that will diminish the status of research and that will diminish the quality of education, training and research then it is something that no one in their right mind would support.

My friend from Regina—Qu'Appelle has put forward a set of amendments that say: For the sake of decency, reasonableness, the future of Canada, and jobs and opportunities for young Canadians in the future let us take this section out of this legislation.

We are not alone in this call. This bill was sent to committee so we could listen to the experts, to those who understand these issues more than ourselves, who live in this experience, and who have made a career and a profession of education and research and developing the social sciences and humanities.

Witness after witness appeared before the committee and every single one of them said to do the same thing. They said to scrap this section of the legislation because it is bad, it is wrong, and it is not in the best interest of Canada.

In a democracy part of our legislative process is to go to the people who are most knowledgeable in the area we are considering in a piece of legislation and ask them for their input. We ask for their advice and suggestions.

To be fair we do not necessarily automatically follow all of their suggestions and advice, but we accept what they have to say as being reasoned and very sensible and very important from their perspective. Based on that we make a judgment.

When there is some commonality to the extent that every single witness appearing says to do the same thing, scrap the bill, and makes long presentations as to why this would be appropriate, when not a single member of the government can criticize what they have to say and members of the opposition support what they have to say then it becomes clear this section should be deleted.

A lot of my friends on the government benches hold that same position. I know some government members have actually lobbied the minister to get this section out of the bill. Why? I guess they are beginning to listen to their constituents for once.

There has been a great to do in the last little while about the new emerging leadership of the Conservative Party saying it is time we listened to the constituents, it is time we listened to the people of Canada. Where the hell have they been in the last eight and a half years? Is this not the way a democracy is supposed to work?

All of a sudden there is this new revelation, this great new approach, that we should try listening to the people of Canada. Now is the time for those leadership candidates to show they actually mean what they say. When we vote on this motion that would delete the section that literally all Canadians who are aware and understand this process want to see removed then we will believe what they say. Then we will believe they will actually listen to the people of Canada because they certainly have not on issues like the GST, the North American free trade agreement and others.

I listened with interest to the previous speaker from Winnipeg who said the reason that the government is doing this is to save money, to save the taxpayers' hard-earned tax dollars. If that is what this is intended to do, it does not do that. As a matter of fact, there is absolutely no saving at all.

One does not have to listen to me to make this point. We can go to the Treasury Board and see what it has to say because the Treasury Board did a very thorough analysis, as it is wont to do, of this new cultural agency. In other words, it examined amalgamating the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the international cultural program into the Canada Council.

• (1650)

It asked what the savings in dollars and cents by doing this would be. The Treasury Board went through all of the computer programs, the analyses and so on. Lo and behold there would be no savings in 1992, no savings in 1993–94, no savings in 1994–95, and so on and so forth. In other words, the government itself said that there is no financial advantage to doing this. That makes a mockery out of what the government is doing.

If the point is to save taxpayers' money and the government says in its own analysis that it does not save any money, then for goodness' sake let us not use that argument.

What other argument can be used? The only other argument that can be used was reflected the other day by an individual from the other place, Conservative senator Finlay MacDonald. He was the first senator appointed by our Prime Minister and he is absolutely furious about what the government is doing. He is a Conservative member of the Upper House, the Senate, and he is furious because he says all the government is really doing is catering to the Reform Party by taking some Draconian, unnecessary, and horrible steps that will set back advanced education and research in this country for many years. The reason the government is doing that is to cater to the Reform Party and its rather outmoded and "dinosaurial" platforms.

Perhaps I should quote from the senator directly. He said: "The whole exercise is the government's attempt to feed the public perception that chronic deficits are caused by waste and mismanagement for it allows the public to believe there is a painless way to solve our serious financial problems. The whole exercise might be nothing more than a symbolic act to protect the party's right flank from attacks from the dreaded Reform Party to cause sufficient pain and spill enough blood to impress the voters. If true this might be good politics in the short term but it is not good public policy in the long run". Those are brilliant words from Senator Finlay MacDonald. He is saying what the government is doing is absolutely haywire, absolutely wrong and not in the best interest of Canada.

I want to again commend my colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle for bringing forth this set of amendments that will now give the House of Commons an opportunity, and particularly those on the government side, to vote against including part III in this legislation and voting in favour of keeping the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the international cultural program separate in terms of funding agencies.

It is our way, as parliamentarians, to show that we acknowledge the tremendous role that social sciences play these days in the future of the country. We recognize the tremendous value of the humanities in developing Canadian culture and that these should be recognized and funded separately from other funding agencies and institutions.

Let us stand up for those people who will build the economy of the future, a knowledge based economy of the future. Let us do the right thing by all accounts and support these amendments put forward by my hon. colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my opposition colleagues in condemning such a move of course. Recently, this government has been making one blunder after another. First, it attacked the unemployed with Bill C-113 and then, with Bill C-92, it proceeded to protect the family trusts of the rich who fund the party. Now it is attacking research and the whole area of humanities and education sciences at the same time.

When just for the sake of cutting $1.5 million in expenditures the government is down to attacking things that are so fundamental for a nation, for both our nations, Quebec and Canada, when it is down to attacking such fundamental things, it means that this government is totally out of control and does not know which way to turn any more.

While it is ready to spend $1.5 million to send a Prime Minister on a farewell tour in Europe it is merging two organizations which do not belong together at all to save $1.5 million.

• (1655)

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As you know and the hon. member knows, we are presently at report stage and, normally, the rule would dictate that we deal only with the amendments before us. The hon. member's remarks bear no relation to the content of these amendments.

Mr. Plamondon: Not only are they attacking, Mr. Speaker, but they are also trying to apply censorship. Imagine that. I would remind the hon. member for Terrebonne that freedom of speech is first and foremost in a democracy. However that is a right he has relinquished, consistently following like a sheep the party line on every bill that was to the detriment of the Canadian people over the past year.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise the same point of order again because we do have rules in this House which require that the hon. members' remarks deal with the substance of the debate, the content of the amendments. It is not censorship; it is simply a matter of complying with the rules of this House. I urge my colleague to comply, and I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to remind him of how important it is to try to comply with the Standing Orders of the House as much as possible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Indeed, as we all know, we are presently debating Bill C-93. I call upon the hon. member, who I believe was making his opening statement, to deal more specifically with the substance of this bill.

Mr. Plamondon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for straightening out the hon. member for Terrebonne who was once again away off track. If he were to review the speech he made yesterday on the same bill, he would see how far he wandered from the subject of the amendments, while I was only making an opening statement and was about to move to the group of amendments in question, group no. 2 which includes 20 or so amendments.

I would like to get to the crux of this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. I hesitate to recognize the hon. parliamentary secretary again. Allow me, I do have the floor. The hon. member has just mentioned the amendments and I think what he said was relevant to the debate. At any rate, I am willing to give the hon. member for Terrebonne once more the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, this is simply to remind the hon. member for Richelieu that the group in question deals with part III of the bill, not part II.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Actually, the debate is on Motions Nos. 21 to 64.

Mr. Plamondon: That is exactly what I said, Mr. Speaker. It just goes to show the hon. member for Terrebonne does not know what he is talking about. This reminds me, I had an old philosophy teacher who used to say, when the class failed to understand something that was perfectly obvious, that it was like casting pearls before the swine. I think that would apply to many members, especially Tory members from Quebec, who have failed to understand the disservice they are doing their constituents by agreeing to be silent accomplices in a debate on these fundamental principles and by voting like sheep, as they did in the case of the unemployment insurance bill, in the debate on the Constitution and in the debate on the referendum bill. What happened to the Liberals in 1984 will happen to them. They can look forward to a crushing defeat in the next election.

Now for the subject of today's debate. I would like to quote an article by 40 academics which appeared today in Le Devoir. The hon. member for Terrebonne may not think very highly of them, but to me, academics are the thinkers of our society. These 40 academics were from the University of Quebec in Montreal, the University of Quebec in Trois-Rivières, the University of Montreal, Laval University and the University of Ottawa. They decided to get together to formulate their comments. In fact, they appeared before the committee at the same time as the Canadian Federation for the Humanities. What did they have to say about this bill? They said the following, in the second paragraph of their statement:

> This merger brings together agencies that do not at all operate the same way. After careful analysis, in 1978 the federal government decided to create a separate social sciences and humanities research council, in addition to the Canada Council. During the past fifteen years, two entirely different work traditions evolved around these agencies. In the field of humanities, experts work mostly in universities. They have developed a system to evaluate research projects and activities which is based on a tradition of the scientific world, namely the assessment made by peers. This has ensured remarkable progress in the training of the new generation of scientists, as well as in applied and basic social research.
> The merging of those two bodies, which the government is now considering, jeopardizes these progress. This measure is a step back, given Canada's objective to develop scientific research. It is an implicit non-confidence vote on the part of the federal government to those who have been working for fifteen years to build our scientific future in the field of social research. Merging the two bodies gives no guarantee in terms of effective support to research in humanities.
> Some members of the federal government have offered verbal guarantees to preserve the traditions of the SSHRC. However, Bill C-93 contains none of these guarantees. There is nothing to guarantee some administrative and financial autonomy to humanities in the new council resulting from this amalgamation. There is nothing either to guarantee that members appointed to the new council will have a minimum of qualifications in the field of humanities, and of course the same would be true as regards the arts.

Today I referred to these 40 academics because my colleague spoke earlier about the arts. But it is the same questioning and the same total rejection of Part III of this bill. And it is unbelievable that some members are party to such a measure which—

• (1700)

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will give me the additional minutes which the hon. member for Terrebonne has tried to take away from me. Nevertheless I will conclude after the last paragraph, which I would like to quote, of this most interesting text by these 40 academics. They say:

> The merger was done without any consultation. This idea was conceived in the offices of the federal Minister of Finance. It was never the object of consultation with the other departments and the councils concerned, nor with universities or organizations in the fields of humanities and arts. This project is not supported by any study on the effectiveness of the councils or on the future prospects in these fields.
> The merger is unanimously criticized by all the stakeholders concerned. Every organization which knows the plight of social research in Canada has asked that the part of Bill C-93 which provides for this amalgamation be withdrawn. This not only includes organizations which represent specialized researchers in the field (the Canadian Federation for the Humanities), but also organizations which represent all the universities. Every scientist sees in this plan to merge a threat to the development of scientific research in Canada. In fact, organizations representing Canadian artists also denounce a merger which does not suit their needs either.
> The federal government continues to turn a deaf ear to the unanimous calls made—

This is what is so reprehensible. This merger comes after hearing all the Canadian academics condemn such a measure, as well as all the people in the field of arts. After the committee heard all these witnesses say that part III is unacceptable. The government talks about the savings which could be made when it does not take into account that a reorganization will be necessary, that leases will have to be broken, and that in the end there will not be a saving of $1 million at all.

It would be a lot better to cut the million and a half dollars which will be spent for the Prime Minister's travels and let our scientists help the Canadian and Quebecois nations grow, and also let the arts grow independently. By controlling their affairs through their board of directors the arts often contribute to the growth of a nation in a way that helps differentiate it from other nations. Here, in Quebec as well as in Canada, we badly need those two bodies. The amendments proposed are to the effect that part III should be overlooked, and it is my hope that the majority of members in this House will support these amendments.

• (1705)

Mr. Jean-Luc Joncas (Matapédia—Matane): Mr. Speaker, before getting into the specific content of some motions that were presented, let me clarify something about the allegations of opposition members who questioned the information given in this debate by my colleague from Terrebonne and my colleague from Winnipeg, especially concerning the potential annual savings of $5 million from this merger as of the third year.

My colleagues specified that this information came from discussions between Treasury Board, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council.

I do not think that my colleagues would allow themselves to toss figures around, as the opposition members claim. We are rather used to the opposition tossing figures around and I suggest that my colleagues find out from the Canada Council or Treasury Board before casting doubt on what my colleagues said.

Let us return to the discussion of what specifically interests us. I will talk about Motion No. 24 concerning part III and the Council's new name.

The provision in the bill is the result of much thought and consultation by the government. We believe that it expresses both a certain continuity, an important factor for future clients of the Council, and recognition of the increased prestige which the Canadian social science community has acquired since the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council was created in 1978.

This is a sensitive issue to resolve. The name Canada Council is meaningful for thousands of Canadians and citizens of other countries who are directly affected by its mandate. It is a short title to which many are attached, both in French and in English, and I think that we should build on that advantage.

This bill seeks to increase the efficiency of government and not to spread confusion about what the future holds for us.

Motion No. 24, proposed by the hon. member for St. Boniface, would simply add to the present English name of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council the words "Arts and."

Some might conclude that the Council's role with respect to the arts is limited to funding research. That is clearly not the case and I doubt that it is my hon. colleague's intention. Therefore I ask all members to vote against this motion and to opt for a solid tradition that goes back nearly 40 years.

I will now deal with Motion No. 25 which concerns the composition of the council or the representation for each of the distinct functions. The wording proposed in Motion No. 25 would lead to dissent. It could encourage each interest group and discipline to insist on having a member on the new council to represent very limited interests. I am not talking only about the arts and humanities but about the various disciplines in them.

I do not think that is a particularly good approach. We run the risk of having official pressure groups on the new council. Such a situation could be a source of division and great difficulty.

Let us not forget that the council's mission will be to meet the needs of all Canadians and not only of the main client groups. This proposal would create a precedent the consequences of which could hinder the council in pursuing its own interests.

The intent may be good, but by seeking proportional representation on the council with a mechanism that is too rigid and awkward, we would set a dangerous precedent. That is why I also ask my colleagues to reject this Motion No. 25.

I now come to Motion No. 26 which concerns eligibility to serve on the council. Motion 26 does not take into account the basic principles of corporate management. Moreover, if agreed to, it could be a source of conflict.

• (1710)

The proposed amendment would limit membership to experts in a field of concern to the council. Therefore this amendment would exclude any Canadians who would not have an academic or artistic background. The Council is a Crown corporation as defined in the Financial Administration Act. It must be organized and must perform like any non-profit or socially-oriented corporation, public or private, which means that its board of directors must act in the interest of society as a whole. According to this widely accepted principle, an appointment to the Board can be based solely on professional expertise or other.

Finally, this amendment could be a source of conflict. If for some reason someone challenged an appointment on the ground that eligibility criteria set out in the act were not adhered to, the government could find itself in a position where it would not be able to make any appointments. If only for practical reasons, challenging an appointment should not be possible once made. Otherwise the board would be paralysed. This is why I ask hon. members to reject this motion.

It is clear that Bill C-93 is consistent with our government's policies to reduce spending by streamlining. I believe that Bill C-93 is a good bill and that the government is proceeding as set out in the economic statement of the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have a chance to oppose Bill C-93 in regard to part III which would amalgamate the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the International Council of Canadian Studies within the already large and useful Canada Council.

Trinity—Spadina, the constituency I represent, includes the large and central core of the University of Toronto. It is a university of about 50,000 students with many important faculties and departments, including the arts, sciences, social sciences and so on. I have been asked by people at the University of Toronto to oppose part III of this bill. I agree with them and am happy to do so. I support the amendments of my friend, the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, who has moved to delete this part and retain the independence of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the International Council of Canadian Studies.

The member for Winnipeg South has said that she favours the bill because the independence and funding of both of these sections will be maintained. That is very difficult to believe. The official explanation of the bill in brief is this: "The purpose of this part", that is part III, "is to wind up the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and transfer its functions and staff to the Canada Council and to transfer certain functions and staff of the Department of External Affairs concerned with the promotion of Canadian culture abroad to the Canada Council." As a sop to the so-called independence of these two groups which are to merge, I quote again: "The Canada Council would be renamed the Canada Council for the arts and for research in the social sciences and humanities to reflect its expanded functions."

• (1715)

We are told that we will save $5 million on administration, but administration at the University of Toronto is not something to be scrapped. Administration of the International Council for Canadian Studies is not something to be scrapped. It is not clear at all and it has not been explained to us how an essentially domestic body, the Canada Council, will be able to take over the functions of those two bodies and particularly how a domestic body can take over the functions of external affairs and carry on the negotiations with other countries which are being carried on at present by the Department of External Affairs.

I have a letter addressed to the Minister of Communications from the Social Science Federation of Canada. It begins by saying:

> On behalf of the 15,000 social scientists represented by the Social Science Federation of Canada, I am writing to express our concern about part III of Bill C-93 and its implications for the future of social science research in this country.

Mr. Speaker, 15,000 scientists in Canada, through their democratically organized representation, have opposed this bill because of part III. They have offered five amendments which have been almost completely ignored by the government in the drafting and rejected by the government in committee.

The fact is that in our modern society we have needs that are not properly reflected in the structure of parliamentary government. Parliamentary government in Britain was established in its present form about 150 years ago with the two-party system of government. Only a minority of men were able to vote and no women could vote. Only a minority of men and women could read and write. An urgent message from Edinburgh might be brought to London in several days by a strong rider on a relay of strong horses and it took six weeks to cross the Atlantic. This was an agrarian society and Parliament as well as the universities were elitist and for the few.

We now have a modern industrial-commercial society in which large segments of the economy and society are not properly represented by the parliamentary system and 295 MPs and 100 or so senators are sent once every four or five years to Ottawa and expected to make all the important decisions for the whole of Canada. When 15,000 scientists say "hold on, you are making a mess of that decision of merging these two structures, we know because we work there" they are ignored. When they come to the committee to speak about it they are thanked courteously, agreed with by many members of the committee, including even some government members and ignored by the government as the committee can be ignored. Some committee reports have been totally ignored by the government.

We need a change of structure, not only internally in Parliament but in the relation of Parliament to Canada. Then a group such as the 15,000 scientists in the Social Science Federation of Canada would have the right to have a voice in making these decisions instead of coming cap in hand and being politely turned away as if it had never come at all.

• (1720)

The other body to be merged, the International Council for Canadian Studies does not have 15,000 people. It has hard-working staff in certain overseas offices who engage with foreign governments and foreign universities in exchange relationships which have benefited Canada in many ways. Now they will be removed from those foreign posts such as London, England. They will be concentrated in a domestic structure in Canada and will simply not have the funding for staff to do the administrative work presently being done by the International Council for Canadian Studies.

The letter from the International Council of Canadian Studies states:

> Moreover, a large part of the money spent on Canadian studies abroad is returned to Canada in one form or another, for example through academic visits, purchases of Canadian books, and so forth. An American study has shown that for every Canadian dollar spent in such a program three dollars are returned to Canada.

That was known in the culture of my youth as killing the goose that lays the golden egg, wiping out one dollar of expenditure to wipe out three dollars of return.

It is unfortunate that for these eight or nine years this government has pursued a policy of no consultation or phoney consultation. Several years ago the government asked for ideas on housing, received 400 beefs and gave no opportunity for discussion of those beefs. The government paraded consultations across the country about immigration levels but never once mentioned its basic intention to change the whole structure of immigration in Bill C–86, the composition of those levels and whether grandparents should be included in the family any more. Those things were never discussed.

The change of treatment of refugees was never discussed before the public. Now we have this foolish change in part III which—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to participate in this debate concerning Bill C–93, which is a budgetary item and deals specifically with one organization. I would like to explain to the House the importance of the decision being made by the government and why I personally am very opposed to it as is my caucus. I am also very supportive of the amendments being proposed by my colleague from St. Boniface.

It has taken the academic community in Canada several years to mature and develop the sophistication it now has. One of the major steps taken by the academic community was to join the government in working on the development of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

I had the good fortune at the very early age of 31 to become a member of the board of directors just after it began in late fall, 1977. In 1978 I joined it and as of April 1, 1978 I was a member of the board for the next five years. Thus I bring to the House not only my perspective as an academic and teacher for 18 years, but my views as somebody who was responsible for decision–making within the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council during its formative years.

I would like to take some time to explain to the House how we built up this organization. Those who follow the House may wonder if this is not an arcane discussion about a fairly small organization. They should consider the fact that we try to build up a series of organizations in this country one step at a time which have the capacity to research and develop good minds, reward good minds, give them the resources they need and at the same time not go around in circles.

Those who have been involved with the creative process will know that if the structures of research are not done properly, it is very difficult for people to develop careers and to have the resources to do the full research. The government at the time decided to move away from a joint organization of the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council because it found that when it came time to make decisions it was dealing with apples and oranges.

Culture is defined in terms of the theatre, music, literature, and all endeavours that are generically under the arts. The organization of the cultural community in Canada, the organization of the arts and the organization of the creative processes of the arts are much different from the organization at work in the social sciences world which although it overlaps is different from what is done in the humanities. Most of it, although not all of it, takes place within a university setting. It requires a special type of organization to liaise not only with the individual researcher but also with the academic community.

I was impressed by the difficult task before us. For example, the university system as members know is driven mostly by provincial considerations. In the 10 provinces there are many different ways that universities are structured. Most provincial legislatures have particular acts. Therefore when spending relationships are developed with these organizations it takes a while for one organization to know another.

I can remember, for example, the question of sabbaticals was handled much differently in highly unionized situations. In the province of Quebec it was handled differently than it was in my province of Manitoba.

As a member of the board we learn from experience the significance of different methods. In the first five years of the board we managed to attract some outstanding Canadians who had previously been involved with the Canada Council. They brought to bear in the new organization not only their experiences in their host organization and/or their private lives but the work done by the Canada Council before that.

We were headed by an outstanding public servant, Andre Fortier, one of the first generations of Quebecers to end up playing a major role in the federal government. Andre was able to bring a sensitivity to the job that was appreciated by everyone. Similarly we managed to attract people of the calibre of Michel Bélanger and Doug Kenny, former president of UBC, who had organizational experience that made it possible for us to make decisions.

The reason I say this is that the relationship between the university world and the federal government is at best a delicate one. We are dealing with questions of ideology, the career patterns of individuals and the distance between Ottawa and some pretty remote universities. It takes a while to build up confidence within both.

We need the freedom to do the research as generated by the researcher and defined by the research community. At the same time I do not have to tell the House how important is the context of public expenditure controls, being a watch-dog organization over how government moneys are distributed.

The objectives are not easy to combine. It is not easy to ask somebody what research they are going to do, have them apply, have their work evaluated and have the money put into the community through the university or to the individual directly to make sure a product is produced and the person's career continues.

At the same time we are dealing with the publishing world on some major projects. We took the initiative over 10 years ago to develop projects of national concern. One great frustration we have as academics, and I think in the general public, is that so much of the university world seems to be esoteric and driven by curiosity in a way that is not related to societal needs.

We started a program to define some national interest projects dealing with aboriginal people and women and helping out small isolated universities. This required us to do targeted research in a very rough way.

The resistance in the academic community was understandable, but we forged ahead and developed a new working relationship with it that allowed the government to have work done that was of concern to Parliament and at the same time it was defined by the research community.

• (1730)

That balance comes from organizational experience and from having some understanding of how that mind works. From my own experience I can say that mind works much differently than those found in the artistic community. It is very different from dealing with, for example, the Royal Winnipeg Ballet. It is a much different creature than the University of Winnipeg. The Young Peoples Theatre is much different than the University of Manitoba. Even when there are overlapping areas such as drama departments we still find the work world is much different.

I listened in committee to the different groups that came forward to make some suggestions and try to get the government to withdraw this part of the act. Government members themselves heard them. I must thank them for the courtesy of listening to my thoughts at the time.

To have worked from 1977 through to 1993 building up an organization, 16 years of working with and finally developing a working relationship, which meant committees, subcommittees, advisory boards and board members who have some interest in this area, were not easy accomplishments. It struck them that it did not make any sense to spend 16 years to move this along and finally get it settled, not with the big organizations but with the individual researchers, and then to take it away.

They do not show any savings if it is taken away. There has not been one report presented to Parliament showing that one nickel will be saved. They do not show it is going to be any more efficient; the work still has to be done.

We have presented amendments, as has my fine colleague from St. Boniface in bringing his great experience in the university community and in government to bear, dealing with the board of directors, parliamentary review, defining the separate roles in these organizations and even such minor suggestions as changing the name and recognizing social sciences and humanities as being an independent and equal groups.

No, that is lost with them. They are turning back the clock to 1976. It makes me so sad that in five years a group of parliamentarians will ask: "How do we unravel this? How do we build up an organization for university researchers?" They will turn back to this debate and ask: "How could these members of Parliament waste the Canadian taxpayers' time and money?" For that reason I object to what the government is doing and hope there is still time to see changes.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the amendment that deals with part III. I want to make three or four points.

It has become obvious that in spite of the rhetoric we are hearing from the Tory party now as it faces a national leadership campaign and the inevitable election and defeat it will suffer in the next few months in Canada, it is saying that it has to have a new style of politics, to develop more consultation and to have more involvement with the Canadian public. That should have happened over the last nine years when it had the opportunity to implement what it now mouths.

Canadians in my riding of Surrey North in the last two or three weeks are simply stunned by this new-found concept of participation, a new style of politics and consultation. A government that has done everything opposite is now taking this type of a stand. This government has refused to consult with people. It has used closure more in this Parliament than in the total history of Canadian parliaments.

It is another example of legislation being brought in without consultation and against the advice and wishes of the people being affected.

• (1735)

The organizations that have openly opposed the government in this regard are the Canadian Federation of Humanities, the Social Science Federation, the Canadian Association of University Teachers, the academic communities and the arts community. All of them say not to do this. They also do not accept the government's proposition that this is somehow going to save money.

I have been in administration most of my adult life. I have had administrative responsibilities for very large organizations, some of them with budgets into the $50 million range and with 350 or 400 staff members. The bigger the bureaucracy the more difficult it is to maintain efficiencies and maintain direction, intent and focus. We had two or three different organizations that represented distinct and very important areas in our society, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council. They are not the same entity. They are not going to have the same priorities, nor should they. They are not going to have the same vision. All we have done is create a big, amorphous bureaucratic blob.

At what point in time in Canadian history are we doing this? I want to talk briefly about a couple of issues on which the public are crying out for more specific research and investigation. In the social science area, the whole issue of juvenile violence and crime is becoming a major issue right across this country from small communities to large cities, and certainly in areas like my riding of Surrey North.

There is the Surrey crime prevention society, which has done remarkable work in the last couple of years. There is the mayor who set up a special advisory committee to deal with this growing and difficult social problem of youth violence and crime. There have been a number of murders in my community. We must have our best social scientists directing their minds, as well as participating with community members, the police, and the public, to examine this kind of issue and in conjunction with the community to arrive at ways to solve it.

I have found myself in a very unique position because I started off working in juvenile corrections far too many years ago. In the late 1950s and early 1960s I worked in juvenile courts and juvenile detention centres. I sat down with the mayor's advisory committee, Bob Bose's committee, a week ago and tried to set out for it what I thought were the changes that had taken place in society which had helped to cause the increase in youth violence. Yes, we had some information. We had some information that had been obtained by proper social scientists and research, but there were tremendous gaps.

The gaps included just little things like trying to document how much of the youth violence and crime is related to drug use in terms of committing of thefts in order to obtain money for drugs, and how much is involved in youth being under the influence of various kinds of drugs while they are committing crimes. We do not have accurate information. What is the role that is being played in the use of firearms and other concealed weapons like knives?

• (1740)

We do not have good information. What is the incidence of foetal alcohol syndrome and foetal alcohol effect as it relates to juvenile anti-social behaviour?

A committee in this House looked at that problem. One of the first thing it called for was systematic social research. Can you see this government saying no, we are going to lump all these people together in this great big blob. Great big blobs produce little blobs. That is all they produce. They do not produce anything meaningful.

We have to look at the issues for juveniles under the Young Offenders Act. What really is the impact of longer sentences on youth? What is the impact of putting a 16-year old in with 45-year old murderers? Is that the effect we really want?

What is the impact on our communities, particularly the urban communities where kids have anonymity? They can get in their car or on a sky train and go to a neighbourhood where nobody knows them. That is not what I grew up with. If I got in trouble in my small town, everybody knew it. Worst of all, my parents knew it.

Mr. Angus: Very quickly.

Mr. Karpoff: And very quickly. Probably before I got home. We do not know what the social changes are. I sat down with Mayor Bob Bose's committee. He gave tremendous leadership in this area. We talked about the social changes that have taken place in the last 20 or 30 years that make it that much more of a difficult problem to deal with. More important, what are the things we should be doing so that this does not become the problem that it is in the United States where each day 100,000 kids go to school packing a gun.

Last year there were more people killed in the state of Texas by firearms than by automobile accidents. We have a government that says we do not need groups of people who are dedicated to studying this type of social problem, we do not need to have a distinct group of social scientists.

People in my riding say this is false economy. Even if there was some economy, which everyone has refuted, it is false economy. This is an important problem. Society and the communities want participation, research and solutions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 21.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

[Translation]

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. As ruled by the Speaker, we now move to Motion No. 65.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved:

Motion No. 65

That Bill C-93 be amended in Clause 137 by striking out lines 34 to 36 at page 50.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject being dealt with in Motion No. 65 was brought forward before the committee by the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada.

This institute comprises over 1,000 patent and trademark agents across Canada, both private and corporate, who in turn represent many more patent and trademark holders.

• (1745)

The institute contends that the merger of the Trademarks Opposition Board with the Copyright Appeal Board to form a new intellectual property tribunal will result in inefficiency and additional cost to government.

I think it is important to point out that this is a massive bill that deals with a number of organizations. It must be very complicated because I believe the government members have not understood the intent of this. I will explain why this is a problem.

For example, for trademark matters, as part of the new intellectual property tribunal the bill contains a provision that in trademark composition no new evidence can be filed in the event that the matter is appealed to the Federal Court of Canada. Imagine that, no new evidence can be presented?

Today if you file an appeal you can file new evidence whereas in the proposed subsection no new evidence may be filed. This is a good example of the government going forward blindly, not knowing where it is headed and not doing its homework.

By removing the lines indicated, as I have proposed in the amendment, an individual would once again be allowed to submit additional evidence. This it seems to me is a most reasonable request, not unreasonable at all.

Under the system today when there is a trademark opposition evidence is filed by both sides in the form of affidavits, written arguments are filed and there is an opportunity for an oral hearing. The opposition board is chaired by a lawyer and two other hearing officers. Trademark agents then plead the cases of their clients before the board.

At the present time less than 2 per cent of these cases are appealed and hundreds of cases are heard annually. The system works well. Le système fonctionne bien, il ne faut pas oublier cela.

What will happen as a result of this bill? We will have a new intellectual property tribunal which hears trademark opposition cases and for which all of the evidence has to be filed before the intellectual property tribunal because no new evidence can be filed on appeal. This is not going to work. This will lead to more cross-examination and more affidavits. It will be the affidavit of the officer, the affidavits of customers in serving evidence and it will turn into a much more costly system.

The government said it wanted to save money. Here is a change that is going to cost it more money. C'est malheureux, c'est vraiment malheureux, monsieur le Président, qu'ils ne comprennent pas cela.

This is why I am suggesting we remove this offensive section and once again allow additional evidence to be submitted.

[Translation]

There is a basic principle involved here. If the changes proposed by the government are accepted—I think regretfully it did not understand that and I hope my friend opposite will reconsider the matter—it will be impossible to submit new evidence. Everything will have to be done from the outset. The result will be extra work and therefore extra costs. Things will not go as smoothly as they do now, so why change something that is already working very well.

There is a lesson to be learned here. The government tried to make all kind of changes and came out with a massive bill which has generated a number of amendments about various organizations, and I believe the government went astray. It does not know where it is headed. It does not have a clue.

The government said in the beginning that it was introducing this bill in order to save money. Costs were supposed to go down, but that has not been proven. Then it got scared because we said: where is the proof? It argued it would improve efficiency. We said: where is the proof? Have you done any studies? It said: " No". Then we started to ask pointed questions like the one I raised a moment ago: " Did you consider this in detail?" Yes, more or less. Obviously no thorough study of the bill was made. Here is a reasonable proposal. If the government really wants to prove that it listens to the people, to opposition members, it has a golden opportunity to do so.

[English]

I would submit that not only this particular amendment but the other ones that I made previously are really quite reasonable. They attempt to respond to the complaints that we have heard. Many people wanted the whole thing withdrawn and the government resisted that even though it was flirting a little bit with the possibility of rescinding it.

We know that and it knows that, but the big hammer of some minister came down and said: "No way". I said: "Okay. Here are some reasonable amendments. If you were a reasonable group of people, and I think that many of you are but you probably do not have a chance to show that reasonableness, then here is an opportunity. I gave you several opportunities with the amendments that were just debated a short while ago which we have just finished debating and I am presenting another one. Surely you want to respect the basic fundamental of democracy and that is that you can submit more evidence if you want to appeal a decision, that it does not stop there".

• (1750)

That is it. I think I made my point, and I hope the government will support this particular amendment, as well as all the others we submitted.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to speak on Motion No. 65, tabled by my colleague, the hon. member for St. Boniface. I am a little disappointed by the hon. member's attitude. It is incredible to see that such a nice colleague, such a nice man is so pessimistic, has such a gloomy view of the future and doubts the efficiency of our measures. I can assure my colleague that time will show that his fears were quite groundless.

As for the savings, the opposition constantly harps on about the money we are going to save with these measures, through streamlining administrative costs. They criticize us for quoting figures at random, but I will remind my colleagues that the figure of about $5 million which has been announced, as I mentioned yesterday in the House, is the result of the discussions that have taken place between the management of the Canada Council, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Treasury Board. I would advise my colleagues, once and for all, to pick up the phone, it is not even a long distance call from here, and call the executive board of the Canada Council which will no doubt be happy to confirm the figures that were put forward here.

It is a commonplace for additional evidence to be tabled before the Court of Appeal and for a new lawsuit to be engaged in there. This approach is very time consuming for the judges of the Federal Court and in general it is a source of useless spending on the part of the clients. The government does not know any other instance when such a practice is tolerated in Canada.

The government feels a provision forbiding the tabling of additional evidence in the case of appeals would only eventually make the Intellectual Property Tribunal procedure consistent with all the other established practices and would allow cases to be correctly dealt with from the start. This principle follows from the analysis of the matter which can be found in the Henderson report, published in 1991, and I wish to refer my colleague to it. It is an important study on the legal controversy mechanisms, prepared by one of the most distinguished members of the Canadian legal profession. Out of that study came the recommendation for the creation of the intellectual property tribunal.

According to government data, between 15 and 30 appeals are lodged with the Federal Court each year. Therefore, contrary to what the member for St. Boniface is trying to say, the time alone spent by judges on those appeals could lead to tremendous savings.

It is a matter of common sense. One does not have to be a genius to figure it out.

Finally, the government feels that as a result of this provision forbidding the filing of new evidence a greater number of cases will be settled before the hearing. At the present time, hearings are often devoted to questioning and discovery which should be of a more informal nature.

The Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada seems to have concerns with the added obligation of avoiding mistakes right from the start. They feel it might jeopardize the livelihood of the trademark agents who are not lawyers. These agents are required to appear before the actual Trade Marks Opposition Board. Now the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada fears that lawyers will be called upon to intervene more often than the agents.

• (1755)

The government feels this concern is unfounded. The increased efficiency of the process will probably allow the trademark agents to deal with a larger number of cases in less time and the lawyers' services will be required for the more contentious and more complex traditional legal issues.

In a competitive context, the success of our intellectual property specialists, including trademark agents, depends on efficiency.

The government has already put forward, at the committee stage, an amendment which dealt to some extent with the concern expressed by the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada with respect to the government's decision to remove the opportunity for a new hearing of the evidence by the court under an appeal from a decision regarding a trademark invalidation or opposition procedure.

Pursuant to the amendment put forward by the government, a Federal Court judge would have the discretionary power to authorize the hearing of new evidence when circumstances warrant it, and this in order to prevent any serious injustice.

Transitional provisions are made in sections 155 and 157 of the legislation, and the hon. member for Richelieu would do better to read the bill, for he would know what he is talking about. Under those provisions, the trademark registrar continues to have jurisdiction with respect to any matter referred to him under the former regime. By registrar we also mean of course the former Trade Marks Opposition Board that has not been formally set up by a legislation.

Therefore, the adjustments to be made by the intellectual property specialists will be made gradually over a long period of time. At the end of the day, such adjustments will serve everybody's interests, because efficiency and productivity are the objectives aimed at by all interested parties.

As for the allegations by the hon. member for St. Boniface that we should listen to people, that is precisely what we are doing. The public has clearly indicated to us that it is fed up with politicians who come here to the House claiming they have innate knowledge and propose major expenditures without any regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay, ordinary citizens, those who work 40 hours a week and try very hard to make ends meet.

We listen to these people, and they tell us that we should do what needs to be done to streamline government, to streamline our administrative costs and reduce our expenses.

I would have thought that the hon. member for Richelieu, who is so close to the people, was listening more closely to his constituents. If he went to see them more regularly and talked with them I am sure that is the message he would get from these citizens, these men and women who work 40 hours a week, who pay taxes and ask their government and their representatives to strive to cut government costs and expenses.

That is what Bill C–93 is about, no more and no less.

The hon. member for St. Boniface is wrong in saying that we do not listen to the people. Just recently we distributed 7,000 survey questionnaires in the riding of Terrebonne and received replies from 1,167 constituents who took part in a budget–making exercise. The signals we got from the riding of Terrebonne were very clear: Cut expenses and reduce the tax burden on the public.

That is what Bill C–93 does. That is why I ask the members of this House, in particular the hon. member for Richelieu who claims to be close to his people, who constantly boasts of paying attention to his constituency, to do the honourable thing once and for all in this House for their constituents; respect their ability to pay. He should stop being partisan and engaging in petty, partisan politics and quit his empty rhetoric. He should do something positive in this House and support a bill to reduce government spending and the tax burden on the taxpayers in his riding and mine, in Quebec and across Canada.

I think that would be the most honourable thing the hon. member for St. Boniface and all opposition members should do, out of respect for all canadians' ability to pay.

• (1800)

Therefore I urge hon. members to reject Motion No. 65 because it is not realistic. It is not in keeping with the intent of the bill, the purpose of which is to increase efficiency and reduce costs.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it certainly amazes me when I listen to government members justifying their actions.

They start out by saying that these measures are undertaken to reduce costs and the deficit. With regard to that nobody has any problem. We want to see costs, deficits and debt reduced absolutely. We have no problem with that whatsoever.

However we maintain that what the government is doing is actually increasing the debt and the deficit. We have heard previous debates dealing with part III of Bill C-93. We have introduced evidence from documents obtained under access to information in which the Department of Finance shows that there are no net savings to the measures this government is taking by abolishing SSHRC and the cultural programs of external Affairs and rolling them all into the Canada Council.

We have demonstrated that there are no savings. In fact, we can assume it is going to cost money. What we are hearing now is that there is a need to move into a new building. There is the cost of integrating these three different functions. This costs more money than was originally anticipated. This is costing money.

We are dealing with an amendment which is worthy. The government is trying to defend its opposition to this amendment introduced by my colleague from the Liberal Party on the basis of cost.

I was just reading the submission in committee by Mr. Robert D. Gould who is a member of the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada. He has a fair amount to say about this section. What this section does is to prevent new evidence from being introduced on an appeal to the Trade Marks Opposition Board. This gentleman says:

> Under the system today, when there is a trademark opposition, evidence is filed by both sides in the form of affidavits, written arguments are filed, and there is an opportunity for an oral hearing. The Trade Marks Opposition Board is chaired by a lawyer, having close to two decades of experience in these trademark matters on the board, ably assisted by two other hearing officers. Trademark agents who are lawyers or who are not lawyers plead the cases of their clients before the board. There can be cross-examination of affidavit evidence, although this takes place in less than 5 per cent of the cases, and the entire procedure is summary in nature and not extremely expensive.
> Less than 2 per cent of all cases decided by this Trade Marks Opposition Board are appealed and hundreds of cases are heard annually, so the system works well. For those cases that are appealed the parties are able to file additional evidence on appeal and, I repeat, that is only in 2 per cent of the cases.
> Now, what is going to happen when, as a result of this budgetary process, we have a new intellectual property tribunal, which hears trademark opposition cases and for which all the evidence, for now and for all time, has to be filed before the Intellectual Property Tribunal because no new evidence can be filed on appeal.
> Do you think there is going to be cross-examination in only 5 per cent of the cases? Hardly. Because this is a person's last chance, I would expect there will be cross-examinations going on in the majority of cases. Then, what about a small Canadian company that is the applicant or the opponent and that is going to file today perhaps the affidavit of its officer?
> Under the new system, where this is your last chance, it will be the affidavit of the officer, the affidavit of customers, and survey evidence, and it is going to turn into a much more costly exercise.
> I estimate to clients I deal with that the cost of an evidence stage of an opposition is between approximately $1,000 and $2,000.

• (1805)

Then in his testimony he is suggesting that under the new system it is going to cost $10,000 to $20,000. He suggested as well in his testimony that now lawyers are going to become involved in the process.

Here is his summation:

> I would submit that it is not an answer to say that this provision about no new evidence is going to be deferred.

We heard the government members saying that they will not implement this right away.

> If it is not worthy of being in the legislation today, or implemented today, surely if it does become worthy at some time in the future, that is the time to put it in.

Basically what he is saying is that this provision under the act that will not allow new evidence to be introduced on appeal is going to cost more money. It is going to cost more money for those people who have failed themselves on this process and it is going to cost the government more money.

Here we see again in this particular provision that the government is going to end up having a greater debt as we see with the previous part III of this bill that abolishes SSHRC and that is going to cost the government more money.

A few weeks ago there was a study that looked at the cuts to the Canada Council. It came to the conclusion that the government was going to lose more money with the cuts to the Canada Council than it was going to gain because of those cuts. This study showed that because of these cuts there were going to be fewer taxes collected and fewer cultural industries producing things and employing people. There was going to be an increase in welfare, an increase in unemployment insurance and the net effect was going to be a decrease in government revenues.

We see how this government's attempt to reduce its costs and to reduce the deficit that it has the opposite results. It is no wonder that after more than eight years of the Tory government's attempt to reduce the debt and deficit we have seen the deficit double because these people across the way do not know how to use their intelligence to start reducing government waste and government costs. Every time it turns around and introduces a measure it only increases the debt of the country.

It is no wonder that after eight years of Tory attempts to control expenditures we have seen our deficit double. It is because of measures found in Bill C-93 that we begin to understand why our deficit and why our debt has doubled over the last eight years. This government in its pigheadedness insists on introducing measures that in the end will cost Canadian taxpayers more money.

It is about time we had a new government.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, thank you for the opportunity to speak on this amendment. Allow me to begin with a short preamble, as the member for Terrebonne did. Looking at us, he said: "Be logical." If we follow his logic in politics, then we can understand why the government is ready to pass such a bill. The member for Terrebonne voted yes during the 1980 referendum. He then got elected in 1984 by promising to bring Quebec back with honour and enthusiasm. Meech Lake was a failure. Twice he called the Bloc Quebecois to join them but got scared and did not make the move. Later on, he said that he would never support a Canadian referendum but he voted for the Referendum Act. He voted against the interests of Quebec by supporting Bill C-113 regarding unemployment insurance. He even became an accomplice by making speeches in favour of this bill. We do not trust his logic.

• (1810)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would ask the hon. member to abide by the rule of relevancy.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I wish you would apply the same rules and, above all, be as flexible with me as you were with the hon. member for Terrebonne when he directed his remarks to me and wandered off the subject of Motion No. 65. I am just responding to what he said, but I will get to Motion No. 65.

I referred to his comment that we should be logical. He also talked about reducing expenditures with this amendment. How can we believe a government that says this amendment will no longer allow the tribunal to receive appeals? How can we believe this government, when we realize that in its budgets since 1984, its global budgets, it has always been wrong? Why should it not be wrong now if it was wrong about those budgets? It means that the forecasts for all the changes it wants to make are wrong as well. In 1987 the government predicted that in 1992 it would no longer have a deficit. We now have a deficit of $37 billion. These are not minor mistakes.

I heard the hon. member for Terrebonne making a case for the administrative reasons behind this amendment and why we should try to cut spending within the tribunal, while ignoring the principles of justice. I think he was talking about better administration. He told me to listen to my constituents. In my riding, people are telling me a lot about spending cuts. People have a lot to say about this, but they all know whose fault it is. It is because this government failed to cut its own spending.

Now all of a sudden it has discovered the virtues of sound administration. However to them the word administration means what it meant to my ancestors when someone was on his death bed and people would say go get the priest so he can administer the last rites. That is more or less what this government has in mind when it uses the word administration. It sees Quebec and Canada as a future corpse it is about to bury under a pile of debt. Meanwhile it is going to administer the last budget rites. I realize why the hon. member for Terrebonne is so confused in his constitutional and economic thinking.

This amendment is necessary because it will maintain the possibility of appeals. We all know the cost involved will be minimal. Hundreds of agents have expressed their support, in testimony and letters, for maintaining the tribunal in its present form. There would be no advantage to changing it. The so-called savings involved would be more readily achieved, for instance, by cancelling the Prime Minister's trip, which will cost $1.5 million and serve no purpose at all. Meanwhile, parties who wish to file additional evidence will not be able to do that. They will have to state their case, without being able to file additional evidence in the course of the proceedings.

We know that hardly 3 per cent of the people who appear before these tribunals file an appeal. This is just one more case of violating minority rights. The government's refusal to accept this amendment is all part of its new vision, a philosophy that permeates this government and influences every single piece of legislation it has tabled.

It is a limitation for ordinary people to go to court just to have better access to the democratic process. We saw it in Bill C-114, when it was done the same way. It had a mini reform not to limit the spending of the money bags that finance the Conservative Party. It attacked the poorest by requiring an ID card to vote and on the matter of prisoners' right to vote. It rammed the bill through in haste on a Friday, using regulations that are normally never used. Why?

This government is blind because it does not see that with Bill C-114 it is limiting the democratic process and limiting the rights of the unemployed with Bill C-113. It is limiting people's ability to come forward with new evidence in hearings. By accepting the amendment from my colleague, the member for St. Boniface, the government is again limiting the people and individual rights which historically have always existed in Quebec and in Canada.

This over-all philosophy that now guides the members of the Conservative Party blinds them so much that they do not see the widespread discontent among the people and especially they do not listen. For example, they turn a deaf ear to the demands of the university people who I just mentioned and who have come out clearly against that bill. They do not hear the humanities federation and all those in some way connected with the arts in Canada and Quebec. They refuse to hear appeals, on the pretext of saving money—which is far from proven—by eliminating the 2 per cent who occasionally appeal to those tribunals. The government is again going after the people instead of the real problem.

This new tribunal will not speed things up, because more affidavits and more documentation will have to be presented and the tribunal will have to examine much more voluminous evidence and that will of course take much longer.

We see that the government's intentions will be completely defeated because the volume of documentation will be greater from the beginning. All the cases were generally settled fairly easily because those who wanted to plead had a chance to present the evidence during the tribunal proceedings and had an opportunity to present additional evidence from time to time at any point. This greatly accelerated the solution. Supposedly to economize the government would prevent the presentation of new evidence during a hearing. This is completely contrary to the logic of all other tribunals.

The member for Terrebonne quoted material from 1991. Instead of reading documents like a sheep, documents which he is given to read in the House as if he were a parrot of the Conservative Party, why does he not find out what his constituents think and get the will of the people, which is completely opposed to this bill?

I see the member for Portneuf here. I went to his riding, and I will share with him what the people of Portneuf said to me: "Do you see our MP in Ottawa? We never see him in our riding." I told them: "Yes, I see him from time to time, but you—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has expired.

On a point of order, the hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, no wonder the member for Richelieu cannot see the member in question, he is never here.

• (1820)

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It is a point of order. Will you grant me that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I would be extremely disappointed if the excellent atmosphere which has prevailed since the beginning of this debate was to be spoiled by temporary vagaries. I would simply point out that the rules forbid us to mention whether or not a member is present in the House. That being said, I am quite willing to give the floor to the hon. member for Richelieu for a brief remark.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, during my first speech, half an hour ago, I was interrupted three times by the member for Terrebonne on points of order which were not really points of order. Once again, points of order degenerate into insults. I have made more speeches in this House than the member for Terrebonne. I have been here more often than he has.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The message did get through on either side. Could we then get back to the subject of the debate?

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I will make no comment regarding whether or not some parliamentarians are here since, as the Chair mentioned a while ago, it is against the rules. Of course, it is totally acceptable, as far as the rules are concerned, to mention whether or not a parliamentarian is in his riding even though that might annoy the member for Terrebonne or some other member. Of course we are not allowed to mention the absence—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is, among all parliamentarians, one of the most experienced and most knowledgeable of the rules. I would invite him to get back to the subject of the debate.

Mr. Boudria: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I meant to talk about the presence, in spirit, of all the members concerning the debate that we are having this afternoon on Bill C–93.

This bill has been very controversial from the very beginning. First of all, it must be emphasized that the government took some measures not by presenting them as good ideas, but by praising them as budget measures. That is how they were announced in this House. For example, and this deals with another part of the same bill, when it talked about merging the Canada Council with another council, the one on social sciences and humanities, there was no evidence, and there is still none today, that would save money. All that was introduced to the House as a budget measure.

[English]

Now we are discussing Motion No. 65 presented by the very distinguished member for St. Boniface. He presented this motion in this House to remove the offensive part of the bill, namely to strike out lines 34 to 36.

The subject of the issue in question was brought before the legislative committee by the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada. I should point out that there are some 1,000 patent and trademark agents across Canada, both private and corporate. They represent many patent and trademark holders, obviously several times the number of patent and trademark agents. The Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada has indicated to our colleagues in the parliamentary committee that the merger of the Trade Marks Opposition Board with the Copyright Appeal Board to form this new so–called intellectual property tribunal will result in what it calls inefficiency and additional cost to the government.

Wait a minute. Allegedly, the whole reason we are doing this is to save money. If it is to save money and this is going to cost more then how come we are doing it? There is something wrong here, something is just not right.

Could it be that the government has discovered that this is not working but it does not want the humiliation of backing down, that the Minister of Finance, who is going to present a budget to us in a few days, particularly does not want to be humiliated by backing down from something he indicated in a previous budget? His selfish pride is more important than the good of the people of Canada. I would not think that, but if I was more partisan

I might be tempted to. I say that to my colleague for St. Boniface. It is quite tempting to arrive at that conclusion.

• (1825)

For the trademark matters as part of the intellectual property tribunal, the bill is going to contain a provision that in trademark opposition no new evidence can be filed in the event that the matter is appealed to the Federal Court of Canada. Today, if one files an appeal one can file new evidence whereas in the proposed subsection no new evidence may be filed. Why is that? What happens in these kinds of cases where new information becomes available? If the object of all of this is to make things more just and better, why are we removing something that exists right now in favour of replacing it with less? As I indicated previously, the institute that I just referred to also says it is going to cost more.

Here we have a bill for which the purpose is allegedly expenditure restraint. By the way, that is totally unproven. It is going to cost more and provide less, at least as it pertains to those particular lines in the bill. The amendment of my colleague for St. Boniface is indeed very reasonable.

Mr. Duhamel: The member for Terrebonne knows that.

Mr. Boudria: The member for Terrebonne who I am sure is listening attentively to these remarks will know that it is a reasonable proposition as well. I know that the member for Richelieu also thinks this is very reasonable. I can tell that he thinks it is very reasonable. I can see it in his face as we are speaking right now. I know the member for Richelieu made a profound speech in favour of retaining the existing federal board. I am glad to see this new-found interest in federalism on the part of the member for Richelieu. I am sure that I speak on behalf of all members of this House when I see this conversion on the way to the electoral box on the part of the hon. member in question.

The opposition board is chaired by a lawyer and two other hearing officers. Trademark agents then plead the case of their clients before this board. Presently, less than 2 per cent of the cases are appealed and hundreds of cases are heard annually. The system obviously works quite well as it is.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: Speak French when you are talking to me.

Mr. Boudria: I am glad to see that the member for Richelieu agrees that we should maintain the current system and keep the federal tribunal as it now exists and which has the support of the member for Richelieu, that great federalist who is well-known in this House. All members are rejoicing at that.

Mr. Plamondon: Rejoice.

Mr. Boudria: I too am rejoicing with my colleagues when I see this conversion—not administration, because he mentioned the word administration earlier—but this conversion that he went through because we would rather see him convert before we have to administer him, to use his own word. By that I do not mean to give him the last sacrament, because since he is converting, he will certainly not need extreme unction.

I congratulate our good friend, the member for Richelieu, for his new words. We, at least on this side of the House, greatly appreciate his concerns for the interests of all Canadians.

• (1830)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 65 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of Finance) moved:

Motion No. 66.

That Bill C-93 be amended in Clause 171 by striking out line 35 at page 59 and substituting the following therefor:

"adding thereto, immediately before the headings preceding section 31".

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, my comments on this technical amendment proposed in Motion No. 66 will be short. The government wants to change the wording of section 171 by substituting the following words: "adding thereto, immediately before the headings preceding section 31".

To understand the meaning of this motion we have to read clause 171 from the beginning. As to the substance of the motion, I want to make clear that this is a purely technical amendment requested by the lawyers responsible for this bill. My opposition colleagues will want to read the quite technical explanation that was given on this motion which was recommended for practical considerations. The only purpose of the proposed amendment is to set the right order for clauses 30 to 30.2.

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to briefly touch on a technicality. First, as the hon. member from Ontario did, I would like to make a few preliminary comments on something perhaps not directly related to the amendment before the House. The hon. member concluded, from the speech I made, that I had found new interest in federalism. Of course, if I consider that this tribunal must be preserved it proves that members from the Bloc Quebecois do not want to dismantle institutions dear to the federal government. While we stay in this Confederation we want to make sure that the institutions which are working well can keep up their good work. However, when the time comes to define our sovereignty we will take our share of that tribunal, as long as it is still in the interests of our people and has not been dismantled, which is exactly what the government wants to do with this bill. I just have a few words to say about the technical amendment. There is not much to say. It is mostly a question of grammar and interpretation. I will focus on the other amendment.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to know if my colleague, the parliamentary secretary, recognizes that the government made a mistake. He only has to nod, because I think several mistakes were made, although the last one we saw was a bit different. Is that so? Am I right?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As a rule, there is no question or comment period. However, if there is unanimous consent to allow this exchange the Speaker has no objection. I understand there is consent.

• (1835)

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, the fact that I was nodding does not mean that I endorse in any way the remarks made by the hon. member. I would like to make it clear though that we on the government side recognize that we are not perfect. Perfection is something we leave to the opposition.

Sometimes we need to make some adjustments. The legislative process that we have in Canada, with all its different stages, including second reading stage, legislative committee stage, report stage and third reading stage, is designed to allow us to make technical or other adjustments when necessary, for the benefit of the Canadian people.

Therefore it cannot be said that this amendment results from an error but rather from the desire of the Canadian government to do things right, as is always the case.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise somewhat amused. First of all I wish to go on record as also supporting the amendment. It is a technical amendment. It is one in which the government corrects what was imperfectly drafted to begin with.

I fully sympathize with the parliamentary secretary's explanation. Of course as human beings, and this being a human institution, we are quite capable of making mistakes. The ability of correcting those mistakes has to be natural.

That is why legislation goes through the various stages. Each stage should be like a filter. We give critical examination of the legislation. As things come out in debate, in consideration and critical analysis those things that are seen not to be quite right are corrected.

I just wish the government would take that principle and extend it a little further. During the debate if the government was really honest, not in a partisan mood, not in a mood of saying this is what we have brought down and this is what we are going to force through, but rather if the government was more open, it would realize the things that had been brought forward in the debate on this bill, whether at second reading, in committee or report stage, that where it hoped there would be savings there was not going to be savings.

Some of the things that are still in Bill C–93 are going to create more hardship and more cost rather than making things efficient and reducing cost. We have pointed this out. Members of the academic community have pointed things out. People involved in patent and patent rights have pointed these things out.

Unfortunately, the government has not been listening. It might have been listening but it is not hearing. This is of course we find unfortunate. If our parliamentary system worked properly and we were able to set aside our partisan differences, then on a matter like Bill C–93 we should have been able to have many more significant changes that would have been good for this country, would have been good for the people, those parts of Bill C–93 which are supposed to serve.

Again, we will support the government amendment. Our only wish is that the principle would be extended as well to other sections and other recommendations and amendments that we have introduced.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

• (1840)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved:

Motion No. 67

That Bill C–93 be amended in clause 17 of schedule I by striking out line 40 at page 82 and substituting the following therefor:

"regulations imposing, on any licensing body, licensee or user".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have an opinion that I would like to put on the record. This would give the government another opportunity to make a correction and respond to the series of very reasonable amendments. I am hoping that my colleague from Terrebonne, among others, will get an opportunity to examine it carefully and perhaps support it.

I want to read that opinion into the record to make sure it is not misunderstood. It reads as follows:

> That the word "assignee" is not an appropriate use of the term in the amendment because SOCAN is in fact an assignee of copyrights. Also, copyright holders should be removed from the amendment because it will spread the liability for costs to all of SOCAN's members since they are the legal copyright holders.

Those are important points that need to be recognized. Here is an opinion of someone who believes this current legislation is improperly worded:

> The problem with Bill C–93, section 17(2) as it now stands is that SOCAN, a clearing house that collects fees for the users of creators' works and distributes these fees to the creators is liable for a large portion of the costs associated with the operation of the intellectual property tribunal.

> These costs as indicated by the officials at yesterday's hearings could amount to well over $1 million annually.

That is a direct quote of an opinion that was sent to me and the government as well, I believe, so it could examine the current bill. There is one more paragraph:

> This is fundamentally unfair since other parties, namely the users of creative works, also benefit from the operation of the tribunal. These parties should also be responsible for the tribunal's costs.

Again, I want to make a plea to the government to look at this. It does not seem to be unreasonable. It seems to have made an excellent point. I hope it will be examined carefully. It would be unfortunate to pass this bill and have to change it later.

Let me summarize the conclusions of the analysis that were done for me on this bill. I would like to enter them into the record.

SOCAN opposes the introduction of those provisions of Bill C-93 that provide the proposed intellectual property tribunal with the power to fix both the costs of particular proceedings and the costs of the tribunal generally.

The process of the approval of royalties for the performance of musical works is not apt for the imposition of these cost provisions. Alternatively, if it is decided that the principle of user pay tribunal must become a feature of the proposed intellectual property tribunal, the statute should be amended to set out guidelines in the statute and not regulations. They should clearly provide guidance to the tribunal and ensure that licensing bodies are consulted in determining the nature and extent of those costs and the manner in which the licensing bodies can pass those costs on to their licencees.

Licensing bodies should also be given the right to appeal any decision that may determine those costs for which they will be responsible. To treat these costs as proposed in Bill C-93 amounts to a tax on the incomes of composers, lyricists and songwriters. It is grossly unfair to them.

There are a few points that need to be underlined.

[Translation]

It seems to me that this opinion, which I think is shared by the government, clearly indicates some weaknesses in this bill. In its present form, the bill is too vague, and that could cause some very serious difficulties. There are principles of fundamental injustice in this bill. I would simply ask the government to consider what was said, what I just proposed, so that I and the people I represent can be sure the whole bill will reflect the remarks I just made.

• (1845)

As I said earlier, it would be unfortunate to proceed with this enormous bill only to find in it the kind of potential errors I just pointed out.

I am sure you will recall, Mr. Speaker, because you have an excellent memory, that I suggested a few minutes ago, when we studied Motion No. 65, that there may be some serious errors in that part of the bill also. The government brought forward this enormous bill, so enormous that it got lost in it. I am beginning to fear that, because I am an opposition member, the government will not listen to what I said. In fact, the suggestion did not come from me, but from someone else, and I thought it made sense. That is why I make those recommendations to the government.

[English]

There are some potential traps in this particular bill. I outlined some in Motion No. 65 and in Motion No. 67 with my amendments. I would like the government to simply look at them. I hope they will not be simply discarded because I am a member of the opposition. Remember that these are professional opinions that have been entered into the record from responsible people who are really quite concerned.

If the government proceeds with the bill without looking at this I believe it would be irresponsible on my part not to call it irresponsible. I hope the comments I have entered into the record and shared in openness and sincerity will be looked at and I will be given some reason why they are not acceptable if that is the case.

Perhaps I am dreaming but I would like to hear some good reasons why this whole series of amendments I proposed would not be respected. They seem to be minimal changes that respond to the needs and expressed concerns of Canadians who have a lot of information about this bill.

I believe I have made my point. I look forward to a rebuttal of the points I have entered into the record. Failing that rebuttal, I will assume that the government supports my amendments.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): To start with, Mr. Speaker, I would say that it is perfectly normal for people to express concern. However, for a member of this House there are always two alternatives: members either fuel that concern or they try to calm things down. That is what I was trying to do for the benefit of the hon. member for St. Boniface.

If this proposal was agreed to, the government would have to widen the scope of the cost recovery provisions in order to be able to charge directly to users, licensees and consumers the costs associated with creative works administered by a licensing body.

SOCAN, the only body as such to stand against the government proposal to charge user fees to clients of the intellectual property tribunal, is indeed requesting that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Boniface be adopted. This amendment would widen the scope of cost recovery provisions and allow for charging directly to users, licensees and consumers the costs associated with creative work administered by the licensing body. The government's policy is to recover the costs from the licensing body which could then bill users according to economic conditions approved by the intellectual property tribunal.

Thanks to the application of user fees with the option of cost recovery in the sector under the board's jurisdiction, the copyright system will operate like many other government services which recover real operating costs from users instead of making all taxpayers bear these costs.

The National Energy Board and the CRTC are two good examples of this practice. Both agencies have the discretionary power to recover costs from users as appropriate, and they do so from time to time. However, the agencies are under no obligation to do so. The United States has a similar system with its copyright royalty tribunal. Here again, there are no specific rules providing for cost recovery from users, licencees or consumers.

I would like to make it clear to hon. members, and more particularly to the hon. member for St. Boniface, that the government's proposal will represent savings of over $1.2 million annually for taxpayers. SOCAN revenues, which are all under the jurisdiction of the proposed intellectual property tribunal, represent about $70 million of the $120 million now covered by the Copyright Board. As new licensing bodies are created, for instance in the photocopy sector, the share of costs billed to SOCAN will diminish.

The purpose of the new provisions of part VII of Bill C-93 is to guarantee that the principal clients of the intellectual property tribunal, including SOCAN, the Canadian Motion Picture Distributors Association and photocopy licensing bodies, will assume a fair share of the tribunal's operating costs. A cost recovery system based on user fees will not come into effect until the appropriate regulations have been drafted and put in place. Details of the system cannot be worked out until the regulatory process has begun. This process will include broad consultation with interested parties and consultation and co-operation between those parties and the government.

It is very difficult to recover costs directly from licencees and consumers who, ultimately, pay the royalties passed on to creators by the licensing bodies. SOCAN alone has more than 35,000 licencees, ranging from major cable network companies and the CBC, down to restaurants and church basement auditoriums.

In Motion No. 67, the term user may be interpreted as including consumers, who total 25 million in Canada. It is preferable to give the proposed intellectual property tribunal the discretionary power to recover costs instead of providing for a system by regulations or legislation. Furthermore, it would be very difficult and extremely complex to develop detailed provisions that would cover the broad range of users, licencees and consumers.

Finally we would like to point out that the only licensing body opposed to the cost recovery principle proposed in this bill is SOCAN. Consequently, the government cannot accept any amendments at this stage. The legitimate concerns of SOCAN can be dealt with most effectively during the regulatory process and through the submission of briefs to the intellectual property tribunal.

The motion is unacceptable because it would lead to a policy that would be neither sound nor practical. It is practically impossible to develop a specific system for billing costs to the many and various classes of users, licencees and consumers for works that are administered collectively for licensing purposes. Licensing bodies will probably obtain the desired results through the far more effective approach of billing costs where appropriate.

• (1855)

Consequently I would urge all members to reject this amendment, for the reasons just mentioned.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I really tried to follow what the parliamentary secretary was saying but I am afraid I am going to have to wait until I read Hansard tomorrow. I think what the parliamentary secretary was doing was just reading out what bureaucrats had told him to read out.

It is a technical amendment. There are technicalities in it. I am not quite certain the parliamentary secretary totally understood what he was saying but I suspect what was happening is that he was given something to read by some bureaucrats. It sure sounded bureaucratic to me.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, I would like to give the Chair and the hon. member who alluded to the fact that I was reading a text the assurance that this is not—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I cannot allow this point of order because if I did we would have constant interruptions. In this House members may differ in their opinions of the behaviour or statements of their colleagues, but they cannot seek a remedy from the Chair.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I was not objecting at all to the hon. member referring to his notes quite often. I was wishing that he would have expressed the concepts and the government's arguments in his own words. Had he done so I think we would have all understood the arguments a little bit better.

The problem is that when bureaucrats write these briefing notes the bureaucrats have their own language. It is a language that I find at times hard to understand. Particularly when the bureaucrats are trained in law they have sentences that run through half the page and quite often are hard to understand. It takes another bureaucrat to totally understand the argument they are making.

SOCAN made a representation to our committee and I thought at the time that it made some sense. I did not think that government members or people from the government departments succeeded in refuting their concerns.

What is the situation? SOCAN represents the composers, lyricists and so forth, the creators of musical works. It collects certain royalties and fees. To establish the level of royalties and fees it goes to the board that is being created here. It has to do this. It is not a choice on its part. It has to go through this process. There is no problem with that and SOCAN does not have any problem with that.

The users of their musical works also have the right to make presentations to the board if they object to this provision or that fee and so forth. I do not think anybody has any problem with that. That is due process. SOCAN goes and presents its fees and then the users who have to pay those fees have the opportunity to give their objections and comments. SOCAN objects to the fact that the cost is entirely borne by them.

The parliamentary secretary is wrong when he states that SOCAN is against the principle of cost recovery and user fees. From reading and remembering its testimony before our committee I can say that was not the argument it was making. The argument it was making is that the cost should be borne by all the parties concerned.

• (1900)

Let us say I am a restaurateur, as I was before becoming a member of this august body, and let us say I have a sound system that works and that I should pay a fee to SOCAN. I do not like the fee but I am an ornery son of a gun and I am going to go on the war–path and create as much trouble as I can for SOCAN so I appeal and do all kinds of harassments. I do not have to pay any of the cost. SOCAN has to pay all the cost. Therefore SOCAN is exposed to all sorts of nuisance actions against it. The people initiating that action bear no costs but SOCAN has to carry all the cost. From what I understand that is SOCAN's argument, and I think it is a reasonable argument.

I wish the government would get off its high horse and listen to these arguments and begin to recognize that perhaps this should be changed a little. It does not require a major change, it does not require a change from the basic principle of cost recovery. All we are asking for is some change to make certain that if a group brings nuisance actions it too will carry the cost and not just SOCAN itself, not just the composers and lyricists, the people who create the musical works. They should not be the only ones that carry the cost of this.

It seems fair to me. It seems just to me. What is the government's problem on this? Why can it not see this? Why is it not more conciliatory, more willing to work with all the actors, with the opposition, with the users of the services in making certain that we have good legislation that everybody can live with? Why will the government not be a little more constructive?

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add a few words on this very important amendment. Once again, it is an amendment from the opposition which would be very easy for the government to accept, since it would not translate into costs to the government and it would merely ensure the sharing of the costs of an appeal before a tribunal for users as well, in addition to collectives or copyright associations.

A nation grows and lives through its creative talents. If a nation such as the Canadian or Quebec nation exists, it is because it has had artists and creative minds in the scientific field and in every other field, especially at the artistic level. This is often what identifies a nation, and it is said that a great nation emerges when its composers and creative minds are at the top of their profession through their publications and the way they are accepted by the public.

France exists and rose through its great authors, the same way the Americans spread their culture through their musical composers and their creative talents, especially in the field of movies.

However, in Quebec and in Canada we are a third world country. In terms of the way copyrights are treated, as well as the status of the artist, we are several years behind, even though the government opposite made a little step forward with Bill C-88, as I recall following pressures from various organizations.

However in this case, as in Bill C-62, we are dealing with copyrights. I talked to the president of the association des auteurs-compositeurs du Québec, who told me how unusual the situation was. For example, the owner of a public place—we talked earlier about restaurants, but we could also have mentioned public waiting rooms or shopping centres—can decide to challenge, before the tribunal, the fact that he has to pay copyrights for musical works which he uses to attract clients and to provide them with the most comfortable environment. Therefore he pays for a picture on the wall. He pays for a chair, but he refuses to pay when he fulfils the dream of those people waiting in the emergency room, in the restaurant or in the bar. Then there is a challenge.

He finds himself before a court, oftentimes on an appeal, and sometimes he loses, but the costs will be billed to the management corporation. In that sense, the amendment is very important since it proposes to add the user to the list and, in doing so, it could put an end to some abuses. Government says it wants to ensure better management, to cut down on expenditures. However if it wants these agencies to spend less it should not open the door to anyone who wishes to challenge anything for any reason whatsoever, however bizarre. Instead it should say: Very well, you want to challenge so you will have to share the costs if you lose your case just like you would in any other court.

This is what this amendment is all about. It would not cost the government a cent. This amendment is a salute to our artists who make it possible for our two nations to come together, a salute to those artists, especially those from Quebec to whom I want to pay tribute, who created that new nation which will soon become sovereign and will join the group of world nations.

It is the same for the Canadian nation; Canadian creators also played a part in the shaping of Canada and when our two nations will engage in a neighbourly—

Mr. Duhamel: You will always be welcome among us.

Mr. Plamondon: My colleague, the member for St. Boniface, tells me we will always be welcome. You will too. Besides, it is obvious that in our thinking about sovereignty we will no doubt suggest that all those who wish to, either Canadian or Quebecer, will be able to get both a Canadian and a Quebec passport. We will also propose an agreement, some form of trade relations as there should be between civilized countries. In any case, trade relations exist automatically among countries bound by great international agreements.

As far as respect for both nations is concerned, I am quite convinced that the Quebec nation and the Canadian nation will maintain a very respectful relationship and will co-operate toward their mutual success.

In that respect, as I was saying a minute ago, before my friend from St-Boniface's interjection, these amendments will allow our authors to have a better income, not necessarily in terms of salary but in terms of decreased costs for collecting royalties from public places for instance. These amendments will allow the Société des auteurs-compositeurs du Québec, or SOCAN, the society which manages Canadian authors and composers, to act more freely to collect as well as to redistribute dues more rapidly without constantly facing complaints from people who have no right to do so since they are using the music, words, material and brainpower of authors.

In that respect, I think the tribunal should also be allowed to decide whether or not to consult users when setting ways to calculate and pay costs.

I will end on that point. I wish that Quebec members, those who are constantly forgetting that they should be promoting Quebec's interests within the government, those who choose to stay within the government, those who represent 40 per cent of the government caucus, would wake up. They should pay attention to what authors are asking of them. They should stop being yes men and become passionate promoters of Quebec interests.

They still have a golden opportunity to do so.

I want to remind them that this bill on which we will have a vote later is completely rejected by the minister, not a sovereignist minister, but by the minister Cannon from Quebec, who says: "No, this bill must be amended". He has made incredible claims about telecommunications. Even his predecessor, Mrs. Hébert, used to say when she talked about the control the federal government still had on the telecommunications bill: "It would be worse than the Meech Lake failure if this bill was passed."

We realize again to which extent, whether it be the unemployment insurance bill or the electoral reform bill, our hon. members from Quebec have an important part to play within the government. Instead of following the set course of action they must try to direct it with the help of their colleagues. We have reached the point of saying that when a Conservative member winks in Ottawa he opens an eye. It shows how passive the Conservative members are in the House. Instead of defending the government, they should defend the interests of their constituencies and of Quebec.

Aagain they miss the boat and they remind me sometimes of my mother-in-law. They stand at the edge of a financial abyss, after the constitutional failure and the economical failure, they wrap themselves in the Canadian flag and say: "I am going to jump and the flag will open like a parachute to bring me to the promised land." This reminds me of my mother-in-law. She dreams that Céline Dion is getting married and the pope is coming to sing at her wedding. Dreams are not for real. I too dream that Chrétien and Mulroney become gas station attendants. However this will not come true. So the hon. members who are dreaming must wake up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member's time has now expired.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 67 standing in the name of the hon. member for St. Boniface. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[Translation]

The House will now proceed to the deferred recorded division at the report stage of the bill which is now before the House.

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the division be deferred until later today, that is until 8 p.m., meaning that the bells will ring for 15 minutes starting at 7.45 p.m. and that the vote will be held at 8 p.m.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been asked by the parliamentary secretary to defer the vote until a later time.

[Translation]

Accordingly pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 7.45 p.m. today, at which time the bells will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[English]

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to speak on Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, as reported with amendments from the legislative committee.

Although the name of the bill relates to tax and taxation it has other implications including health. As I understand the bill, there are four measures being presented in it.

One, there will be tighter controls on the distribution and sale of duty-free tobacco products. Two, there will be improved markings on tobacco products to better identify duty-free tobacco products. Third, there will be the addition of proceeds of crime provisions to the Excise Act and Customs Act to enable law enforcement agencies to seize the proceeds of crime. This could be a big deterrent. Finally, there will be the imposition of higher penalties for smugglers and sellers of contraband goods.

That is the intent of this bill. In essence, by allowing this to proceed it could impose an increase in export taxes and impose higher fines on smugglers and sellers of contraband. As well, it will also help stop tax evasion.

I should say at the outset that the root cause of smuggling in this country is moral decadence and the absence of a public sense of duty to fellow citizens. When that duty to fellow citizens to protect their health is omitted then there is really a danger to our nation.

I submit that when we allow the sacrifice of human lives and greed for money to run a personal business of smuggling then there is really something wrong with our country. We ought to undertake as a nation any means we can marshal to stop this moral cancer.

The implications in this bill go beyond taxation itself. They go to the area of health care. There are also implications in this bill for the tobacco farmers and there are implications for workers in the tobacco industry.

I would like the government to have a multi-faceted approach, not a patchwork or piecemeal approach, to increasing taxation thereby decreasing smuggling and the consumption of cigarettes. These are all excellent goals that we hope to attain as a country.

In so doing there is no doubt that there will be hardships and difficulties on the tobacco farmers and there will be hardships and difficulties on the workers in the tobacco industry. We must have alternative programs for those workers. We must have government aid.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, I think the government should hear what the hon. member has to say. There is not a single minister in the House, and that is against the rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member that no comment on the presence or absence of colleagues in the House is in order.

Mr. Plamondon: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Richelieu on a point of order.

Mr. Plamondon: At least one minister should always be in the House and there is none. When a bill is before the House at least one minister should be here to listen to the opposition. I would like to take this opportunity to ask whether we have a quorum.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We do not have a quorum. Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): We do now have a quorum. The hon. member for Winnipeg North has the floor.

• (1920)

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, certainly the point made was that we would like members of the government side to listen to the debate.

The debate about the health of our nation and the health of our citizens is so important that we ought to have a minister of the government present in the House of Commons. It is a point well taken by one of my colleagues.

Bill C-102 has implications for the tobacco farmers and the workers in the tobacco industry. We have an obligation to those workers and farmers that as we pursue the intent of this bill we do not forget them in our programs. We must have programs to help the farmers diversify their crops during the transition period as the sale of tobacco decreases.

We must have training programs for the workers so they can acquire the skills to face the new challenges in fields other than the tobacco industry.

I would like to state very clearly as the critic for the Official Opposition, the Liberal Party of Canada, that we support increased taxation on cigarettes as part of the over-all strategy to decrease the consumption of tobacco and cigarettes in this country.

This is only part of the over-all strategy. Taxes alone are not enough. We say categorically it is the official Liberal policy that we will not roll back taxes on cigarettes.

What do I say about those who control the policies in the tobacco industry? We have to challenge them and their consciences so they do not direct life-style advertising at our young Canadians.

It is known that if we are able to prevent people from smoking before the age of 18 years they are much less likely to smoke later on. What a tremendous success. I should say to our tobacco industry that is concerned about the success of our anti-smoking policy that we can be a model for other countries.

It is difficult. It is a dilemma because we would like to support the workers in this industry and the source of the product, the farmers, as well. However we have to help them with other programs because the industry producing cigarettes is about the only industry that truly produces a product that harms Canadians. It leads to harm.

The harm to the Canadian citizen starts even before birth. It affects the growing child, adolescents and adults. We know the human toll in terms of disability from disease caused by smoking. It affects the lungs. It causes the destruction of our air sacs. It causes obstruction of air flow. The afflicted citizen has difficulty breathing, yet continues to live for a long time with the disability. It exacts a human toll on the quality of life of that Canadian citizen afflicted with the smoking habit. It also impacts on the productivity of that citizen in the labour force.

It also leads to other diseases. It is a significant cause of heart disease and cancer, particularly of the lungs. When you put this all together it shortens the life span.

• (1925)

After a period of time smoking becomes an addiction that is not easily broken. The government must have programs to help those addicted to stop the habit of smoking.

Cigarette smoking has also led to fires and the loss of homes. The toll it exacts on the human person in terms of disability and illness impacts on our medicare system in the course of delivering health care. The cost of our medicare system would go down considerably if we could prevent a number of illnesses related to smoking.

As we look at Bill C-102 let us not forget that we must also challenge the manufacturers of cigarettes to stop directing their life-style advertising at youth so they do not start smoking.

We should also have programs to help those who are already smoking but not yet addicted stop their habit while it is still sheer habit and not an addiction.

Let us also provide counselling services for those afflicted. Let us have a government program to help distribute the nicotine patch and instruct people in its proper use. We congratulated the government when the change in labelling was passed recently. It is an issue that this critic from the Liberal caucus has demanded from this government since 1989 when I was first elected to this House.

We welcome increased fines to vendors to prevent them from selling cigarettes to our youth.

We should also delete the industries' names when they sponsor sporting and cultural events.

In this position taken strongly by the Liberal Party we have the support not only of those opposed to smoking for the reasons I have indicated, but the support of the smokers who would like to break the habit.

The Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Heart and Stroke Foundation and many other health groups support us and many Canadians in our efforts to have an over-all strategy to help stop smoking.

In conclusion, Bill C-102 is truly a challenge to leadership. When things are good in the country and there are no problems there is almost no need for strong leadership because there is agreement. When hard choices have to be made there is a real call to leadership.

We want to send the message that the smuggling must stop. It is inherently morally decadent and the continued practice of smuggling and selling contraband affects many Canadians.

We also want to indicate that we care about the tobacco farmers and the workers in the industry. When we have the opportunity to form the government after the next election we will have programs for them so we can truly have a consensus in this country.

I challenge this government to seek international co-operation. It must talk to the United States government and President Clinton and tell them to follow our example. In that case there will be almost no opportunity for smugglers to make a packet on the health of Canadian citizens. We need a comprehensive approach.

I am delighted to have spoken on this bill. The Official Opposition supports this bill because we feel it will help stop smuggling to a great degree.

• (1930)

It will help prevent smoking. It will help those who are smokers to stop smoking. I have one last word. We can have all the laws in the land but if we do not provide the resources and the human personnel at the borders to help enforce the laws those laws may mean nothing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

CARRIAGE OF GOODS BY WATER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, April 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Corbeil that Bill C–83, an act respecting the transportation of goods by water, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I just want to indicate that my caucus supports this legislation and will be voting in favour of it.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I too, along with my colleague from Thunder Bay, had the privilege to serve on the Standing Committee on Transport. It saw members from the government side and Her Majesty's Official Opposition, as well as the third party, work together to conclude a process that will see the modernization of Canada's existing legislation concerning the carriage of goods by water by adopting on a gradual basis the two international conventions known as the Hague–Visby rules and the Hamburg rules. Until that committee meeting I did not know what the Hamburg rules were. It turned out that they were a lot more than two all–beef patties, special sauce, lettuce and cheese.

In the absence of an industry–wide agreement on the adoption of either of the two rules the stage approach represents a compromise that ensures that the Canadian law is at least in step, and this is what we had a concern with in committee, with that of our trading partners.

We too will co–operate with the government on the passage of Bill C–83.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I concur with my Liberal colleague and my New Democrat colleague. We had a long debate on that bill on Friday just before the Easter recess and I believe that we reached a consensus. Therefore, I would ask for the consent of the House to move that the bill be adopted on division.

MARINE INSURANCE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–97, an act respecting marine insurance, as reported (with amendment) from the Standing Committee on Transport.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I just had to rise for a moment on behalf of the government to tell all those assembled who are listening that Bill C–97 is an act respecting marine insurance. It is a new act that is intended to provided a very clear legal framework for marine insurance contracts.

The Marine Insurance Act will establish for the very first time a federal framework that governs the relationship between marine insurers and insurance buyers, their rights and obligations under a marine insurance contract and the principles and conditions of indemnity for losses covered by the contract.

• (1935)

I would like to express everybody's appreciation, all members of Parliament, to the transport committee for their excellent work. They worked particularly hard but with a great deal of co–operation because it was helpful to the nation. Opposition members may not be able to say that in their own sense but I would like to say on behalf of government members that the co–operation from the opposition was much appreciated in this situation.

That same transport committee dealt with Bill C-83 and thus saved some further valuable time of the House and the nation for a good purpose as well. The way these two bills we are dealing with had been treated—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I realize that I made a mistake. We have no amendments at report stage. There is no debate.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MacKay (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I just would point out to the House and Canadians who are listening that for a member from Calgary, Alberta, marine insurance in our area is not particularly large. However, the consequences of marine insurance do affect prices across the nation because maritime shipping is an important aspect in the lives of all of us.

I want to say thanks again to the committee and to say to Canadians that the importance of this piece of legislation should not be measured by the length of the debate but on its merits which are indeed considerable.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, before we call the vote with regard to this matter I want to thank the hon. member opposite who expressed his appreciation for members of the opposition on how they acquitted themselves on this particular piece of legislation.

I know my colleague would want to be even more specific in thanking the hon. member for Hamilton West who is a very distinguished member of this House, as well as my colleague from Ottawa South who has also followed this legislation very carefully and with great prudence.

My party is happy to support the subject matter which is before us but I do want to thank the hon. member from Calgary who has expressed his appreciation to members of the Official Opposition and I am sure members of the third party and others for their co-operation with regard to this subject matter.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a couple of brief comments.

We are obviously supporting the legislation as we did in committee and as we did at second reading. However, I think the public does not appreciate the kind of work that members of Parliament do and that there are a lot of pieces of legislation that are processed through this House that are not partisan in any way. They are reviewed in a thoughtful and conscientious manner by members of all sides of the House. They come from the departments. In this case it was the Department of Transport but it could be Employment and Immigration, Revenue or what have you. We look at them and seem them as appropriate mechanism and appropriate changes to bring the laws into today's time.

These two bills, the one before us and the previous one, are examples of that. We looked at them. We talked to people who had concerns about them. In some cases we made some minor modifications but basically they were good pieces of legislative work.

• (1940)

Too often in the press we are seen as combatants as opposed to partners in making Canada work. These two bills are examples of the kind of work we do here on a regular basis.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I concur with my friend from Thunder Bay. He is absolutely right. In short order government members, members of the Official Opposition and members of the NDP worked together on these two bills. It was not an easy piece of work: we had to sit down and had to read over these things.

Obviously we trust each other to a certain extent but there always has to be that check and balance when it comes to legislation before the House. Therefore we spent some time sitting in our offices between the hours of 6 p.m. and whenever we left for home reading through these kinds of things and making sure they all work.

What we found, especially on Bill C–97, was that the main provisions established a statutory framework for the contractual relationship of the principal parties to a contract of marine insurance specifically, for example the insurer and the insured and their respective rights and obligations arising out of the contract and the principles of indemnity for losses covered by the contract. The legislation is essential to correct all the anomalies and uncertainties that make the conduct of business unpredictable in so far as marine insurance contracts are concerned.

I thank the opposition House leader and my colleague from Ottawa South. We worked hard on the bill and achieved something we can be proud of, something that will better the business of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since there are only a few seconds left before the bells at 7.45 p.m., I would ask that the proceedings of the House be suspended and that the vote take place at 8 p.m.

Mr. Plamondon: This is a government without ideas which is not even capable of tabling bills. We are ready, we are here to debate and we have no intention of stopping now. When bills are tabled, they must be debated.

When bills are tabled, they must be discussed and debated.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Since there is nothing left on the Orders of the Day, since there is no bill right now, the sitting of the House is suspended for two minutes, until 7.45 p.m.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 7.43 p.m..

[English]

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 7.45 p.m.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and Motions Nos. 21 to 64 inclusive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 7.45 p.m., pursuant to order adopted earlier this day pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

• (2005)

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The first question is on Motion No. 1. The vote on this motion also applies to Motions Nos. 2 to 20 inclusive.

The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare Motion No. 1 lost. Therefore I declare Motions Nos. 2 to 20 lost.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think You Honour may find that the House would be willing to apply the result of the vote on Motion No. 1 to all other divisions except those on Motions Nos. 38 and 66 in terms of the amendments to the bill.

We would apply the result of the vote on Motion No. 1 to all other divisions except those on Motions Nos. 38 and 66, and then we would apply the result of the vote on Motion No. 1 in reverse to Motion No. 38. That will necessitate an actual vote on Motion No. 66.

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, not to withhold unanimous consent but merely to indicate that in giving it I would expect the indulgence of the House, since I was not here for the first vote, to add my name to the vote as recorded with my party.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. White: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate that I agree but I will be voting in favour of all the motions from Motion No. 21 forward and then with the government on the final motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The House divided on Motion No. 21, which was negatived on the following division:

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

86TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 86th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, concerning the list of members to compose the legislative committee on Bill C-117.

Pursuant to Standing Order 13(1), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

87TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour to present the 87th report of the Standing Committee on House Management, concerning the general list of members to serve on committees in the Departmental envelope.

With leave of the House, I intend to move for concurrence in this report later this day.

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL

14TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 14th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Pursuant to Standing Order 108(2) your committee has considered the examination of the uncensored version of the report of Mr. Gill Rhodes on the conditional release from the Edmonton institution of inmates Gerry Claude Crews and Albert Allan Foulston and other matters relating to conditional release, sentencing and dangerous offenders.

To ensure better protection for society the committee believes that conditional release should be granted only after the risks have been effectively assessed. Accordingly, in light of what it heard the committee has made recommendations aimed at improving the risk assessment process prior to release.

The committee's examination went beyond the original scope of its study by pointing out some of the structural, legislative and administrative shortcomings of the conditional release system.

As a result, there are a number of recommendations to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. The committee is also calling for amendments to part 24 of the Criminal Code of Canada pertaining to dangerous offenders.

Finally the committee recommends further amendments to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act that would allow for an independent review of the tenure of National Parole Board members.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests a comprehensive response to this report in 150 days.

ENVIRONMENT

SEVENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today, Earth Day, to present in both official languages the seventh report of the Standing Committee on the Environment in relation to Canada's response to the conventions on biodiversity and climate change signed at the earth summit held in Rio June 3 to 14, 1992.

This report contains 23 recommendations ranging from the protection of endangered species, habitat, ecosystems and biodiversity in Canada to recommendations encouraging higher fuel efficiency standards for automobiles and a shift to alternate fuels.

The committee also examined the issue of Canada's international commitment to developing countries and recommended that Canada increase its official assistance to .7 per cent of the GNP by the year 2000.

The hearings of this study were critical and were held one week before the prompt ratification by Canada of these historic conventions.

Rio was not an end unto itself but rather a reaffirmation that if the planet is to survive, we must strive toward establishing a new global partnership. We can no longer live in isolation from one another.

May I say in tabling this report we welcome as well the historic actions taken by President Clinton yesterday in confirming that the U.S. will support the biodiversity convention and will set standards for the year 2000 in meeting the challenge of climate change.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1993

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-125, an act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature in those statutes and to repeal certain provisions of those statutes that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Lewis (for the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PATENT REVIVAL (SELEGILINE) ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Bramalea—Gore—Malton) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-421, an act to revive a patent relating to a pharmaceutical product.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Chadwick: Mr. Speaker, I would like to present my private member's bill, a bill to revive the patent for Eldepryl. This bill would revive the original Canadian patent for the drug Eldepryl which was introduced into Canada for the treatment of Parkinson's disease by the Canadian company Deprenyl Research Limited. The bill would revive the original Canadian patent for Eldepryl until June 5, 1996, thus providing protection similar to that now enjoyed by Eldepryl in the U.S.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Chadwick moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise to seek unanimous consent for leave to introduce a private member's bill. I seek unanimous consent because the bill was just tabled yesterday. I have spoken to the House leaders and I believe you will find there is unanimous consent for me to do so.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

CURRENCY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-422, an act to amend the Currency Act (abolition of the cent).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to abolish the penny from legal tender. I think the move is justified by the fact that the penny now costs 1.25 cents to produce, by the fact that hundreds of thousands of Canadians have shown their feelings by not putting pennies back into circulation and accumulating them at home, and by the nuisance value and the delays in commerce that are created by calculation of small amounts of change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Kaplan moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

PETITIONS

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the great city of Kamloops. They indicate their concern with the present NAFTA wording. It is not clear to them that water is an exempt category.

These petitioners ask the Government of Canada to ensure that water is exempt.

CHILDREN

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have about 10,000 signatures of petitioners from Calgary and the surrounding area in memory of all children that have suffered at the hands of others.

The petition states: "We have formed this petition to stress our belief that the penalties in respect to child molesters and child murderers are far too lenient in this country. We strongly request that this petition be heard as a people's vote to reinstate capital punishment for child murderers and to stiffen penalties for child molesters.

If we cannot protect our children from the people who commit these heinous crimes, then who will? Therefore your petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation against this type of offender".

As I said, I have altogether 250,000 signatures that I am going to introduce in the following days. I hope the Minister of Justice takes note of these petitions.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, today being Earth Day today I have the pleasure of tabling a very important petition signed by residents of British Columbia expressing concern about an emerging resource and environmental issue of water diversion and in particular proposals by multinational companies to divert the North Thompson River at Valemount, B.C. into Kinbasket Lake for eventual export to California.

The petitioners are concerned about this particular project and wish to draw it to the attention of Parliament.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have petitions from approximately 2,700 people collected mostly in two days of petition drives throughout my constituency against the North American free trade agreement.

In the view of those who signed the petition the North American free trade agreement has resulted in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada.

The petitioners also believe that the agreement will cause Canadians to lose more good jobs in the future. They believe further that the trade agreement, if implemented, will result in further restrictions being placed on the ability of Canada's federal, provincial and territorial governments now and in the future to assist Canadian industry, conserve Canadian natural resources and advance needed social programs.

Therefore they call on the House to reject the North American free trade agreement and recommend to the government that it use the termination clause to end the U.S.-Canada Free Trade Agreement.

I might say that approximately 90 per cent of the people we asked to sign this petition indicated their willingness to do so.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a large number of people in Surrey and the surrounding municipality of Langley, B.C. and some of the other areas in the lower mainland of British Columbia.

The petitioners point out that the proposed North American free trade agreement will result in even greater trade concessions being demanded of Canada. They are particularly concerned that the new trade agreement will prevent the reintroduction of generic drugs into this country.

Therefore the petitioners call on the House to reject the proposed North American free trade agreement and to recommend the government use the termination clause in the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 404 and 497.

[Text]

Question No. 404—Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova):

With respect to the department of employment's training budget for 1992-93 in Nova Scotia, (a) how much was taken away and given to other provinces (b) how much was taken from each employment centre in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): (a) The Department of Employment and Immigration Canada in Nova Scotia participated in a general redistribution of unemployment insurance developmental uses funds. Nova Scotia contributed a little more than $1.5 million from its initial allocation of section 26.1 and section 25 funds. (b) It was necessary to adjust the Canada employment centres developmental uses budgets by the following amounts:

Amherst	$ 103,200
Antigonish	86,900
Bridgewater	97,400
Digby	56,400
Halifax	356,900
Kentville	91,900
New Glasgow	113,700
Port Hawkesbury	107,200
Sydney	333,000
Truro	79,700
Windsor	54,200
Yarmouth	55,000
Total	$ 1,535,500

Question No. 497—Mr. Bosley:

With respect to the December 31, 1991 deadline for filing applications for the federal sales tax inventory, (a) how many businesses filed their rebate after the deadline (b) what would be the estimated cost to the treasury of retroactively extending the deadline to December 31, 1992 so that all cases of double taxation could be redressed?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): For the period of January 1, 1992 to March 31, 1993, at least 2,650 claims were filed outside the time limit and cancelled. Claims received after March 31, 1992 were returned to claimants with a letter explaining that their claims had been filed outside the time limit. The number of claims returned after March 31 is not recorded. Some registrants did not file a rebate claim because they knew they were outside the time limit. The number of potential claimants who did not file an application cannot be estimated.

Keeping in mind that claims received after March 31, 1992 were not recorded and that the number of potential claimants who did not file an application cannot be estimated, the cost of retroactively extending the deadline to December 31, 1992 cannot be fully estimated. However, for those claims that were data captured, the estimated cost would be at least $10 million.

Retroactively extending the deadline to December 31, 1992 would not redress any cases of double taxation because that date has already passed and potential claimants were not given the chance to file their claims.

In order to ensure that the public was made aware of the federal sales tax inventory rebate deadline, the department published and distributed GST Memorandum 900 "Federal Sales Tax Inventory Rebates" to all GST registrants as part of its initial registration acknowledgement kit. In addition, more than 500,000 rebates forms, which also notated the deadline period for filing, were sent directly to those registrants who indicated on their registration application form that they had goods for resale. Throughout 1991 inventory rebate application forms were also available from all our Excise/GST offices as well as the accounting community.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Riis: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. We are fortunate the government House leader's parliamentary secretary is here. We all remember that during the second reading stage of the North American free trade agreement debate, the debate was limited to only four hours and 10 minutes and then closure was brought in. Could he confirm that this morning the committee studying the NAFTA agreement has agreed to also impose closure and to limit debate during the committee hearings.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, the House Leader of the New Democratic Party asked a question I cannot answer immediately. I will make enquiries and get back to him later today.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there another supplementary question relative to the point of order?

Mr. Riis: Actually it is another related point of order, Mr. Speaker. The parliamentary secretary is absolutely correct. Since it is Thursday, at three o'clock the government House leader will have a chance to bring the House up to date on various affairs. Perhaps that would be the appropriate time to ask that question.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

That this House condemns the government for policies which have decimated the economy forcing company closures resulting in job losses for Canadian workers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have moved this motion today because there is in this Chamber, especially among government members, an air of self-congratulation as they come close to presenting their budget this coming

Monday. They are telling themselves what a wonderful job they are doing and are trying to persuade the Canadian people that what Canada needs and wants is more of what it has had over the last eight and a half years. In my view there could be nothing further from the truth so far as the Canadian people are concerned.

They may hope to camouflage the Conservative record by choosing a new leader, but it will simply be camouflage; it will not indicate any significant difference in the direction, the values and the fundamental priorities of this government and this party.

What this this government is talking about as we come close to a budget in a month with 11 per cent of Canadians officially out of work is the overwhelming need, the incredible priority not of getting people back to work but of dealing with the deficit, as if somehow they could deal with the deficit without getting those people back to work.

It is simply impossible to make any kind of serious impact whatsoever on our deficit problems until the government starts to look at things the right way up instead of "bass ackwards" as it has done for the past eight and a half years. It has to realize the problem is that it has forced people out of work, that those people when they are out of work require income support which leads to an increase in the deficit. The answer has to be to get those people back to work so that we can deal with the deficit problem.

The official figures for unemployment grossly understate the problem. We have done some calculations on the 11 per cent official rate. Our calculations say this. If we take the participation rate which has marked the largest province over the recent period, the province of Ontario, within recent years it has been as high as 70.1 per cent. That gives us a measure of the number of people who want to work in this society.

If we apply the participation rate to the present levels of the potential labour force, we find that the unemployment rate is not 11 per cent, it is 17.1 per cent. That is a much more accurate measure of just how far below the expectations, the hopes, the goals of Canadians the government is falling.

In some provinces like Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia, the levels are even more vicious. If we take this approach in Newfoundland, the rate of unemployment would be close to 39 per cent. If we take the same approach to Nova Scotia it would be over 26 per cent. That is a much more accurate view of the gap between what people want, what people are anxious to be able to contribute in terms of employment and what the government has created as a potential for people in this country.

In the province of Quebec, if we took this participation rate of 70 per cent, the unemployment rate would be 22.5 per cent.

[Translation]

This is a very important statistic. By taking a more realistic approach, we get 22.5 per cent unemployed in the province of Quebec.

[English]

In Ontario, we would be looking at 14 per cent unemployed. In Manitoba the rate would be 13.4 per cent and in British Columbia 15.8 per cent. We are talking about a huge problem, a problem of which the government has simply no sense of its depth. It stands in self-congratulation day after day in this House of Commons saying: "Oh yes, these statistics are going well. Oh yes, the Royal Bank of Canada as it did last year says things are looking tremendous in Canada".

We ended up with the largest number of bankruptcies last year, after the Royal Bank said that things were going tremendously. I fear that the government looks at the world through rose-coloured glasses. It does not see the realities. For instance, it does not see the realities in my home constituency.

• (1035)

These are realities which mean that since 1990 just in my area of Windsor the following plants have closed: Allied Chemical in Amherstburg with 87 workers losing their jobs; A&P retail stores in Windsor, 184 workers; Bomar Coating; Brant Castings, another 114 workers; Chateau Park Retirement Enterprises, another 50 workers; Complax Corporation, 40 workers; Champion Spark Plug Co., 210 workers; Coulter Radiator; Elan Corporation in Chatham, 150 workers; Emrick Plastics; Hunt-Wesson in food processing, 57 workers; Industrial Part Coders Limited, 44 workers; Industrial Platers; International Playing Card Company of Windsor, 35 workers; International Robotics; Kelsey-Hayes, 455 workers who lost their jobs; Motor Wheel Corporation in Chatham, 250 workers; Nabisco Food Processing in Leamington, 87 workers; Newcor Canada Ltd. in Windsor, 66 workers; Reflex Corporation in Amherstburg, 90 workers; Seminole in Windsor, 35 workers; Sheller-Globe in Kingsville in Essex County, 419 workers; Standard Tube in Blenheim in Kent County, 140 workers; the Great Atlantic and Pacific Company, food industry, in Chatham, 63 workers; Tender Flesh Poultry Products in Chatham, 33 workers; Valenite-Modco, another 32 workers; Wean Canada, 145 workers; Wheels Corporation, 153 workers; Windsor Bumper, 338 workers; Windsor Ceramics, 78 workers; Windsor Machine, 13 workers. These are just the plants that have shut down completely.

I could list the lay-offs that have hit all sorts of other plants from Woodbridge Foam in Tilbury to Peerless Plastics, GM in Windsor itself, H.J. Heinz in Leamington, and General Chemical in Amherstburg. My community has been hammered, and it is not just my community. We find this same reality throughout southern Ontario.

Why has it taken place? Ask the workers at these plants and I do not think one would find anybody who will disagree that the fundamental reason this has occurred is the free trade deal with the United States. If we look at our over-all trade balance in goods and services with the United States, if we look at the four years before the free trade deal came into effect, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, in every single year Canada ran a surplus. In every single year since the free trade deal came into effect we have run a deficit, and a much larger deficit than any of those surpluses that were run in the previous period.

In 1989 the deficit was $2.4 billion. In 1990 the deficit was $2.7 billion. In 1991 the deficit was $4.8 billion. In 1992 the deficit was $2.6 billion. This is an average deficit of $3.1 billion, compared to a surplus in each of the four years before this trade deal came into effect. That is a very telling piece of reality.

We could talk about individual cases. We could talk about the case of Wyeth drug manufacturing in my community which has now announced a shutdown. We could talk about what I have here in my hands, a grant announcement from this government stating that it was giving a federal grant to a sister company of Wyeth to expand its production, a grant that led to a tremendous increase in the production capacity in this plant.

• (1040)

The final payment on that grant was made in March 1990. Three years later the sister plant in Windsor was shut down to shift production to this increased capacity. In other words, we had Wyeth workers paying through their taxes to eliminate their own jobs.

There is something gross and scandalous about that kind of waste and unfairness and the human tragedy that results as a consequence.

I could continue. I could talk about an announcement just last week by Inter-City Truck Lines which is shutting down. It is one of many truck companies we have lost in this country in recent years.

This particular one is a company that employs 500 workers. It will keep perhaps 75 to 80 that it will spin off to another company. The other 420 or 425 workers will be out on the streets trying to find a job in this harsh economic climate.

Before I finish I want to talk a little about the group of workers from St. Catharines who were here yesterday. They brought to the House of Commons something in the order of 15,000 signed postcards from across this country. The postcards indicated the concern of people for these jobs that are being lost.

These people asked the Prime Minister of this country to improve the Canadian content laws in the auto industry. Most important, they want him to work with the CAW, the union that represents these workers, to help prevent the closure of this excellent foundry in St. Catharines.

This is a foundry that is world class and highly efficient. It would not even be on the chopping block if not for the fact that GM is cutting back its activities all across North America, except in Mexico where it is expanding its activities. It had to take some of that burden and place it on Canada, even though the plants that were being hit in Canada were significantly more productive than the plants that could have been chosen in the United States.

I have 15,000 of these cards here. They show what the empty parking lots of the foundry will look like. They show the workers of Hamilton, St. Catharines and the Niagara area marching behind a banner saying: "Fighting for a Working Future".

We talk in this country about how people do not want to work. They do want to work. They are willing to go out and fight as hard as they possibly can to get a fair shake, to be able to work in factories they have built up over the years.

These factories continue to make money but yet are being shut down. They are being shut down, frankly, with the blessings of this government instead of with the intervention of it to try to deal with the problem.

One of the other postcards that is included in this group of three they received from so many people in the area simply has a picture of a little girl saying: "My daddy wants his job".

• (1045)

That is what it comes down to, except it is not just her daddy but it is also her mommy. They are not just jobs for the moment, they are jobs for the future.

The minister of industry in this government met with people in St. Catharines and said that he would set up a meeting with the General Motors people in Detroit for the leaders of the fight-back group in St. Catharines. Yet he has refused to follow that up. He has refused to put into effect any of the promises he made to this group of workers.

This is not right. There are so many things we could be doing in this country. We could be intervening to provide some leadership, to try to keep plants that are making a contribution to companies and our country open. We could have new Canadian content regulations and regulations in other areas like the trucking industry that would give us hope for the future.

We could say to the governments of the United States and Mexico that we are not going to proceed with free trade with Mexico because that will make things worse for our country and our workers. We could say, as the Conference Board of Canada suggested today, let us have a community based development effort. Let us have a national investment fund which works through communities to help develop local community initiatives to keep plants like this foundry operating, to keep plants like Wyeth in Windsor operating, to see to it that profitable companies are not simply permitted to desert our communities and leave our workers in the lurch.

We could do these things if we only had compassion from this government, if we only had a sense of caring, and a sense of believing that we can make a difference. We believe that Parliament can make a difference, that government can make a difference, but only if government is prepared to listen to people and make the needs and concerns of people central to the agenda of this place.

As a result of the fact that I think the needs and concerns of people need to be central to the agenda of this place I want to take these postcards to the Prime Minister's desk and leave them for him. He should see these postcards addressed to him and should recognize the 15,000 people in this country who are asking for his intervention to make things better for them and better for the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I do not see why the hon. member who just started his speech put a bundle of so-called postcards on the Prime Minister's desk in his absence. The postcards should have been delivered to the Chair through the Clerk's office.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would appreciate if the table officers took the cards off the table.

• (1050)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, again I want to say that I appreciated many of the remarks of the member for Essex—Windsor who spoke just a few moments ago.

I am one who believes that government can make a difference, that government has a leadership role to play in the economy, and certainly a different kind of leadership role than the one provided by this government. I totally reject the trickle-down theory. The philosophy of this government when it comes to the economy is leave it to the private sector, leave it to the big boys, leave it to trickle down and somehow out of that a miracle will be performed and all the investment decisions will be right, all the job decisions will be right and everyone will prosper and benefit from that kind of loose economic philosophy. All we have to do is look around at the carnage and the results of the past eight or nine years and we can say that that kind of economic policy does not work.

Not only does the government, in my opinion, have a responsibility to make a difference, but I also believe that people want to work. I do not think people in the main are laggards, lazy bums who want to avoid their responsibilities and avoid making their own way through life. They want a job. How many times have we heard accounts in the past few years about companies giving notice of a job vacancy, one job, two jobs, maybe three or four jobs and the applications for those jobs came pouring in by the hundreds?

In recent weeks a job vacancy was brought to my attention. It was not a job that paid a lot of money. In fact, it offered less than $30,000 a year and in these days $30,000 annual income is not a lot. It was unbelievable the number of job applications that poured into that office. That to me indicates that people really want to work. This notion that if people would just apply themselves and just get off their fannies and look for a job that those jobs will be there is not true. Sure, there are always a few in the economy who for some reason or other do not want to fend for themselves and who do not want to work, but I think that in the main those people are few and far between.

I thought maybe the speaker had left. I wanted to hear a little bit more from him with respect to his talk about the so-called participation rate because I believe too that the current unemployment figures are illusory. I do not believe that the unemployment rate is just 11 per cent or 11.5 per cent. I think that a lot of people have simply given up and they have left the job market. They have left the economy because they have looked and looked and they cannot find anything. I would like to hear a little bit more from the speaker on that, whether he finds evidence that a lot of workers have been out of the work force for many months, perhaps even a few years and they have just given up. They are no longer looking for a job and they are not counted in the unemployment figures.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, on the last question which was put by the member for Winnipeg St. James, there are statistics which are collected on discouraged workers. Those statistics have some problems associated with them because in a sense they require people to do a kind of a psychoanalysis of themselves. I think the best approach, the most honest approach is to ask what do we know, what has been shown to us by the economic history of our country? Take a large province like the province of Ontario. We could take the province of Manitoba too but in some ways it is a little fairer to take the province of Ontario because it is a large and relatively diverse province.

We can ask ourselves what do we know from history, not from people being asked to analyse themselves, but what is the record as far as the percentage of people who want to participate in the labour force?

We can find that out by looking over recent years and discovering a level of participation which has been achieved. Within the last three or four years the level we have seen has been upward of 70 per cent in the province of Ontario.

The province of Ontario has a somewhat different structure of its economy from the provinces of Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Harvard: Because of manufacturing.

Mr. Langdon: Because it is a manufacturing area, because there is less primary production, but there still is a fair amount of primary production too in Ontario. You are getting a fairly balanced picture I think with that figure.

When you apply that figure and say okay that is a fair measure of what Canadians across the country would like to see as their level of participation in the labour force, you will also get a measure of the potential labour force we are really talking about in this country.

You measure the actual unemployment rate plus the difference that you get between the present participation rate and the 70 per cent participation rate. As I say you come up with extremely dramatic figures. It is a 17.1 per cent as an unemployment rate right across the country.

The point that is interesting is that it does not even take into account the number of people who are in part-time jobs who would like to be in full-time jobs. If you took those into account you would probably be looking at an unemployment rate of at least 20 per cent in this country and that is staggering. Across this country we are failing to meet our potential by a 20 per cent level.

From a human point of view, as the Catholic bishops talked about it, that is appalling. Even from the point of view of a hard-headed economist, which I used to pretend to be, it is a gross waste of human resources to have that many people who want to work, especially at a time when you have underemployed capital equipment, not working.

We have a real problem in this economy and the problem is not the financial deficit. The problem is that we are not coming at all close to living up to our human potential or our economic potential.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's motion is one of those sweeping statements opposition members are so fond of making. With all due respect, I would like to suggest that opposition members take a good look at some of the very concrete efforts made by our government to get the Canadian economy on the right track.

The hon. member's motion gives the totally false impression that our government has been waiting around without doing a thing. Canadians know that is not the case. We are making very specific and concerted efforts to deal with Canada's economic problems and to encourage businesses to invest in this great country of ours.

Our government offers a number of programs that are starting to show good results. The situation cannot change overnight. There are no instant solutions, but we are making progress.

• (1100)

I realize that some people think economic growth depends on the government. However, the vast majority of Canadians realize that the true source of wealth and prosperity in this country lies in the determination of Canadians, of people confident in their ability to work hard and take the risks inherent in any business venture.

In other words, we cannot legislate prosperity. Prosperity is the result of market forces, and the private sector is in the best position to create it. That is the philosophy behind the agenda the government formulated when it came to power in 1984 and which it has been following ever since.

Since 1984 we have concentrated on implementing the fundamental changes that were necessary to build a more competitive, more market-oriented economy with less government intervention and a more effective and efficient economy that would stimulate investment and job creation.

We privatized more than 20 Crown corporations. This has helped reduce the number of federal employees by 90,000 since 1984.

We took steps to eliminate or restructure 46 federal agencies, boards and commissions.

We embarked on a wide-ranging regulatory review to eliminate all federal regulations that constituted undue barriers to private initiative or were no longer in the public interest. For instance, Agriculture Canada reviewed 58 sets of regulations. Fifteen were eliminated, in whole or in part, and four are being sunsetted and 38 will be modernized.

We are working on reducing overlap and duplication in federal departments and in areas shared with other levels of government.

We deregulated the financial services sector to promote competition and give financial institutions a chance to be more effective, both on Canadian and international markets.

We revamped Canada's bankruptcy laws to make them fairer and more equitable.

We improved and liberalized the investment climate in this country. For instance, we eliminated the Foreign Investment Review Agency and created Investment Canada, which has a far more concrete, positive and dynamic perspective, to attract investment to this country instead of thwarting them.

We deregulated the transportation and energy sectors which included eliminating the disastrous National Energy Program with its punitive taxes and rigid constraints on investment.

However, our efforts to create a climate conducive to private sector activity go far beyond tax reform and deregulation.

As far as inflation is concerned, we applied the basic economic principle that sustained economic growth goes hand in hand with price stability.

Inflation must be low, if we are to enjoy low interest rates. Lower capital costs stimulate investment by high-growth businesses, competitive businesses that create the jobs Canada needs.

We have taken vigorous steps by clearly setting publicly stated objectives and by applying a policy of wage restraint throughout the federal government in order to reduce inflation.

We have been successful. In 1992, inflation averaged 1.5 per cent, the lowest figure in 30 years. As a result we saw a spectacular drop in the bank rate which went down 8.5 points from its peak level in May 1990. Interest rates are now at their lowest levels in 20 years.

For a business that borrows $100,000 repayable over 10 years, this drop in interest rates will mean a savings of about $475 per month.

Consumers also benefit. Some mortgage rates are now as low as 5.75 per cent something we have not seen in 35 years.

• (1105)

I would also like to point out that the difference between the prime rate in Canada and the United States has fallen to 0.25 per cent, from 4.75 per cent in May 1990. The Bank of Canada rate has also fallen to 5.56 per cent, more than 3 per cent below its recent peak last November.

We have completed our efforts to make Canada a welcoming country for business people by reducing barriers to foreign trade, in particular by submitting to this House a bill to extend the benefits of free trade between Canada and the United States to the whole continent with NAFTA.

My colleagues on the other side of the House want to make all Canadians believe that the FTA is a failure. They would no doubt have them believe that the earth is flat. Let me remind them of some basic facts about the FTA.

These are actual facts and not myths that I will mention. Last year Canadian businesses sold a record $122.3 billion of goods to the United States. That was done by people, workers who have confidence in their abilities, optimists, builders. With them we will continue to make our mark on the world market and will remain a very great country.

Our total merchandise exports rose to $157.5 billion, an increase of nearly 21 per cent since the agreement took effect. In 1991 the increase was 11 per cent, the largest annual growth since 1984. These results continued in January because we had a monthly trade surplus of $22.8 billion, the highest since 1985.

Our success should not make us rest on our laurels. Given the persistent weakness in the world economy, growth and job creation in Canada are not as strong as we would all like.

No company, no industry and no country can escape the challenges of the outside world. In no way can the government stifle the forces of change, as the hon. opposition member's party very soon realized when it took power in Ontario.

Everywhere, in Canada or abroad, businesses are going through a period of thorough change and restructuring.

For many companies and their employees, the process is painful. It has forced some companies to downsize and many others to slow down job creation since cost control is essential to greater competitiveness.

Nevertheless, the difficulties accompanying this process must not make us forget that the thorough changes that industry is undergoing today are nothing new for Canada. This is far from the first time that Canada must adjust to fundamental economic changes.

In the 1940s, agriculture provided one quarter of the jobs in Canada; now it is less than 4 per cent. However, we produce more and better food and commodities and all Canadians, including farmers, enjoy a much higher standard of living than their parents did. The same process is going on these days in manufacturing.

Therefore when we are faced with economic changes it is more important than ever to understand what they mean for Canada and what they do not mean. For example, the current decline in employment in manufacturing is not a symptom of fundamental decline in the economy. It does not mean that the FTA was a mistake either.

In fact, the proportion of jobs in manufacturing in Canada has been decreasing since the early 1950s. That did not prevent this sector from nearly tripling its production in the same period.

At the same time we have witnessed remarkable growth in high-technology industries and the service sector in Canada. These industries will be the base of the economy in the 21st century by selling their know-how right here and throughout the world. We can be winners in the new economy. We have tangible proof of that.

• (1110)

The electronics industry employs more people than the pulp and paper industry in Canada.

Today there are more jobs in communications and telecommunications in this country than in the oil and mining industries combined.

In Alberta more people are employed in financial services, including insurance and real estate, than in the oil and gas industry.

That is a fact. An economy is never static. Job content, job supply, corporate structure, types of business, sources of wealth, all these are constantly changing.

This means there is only one way to ensure financial success and it is only open to those countries which do what must be done to grasp new opportunities when they arise even, and especially, when hard choices have to be made.

One area where hard choices have to be made is the way taxpayers' money is spent, taking into account the need to invest in the future and at the same time control government spending.

With regard to investment, we are working toward building a better future for all Canadians by favouring investments capable of adding value to our natural resources and human resources as well. For instance, last year we changed the rules relating to R and D tax incentives to better reflect how businesses spend their money in that area. These changes will translate into an extra $250 million in assistance over five years. And we are currently contemplating other changes to provide another $400 million.

We also know that to make the most of our R and D efforts we must rely on an increasingly skilled labour force. To face this challenge we are increasing manpower adjustment and training assistance. During the next fiscal year we will spend $3.8 billion on that, over 65 per cent more than in 1990-91.

In addition, we have lowered the tax rate on manufacturing in Canada so that Canadian manufacturers can better compete with their American counterparts. We have implemented extensive measures to help the key small business sector.

However, such investments must not be made at the expense of increasing government deficits. Concern for the public debt at all levels has become a common theme with most of the people who were consulted throughout the country as part of the budget preparation process.

More and more Canadians understand how the money borrowed to cover deficits at all levels of government is now strongly pushing interest rates and taxes upward. People are realizing that we simply cannot let that get in the way of growth, investment and job creation.

To curb these pressures, our government has taken drastic measures: bringing the rate of spending growth below the rate of inflation; putting reasonable limits on the growth of federal transfers to the provinces; implementing the Spending Control Act which sets strict limits on the annual growth of most program expenditures; cutting by nearly 50 per cent the deficit as a percentage of the Canadian economy. Since 1984-85, we have reduced our program expenditures by $118 billion.

If it had not been for these measures, the deficit would now have reached $82.5 billion, two and a half times what it is.

In spite of these measures, compound interest on the national debt we inherited continues to put a strain on government finances. Added to this, the recent economic slump has dealt our finances quite a blow, especially on the revenue side.

That is why, in his economic statement back in December, the Minister of Finance announced a wide range of measures to further reduce federal expenditures by $8 billion during the current fiscal year and the next two.

For instance, there will be a two-year freeze on the salaries of cabinet ministers, members of Parliament and civil servants. Incidentally, this is the fifth time since 1985 that ministers and members of Parliament have had to accept salary restrictions or reductions.

• (1115)

The operating budgets of the departments have been reduced by 5 per cent, based on the levels anticipated for the next two years.

For National Defence alone, the salary freeze and the operating budget reduction will translate into savings of about $1.3 billion for taxpayers.

We have taken carefully targeted measures regarding the unemployment insurance program. Working Canadians cannot afford to subsidize those who quit their jobs without just cause.

Finally, we are reducing by 10 per cent federal grants and contributions.

Through these measures we do what is necessary to meet the challenge of public finances in Canada. We must not only live according to our means. We must also repair the damage done when we lived above our means.

Real, basic progress toward the solution of the problem posed by the national debt must be based on the two pillars which we want to strengthen in the budget to be tabled next Monday.

Economic growth and increased revenue will not be enough to solve the problem. Governments must control their expenditures.

We also need a consistent and co-ordinated action plan at the national level. We will not get anywhere if a level of government reduces its taxes while another level does the opposite.

The solution is simple. Growth, investment and long-term job creation depend on the ability to control deficits in the public sector. Our government intends to play the active role of national leader as regards budget co-ordination and economic co-operation. This includes eliminating the barriers to domestic trade, a necessary measure to strengthen our economic union and truly improve the well-being of Canadians.

I spoke today of the challenges which we must face in order to control the rapidly changing economy of the 21st century. This economy can be compared to a new and promising country, in the sense that it offers vast possibilities to the pioneers who are ready to face the unknown in order to take advantage of all this untapped potential.

Canadians can take advantage of these possibilities and they will do it successfully by creating the new quality jobs that go along with the latter, provided we preserve and strenghten the foundations of a competitive and highly productive economy put in place by our government.

However, we will miss out on these possibilities and we will find ourselves facing even greater economic problems if we opt for the solutions put forward by the members of the opposition. These policies would lead us to greater debt and tax burden, while preventing us from doing trade with our main business partner. To implement such policies would be tantamount to returning to the past, ignoring the present, and giving up on the future.

This is not the road Canada must take. On the contrary, according to the OECD, the policies implemented by our government have put us on the right track to enjoying the strongest growth among the largest industrialized countries, this year as well as next year. Canadians deserve that and nothing less.

[English]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, today in Canada we face what I think are very desperate economic circumstances.

We have seen how Canada has been deindustrialized over the past four years. We have seen the loss of 319,000 manufacturing jobs or 15 per cent of all Canada's manufacturing jobs. Unless one is blind, one cannot attribute this entirely to global forces beyond our control. If that were the case, how would we explain that during the same period of time the United States lost only 7 per cent, not 15 per cent of its manufacturing jobs? In Ontario we have lost 185,000 manufacturing jobs or 18 per cent. In Quebec the figure is 115,000 or 19 per cent of its manufacturing jobs.

• (1120)

[Translation]

In Montreal's east end the unemployment rate now stands at 25 per cent. This is terrible. Everywhere else in Canada, the rate is 11 per cent.

[English]

One million five hundred and forty thousand Canadians are actively seeking work, but as the Catholic Conference of Bishops told us this is only the tip of the iceberg. Their estimate is that close to four million Canadians are now seeking full-time employment and cannot get it. This includes our official unemployment figures. It includes those who stopped looking for jobs because they just are not there and those part-time workers who seek full-time employment. This is indeed a desperate situation.

Why do we find ourselves in this position? We have seen a Conservative monetary policy which has emphasized controlling inflation at the expense of growth and jobs. We have seen a Tory fiscal policy over the past eight years with 33 tax increases, including the GST, making us a much higher tax jurisdiction than our major competitor, the United States. Yet, have they been able to bring the deficit under control? No. Our national debt is not the $165 billion that it was when they took office in 1984. It is now $450 billion, much of that now controlled by foreigners so that the interest payments made on our debt go out of Canada, that are reinvested abroad and produce no tax revenue, not even withholding tax revenue as it is paid to foreigners.

We have seen a trade policy brought in. Our party is not against liberalized trade. We know that it has benefits. We have always been the party of freer trade, but they gave us a trade deal without programs for adjusting to the new realities to help our workers compete. They have given us a trade program without definitions of subsidies or anti-dumping.

What happens? New investment to service the North American market has not come to Canada because Canadians are now facing unprecedented trade harassment. On the Honda issue alone there was no binding arbitration available. What manufacturers will want to establish themselves in Canada when even if we can win a trade dispute one or two years down the road through a binational panel they are still subject to that harassment of preliminary duties and everything else?

We have seen in the province of Ontario how its introduction of new labour legislation has created a chill on investment. We have also seen that because so much of Canadian manufacturing and production is controlled by foreigners that when there is a global downturn in the economy, Canada suffers more than others. Head offices abroad will close down Canadian branch plants before they will sacrifice workers in their home jurisdiction.

As Mickey Cohen, former deputy minister of finance said a short time ago in Toronto, we now face the incredible problem where we are a high wage nation but we could be doomed to being a high unemployment nation. This is one of the incredible challenges that we face. Not in the nine years of Tory management of our economy have we had the comprehensive view of Canada's role in a global economy and how we could maintain high wage, high value added jobs with a high level of employment as well. What is the legacy? Not only the deindustrialization and the high levels of permanent unemployment we face but also since 1989 Canada's ability to compete has fallen from fourth to eleventh place in the world.

• (1125)

Since 1984 when this government took office our trade surplus has gone from $19.8 billion down to $7.4 billion. In 1984 we had a $1 billion surplus in high tech trade; today we have a $30 billion deficit in high tech goods and services. What does this say to our young people who want to enter the Canadian work force? Why are we falling behind so quickly on a global basis?

Even worse perhaps is that our manufacturing productivity is now growing under Tory economic policies at only two-thirds the rate of that of our major competitors, the G-7 countries.

Is despair the only thing we can offer close to four million Canadians who want high paying permanent jobs and do not have them? I believe there are some solutions available to us. What we have to tackle immediately is investing in Canada's human resources. We have to deal with the 40 per cent of Canadians who today do not have either the literacy or the mathematical skills to deal with the requirements of modern jobs. We have to deal with an education system that is producing a 30 per cent high school drop-out rate and yet there are no skills training as an alternative for these young people. We have the Mexican challenge where our new potential trade partner is graduating four times as many engineers and scientists as we are in Canada. We have the incredible problem where our level of research and development, 1.37 per cent of our gross domestic product, is less than half that of our major competitors. It is a level that is falling rather than rising.

These are areas where we need the long-term investments by the public and private sector working in close co-operation to recreate the human capital base which is so critical to giving us those high wage, high value added jobs in the future. This has not been done. This issue has not been taken on by our government.

In the short term there is still a great deal that we could be doing as federal politicians in Canada. First of all we have close to one million small businesses in Canada. If only half of those small businesses over the next two years could add one more employee we could get rid of 500,000 unemployed. We know that the biggest problem that these small businesses face is that many of them have not had access to the capital or the bridge financing or the financial means necessary to get through this made-in-Canada recession.

This is why the Liberal Party is proposing new means for helping these small businesses survive and expand.

Second, why is it that Canada exports so much of its raw natural resources, its primary resources, and buys back finished goods from our foreign competitors? This is why we propose the immediate establishment of a primary industry's enhancement council that will work with our primary industry manufacturers in food, forest, sea, mining, energy, whatever, to produce more value added goods here in Canada, more downstream goods. Add the value here. Do not give away our resources holus-bolus to our foreign competitors so they can create jobs with them.

• (1130)

This is why, in order to deal with the decline in our manufacturing productivity, we are calling for the establishment of a manufacturing productivity council which will use private sector consultants to go to our small and medium size manufacturers to show them world class techniques for expanding their productivity and exports.

This is not a give-away program because the manufacturers will repay the government for these studies out of enhanced productivity, enhanced profits and enhanced exports. It would be a self-funding program with no bureaucracy because we are not going to use bureaucrats. We will be using the best private sector knowledge that is available.

This is why we have called on the government to work in close co-operation with the Canadian Manufacturers Association which has initiated a program for Canada called The ISO-9000 Series program. It is a program adopted throughout the European Community in order to bring up the quality standards of European manufacturers. Yet this government has refused to enter into a cooperative joint venture program with the CMA to bring these same quality standards to Canada.

The situation, if allowed to continue, is going to create more and more desperation. There is hope. There are things we can do. Let us adopt a comprehensive economic strategy so that our young people and our unemployed workers can wake up tomorrow with hope.

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, I was most disturbed with the hon. member's comments about a made-in- Canada recession. He knows, as I know and as Canadians and people around the world know that we are dealing with a global recession.

Last summer in May and June I had the privilege of having a student from the University of Michigan working in my office. I am going to have another one this summer. Last summer's student, Robert Tyson, went back to the States and last October wrote a letter to the Prime Minister and sent me a copy. In it he says:

> I also believe that the criticism your government receives for the poor world economy is unfair. Over here things are just as bad. My own father is one of hundreds to lose his white collar job from a company that has not let workers go in living memory. This occurred despite his 20 years of seniority. My college friends and I have had difficulty finding summer jobs, succeeding only where friends or family members could pull strings for us.
> It is humorous to come back to the United States and hear all of the same complaints about the North American free trade agreement but to hear them coming from Americans. I understand that Canadians are afraid that their jobs will move south to America but Canadians should know that Americans are just as afraid that their jobs will move north.

The hon. member should recognize that the United States has lost more than one million manufacturing jobs since January 1, 1989. He should see Canadians as others see us.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit disappointed that the hon. member who in the past has had the courage to recognize the facts and speak them directly to his own government is using anecdotal evidence and not over-all facts and figures to deal with this issue.

If he is correct that Canada is just part of what is happening in the United States, why is it that Canada has lost 15 per cent of its manufacturing jobs over the last four years? The Americans have lost only 7 per cent.

Why is it that the level of unemployment in Canada is officially 11 per cent, probably double that unofficially, and in the United States it is only 7 per cent? Why is it that Canada went into this recession induced by our high interest rate, high dollar policy at least six months before the United States and is coming out of it after the United States?

This is not a normal function of what is happening in Canada in relation to world events. What has happened to us is a made-in-Canada recession, deliberately set by this government.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House on this motion because I believe that the unemployment created by this government's policies is an issue that we should be discussing as the government is apparently unwilling to deal with the problem. It is a fact that this government's policies have led to plant shutdowns and unemployment. As my party's employment critic I receive newspaper clippings from the Department of Employment and Immigration. A large part of those clippings is stories about layoffs and slow-downs.

We are supposed to be in a recovery. However, someone should tell that to the 112 people laid off recently at Pacific Press in British Columbia, the 415 people who lost their jobs at the Northern Telecom plant in London, or the 2,500 GM workers who are going to be laid off when GM closes its Scarborough plant this spring.

The Conservative government may not like to hear it but Canada has lost 325,000 manufacturing jobs since 1989. We have had double digit unemployment for two consecutive years. The OECD, the Conference Board of Canada and many others are predicting that we will continue to have double digit unemployment through this year and into the next.

Let there be no mistake. We are facing an unemployment crisis in this country the likes of which we have never had to deal with in the past. Officially, there are presently 1.5 million Canadians who cannot find work, but that does not include the hundreds of thousands who have given up looking and have fallen out of the system.

Last year, for example, more than a million Canadians exhausted their UI benefits before they found work. That is a 41 per cent increase over the year before. Last week the Catholic bishops raised the alarm by claiming that the real jobless figure is 3.9 million. This, to me, is a tragedy. We have been urging this Conservative government to focus on putting Canadians back to work but I must say that our appeals have fallen on deaf ears.

The Conservatives are paralysed because the unemployment crisis is a direct result of their policies and in order to solve that crisis they would have to admit that they made a mistake and would have to change course. That is something that they are not willing to do.

What are some of the things the government has done that have led us to this unhealthy situation? First, there was the high interest rate and high dollar policy. This had a number of negative effects on our economy. A prolonged period of high interest rates made it very difficult for smaller companies to find financing and many of them were forced to give up. The combination of a high dollar and high interest rates alone had a disastrous effect on this economy.

The bankruptcy figures tell us a very sad story of this record. In 1992, 14,317 businesses declared bankruptcy yet the government still talks about an economic recovery. In 1991 the number was 13,496. In all, over 200,000 businesses and individuals have followed a dead-end route to bankruptcy. It still talks about an economic recovery.

How many dreams have been lost in this country? How many lives have been ruined? How many jobs might have been created in the small business sector if this government had created the environment to bring prosperity to Canada? It has denied opportunity to the Canadian people and to Canadian business.

I know that in my riding and throughout Canada businesses have been treated harshly. I have met with people who are confused about what this government was doing. They felt that their entrepreneurial spirit had subsided. Now they are crushed. Hope and ambition have been replaced by despair and embarrassment.

Another policy mistake the Conservatives made was to enter into the free trade agreement without proper safeguards for Canadian interests. We have seen what happened with the absence of subsidies and dumping codes or the absence of adjustment programs. These people opposite are are the same people who said that jobs were going to be created and that prosperity was going to be part of the Canadian fabric. They said: "Yes, there will be some adjustment in our industrial sector but do not worry as we will have adjustment programs to ease the pain that Canadians would feel". Where are they? Where are those programs that have left 45 and 55-year old factory workers out in the cold? Where is the hope for our young people? Where are all those promises that have been made? They will have to live up to that record.

Canadians have been asked time and time again by this government to make sacrifices for the national debt, the economy and for our children and the future. We did. We paid higher taxes. We have fewer services but what kind of thanks did we get in return? We have a high national debt, record bankruptcies and over 400,000 young people unemployed. This is the thanks we got after we played its game and sacrificed our lives for this government.

Let me be very clear that we have honoured our part of the deal. We have said yes, we will accept the higher tax rates provided it can reduce the deficit. We will accept fewer services provided it can reduce the deficit and the national debt. We will pay the price provided it can create the environment for small business to prosper.

What has it done for small business people throughout Canada? It has not gone to the banks and said: "You have not only an economic contract with this government, you are not only a financial institution, but you have a social obligation to bring about change in this country and to give the type of capital that small business people throughout Canada need in order to generate those jobs".

What have these people across the aisle done? They have been silent. They have been too busy playing up to the pressures of interest groups and have forgotten about the individual Canadian out there trying to make a serious go of it and provide a better future for their children and young people throughout Canada. That is what they have done. However, people have caught on that this government has been nothing but a government that responds only to interest group pressures.

It has not created an environment where small business can prosper. It has not given more hope to young people. It has not given hope to the single mother who is compelled to stand in front of the local food bank for a daily meal. It has divorced itself from the responsibility of government. It has abdicated its responsibility to bring about positive change.

The only thing we have to show in this House and across the country is the 1.5 million unemployed Canadians. We have 30 per cent of our high school students dropping out and this government has been silent because that is the Conservative style. The Conservative style of governing is hands off: "Let the market forces dictate what happens and as far as we are concerned we can stand back and watch the people get hurt". That is what it has done and that is, I guess, what it is proud of because I have not seen anything coming from this government since I have been here that has given me, as a young Canadian and as a parent of two children, any hope for the future. That is the Conservative reality of Canada.

I have a very simple message here. If any members on the opposite side are listening, there are people hurting in this country that need your help. There are people out there who have lost hope. I think it is high time that something was done about it. We have paid our part of the deal. We have sacrificed long enough. We have co-operated. Now it is time. We want to see results and we want to get Canadians back to work and hope back into Canadians' lives.

• (1145)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House recognizes the tension that my hon. friend feels in view of the very substantial nomination fight that is going on in the Liberal Party in his particular riding. I can understand why he would want to come here and make dying gasps and last-minute speeches in an effort to try to establish some credibility.

I think what the House should hear is some facts instead of histrionics and bombastic speeches and accusations without one shred of evidence that would stand up anywhere. I would suggest to my hon. friend that before he goes out on the campaign trail he must get some facts because that kind of stuff just will not last and take the strain of a campaign such as he is going to face and such as he is already showing the effects of.

I would like to ask my hon. friend this. If we are blaming free trade for everything, as my hon. friend is, how does he account for the fact that since the free trade agreement came into effect our merchandise exports to the United States rose to record levels in 1989 and 1990. They eased back to somewhat less than record levels in 1991 but in 1992 our merchandise exports to the United States were at or near record levels in every month of that year. In the first nine months of 1992 our merchandise trade surplus with the U.S. ran at an annual rate of over $16 billion. That is up 16.6 per cent over the same period in 1991.

My hon. friend will know if he is being honest with himself and with the House that every billion dollars in exports creates or maintains 15,000 jobs. Canada's exports to the United States increased by $31.3 billion in 1989-91 when compared with 1986-88.

I would think that my hon. friend would recognize that the whole world is going through some restructuring. One cannot blame our government for the recession in the United States or in Japan. These folks do nothing but blame. However, one day when it comes to election time they are going to be called on for some ideas of their own. To sit there and simply criticize the government is not going to wash when they get out there in the real world. My hon. friend knows that.

Does my hon. friend not give some credence to the fact that things are changing? For example when General Motors shuts down the Lumina line in Oshawa in the fall of 1993 it will come back a year later having retooled and will produce the same number of cars with 1,400 less employees. That is a fact of life.

My hon. friend, in the histrionics and bombastics of his speech, does not want to acknowledge the facts of life that things are changing. We have to adapt and we have to enter into agreements like the free trade agreement and the NAFTA in order to put ourselves in a position to capitalize on those opportunities. That is what we have done.

I know it has caused a lot of grief in his party and that there are very severe differences between the hon. member for Etobicoke North and the U.S. hater from Winnipeg. I appreciate those differences. However, surely when one comes to the House of Commons and one tries to improve the country as a whole one has to deal with facts and not just the rhetoric that my hon. friend got away with for this length of time. It is not, however, going to wash in the next election campaign.

Mr. Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I like the soft approach and the soft voice of the minister because he really thinks it is going to be a soft sell. The reality is that the minister, when he goes campaigning, will have to answer to the promises that were made in 1984 and 1988.

Let us talk about reality. There are 1.5 million Canadians unemployed and 2.2 million Canadians who live on welfare. Is that something he is proud of? I certainly am not.

• (1150)

Is the minister happy with the fact that he has just sat there while there are small businesses even in his own riding that cannot access financing and he has not done a thing to help them?

The minister can talk all he wants but the reality and facts I have outlined in my speech are facts that he knows about. The government gets off on these great thoughts about how it is preparing the economy for prosperity. What prosperity? If one walks through any major urban centre one sees people on the street, one sees people who do not have food in a country as rich as Canada.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to debate this motion which condemns the government for its policies that have created such disaster in Canada that so many plants, especially in southern Ontario, have been closed. Even the official unemployment rate is at a disastrous level. It is officially 11 per cent, more or less.

Unofficially, according to the Roman Catholic bishops, 3.9 million people are either unemployed, have given up working or have short-time jobs when they really need, want and have been looking for full-time jobs.

It has also been pointed out that compared to the participation rate of three years ago unemployment now would be 17 per cent for Canada, not just 11 per cent, if it were counted more accurately. That is because of full-time jobs that have been lost with no other jobs in their place.

It is the worst we have had in half a century especially considering that 10 years ago, when it was nearly as bad, only about one-third of the jobs were permanently lost and now at least two-thirds of the jobs are permanently lost.

I want to mention a little bit about the riding I represent of Trinity—Spadina. Within weeks of the free trade agreement coming into effect in the beginning of 1989 the Inglis plant, which employed 600 workers, announced that it was closing. For decades it had been making washing machines. Half the washing machines in the Canadian market came out of that plant. It had a good, trained and responsible work force.

Admittedly the company from the United States that then owned it had not updated the machinery but it was still producing for half of the Canadian market. The workers were laid off within the year with no possibility of any kind of replacement in that sort of washing machine employment for them.

I want to speak about the garment industry. It has been blasted by the free trade agreement. Employers and owners of businesses have told me that when they go to the bank to get a loan for an expansion or to get over a short difficult period, people who have been in the business for years, leaders in the market, and leaders in style are told by the banks: Not for the garment industry. They know what the free trade agreement has done to the garment industry in Toronto.

Ms. Mitchell: And B.C.

Mr. Heap: And in British Columbia and I expect also in Winnipeg.

Many of these employers opposed the free trade agreement and explained to the government the damage it would cause. The government ignored them and now some of them have closed. Those that have not closed are mainly import houses importing from China and Taiwan which have cheap labour.

They are negotiating with Mexico which has cheaper labour than anyone in Asia. It has cheaper labour not only than Japan but than Korea, China, Singapore and so on. They are negotiating with Mexico. One of them has kept about 15 out of 100 employees. He laid off 85. He has 15 just to handle the warehousing and maybe some very short make-up orders.

The printing industry has also been hit, as has the data processing industry which is a very important service industry in downtown Toronto.

• (1155)

The government has simply ignored what is happening. It has done nothing to pick these people up. I want to quote the comments on this from the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops. Its base principle, as quoted from the gospels, is Jesus Christ saying:

> Just as you did it to one of the least of these brothers and sisters of mine, you did it to me.

In other words, its bottom-line approach for the economy is that it has to look after the poorest. If we look after the poorest, the rich will not suffer.

The bishops spell that out further in a statement well known as the preferential option for the poor. They say:

> a) that the needs of the poor have priority over the wants of the rich; b) that the rights of workers are more important than the maximization of profits; and c) that the participation of marginalized groups takes precedence over the preservation of a system that excludes them.

In other words, they are saying that if we look after the poor the rest will do well enough. Particularly, we should look after the ones who are being excluded from the system, such as the women who have been forced out of their factory jobs into home work jobs for what amounts to about $2 an hour.

Out of this $2 an hour these women must pay for their sewing machine, heat and light, and the rent of their home in which they do the work. They have to pay what the factory owner used to pay. On top of that it comes out of maybe $2 or $4 an hour when we add up the hours they work, sometimes illegally helped by their children. This is what has happened to some of the marginalized people in Trinity—Spadina, especially the immigrant women.

This is what is condemned by the Roman Catholic Church. It is not speaking only out of compassion. The Roman Catholic bishops are not just bleeding hearts. They are saying, as my colleague from Essex—Windsor said, that if two million, three million or four million Canadian workers are not allowed to work they still have to eat and their families still must have homes.

The country is losing money and going into deficit no matter how much this government may lower the taxes on the rich, no matter how much this government may rig its figures. It is the forced unemployment in this country that is causing disaster.

The Roman Catholic bishops point out on page 7:

> Despite protests to the contrary, governments are simply waiting for a surge in Gross National Product to restore lost jobs and create new ones—this despite the evidence that new economic growth, as measured by GNP, will be only loosely related to job creation.

After saying that the market has failed the bishops say:

> It is Pope John Paul's ardent hope that individuals and communities—including the poorest—will have the political power and will necessary for freely determining and shaping the framework within which the market works, so it can be in harmony with their own cultural and moral values, even at the international level.

The government has to reverse or be reversed.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think the remarks my colleague put on the record are tremendously important. They show the ethical and moral reasons that the North American free trade agreement must be defeated.

I would like to comment on his remarks in which he said that the free trade agreement has had a tremendous impact on many of the industries where women are working at very low wages, and more often than not they are immigrant women. The situation he describes in Spadina is very similar to that in my own riding of Vancouver East where the free trade agreement has largely been responsible for the fact that fish processing plants have been closing. Some of them have moved south of the border. One of the Liberal members mentioned earlier how we must have value added to our products. The trade deal certainly has been prohibiting that in many industries. The export of raw logs is another one.

• (1200)

I agree with the hon. member completely that in the garment industry it is a particular tragedy. Not only do we have plants closing and jobs going and many of the plants leaving the country, but we have this move to home industries. They do not have the standards of work that women predominantly should have. They are really including the cost of all the overhead and having to pay it out of very minimum wages.

I would like him to comment further on that and to explain why the NAFTA agreement will add to this tragedy.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question because in 10 minutes it was not possible to put everything forward.

The free trade agreement which, as I said, was opposed by the leaders of the garment industry and the majority of the manufacturers in the garment industry in Toronto and I believe in the rest of Canada, has resulted in such changes in the import duties that foreign manufacturers and particularly American manufacturers are able to flood the Canadian market.

Along with the free trade agreement was the high interest rate policy chosen and enforced for two or three years by the government through the Bank of Canada, which is a creature of the government and the Parliament of Canada. The manufacturers told me they could not sell in the United States. Even though tariffs going into the United States were lowered, the difference in the Canadian dollar brought about by the enforced high interest rate meant that they were priced out of the American market. We were supposed to get access to it, but the two policies of this government, the free trade agreement and the high interest rates, blocked them.

Even though the interest rates have gone down, some of those manufacturers are not there. When we go down Spadina Avenue we see property for sale and for rent where there used to be hundreds and hundreds of people working in the factories.

The NAFTA will also hit the remaining industries because it will mean that we will be penalized for bringing in cloth, yarn or thread from outside North America. There are many varieties of good cloth to be had from Europe and from some parts of Asia, but the North American free trade agreement will penalize Canadian manufacturers by hindering their access to the American market if they use cloth not made in Canada, the United States or Mexico.

That particularly hits cotton. It is admitted we do not grow cotton in Canada. They do in Alabama, the southern states and Mexico. Canada will be penalized if we have to buy cotton from those places, manufacture it in Canada and try to sell it back into the American market which the government claims it opened for us. We will be penalized more if we try to buy it outside North America.

It is quite possible the whole garment industry in Canada may be doomed by the foolishness of the government.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I do not know if my colleague from Trinity—Spadina mentioned to you that we were going to split his time in two 10-minute portions. I would like to take my time now if I could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is no problem. Questions and comments are now terminated.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity, short as it is, to say a few words today on the motion presented by my colleague from Essex—Windsor. His motion was essentially on the state of the economy on the eve of the budget, which will be presented by the Minister of Finance on Monday afternoon.

• (1205)

I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about the general state of affairs of the economy in the country. I would also like to draw some conclusions and comment about the general national state and mention a few situations that I think bear some relevance in my riding to the debate we are having today.

There is no question that the time is quickly coming for this government and all Canadians to take a strong look at the choices that are available to address the problems facing our economy. It is important to get the message across that there are choices. They may not be the choices this government has made nor the choices of other critics of this government, but there are real choices and real positive solutions to some of the problems we face in this country today.

I do not think anyone, particularly on the government side, should reject or hide from the fact that we are in a very difficult economic situation. Unemployment in March rose to 11 per cent from 10.8 per cent in the previous month.

Amazingly there are some 1.5 million people in Canada looking for work. Our unemployment rate last year was the highest of all the G-7 countries. My leader, the member for Yukon, has mentioned in her questions to the finance minister that in addition to the unemployed we have the problem of the underemployed. That is often not addressed or dealt with in this House and I think it is important that it be raised, as does the leader of the New Democratic Party.

We have also seen the explosion of the welfare rolls all across the country. The point made by our leader in the House has been in response to the government challenging the opposition to offer alternatives. When we have been presented with that challenge we have offered alternatives.

Alternatives were presented by our party in the extensive debate we had on the goods and services tax in this House. We were the only party to do that. We met that challenge and I suggest that we bested the government in terms of what we said could be done.

With regard to the welfare rolls, a question has been put to the finance minister and he has not answered it. He asked where the money will come from to do the wonderful things proposed by members of the opposition. We have told him where the money would come from but the question is rightfully put to the Minister of Finance: Where will he get the money to pay for the ever-increasing welfare rolls?

In Prince George, the major community in my riding, I took the time to look at this situation. If we are going to address these problems we have to know what we are dealing with. In Prince George alone there are some 5,000 people on social assistance. A number of those people are not able to work and will likely never work. In our country where we measure our value by how well we take care of those who are less well off—my colleague from Trinity—Spadina said that better than I did—we clearly have to continue to help those people.

Government has to initiate projects for training but the private sector also has a responsibility. It is not often mentioned in this House because our natural inclination as members of Parliament is to look at the role of government. There is a role and a responsibility for the private sector as well. On matters of research and development and innovation we have some winners in this country, but it is also clear that the private sector has failed Canada in a number of areas as well.

There are reasons for that, such as the branch plant economy we have in Canada and the seemingly endless reliance on being the hewers of wood and drawers of water. We must take advantage of existing legislation and programs to ensure that we do get an opportunity to add value to those wood products in particular—I am interested in that for my riding—and other similar areas. We do have some tools at hand that we can use.

I realize that I only have a few minutes left but one particular example sums this up. In my riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley I have met with the workers at the Kelly Douglas & Co. warehouse and corresponded with the company owners. This warehouse has been in operation for many years in Prince George. It closed virtually overnight and some 65 people were laid off. A number of them had done nothing else in their lives. They had worked full time in that particular warehouse at good pay but now they were unemployed. The workers have said that the local management was treated as poorly as they had been treated. So what do we do? What does the union do? What does the company do?

This is the classic situation of a good leadership role being played by the union and a poorer role being played by the company. There are also some serious questions about what to do in our economy.

In this particular case the union has taken a leadership role by working with its members who used to work at this warehouse. It contacted the Canada Employment Centre and is now working with these people—some have done no other work in their lives—to prepare them and help them look for other work. I visited the classroom where they are being trained to prepare résumés and introduced to computers. One person said: "Well, this is fine. I appreciate being involved in this class, but why are the taxpayers paying for this?" I thought he had a good question there. He suggested that the employer should be paying more attention to these workers now that they have been laid off. The union is challenging what this particular company is doing as well through a grievance procedure.

This is the classic situation of the seemingly uncaring employer, but it is also a unique situation because the union has gone far beyond its traditional role and is working to serve its members. There is an increasing concentration of business in larger and larger centres where communities like the ones I represent have fewer and fewer services.

After raising those challenges from that very specific example I now come to some positive solutions and suggestions and, most important, some choices. I want to impress on anyone who is watching this debate, earnestly concerned about the state of our country's finances and eagerly waiting to see what the Finance Minister does with his budget on Monday, that there are some choices. The New Democrats and in particular our leader have made some effort to develop our strategy for a full employment economy. We have met the challenge of presenting alternatives. This is a reasonable plan. It has been given the rubber stamp of approval from independent financial consultants. It can be done. There is a different way of running the economy rather than this government's approach. There are positive solutions that give people meaningful jobs and the opportunity to present and participate in economic planning.

I encourage anyone who is interested in that debate to please write to us. We will send them a copy of it. Then they can certainly get a chance to see what the alternative is and what the challenges and choices are.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, we are discussing a very important topic today, the economy. In my neck of the woods, forestry is a major part of the economy and we have been hit quite hard. I know the hon. member representing his party has the responsibility of following the forestry sector for his party. I know he is quite knowledgeable in that area.

• (1215)

I would like to mention to the House that in my area of Restigouche—Chaleur there is a mill in Atholville, New Brunswick that has been closed. We have another mill in Dalhousie that has been closed 50 per cent. Two of its four machines have been closed down. I have been quite concerned about the policies of this government with regard to high interest rates, the high dollar and its effect on industry and more specifically on the forestry industry. I have also been concerned about other policies.

I wonder if the hon. member would care to comment about the policies of this government with regard to the forestry industry.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member. We have sat on a number of committees and discussed the concerns of the forestry sector in the country.

He is quite right when he mentions a range of problems and issues facing the forestry sector. We know the challenges faced by all governments and in particular provincial governments that are faced with the day-to-day management of the allocation of the forest resource to companies. There is a clear challenge there on the question of set-asides and meeting the goals of the Brundtland commission for 12 per cent. That difficult challenge is particular to my own province of British Columbia and is a very important one. It is important to mention on this Earth Day that it is a very difficult time for most provincial governments.

With regard to the high dollar and in particular trade policy, I would just like to comment on two things. The general approach to the high interest rates and the high dollar has been very difficult and has hurt all components of our forestry sector, particularly as it relates to our exports to the United States.

Of course I must mention the softwood lumber tariff dispute that we have had with the United States. We anticipate a ruling next week from GATT that is discussing the whole subsidy question. This whole issue of the current tariff and what is to be expected is before a couple of panels now and is hanging over the forestry sector. The U.S. lumber lobby has already said that if it loses at any one of these panels it will be launching an extraordinary challenge to the decision, so the whole dispute over softwood lumber is nowhere near finished yet.

One of the problems in eastern Canada is the age of our mills and particularly a lot of the pulp mills. The owners are having difficulty making those very big money decisions about reinvestment into those mills. There is upgrading necessary to improve the water treatment systems of those mills. As one of the most important sectors in Canada there is a great deal more to do.

I am wondering, on the eve of the budget, if we are going to see a forestry minister continue in this House. There has been some debate in the government about doing away with the minister. It would be ironic since one of the first pieces of legislation my colleague and I worked on when we arrived in Parliament was the creation of that department. If one of the last actions of this government was to do away with that department in such an important sector I do not think most Canadians would appreciate it.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to join in today's debate concerning the state of the Canadian economy.

I would like to respond to a few of the comments made by previous speakers. I think we should not allow all of them to go unchallenged, especially when they may have left an inappropriate or incorrect impression.

It is fair to say that every member of this House would prefer an economy that was stronger with more employment, more jobs and higher incomes. Of course, that would benefit not just the people with those jobs, it would also benefit governments. It would benefit governments because people with jobs earn income and pay taxes. Fewer of them would be drawing on the government's social programs, such as unemployment insurance or welfare. Governments would be receiving revenues. That would make life a lot easier for them in trying to control the deficit which all levels of government are now having a great amount of difficulty in doing. We would like to have the revenues from those higher taxes both from individuals and from corporations with profits.

It is fair to say that all of us would be interested in having a stronger economy. The real question is as to what degree can government action produce that stronger economy.

Unfortunately what has happened in the last few years is that we have become unable to be insulated from events in the rest of the world. It used to be, probably since the end of the Second World War until the mid-1970s, that as a country we were able to set ourselves aside and avoid a lot of the economic factors which had great influence, at many times negative, in other parts of the world. In part, that was because we had a lot of natural resources on which we could rely and we were able to determine our own force and set our own agenda. We had high income and high value from those resources. For example, that is why we were able to insulate ourselves in many ways from the oil price shock of the early 1970s. We did not have to endure what many European countries or Japan had to endure, for example the high prices of energy which harmed or had a great impact on their economies.

The fact of the matter is in today's world we no longer have that insulation. Today's world is a multinational trading world. Goods and services trade throughout the world. Modern communications and computers have meant that manufacturing jobs can be shifted to what used to be Third World countries. Those countries now compete with us for jobs that we used to consider as our own and natural to Canada. The fact is that we no longer have the luxury of saying that in Canada we will set our own course regardless of what the rest of the world does.

One of the comments made earlier in the debate concerned interest rates and the high dollar. One of the things that causes the dollar to be stronger or higher against other currencies is borrowing money in foreign currencies and bringing it to Canada. The prime borrowers in foreign currencies and foreign markets are governments or government agencies.

It is not the federal government that has resorted to that. It is provincial governments such as the Government of Ontario. The Government of Ontario, and add to that Ontario Hydro, its Crown-owned agency producing electric power in that province, is probably the most substantive borrower of funds outside of Canada. The current NDP government is continuing the practice that was established by other governments at an even higher rate than ever before. When those governments borrow in foreign currencies, naturally those currencies are converted into Canadian currency when they are going to pay for goods and services in Canada. That increases the value of our dollar which is something that has been complained about by the opposition.

When governments borrow money either domestically or from foreigners, that borrowing puts pressure on the amount of capital available for investment and for other purposes which raises interest rates. When we have complaints from the opposition members about the level of interest rates or about the level of the dollar, I encourage them to look at what is behind these figures and what is causing it. To the extent that government is responsible, it is government spending and government deficits. The people of Canada have become increasingly concerned about those deficits. I think and I hope that in his budget next week the Minister of Finance will present once again an updated and credible plan to deal with that.

Earlier a member of the Liberal Party suggested that we have paid for many of these difficulties and we are continuing to pay. Unfortunately, that is true. Unfortunately over a period of time, for 10 or 15 years, as governments, and I will restrict this to the federal government for the moment, we increased our expenditures at 10 per cent to 15 per cent per year for 15 years. That went on until about 1984. It built a debt in this country of something in the order of $200 billion. For the period of 1975 to 1985 the debt increased 10 times what it had been.

Since then the current government has tried to control that spending. We have kept spending below the rate of inflation, in the neighbourhood of 3 per cent to 4 per cent per year average over that time. We have tried to control the deficit. There have been increases in taxes, there is no question about that. In spite of that, the interest on the debt that was there in 1984 has continued to accumulate and that has brought the current debt in this period to approximately $400 billion. It has almost doubled. That has happened simply because we have seen interest on that existing debt.

It is a rule of thumb when investment counsellors are talking to people, counselling them on saving money and saving for their future that if money is put away, if money is invested and saved today, that roughly in seven years that money will double. Unfortunately from the other point of view, if there is a debt today which is not paid, in seven years that debt will be approximately double. That is what has happened over the last period of time. It is not because this current government has gone on a spending spree and spent more money.

We have found ways to provide the programs we felt most necessary through restructuring and eliminating some of the programs and some of the spending that we felt we could do without. On every single occasion we did that, we were opposed by the opposition parties.

I can mention one example. We started with a post office that had a deficit of $600 million a year. It was costing Canadian taxpayers $600 million a year. That post office is currently either making a small profit or breaking even. We have turned it around from a loss of $600 million a year to roughly a break-even or small profit situation. Why has that happened? It has happened for a couple reasons. It has happened because in that business we have adopted new technology, new methods of service to people. We have changed the strategy and the focus and we have brought it into the modern age.

Unfortunately in Canada some people seem to suggest that we can continue to maintain industries in the face of international competition, in the face of changing technologies and in the face of new products and services that have come to replace some of the ways we used to do things. We cannot remain locked in the past. I think everyone understands that. I think even everyone who worked in the factories that were talked about earlier where those factories have for one reason or another closed would agree that in part it is because we have not found new technology or invested in new technology in those areas to make ourselves competitive with the rest of the world. As I said earlier, we no longer have the luxury of being non-competitive.

We had some good comments earlier by the hon. member for Willowdale when he talked about the need for investment in technology and for investment in research and development. There is no question about that. We all understand that. The question is that in order to make that, we have to free up that investment for research and development, for investment in new technology that will make our workers and business more productive. We must not crowd that investment out by continuing to increase government spending and government borrowing on current consumption. That is very difficult because we have a lot of demand for the services of government.

We can see the difficulty in provincial governments. There were comments a moment ago from members of the New Democratic Party. However we have a New Democratic government in Ontario. Ontario is 43 per cent of the Canadian economy. If the methods being suggested here today by the New Democratic Party were successful and worked, it should have the strongest economy. We should have a booming economy right now.

We know that the Rae government tried those in the first two years it was in office. It was a disaster and it has admitted now that it was on the wrong course. The treasurer, Mr. Laughren, and the premier, Mr. Rae, have been saying in recent days that they are going to have to change course, adopt a different fiscal plan, reduce their spending and reduce their deficit because they can no longer continue on the path on which they have put themselves.

They have recognized it. The NDP have recognized the folly of the kind of thinking they continue to perpetuate in this House. They have recognized it in Ontario because they ran up against the wall. They ran up against people saying: "No, we are not going to lend more money. If you want to borrow you are going to have to pay either excessive interest rates or we are not going to lend it to you at all". That reality has brought the fact home to the NDP government in Ontario that it is going to have to adopt a different strategy. What strategy is it adopting? It is adopting a strategy that this government has been conducting for several years.

One can say that we are not particularly happy with the level of unemployment or the state of the economy. I can say that I am not happy. But the question we have to ask is: If we had not adopted the policies that we have been pursuing over the last few years, where would we be?

For example, there was talk earlier about trade. Trade is the life-blood of this country. We depend on trade for about one-third of our income. We have to do everything we can to remain competitive so that we can continue to trade in the world and compete against goods and services from the rest of the world and increase our exports.

In 1992 exports reached a record high level of $157 billion. That was 11 per cent above 1991. Exports to the United States reached a record high level of $122 billion. That was $19 billion more than in 1988. That is under the free trade agreement. Under the free trade agreement we have increased exports by $20 billion, about 20 per cent since 1988, to the United States. There has been an increase of 10 per cent from 1991 in the over-all exports to the world. Our exports to Japan for example increased from 1984 to 1992 by over 40 per cent, to a record level of $16 billion. Why is that? It is because we have been pursuing trade opportunities such as the free trade agreement. It is also because we have been removing impediments regarding Canadian businesses and their ability to trade.

Someone mentioned the GST briefly in this debate. That was one of the most difficult policies for this government and for members like myself who supported that policy to go out into the country, to tell people, to explain to people why we had to make this change. We told people why we had to eliminate a federal sales tax that was hidden and buried in the cost of our products, that was crippling our manufacturers' ability to produce products and trade in the world or to compete against imports. We told them why we had to eliminate that tax and instead replace it with a new tax called the GST. We had the courage to do that.

We heard earlier about the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Somehow it was suggested that we are not supporting some initiative of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. There was no stronger supporter of the GST than the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. We supported that, we eliminated the federal sales tax, we put in a new tax called the GST and this was very difficult politically. No one knows better than I.

• (1235)

I had town hall meetings in my riding. Many, many people came to those meetings. In many cases they were very angry people. They were opposed to the government doing this. They argued instead that we should be cutting government spending by that amount.

However, cutting spending by that amount would have required us to be cutting payments for example to senior citizens and others. We said no, we will have to replace this tax with another tax called the GST and we did it. We did it in spite of that political difficulty because we had the courage to do it.

What has happened? Our exporters have become more competitive. We see that in the numbers we are showing.

People talked about high interest rates. High interest rates are driven by inflation and government spending. We have been keeping government spending under control, not as well as we would have liked, but that has not been the problem.

It is revenue that has fallen short because of the weakness in the domestic and world economies. The Canadian economy has not been as strong as we would have hoped. Therefore government revenues are approximately $10 billion a year less than what we were expecting. This has put enormous pressure on us.

However, the policies we have pursued, such as the elimination of the federal sales tax to replace it with the GST and the introduction of the free trade agreements and others, have put us in a position where currently we are one of the stronger economies in the world. We should recognize that.

It is not a situation where we are totally insulated or when we can simply say that in Canada we will have our economy and we will ignore what is going on in the rest of the world.

In terms of the G–7 nations, Canada is expected to lead the world. The OECD says that among its larger members Canada has made the greatest progress in recent years in reducing its structural deficit.

Without the government's actions to control its spending, the deficit would have reached $82 billion by 1991–92, which is close to two and one half times the actual level. The debt would have reached $645 billion.

In spite of the fact that we have not made the progress that we would have liked, certainly that I would have liked, we have made some of the greatest progress in recent years in the OECD, the 24 industrial nations of the world.

In terms of the future world economy, the OECD forecast in its most recent global outlook that Canada will be the leader among the world's seven largest economies in 1993–94.

If all our policies were wrong and if all the things that we did in the last seven or eight years were incorrect, why would our competitors, the OECD and our Canadian forecasters such as the Royal Bank last week and the C.D. Howe Institute and others be saying that Canada is now expected to be one of the world's leading economies in the next few years?

The reason for that is because we had the courage to do the things that needed to be done. Everybody understood that these things were difficult. Everybody understood that it is difficult for a government to say no, we are not going to continue to spend money like $600 million a year subsidizing the post office or $600 million a year subsidizing VIA Rail when nobody takes that service.

We made those difficult decisions. They were decisions at the time that were difficult for me because I had to defend them among my constituents. Having made them, we have now reached a point where we have the lowest inflation in 30 years.

Inflation is virtually non–existent. We have the lowest interest rates seen in probably 30 years. We have interest rates and mortgage rates that have been unheard of. One can get a mortgage now for under 6 per cent. One has to go back to 1962 to find a time when one could get a mortgage for under 6 per cent.

These are the policies that were long–term policies. They were policies that put in place an environment and a structure in Canada through which we could look to long–term growth. They are not policies where we simply borrow more money and spend it today.

Yes, we might be able to borrow some money and spend it. It might create a few jobs. However, tomorrow when we try to pay that money back, just like we have the problem now in paying for the borrowing we already made, we will have a weakened economy. It weakens our ability as a government to respond to problems.

• (1240)

I will end now. I look forward to the questions that may come to me. I think we have put in place the policies that will secure our future. What we need now is to continue them and not to change them.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued by the mental gymnastics of the member opposite and the suggestion that perhaps what the rest of the country is witnessing is a misperception of some great economic strategy that is being actually foisted upon us for our benefit.

There was the question of the benefit that Canadians are receiving for some of the very courageous decisions that the government made over the course of the last nine years. I wonder if this would include the fact that the government has had the temerity to visit upon us over the course of the last two years the following number of bankruptcies: 11,180 in 1990, 12,952 in 1991 and 13,851 in 1992. This is all for a relative value of $2.8 billion, $4.9 billion and $5.5 billion. This is a real good economic strategy.

He said: "We had to make some real tough decisions in terms of taxation. We brought in taxation because we wanted to decrease the deficit and reduce the debt". However, he acknowledged that the debt has gone up to in excess of $400 billion, over 100 per cent since the Tories took office. The deficit has not been measurably decreased even though personal income taxes have gone up by over 74 per cent over the course of the last eight years.

Mr. Heap: Except for the rich.

Mr. Volpe: That is right. Except for those who can afford to pay it.

He has also ignored the fact that part of the economic package has seen for example that the trade balance in this country upon which a great portion of our wealth depends has gone from a positive value of $19.8 billion in 1984 when these great sages of economic planning came in to a bare $9.4 billion last year.

When we take a look at the current account balance the difference is much more seriously negative. In fact the current account balance went from a positive value of $3.457 billion in 1984 to a net deficit of $28.563 billion last year.

I want to know what the courageous decisions actually are that this government made. The hon. member talks about the GST but that did not require great courage. It required great stupidity. This is only if we believe the figures that the government gives us. It will have to require a great leap of faith on our part, given the record. If we take a look at the figures the government gives us on the GST it says we had a net return of roughly $.5 billion last year. That compares with the $18.5 billion MST that it was getting before the GST was brought in.

The other figures that the government gave us is that it collected $30 billion and gave back roughly $14.5 billion. Of that $30 billion, $9 billion was collected on imports. There is an increase of over 100 per cent in the GST or sales tax revenue on imports and $20 billion on domestic items with over half of it given back in rebates and refunds.

What it tells us is that either the government does not have a grasp of the impact of its taxation and it has driven the economy underground or it has taxed the economy into non-existence, as witnessed by the large rate of bankruptcies and the volume in both numbers and dollars of the value of those bankruptcies.

Because we are all reasonable men and women in this House, could we please, through you, Mr. Speaker, get an explanation from the member opposite of where this courage is to be manifested and where the benefits of that courage can be seen for those of us Canadians who witnessed a 75 per cent increase in income taxes and a whole array of other tax increases? My colleagues tell me that there were in excess of 35 tax increases during its administration. Would he be so good as to explain to those of us who are paying for the tune just what kind of music we should be listening to?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, it is interesting that we have a member from the Liberal Party speaking about taxes and spending when in fact he suggested that we have a debt that is now approximately twice what it was eight years ago. I acknowledged that earlier. The fact of the matter is that in the previous eight years the Liberal government took the debt and increased it by 10 times. Not only that, let us take a look at where that debt was in 1984. All of the debt that has accumulated since that time is interest on that debt that we inherited.

Over the period of time between then and now we have successfully run this government in the black. We have also been able to pay some money toward that debt that we inherited. We are now in a position, having established a government that runs in the black, to say: "Can we attack that debt and that deficit". This is because, as we know, the longer it goes unpaid, the more the interest accumulates and the bigger the amount we have to pay. That is what we are talking about doing and that is what the Minister of Finance will talk about doing in his budget next week. I think all Canadians recognize that.

I think all Canadians recognize that we can no longer continue on the path that we were put on by the Liberal government. They recognize that we have turned that around. They recognize that we are paying our way as we go now and that we have to now attack the debt that they left us before it accumulates even more interest, which accumulates every single day.

That member should be apologizing for putting this country in that position. It has taken us this long and all this pain and difficulty to get back to a point now where we find ourselves among the countries, as was just mentioned earlier, that can look forward to the highest growth, the strongest economy and the most employment growth among the G-7 countries.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member during his remarks and I noticed that at one point he attributed the problems of Canadian exports to the fact that some of our industries have been allowed to fall behind in the development of their productivity.

Had the member been here earlier perhaps he would have heard my colleague, the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, point out that the GM foundry plant in St. Catharines is rated the most efficient foundry plant on the continent and that its wage level is $9 an hour below the equivalent foundry plant wage levels in the United States.

How can the member account for the shutting down now by GM of that foundry plant on the basis of a lack of efficiency and how can he argue that it is not on the basis of the free trade agreement?

Mr. Dorin: Mr. Speaker, I have to confess to not being particularly familiar with the foundry plant in St. Catharines. However, I would say that if it is as efficient as the member suggests, if it is as competitive as the member suggests then I am sure that there is somebody out there who would be more than interested in acquiring this plant and operating it because it sounds to me like it would be very profitable.

It is very unusual for companies or owners of plants to close them down when they are profitable. I would like to hear from the member, if he has an opportunity to tell me, if this is a profitable plant. If it is then I can probably find a buyer.

• (1250)

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is my intent to share my time today with one of my colleagues. We rise to speak on this opposition motion that this House condemn the government for policies that have decimated the economy and forced company closures, resulting in job losses for Canadian workers. I want to stress the decimation that has occurred in our resource sector in related industries under this administration.

Canada has been identified by the United Nations as the best country in the world in which to live and yet in the last nine years under this administration we have seen our national debt increase to more than $450 billion. Our current account deficit at the end of the last fiscal year was $28.5 billion and the budget deficit is out of control. Unemployment is at an all-time high with 1.5 million Canadians unemployed.

What is even more serious as far as I am concerned is that our resources are being depleted by interests outside Canada. If we were in any other business these depleted inventories would have to be deducted from the value of the business or company. This government gives no such accounting of the depletion of Canada's resources and I suggest such an accounting is urgently required as we note what is happening here in Canada.

This government is more interested in its image in other countries than it is in the well-being of the Canadian people and the Canadian economy. As we examine the resource industry in Canada, we are blessed with tremendous resources but we note that the Atlantic fisheries industry has been decimated due to overfishing by foreign interests. Only after the stocks have been depleted by the factory trawler ships has the government decided to take a hard line and force realistic cutbacks. In the meantime, thousands upon thousands of Canadians have been forced out of the industry and are now on unemployment and social assistance.

We have witnessed the hardships in the forestry industry that is only now beginning to recover. Harvesting methods such as clear-cutting are environmental disasters but are practised in the name of efficiency.

The Canadian food industry is being traded away by an uncaring government and its incompetent negotiators who have utterly failed to realize the impact across rural Canada. This impact has created untold hardships on thousands of Canadian producers in the agricultural industry in the towns and villages across this nation who provide the services to the primary producers.

I submit to this House of Commons, to this highest court of the land that we as Canadians must establish rules to control our resources, the processing of these resources and the environment. Otherwise this plundering by the transnational companies that have no loyalties to this nation will destroy our resource base, our industry and our standard of living that has been the envy of other nations. We as Canadians must put a stop to this madness immediately. We must put an end to the current trend of governing by corporate decision and above all we must take back control of this country. In the next six months Canadians will have the opportunity to make that decision and I am confident they will respond with the future of Canada first and foremost in their minds.

Let me just put on the record again in this House the number of food processing plants that have been closed or forced out of business since January 1989 when the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement came into effect. There have been 107 plant closings or major lay-offs. This government is obviously going to force the NAFTA legislation through the House, regardless of the lack of support by the Canadian people and regardless of whether or not it is going to pass the United States Congress. This government is going to sacrifice our Canadian workers, our environmental standards, our food quality and our resources in return for access to a foreign market for telecommunications, banking and financial institutions.

Let me give just a few of the facts and figures on the increases of vegetable imports into Canada between 1990 and 1992. Canned tomatoes increased by 85 per cent; tomato paste, 33 per cent; canned tomatoes, 191 per cent; canned peas, 250 per cent; baby carrots, 2,400 per cent; carrots and peas mixed, 2,900 per cent; canned beets, 87 per cent and tomato sauces, 873 per cent, an increase from 3,515 tonnes to 30,699 tonnes. The trade tribunal did not see any damage to our economy. This is nonsense. One company that discontinued canning tomatoes, peas and pumpkins is now importing large quantities of canned products from the U.S. and only the labelling is done in Canada. This company will be importing up to 92,000 cartons of processed pumpkin alone by the end of June 1993.

All these vegetables were previously grown in Canada and provided income for Canadian farmers, service industries and workers. Now they are being grown in another country where input costs and wages are lower.

We appear to have lost a market for our Canadian corn to be processed into breakfast foods. We have seen the meat packing plants, the flour mills and the pickle plants close. The list goes on and on.

We are told we must be globally competitive but as I have previously stated in this House, the global competition is a few huge transnational corporations whose loyalties are bottom line profits to uncaring shareholders in other countries.

Let me put on the record the devastation that has occurred. I want to cite an example from a news article written by Hugh Zimmer of Otterville, Ontario, a recognized writer and researcher. He points out that everyone ignores the Mexican labour issue. The regulations are ignored. The underground economy is estimated at 25 per cent of the labour force. The plan is similar to cheaper Portugal being used to lure jobs away from areas of Europe with higher wages.

How can any government in Canada with any conscience be part of such an arrangement that will undermine our structures and our standard of living, unless it is acting on behalf of these corporations that have no loyalties to this nation?

Mexican labour rates decreased dramatically from 1979 to 1989. We know their environmental standards do not measure up to ours. We know their food processing standards do not measure up to ours. The use of pesticides, herbicides and other chemicals used in food production and processing is not as stringent as in Canada. My research shows that of 48 chemicals used in food production and processing in Mexico, 12 are banned in Canada.

Before going into a trade agreement with any nation or nations, these nations should either measure up to our standards or, under article III of the GATT, their products should not be allowed access to our markets. To do otherwise is a betrayal of trust to Canadian businesses, Canadian workers and Canadian consumers whose health could well be impacted on by these lower standards.

Canadian agriculture and food production simply cannot survive with such declining returns and the increased input costs we have in Canada versus those of other nations.

As food production and processing on this planet falls under the control of fewer and fewer corporations, we see the government members acting like a herd of lemmings heading for self-destruction. They lack the courage and backbone to place Canadian interests first.

Our workers are responsible, our environmental standards are reasonable, but they are being sacrificed in the name of global competitiveness based on lower standards in other countries.

I ask the Minister of Finance when he presents his budget next Monday to include measures to ensure that Canada's resource industries will be put back under the control of Canadian interests. Measures must be taken to ensure the long-term prosperity of this nation and put a stop to the plundering that will eventually destroy Canada.

I want to put on record one of the things I recently saw. In Benchmark, Ontario a cash crop farm with 80 per cent equity and a net cash income of $47,000 in 1987, government payments of $25,251 over the next five years, decreased by 30 per cent. Expenses increased by $12,000. In 1987 returns from the operation exceeded operating expenses by $22,000. In 1992 this situation reversed and operating expenses exceeded market returns by $8,000.

This situation cannot be allowed to continue. The same situation exists in Saskatchewan and other provinces across Canada. I submit that we as Canadians have to take control of our economy, our natural resources and our food processing. We must maintain our health and environmental standards and, above all, the standards that apply to our workers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member's time has expired but we will still have five minutes questions or comments when we come back on debate.

It being one o'clock p.m. I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(2).

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

FISHERIES

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is leaving fishermen in Nova Scotia on the hook. For literally months the minister has been promising there would be a federal compensation package to support communities in eastern Nova Scotia devastated by the quota cuts.

It is now April 22 and there still has been no announcement. A task force from the Nova Scotia provincial government proposed a plan to the minister well over a month ago.

Perhaps the real reason behind this inordinate delay is so the government can announce this package in the midst of the provincial election to help the rapidly fading government of Don Cameron and the provincial Conservative Party.

I wish to inform this House that if the minister and the federal Conservative Party are using Nova Scotia fishermen as election bait they will not get their votes. Stop the politics, stop this cynical manoeuvring and start helping those people who need the government's help the most and who need it now.

FORESTRY INDUSTRY

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, Canada's forestry industry is on the rebound. In the first nine months of 1992 pulp production was up 20 per cent and lumber production was up by 13 per cent. With the recent surge in lumber prices, 1993 promises to be a good year.

I would like to congratulate forestry companies in Alberta for investing approximately $2.7 billion and creating 1,700 jobs in this sector of our economy this year.

This industry is poised for growth. This growth is targeted to foreign markets. This government is committed to promoting access for Canadian products into foreign markets through the free trade agreement, the GATT and the NAFTA.

NAMIBIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, Oxfam Canada has been advised that the Canadian International Development Agency has arbitrarily decided not to participate in phase two of the Canada–Namibia co–operation agreement. CIDA worked with Oxfam Canada to design this five–year Century Focus project which was to spend about $7 million in Namibia, 10 per cent from Oxfam and 90 per cent from CIDA. The CIDA contribution represented Canada's bilateral aid to the newest member of the Commonwealth of Nations.

Namibia is a success story and a point of hope on the African continent. The cuts in foreign aid are unacceptable everywhere, but where a country has finally been nurtured from oppression to democracy Canada is doubly wrong for so quickly abandoning this fledgling nation.

The preoccupation with eastern Europe will be a tragedy if it means that we desert or even betray our earlier commitments. I call on the government to reverse this decision or at least wait until the first phase can be evaluated.

PARKINSON AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, April has been declared Parkinson Awareness Month. Parkinson's disease is the second largest neurodegenerative disease in Canada. One person in 200 over the age of 40 and one person in 100 over the age of 55 may develop this chemical disorder of the brain. Since 1965 the Parkinson Foundation of Canada has been striving to help people with Parkinson's disease. It raises funds for research, provides information and counselling services to patients, their families and caregivers, and raises public awareness through various activities.

Activities for Parkinson Awareness Month will vary from chapter to chapter. One beautiful symbol of the struggle against Parkinson's disease is the red and white Dr. James Parkinson tulip named for the physician who first described the symptoms of this disease.

EARTH DAY

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, today we celebrate Earth Day with tree planting and environmental events across the country. As individuals and as a country we must take responsibility for leaving future generations a healthy planet.

Many Canadians take actions to protect the environment but expect governments at all levels to do what citizens alone cannot do. For instance, we have to work to eliminate pollution and prevent toxic chemicals from entering the air, soil, rivers and lakes. We have to stop overfishing and protect the ocean habitat. We have to harvest our forests carefully and conserve old growth forests. We need legislation to protect endangered plants and animals. We need to use energy more efficiently and produce a national plan to prevent global warming. We should help the poor in securing adequate nourishment, shelter and health standards.

In other words, we have a lot to do and so little time. Let us make every day Earth Day.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are outraged at the fact that their hard-earned tax dollars are being purposely squandered by the president of the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development, Mr. Jacques Attali.

• (1405)

His personal Napoleonic pipe-dream of Taj Mahal-like grandeur for EBRD headquarters fundamentally mocks the good intentions and compassion with which Canadians contributed.

The purpose of this bank was to use the vast majority of its funds for the creation and development of private sector businesses and market economies in the former Communist regimes.

I, and I am sure Canadians everywhere, applaud the efforts of our representative at the bank, Mr. Donald McCutchan. Mr. McCutchan, courageously, was the only bank board member to vote no to this breach of trust.

I call upon this government, despite today's apology by Mr. Attali, to strengthen its determination to rectify this mess and get on with the rebuilding of eastern Europe.

ARMENIA

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, April 24, the entire world will remember the first holocaust of the 20th century.

Armenian Canadians will be on Parliament Hill at 12.30 p.m. to pray and remind humanity of the horror of those years of suffering.

My colleague and friend, the hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre, along with many other members of Parliament, will give our fellow citizens the assurance of our active commitment to have this event proclaimed by Canada and to take up this issue to the UN.

Sunday evening, in Montreal, I will be present at one of the Armenian churches Sourp Hagop, and I invite all my colleagues to attend.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, 50 years ago in the Warsaw ghetto courageous Jewish resistance fighters were in their third day of a desperate 27-day battle against overwhelming Nazi forces.

This weekend I will join my community in commemorating the 78th anniversary of the Armenian genocide which was the model for the Nazi holocaust.

Don Valley North is home to many people who have experienced racist and/or religious violence. There are also many people who have risked their lives in wars combating these evils which humiliate, hurt and destroy so many innocent people.

Canadians must remember and our children must be taught these horrendous lessons of the past. We must resolve to continue to fight for human rights and freedom from discrimination in Canada and around the world.

DE LA SALLE HIGH SCHOOL

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Today, Mr. Speaker, hundreds of young students and their parents are here on Parliament Hill to protest the unfair budget cuts the Ontario New Democratic government is imposing on De La Salle High School.

At stake is the unique program offered at the De La Salle Centre for artistic excellence; this program is the only one of its kind in Ontario to serve the numerous artistic needs of our French-speaking youth.

It is imperative that the people should let the New Democratic Premier of Ontario know how crucial it is to restore the level of financing so that our young people can mature and develop their talents to join the ranks of the Canadian arts community.

There are 17 English schools in Ontario offering similar arts programs to serve the needs of the majority. Just one school in the whole province of Ontario to serve half a million young French-speaking Ontarians, is that too much to ask?

I invite all French-speaking Canadians and their friends to write to the Ontario premier telling him that francophones in his province are asking no more but no less than what the majority enjoys.

EARTH DAY

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, today is Earth Day. On this occasion, I am proud to say that, in its various policies and programs, Canada has made every effort possible to live up to the commitments made by our Prime Minister at the Earth Summit in Rio.

Our country has taken part in several international initiatives designed to preserve our natural environment.

For example, CIDA manages Canada's contribution to the launching of the experimental stage of the Global Environment Facility and has established a very innovative program designed to assist Canadian companies in making their most advanced environmental technology available to developing countries.

As agreed at that Summit, CIDA is playing a leadership role in the preparations for an international convention on desertification.

In closing, I would like to invite all Canadian men and women to ponder upon those questions and ask themselves what contribution they can make to the preservation of our planet.

FISHERIES

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on March 19 I rose in this House and asked how this Conservative government could allow mass reclassification of senior bureaucrats while refusing the legitimate reclassification of fisheries officers and marine surveyors.

The labour minister assured me that the President of the Treasury Board would respond to me as soon as he came back to the House. That was a month ago and there has not been a word.

In the meantime the government's classification grievance committee has ruled that the reclassification of fisheries assistant deputy supervisors is less important than that of a government interior designer because the designer's decisions affect the projected image of Canada as well as the resources of the department.

Do fisheries assistant deputy supervisors, and in fact marine surveyors, not affect the projected image of Canada as well as the resources of the department? What about the safety hazards they face?

This is not about reclassification. This is about paying off senior bureaucrats with wage increases at a time of across the board wage freezes, and this government's total unwillingness to provide legitimate reclassification of fisheries officers and marine surveyors.

ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House of Commons today to remember the Armenian genocide that began on April 24, 1915.

I know that my colleagues in the House agree on the importance of remembering this day and mourning the loss of 1.5 million people who were killed in this horrific massacre. We must not lose sight of the impact this tremendous loss of life has had on the Armenian people. They were the daughters and sons, mothers and fathers, and wives and husbands of a nation of Armenian people who perished in this brutal extermination.

The tragedy is that Canada and most countries in the world have not officially recognized the 1915 massacre as a genocide.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, almost half of all Canadians volunteer their time and energy to a worthy cause at some point in their lives.

National Volunteer Week reminds us that these individuals make a vital contribution to our families and communities. It also provides an opportunity to recognize the efforts of special organizations, many of which would cease to exist without the commitment of their volunteers.

Calgary has been called the most active volunteer city in Canada. As the member representing Calgary North I can testify to the fact that our city is second to none in this regard.

The Family Life Education Council, Kids First, the YWCA, the Schizophrenia Association of Alberta and the many community organizations in Calgary are only a few that come to mind when I think of community builders which rely on volunteers. These organizations know first hand that volunteers represent the heart and soul of their operation. They also know there is no limit to what people can accomplish when they work together toward a common goal.

I would like to express sincere thanks to those individuals and organizations who contribute daily to our families and our communities. Their efforts make a world of difference.

I challenge everyone to get involved with the revitalization of our community as volunteers.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, last December GATT ruled that the United States had the right to use special procedures to launch a countervail action against Canada's softwood lumber exports.

GATT also ruled that the $15 million in bonds that were collected by the U.S. government should be returned to Canadian companies.

The GATT subsidies committee meets next week to deal with this ongoing dispute and the government should be monitoring this matter closely for the many communities across the country that depend on the forest industry.

The minister said he would be aggressive with the Americans to get our money back. The minister should tell the House how much money the Americans have returned to us.

In other words, we want our money back. Rather than kowtowing to the U.S. all the time this government should be prepared to defend Canadian exports and Canadian jobs.

ORDER OF CANADA

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Huron—Bruce): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada and the Canadian Seed Growers' Association are pleased to recognize the appointment of two outstanding seed growers to the Order of Canada.

They are Mr. Leonard Haney of Picture Butte, Alberta and Mr. Harvey Gjesdal of Birch Hills, Saskatchewan. Both gentlemen are credited with recognized excellence in their respective fields of production, pedigreed seed.

These two gentlemen have given a lifetime of performance to the seed industry of Canada and to agriculture in Canada. They have helped producers across this nation, received achievements for producing top of the line quality products of grains and oilseeds and have enabled Canada to be in a position to better serve the world by feeding the world and to take our proper place.

• (1415)

I ask the House to congratulate these two accomplished agriculture producers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, two consecutive Secretaries of State have failed to bring forward a student loans program that is revitalized and responds to the needs of Canadian students.

Here is what has to be done if they have been listening to Canadians. Remove the 3 per cent tax on student loans and cut the additional six months' interest. Involve students in the student loan criteria if it must be given to the banks. Have flexible loans that respond to part-time students and variable workloads and increase the criteria for loans. They have not been changed since 1984.

If those in government want more help, I am willing to give it to them.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Last night we learned of yet another Somalia shooting, allegedly at the hands of Canadian soldiers, bringing the number of such incidents to four.

Each time information on these incidents has come from tips by reporters, anonymous phone calls or a letter from a soldier to his wife. Each time there has been a hurried-up investigation immediately afterward. Never have we had an honest, forthright, effective response from the Minister of National Defence.

When will this government acknowledge that the minister of defence is simply not fulfilling her responsibilities to her department or to the Canadian people? Will the Acting Prime Minister ensure there will be an open and complete account of these serious problems affecting our peacekeeping troops in Somalia and the reputation of Canada abroad?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the accusation that these incidents have not been reported simply is not true.

For example, the March 4 incident, which was the subject of some discussion here, the officers in charge on March 5, the day after, telephoned Canadian Press, Standard Broadcast News, CBC Newsworld and CBC Radio. It was widely reported in Canada.

Regarding the incident of March 16, a press release was issued in Mogadishu. It was not covered but there was no attempt to cover it up. The other two incidents were both reported in the media.

In each situation an investigation was commenced. Two of the incidents were considered sufficiently serious that investigation teams were sent from DND to Somalia to investigate directly.

The minister of defence is in the legal system of DND and in fact has duties not dissimilar to those of a judge. Therefore she is limited in what she can say with respect to details of the cases.

I am sure the hon. member would appreciate that in the interests of justice, fairness and proper procedure in this matter, it would be most inappropriate for anyone in authority to give extensive details of the investigation.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister knows that in one case notice was given by posting a notice on the board. The other was simply a verbal account. In two cases there was no record of any press release being distributed.

In the CTV report last night the defence department admitted that investigations were under way in only two of the cases. It does not add up in anybody's estimation to a full, open and proper account. The consequences are serious. The defence chief of staff said in an interview in Maclean's:

> The Somali incidents may well be symptomatic of a breakdown of our discipline and our leadership.

My serious question is this. Does the government, the Prime Minister and the Acting Prime Minister not think it is about time that we had a minister of defence in place who has the capacity, the interest and the time to deal with the serious problems affecting us in Somalia, to come to grips with the breakdown of discipline and leadership, in other words, to show there is some responsibility being shown at the top of the department of defence?

• (1420)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong again in saying that only two of the incidents were investigated. That is not true. They were investigated. The investigations were initiated or started on site in all cases. In two of the cases it was found unnecessary to proceed further and in the other two cases it was found necessary to proceed further. That is exactly what is happening. That is what should properly happen in any circumstances.

The hon. member seems to have some doubts about the validity of the legal system within the Armed Forces and as a result of expressions of those doubts by himself and other members there have been some concerns raised. To allay those concerns the Judge Advocate General's department will be having a press availability session this afternoon to describe to all interested people exactly how the legal system works within the Armed Forces.

I am sure any fair-minded person will reach the conclusion that things are proceeding properly in a fair manner.

[Translation]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is not up to judges and lawyers to do so, but to the Minister of National Defence.

I must say how very concerned I am about the precarious situation of our troops in Bosnia and in Somalia. They are asked to disarm civilians, without having the mandate to protect these same people. According to Colonel Michael Dewar of the International Institute for Strategic Studies in London, Canadians do not have the necessary equipment to protect themselves.

Neither the Secretary of State for External Affairs nor the Minister of National Defence have reported these serious events to the House.

Will the government, the Prime Minister, ask that a complete report on the situation of our troops in Bosnia and in Somalia be tabled in the House? Will he see that we have a parliamentary debate on the peacekeeping role of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how the hon. member has reached the conclusion that Canadian forces do not have the ability to protect themselves. They do indeed but perhaps not from the kind of innuendo the hon. member is putting forward in the House. But to protect themselves physically no military force has more experience, expertise or more respect from the rest of the world than the Canadian Armed Forces in terms of peacekeeping.

I want to remind the hon. member that what the Canadian Armed Forces are doing in Somalia is saving lives. Armed warlords were killing each other and depriving starving Somalis of food that was being made available by international relief efforts.

As a result of the activities of the Canadian Armed Forces and other armed forces under UN auspices hundreds, if not thousands, of Somali lives have been saved. He should remember that as the main purpose and that is what happened.

It does not mean that improper incidents by Canadian military personnel are to be ignored. They are not being ignored. The allegations are being investigated in a proper fashion. I wish the hon. member would allow those investigations to proceed in that manner.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. You heard the answer from his colleague. He did not answer the critic of the Official Opposition.

In the midst of the escalating crisis in Srebrenica, 150 Canadian soldiers have put their lives on the line in the name of UN peacekeeping. All Canadians, especially the family members of our Canadian forces, are fed up with the government's indecision and the mixed messages being sent to the UN high command.

The safety of our troops is at stake. The government must declare whether peacekeeping forces will defend themselves only or will they extend protection to the inhabitants of Srebrenica?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, their role under UN command is to try to bring about a disengagement of the forces as a result of the Muslim forces having acknowledged their defeat. They have been carrying that out admirably and in the process I think helping the situation.

Under the rules of engagement should they be attacked, they have the right to defend themselves. They are not there to engage in military action with the forces. They are there under UN command to effect the disengagement of the forces and they have been doing that very well.

• (1425)

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Why are we asking for additional forces? Why are we saying we will provide protection to the inhabitants? With what equipment?

It is very clear we need a full debate in the House on this whole issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, it is plain to Canadians that the current minister of defence is preoccupied, at least in her own mind, with a more important battle on another front, the fight for the leadership of her party.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Shields: If we had the helicopters there would be more protection.

Mr. Flis: The Tories hoot and howl, but the safety of our troops comes first to the opposition. Considering the future reputation of Canada as a peacekeeping nation, would the Acting Prime Minister give a message from this House to the Prime Minister to discharge the present minister of her responsibilities and appoint a new minister who has more time and commitment to this important role in a time of world crisis?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member is worried about the effectiveness and safety of Canadian forces. I hope he will convey that to his colleagues and perhaps they will re-examine their new-found position on the EH-101 helicopters.

As for the question of a debate in the House we would welcome a debate. I suggest the hon. member talk to his House leader about scheduling an opposition day at the first opportunity. It is available to him and we would welcome that opportunity.

The Canadian forces, by all accounts that I have heard or read, are conducting themselves admirably in Yugoslavia, contributing to the saving of lives. They have been getting the wounded and the weak out of Srebrenica and continue to perform in a fashion we have become accustomed to from the Canadian Armed Forces.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister and is a straightforward one I think.

When will the Minister of National Defence come before Parliament and the people of Canada and account for how she has conducted her responsibilities as Minister of National Defence in respect of the operations of our forces in Somalia?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the minister of defence has indicated, under the National Defence Act the minister has certain responsibilities that are similar to those of a judge in terms of the legal system. That precludes or circumvents or puts bounds around the kinds of things that can be said.

She has publicly asked that the Department of National Defence issue as much information as possible as soon as it becomes available in respect of these incidents in Somalia without prejudicing the case.

In order to give the hon. member and anybody else some comfort in the military's criminal investigations and the procedures and so on, as I indicated earlier there will be a briefing by the Judge Advocate General's office this afternoon for members and the media. Hopefully it will aid the member understand that the Minister of National Defence has been acting properly and in a responsible manner, given her responsibilities.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the minister does not need to lecture the House on the responsibilities of the Minister of National Defence. They are very clear.

We accept the minister has responsibilities in respect of the prosecution, but she also has responsibilities for the reputation of Canadian peacekeepers, how they are carrying out their responsibilities, what instructions she gave when she learned about these incidents, what she learned and what actions she took in her responsibilities for the troops in Somalia.

Will the Minister of National Defence come before this House tomorrow and make a comprehensive statement, within the bounds that she is limited, on how she has conducted her responsibilities, or will the minister recommend to the Prime Minister that she resign and be replaced?

• (1430)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, given the hon. member's questioning, it is touching to hear his concern about the reputation of the Canadian Armed Forces.

I would ask the hon. member to attend the briefing this afternoon, or read the National Defence Act if he chooses, and determine for himself the roles and responsibility of the Minister of National Defence in respect of these particular incidents. Then I would ask him after that in all intellectual honesty to examine what the Minister of National Defence has been saying and doing, and if he is a fair man he will reach the conclusion that she has been acting properly.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is a shame that the government and the Minister of National Defence are hiding behind her responsibilities.

[Translation]

By her silence the minister of National Defence undermines the reputation of our Canadian forces who do a great job. Could someone tell us when the Minister of National Defence intends to make a statement so we can finally get to the bottom of this?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as I answered earlier, and I realize that was after the member had written out his question, the Minister of National Defence said yesterday that she has instructed the department to make all details available as soon as they are required but in a manner of course not to prejudice the case.

The hon. member is saying he respects the reputation of the Canadian Armed Forces but on the other hand has been using every opportunity possible to suggest that somehow they have been improper in their activities, that the proper procedures are not being followed, and that somehow people who may have been guilty of crimes are not being investigated.

He suggests that there is a cover-up. He has not a smidgen of evidence for any of those allegations. I would suggest that if he is concerned about the reputation he should stop making these allegations which have no basis.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, Mr. Marcel Côté, the Chair of the Progressive Conservative platform committee, was saying that the budget will contain very painful cuts.

Can the minister confirm that in preparing his budget he took into account the fact that substantial cuts in government spending, if not matched by a parallel lowering of interest rates, will reactivate a major recession and create a crippling deflation?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will have to wait until Monday and then he can draw his own conclusions.

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, we have waited a long time to find out if this government understands the linkage between fiscal policy and monetary policy.

For years now we on this side of the House have called for a real agenda for change. All this government has given us is a series of stop-gap budgets, not one of which has addressed Canada's real needs.

The chair of the Progressive Conservative platform committee says that next Monday's budget is simply more of the same. He says: "Within a month and a half the budget", Mr. Mazankowski's budget, "will be totally forgotten".

If that is what Mr. Côté says, what is the government going to say to the International Monetary Fund?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Coté was not involved in the drafting and the putting together of the budget.

If the hon. member wants to know where we stand in terms of how to best achieve low interest rates, it is through the containing of inflation and fiscal consolidation.

Mr. Peterson: Kim does not like her officials; Don does not like his president.

Mr. Mazankowski: Both those policy pillars are certainly not in accord with the Liberal Party because its policy is to tax, spend and borrow. We have had far too much of that.

EUROPEAN BANK OF RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Today in London, England, Mr. Jacques Attali, president of the European development bank, held a press conference in which he apologized for the extravagant expenditure on the bank's headquarters. He also said that only yesterday he received another telephone call from the Prime Minister of Canada expressing his support.

• (1435)

I ask the Minister of Finance: How can the Prime Minister of Canada express his support for expenditure in only two years on the bank's headquarters which is more than twice what was spent on loans to struggling European countries? How can the Prime Minister appear to condone what to Canadians looks like the misuse of their hard-earned tax dollars, money his Conservative government committed to this bank?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is really interesting how the opposition tries to distort the facts.

Yesterday it was accusing the Prime Minister of withdrawing the Canadian director on the advice of the president of the EBRD. In that same press conference today he was asked the question directly by Madeleine Drohan of The Globe and Mail, and I quote: "There have been some reports that you asked for the Canadian director to be taken back. I am wondering if that is the case and what the reason was for it". The president: "It was not asked for". As a matter of fact he goes on to say that the directors who have served have served very well.

Why would the hon. member take issue with the position of the federal government which really is the same policy we apply back home? The director who has discharged his responsibilities in an exemplary fashion was merely carrying out the directives and the policy of the Government of Canada, period.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, speaking in this House about Jacques Attali, said:

> No, we didn't bring him over on a Canadian forces jet—wrong again.

Also yesterday in a Toronto newspaper, The Globe and Mail, it was reported and I quote:

> Mark Entwhistle, the Prime Minister's press spokesman, confirmed yesterday that Mr. Attali was flown to Ottawa from New York on March 5 aboard a Canadian Forces Challenger jet for a working luncheon.

I ask the Minister of Finance to explain this discrepancy. I ask him to explain why the Prime Minister denied something that actually happened. Why are he and the Conservative government so embarrassed and defensive about this matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that transportation was provided from New York. That is fully consistent with an international protocol that exists with all the G-7 countries. That is extended to the international financial institutions as well.

This is not something extraordinary. We extend this courtesy to people like Mr. Gorbachev and other foreign dignitaries who have difficulty in arranging their commercial transportation.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of health. I would like to say that we on this side of the House have greatly appreciated his contribution to public life.

In his remarks this week the minister said that he will continue to speak out in defence of universality in the Canadian health care system.

I want to ask the minister for his reaction to the increasing number of plans for private medical clinics for the wealthy, including one in Calgary which will also take public money for the selling of private beds in public hospitals and for the increased privatization of provincial health plans.

What actions is the minister of health prepared to take if the planned Calgary private MRI clinic goes ahead?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there are rules within the health care system in Canada which indicate that all administration of hospitals funded at the federal level with the provinces have to be public management.

If there is anything wrong with what is done in any part of the country dealing with the health care system, including what my hon. colleague referred to, it will be investigated by the department. If there is any problem we will see to it with the province involved. In this case the hon. member is talking about Alberta. We will wait for the province of Alberta to ensure that what is done is according to the rules of the health care system in Canada.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The minister's answers always overlook that the real reason private medicine is growing in this country is the five-year federal freeze on health funding. The federal government's cash contributions to medicare this year increased by $3.3 million or only 12 cents per Canadian.

Will the minister agree that the five-year freeze has not encouraged medicare innovation but instead has encouraged medical privatization and the development of a two-tiered U.S.-style health care system?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if the member would have listened to what I said in my first answer he would not have had to ask the second question.

He knows very well what I said. I said that within the rules of the health care system the federal level supports what is public management. I did not talk about the private health care system.

Once again talking about the money, he should know that the three provinces in which his party is represented have said for the last two or three years that there was enough money in the system. It is not a question of money; it is a question of management.

Once again, if he had listened to what I said the first time he would not have asked the second question.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, in its ruling earlier today on the Gemini case the competition tribunal decided that the order sought by the director of investigations and research was beyond its jurisdiction; but the tribunal did say, and I quote: "If Canadian fails or is forced to merge with Air Canada competition will likely be substantially lessened".

What contingency plans does the Minister of Transport have to ensure a competitive, Canadian controlled airline industry providing safe and accessible service to Canadians?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the decision rendered this morning by the competition tribunal is an important step in a due process that is ongoing.

The transaction between PWA and AMR is also being examined by the National Transportation Agency. PWA has already indicated that it will appeal this morning's ruling. I think it would be improper for me to comment on other aspects of this matter before this is settled.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, despite over a year of warnings this minister has done little more than issue idle threats about overcapacity in the airline industry, threatened to bring back some kind of recalibrated regulation and then backed off doing that, and provided under the table assistance to certain carriers by not requiring them to pay transportation fees and charges. During all that time he has never yet come forward to indicate whether his policy for Canada is to have one airline or to have two airlines competing.

When is this minister going to take responsibility for this portfolio and tell Canadians what he sees for the future of Canadian aviation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not it is as a result of the Minister of Transport's interventions, but I think Canadians should know that our two major airlines, Air Canada and Canadian Airlines, announced recently that they would reduce their capacity by 11 per cent. This is a step in the right direction, a direction which should bring both companies back to a profit level which should benefit all Canadians.

VIOLENCE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The Deputy Prime Minister will know that Canada has now become the second-most violent country in the western industrial world, second only to the United States. The minister will also know that an all-party committee of the House has described that one of the causes of this is the decline of social policies, in other words the very policy of the government.

Will the minister now admit to the House that increased crime, increased violence in homes and on our streets, is a direct result of the cutbacks in government programs and social policy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

• (1445)

YOUTH

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister's answer was short and so have been the solutions of this government to the problems facing this country.

My supplementary is for the same minister. Criminal activities among Canadian youth are on the rise, caused in large part by the helplessness among those in large cities who are looking for jobs, looking for training, looking for any opportunities. Instead of opportunities all this government offers is cutbacks, cutbacks in jobs, cutbacks in training, cutbacks in support for students.

How can this government pretend it is interested in the safety of our children when it gives them absolutely nothing to do and nothing to hope for?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, again there is I am sure not a deliberate, but a misleading attempt to distort the facts.

The fact of the matter is that the total federal social expenditures between 1984–85 and 1991–92 have increased by some $36 billion, from $57.3 billion to $92.7 billion. That is an increase of $35.6 billion or 7.1 per cent on an annualized basis. That is far more than the over-all program expenditures by the Government of Canada and far more than the rate of inflation.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The only thing we can safely say about the decision by the competition tribunal this morning is that the uncertainty facing both Air Canada and Canadian will continue into the near future.

What action is the minister prepared to take now to ensure there is a Canadian airline company around when the results of that appeal are heard?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first of all, we will let the process go through. One aspect of it is the question of the Gemini system. The other aspect is the question of de facto control. This is being examined by the NTA. We are monitoring this very extensively and I think matters are progressing satisfactorily.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the same minister.

The minister cannot stop the appeal. We know that. The minister cannot stop the NTA process. We know that. What we want to know is whether the minister is going to take other action to ensure that those two airline companies will survive. It does not do us any good to wait until the appeal is heard if there is only one airline left by that time.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have already mentioned several times that when both companies appeared before the National Transportation Agency they indicated that they knew how to become profitable again by reducing their capacity.

I am quite certain that the hon. member is aware that both companies recently announced that they were going to reduce their capacity by 12 per cent. It is not quite enough but it is a major step in the right direction to become profitable again for the benefit of all Canadians.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

This minister is undoubtedly aware that American Airlines has offered to purchase a third of Canadian's shares. The minister must have realized that for all intents and purposes, it meant a take-over by the American carrier, the air transportation world giant. The net result of this deal will be to jeopardize Air Canada and to eventually push this company under the control of another American giant.

I ask the minister to tell the House what he intends to do to prevent such a disaster.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member has kept himself informed but for the last month, the National Transportation Agency has been reviewing this particular situation.

This country is managed by rules according to which, in case of a transfer of shares between two companies, the National Transportation Agency, which is an independent agency, must review the terms of the proposed agreement and decide whether or not they fall within the scope of the legislation.

The National Transportation Agency will hand down its ruling by May 28 and any speculation in this matter is pure fantasy.

• (1450)

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): In other words, Mr. Speaker, everyone is responsible except the minister in charge. Instead of playing the same old tune with his wishy-washy answers, the minister should remember that the fate of the Canadian airline industry is being decided.

Does he not realize that the only responsible and reasonable solution to this problem is through the merger of Canadian Airlines and Air Canada? Does he not agree that this is the only way to save the 6,000 Air Canada jobs in the Montreal region?

[English]

I ask the minister to tell the House what measures he will take to force a merger of Canadian and Air Canada in order to provide Canada with at least one healthy national airline.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will answer in one language only because with simultaneous translation the answer will be the same in both languages. I hope that from now on the comments the member makes in his riding will be different from what he said recently on that subject.

With regard to the matter before the National Transportation Agency of Canada, I think the honourable member, who is a lawyer, should know that everything is proceeding as it should and that we have laws in this country we must live by. The National Transportation Agency of Canada will decide if the proposed transaction is in accordance with the legislation. By the way, I think the question was even more trivial than any reply I could give.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

As he knows, we are just emerging from a brutal three-year period of world-wide economic problems. The fundamentals are now in place for growth and expansion here in Canada. Inflation is low; interest rates are attractively low.

However many small and medium-sized businesses in my riding cannot obtain loans from our major banks. How can the government convince the banks to be more reasonable in their credit-granting practices?

It seems to me that the banks have become part of the problem of this recovery instead of being part of the solution.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, indeed that is a good question.

The government has certainly been trying to address that and to do whatever it can to stimulate the small business sector, to take a number of initiatives to make credit available to the whole ambit of the small business sector in a more effective way. To that end, government has brought in changes to the Small Businesses Loans Act which have increased the over-all borrowing to $250,000. There have been a number of important measures that will improve access and the utilization of the Small Businesses Loans Act.

It has prompted a very positive response from the Royal Bank of Canada and other banks. I want to make particular note of the fact that the Bank of Nova Scotia and one or two other banks have indicated that under this new proposal they will be prepared to loan money to small businesses under the Small Businesses Loans Act at the prime rate of interest, which is 6 per cent. That is a very good indication of the banks' willingness to co-operate with the small business sector. I applaud them for their efforts.

EXTERNAL AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put my question to the Minister for External Relations. It concerns development assistance cuts.

Yesterday the minister stated that her treacherous application of a regional strategy, Africa 21, was not influenced by the leaked department of external affairs document which proposed linking aid to Canadian trade priorities. If this was not the motive for the minister's cuts in Africa, why did the minister choose to abandon or level disproportionate cuts to many of the poorest emerging democracies in Africa, our stated first priority?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I first want to repeat here in this House that we have not abandoned Africa, quite the contrary. As part of the practice that I had to implement, we considered very seriously the consensus and the best way to deliver programs to continue providing social, cultural, political and economic aid to all countries in Africa, Asia and the Americas. We therefore had to take the regional base into account, on which there was a social consensus. Based on these decisions and these consultations which preceded Africa 21, we took the measures announced in our economic statement of December 2, 1992.

• (1455)

I want to tell this House again that we will always have available to the countries of Africa, wherever and whatever they are, the funds needed for humanitarian aid, emergency relief, food, and of course we must do business with the African countries, which can also deal with Canada.

[English]

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. This government has abandoned the poorest countries in Africa. Token programs will not replace the lost support for long-term development projects. The president of the World Bank reminds us that not helping the poorer countries carries negative consequences for all.

Why does the minister not reverse her many appalling budget cut decisions in Africa until a full public review of development assistance policy can be made?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the world political context has evolved and the needs have changed. We must adapt our procedures and program delivery to new requirements. Even the United Nations Secretary-General agrees that the best way to help the poorest African country is through regional development and that is what we are working on. I repeat, we have not turned our back on Africa. We are simply applying our programs differently.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Finance why as a result of the government's new immigration law proclaimed on February 1 the department is not renewing the work permits of thousands of refugees who had jobs, satisfied employers and were supporting themselves. The minister of immigration and his officials promised in committee on February 17 and March 24 that this would be corrected, yet two months later nothing has been done.

Why is the government throwing these people on to the welfare rolls when the minister has said he wants to cut the deficit?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows the minister of immigration is away on government business. I will take notice of the question and I am sure he will get back to the hon. member as soon as he returns.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, every day we learn of refugees who are losing their jobs because their permits are not being renewed.

[Translation]

In the debate on Bill C-86, we alerted the government to this result and we even proposed amendments, but the government did not listen. I now ask the government to proclaim regulations to ensure that all refugees' work permits will be extended until their final hearing.

[English]

Why sap the welfare system when refugees want to work and they have jobs?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, since my hon. colleague's supplementary question called for regulations, I will of course transmit this request to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. It concerns reports that the government is failing to collect millions of dollars in GST from American magazines, thus putting Canadian magazines at a disadvantage.

Is the minister prepared to deal with this problem in some way, or is he prepared to choose an alternative strategy and that is to get rid of the GST, the tax on reading material altogether, so that this discrepancy would disappear? If he is not prepared to do that, what is he prepared to do to make sure these American magazines are paying the GST?

Mr. Harvard: Axe the tax.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we did axe the tax. We axed the federal manufacturers' sales tax, making Canada more competitive.

The hon. member should know that the large American and indeed foreign publications are GST registrants. They pay and collect the GST in Canada. Publications such as Newsweek, Esquire and others all pay and collect the tax. The majority of other publications that come into this country have sales of less than $30,000 and as such are on a level playing field with Canadian publications with sales of $30,000 or less and do not have to register or collect the tax.

THE BUDGET

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

This morning we heard the opposition bleating for more spending and fewer cuts. Today in the Financial Post an article summarizes a report in which the Business Council on National Issues warns that Canada is facing a debt crisis. The council strongly argues that there is an urgent need for Ottawa and the provinces to cut their combined deficits from $60 billion to $40 billion per year. Canada's future depends on it.

In the forthcoming budget does the minister intend to take action which is firm and effective enough to achieve this absolutely essential objective and to what extent will he involve the provinces?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question because it highlights the number one concern facing Canadians from coast to coast and that is the acknowledgement and recognition that we have a national debt problem composed of a debt at the federal level and the provincial level. They clearly want governments to work together to address this very pressing issue.

To the extent that we can provide leadership at the federal level, we will be trying to establish a process which will allow the federal government and the provinces to co-ordinate a fiscal and economic plan to lead us out of the difficulties faced by the growing deficit.

I hope the budget I bring down on Monday will go some distance in dealing with the very serious question my hon. friend raises. I appreciate the fact that he too is very concerned. I hope he can get some concern generated by the Liberals and New Democrats as well.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a very brief point of order.

During Question Period my colleague from Windsor West alleged that the Prime Minister spoke to President Attali yesterday. That allegation is absolutely false, untrue, unfounded.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): That is a bogus point of order, as I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister knows.

Mr. Speaker, my business question is for the government House leader and concerns the House business for tomorrow.

If the Deputy Prime Minister wishes to engage in debate on whether the Prime Minister was correctly quoted or whether he was just careless with the truth, I would be happy to accommodate him at any time.

Could the minister indicate the business for tomorrow? Since the budget has been announced for Monday of next week, which was subsequent to our meeting of House leaders last Tuesday, I would ask the government House leader what he will be proceeding with on Monday and if he could give us the line-up for the rest of the week.

Business of the House

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, yes. Tomorrow we will debate Bill C-93, the government organizations act at third reading. This afternoon will be the first of eight allotted days during this supply period. Tomorrow will be the government organizations bill.

On Monday, prior to the budget address by the Minister of Finance at 4.30 p.m., there is a number of pieces of legislation we would like to deal with: Bill C-109, the bill dealing with privacy provisions for cellular phone use; Bill S-17, the intellectual property act; Bill C-72, the environmental round table act; Bill C-107, explosives act; and, Bill C-90, the sentencing act.

I recognize that on a number of those there is a great deal of consensus and hopefully we can deal with them. I also recognize that not all of those might be in that category.

We will begin the budget debate on Tuesday and I expect to continue it on Wednesday. I will be in discussions with House leaders opposite on the business for the rest of the week and indeed for the rest of the month.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the government House leader that although we have co-operated extensively in the past in facilitating legislation in this House, I do not believe for a moment that all of the legislation which he read for Monday could ever be completed in a full day. I wonder if I can get the priority of the bills that he has in mind and the order in which they will be introduced. He has read a number of bills. Will he be starting with Bill C-109 or will it be S-17? I think the House would like to know.

• (1505)

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, my intention is to start with Bill C-109 and then proceed to S-17. If through our discussions there would be some reason to change that order I would certainly entertain such a possibility.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the government House leader. The first question is on behalf of my leader.

Would the government House leader give us some indication on the status of the Yukon land claims act? I know we have been looking at that for some time. I think that would be helpful, particularly for the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure. Is that the one that is currently before committee or that is still to be introduced? It has passed? I am not sure what the problem is in that regard but I will certainly look into it and get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, in terms of that progress, perhaps I could ask my hon. friend, not necessarily through the House but just on a personal basis, to inform me of what the status is.

I also want to take this opportunity to ask one other question. The NAFTA legislation, when it went to committee for the first time today, the first order of business was to introduce a form of closure. That in itself is disappointing.

When the NAFTA legislation returns to the House of Commons and considering that we had less than five hours' debate at second reading, the important stage of principle, would he at least give us the assurance that the government will not use closure or time allocation at report stage or third reading just so we can have some cover that there will be adequate debate?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, what happened at committee, which is what I would like to see happen more frequently—in the House it does happen from time to time—is that the committee agreed to a reasonable and rational approach to the hearing of witnesses and clause by clause study. It put forward a complete program. All the committee members indicated that they would be willing to put in the hours and the time for the next few weeks to get it done. I think that is highly appropriate.

Certainly there are provisions under Standing Order 78(1) and (2) that allow us to get together as House leaders and agree on a reasonable amount of time in respect of report stage and third reading. I am also more than willing to sit down with opposition House leaders and discuss such an agreement.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, this puts us into a very delicate and almost impossible situation because the New Democratic Party opposes this legislation completely and totally. Therefore when the government House leader asks us to co-operate or to facilitate with legislation I just have to tell him that there is no way on God's earth we can ever do that.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I understand. I was not suggesting the New Democratic Party should bring itself to vote for the legislation. I understand they are philosophically unable to do that or because Bob White told them not to. I do not know what it is, but surely there is a difference between saying once you are opposed to something you must talk about it to infinity to express that opposition.

After a reasonable period of debate and discussion—I do not think the hon. member is going to be able to change our minds, and I doubt if we will be able to change his mind—one has to ask what value there is to prolonged, unlimited debate since the outcome will not change.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Kamloops but briefly. It is getting very much into a debate.

Mr. Riis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I just want to make two points to my hon. friend. Considering that the government only permitted less than five hours of debate at the important second reading stage—we can call it all sorts of names—we say that this is completely unacceptable in a democratic society.

I want to say to my hon. friend that yes, we do wish to debate this. Yes, we do want to see it handled appropriately. I must say that not because of any individual or any particular group that we as a political party feel that this legislation is not in the best interests of our country and the future generations of Canadians. We oppose it for that reason and not for any other reason. For my friend to ask me to co-operate I have to say it is just not possible on this particular piece of legislation.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I understand as well as, I think, any member of the House that there is a strong difference of opinion about the legislation. However, I think we have had enough of an exchange on it. I am going now to the next member seeking the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, regarding Bills C-107, C-92 an C-90 slated for Monday, the hon. minister said that there was agreement or that some kind of cooperation or consensus was possible among the opposition parties.

I would like to remind the minister that we have not had any information. When, as was the case yesterday, we are informed before the vote, we are quite willing to co-operate with the House to make sure that there is only one vote, as yesterday. We are ready to co-operate but we would like to be informed regarding those three bills which are very important to us. We would like to co-operate with the government but it could at least have the decency to keep us informed just like the other parties.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I also wish to address a question to the House leader regarding Bill C-7.

I am sure the House leader is aware that Bill C-7 which deals with the status of the artist received Royal Assent June 23, 1992 but it has not been proclaimed.

Can the House leader inform us of the governments intentions and when this legislation will be proclaimed?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I cannot immediately. Having passed it we are interested in having it put into effect. I presume that the administrative arrangements associated with it have not yet been put in place but I will have to check into that and get back to the hon. member.

PRIVILEGE

MEMBER FOR SAINT-HUBERT—DIVISION ON BILL C-62—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Two days ago division No. 458 was held on Bill C-62. The hon. member for Saint-Hubert raised a question of privilege on the way it was tallied. She clearly explained, after the Acting Speaker had spoken, how the votes of some members of the House had been misinterpreted.

After reviewing the case and the circumstances surrounding the vote, I am indeed of the opinion that a mistake took place in the House. Consequently, following the request by the member for Saint-Hubert—

[English]

I can announce that I will as Speaker issue a corrigendum and the record will clearly correct the situation to effect the way members did wish to vote on that vote. It is an error. It was not intentional and I hope that satisfies hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Plamondon: I wish to thank you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois members, for taking the time to listen to our grievances and above all, for correcting the ruling made at the time by the Acting Speaker. I thank you for your co-operation.

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you on behalf of the House. As a servant of the people and of this House you have upheld in an exemplary manner the true principles of democracy in this place.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member as well as the member for Richelieu.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Langdon (p.).

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House rose the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex had concluded his remarks. We will now proceed with the five-minute period of questions or comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, this morning the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex, who formerly was minister of Agriculture under the Liberal government, made an extraordinary speech because he has a great heart and cares about his country, especially about agriculture in Canada.

I can tell you that I have often read his writings and they are always very informative on issues which are often complex. The hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex frequently tells us how, since 1984, the programs of the Conservative government have destroyed agriculture in Canada and have very often hurt producers and food processors.

[English]

I would greatly appreciate it if the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex would give his thoughts and feelings on food production and processing in Canada, where it comes from and where it is going.

Mr. Ferguson: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for the question.

First, I should reiterate the fact that Canadian food production and processing have the highest quality standards of any country in the world.

However I am growing increasingly alarmed at hearing the government say that we have to be more globally competitive. The government has not told us what that competition is.

I have a publication here called Viewpoint by Ernst and Young. It points out that in Europe the top 10 food manufacturers account for 60 per cent of the turnover among the top 40 companies.

We think this is a high level of concentration. In Canada the top five food distributors control 80 per cent and that is almost a monopolistic situation. In fact in some parts of the country one would have to term it that.

If we have to be globally competitive we cannot ignore the fact that there are some huge transnational corporations that control huge sectors of the U.S. agriculture industry in both production and processing.

One firm controls 25 per cent of chicken production and processing. Two firms control a huge volume of the beef processing. Between those two firms they slaughter 43,000 head of cattle a day. One of those firms has now bought a huge plant in Saltillo, Mexico.

How do we as Canadians compete against that type of thing? We do not have those volumes. On top of that, those huge firms have now been using a streamlined inspection system, or SIS, in terms of food quality. It simply means that it hires its own inspectors.

Last January a large number of children in Washington State became very ill. They were violently ill. In fact three of them died from food poisoning from eating contaminated hamburgers. Several more have permanent kidney damage. Some children in Abbotsford and Chilliwack had the same problems. I submit that this was a disaster waiting to happen. I talked about the quality standards prior to this in the House of Commons.

I maintain that our Canadian systems are the best in the world. We have to maintain those systems. We have to maintain the production systems across Canada that have been the best in the world and that have supplied Canadian consumers with high quality food at very reasonable prices. We can never afford, as Canadians, to let other corporations take control of our food supply.

As another member from eastern Ontario has pointed out on many occasions, food production and processing in Canada must be made a national security item.

• (1520)

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I am particularly pleased to be able to stand up in this House today to debate what I consider an important motion, which is the devastating effects of this government's policies on jobs for Canadians.

While I recognize that there is a tremendous crushing and debilitating effect on those who have lost jobs directly, it goes beyond that. I want to talk about those spin-offs. Let us look at the situation to make sure that we are talking from the same sheet.

Since 1989, in the manufacturing sector alone, between 300,000 and 400,000 jobs have been lost. That is roughly 15 per cent. In the U.S. it has been 7 per cent. While the government argues about a world-wide recession, the U.S. has fared much better than Canada.

Let us look at some facts on the economy. The net public debt at the end of 1991-92 was $422.8 billion. That is much more than double the debt that the government inherited in 1984. The federal deficit for 1991-92 was $34.6 billion. We see over the years that the deficit has exceeded $30 billion virtually all the time. The proposed deficit for 1992-93 was $34.4 billion. The deficit for the first 10 months of the fiscal year 1992-93 was $31.2 billion. The unemployment rate in March 1993 was 11 per cent. The number of Canadians unemployed was in excess of 1.5 million Canadians. The number of Canadians on welfare was in excess of 2.7 million. I have not talked about the food banks which will nourish well over two million Canadians this year.

Here are some other negative changes that have occurred. In 1988 there were 789,000 families experiencing unemployment. In 1992 it is 1.132 million. The unemployment rate in 1988 was 7.5 per cent. That is the average. In 1992 it was 11.5 per cent, which again is an average. What a deterioration. Youth unemployment is particularly close to my heart. In November 1988 it was 11.8 per cent. In February 1993 it was 16.7 per cent. The number of youths who have never worked was 350,000 on average in 1989. In 1991 it climbed to 412,000. In 1992 it was 475,000 and we expect it to be even higher in 1993.

Ask Canadians about their expectations for the future. We did ask this in 1988: Do you think the country and the economy will be stronger and will you be better off or worse off? In 1989, when we got the results, 28 per cent said that we would be better off. In 1992 it had gone down to 16 per cent. Those who said that we would be worse off were 41 per cent in 1989 and in 1992 it was 54 per cent.

I could give some more statistics but I think that I have made the point. The situation has deteriorated by virtually every single economic indicator that we use.

People will say: "You are a member of the opposition so obviously you are going to make statements like that". I want to draw the attention of the House to an article in The Gazette on April 16, 1993. The headline reads: "A national disaster, The real unemployment poll, A staggering 3.9 million people is a gaping wound in Canadian society, Catholic bishops say". What have been some of the headlines across the country? "Japanese owner shuts Trenton plant, Stamping plant to close in June, 91 to lose jobs".

• (1525)

In another article it says: "Auto plant closing to cost 200 jobs". In yet another one there is a map of southern Ontario and metro Toronto with all of the factories and commercial enterprises that have closed. There are many dots. "Job loss data points to manufacturing decline". It goes on to point out how serious it is.

Other articles say: "Where the jobs are disappearing, Job drain at critical mass to union: Hawker Siddeley taking Surrey plant south, Battered Cornwall loses 360 more jobs, 150 will lose jobs in a few months when Gatineau acoustic panel plant shuts, Penetang seat belt plant to move 194 jobs to Mexico, Aerospace plant closes, Auto parts plant closing: 115 jobs vanish". It goes on and on and on.

My province of Manitoba has not, in fact, been spared the devastation of the government's economic policies because it has on virtually every single indicator of poverty, the highest score in Canada. With youth poverty it is the worst record in Canada.

As I travel in my riding and as I travel through Winnipeg I see scores of plants and businesses that have closed and it looks like a devastated area.

As I indicated initially, it is extremely sad that those people have lost jobs because it impacts not only upon them but upon other members of the family and their immediate entourage in the community. It creates stress and a feeling of not being empowered to do anything about it.

There is something else that is often forgotten. Those job losses also assist other sectors. There is an important spin-off.

Let me give a number of critical examples from my riding, which is not unlike many others in Canada. In my riding there is the St. Boniface General Hospital, l'Hôpital Général de St. Boniface. There are many, many job losses as a result of these closings, of this bankruptcy and of this economic situation that is not only recessionary but even worse. There is also those billions of dollars that have not been transferred over to the provinces.

I have in my own riding the Collège universitaire de St. Boniface that is the only French language university in western Canada. It too has been affected as have the other universities and the community colleges because of the reduction in the transfer to provinces for education, training and retraining. It has been affected seriously. There are losses of jobs in those sectors. Community colleges are particularly hard hit. There are people lined up who cannot get the training that they require in order to dig themselves out of this hole called poverty.

There is simply not enough training. There are bankruptcies and closures everywhere. There are delays for new start ups. There are well-qualified and highly motivated people, sometimes with double degrees and sometimes journeymen and journeywomen, who have excellent working records but cannot find jobs.

Let me give a few examples. There is a woman who is a new Canadian who had been a teacher and civil servant in her country. She is willing to take any job in order to help her family. She will have two daughters who will be going to university to be able to benefit from that which we have benefited in the past. Try as she might there is no work.

There is a person who because of health reasons needed to take early retirement but whose spouse developed difficult medical problems and needed some additional attention. He wants to supplement his income with a little extra work. He is well qualified and highly motivated. There is nothing there.

A married young man below the age of 30 is willing to undertake any job. There is nothing.

I could go on and on.

I believe I have nevertheless demonstrated that the policies of this government regarding job creation have failed and I would be pleased to answer any question from my government colleagues about my speeches or any other subject.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague from St. Boniface. I used to live in the suburb of Norwood in St. Boniface and I know of St. Boniface hospital.

I know from my friends still in Winnipeg that district in Manitoba has been very hard hit, as he has said. In fact I felt much closer to what he was saying because there are so many stories like that about southern Ontario. He has made a very clear case that the present economy is not working and a change of course is needed.

On that basis I would like to ask the hon. member a two-part question. What does he feel will be the effect on the economy of southern Manitoba of the North American free trade agreement if it is adopted and brought into force? On the basis of whatever answer he gives to that first question, what is his party's intention regarding the North American free trade agreement?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the question. How I wish he were still a resident of my riding of St. Boniface. In spite of his political preference I am sure he would probably support me during the next election.

Mr. Heap: I hope you would support me.

Mr. Duhamel: Of course I would. A gentleman like you, why would I not?

With respect to the very serious question of what my party's position is with respect to NAFTA, we have put it out time and time again. I feel very comfortable with that position. We have indicated that we cannot support NAFTA the way it is. We need a common set of trade rules. We need to ensure that environmental and labour standards are respected. We need to have security over energy and water.

Those are some of the issues that my leader has spoken about and that he is concerned about. He would make sure those were corrected and rectified before signing such an agreement. He has also said that this is a wonderful opportunity to correct the deficiencies of the Canada-U.S. trade agreement and I applaud him for having done that. By the way, he has also said that if we could not get those kinds of agreements we would abrogate.

There are those who would abrogate first but they would still have to negotiate. They have not proven their case that if they were to abrogate and then negotiate they would come up with a better package than we would if we were to sit down at the table and negotiate.

I feel very comfortable with our position. I think it is a responsible one. I am concerned as are many Canadians that if this is to go through the way it is, the kind of devastation I have described today will continue and it must stop. It must absolutely stop. The country cannot take any more of it.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, would not the hon. member have considered it useful if the bill had been defeated in the vote on second reading? Almost half of the members of the hon. member's caucus were absent for the vote. Those who were present voted against the bill on second reading but of course it was not enough to defeat second reading.

Can the hon. member comment on why almost half of his caucus chose to be absent so that while their votes of those present were recorded against it, the caucus as a whole allowed the second reading to go through by having nearly half the members absent and therefore not voting?

Mr. Duhamel: Madam Speaker, I know that I voted against it. I do not know whether it was half or almost half and I hesitate to speak for those who were absent. I think they can do that for themselves. I am sure there was no machiavellian plan, not that my colleague has suggested that, to try to help the government get it through. I assure the hon. member that is not true. They were solidly behind the leader and his policy. We do not want this bill to go through as it is. We need a standard code of trading rules. We need improved security with respect to labour and environmental standards and the points I have made. I assure my hon. colleague there is no hesitation on our part. Our position is clear. It is there. It will be followed and it will be respected.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, here we go again. Another simplistic motion condemning this government's economic policies. It is so easy for the opposition to produce motions without taking the time to really analyse the government's economic record. In fact, there is now a wave of optimism among Canadians about our economic recovery. And what do we get from members opposite? Another dose of pessimism and negative commentary. The usual unrelenting, repetitive and inaccurate criticism of the government's economic policies.

If my hon. colleagues do not know the facts, I will be glad to explain what those facts are. Only last week the Conference Board of Canada, an independent agency, predicted that economic growth will be even stronger than expected. Exports are up and inflation is very low. In fact we have the lowest inflation rate of any industrialized country. Interest rates are low and stable. The Canadian dollar is strong, and employment opportunities are improving. I know the unemployment rate is high. In any case one unemployed worker in this country will always be one too many. However, does the opposition realize that while the unemployment rate is high, there is optimism generated by our economic recovery among Canadians who are starting to look for work again?

Our government is willing to listen to constructive criticism that is documented and based on fact, not to negative criticism and unfounded accusations based on rumour.

Consider economic growth. Among the G-7 countries, Canada is outranked only by the United States on standard of living per capita, based on the gross domestic product. In recent years, strong economic growth has helped us close part of the gap that separates us from our prosperous neighbour to the south. Investment as a percentage of GDP is at its highest level in 25 years. On this point we outrank the United States and Germany. Manpower productivity is increasing while our production costs have gone down considerably. In addition substantial gains in productivity have enhanced Canada's competitive position on international markets.

The opposition referred to job losses, but do they realize that in the past few years, Canada created more jobs than any other G-7 country? Other countries envy our ability to create jobs. Although opposition members take the negative view, as usual, our government is committed to implementing positive policies that will guarantee sustainable growth.

And here is what we are already doing with that in mind: we are giving small businesses a 10 per cent tax credit for all machinery and equipment they will purchase this year. Furthermore, most businesses hiring new workers this year will not be subject to increases in unemployment insurance premiums. I may remind the House that the opposition voted against these measures.

The government has extended the Small Business Financing Program for two years. This program allows companies to refinance loans at less than market rates.

• (1540)

We simplified the rules so as to encourage more investment in small business with RRSPs. We also raised the ceiling on loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act to $250,000.

Our government is not unaware that research and development is also essential to lasting economic growth. That is why we increased tax incentives for companies doing research and development by $230 million in the past five years. We have also set aside a $400 million reserve to overcome tax barriers to the technological development and the growth of business.

Our approach is as logical as can be. We ask Canadians to show self-discipline and to make short-term sacrifices so that our country can reap long-term benefits.

The only way to get rich quick is to win the lottery. Our government will not endanger Canadians' future economic well-being by unearthing the temporary one-shot job creation projects of the 1970s that went nowhere and cost them so dearly. We remember the old ideas of our Liberal friends. Like old ghosts from the past these Liberal candidates resurface, like the leader of the Liberal Party, a man of the past who, by the way, was a member of the House of Commons when John F. Kennedy was President of the United States. These people would take us back to the old recipes of bygone days, recipes which in the 1970s did not solve any problem, but indebted us, and we are still paying for them. They are just solutions from the past.

Our government has not continued on that dead-end path to put Canadians back to work. We want workers to attain a good standard of living and contribute to Canada's economic prosperity.

For this we have adopted a constructive approach that will produce lasting results in the long run. The opposition motions criticizing our government suggest that we should act as if our heavy debt burden did not exist. They are always trying to ignore it and asking us to act as though there was no debt. All they want to do is spend and spend and spend. They love to spend other people's money.

That means living beyond our means and placing an undue financial burden in a completely irresponsible way on the shoulders of those who will come after us—our children and grandchildren. The government will not take that path. The Canadian people have given us the fundamental responsibility to act in the interest of the economy and we intend to live up to it.

Canada's greatest resource is its people and its workers. That is why our programs count on working people. They show the confidence we have in their initiative, our confidence in the imagination, determination and dynamism of the workers of this country.

As the amendments we made to the unemployment insurance plan show, we are convinced that Canadian workers can succeed. We can no longer spare those who do not act responsibly enough to keep their jobs, simply because they do not want to work. We appeal to their deep sense of self-esteem and we ask them to contribute to the economic recovery.

We must emphasize training. We absolutely must prepare Canadian workers so that they can take their place in the world economy which is moving ahead rapidly and is based on knowledge and high technology. Every day, workers tell our employment counsellors that they want training. Training is almost everybody's top priority. They do not want to be subsidized by collecting unemployment insurance. They want to have a reasonable chance to get better jobs. They want training.

To meet this demand during the fiscal year which just ended, we spent $3.5 billion to enable 685,300 Canadian workers to participate in government programs relating to the labour market.

During this new fiscal year, we will spend about $3.8 billion on programs and services related to the labour market. I think that even my hon. colleagues will agree that this is a significant increase, compared to the $2.1 billion spent in 1985-86. Of the $3.8 billion, $2.21 billion will be spent on specific training and adjustment initiatives for UI claimants in the context of the so-called developmental uses. This amount is the largest ever spent on developmental uses in the UI account. It is 13 per cent more than last year and almost four and one half times more than the $500 million budgeted in 1990. What is so terrible is the fact that the opposition voted against these excellent initiatives.

We are talking not only about expenditures but also about investment. I wonder if my hon. colleagues understand that. The economic downturn is an integral part of global restructuring; it is useless to attempt to put the blame on the government and its actions. If my colleagues from the opposition displayed a little bit of intellectual honesty, they would clearly tell the population that a large part of our present problems are due to a restructuring of the world economy.

The government is not sitting idle, waiting to see what will happen. In spite of all the negative and senseless objections made by the opposition, we take positive measures to help workers face the competition more easily once the economic recovery is definitely under way.

This year one million UI claimants should get some occupational training while receiving benefits. This is how we invest these $2.1 billion. I challenge my hon. colleagues to propose a better way to invest in Canada's future.

Occupational training is certainly the top priority for workers who have had many productive years and who suddenly find themselves unemployed because of this industrial restructuring at the international level. This is the reality and when we talk to workers, they recognize that reality.

Workers who have been laid off and who have worked uninterruptedly for at least five consecutive years have a well established work ethic. They know what they want. They want training and professional development in order to rejoin the labour force. And the government fully intends to provide them with this training.

Our government will spend $300 million to help put these people back to work as soon as possible. To this end we will create partnerships with business communities and organizations. We are in the process of setting up local adjustment committees to meet the particular needs of the clientele. These initiatives are taken to improve our economy.

I also wonder if my hon. colleagues know that our work sharing program enables us to use the UI fund so as to avoid lay-offs. In periods of work slowdowns, employers can keep workers who agree to work a shorter week and who are eligible for UI benefits for the down days.

These are among the other initiatives taken by our government.

Experience has taught us that the government must allow the private sector to have direct input regarding the use of federal resources to solve problems related to the labour market. These employers are important stakeholders. We have also learned that the private sector must spend more time, make more efforts and use more resources, so that we have skilled workers who are able to face the competition.

The government helps to achieve these objectives by gathering together business people and other stakeholders in powerful and effective sector groups.

Working together with the business community and other stakeholders, we have already set up 17 sectoral councils to help promote continuing training. But that is a fact that the opposition forgets to mention, does not remember and fails to recognize. We are now improving this positive approach through a five-year plan, the sectoral partnerships initiative in which we are investing $352 million. This program, which has recently received an extra $250 million in funding, will enable Canadian business to face the human resources challenges confronting it and to do so within the scope of the program. It is essential, for one thing, to establish clearly what skills workers will need to enable Canada to remain competitive in the future. This is a major aspect of our strategy that the opposition has deliberately omitted.

With this in view, the number of sectorial councils will be increased by 38, to a total of 55. These councils will look into human resource development, a challenge now facing Canadian business. The sectoral partnerships initiative is based on the premise that the private sector is responsible for training workers on the job. However, we lag far behind our global competitors when it comes to manpower development. That is why our government will once again act responsibly and provide leadership on this issue.

Under this new program, tax incentives for training programs in industry can be created and even more workers can be trained under cost-sharing agreements signed with the government's partners. The sectoral councils will also develop new and improved occupational standards to increase performance and job opportunities for 3.5 million Canadian workers.

I would like to point out that the new program will not be implemented at the expense of short-term job creation programs as the government intends it as a long-term job creation plan. However, our immediate concern should be, and is indeed, putting Canadians back to work.

The sectoral partnership initiative flows from the many priorities set by business. The sector studies we have undertaken were widely applauded, apart from the opposition. That is how we know that there is strong support for new partnerships between government and business.

The emphasis should be on establishing partnerships. Neither the government nor the opposition can claim to be able to solve the problem on their own. We need partners. We need to create partnerships, to work together with business, labour, educational and training institutions as well as community organizations. Indeed, partnerships have always been important and, now that the economic recovery is under way, it is more important than ever for all Canadians to be involved in such partnerships. That is obvious. If all Canadians join forces our country can remain prosperous.

I urge my colleagues opposite to set aside their negative rhetoric and to join all Canadians in living up to the United Nations report which says that the best quality of life in the world is found in this great country of ours. Try as they may on the opposition side to blame all this country's problems on the alleged bad policies of this government, the fact remains that every time we have introduced measures to control and cut our expenditures to bring the deficit under control, every time we introduced measures to promote better training for Canadian workers, every time we took initiatives such as those under the Patent Act, what did the opposition do? It voted against. They have condemned our measures, often at the expense of the people of Canada and their well-being.

As usual, this motion is pointless. It is totally partisan rhetoric from the opposition.

• (1555)

I call upon all hon. members of this House to reject and vote against this motion which, in itself, is sheer negativism at a time when our economy needs to perform better and better.

I once again urge all my hon. colleagues to reject such a pointless motion, which is of no use to the Canadian.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, toward the end of his speech, the hon. member talked about the rhetoric of the opposition. In fact, throughout his speech, he accused the opposition of making negative comments about the government.

I would like to remind the hon. member that last week, while the House was not sitting, two important reports were released and they did not come from the opposition. In its report, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops made alarming statements about the economic, financial and social situation of Canada.

Then Statistics Canada showed us the real picture which was especially revealing for us in Montreal. For two years now we have been asking the government to tell us how it will revitalize our area. I hope I will have enough time to go through some statistics since the questions and comments period is quite limited.

I would like to refer my hon. colleague to an article by Paul Durivage published in La Presse on March 9. The three sources I just mentioned have nothing to do with the opposition. I am referring to one journalist, the Catholic Bishops of Montreal, and Statistics Canada which is a government agency.

I have a copy of Paul Durivage's article which appeared in the March 9 issue of La Presse and I quote:

> According to Mr. Jacques Pelletier, senior market analyst for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, since 1990 there are 4 per cent fewer jobs in the area.
> The retail market is flat. Last December, of all the metropolitan areas, it was still in Montreal department stores that sales were the slowest.
> As for home building, last year was the worst on record since 1982 in Metropolitan Montreal.
> The slump in the building industry is closely connected to a high vacancy rate which has been consistently increasing since 1986 to reach 7.5 per cent today. For the last thirty years, there have never been so many empty dwellings in the Montreal area.
> Many office spaces are also vacant. In the hotel industry, the Association des hôtels du Grand Montréal, which keeps track of the number of beds occupied in the 45 biggest hotels of the city, sees no visible sign of recovery.

These are telling signs. I have a few very interesting graphs under the caption "A city for rent". Unemployment rate, the curve is going up; housing starts, decreasing; office space vacancy rate, on the rise; hotel occupancy rate, decreasing; retail sales, decreasing; inflation rate, decreasing.

This is this government's track record. So, instead of blaming the opposition for reminding the government every day of the misery that prevails elsewhere, the government had better deal with the real problems people face instead of creating systems which, in the long and the short run, will only benefit its friends.

Instead of blaming others, this government, which was elected in 1984 on the promise of jobs, jobs, jobs, should explain why after nine years we have the kind of numbers which were released by Statistics Canada. Do you know that in Canada we have 1,537,000 unemployed workers and 2,700,000 Canadians on welfare? We have close to four million Canadians who, one way or another, have no job and live below the poverty level, thanks to our Tory government.

• (1600)

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, understandably the hon. member for Saint-Léonard who represents a Montreal area riding shows a great deal of interest for Montreal, but I find it unbelievable that he should try to blame the conditions he described on the policies of our government.

Everyone knows we are just coming out of a recession which has been very hard, not only on Canada, but also on many other countries throughout the world. Clearly, the recession has had an impact, but to say that during that period of recession and global restructuring the government did nothing to help the situation is morally dishonest.

The hon. member talks about all the jobs lost in the Montreal area. Twice in this House we had legislation which benefited greatly the Montreal area. There was the bill on patented medicines which has brought millions of dollars of investment to the Montreal area and has resulted in more than 8,000 new jobs being created.

What did opposition members do for the Montreal area? They voted against that bill and their colleagues in the other place filibustered.

And now they want to advise us on how to create jobs in that area, when we know how well the Liberal government did. At the time they closed all the oil refineries in Montreal. Come on, be serious. The problem in Montreal goes back to the Liberals. When they were in office they never bothered renewing the economic structures.

The hon. member raised the issue earlier of the escalating reduction of housing starts. He was giving a lot of statistics, but he should have mentioned the record level of exports to the United States which is responsible for a lot of jobs; the latest statistics which show an increase in consumption in Quebec and Canada; the establishment of employment centres this last few months; the lowering of interest rates which stimulates construction; more affordable mortgage rates; and growth rates which should be among the highest in the country this year.

We have every reason to have confidence in the future of the country, to have confidence in the policies of the government. We know that the hon. member and his colleagues do not like the fact that we can now see the light at the end of the tunnel, that things are looking up. Obviously, in the context of forthcoming elections this is not good news for the hon. member.

He can say anything he likes in this House. He will not change the fact that we are coming out of the recession and that economic recovery is in progress. All economic indicators are positive. We are on the right track. The people in his riding, like the rest of the Canadian people, have confidence in the future, confidence in their ability, and are determined to recover the jobs lost and to reduce unemployment.

We are on the right track and we certainly do not need any lecture on how the federal government, our government, should commit itself to the economic recovery of Montreal, especially given the track record of the Liberal government in that area.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, today the hon. member for Essex—Windsor has put forward the following motion:

> That this House condemns the government for policies that have decimated the economy forcing company closures resulting in job losses for Canadian workers.

I want to say right away that I support this motion without hesitation because every statistic under the sun shows that Canadians are worse off economically since the Tories took office.

• (1605)

The previous speaker may criticize the opposition but the facts are there and opposition members are not alone in condemning the government for its economic policies. Last week the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops asked the government to act. The bishops begged the Conservative government to do something about the high unemployment rate in this country. They said that the economic policies of the past decade had put an undue burden on the workers in this country.

According to the bishops, Canada is experiencing a social crisis that is unprecendented, with one-quarter of its labour force shut out of the labour market. If the government finds it hard to believe opposition members or Canada's bishops, let us take a look at the figures published by the government's own agency, Statistics Canada.

If it compares today's figures with 1988, the government will see the economic situation in this country has worsened. In 1988 there were 789,000 Canadian families with one member unemployed. In 1992 there were 1,132,000, an increase of over 43 per cent. In 1988 the unemployment rate was 7.5 per cent. In 1992 it was 11.5 per cent. Today more than 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. In November 1988 the youth unemployment rate in this country was 11.8 per cent. Today it is up to 16.7 per cent.

The situation is just as depressing in Quebec's main urban centres. Between March 1992 and March 1993, the unemployment rate went up in Chicoutimi, Jonquière, Trois-Rivières and Montreal, where more than 225,000 people get unemployment insurance benefits.

Consider the number of jobs lost since January 1989 in the manufacturing sector. Canada has lost 319,000 jobs in this sector. The hon. member told us that exports had gone up. That is all very well, but according to Statistics Canada, since 1989 we lost 319,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector, a sector that is vital to our economy. This means 15 per cent of all the jobs in this sector.

In Quebec 115,000 jobs were lost in the manufacturing sector during the same period. This represents a loss of 19 per cent in a sector that is extremely important to the economy of Quebec and the Montreal region. Meanwhile, in the United States only 7 per cent of the jobs in this sector disappeared.

These are Statistics Canada figures, not mine. The hon. member said earlier that we had just come out of a recession that was caused by the international economic situation. It may have been caused by the international economic situation but why did our neighbour to the south lose only 7 per cent of its jobs, while we lost 19 per cent and Canada as a whole 18 per cent? If we are supposed to blame these changes on the international economic situation, why is Canada being penalized more than other countries? I think the conclusion is obvious and that, as the motion says, the Conservative government's unsound economic policies are to blame.

Job losses and high unemployment rates result in pauperizing the population. Montreal is a case in point. Last week one of the headlines read "Montreal: Poverty Capital". That is where we are after nine years.

Figures released last week by Statistics Canada showed that Montreal has set a new record for poverty. In 1990, 22 per cent of the population was living below the poverty line.

Last November in Montreal, food banks distributed 800,000 pounds of food, or nearly 20 tons per day. As a matter of fact, the amount of food distributed by Moisson Montréal, the only food bank in the city, is ten times greater today than it was in 1985.

• (1610)

In 1990 in the whole province there were 269,000 families and 403,000 individuals living below the poverty line for a total of 1,200,000 people.

That is the true portrait of a decade of unhealthy economic policies and mismanagement by the Conservatives.

It is easy to blame the opposition, to say that the opposition voted against this measure or that measure. We voted with the government on measures we thought made sense, but we voted against any economic measure that put the country in an impossible situation.

Mr. Moore: C-91 for Montreal.

Mr. Gagliano: For Montreal. I can see I just woke up the hon. member opposite.

The figures are there. For two years I have been asking the government to do something for Montreal. What has it done? Nothing. What has it done for Montreal, the poverty capital! We used to have this advertising slogan in Montreal: A city with pride. Today, it is a city with unemployment. This is where the Tories got us. They just keep blaming that on the opposition. I could go on at length, but I will remain brief because I want to share my time with my colleagues.

What are the Tories' economic policies? The free trade agreement with the United States. Now they want to force on us a trade agreement with Mexico. During the 1988 elections, they promised to continue to negotiate after the elections for a new definition of subsidies. They are now proposing another agreement with Mexico. But what was to be defined under the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement has not even been defined yet.

Just think of the 37 tax increases, the GST and the absurd monetary policy. Just think of the exaggerated war the government waged on inflation. They waged such a war that now the whole economy is on its knees. Earlier the hon. member talked about the economic policies the government had put in place to help small businesses, to help them take off, thanks to low interest rates. Yes, they are low, but try to borrow from a bank. During the adjournment, I talked with bankers in my riding who told me they had so much money they did not know what to do with it. I told them to lend it to people. There are businesses with projects that want to take off. Why do you not lend them money? The situation is so precarious that they do not want to take chances. What is the use of low interest rates, of policies to encourage businesses to get loans from the bank when the over-all economic situation is so bad that banks will not give these loans?

Let us think about the cuts to the unemployment insurance system. As we are going through one of the worst crises in our history, instead of fighting unemployment, what is the government doing? It is attacking the unemployed, those who are not responsible. They are the victims, not the people responsible for the crisis.

That is what the government is doing, attacking the unemployed.

After nine years in office, after 37 tax increases, after the GST, when the national debt has almost tripled and the annual deficit is the same as it was in 1984, the government finally finds out that it has to address the deficit and the financial crisis. But when we said "stop spending, cut the $5.8 billion helicopter project, lead the way", it said "no, this is sacred; we will not touch that."

During the leadership race, for example, where do you think the candidates will want to make cuts to reduce the deficit? Once again on the backs of the unemployed, the sick, those who live in poverty. Again they will cut social programs. I will never forget this old man who once told me: "Remember every time we have a Conservative government, destitution prevails". Tory times are bad times. The Conservative government proved it once again and still does today. However, I hope—and I really should not say I hope, because I lost all hope in this government—but on Monday, we will finally have the budget and we will be waiting to see what will happen. As I was saying I lost hope. On Monday the Conservative government will probably make cuts to give us the impression that it wants to reduce the deficit but again, it will be the poor and those who earn the least who will foot the bill.

• (1615)

Madam Speaker, you are indicating that my time is up, so I thank you.

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, in my own constituency of Stormont—Dundas, the city of Cornwall provides a tangible example of the negative impact the government's economic policies have had on our communities across Canada. The unemployment rate in Cornwall now exceeds 20 per cent.

In the last two years more than 20 plants have closed and more than 2,500 jobs, manufacturing jobs—in other words, good jobs here at home—have disappeared. Yes, I will hear a question after a few comments.

In Cornwall, as in several other communities in eastern Ontario, the number of welfare recipients is rising at an unprecedented rate because of the many plants closing and jobs lost.

[English]

Many of the plant closures can be directly attributed to the previous high dollar and high interest rate policy of this Conservative government. The Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement also took its toll on the local economy and the lingering recession accounted for the rest.

In addition, the fallout from the NAFTA deal is already having a damaging impact on plants in Canada. Many plants are being forced to implement restructuring measures regardless of the cost to their employees in order to remain competitive.

The current dispute at the Nestle plant in Chesterville is a prime example in my riding of what is happening in Canada today. More and more businesses are taking steps to reduce worker benefits in order to retain domestic and export markets. Workers are being told they must give up previously hard-won labour benefits or face the loss of their jobs.

There is no level playing-field in the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement and NAFTA provides no relief from the inequality of the FTA. The free trade deal has failed to provide Canadian companies with unrestricted access to U.S. markets and has certainly failed to deliver the jobs, jobs, jobs which the government promised Canadians it would.

[Translation]

I would like to ask my hon. colleague for Saint-Léonard if he thinks that this Conservative government, which apparently wants to reduce the deficit at any cost, understands that its economic policies have created an unacceptable human deficit—I repeat, an unacceptable human deficit.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for his question because he brings into the debate a very important element which is often overlooked. We often talk about figures, percentages and amounts, but not the human deficit. We often forget that behind all these figures and this system human beings are affected.

Today when we talk about the unemployment rate we can say in an abstract sense, that it is around 13 or 14 per cent. But the reality is that more than 1.5 million people are unemployed, not to mention the 2.3 million Canadians who are on welfare, giving us a total of close to four million Canadians. Thus, there are four million people in an unacceptable situation, people who do not work and who either get unemployment benefits or welfare payments. Who pays for that? Whether it is the federal, the provincial or the municipal level of government is irrelevant. What is relevant is the fact that human beings who want to work and enjoy a better standard of living are stuck with economic measures such as free trade and the GST.

Let us admit it. When I was sitting on the finance committee which examined the GST for months, all the officials from the Department of Finance, the civil servants, the government members and the minister himself, everybody told us that the GST would create an underground economy.

[English]

The underground economy was where the GST would come out and we would have prosperity. But we created a monster. Now we have an underground economy so big that no one can even account for it. It affects people, human beings. We forget that and the government forgets that. The government talks all the time about the deficit but forgets about the human deficit. I have no more hope or belief for this government.

An hon. member: Did you have some before?

Mr. Gagliano: It is gone, finished. On Monday do you think the government is going to think about the human deficit before the dollar deficit?

An hon. member: Never.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, today we are debating the NDP opposition motion:

> That this House condemns the government for policies which have decimated the economy forcing company closures resulting in job losses for Canadian workers.

It is not difficult to agree with this motion but I would like to suggest that the motion is too narrow. We have to be concerned about more than company closures in this country and the very serious impact that has had on Canadians.

I have listened to some of my colleagues across the floor. I heard them talk about recovery, the optimistic mood and so on. They are speaking of a country I do not recognize. I wonder how many members on the government side are seriously going into their constituency offices and dealing personally with those Canadians who are unemployed and find themselves in impossible situations today.

My staff in my offices and I find the situation in the constituency very depressing. It is very difficult day after day to address and listen to the problems of people who find themselves in these impossible situations.

The government policies which started off in 1989 with high interest rates following the free trade agreement are deplorable. High interest rates were supposed to be addressing the inflation rate in this country but ended up creating costs of servicing our debt which sky-rocketed. In fact, in trying to deal with servicing the debt, it caused our deficits to rise.

These high interest rates caused incredible problems for companies, small and medium sized business, the backbone of our nation's economy, and for individuals as well. We have seen unprecedented high bankruptcies occur in this country. The bankruptcies of small and medium sized businesses and personal bankruptcies are as much responsible for job losses as are any of the large company closures.

However we have not seen the end of this recession. Day after day we hear of more lay-offs and of government cutbacks in programs, cutbacks which cause more job losses. We heard recently of CN cutting back on many jobs. Ontario Hydro is cutting back on many jobs. The Ontario government is possibly coming out with more cutbacks to public service jobs. The list just goes on and on.

It has not stopped at all in my riding of Northumberland. We have been impacted by the loss of jobs in larger companies that have either moved south or have closed their doors completely not to move anywhere. We have had the loss of thousands of jobs in Northumberland because of the consequences of the recession we have been undergoing. We have also had and continue to have daily many small and medium sized businesses close in my riding.

We really find it mocking to listen to the unemployment statistics for my riding. Those who are working in social services and in the unemployment insurance offices know the rates are much higher than statistics would say. For example, the statistics say that in my area unemployment is slightly more than 11 per cent. We do not even pay much attention to those figures any more because we know they are so inaccurate. We really do not know how they derive those figures.

It is interesting that one municipality next door to mine decided to do its own census because it was so concerned about the inaccuracy of the statistics. In doing that census that municipality, which I consider to be representative of the 16 municipalities in my whole riding, found it was not 11 per cent unemployment but a 14.6 per cent unemployment rate. What is more, over 6 per cent additional people said they were underemployed. They were not earning enough through part-time jobs or whatever to maintain a minimum lifestyle for themselves.

Food banks, the largest growing economy in this country, are not serving the needs of desperate people. A single father was in my office on Friday. He is trying to support his 17-year old son and has been supporting him since birth. He was asking me: "How can I live on $750 a month?" He can get no more assistance from the social services programs and the food banks are not going to help him. This is what we are talking about when we say the situation in this country is absolutely unacceptable. It is a disaster. People's needs have to be responded to and the government's current economic policies have not helped but have hindered the process.

I am convinced that if we dwell upon the financial debt and deficit and not the human deficit as my colleague was saying before, which to my mind is as serious if not more serious in the long term for the success of our country, if we do not pay attention to that then Canada will very quickly become a Third World country.

Having spent many years in the Third World I see many similarities now. I see people being supported in unemployment programs and so on. People are so frustrated. They are told they cannot take a course to improve themselves because that would take them away from looking for a job, jobs that do not exist.

Today in my office I heard of a woman who has been on unemployment insurance for four months. She has been called back by her employer to work again but it will probably only be for a few weeks. She is going to lose her position in training. Having spent four months at taxpayers' expense to sit in a training position learning something she was eager to learn, she now has to give that up and go back maybe for a couple of weeks to a job from which she will again be laid off. Then she will not be eligible for full unemployment insurance because of the way the economy is. So much of the inefficiency and ineffectiveness in the system must be addressed.

Others have pointed out that we have lost 319,000 manufacturing jobs and that is critical. That is 15 per cent of the total manufacturing jobs in this country and 18 per cent of the total manufacturing jobs in Ontario. We can talk about this recession and this difficulty as being part of a global picture, a global recession. But how is it that Ontario loses 18 per cent of its manufacturing jobs and the U.S. has only lost 7 per cent? There are inequalities. There have to be Canadian reasons for the Canadian economy doing worse than other G-7 members. The government's policies have not been helpful.

We heard last month in this recovery which is occurring in the midst of a recovering economy that consumer spending is down, that consumer confidence is down, that it is still poor. People in my riding are terrified. Unemployed people are desperate. They do not know what they are going to do tomorrow. Those who have jobs are terrified. They are reading articles such as the one appearing in today's paper by the Business Council on National Issues that the country faces a debt crisis. We are all extremely concerned about what is happening. I would say it is the very policies this government has been following over the last years that have been spiralling us down into a greater and greater crisis.

Talking about the economic recovery on the basis of increased exports from Canada to the United States and a trade surplus is not symptomatic of recovery in this country. We cannot depend upon one statistic like that to suggest that our country is out of recession. A recovery with no jobs is not a recovery.

I go on to quote what the bishops are saying, that 3.9 million people in this country are in search of decent jobs. This country needs value added jobs. Much more attention must be paid to the human needs, the trade needs, the job markets in this country. People have to be trained for existing jobs. All levels of government have to work with management and labour to find out what those jobs ought to be. Where is Canada's place and what are its strengths in a global economy? Train people for those specific jobs. Unless we do that we are not going to recover.

Some of the lost jobs have been recovered through the creation of other kinds of jobs, but if you look at the jobs that have been created they are terrible. They are the very lowest paying, low-skilled service jobs. Flipping hamburgers in McDonald's is an example. Those jobs do not bring dignity to people. They are not jobs that are really taking advantage of the education and training the people in Canada have had. People are frustrated with those kinds of jobs.

This government in its policies must put people first. It must have policies that reflect this priority. Instead, we have a government that depends on trade first, debt and deficit adjustment first and big business first. This is not good enough for Canadians and it is not appropriate and right for the future of this country.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. It is distressing she would leave on the record that indeed the free trade agreement has resulted in only creating jobs flipping hamburgers when she admitted in her speech that trade with the United States has improved.

She also mentioned OECD forecasts. The OECD has forecast that Canada will have the fastest rate of growth in the G-7 in both 1993 and 1994. I just want to put some of these numbers on the record because I know the member will be taking notes. The OECD is forecasting for 1993 that Canada's growth will be greater than 3 per cent, whereas in the U.S. it will be just over 2 per cent, in Japan just over 2 per cent, in Germany just over 1 per cent, in France just over 1 per cent, in Italy less than 1 per cent, and in the U.K. just over 1 per cent. In 1994 it is suggesting that Canada's growth rate will be over 4 per cent, whereas in the United States it will be 3 per cent, Japan 3 per cent, Germany 3 per cent, France 3 per cent and in the U.K. just over 3 per cent.

These are numbers from the OECD. I was wondering why the member, in her speech, would suggest these numbers are not correct when the OECD itself has indicated that Canada will indeed have the fastest growth in the next two years.

Mrs. Stewart: Madam Speaker, I am very happy to respond to these remarks.

First of all I did not say that the free trade agreement was creating low-paying, low-skilled service jobs. It is a fact, and I did not relate it to the free trade agreement at all, that this country has lost hundreds of thousands of highly paid manufacturing jobs.

It is also a fact that some manufacturers in this country, particularly small and medium-sized companies, have been able to successfully negotiate their way into the North American market with the free trade agreement in place. But it is also a fact that thousands and thousands of manufacturing jobs have been lost as a result of the free trade agreement. This is something my colleague raised, not I.

What I was saying was that we have lost value added types of highly skilled manufacturing jobs and we have not had the equivalent or better jobs to replace those lost jobs. Instead we have replaced them with low-paying service jobs.

On his point about the OECD and its prospects for Canada having a 3 per cent growth rate in the coming years, et cetera, we have many other forecasts. We have the IMF report of yesterday.

What I am saying is that recovery without jobs in this country can never be considered to be recovery because Canada must put people first. Statistics that say we are earning more money as a country because of our export trade with the U.S. is not satisfactory. The gap between the rich and the poor in Canada is widening on a day-by-day basis and it is totally unacceptable. This government will learn that very soon in this year's upcoming election.

• (1635)

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her comments and her very clear criticism of the effects of the free trade agreement.

I know that on March 31 she along with many of us, with her caucus, voted against second reading of the North American free trade agreement. I would like to ask her two questions. Does she believe it would have been better if at second reading the North American free trade agreement, or the bill implementing it, had been defeated? If she feels it would not have been better, if it is satisfactory that it was accepted, then why did she vote against it?

If she feels it would have been better if it had been defeated does she regret the absence of her 37 colleagues who, if they were present and voting, would have enabled its defeat?

Mrs. Stewart: Madam Speaker, I am also very happy to answer that question.

Yes, it would have been very good for this country if the North American free trade agreement had been defeated at second reading because second reading does say that in principle we are in agreement with or opposed to a certain piece of legislation.

This party believes that until there are agreed upon parallel agreements we should not be proceeding with a North American free trade agreement because there is a lot at stake for our country in that whole process.

I regret that because of the urgency of the work my colleagues had in their constituencies there could not have been more of us present in the House to vote upon that particular piece of legislation at second reading. There will be other opportunities and the member can be sure that we will express our point of view at every possible opportunity.

I would also like to say it is interesting that yesterday when we had the opportunity in the standing committee to challenge the Minister for International Trade only one of the NDP members was present at the committee meeting and the NDP's critics for trade and external affairs were not present.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, one would think in this House there was no recognition that we live in a world of change, unremitting and massive change. This change has been brought to this world of production and distribution by computerization, by satellites, by the transmission of data, equipment and knowledge, by robotization in plants and equipment in factories and so on. These things so dramatically change the way we do things that they have distorted and upset the entire production system of the world.

There are countries growing in this world. South China, for example, had a growth rate of 12 per cent last year. Hong Kong, Taiwan, Singapore and Korea all have very substantial growth rates. However they are new countries and do not have the old infrastructure. They are building a new structure and therefore can show new growth.

We have a situation in which we must massively change our structures, and in changing our structures we have massive dislocation. That is the kind of thing that is taking place in all of Europe and all of North America. All of the developed parts of the world are subject to this massive change.

It is strange to me, and it must be strange to those people watching, that the parties on the other side of this House do not recognize that. There is a great loss of jobs in the manufacturing field, but production in manufacturing is up 7 per cent. We produce a lot more goods with a lot fewer people. That is the nature of globalization. That is the nature of what is happening today.

We have to live in today's world, not yesterday's world. Yesterday's world is one in which we tried to be a little self-sufficient in Canada. We had trade barriers, high tariffs that prevented foreigners from bringing goods into the country. Then we could develop a plant here and a plant there which were only designed to produce a whole host of products for the Canadian market, and only the Canadian market. Today those plants are so inefficient in terms of industrial production on a world basis that our tariff rates would have to be well over 100 per cent across the board with massive restrictions everywhere if we wanted to retain much of the industry we used to have.

• (1640)

Our industries now must radically change. Our offices must radically change. Our whole system must radically change in order to exist or our standard of living will completely and totally disappear. This government has attacked change. It has attacked the problem. It has gone after the problem. It is not content to take the old system, the old rules, the old ideas and keep them. We have gone after change. We have gone after it deliberately, directly, and with foresight in order to build a new and better economy.

We have a sound money policy. We have beaten down inflation to its lowest rate in 30 years. Prices do not rise unrealistically any more. Our inflation rate in Canada is the lowest of the OECD countries. That took some doing. That put some blood on the floor. However our inflation rate is down so that our money is sound money.

Why do people buy our bonds? Not because they like the looks of us. They buy them because our money is sound money. It will buy today and tomorrow the same amount of goods and services, and that is the kind of thing people want when they lend money to a country or invest in a country. A sound money policy is essential for Canada.

We have developed a fair tax policy. We have done everything conceivable in the last eight and a half years to change the Income Tax Act to get away from all the hidden little wrinkles that were in it to let the rich make more, to let the fast operators make more. We have done that deliberately, capably, and competently. Our Income Tax Act is probably fairer today than at any time in our history.

I am not saying that taxes are ever fair. Taxes are never fair to the beholder. Somebody looks at someone else and says: "They have more than I have. Perhaps they should pay more tax than I should". Our tax system today is fairer than ever before.

A corporate tax system has to be not just fair but competitive. My friends in the New Democratic Party would like to put greater burdens on the corporate tax system. They forget that we are in a world of competition, that companies earn their profits where they pay the least amount of tax. If we make our taxes higher than in countries that are our trading partners then, guess what? The profit will not be made here. It will be made somewhere else and transfer pricing provides no possibility of ever following it through. We could never with all the accountants in the country follow through all of the possibilities of transfer pricing.

In the last budget we made our corporate tax for manufacturers on average 2 per cent less than the manufacturing corporate tax rate in the United States. That is a very substantial advantage to those who would set up plants and businesses in Canada.

We have in this country, and have had for a long time, a sales tax system. Lots of people object to sales taxes, to commodity taxes. Before this Parliament began we had a sales tax system which put a 13.5 per cent tax on people who manufactured in the country. That tax gave an advantage to foreigners who brought goods into the country because they only paid tax at their plant gate and the cost of bringing goods here was not included in their tax base. Therefore we changed that commodity tax system to the goods and services tax.

• (1645)

That tax may have some problems with it. It may need some ironing out. It may need some work and massaging. A bill was passed by this House just recently to do that. Bit by bit we will have that tax system working very smoothly.

However that tax system is the fairest form of commodity tax system that the world knows. Indeed, 45 other countries in the world have that tax system.

To say that this is the wrong system, that a VAT tax system is not a good system, is to say that everybody else in the world is stupid and we know better than they do. That is the attitude of the New Democrats and the Liberals because they have not thought it through. They criticize us but they do not think it through.

In this great world of change we also must make sure that we try to train and retrain people for jobs, that we give people adjustment programs. This year we are spending $4 billion on retraining and training people on a national basis. That is infinitely more than was ever spent before, massively more. We have changed the system to try to train and retrain people, to try to get people to adapt to new circumstances, to new job opportunities, to new careers. We are all going to have to adapt to new ways of doing things.

In government we have adapted to new ways of doing things. Changes have taken place in employment and immigration in terms of how one files an immigration form. Those ways are very much changed. They are very much changed to take advantage of the systems that are now available. They are very much changed in the way the post office operates to deliver mail. These are changes that must take place. These changes will continue to take place. They must continue to take place.

We have to be internationally competitive. We cannot continue to do things in the old way because the old way is not good enough. The old way will give us a very poor standard of living. Our standard of living will drop and drop if we continue with the old ways. We cannot carry on with old ways in a world of change.

We have done a great deal to promote science and technology. In a world of change we have to be brighter and we have to be ahead of other people. From 1984 to 1993 we have increased by 44 per cent direct government spending on science and technology, in grants and so on. Today we spend $200 million a year just on small businesses to allow them special credits in terms of their science and technology development. We have developed a series of centres of excellence across Canada in which we try to bring in scientists and engineers to work on new and important manufacturing and technological development.

Just recently in this House we passed Bill C–91 which gave further patent protection on intellectual property. That bill has been criticized but I have recently attended two major plant openings with major investment in my city of Mississauga. Yesterday Astra Pharma opened a facility and announced another $200 million in further investment in plant, laboratories, and assistance to people in universities to develop new pharmaceutical products. That company is manufacturing painkilling products today for export to the world. It has a world mandate.

With the huge investments in this kind of work, these are not small companies. These are companies that produce high quality jobs for people with doctorate or masters degrees. These are people we need to create a better society. This is not about flipping hamburgers. This is about building Canada. This is about building a better future for all of us. It is a question of the science and technology work we have been doing.

We have a special program for students. The scholarship arrangement qualifies 3,300 young people in our high schools across Canada every year for scholarships at universities. These scholarships are for $3,000 for a four year course at university in science and technology. The students have to be bright to get them but there are 3,300. That is a lot of assistance to young people who are going to help build our nation.

We recognize that if we are going to have jobs we have to assist small business. This House just recently passed a very major change to the Small Businesses Loans Act, increasing the limit of that loan to $250,000, making it possible for the money in the loan to indirectly be worked into working capital credit because it does not require a 100 per cent guarantee. It does not require that the proprietor put his house on the line, his blood on the line. He only has to guarantee 25 per cent of the loan.

Tell me where you can get a bank loan and only sign for 25 per cent of the capital. They only have to guarantee 25 per cent of it. Banks have come forward and said they are going to put that money up but not at 1.75 per cent over prime as they are entitled to under the act. The Bank of Nova Scotia has come forward and said it likes the statute so much it is going to lend the money at prime. The Bank of Montreal is matching it.

Members talk about not doing things but that is pretty important work. We have a 10 per cent tax credit for small business if they buy manufacturing equipment. That comes right off their tax. In effect, with a tax credit of 10 per cent and a small business tax rate of 12 per cent, small businessmen pay precious little corporate tax if they spend their profits in buying equipment. That is assistance that makes our small businesses work effectively.

In order to encourage businesses to hire people a UI holiday was provided for small businesses that pay less than $30,000 a year in UI premiums. A small business with five, six or ten employees which does not have to pay $30,000 in UI can hire people and not make any UI contribution for this year.

Mr. Milliken: That is after you have raised the rate 35 per cent.

Mr. Blenkarn: My friend says we have raised the rate. We did not raise the rate. We reduced the benefit a bit but we did not raise the rate.

Mr. Milliken: You raised the rates twice in one year.

Mr. Blenkarn: We kept the rates where they had been and they would have gone up if we followed the bill the way you wanted us to do.

Mr. Milliken: Get the facts.

Mr. Blenkarn: They want us to ensure the country does not work the way it can work best. This Parliament has had one situation after another where the opposition has ganged up to try to prevent things happening to make the country work better.

We have been working very diligently to trim government costs. We have privatized 23 Crown corporations, wound up 14 Crown corporations, wound up and consolidated 40 agencies and activities of the government in boards and other things. Most important, we have pushed and pushed to blast our way to the markets of the world. With the free trade agreement, our sales to the United States last year were $122.3 billion. That left us a very substantial surplus with that country.

• (1655)

More important, we are currently entering into agreements under the North American free trade agreement to tie in Mexico. We are exploring agreements to tie in Chile and Argentina. Right now the Minister for International Trade is on his way to Argentina again to explore more deals and more potential trade. By the way, he has taken the critic for the Liberal Party with him. Maybe together they can get the trade deal organized.

If we are going to be successful, this country that is expert at a limited number of things has to sell that expertise where it can. We have to be able to sell it everywhere in the world. We can and we will.

Last, may I point to the fact that our financial industries have been revamped so that our banks, trust companies and insurance companies will even more be able to compete in the international financial world.

Mr. Riis: In the Bahamas.

Mr. Angus: Cayman Islands. Do they pay?

Mr. Blenkarn: We think of services as not being profitable. At least one-third of the business of Canadian banks is in foreign markets making money for Canada and bringing back the head office jobs that keep young people employed, give us opportunities and make jobs. Fifty-five per cent of the activity of Canadian life insurance companies is in foreign markets. The head office work for those companies, the policy designed for those companies, is done in Canada and employs Canadians.

We are criticized by people who say we have not done anything. We are in a world of rough change. We have competed better than anyone else in this world of change. Our growth rates are awful but compared to our colleagues in other countries they are superb.

We brought down the deficit as a percentage of the economy. Our interest rates are down very dramatically again, another 10 basis points this week. Our tax system is fair and more competitive. Our trade agreements give us key access to new export markets. Our labour productivity is growing strongly. We are on the verge of a new beginning. I am proud to say this government has done its best to cope with change.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. Solicitor General.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, in order not to interfere with Private Member's Business I would like to present a motion. I think you will find consent for the following motion. I move:

> That, notwithstanding Standing Order 45(6), any recorded division on Bill C-93 requested on Friday, April 23, 1993 shall stand deferred until Tuesday, April 17, 1993 at 6 p.m.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend from Mississauga and while I like him personally, I do not agree with anything he says. I want to make a short statement and I have a question for him.

The other day somebody was describing the government's approach to the economy. He said: "When a family finds itself in a serious debt situation because of accumulated debts the way to respond to that debt is not to resign from your employment and go on UIC". Somehow I think that symbolizes the approach of this government. It feels that by putting more people out of work by causing more small businesses to go bankrupt, somehow this is going to help the economy. This is a puzzling approach. Nevertheless it is where my friend and I disagree.

My question is this. The other day a young woman from Kamloops who is in grade 10 asked me this question. She is a very serious young student and has studied the free trade agreement. Kate Turley is her name.

She told me she did not understand why the government was going ahead with the NAFTA legislation. I replied that I did not either. She said: "Imagine, Mr. Riis, if you won $10 million in the lottery today. You want to start a new factory or plant and are going to invest your money with the idea of making a profit in the years ahead. You have four choices. You can pay your employees $18 an hour as we do in some of our manufacturing plants in Canada. You can go to the northern part of the United States to the rust belt area and pay $12 an hour for the same level of expertise. You can go to Louisiana, Alabama, Tennessee and west Texas and pay $6.50 for the same level of expertise. Now, under NAFTA, you can go to Mexico and pay 60 cents an hour for that same expertise".

Mr. Brewin: It is five cents in the Dominican Republic.

Mr. Riis: Or five cents an hour in the Dominican Republic as my friend indicates. This of course is the next extension of the NAFTA agreement.

The student said: "Mr. Riis, unless you are crazy, if you are interested in maximizing your profits and have a choice of paying $18 an hour, $12 an hour, $6 an hour or 60 cents an hour where would you locate your plant?"

I responded that it seemed obvious to me that I would be encouraged to locate it in Mexico. Of course that is the motivation behind at least 2,000 corporate decisions to move and open plants in the Maquiladora zone in northern Mexico and employ 500,000 people there. Salaries average about 60 cents an hour.

As Ross Perot said, as soon as the North American free trade agreement is signed by Mexico, the United States and Canada, we are going to hear this massive flushing sound as the jobs are flushed from Canada and the United States into Mexico. This young woman called Kate Turley said that she believed in Ross Perot's view of the issue.

I want to ask my hon. friend from Mississauga this. If he was going to open that plant and he had the choice of paying employees in Canada $18 an hour or paying employees with the same level of expertise and training 60 cents an hour in Maquiladora zones in northern Mexico, where would he locate his plant being the entrepreneurial person that he is?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, I want to give my friend a little lesson.

I was at the opening of a further extension of a plant by Astra pharmaceuticals in my riding yesterday. I had a chat with the CEO of that company whose head office is in Sweden.

It also has an office in Mexico. The company puts pills together in Mexico but it does not make any chemicals there because it cannot find any trained labour. It cannot find the equipment.

It has to put the stuff for the pills into a pill making machine that pumps the pills out in Mexico. All the stuff that makes the pills possible is manufactured in Canada or Sweden. It is not manufactured in Mexico and probably never will be.

He said: "What we are is a highly competent technical business. Therefore we have to have the best expertise possible. There is no way that you could possibly operate our business in a place where you did not have a level of competence that would make it possible".

I want to say to my friend, if you have a job that can be done by any jerk who has no education and pay him $18 an hour in this competitive world then you have a problem. If you have a job that must be done by someone who has confidence, who can understand a computer and run robotics, who can handle things effectively and efficiently you had better hire the best highly trained labour you possibly can.

Labour is not the cost in these things. In good, well-organized plants, labour represents about 10 per cent of the cost at the most. You can get your labour for 50 cents a day in south China or Bangladesh. Mexico is expensive. It costs about $2.33 an hour. Mexico is a high labour place in comparison to the Bangladeshes of this world. If one wants really cheap labour then one goes to a place where one can get really cheap labour. However, Mexico is not that kind of place. Mexico is a place where labour costs are expensive if one has to have any degree of technical capacity. The other facilities that go along are continuously more expensive.

• (1705)

We have a company in my constituency called Sissons that currently is in the business of building auto parts.

Mr. Riis: At $2 an hour?

Mr. Blenkarn: I want to tell Nelson this. We have a policy in this government with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development where he will sponsor someone to open a plant in an Indian reserve and he will actually pay all the labour costs. It will not cost you a nickel. However, I do not see people flooding Indian reserves to open plants.

The reason is this. One must open a plant where one has competent people and competent equipment and competent facilities. One may get all worked up about some poor Mexican who needs a job—he probably does—but remember that the jobs we have to have in this country are jobs that are not untrained jobs. They are jobs for people who are competent and capable. We have to build a market for our competent and capable and highly expert material.

Mr. Riis: Are you saying Mexicans are not competent? Where have you been in Mexico, Tijuana? They have universities in Mexico.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a few short questions of the member for Mississauga South who is the self-appointed expert in Canadian economics 101. At a given point the member, among all the other points he was making about the Conservative economic program since 1984, took pains to explain that the GST was a great tax.

I have a few short questions for him as a member of the public accounts committee. He has referred to other countries that do have a GST but only at one level while we have it at multiple levels. If the GST is such a good tax then could he explain to me why the old tax, which was not a good tax and that needed improvement, needed 1,500 people to collect while we now have at Revenue Canada 5,600 people collecting the new tax. Will he explain that?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize. I will allow the hon. member to answer that one question. There are only 45 seconds left in the 10-minute period of question and comment.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I do not for one moment say that the way the GST is presently operating and running is nearly as smooth or effective or competent as it should be. That is going to take some time for our people in the Department of National Revenue to organize. There is no question about it. A tax system that taxes every trade transaction in the whole production system requires more people to follow it up than a tax system that taxes only once at the manufacturer's level. However, the fact is that that type of tax system is fairer and more organized to the benefit of the country than any other system. The VAT system we have is a system that is a transferable tax like all other VAT systems but it takes the tax off of our manufacturers and allows us to export our goods to foreigners without the imposition of our commodity tax. No other system of tax allows that.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to participate in this debate on a motion put forward by my colleague:

> That this House condemn the government for policies which have decimated the economy forcing company closures resulting in job losses for Canadian workers.

I want to talk about the experience of northwestern Ontario over the last number of years where we have seen community after community decimated by the economic realities in part caused by the federal government.

Let me first start with the community of Atikokan which is a remarkable community in my riding that in 1979-80 saw 1,100 highly paid mining jobs disappear when the two iron ore mines closed.

Following that closure, the community struggled. Prior to the closure, the community worked with an adjustment committee to begin the process of looking for new opportunities. Some were forthcoming and some came and went.

We got to the point a little over two years ago where the community had rebounded. We had two wood-based companies. Proboard Ltd. was a manufacturer of a type of particle board panelling. There was also the Atikokan Forest Products Division at Sapawe down the road about 30 miles. It was a sawmill.

One will remember that around that time the policy of the federal government was to impose a 15 per cent tax on Canadian exporters of softwood lumber. At the same time our dollar was high in relation to the American dollar. Let us remember that the vast majority of our trade always has been and probably always will be with our neighbour to the south. Irrespective of the free trade agreement or the North American free trade agreement, that is where the big market is and that is where we need to go to sell a lot of our goods and services.

Two years and a couple of months ago the unemployment rate in the community of Atikokan was 80 per cent. Why? Because of softwood lumber, high interest rates and the high dollar. Both mills were shut down.

The community pulled together. Management, unions, the municipality, the school board, the social service agencies and everybody got together along with their provincial and federal members of Parliament.

Howard Hampton, the provincial member for the Rainy River riding, then the Attorney General for the province of Ontario and a New Democrat, went to bat provincially. I, on the other hand, got in touch with senior ministers in the Conservative cabinet here in Ottawa who have responsibility for economic matters, employment matters or what have you.

I can say very accurately that the only help that the people of Atikokan got was from the NDP government of Ontario. Those two mills exist today because of the assistance they were given. It was not any giveaway or corporate welfare but innovative financial help that allowed those two facilities to exist today.

One of them still has a rocky road ahead of it. It is up and down in terms of the operation but it is still there. Atikokan Forest Products Division is expanding because of the turnaround in softwood lumber since the 15 per cent tax was dropped.

One of the key elements in both those situations was that the unions and the companies and the Ontario government worked in partnership to develop a plan of action. That would not have happened under a Liberal or a Conservative government in Ontario.

• (1715)

Let me go to the other end of my riding that is the community of Thunder Bay itself. Actually parts of it are in Thunder Bay and outside my riding. We have another situation where one pulp and paper mill shut its doors and the process of stripping the equipment was begun. That is Abitibi's Thunder Bay mill. We had a second mill in crisis. The community was in danger of losing yet another mill.

I want to talk about the workers in Thunder Bay who made some tough decisions. Perhaps if the Liberals would listen to me as opposed to wondering about the members in the House we might be able to get on with things.

The situation that exists in Thunder Bay at the paper mill was that Abitibi basically said: "We cannot afford to keep this mill any more. We are going to sell this mill and if we do not get a buyer we are going to close it". This is again a case where a community pulled together. The employees of the mill, both the management employees and the various unions that represent the workers, got together with the province of Ontario.

Through long, hard bargaining they first worked out an agreement between the management employees and the union employees to decide: "Yes, we want to buy the mill. We the people of the community and we the workers want to buy that mill". Whether it was management workers or union workers, they wanted to buy the mill. The province of Ontario came with them and said that it would assist them. It said: "We will provide you with a combination of loans and loan guarantees to allow you to take this step".

It was not easy for the workers. They knew that even if they did this some of their colleagues would not be there working beside them because they would have to reduce the numbers. As a community we lost because of that. They also recognized that they would have to compress their wages and in fact take some cuts but they were prepared to live with that.

However, this is again an example of where groups worked together: the workers, both management and union; the unions; the province; and Abitibi-Price which agreed to sell the mill to the employees. This mill is the first ever, 100 per cent employee owned pulp and paper mill in Canada. Any of the other mills are a combination of employee ownership with somebody else. It is a success story in the sense that they work together.

There are three similarities to these two projects. First, it would have been impossible without the province of Ontario and the assistance that it provided these groups. Second, it would have been impossible without the co-operation of all the players. Third, in neither of these projects did the federal government lift one finger to assist these plants in northwestern Ontario to survive.

We tried employment and immigration and FEDNOR. They wrote nice letters long after the fact but that is all they did in response to the needs of the community.

The crisis is not over. Just a couple of weeks ago Canadian Pacific Forest Products announced that it was shutting down one of its kraft mills in Thunder Bay. Up our way it is not like GM closing a particular plant when we talk about plant closures. This is because in a large number of cases it carves off a chunk of the mill. It is really two, three or four mills in one. It closes one of those mills but the other ones keep operating. It is not the same as a whole factory having the doors locked.

It is another 350 jobs. That actually brings it up to, in terms of the number of jobs lost in and around the community of Thunder Bay in the pulp and paper sector alone, about 1,500 or 1,600 in the last two years. On top of that, the grain industry and the transportation industry have been decimated because of the shift of grain to the west coast. We used to handle 60 to 70 per cent of the export grain. We are now down to around 30 per cent.

Can-Car, which in a year or so will be doing great thanks to the Government of Ontario for ensuring that the TTC allocated its contracts to an Ontario plant rather than letting them go offshore, will have between 800 and 1,000 people working there for the next 10 years.

It is crisis after crisis and the federal government has done nothing to effect a positive change in northwestern Ontario. Even though for years it has recognized the inequities in the Western Grain Transportation Act it has refused to eliminate the distortions that make it cheaper to send grain to the west coast. We would rather leave it to the marketplace. Let the market decide which way the grain should go. We would be quite prepared to accept that. The federal government has done nothing to assist the people of Thunder Bay and northwestern Ontario.

I think it is appropriate to quote from an opinion piece called "Viewpoint" which appeared in the Thunder Bay Chronicle-Journal/Times-News on Saturday, April 17. This is another part of the element and it fits into the debate we have been having about the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and the North American free trade agreement between Canada, U.S., and Mexico in terms of decision making. For years most of our employment in northwestern Ontario was locally owned. In fact, Abitibi Provincial is now coming back under local ownership because the employees decided to buy it, but the rest of our major employers are controlled elsewhere.

The grain companies are based in western Canada, those that are part of the pools, or in the case of Cargill elsewhere in the world. Can-Car is owned by Bombardier based out of Montreal.

An hon. member: Soon to go to Mexico.

Mr. Angus: Hopefully it is not going to Mexico. It cannot seem to get contracts in Mexico even though it has a plant there. The control is elsewhere. Abitibi is controlled out of another part of Canada. Canadian Pacific Forest Products is also controlled out of Montreal. It does not matter where it is, it is the fact that the control is not local.

Let me read the article written by Robert Zobatar who is a forest industry worker. It is entitled "A blue collar insider's view of wood woes. Companies are placing undue blame on unions". He says:

> For the past 23 years I have earned my living in the pulp and paper industry. I have worked at Abitibi's pulp mills and the woodlands operations of Abitibi, Canadian Pacific Forest Products (CPFP) and Buchanan Forest Products. I have met and gotten to know hundreds of workers, some unionized and some not, young people and old people. I have experienced first hand the attitudes and work ethic of these people from days gone by to the present. I can safely say that the workers and the unions are not the unyielding, radical, unwashed masses that big companies such as CPFP try to make us out to be.
> In their most recent press releases, CPFP suggests that next to economic and market conditions, the closure of the softwood pulp mill is the result of the union's unwillingness to accept proposals for modified work practices. Poppycock. In the real world, you don't receive something for nothing. CPFP may be selling softwood pulp for less than it costs to produce it, and suffering a loss, but the fact remains they are not giving it away for free. They are still receiving something for their product. By the same token, unions and workers are not about to give away concessions and receive nothing in return, i.e. job security.
> Behind the scenes, officials of these big companies suggest to the workers that we can't see the big picture, we don't understand things, and we are ruining the companies. Well, most of us stayed in school long enough to learn to read. We are quite aware of the ever-expanding global economy, the world economic crunch, the information era, and the need for change. We are also very much aware of such things as corporate raiding, buy-outs, cover-ups, profit margins, bottom lines, and shareholders—in general greed. If workers really are narrow-minded, then companies such as CPFP are doubly so. They can't see past profit and loss and shareholders. When the more community-involved Great Lakes Forest Products sold out to CPFP, such things as the human factor and community spirit began diminishing and are now on the verge of extinction.

Economic conditions aside, why is the company in such dire straits anyhow? They were equal partners in negotiating the existing union contracts, and didn't sign those contracts thinking they couldn't afford them. Could there have been some poor management decisions, a lack of foresight on mechanization, poorly done studies on some of the new technology they so heavily invested in? Heaven forbid, they should admit to such mistakes.

I have seen this company spend many millions of dollars on every new piece of forestry equipment that came along (machines that can cost a $1/4 million or more) only to discover a few years later that it is obsolete, doesn't perform to expectations, or destroys the regenerative environment.

I have seen many seasoned bush workers offer advice on how to try and make something work, only to be shunned by a young pup foreman fresh out of forestry school whose only concern was to assert his authority over the worker.

When CPFP sold their stud lumber mill last year, I watched as almost to the day that the last piece of equipment was being removed from that mill, Hurricane Andrew struck in the U.S., and the price of lumber skyrocketed. Who did they sell that equipment to? Their arch rival, Buchanan Forest Products, who are now making windfall profits with it.

What did they do with the proceeds of the sale of equipment from the wafer board plant and the stud mill? They received large amounts of grant money to build those plants and also modernize the Dryden and Thunder Bay pulp mills as well. Remember all those headlines in the 70s when things were going well? Have we ever seen headlines about returning money to the government when they sell this equipment, or about helping laid-off workers? No! I suspect that such money will be squandered on the next bit of flash in the pan technology that comes along.

I can only hope that while this company is looking so closely at what the unions can do for it, it is also looking closely at what it can do for itself. I know that with the impending expiration of mill and woodlands contracts, the unions, in view of recent events, are seriously considering the way of the future. Time will tell what comes of it all. Perhaps if we had all paid more heed to Alvin Toffler in 1975 when he published his book The Third Wave, we would have been better prepared for the mess we are all in today.

There is no question that the economy in northwestern Ontario is hurting. It is not just the visible mill jobs. It is not just the visible jobs in the elevators. It is not just the visible jobs at Port Arthur shipyard, which is being drastically downsized as a result of the policies of the federal government to get us out of the shipbuilding and ship repair industry as a nation. There are also hundreds of spin-off jobs that existed because of those main jobs being in place.

There are also smaller companies that are not as visible, that are off the main track, that have gone away, that will not come back, and that cannot come back because the product they produced is now being produced much cheaper elsewhere, whether in the southern United States or in Mexico even today let alone when the North American free trade agreement comes into effect.

We have to do better than just look after those workers who have lost their jobs by providing them with training. I recognize that there will be restructuring. A society that does not change is a dead society, no question about that. It is how we do it. It is what things we put in place to protect the people, to protect the industries where necessary. We have to keep in mind that these are all people, they have families, they have children, they contribute to the community, they are members of our church or our service club, they are everybody and we all have a responsibility.

We cannot just leave things to the marketplace to decide. There needs to be a role for governments to ensure the orderly progression of whatever restructuring is necessary in society.

I appreciate this opportunity to participate in this debate today. I just wish the government were really listening.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. This is clearly a world of change and he will realize that when he travels, if he does, to the southern United States. Where they used to have cotton fields they now have forests of pine that grow to pulpwood size in less than 25 years and are harvested by automatic machinery so that the lumber or wood is never touched by human hands. Of course we in northern Ontario have the same type of machinery but we do not have quite the same easy access to the wood supply that technology has given them. Our paper, while it is first class, is in very tough competition with other paper sources in the world and other wood products in the world.

• (1730)

I was wondering if in the restructuring of companies in his area whether he has a place that takes advantage of the changes we have made in the Income Tax Act that enable people to invest up to 10 per cent in the ownership of a company by using their private RRSPs. That means that they can in effect invest in their own company without paying income tax on the investment. In his area had he been promoting that rather beneficial arrangement for the assistance of people in developing small businesses and small business ownership and family business and for making capital available for people to build their own job opportunities?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for Mississauga South for his question.

I will respond in two ways. I would be very nervous about encouraging anybody to put at risk money which is designed to ensure that they have an appropriate income at the time they reach their retirement age. By diverting even a part of their RRSPs in a venture is not something I would go out and campaign for. It is obviously something that each individual would have to look at in terms of their own financial circumstances.

I can say we are very frustrated about the work being done by my colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie, in trying to convince the federal government to match what Ontario has done. This was in terms of allowing individuals who purchased shares of their companies to consider them as tax deductions. It is much like what was tried for Algoma Steel. My understanding is that it cannot be done and the government has refused to bring that forward.

Here is the other point. I discovered this after a colleague of mine was given notice that the job he had for 17 years is gone. He works in one of the grain related industries. The dilemma he now faces is he knows he is going to get severance pay and quite a decent package. He also knows that under the UI Act passed by this Parliament and moved by the Conservatives that that severance pay will be treated as earnings for a prescribed period of time. He had wanted to take that money and invest it in a small business that would provide him with employment. He is in his 50s. We all know the reality of workers at that age. They are not as employable as workers at age 45, 30 or 25 because of the length of time the employers see they will get back from their investment. He recognizes that but he is caught between a rock and a hard place.

He knows that if he takes that $20,000 and puts it into a small business he will have no income because he will be ineligible for unemployment insurance because the assumption is that the money will be used to replace unemployment insurance for up to 52 weeks. It is a real dilemma and it has been created by this government. Even though I know that was not the intention, it has actually worked against what the member has been suggesting, which is getting more people to invest in small business in those kinds of ways.

• (1735)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's speech. I wish the hon. member for Mississauga South had been a little more pointed in his question. I will try to make the point perhaps a little clearer.

The hon. member knows from the speeches we have heard today the employment loss in Ontario has been the gravest of all the provinces at 18 per cent or 185,000 jobs lost in the manufacturing sector.

I think he must recognize the gravity of that problem. I am sure he also recognizes that these jobs are not coming back. As he knows, Ontario is saddled with an NDP government which is driving investment out of the province.

We know that the economies in British Columbia—

An hon. member: They are driving us crazy.

Mr. Milliken: I was not going to go that far. He knows that jobs are being created in British Columbia and Alberta at the present time because those governments are much more enlightened. One of them is an NDP government I admit. It is more enlightened than the Ontario government, which seems to be unusually doctrinaire in its approach to social problems in our province.

I know he is a friend of the premier. There is a colleague of the premier in this House. I have suggested that the premier receive tutelage at the knees of some of the hon. members here. I would not want to suggest that the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan had been here long enough to tutor the premier of Ontario.

Certainly the premier would have benefited from his advice.

I wonder if he would agree with me that the appropriate advice for the premier is to get out of office. He is driving investment out of Ontario. He is stopping job creation in Ontario. In fact, if we had any other government in Ontario today, Ontario would be out of the recession.

I think the hon. member for Mississauga South will agree with that statement. If that is so, would he not agree with me that the best advice he could give the premier of Ontario is to call an election and put the people of our province out of their misery by allowing them to get rid of the government that is keeping them in the misery that the Tories helped create?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised that the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands would raise the question in that sort of tone.

An hon. member: Direct way.

Mr. Angus: Direct way. I do not agree with him at all. Let me make it very clear. I am quite supportive of Bob Rae and the Ontario cabinet and caucus.

Mr. Harvard: That's dangerous, Iain.

Mr. Angus: I will tell you why. First of all, when the hon. member's party was turfed out of office, it was spending like drunken sailors at a time when the economy was booming. It should have been putting money away. That is why, when the books were opened, we saw the billions of dollars that Ontario was in the hole. When David Peterson went around to people during the election saying: "We have money in the bank, folks," that money in the bank disappeared pretty quickly.

The second point I want to make—

Mr. Milliken: Spending like Bobbie Rae.

Mr. Angus: One of the things the Ontario government did after coming into office was recognize the impact the recession was going to have.

It used public tax dollars to protect existing jobs and slow down the outflow of jobs. It also used public money to invest in new projects, the anti-recession program. I can tell the member that created a lot of jobs throughout Ontario. I know that in northwestern Ontario it helped a lot of communities.

Mr. Milliken: Six hundred jobs.

Mr. Angus: No. I do not know the number but at the very least 600 jobs were created in Thunder Bay.

The member is wrong. The member should stop listening to the stuff that is coming out of Queen's Park from his provincial colleagues and start looking at the figures. He should look beyond the rhetoric to find out the kind of good work the Ontario government has done.

Quite frankly if there had not been an NDP government in Ontario we would not have had the assistance to Algoma Steel in Sault Ste. Marie. We would not have had the package for Kapuskasing and we certainly would not have had the help that we got in Sapawe and Atikokan. Provincial Papers would be closed today and not owned by its employees.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to speak this afternoon to an opposition motion to the effect that the federal government, my government, has done very little for the economy and that it sat idly by, to use the words of my colleague from the New Democratic Party, without any attempt at strengthening the economy.

• (1740)

I think this is a totally gratuitous, ludicrous and unfounded statement. All in all I would say it could be described as a typical NDP statement. Let me explain. History shows, and we have the figures to prove it, that when we came to power in 1984, we inherited an extremely high deficit. At that time the Prime Minister of Canada stated that one of his government's priorities would be to bring down that deficit, to help small businesses get back on their feet, and to get rid of any overlapping that existed, which would make it possible for Canadians to thrive in their country and abroad.

What did we do? First we tackled the deficit which was out of control; the government had been spending more than it was taking in and the debt was increasing dramatically. During the last few years we went from an operating deficit to an operating surplus. Except for the debt, one could say that our government, under the responsible leadership of our Prime Minister, has succeeded in radically containing the operating deficits and replacing them with operating surpluses. Unfortunately, my opposition colleagues, the Liberals in particular, are reluctant to admit that our government's policies have produced very positive results.

Since 1984 both the Liberal and the NDP opposition have questioned the various programs and bills, even the various budgets tabled by our both past and present Ministers of Finance. Each time they called it a catastrophe. Each time a new budget was tabled in the House, they said it was worthless because Tory budgets mean economic chaos for Canadians. Businesses will go bankrupt or will be shut down and jobs will be lost.

But when we look at what has happened since 1984 and we study figures carefully, we realize that we have helped the business sector more than before. How can we do that? Of course, the government is not going to set up businesses. I see my Liberal colleague nodding in disagreement but if he looked closely at what has happened and considered where investments were, he would see the tax breaks and the interest rate cutbacks companies have benefited from. In 1984 for a businessman who wanted to start a company, the commercial rate under a Liberal government was 12 per cent. Now, in spite of the criticism from the Liberal opposition, the commercial rate is 5.35 per cent. You can play politics. You can say whatever you want. One thing is for sure, if you have the choice of paying a 12 per cent interest rate on a million dollar loan or 5.35 per cent, any Canadian in his right mind, maybe with the exception of a Liberal, will choose to pay 5.35 per cent. That is how the federal government, the Prime Minister and our Ministers of Finance, have wanted to operate since 1984.

On one hand they tell us: You're helping companies at the expense of workers. But without companies, there are no workers. It is an equation which is fairly simple and so logical that it should not even be questioned.

On the other hand we were told: Now we have the companies but no workers who are experienced. So we should give them some training because whether we like it or not, we are open to global competition and to foreign markets. Canada is an exporting country and it needs some foreign market. The opposition told us no, that we must stay home. They were against the free trade agreement with the United States. Now they are fighting against the agreement with Unites States and Mexico. They forget to mention one thing to Canadians and again it is very important and has no political colour: Our trade surplus with the United States was $17.5 billion last year which means hundreds and thousands of jobs in our country.

• (1745)

This means that jobs were saved, jobs that brought tax revenue to the government and gave our small business people in each of our municipalities and our respective ridings a living because people were able to buy and to pay. Our workers' income had an added value that was extremely important because the inflation rate last year was 1.5 per cent compared to the average of 8.8 per cent under the last Liberal government.

Figures do not lie; the figures show that the Conservative government of Prime Minister Mulroney with its finance ministers and various ministers with economic portfolios has taken concrete action to give Canadians better opportunities in the world economy.

The Conservative government is not the one saying that Canada will have the highest growth rate next year; it is the OECD, all industrialized countries that say Canada is doing well and working to overcome its financial problems created by a previous government.

We see what that does, the massive intervention of a government trying to create a parallel economy, a fictitious economy. Remember, and who does not remember—I see my colleague from Mississauga South and I am sure that in his riding he had problems in 1984 and before—when ordinary people wanted to borrow to buy a house. Interest rates were around 20 per cent; today you can get a mortgage at 9 or 10 per cent or so. This means taxpayers save 10 per cent in interest. The 10 per cent saved on a mortgage loan can be used for consumer goods. Consumer goods mean production, which means job creation, business and available capital.

I do not think that Canadians are not intelligent. On the contrary, they have been able to set themselves up in business in recent years not only in their respective provinces but also internationally. Looking at companies like SNC Lavalin and Bombardier, which are leaders in our economy, we can say one thing: We need foreign trade in order to survive.

Not just foreign trade comes into it because as we go down to more concrete levels in our local economy we realize that our government has done a lot since 1984. Of course we have not solved everything but we have done an awful lot to revive the economy. For example, take the number of unemployed workers in 1984. When something did not work the Liberal government created a Crown corporation and all sorts of programs but in fact these were not necessarily long-term paying jobs.

I am looking at the statistics here, because we are often criticized for losing hundreds of thousands of jobs while the Conservative government did nothing. For example, in April 1992, 12,173,000 people were employed and in 1993 there were 12,376,000, an increase of 203,000 in a year. That is not so bad for a government which they say is doing nothing for the economy.

Nearly 163,000 full-time jobs were created in a year. In every Question Period, we hear the opposition say: "It is disastrous. Companies have closed down and jobs have been lost because of free trade with the Americans or free trade with Mexico." It is getting very hard to answer the opposition because when we talk to them individually, most of the sensible members in the Liberal Party tell us that, yes, a free trade agreement with the United States is essential and vital. Every one of them tells us that markets are going global and that we cannot live in isolation. Of course for partisan political reasons they can say that they want to renegotiate the agreement, reopen it and impose Canada's position.

They do not know what renegotiation means. Furthermore, I would point out to everyone listening to us that under the last Liberal government, relations with the Americans were extremely strained. We lost hundreds, even thousands of jobs because of that.

• (1750)

One of the daily tasks of our Prime Minister was to rebuild the confidence of the Americans in our country, to reopen markets which had been lost by the Liberal government, to try to allow Canadian businesses to export and create jobs for Canadians. That is what we did and we can see the results today.

When we do business with our main partner, the United States, we no longer need to refer disagreements to the GATT where decisions can take three, four or even five years. We have a settlement mechanism within the free trade agreement and this has proven to be most helpful for Canadians. Look at our pork producers, for instance, and we are now working on the softwood lumber case.

I heard NDP members say that we did not do anything for the forest industry, for the pulp and paper industry. They know very well that we are going through a market restructuring and that Canada is no longer alone on international markets. Competition is fierce.

That is why, accompanied the Minister of Forestry, who is now in Europe defending the sound management of our forests accompanied by the Minister for International Trade and with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who more than tripled and even quadrupled the budget for labour training, we are giving ourselves development tools that are very interesting.

As evidence of what I am saying, only two weeks ago the Minister of Employment and Immigration was in my riding. He announced financial assistance of $300,000 to a co-operative of forest workers who bought a business, a sawmill, at a cost of $1,500,000. They will maintain 70 jobs and open new markets.

Do you know what is interesting, Madam Speaker? A part of their new market is directed toward American markets and will reach European markets. Contrary to some prophets of doom on the Liberal side, but particularly on the NDP side, they are not scared of markets, of competition. They mostly trust their ability as workers to have in their community a profitable industry with quality products.

These are ordinary people who did that and they did it with pleasure. They did it because it was an economic challenge to keep their region strong, to allow some people to get back into business and to allow others to start new businesses.

Very shortly yet another announcement will be made in my constituency concerning an investment of $400,000 going to a sawmill, for a total of $2,800,000. A dry kiln will be built. Why a dry kiln? Because we are exporting a lot of lumber. This particular sawmill exports a lot of its lumber, not to the Canadian market, but to foreign markets, to the United States and Europe. We have high quality phytosanitary measures and our businesses are adapting to new market conditions.

Unlike the opposition parties, the companies do not rest on their laurels and say: "Boy, everything is wrong. It is even worse than before. Nothing has changed". Quite the opposite. They seek new business opportunities because they know that in order to succeed they need to be productive and to compete not only with other Canadian or Quebec businesses but also with every international company in their industry. That is the key to success and what we have been successfully promoting since 1984.

I see my colleague from Richmond—Wolfe is here. Even if it is wrong we often say our friends from the Bloc Quebecois, our friends from the Liberal Party, our friends from the NDP. I call them friends because they are members of Parliament, but besides being parliamentarians we have nothing in common.

The hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe told me he worked hard to help, for example Domtar in Windsor which got a $40 million investment; in Disraeli $200,000 was given to a company; the RCM received $1 million through the disadvantaged areas assistance program. The same thing was done in our part of the country. The federal government negotiated Canada-Quebec and Canada-Ontario agreements. In the end, federal-provincial agreements were reached in every major economic sector.

We have done a lot, and we did it not just by excessively increasing government expenditures. We did it within our ability to pay, within our ability to do things without borrowing from our children's future and the future of all Canadians. Above all, we did it jointly with all the provinces and with each and every one of our partners.

I do not understand why the NDP refused to support the free trade agreement which was extremely important for Quebec and the other provinces which export to the United States. Neither do I understand why the NDP and the Liberals refused to support drug bills which were extremely important in terms of research and development, in terms of highly skilled jobs and in terms of specialized jobs.

Similarly, I cannot see why our colleagues from the NDP and the Liberal Party voted against the unemployment insurance reform bill which allowed the Minister of Employment and Immigration to take sums of money and use them for training instead of simply encouraging workers to look for a job.

These last few years, they have refused to co-operate to stimulate the Canadian economy. They have refused to do so because in their view, it does not matter if you spend too much, it does not matter if you spend more than your operating budget since it is only somebody else's money anyway.

Today for example, when we look at our public finances, we are happy and proud to be able to say that revenues are now higher than expenditures. That is what a responsible government is all about. That is why the Richmond—Wolfe, Champlain and Mississauga ridings, and even ridings of members of the opposition, can obtain real economic action which benefit the workers and the businesses and bring in revenues.

I almost forgot; now that I see him, I remember my colleague, the member for Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle whose efforts were focused on forestry. He worked extremely hard to push forward at least three forestry projects with federal investments in sawmills totaling over $4 million. That amount of $4 million will generate $16 million in investments will create 350 direct jobs in Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle and who knows how many indirect jobs. We did that although the opposition, Liberals and New Democrats alike, would want the Canadian people to believe that we did nothing. Those are real achievements rather than just empty rhetoric as they often indulge in.

The opposition claims that the members on this side are silent; they are not silent. They are working to solve issues and economic problems in their respective constituencies. We can enumerate every one of them as well as the businesses which have been helped. We can even name the workers who have been helped and the programs which were implemented. Finally, we can say that in spite of the unpopular policies implemented by our government since 1984 there is hope in the eyes of Canadians. They know that we are a responsible government which makes difficult decisions and that we will be re-elected.

If I were a Liberal I would be getting concerned because the polls show that it is indeed the case. If I were a New Democrat I would not worry however, because their popularity is high before an election, but they always fall back where they belong come election time. I would worry if I belonged to the Bloc Quebecois, because they are the ones who will most likely disappear.

In the last nine years the government formed by the Progressive Conservative Party was able to give a new life to the Canadian economy. It was able to do so not only by putting money into our businesses, but by cleaning up our institutions and by managing in such a way that would make any Canadian venture a profitable one. Indeed, it is hard not to follow the example of the federal government because our revenues are higher than our expenditures and it is the net profit which benefits Canadians as a whole.

This is why I am proud to belong to a party which believes that the economy is not built by "program creators" as the Liberals did, but through joint action and harmonization by the economic sector, the workers and the governments. This is what puts our country among the ones which will experience the highest growth rate in the coming year.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

VIA RAIL

REMOTE ROUTES

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should hold full public hearings before a final decision is made on the status of VIA Rail's remote routes.

He said: I am pleased to rise in debate today on an important issue to the people of Prince George—Bulkley Valley and northern British Columbia. The issue is the future of VIA Rail's Skeena service that runs from Prince Rupert to Prince George and through the Robson Valley on to Jasper.

The focus of the debate is my private member's motion that calls for the government to hold public hearings before deciding on the future of VIA's remote services which includes the Skeena. Before giving some background to the motion I want to say—I think I have checked the record—that this is the first time that Parliament has debated VIA's remote services to this extent, I want to thank the members who are here tonight to participate in this debate for that involvement.

Members will remember the announcement by the government in October 1989 to cut VIA services across the country by 50 per cent. Many services were eliminated completely and others were cut back. Perhaps the most notorious cut by the government was the decision to drop the fabled train called the Canadian that provided service on the Canadian Pacific route, often referred to as the southern route. This was a classic train noted all over the world and this government cancelled it. One will remember that we were to get a private service in its place. That is something yet to happen.

The government then allowed VIA to continue its northern route that was cut back to three times a week in either direction. Work has been done to improve this service and I will comment on that a little later on.

At the same time as these changes were made the government announced that eight so-called remote services operated by VIA would be reviewed by the government. I quote from the minister's release of the day: "The government will be reviewing the transportation needs of the truly isolated communities along these remote routes to determine whether more cost-effective means of access could be introduced". The future of these services was left in the hands of the Minister of Transport.

The remote services were The Pas to Lynn Lake, Wabowden to Churchill, Winnipeg to Churchill, Sudbury to White River, Senneterre to Cochrane, Montreal to Senneterre, Montreal to Jonquière and, of course, the Skeena.

I would like to focus my comments on the Skeena and then make some reference to general comments on the remote service. The Skeena operates between Prince Rupert, Prince George and Jasper three times a week. In the past, some time ago, it was daily and at one time served Edmonton. Conventional equipment is used and it passes some of the best scenery available for rail passengers in Canada, or in the world for that matter. The trip has been written up by foreign writers as one of VIA's best kept secrets. It even hosted CBC's Midday program at one time.

I have travelled on the train quite often and am always impressed by the trip, the terrific staff and the opportunity to see my riding and the rest of northern B.C. from a different perspective. The staff on the train have always been very helpful and are always willing to pass on their views about the need to keep the service and how to improve it. They are very dedicated to good passenger rail service.

Statistics released at the time of the cuts to VIA pointed to an expensive run but also one that, when running on a half decent schedule, generated enough traffic to be in the top third of all VIA trains and also the top of all of the remote services.

• (1805)

However the cuts to VIA affected the service's awareness to people. The current schedule of 3 a.m. departures from Prince George—some would question whether Prince George is on a remote service—did not make it popular with travellers. Connections in Jasper to the Transcontinental service are non-existent and are not an encouragement to travel to points east or to return from the east by train. The three days a week service is not frequent enough to give travellers the automatic knowledge of when the train will be coming or going.

All that combined with a telephone service that is not always easy to use has led to a decrease in traffic although there are still times when the train is very busy.

Following the government's decision to study the remote services I continued to impress upon the government the need to make a positive decision on VIA Rail. I kept the pressure on three different transport ministers to make a final decision that recognized the need to keep the Skeena running. At times the government was confused about the direction to take. Letters often contradicted public statements and the decision-making process seemed to drag on, perhaps deliberately.

For example while the decision to review the service was made in October 1989, as of July 1992 the minister was still saying that a decision had not yet been made. In fact a letter which I have just recently received from the minister says that cabinet still has not had time to actually review the file, but more on that in a moment.

In order to consult with local residents along the line I along with the member for Skeena hosted a public meeting in Smithers, B.C. on September 30. We heard comments from tourist operators, local governments, chambers of commerce and people who work on the railroad itself. They all spoke about the need to keep the service, to improve the schedule and to develop a comprehensive marketing campaign. A clear consensus emerged that we had to keep the pressure on the government to make a positive decision.

Also, with the hon. member for Skeena I want to extend our thanks to our party's transport critic, the hon. member from Thunder Bay—Atikokan. He has been outspoken on the questions of VIA Rail and the disaster we now have in the country and with all the troubles in the airline industry.

Last July there was some success when the Minister of Transport visited Prince George. I issued a challenge to him to keep the service going. The minister responded by saying as reported in the Prince George Citizen on July 25, 1992: "As far as the Skeena is concerned it is still a decision of CN Rail and the Government of Canada to keep the Skeena running". He went on to say: "I am committed to see it continued".

I praised the minister and the government for this decision and was hopeful that it would be finalized and plans for the service could be developed to improve its viability and attractiveness to the travelling public. Since then we have had some good news and maybe some not so good news.

Correspondence as recent as a letter dated February 11, 1993 from the Minister of Transport would seem to indicate there is still some confusion on the part of the government as to the future of these remote services. I quote from the letter: "Although the review process for the VIA Rail remote services is complete, cabinet has not yet had an opportunity to consider the remote services file. As I mentioned in my previous correspondence"—I might add many previous letters—"I am confident that a decision will be made as soon as possible. Thank you again for writing".

First of all I think it would be opportune and helpful to the members of this House, certainly those members who represent constituencies where there are remote services, if the minister would release that report and make it available to us. I think that would go some distance in aiding all of us who are obviously communicating with our constituents, local governments and chambers of commerce on the importance of these services.

Let us settle the confusion first. In the February 11 letter the minister continues to go on about how this file is still being studied. Three transport ministers have been doing that since October 1989.

• (1810)

I want to make it very clear the Minister of Transport made a public commitment to the people of northern B.C. that the Skeena was to be continued and I hold this government to that promise. The minister cannot say one thing in Prince George and another here in Ottawa. The Skeena is here to stay.

More recently VIA Rail has announced consultations regarding changes to the Skeena. This is a bit of the good news. What is being proposed for the Skeena is a daylight service with trains running from Prince Rupert to Prince George three times a week during the day and a similar service from Prince George to Jasper also during the day.

The focus will be on the tourist potential of the train and it is very clear that Prince George, the city, and its hospitality industry will be the biggest benefactors of this change. All of the communities from the Robson Valley, McBride, to Burns Lake and Houston will also benefit from the increased travel.

The travel will be at more reasonable times. It will now be possible for people from McBride as I mentioned to go to Prince George during normal hours. It will also be possible to head west from Prince George to Burns Lake or Houston at a more reasonable departure time.

Assuming no major problems with this proposal, VIA intends to upgrade meal service on the train, add a coach, and have at least one day of good connections in Jasper to the Canadian where there are currently no convenient connections.

I should note as well that for residents of the Prince George area of northern B.C. the quickest way to travel for example to Vancouver is actually on the British Columbia Railway. This new schedule should make connections much easier with the BCR for those passengers wanting to travel by train to Vancouver.

Perhaps the most important part of the consultations from VIA Rail are VIA's plans to launch a major marketing of the service in Japan, Australia, the United States and the United Kingdom. This may be the first real promotion of the run in some time. We need the kind of promotion of the Skeena like VIA currently does of its service in central Canada.

If we had the full colour ads and the television advertising that most of us see in Ottawa and in central Canada for which VIA is perfectly in its right to do and I encourage VIA to do that, but we ask for a little fairness. If we had even a portion of that advertising and promotion revenue for Skeena clearly more people would be aware of the service. It always grates me to see the extensive advertising conducted here when there is nothing to promote the Skeena.

Even VIA's ads to promote special rates on the Canadian in western Canada do not include tickets on the Skeena. The changes VIA Rail is proposing would take effect with the April 1994 schedule. VIA says it needs time to prepare the service and to market the trip overseas.

I have already had calls to my office. Of course many people, encouraged by these hopeful changes thought they were going to happen immediately. After explaining to them that VIA feels it needs the time to change the schedule, people were comforted by that and were pleased to hear that maybe for the first time in a long time something is actually going to be done to improve and work on the service on the Skeena.

I was pleased that the president of VIA Rail, Mr. Lawless, took the time to greet the member for Skeena and me on the change and to hear our suggestions and comments about the direction to take. It is a step in the right direction and I hope ensures the Skeena's continued operation.

There is one caution though. It was expressed to me by some residents in the community as to whether the service's new orientation would be able to attract the necessary traffic in the winter months. In other words, in improving the service to serve the expected heavier tourist use which we support, we must not forget about the regular users of the route and the system. One proposal was made to me that if there were heavier tourist potential and use in the summer it might revert to a slightly different or tailored service in the winter months.

• (1815)

It is my view that even more can be done. This government has to definitively state that remote services are not going to be cut. As I said earlier, the Minister of Transport has made a commitment to northern British Columbia and Prince George, but when one looks at the writing, he is less supportive here in Ottawa and he cannot have it both ways.

It is my view as well that the government must introduce a VIA Rail act so that the corporation can continue to operate on a more independent basis and not always rely on the blessing of the government of the day.

With regard to the Skeena, I also see a need to look at daily service as we once had and for an extension to Edmonton which VIA Rail was open to if the traffic should warrant it. We have seen what the improved service on the Canadian has done for the traffic on that run.

The upgrading and improvement of that particular service has attracted the ridership. People who are taking that train have been prepared to pay the price for it as well, which tells me and I hope will tell this House that when an effort is put into upgrading and improving the service people will take the train. The schedule must be convenient and there must be a marketing plan to back it up.

My motion calls on the government to hold public hearings before a decision on the remote services is made. There have been some consultations in northern B.C. with VIA Rail, the tourist operators and others about the proposed changes to the Skeena. Those kinds of hearings have to be more extensive, in particular to the other runs in this country where the discussions are ongoing.

The first step would be for the minister to release that report. His report to cabinet should be made public so that we have the benefit of the research and knowledge of his department and the time it has put into it. Then we could circulate the report and discuss it with the communities, the chambers of commerce, the local governments, the people working on the railroad itself. We could see the direction in which the government wants to proceed and the public could have an opportunity to have their say.

The public did not have their say when the Draconian cuts were made to Via Rail in October 1989. I think that is only fair particularly to those communities where in some cases the train is the only transportation service available. At the very least, the people in those communities should be given the opportunity to have their say.

I have fought long and hard to keep the Skeena operating and to improve its service. There is still more that can be done but to date, we have a commitment to keep it going. I am going to keep up the good fight for the people of my riding to see that this service continues.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's arguments in favour of public hearings.

However, I am afraid I must disagree and I intend to provide a number of statistics to show that hearings would not contribute any information that is not already available.

I wish to respond today to the hon. member's motion requesting that public hearings be held before a final decision is made on the status of VIA's remote routs. As you will recall, these services were not affected by the government's decision in 1989 to restructure the VIA Rail network.

Rather, the remote services were to become the subject of a study to determine if more cost effective options existed for providing service to truly isolated communities.

Before addressing my hon. colleague's motion, I think it might be useful if I were to elaborate somewhat on the characteristics of the remote services, so that people will know just what it is we are talking about today.

As part of its network, VIA operates eight remote services. These eight routes operate over 3,100 miles of CN and CP railway lines in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia.

• (1820)

The eight remote routes operate between the following points, which may interest our listeners: Montreal–Jonquiere; Montreal–Senneterre; Senneterre–Cochrane; Sudbury–White River; Winnipeg–Churchill; The Pas–Lynn Lake; and Jasper–Prince Rupert.

Generally speaking, VIA operates three return trips a week over each route. The only exceptions are along the Senneterre–Cochrane route where VIA operates only one round trip per week between Taschereau, Quebec and Cochrane, Ontario, and the Wabowden–Churchill route which sees one round trip per week.

The Wabowden–Churchill service, however, follows the same route as the Winnipeg–Churchill train, which runs three return trips a week.

The Wabowden–Churchill and The Pas–Lynn Lake services operate as mixed trains. A mixed train consists of a freight train which operates on a fixed schedule to which one or more passenger cars are attached. All the other remote services operate only as passenger trains. Coach and checked baggage service are provided on all the trains.

Sleeper and meal facilities are provided on the Montreal–Senneterre, Winnipeg–Churchill and Jasper–Prince Rupert trains which operate on overnight schedules.

Studies have shown that of the 394 points located in the remote areas served by the trains—and here are some statistics that are real eye-openers—only 45 have year-round populations with a total of 7,844 residents. Many of these 45 points are the homes of native people. So you get the picture. Of 394 points, only 45 have year-round populations, and most of those 45 points are the homes of native people.

The most recent statistics available indicate that the number of residents living at remote points on a year-round basis was 2,457 on the Montreal–Senneterre route, 10 on the Senneterre–Cochrane route, 326 on the Sudbury–White River route, 3,002 on the Winnipeg–Churchill and Wabowden routes, 1,793 on The Pas–Lynn Lake route and 141 along the Jasper–Prince Rupert route. There are no individuals living on a year-round basis at any of the remote points identified as stops along the Montreal–Jonquiere route.

People may wonder, then, what these routes are used for. These trains are used for a variety of purposes. Certainly they provide those people who do live year-round at remote points—and there are very few, as I said earlier—with access to regional service centres for medical, shopping, educational and business opportunities.

Many of the remaining points are used on a seasonal basis. They are used for recreational purposes to access cottages and commercial lodges and camps located at remote points. Others travel into the area for hunting, boating or other recreational wilderness pursuits. Such remote service contributes to the economic activity in the area by promoting access to camps, lodges and tour operators located in remote wilderness areas.

Some individuals travel to remote points to earn their livelihoods in such areas of activity as trapping, fishing, prospecting and forestry.

That is why the trains provide a limited freight service. And that is why the statistics on service frequency, routes and population density are so important. The trains provide a limited—that is the operative word—freight service, carrying foodstuffs, essential supplies and mail to remote communities.

• (1825)

In 1992 approximately 42 per cent of the passengers using the remote services were destined to points which are solely served by VIA. The remaining passengers were travelling to points which are accessible by year-round highways and in some cases are also accessible by bus or air transport.

The number of travellers going to or from remote points varies considerably by service. In 1992, the percentage of passengers travelling to or from a remote point varied from 80 per cent for The Pas–Lynn Lake to 7 per cent for Jasper–Prince Rupert. In the case of the Montreal–Jonquière service which has no permanent year-round population at any remote point, these travellers are going to seasonal camps and cottages located at remote points.

In 1992 almost 108,000 passengers travelled on these services yielding an average of 42 passengers per trip operated. The level of demand, however, varied greatly. The Winnipeg to Churchill route, which at almost 1,100 miles is the longest remote service, carried an average of 101 passengers per trip. In contrast, the Senneterre–Cochrane service carried only eight passengers per trip.

Between 1988 and 1992 the ridership on these services declined by 28 per cent. These declines can be attributed to the construction of roads into the remote areas, declining populations at remote points, closure of lumber camps, and regrettably the downturn in the tourism sector which has been felt in many regions over the past several years. As well, many passengers who used the remote services to travel to points which do have other means of access appear to have shifted to alternate means such as car, bus or air to make their trips.

No one can deny that the remote services represent a complex situation. They are strung out across the northern regions of our vast country, in areas with a small and declining population. However, the cost of providing this service is accelerating. In 1992, the subsidy per passenger amounted to $250. In other words we are subsidizing a very small percentage of the travelling public. You must realize that common sense dictates we review the entire situation.

I agree that the government must look at the provision of services to remote communities in all these regions, but we must reduce costs. As a government, we are responsible for managing the resources and finances of this country. That is why I do not think it would be useful to conduct public hearings. The government must therefore take the lead and make decisions on the basis of the situation and the figures before us today and I must say we have enough information to do so.

[English]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given the opportunity to address this private member's bill which I believe can be supported. Let me explain why.

To have full public hearings before a final decision regarding VIA Rail's remote routes is taken seems to me to be rather wise.

[Translation]

We could have public hearings which would last a long time, cost a lot of money, and so on, but we could also have shorter public hearings to try and confirm some statistics as my colleague was saying a moment ago. It all depends on the scope of the hearings. As far as I am concerned, I would prefer public hearings, to be absolutely sure. My friend said that situations vary a great deal. There are remote communities where the only access is by rail while others, although small and isolated, are better linked with the rest of the world. As far as I am concerned I would say that we should consult without taking months to do so and spending millions of dollars.

Clearly I support this motion, but I support it in a positive way since I would like public hearings to ascertain that the data we have are accurate.

[English]

As I indicated, we must make sure we see each unique situation as it is. I support a policy for the whole of Canada that looks at the smaller, isolated, very often northern communities. I think it is important that we do not simply look at one part of the nation but we do so within the whole.

• (1830)

I want to focus on the line to Churchill and the port of Churchill this evening. Obviously those are in my province and are particularly important to me and my province.

Some will know that I and my party colleagues sat down together and put out what we called an agenda for jobs and growth. We believe that an aggressive economic policy is the key to the creation of jobs. This is very relevant. I want my colleagues to know that I am not playing any games. We addressed a number of factors: the cultural industries, the production of ethanol which might be good for the west, a new core area agreement for the city of Winnipeg, and prairie and western integration programs because we think that we can do more things co-operatively. We looked at Winnipeg International Airport and what might be done to enhance jobs but we also looked at the port of Churchill.

I want to focus my comments on the port of Churchill. The port of Churchill has been one of the victims of the nine years of Tory economic policy. Where the Tories see this as a lost cause, and I do not say that unkindly, we see it rather as an opportunity to be seized. Obviously there is an ideological difference.

Our intent with Churchill is anchored in a very straightforward set of facts. Prairie grain producers have the opportunity to export their product through a port situated closer to their farms, closer to major export markets, which is simply less costly than the St. Lawrence seaway or the west coast. Those are facts and that is part of our statement. Churchill makes economic sense for prairie farmers and Manitoba.

I want to quote this document. This is a fact that not a lot of people know about.

> For example, Churchill is approximately 1,270km from Prince Albert. But Montreal is more than 3,500km away via Thunder Bay and the Seaway. Murmansk, Russia is an important destination for Canadian grain exports. It is more than 800km closer to Churchill than to Montreal. The simple fact is that the Port of Churchill can save prairie farmers on transport costs compared to Thunder Bay and the St. Lawrence.

I continue to quote from this document.

> Using Churchill is also sound environmental policy. Shorter distances mean less consumption of fossil fuels. A thriving Port and maintenance of the rail line could pave the way for economic diversification in Churchill.

fThis is extremely important.

> Port facilities and a rail link make it a leading world contender as a spaceport satellite launching centre. New opportunities in Northern tourism also depend heavily on the continuation of the rail link.

It is not only for the grain. There are other possibilities, for example tourism. Again to quote from this particular report:

> Yet the rail link and all its spin-off benefits depend on grain exports through the Port of Churchill. The Port requires 600,000 tonnes per year to break even.

This is a fact.

> However, in the last several years it has seen less than 300,000 tonnes.

Therefore, it has been losing money.

> The Port could easily handle 1,000,000 tonnes per year without difficulty and without expensive upgrading of either the rail link or the Port facility itself.

We believe that.

> Exciting opportunities are within reach for Churchill. For example talks are under way on barter arrangements with Russia which would see Canadian grain exports paid for with phosphate rock. Churchill could be the linchpin in substantial two-way trade flows between the prairies and the new democracies of Europe.

I complete this quote by saying that my colleagues and I want to press any new government for the export of one million tonnes of grain through the port of Churchill each year.

While I have deliberately focused my remarks on the port of Churchill, I think we have to do an in-depth analysis on the others as well. While I suspect my colleague's statistics, and they were impressive, are really quite accurate, it is particularly important to ensure that we look at each unique situation. Without exaggerating costs, because I am sensitive to those as well, particularly in today's economy, it would be foolhardy not to have public hearings so that we can make sure that whatever decisions are taken are sound for the people in those various communities.

• (1835)

[Translation]

I could not agree more. I do not want public hearings for the sake of it, but I would like to try and establish what the best solution is for each remote community concerned.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to support my colleague's motion which the House should adopt, requiring public hearings before any decision is made on the remote services of VIA Rail.

Let me begin by asking, where is the report? When the then Minister of Transport announced in succession the elimination of 50 per cent of VIA Rail services in the fall of 1989 and the Prime Minister announced the creation of the royal commission on passenger transportation at the same time, the minister also said, and my colleague read a quote from the press release, that they would do a study of the remote routes to look at alternate ways of providing services. There are a number of Canadians who can only leave their communities by rail. There is no road, there is no air service, and in some cases there is no water service, certainly not of the commercial variety. They are captive.

I know for a fact, and it is in the public record, that the Department of Transport finished the report quite some time ago. I believe it was almost eight or nine months ago when I heard it was completed and they were just waiting for time on the cabinet agenda.

While we are all happy they are continuing the remote services, there is a level of uncertainty out there. I challenge the government today. I hope the next government member that stands in his or her place to speak on this motion will tell the House why it is the Minister of Transport cannot get time at the cabinet table to talk about alternatives for the remote rail services.

Is it because cabinet members already know what is in it? Do they know that the price tag for providing alternate services, either road or air, is too expensive? Conversely do they know that the price tag for relocating those 7,844 permanent residents along those eight lines is also excessive? Or maybe whatever is in that report is as bad as the original decision was and the government does not want to add any more nails to its coffin as it goes into the federal election.

I encourage the government member to report to the House. I encourage the Minister of Transport to report to the House and tell us what is happening with that.

I mentioned uncertainty. The member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley has done an incredible amount of work keeping the issue of the Skeena alive in his area to the point where the Minister of Transport, I assume at the beck of the government member for that area, told chamber of commerce members, as reported in the Prince George Citizen on July 25, 1992:

> Corbeil told Chamber members at Friday's luncheon his commitment to maintain VIA Rail's Skeena service through Prince George is firm.
> "As far as the Skeena is concerned, it's still a decision of CN Rail and the Government of Canada to keep it running," he said. "My colleague, Frank Oberle, said the line would go only over his dead body.
> "I wouldn't want to be responsible for him shooting himself," Corbeil added, eliciting laughter. "And so I'm committed to see it (Skeena) continued."

• (1840)

Yet we hear that they are still studying it, that they do not have the report to cabinet and that cabinet has not made a decision. There is that uncertainty.

There is also uncertainty every place east of Winnipeg. Independent of what the government is doing—in fact the government has said that it will not intervene in any way—CN and CP are working together to roll up as many tracks as they can. CN has already applied to sell its line from Truro to Sydney, Nova Scotia. CP has applied to abandon its line from Sherbrooke, Quebec, to Saint John, New Brunswick, a line which contains VIA Rail services that I used not too long ago. They are combining operations in the Ottawa Valley which will have an effect on VIA Rail services. They are looking at consolidation of operations east of Winnipeg.

When the government member spoke he forgot one of the remote lines, one of the protected lines. It is the line that goes from Capreol to Winnipeg. It is the line that the Transcontinental is on. The reason the Transcontinental goes on the northern line where there are fewer people as opposed to the southern line where there are hundreds of thousands of people, a line that goes through the north shore of Lake Superior, the city of Thunder Bay, Dryden and Kenora to Winnipeg, is that the northern line is a protected line. There are communities along there that have no alternative services. VIA decided to forgo the revenue it would get on the southern line, and a lot of people used that train on the southern line, because it had to keep services on the northern line.

In my discussions with Mr. Lawless he indicated that if we were to relocate the current three times a week service that runs on the CN northern line to the CP line to the south along the north shore of Lake Superior, that in itself would not cost much more than it does today in terms of operation costs or level of subsidy. To provide a local service much like we have in some of the other remote lines would cost a subsidy of about $12 million or $13 million per year. I do not know whether that takes into consideration the increased revenue on the southern line that would offset some of that, but that is part of the reality.

CN and CP are looking at consolidating their operations from Winnipeg through Thunder Bay on to Ca-preol and Sudbury. If the two railways decide to do as indicated in a report done for the National Transportation Review Commission and the northern CN line which is currently the home of the Transcontinental VIA service is abandoned, that passenger service will be relocated to the southern line.

What happens to those people who live along that northern line whose only way out today is by rail? I grant that there are not hundreds of thousands of them. I take the member at his word that there are roughly 7,800 to 7,900 permanent residents. There are also a lot of working class folks who have what we may call cottages in other parts of Canada but we call camps up our way. They are not elaborate. They are not insulated. There is no electricity. Basically there are walls, a roof, a floor, some windows, a door and some bunk-beds. It is the kind of recreation a lot of working people in the cities of Winnipeg, Thunder Bay and Sudbury can afford.

There is also a lot of industry along those lines, industry such as the tourism outfitters that rely on that remote service to stimulate the economy of this nation. They attract people from the United States, Europe and Asia into those camps. They need the rails to get there. It may not show up on VIA's books but it certainly shows up on our balance of payments and it certainly shows up in the taxation applied both federally and provincially to tourist outfitters and the people who work for them. The member suggests we should have public hearings before any changes are made. I would like to remind the House the last time the only public hearings were by the transport committee after the decision was made, trying to derail it. It had no luck.

I took the matter to the Federal Court of Appeal twice and lost both times. In fact, I am still paying some of the bills. That was the only public review.

At the very least if services are going to be eliminated or replaced, there should be public hearings. There should be environmental assessments. It may be doing more damage to punch a road through the natural environment than to continue the rail services. I could go on and on.

I would encourage the House to support my colleague's motion because there is a lot of great rail service out there. I rode the E & N last week. I took it to Nanaimo and met my colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan to talk about the rail issues that affect his community. It is a great service. It is like a remote service even though it is not remote. We need those kinds of services in this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There being no further members rising for debate, the time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bill McKnight (for the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notice of a question of privilege.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Madam Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of debate concerning Bill C-93.

During report stage debate, the government introduced some new figures. The debate very much hinged on the efficiency and cost savings to be achieved by bringing the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the external cultural program into the Canada Council.

We heard testimony from Treasury Board, the Privy Council as well as Finance in committee stating there were no savings. We tried as well to bring in the minister and the people from the Canada Council in order to allow us to verify whether there would be any savings and efficiencies. We were not allowed to do that. During the debate the government introduced a new set of figures, claiming some $5 million per year in savings will be achieved.

It is important as a member of Parliament that I know where these figures come from and that I have an opportunity to review them because they are important in determining what position we will take on this bill. It is also important to the academic community because, as would members on this side of the House, it would like to see greater efficiencies and cost savings. We would like to see that this is proven.

I believe my grounds for the question of privilege are that my ability to perform my duties as a member of Parliament have been infringed. As well, the authority and the dignity of Parliament and of all members have been offended by the action of the government. The action in question is the introduction of new and previously unavailable and arguably withheld evidence to the House. The lack of the evidence in question affects my judgment as a member and potentially the judgment of my party. In short I have a right to examine the evidence and to draw conclusions, a right I tried to exercise in the committee without success.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I am at a loss to understand the view of my friend from Regina on this matter.

During the committee hearings government witnesses indicated there would be a considerable saving in combining these agencies. Rather than two separate boards of directors of 21 each there would be one board of directors, reducing the total number of combined counsel from 43 to 21. That is an enormous saving.

Currently there are two administrative and support structures with personnel, financial information and the rest. The member was advised of all this in the committee hearing. All can examine the committee report. That has now been quantified at $5 million in years four and five of this program.

I do not understand the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle raising this as a question of privilege. It may be a matter of debate, whether he listened to the debate or not. It certainly is not a question of privilege and I think that the claim ought to be dismissed out of hand.

Mr. de Jong: Madam Speaker, I think an examination of the record of the committee hearings will show that documents obtained under freedom of information from Treasury Board showed zero savings. I assume that conceivably by bringing various boards together there are savings on one hand but there are also costs associated on the other. That is why I assumed Treasury Board came to the conclusion there would be zero savings in years one, two, three, four and five.

The savings figure of $5 million a year was never once mentioned in committee. The government now claims at this very late stage of the progress of the bill through various stages that there is going to be this type of saving. I suggest if that is the case, this bill go back to committee for further discussion.

As it stands now I feel my rights as a member of Parliament have been infringed on and I do have a question of privilege.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think we have a prima facie case of privilege. In fact, we were moving, it seems quite rapidly—and I think the hon. member will agree—towards the debate that is about to start.

I did not have time, from the moment we received the notice that the hon. member would raise this question of privilege and the opening of the sitting, to go back to reading what had happened in committee.

• (1015)

On the other hand, I do believe that we will have time at this point to debate all these different points as we proceed with third reading. However, I must tell the hon. member that although he may have a grievance that is real, I do not think at this point that it is a prima facie case of privilege.

Nonetheless, I will ask the clerk and his officers to look into the matter and, if required, we will get back to the House with another ruling. For the time being, I do not think that this is an appropriate question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, on this point. Am I to understand from the comments you have just made that during the course of third reading debate you will interrupt if you determine after consultation that a different decision is appropriate and at that point in time we will deal with the matter? In any case, am I to understand that you will report back to the House prior to the completion of third reading of this particular bill?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As I have just said, I do not think at this time that there is a prima facie case of privilege.

Should our clerk through a study of whatever happened in committee advise me otherwise then of course we would come back to the House.

I must tell the hon. member at this time we do not see a question of prima facie privilege.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I understand and accept that. It becomes a moot point if this House has already triggered a vote on third reading of this particular bill and then a decision is made after that. Therefore my question is: Will you indicate before that point in time if as a result of your review there is any change in your decision?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If there should be a change in my decision I would definitely come back to the House before 2.45 p.m. when we have to vote. Otherwise there would be no reason for it, would there?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to begin the debate at third reading of Bill C-93.

We on this side of the House have worked relentlessly to reduce the size and cost of the federal government. We have restrained federal spending, including public sector wages. We have implemented the Spending Control Act and the debt servicing and reduction account to ensure that fiscal responsibility is a matter of law. By privatizing over 20 Crown corporations we have reduced the public payroll by 50,000 employees. Nevertheless, we realize, as do Canadians, that the task of streamlining the federal government and making it more efficient is not yet complete. Bill C–93 is a further step in that direction.

Bill C–93, the budget implementation bill, is the second of a series of omnibus bills designed to give effect to the government streamlining measures announced in the 1992 budget. The first one, Bill C–76, received royal assent on April 2, 1993 and a third one, Bill C–92, dealing with the Income Tax Act and other technical measures is proceeding to second reading in the other place.

• (1020)

The purpose of the Bill C–93 is to reduce government overhead and to provide services to Canadians more efficiently. The Bill includes the necessary amendments required to give full effect to the budget decisions affecting 14 organizations.

Contrary to the campaign which my friends opposite have waged with their filibuster of this bill in the House and with their allies through the media, this bill is not simply a "cuts" exercise, and its success will not be measured only in the calculation of dollars and cents over the short term.

As we are bound to repeat once again for the benefit of the opposition, there will be savings over the longer term as the size of government is reduced and overhead costs are diminished, and this is precisely what Canadian taxpayers wish to see.

More to the point, these changes are part of our broader commitment to smaller, simpler, more cost-effective government, able to provide Canadians with the programs and services they need in the challenging circumstances of the 1990s and at an acceptable cost of delivering them.

I want now to review some of the more contentious issues raised in earlier debate with respect to specific organizations addressed in Bill C–93.

The positive features of Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation or ECBC will be retained after the Corporation is merged with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, commonly called ACOA. In particular, financial assistance will continue to be available for new and existing businesses that are likely to make a substantial contribution to industrial development and employment opportunities in Cape Breton Island outside of the coal producing and steel industries. ACOS's new statutory powers will be restricted to Cape Breton Island and a portion of mainland Nova Scotia around the town of Mulgrave.

Dissolving the ECBC and carrying over its specific statutory powers to ACOA will eliminate a duplication in program delivery and the administrative overlap which that duplication entails. ACOA clients in Cape Breton will be the beneficiaries of increased efficiency in promotion, financial assistance and development of industry on the island.

During debate on this part of the bill on Tuesday, April 20, 1993, the member for Regina–Qu'Appelle made reference to estimates of the costs and savings to government from the merger of ECBC with ACOA. I refer to page 18151 of Hansard. Specifically he stated that the merger would cost the government $1 million over five years.

The $1 million cost figure referred to by the member for Regina–Qu'Appelle was an early estimate of costs which was made prior to the February 1992 Budget and prior to any specific knowledge of the parameters of the integration of ECBC into ACOA. That estimate assumed far greater job losses and severance costs than will actually be the case, since most of ECBC's employees will be transferred to ACOA.

It is now estimated that there will be no additional costs to government as a result of the merger. The corporation, like any responsible corporation, has set aside annual contributions for employee termination benefits. There are sufficient resources in this fund to pay all anticipated severance costs associated with the merger.

With respect to savings it is estimated that the annual savings to government from merging ECBC with ACOA will be at a minimum $250,000. Saving could reach up to $1 million annually on the successful divestiture of ECBC'S industrial park and farm operations.

[English]

Mr. de Jong: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker.

I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary but again he is quoting figures that were not available in committee. I wonder if the hon. member would be willing to table those figures in the House so we can all see the source of his figures from which he claims to have these savings.

• (1025)

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I was simply saying that the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation had set aside some funds for severance pay. The costs associated with the merger or integration of the corporation and ACOA will be paid but out of the funds set aside for that particular purpose.

I take note of my hon. colleague's question and will see when I am through with my speech if I can provide these documents and confirmations to the House.

Questions were also raised in debate at report stage with respect to the future of ECBC's industrial park and farm operations. The member from Cape Breton—The Sydneys stated at page 18150 of Hansard that at present, ACOA has no provision to own land but ECBC does. He is correct. However, he neglected to inform the House that ECBC's power to acquire or hold land will be transfered to ACOA as part of the provisions of Part II of Bill C-93.

With respect to the future of the two properties identified by the member, the industrial park and demonstration farm, it is the government's objective to assist private-sector operators to take over these operations.

I trust these clarifications put to rest once and for all any residual anxiety about the nature of the programs for ECBC Cape Breton.

This is strictly a legislative initiative to streamline the administrative component of program delivery, simplify the access to information for the business community on the island and improve the quality of service to all Cape Bretoners.

Next I want to deal with what appears to be the most difficult aspect of the bill for my friends opposite to get their minds around, Part III—the integration of the Canada Council with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the international relations programs.

In spite of efforts by members on this side of the House to set the record straight, the opposition speakers continue to characterize this section of the bill as an empty exercise motivated by fears of the government having to cave into right wing political pressure.

They are, of course, entitled to their opinions, but I am here again today to tell the House that this government will not be put off from finding reasonable and prudent ways to relieve the burden on the Canadian taxpayer whether the pressure is coming from the so-called right or from any other self-serving lobby.

This merger, once the transition has been completed, will result in increased efficiency in the delivery of programs and services. I am talking about grants to artists, promotion of the arts and the provision of scholarships in the social sciences and humanities and enhancing our capacity to project our national personality and the expression of our culture abroad.

The opposition continues to demand of us why are we proceeding with this merger. The answer remains straightforward and has not changed since they first posed the question at second reading: to improve program delivery and reduce overhead. Let me say one last word about the operation of the councils. It is important to recall, as my colleague from Winnipeg South told the House on Wednesday, the Canada Council worked well as one council for over 20 years.

Over time, the council developed a structure adapted to the two clienteles with the creation of an Academic Advisory Panel as a parallel to the Advisory Arts Panel, and the establishment of a separate administrative staff to deal with the academic community.

The differentiation of roles between the two was fully understood and accepted by the two bodies and their relationship was characterized by mutual respect.

• (1030)

It is also significant to note that in its appointments to the new council, the government of the day took the Canada Council as its model and gave the new body, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, a predominantly lay composition and similar budgetary and expenditure practices.

The merger of the two councils in no way represents a lesser commitment to the academic community. The government is on record as saying that the interests of all its clients will be protected. Social research will in no way be compromised, as opposition members tried to say.

Both the Canada Council and SSHRC are granting councils, both have well-established peer review structures. The distinct peer-review structures will remain in place after integration. However, as my friends opposite conceded on several occasions in this debate—and again as late as Wednesday afternoon at continuation of report stage—there is a need to streamline government to deal with the growing fiscal pressures on the public purse.

Simply put, one more time, we no longer need and can no longer afford a separate council for each sector. This has no relationship to the level of appropriation for the grants and contributions which the three sectors receive or to the level of funding for the respective programs which they deliver. For more than 20 years, the Canada Council included both councils and operated very well. We know that this can be done again while protecting the interests of all three client groups—the arts, the social sciences and humanities and the international academic and cultural relations programs. Despite the protestations to the contrary of my friends opposite, the structure of Bill C-93 is clearly designed to reflect this intent.

Furthermore, the government never said that the Council would have only one vote for appropriation purposes. While the ministers of the Treasury Board will decide how many votes there will be, I can once again assure the House, and especially the opposition, that they have taken into account the wishes of the granting councils management and the views of the client organizations and will continue to do so.

I have been truly astonished at the tenacity of members opposite on the question of savings associated with the merger. They managed to get their hands on an outdated, pre-budget estimates draft and totally distorted its meaning. That may be understandable for people who are not familiar with the bureaucratic processes involved in our parliamentary routines for voting appropriations. I can even appreciate the political expediency involved in their behaviour which implies, "Look, don't bother me with the details. The answer you are going to give me is not one I want to hear, because it does not suit my line of argument."

What totally floors me is when the members opposite continue to cling to their story line in the face of clear statements telling them that there will be significant ongoing savings resulting from the integration of the Councils and the international programs. One more time, once the transition is complete, ongoing savings of approximately $5 million annually are expected from this measure, in all probability starting three years after the integration, that is, in the fourth and fifth years. Hopefully, this is the end of the phoney "no savings" line, as painful as it may be for the opposition to abandon it.

I would like to come back to that amount of $5 million which my colleague from Winnipeg South and I put forward here in the House. We clearly said, and I clearly said in my speech at report stage, that it would be inadvisable for the government to try to detail the savings and how they would be made, since the new Council, like any Crown corporation, must operate at arm's length from the government.

• (1035)

I was listening a few moments ago to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member and I would like to remind the Speaker that the Canada Council is an independent Crown corporation and that, on the issue of savings, it is up to the Council itself to determine how these savings will be realized. Therefore, we are not in a position to give further details at this moment, nor are we required to do so.

I would like to refer to a letter from Mrs. Paule Leduc, director and president of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, to my hon. colleague from Regina—Qu'Appelle, of which I received a copy. With unanimous consent, I am prepared to table this letter, which I will read to you.

[English]

Dear Mr. de Jong:

Following our telephone conversation this morning concerning future savings resulting from the merger of the SSHRC and the Canada Council, I think we can reasonably expect that ongoing savings in the order of $5 million annually could be achieved after four to five years of the existence of the new combined agency.

I also expect that savings will occur earlier in the process, probably as soon as year three, but at this stage I cannot give a definite amount.

It is premature for me now to identify in detail how those savings will be achieved, but we can already identify that integration of corporate and administrative services, the sharing of a single location, as well as some program rationalization will combine to reach a target of that magnitude.

[Translation]

That letter is signed "Mrs. Paule Leduc, director and president, Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council". I could table the document with unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to table that letter?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I hope this confirmation by Mrs. Paule Leduc will dispel the doubts that the opposition is trying to cast on the savings this merger will bring.

As we said on Wednesday, it is normal that in the first few years of operation there are costs associated with the merger. Nevertheless, we expect, based on the preliminary judgement which the management of both councils has given us, that reduction in overhead will result from a streamlined program structure with three-year funding instead of annual grants, simpler and more flexible financial management, co-location under one roof, rationalized common services—by that I mean personnel, financial and information—and the return to one governing body, one council, instead of two.

I congratulate my friends opposite for the entertainment they have provided the House and the public with their misleading attacks on this merger. We have been patient and have tried to correct the record a number of times. Now—enough is enough. There are significant ongoing annual savings asssociated with the merger in part III of Bill C-93 over the long term.

We have told the members opposite the magnitude of those savings and when we expect to begin to realize them. That should be sufficient. I know it is more than sufficient for the taxpayers of Canada.

I have one final point on the specifics of the recent debate on this bill. I am referring to the point raised by the honourable member for Regina-Qu'Appelle on part VIII of the bill and the debate on Motion No. 67 on Wednesday.

Although, this is a highly technical area of intellectual property litigation, I think that in his remarks on cost recovery, the member has confused user fees, pass-through costs and awarding of costs for frivolous proceedings. That would appear to be the case with his statements in Hansard on pages 18260 and 18261.

He argued that SOCAN will have to absorb the cost of frivolous proceedings brought against them. This is not the case. I refer the honourable member to page 80 of the Bill. Section 12 of the new Intellectual Property Tribunal Act clearly provides the Tribunal with the discretionary power to award costs against nuisance proceedings of this sort.

• (1040)

Therefore, I believe that SOCAN's fears in this regard are unfounded.

Moreover, Madam Speaker, you will allow me to point something out with reference to a remark the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle made about me as recorded in Hansard of April 21, 1993, page 18260 and I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, I really tried to follow what the parliamentary secretary was saying but I am afraid I am going to have to wait until I read Hansard tomorrow. I think what the parliamentary secretary was doing was just reading out what bureaucrats had told him to read out.
> It is a technical amendment. There are technicalities in it.

The hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle went to say:

> I am not quite certain the parliamentary secretary totally understood what he was saying but I suspect what was happening is that he was given something to read by some bureaucrats. It sure sounded bureaucratic to me.

I regret the hon. member had difficulty understanding properly what I was saying. He said that I was referring to notes prepared by bureaucrats and he is right because I was indeed referring to notes prepared by public servants and by my staff; these notes are only aimed at giving good, detailed explanations to the hon. member because of our concern, as a government, to explain properly the positions and decisions we take, and I regret the hon. member had difficulty understanding. Hopefully he would have read Hansard, but I must assure him I never read here a text or refer to notes without fully understanding their meaning.

I will come back with some explanations in a language which, hopefully, will be better understood by the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

The thing is very simple. The government has a user pay policy. Take passports, for example. There was a time when even passports were subsidized, that is to say that the fees charged to the user were less than the production costs. Then the government came up with a policy to apply the user fee principle. The same principle applies to the Intellectual Property Tribunal.

And in that instance, we are only saying that SOCAN and other users will have to bear the operating costs of the Intellectual Property Tribunal.

Second, this particular amendment which would have added the word "user" or "consumer" could have been interpreted in such a way as to impose a tremendous administrative burden on the Intellectual Property Tribunal which, by law, would have had to take upon itself the tremendous burden of billing for its services.

I believe that SOCAN, which represents around 35,000 members, should bear the costs connected with using the Intellectual Property Tribunal and then charge its members. That way, the Intellectual Property Tribunal does not have to be laden with such a burden.

I believe I have now dealt with the main concerns which the opposition has raised with respect to Bill C-93. I also think it is important to remember that there are seven other parts to this bill and that they have drawn very little attention during our proceedings. In fact, there are sections of the bill with which the opposition have expressed their support, like the winding up of the Veterans land administration and its integration into the Department of Veterans Affairs.

As I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, Bill C-93 is in line with the government policy, with the economic statement and with the 1992 budget aimed at providing Canadians with better services for less, at streamlining administrative costs and in the end at alleviating the tax burden of the people.

• (1045)

Ever since 1984, every bill presented with that intent, namely to slash government spending, to reduce the machinery of government and therefore administrative costs, everyone of those bills was systematically opposed by the Liberals and the New Democrats and now by the Bloc Quebecois.

We introduced bills on privatization. The Liberals voted against the privatization of Nordion and Tethratonics, Bill C-13, second session. On third reading, they opposed the sale of government shares in Telesat Canada proposed in Bill C-38. They did not support the privatization of Petro Canada, Bill C-84, second session. The Liberals voted against the act respecting the control of government expenditures which was meant to cap government spending, Bill C-56, third session. They opposed Bill C-26, third session, a legislation to improve the efficiency and accountability of the public service. That bill also includes other measures that would create better employment opportunities for women, natives, handicapped persons and visible minorities. They voted against.

The Liberals did not endorse the amendments to the Patent Act which will promote pharmaceutical research and development, Bill C-91, third session. They voted against some substantial amendments to the Bankruptcy Act, Bill C-22, third session. Finally, if we look at the legislative package put forward by this government to streamline expenditures, which is the wish of the Canadian people, I think it is clear they systematically voted against it each and every time.

This is not surprising. When a party like the Liberal Party is in power for so many years and when we see that over a period of 12 years the deficit grew from $1.8 billion in 1969-1970 to $38.5 billion in 1984-1985, with an accumulated debt of $200 billion, it is not surprising.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier rises on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I have been listening very carefully to the hon. member's speech on Bill C-93 at third reading and I have to ask myself the following question: does the rule of relevancy require that we pay special attention to the bill not under consideration?

Until the hon. member launched an attack against the Liberal Party, I thought he was only being a bit partisan. However I would like the member to concentrate on the subject matter of Bill C-93 and explain to us how the government will sell that bill, which is bad for Canada, to the people it will affect.

Mr. Robitaille: Madam Speaker, I think the House has always had some leeway with regard to arguments behind our government policies in every debate which takes place in the House. I have been here since the beginning of the week to debate this bill and I have listened to speeches from my colleague's friends as well as from other hon. members which were far from relevant to this debate. As far as I am concerned I think I have kept my remarks well within the scope of the debate on Bill C–93.

What I am trying to explain is the filibustering the liberal opposition has been doing on Bill C–93. What I am trying to show here is that every bill like Bill C–93 has systematically been opposed to by the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party.

What I was trying to say before I was interrupted by my colleague was that it was not surprising to see constant opposition against bills which are aimed at reducing spending while, in 12 years, the Liberal government kept increasing expenditures at the rate of 14 per cent. I was referring to an example which is really rather interesting. In 1974–75, Mr. Jean Chrétien stated on page 7138 of Hansard of July 2, 1975 the following: "We have decided that restraint is necessary. In order to exercise restraint we had to cut back on planned expenditures". That year, expenditures went up by 28 per cent.

Systematic opposition by the Liberals to Bill C–93 is part of a tradition that has lasted for more than 25 years, and I can understand that.

In conclusion, I want to state once more the importance, for the Canadian people, that governments do everything that is needed and take fair measures to reduce government spending, streamline administrative costs and increase the efficiency of services for the Canadian people.

As I said, a recent survey in Terrebonne clearly indicated that this is the way we should go. Throughout this country, Canadians who work 40 hours a week or more and strive to make ends meet tell us that the tax burden is unbearable. They are fed up with taxes and they are sick and tired because we do not make appropriate decisions to streamline our costs and expenses and save money whenever it is possible.

We should never forget that public funds do not come from another planet, or from the opposition members' pockets but from all Canadian taxpayers. I think there is a constant lack of good faith on the part of the opposition. If only the opposition had supported the government in its spending cuts, even once, if the Liberal and NDP opposition had only once made suggestions about spending cuts. Instead, for nine years now—you have been here all that time, Madam Speaker, you know what has been going on—all we have seen in this place is filibustering without any consideration for the Canadian taxpayers' ability to pay.

Bill C–93 is in keeping with the approach set out in the 1992 budget where we announced that 40 organizations would be eliminated as the services delivered by these organizations are already provided by the private sector and that others would be consolidated. This Bill C–93 responds to the 1992 budget. It will rationalize the delivery of several services to Canadians, contribute to more efficient government and reduce the burden of government on Canadians. That is something that we all want in this House and that all Canadians want as well.

Therefore, I urge all members of this House, on either side, to pass this bill so that it can be sent quickly to the other place and that we can finally achieve these savings.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: There will not be any questions or comments during third reading. Before we continue I would like to direct this comment to the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle.

Our Clerk has looked at Hansard from the committees. We have come to the conclusion that there might be divergences of opinion and there might be points for debate, but on the point brought to my attention this morning by the hon. member there is no question of privilege.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Saint–Boniface): Madam Speaker, like my colleagues, I recognize that you are a very fair person. You will no doubt note that our friend opposite has delivered a political speech which was not bad but he failed to provide rational arguments in support of the bill before us today.

For one thing, he mentioned that the Liberals opposed the bills his government introduced in this House. Liberals always oppose bills that do not take the people into consideration.

• (1055)

This is the kind of bill that the Tories have introduced. They talk about cutting expenses. They are very concerned and talk about it often. It is very easy to cut expenses on the backs of others. That is what this government has done. The hon. member referred to misleading attacks. It is the government which is being misleading and I can prove it. He quoted a letter from Paule Leduc, a very honest letter where she says it might be possible to save a few dollars in the not too distant future.

[English]

He did not admit that particular saving could have been achieved if the government had simply asked these organizations to reach a particular precise budgetary target. It is not as a result of what the government is doing. It is because these organizations will be forced to reach targets, and my hon. colleagues know that full well.

They know full well that this will go down in the annals of history and the annals of government as the silliest, the flimsiest, the most superficial bill that has probably ever come forward. It has been a botched job right from the very beginning. The government is trying to put some glitz to it, a bit of shine. There is no glitz; there is no shine. It is a deceptive and destructive bill. It is one that will haunt this government.

Let me make one point very clear. No one in government is opposed to streamlining if it is going to save money, if it is going to bring about increased efficiency and effectiveness. However there are no savings here. There is no increased effectiveness or efficiency. There are no studies to show it. When we questioned the witnesses from Treasury Board and the Privy Council, and I shall share the quotes shortly, they had nothing, no studies. They admitted they had nothing. They were honest men and women, and I appreciate their honesty. They might have chosen to do something else but they chose to tell the truth and by telling the truth they have exposed this government's project.

Just so that people are very aware of what is happening here, let us look at what is going on. The government has decided to streamline, initially it said to save money. Then when it was found out that was not true in reality, what did it do? It started to go for increased effectiveness and efficiency. When that did not come forth then it tried to pretend that we in the opposition were being unfair.

Let us remember that what the government is doing is in fact trying to kill organizations that in some cases were already dead. It is removing organizations that have been dormant for years. Worst of all, dynamic and vibrant organizations were taken out completely because the Economic Council of Canada could not stand the heat. The government could not take that kind of criticism. One of the worst decisions it made was the merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada with the Canada Council.

Let us remember this bill is wide ranging. It talks about the Agricultural Products Board. It talks about the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. It talks about the Canada Council for the arts and for research, the social sciences and humanities. It talks about the independent review commission for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Intellectual Property Tribunal. It also addresses the Canadian Commercial Corporation and Emergency Preparedness Canada. It talks about the International Trade and Procurement Tribunal, the Petroleum Monitoring Agency and the Veterans' Land Administration Act. It is a wide-ranging bill. The government has failed, absolutely and totally failed to make its case.

Because of its vastness and because it is complex the government has tried to suggest to Canadians that there were savings, that this was a good move and that this would be more effective. We know it is not true. We know what this bill is all about. It is about killing those agencies that are dead, removing and killing those that are dormant, and sapping the strength out of those that are vital and dynamic because they were a threat to government.

This bill is about trying to reach the Reform Party agenda. They are kissing cousins and I shall have more to say about that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will be able to pursue his remarks after Question Period and Routine Proceedings.

The House will now proceed to members' statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THOROLD, ONTARIO

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Madam Speaker, I rise to outline again the difficult economic circumstances in my riding due to the adverse effects of the free trade agreement, cross-border shopping and, most significant, the huge lay-offs in major industries such as GM.

My constituents are very disillusioned with the empty promises of this government and are looking for help at this time in connection with a local project known as the Peter Street bridge in Thorold. The Peter Street bridge is a vital link in Thorold and is now under threat of closing due to extensive repairs which are required to ensure its safe use by not only my constituents but the thousands of tourists who use it every year.

I urge the government, mainly the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority which has jurisdiction over the bridge, to extend its financial assistance to my riding and fully support the initiatives of the mayor and members of the city council of Thorold in their attempt to provide their city not only with a viable link but especially—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

Mr. Barry Moore (Pontiac—Gatineau—Labelle): Madam Speaker, National Volunteer Week, this year from April 18 to April 23, is a special opportunity for us to pay tribute and give recognition to all those individuals who volunteer their services in their local community.

Today I would like to join these communities in paying a special tribute to the contribution made by volunteers to community life.

To our volunteers I want to say thank you for your dedication and commitment. What you have accomplished deserves the respect and admiration of us all.

I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate a young lady from my riding, Annie Galipeau, a resident of Messines, who won an award in the Dramatic Arts category at the YTV Gala held last night at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa.

Congratulations, Annie, and good luck.

CLAM FISHERY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, clam fishermen on the Bay of Fundy shore near Five Islands are very concerned about the clam resources and want the establishment of a season to ensure a sustainable and viable fishery. The fisheries committee of the West Colchester Development Association has recommended that a season from approximately May 15 to October 31 be established in order to prevent overdigging and allow for the replenishment of clam stocks.

This committee is made up of residents in the area who are involved in the clam fishery and are very knowledgeable about the resource and the conditions. I support this committee in its efforts to protect the resource and will be urging the minister and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to accept this sensible recommendation at a meeting in the area to be arranged in the very near future.

YTV AWARDS

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Madam Speaker, yesterday evening hundreds of thousands of Canadians were impressed and entertained as they watched the live broadcast on the YTV network of the fourth annual YTV achievement awards. These awards to young people 19 years of age and under demonstrate the talent, creativity, innovation, community service and courage of young Canadians. The winners exemplify the best of our country and convey a much needed message of optimism and hope for the future.

I would like to congratulate all the winners, but in particular I want to congratulate Tamia Washington of Windsor, Ontario who received the national vocal award. To Tamia and all the winners I say on behalf of all Canadians and myself: Congratulations, we are very proud of you. Félicitations et bonne chance à tous.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, any time that I have risen in this House the words I have spoken have been my own. However, pursuant to an agreement that some of us entered into yesterday the following words were suggested to me by an outstanding group of young people who are employed by this House.

Last night in the spirit of friendliness and healthy competition members from both sides of the House joined together to face the pages in an invigorating game of the great Canadian sport of hockey. While it was a delightful experience for everyone, the pages once again proved their worth by tearing apart the MP squad as though we were a group of amateur bowlers. Their complete domination of the game left us cold and left the ice melting. These fine young people should be thanked, not only for the enjoyable evening but also for not rubbing it in our faces.

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, Winnipeg residents are anxious to hear confirmation of the federal government's support of a third core area initiative. Both the provincial and city governments have already indicated their desire to participate in the third phase of this very successful program.

The two preceding core area initiatives have greatly benefited the larger community of Winnipeg by enhancing social and community services downtown and by encouraging job creation, work experience and training as well as the growth of small business. However there remains the need for new programs and development in the city.

Government cutbacks, high unemployment and the recession have had a devastating effect on the economy of Winnipeg. The demands on service organizations have increased dramatically while funding continues to shrink.

The people of Winnipeg are eager to haul themselves out of this recession but they need a commitment and some encouragement from the Conservative government, and they need it immediately.

Repeated efforts to get an answer from the minister responsible have so far proved unsuccessful. I call on that minister to answer and answer positively, and to invest in the future of Winnipeg and not allow it to continue to deteriorate safe in the knowledge that the Conservatives will not be around after the next election.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, when 976 service was first proposed the Bell Telephone Company opposed its introduction but the CRTC forced it to carry 976 service and at the same time created a situation in which anyone who objected to 976 service would have to pay a $4 a month service charge to have the service blocked.

Now postcards with gorgeous pictures of escorts encourage people to phone a 976 number. All sorts of people are facing a big surprise when their telephone bill carries a $10 or $15 charge for a sex service call.

It is clearly time for the CRTC to eliminate 976 service from the services offered. This service is not needed and it is clearly being abused.

WHARFS

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, the fishing season is almost upon us and most of the wharfs in my riding of Egmont, P.E.I., are still in such a state of disrepair that the safety of the fishermen using them is in jeopardy.

I and fishermen's associations have brought this situation to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans on many occasions. The only responses so far have been a few band-aids supplied here and there, leaving us now with wharfs that have deteriorated to the point where it will cost millions to restore them to safe operational conditions.

I ask the minister to get personally involved. We now have a situation in which defeated provincial candidates, a Public Works employee and an unelected member from the other place are making announcements to the media on the minister's behalf, and we do not know if those announcements are true or not.

Fishermen need to know who is in charge and what is going on. They want to know what is going on in other Egmont harbours that need repairs.

While spending large amounts of money after eight years of neglect may seem like a cynical vote buying gesture, I would advise the minister to set that concern aside and do the repair work so that the fishermen in P.E.I. can work from harbours that are functional and safe.

FUR TRADE

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River): Madam Speaker, today the federal government has announced its renewed investment in one of our country's most significant industries, the fur trade.

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Department of the Environment have committed $12 million over the next five fiscal years to assist the Canadian fur trade to adjust to changing market realities and respond to the advancement of the management and humane trapping of fur.

Thanks must go out to individual trappers across the land, the trappers' organizations and the Fur Institute of Canada for their representations to the government. Thanks must also go out to the ministers of environment, international trade and DIAND who ensured that the support was secured for another five years.

Our Canadian government is proud of the fur industry. We are proud that Canada will continue to be leaders in the development of humane trapping and ranching methods and will continue to be leaders in the exporting of a beautiful quality fur product.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Madam Speaker, this morning the media reported that three members of the Armed Forces under investigation for the March 16 beating death of a Somali man have been released from all forms of custody but the release is not an indication of whether or not charges will be laid.

A fourth soldier continues to lie in hospital in critical condition as a result of circumstances that may be connected to the March 16 incident.

I and members of that young soldier's family join with other concerned Canadians in wanting to know the truth about what is happening in Somalia.

I therefore repeat the call to the Minister of National Defence made by my colleague from Victoria for an independent public inquiry into this and earlier incidents which are now coming to light. My constituents and I want to know what is happening within the military command in Somalia and why information which the minister admitted to having about these incidents has been deliberately suppressed.

• (1110)

I would ask the Minister of National Defence to respect the wishes of the family involved and immediately establish the public inquiry.

ROSSER, MANITOBA

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Madam Speaker, Rosser is a municipality and town west of Winnipeg which I represent and live in. It is celebrating its 100th anniversary this year.

This area of Manitoba with its rich farm land has become home to many pioneer families and immigrants, such as my parents and many others.

The historic development of Rosser is fascinating as well as intriguing. General Thomas Lafayette Rosser was a classmate at West Point with the famous General Armstrong Custer. They fought opposite one another in the U.S. civil war, yet later renewed their friendship. About seven years before General Rosser surveyed the CPR line from Winnipeg to Saskatchewan as chief engineer he was preparing to lead a volunteer force to rescue General Custer at the Little Big Horn, but he was too late.

I am sure all Canadians are grateful to this great, colourful American general for his contribution to the early development of Manitoba.

I also would like to congratulate Reeve Allan Beachell, his council, and many volunteers for making the 100th anniversary of Rosser a lasting and memorable success.

OTTAWA LYNX

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, April 17 was an important day for Ottawa.

Last Saturday marked the return to Ottawa of professional baseball as the Ottawa Lynx took the field in the International Baseball League. The first pitch was the culmination of years of effort by Howard Darwin, a dedicated entrepreneur and sportsman whose leadership and commitment to his community have benefited the people of Ottawa for many years and in many ways.

My 10-year old son and I were in the stands for that first pitch, a strike by the way. While the weather was cold and wet and the Lynx came up one run short we had a great evening, and without a doubt the fans loved every moment.

With inexpensive ticket prices Howard Darwin has brought families of this region a great activity to share. It is an opportunity to eat popcorn, hope for a foul ball and, most of all, build memories together.

Ottawa city council deserves credit for undertaking the building of a wonderful facility for our new team. The stadium does not yet have a name but surely nothing could be more appropriate than Howard Darwin Stadium in recognition of an individual who successfully pursued his dream for his community.

FRENCH-LANGUAGE NEWS

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Madam Speaker, the campaign for the leadership of the Conservative Party has given us another prime example of what is lacking in the media sector. Large sections of the French-speaking population in Quebec and Canada were unable to watch the broadcast of this event in French. For instance, Wednesday's debate was not carried in the Saguenay—Lac-Saint-Jean area.

What amazes me is when I hear some people say we do not need this kind of service and that we would be better off improving CBC programming.

Do they not realize we will soon be invaded by 300 American channels? Are they aware of a plan now on the drawing board to set up a second English language news network in Canada, while nothing is being done for French-speaking viewers?

It is time to correct this imbalance. The CRTC should intervene to promote and facilitate the establishment of a French 24-hour news network.

CANADA POST

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, Canada Post, well known for closing rural post offices, has now decided to close outlets in urban centres.

The corporation is currently planning to set up a franchise network in Prince George, B.C. which will mean the closure of post offices on 5th and 15th Avenues. At best the corporation says it might keep mailboxes open at these locations and that it will set up a business service centre.

Surveys I have conducted in the business community show that it wants to keep the service. Downtown Prince George needs the traffic generated by people going to the post office. It would be regrettable if Canada Post is not a partner in the renewal of downtown Prince George.

I call upon the minister responsible for Canada Post to use the powers given him in the Canada Post Corporation Act to tell the corporation to stop the closures and listen to the public and business community about the need to keep our post offices open.

Oral Questions

GOVERNMENT OF ONTARIO

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, we have just heard that the New Democratic Government of Ontario has finally made an announcement. It will be cutting 11,000 government jobs in the public service. It will close down the Oxford Regional Centre for the developmentally disabled in Woodstock. All 18 of Ontario's international trade offices will be eliminated. Colleges of agricultural technology at Centralia and New Liskeard in northern Ontario will be closed. Twenty-five offices of the Ministry of Natural Resources will be shut down. Grants to municipalities will be cut.

• (1115)

To show how incompetent it can get, the NDP government is closing down a centre for the disabled and is destroying the careers of 11,000 public servants in Ontario to pay for its own stupid mismanagement.

DUTY-FREE GASOLINE STATIONS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, last August I was approached by one of my constituents, Mr. Rob Montanino, with a proposal to establish duty-free gasoline stations in communities along the Canada-U.S. border.

His proposal was well developed. In principle it would afford both departing Canadians and our American visitors the opportunity to purchase their gasoline on this side of the border. There is the potential for a net benefit of course to our economy and to our border communities.

On his behalf, I submitted Mr. Montanino's proposal to the Minister of Finance and his officials for their consideration last October. Although the minister expressed some reservations and some operational hurdles in his response of January 28, 1993, Mr. Montanino's proposal in my mind is worthy of further examination.

I hope that the minister will continue to look at well-developed proposals like Mr. Montanino's which seek to improve the economic situation of our communities on the competitive cross-border front line.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

I would like to begin by quoting from the statutes of the defence department. At the very beginning it says that the minister is responsible for the management and direction of the Canadian Armed Forces and the development of policy on national defence.

Yet we have a minister who has known of four serious incidents and has never reported them, has taken no action whatsoever to clear up what her own chief of defence staff has said is a breakdown of loyalty and discipline, and has rejected all calls for better preparation, training or equipment for troops. She now states as part of the new politics of exclusion that it is better if she does not come to Parliament to answer questions.

I ask the Acting Prime Minister, how can Canadians have any confidence with the serious problems affecting our peacekeeping troops in Somalia that the conduct of the defence department will be dealt with when the minister believes she does not have to be accountable to the people of Canada and to Parliament?

Is it not time that this government appointed a new minister who recognizes the need to manage the department and be responsible to the people of Canada?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The hon. member is distorting what the minister of defence said and is misleading the House and the Canadian public about the circumstances.

As the Judge Advocate General stated yesterday, the minister of defence under the National Defence Act has certain duties that are similar to those of a judge. What the minister of defence said in respect of these incidents, two for which the investigations are carrying on, is that they could possibly lead to court martial legal proceedings. In respect to those incidents which have been the subject of many questions in this House, she is very much circumscribed in terms of what she can relate to the House without prejudicing the individuals involved in order to ensure that justice prevails.

It is in that context she said it would be easier not to respond to those questions because of the possibility of causing harm to the judicial process and the questions of fair play, the charter of rights and all of those things which come into play in view of her responsibility. She will be in the House on Monday and Tuesday.

The rest of the department and its operation, the Canadian Armed Forces as has always been the case and particularly under this minister, is running very well.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, when it comes to raising questions in the House, they are not questions about the specifics of a particular investigation. They are about the conduct of the minister, the department, the impact on our peacekeeping troops and whether under these circumstances they are able to do the job for which they are assigned. Surely, a minister who says that it is better not to be in the House is one who is in direct violation of her responsibilities to live up to that mandate.

• (1120)

This is what I want to ask the minister directly. We have another major problem. Our troops in Bosnia have been given a new mandate to protect civilians against potential attacks. Yet by all expert judgments they have neither the equipment nor the numbers to fulfil that mandate. That puts them at serious risk. It is a matter of grave concern to us all. There has been no report, no explanation and no accounting from the minister of defence to this House of Commons or to the Canadian people on that very grave and serious circumstance.

I want to ask the minister, when are we going to find out what new rules of engagement our troops in Bosnia have been given? Will they be given new equipment? Will there be other troops provided to help reinforce the new mission that they are given? Has support from the United Nations been obtained for this mission? Most important, where is the Minister of National Defence to answer these questions?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in the preamble to his first question the hon. member said that the Canadian Armed Forces is not able to do the job assigned to it.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Because of the equipment.

Mr. Andre: No, he was talking about Somalia and in general the Canadian Armed Forces. I would ask him to provide the evidence that the Canadian Armed Forces is not the efficient, capable and the world's best peacekeeper we all believe it to be. He is saying something else. I wish he would provide proof before he makes that accusation.

With regard to Bosnia and Srebrenica, in particular, the Canadian military now in Srebrenica is there to enforce the ceasefire, to disarm the Bosnian Muslims and to provide humanitarian aid to the wounded and weak. It is performing that role admirably. Obviously if there is a full-scale attack by the Serbians or the Bosnians it will not be able to defend Srebrenica. However that is not its mandate from the UN.

In terms of other countries being invited, the objective is very simple. It would like to raise the stakes to put a situation where there is a multinational force there so that any attack on the city by the Serbs or the Muslims would be, in essence, an attack on the entire world. It raises the stakes and the cost of any such attack, therefore increasing the likelihood that it will not occur. If the Canadian forces are attacked, they are the most experienced peacekeepers in the world. They are aware and capable of protecting themselves.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a quick response to the minister when he asks about the concerns we raised. The concern was raised by the chief of defence staff himself. He said there was a breakdown in discipline and leadership of our troops in Somalia. It would seem to me that any government or any minister who had any interest at all in the welfare of those troops would be in a position to respond to that very serious concern raised by the chief of defence staff.

[Translation]

We are faced with a crisis of confidence on the role of Canadians in Somalia, with high risks for troops in Bosnia, and a Minister of National Defence who stays away from Parliament and fails to recognize the seriousness of these events for Canadians.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister to take immediate steps to replace the Minister of Defence with someone who recognizes the responsibilities of her position and will report to the House on the very serious events involving Canadian peacekeepers.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member was engaged in his earlier comments in a practice which does not really help to better understand the situation.

He takes a comment from the CDS on a specific instance in Somalia and generalizes it to the comment he made that the Canadian Armed Forces is not able to perform the task assigned to it. That is absurdity and there is no evidence to substantiate that.

The unfortunate incidents in question are being fully investigated. The hon. member should allow that investigation to proceed without prejudicing it by making these wild accusations and extrapolations.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): It is the government that is incompetent, not the military. It's the minister of defence.

• (1125)

Mr. Andre: The reality is that our troops in Yugoslavia, by all accounts from everything I have heard, are performing admirably. They were asked to go into Srebrenica because of their quality, experience and ability. How the member translates that into some sort of crisis that the military is coming apart, is incompetent and that only by answering the hon. member's questions in this House can these problems in Yugoslavia be cured is absurd.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, my question is for the government House leader.

The Minister of National Defence disagrees with the chief of staff of national defence. That minister should be here either to defend that particular chief of staff or to deny those accusations. Last night the Minister of National Defence said that it was good she is not in the House of Commons to answer questions.

Why does the government think it is good that the Minister of National Defence will not answer questions about the military mandate given to our forces in Bosnia? Why does the government think it is good that the minister does not answer questions about the role of the troops in protecting 30,000 refugees in Bosnia? Why is it that the Government of Canada believes Parliament be denied answers from the Minister of National Defence on these most important matters affecting Canadian troops as well as our international reputation?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, of course the Minister of National Defence never said any such thing.

Mr. Milliken: You better read the quotes, Harvie.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of National Defence said, as I indicated earlier, and I do not know if the hon. member was at the briefing by the Judge Advocate General or not. If he had been he would have heard the Judge Advocate General confirm that the Minister of National Defence has certain judicial responsibilities in respect of military justice and in that respect it is most inappropriate for her to be discussing or answering questions. Indeed, the difficulty is that inadvertently, through the kinds of questions that have been coming in this House, something might be said that would prejudice the case. It was only in that context. To extrapolate from that the suggestion that covers the entire gamut of DND operations is absurd. She said no such thing.

The hon. member also said in his preamble that the Minister of National Defence disagrees with the CDS about the fundamental operations and therefore—

Mr. Dingwall: If she doesn't she should be here. Where is she?

Mr. Andre: The hon. member makes absurd allegations and then demands that the Minister of National Defence come here to answer these absurd allegations. Make reasonable questions and perhaps you will get reasonable answers.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, the minister opposite is trying to build a case and trying to shield the Minister of National Defence in that opposition members somehow are asking specific questions with regard to possible criminal investigations as to who did or did not do what. We are not asking for that kind of information.

Why does the government think it is good that the Minister of National Defence is too busy to answer questions about her own personal role and about ministerial responsibility? Is it not the responsibility of the Minister of National Defence to answer questions when there is a crisis of confidence in the minister's management of the Department of National Defence? Is that not her responsibility?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, there is no crisis of confidence in the Department of National Defence. However there is a crisis of confidence in the Liberal Party because of what the polls are saying. Let us make it abundantly clear what this is all about. This is not some new-found concern about the capabilities of the Canadian Armed Forces on the part of the Liberal Party.

In respect of the particular details of the incidents that have been asked about in this House and so on, I have provided all of the information I possibly can without prejudicing the cases. The Minister of National Defence would provide exactly the same answers to those questions because there is a prescription in terms of what answers can be given to those questions.

I am sure hon. members, deep in their hearts, when they get past worrying about the polls, will recognize that it is most unreasonable to be pursuing these kinds of questions.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the people of Canada are going to judge the government House leader very harshly for turning this into a very partisan issue in the way he just did. There are differences across this House, but to suggest that my friends on the right are raising this matter because of the polls is beyond belief.

• (1130)

When our peacekeepers are on the front lines in Bosnia and Somalia there are legitimate concerns. Let me suggest that with the very serious events taking place now in Bosnia and Somalia, none of which would interfere with the investigation or the legal proceedings and all of which have to do with the duties and the responsibilities of the Minister of National Defence under the Defence Act and, above all, have to do with our peacekeepers in the field, the minister should be here in the House to respond.

Will the government not agree that her primary duty is for the safety and reputation of Canadian peacekeepers and her first responsibility is to the people of Canada, to the House of Commons and to our peacekeepers and their families to answer questions about these matters?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member said there are serious problems in Bosnia in respect of our peacekeepers. There are serious problems in Somalia in terms of their ongoing role.

Other than those incidents which are being investigated and which we talked about earlier, what are these serious problems that are not being addressed? What is the crisis?

He then proves my point. Instead of asking about these particular serious concerns he claims are there, he turns around and asks a question designed to damage the reputation of the Minister of National Defence. I think that proves the allegation I made earlier.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, let me ask some precise questions about the situation in Srebrenica. First let me say that all members of this House fully support our heroic peacekeepers there and fully support the United Nations establishing a protected enclave there.

The questions are these, and I would be very interested if the minister were prepared to give us some specific answers. Have the Canadian forces in fact been ordered to defend Srebrenica as indicated today in the media? If so, who made the order? Is it accepted as a valid order under the security resolution by this government? Can the government assure Canadians that Canadian troops have not been put in a completely indefensible position and that the government has in fact been successful in getting other UN members to have their troops in that enclave to join in the defence of Srebrenica?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the answer to the first question is no, the Canadian forces have not been asked or ordered to defend Srebrenica against a full-fledged attack by either side.

They are there attempting to maintain the cease-fire and providing humanitarian aid. As I indicated earlier, there have been discussions with the British and French officials. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has had discussions with the British and French to see if we could internationalize the forces in Srebrenica, thereby escalating the price that would be paid by any aggressor that attacked the town itself, making it an attack on the entire world.

It is quite clear that the 150 Canadian troops could not defend Srebrenica on their own. If they are attacked, as I indicated earlier, given the long experience of the Canadian Armed Forces they are capable of taking necessary action to protect their own welfare.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the answer seems to be different from that of the Secretary of State for External Affairs who was quoted as saying she was making every effort to try to get other countries there.

I would appreciate it if the minister could clarify that. While he is on this feet, it would be appreciated if he could tell the House that. He asked for some specific questions.

In December, when our forces went to Somalia, it was reported that no rules of engagement covering our forces in Somalia had been adopted by the Government of Canada, by cabinet. I would like to know if rules of engagement have subsequently been adopted by the cabinet and, if so, would the minister explain to the House precisely what they say in respect of dealing with unarmed Somali, three of whom have been reported killed by Canadian forces in Somalia?

• (1135)

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the rules of engagement are rules of engagement that apply to all the forces in Somalia. Indeed to give out the details of the rules of engagement would risk compromising the operations in Somalia. It would be contrary to the agreement we have.

However, a broad outline of the rules of engagement could be provided to the hon. member. I will look into providing him with a briefing if he truly is interested in that.

In terms of the rules of engagement, as I indicated they are international rules of engagement. We have agreed to them along with all the other countries that are participating in this operation.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, there are certain rules and regulations that are secret, but policy and the role of a minister are public policy and for public knowledge.

The Official Opposition has the highest respect for all peacekeepers around the world. We are asking serious questions and we demand serious answers. The minister should not be making light of our questions as he did previously.

A spokesperson for the Department of National Defence stated this morning that the 150 Canadian peacekeepers are too ill equipped and outnumbered to provide any defence of the town of Srebrenica. Two Canadian platoons sent from Tuzla to reinforce the Canadian troops were turned back by Serbian forces. France and Britain have ignored Canada's SOS for more troops.

What plans does the government have to ensure the safety of our peacekeeping troops and prevent a wholesale slaughter of the now defenceless Muslims?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I dispute absolutely the allegation or the accusation by the hon. member that we have treated lightly the serious questions. The serious questions we have treated seriously, but there have been a lot of less than serious questions answered which we have treated with the respect they deserve.

In terms of the 150 peacekeepers in Srebrenica, as I indicated earlier of course that is not a sufficient force to defend Srebrenica against an all-out attack by either side. I indicated that. That is not the intent. That is not the purpose. That is not why the Canadian forces are there. They are there to observe the cease-fire, to implement the cease-fire and to provide humanitarian aid. So far the cease-fire is holding.

I have told the hon. member that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has talked to her French and British counterparts about getting troops from those countries in there to internationalize the force. They have not said no. They have not responded to the request. To translate that into a firm no, as the hon.

member did, is a distortion and not helpful to the understanding of this serious situation.

If in fact the Canadian troops are attacked as a result of a breakdown in the cease-fire and so on, they are the most experienced troops in the world in terms of defending themselves and would take necessary action to defend themselves.

We are not expecting that. We are not hoping for that. The cease-fire is holding. We are endeavouring through diplomatic means and other means to make alterations so that the cease-fire will become permanent and we will be able to make that an internationally protected enclave.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): My supplementary question is for the same minister, Madam Speaker. His answers are just confusing the mandate even more.

Yesterday the Acting Prime Minister rose in the House and declared unequivocally that the mandate of the Canadian UN peacekeeping forces in Srebrenica is simply to disengage both sides. "Our troops will protect themselves only and not the inhabitants of the town", he said.

Today we learned from the media, not from the minister of defence, that the UN has ordered Canadian troops to defend Srebrenica which goes far beyond the original mandate of using force only to defend humanitarian convoys, which he just said earlier in his response.

Will the minister clarify for Canadians what is the main goal of the Canadian troops in Srebrenica? Is it consistent with the original mandate given by the United Nations? Canadians have a right to know.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I guess I will repeat it for a third time.

The troops are there, as I said yesterday, which is entirely consistent with what I said today, to implement the cease-fire which is holding. They are there to help in disarming the Muslim troops who have given up their arms. They are there to help provide humanitarian aid. They were never there and they have not been ordered to be there to protect Srebrenica against an all-out attack from either side.

• (1140)

Mr. Flis: That's not what the UN said today. You have been around long enough to know better.

Mr. Andre: The hon. member will not allow me to give an answer. He takes these little snippets here, exaggerates them to extreme and then lectures me on not treating him seriously.

I recognize that it is a serious situation. I would ask the hon. member to recognize that the role of the Canadian troops there is well understood by anybody who chooses to understand. What we are trying to do through diplomatic means and through co-operation of other countries in the UN is to make the thing stable on a more permanent basis.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

Roughly two months ago it was the removal of the sea cadets school in Lake Winnipeg with the loss of six permanent jobs and 47 seasonal jobs. Just now I have been informed that the government plans to close the instrument check pilot school in Winnipeg and move it to Ottawa.

For the knowledge of hon. members, this school provides advanced pilot training in instruments for night landings to pilots. Dismantling of the sophisticated training infrastructure has already begun. They have started moving it to Ottawa. This move affects seven professionals and several support staff.

Why is this government continuing to remove high quality, highly skilled, value added jobs from Manitoba? Why continue to pick on Manitoba?

An hon. member: Because they don't like you.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member is suggesting. I will have to look into the details of the specific changes.

The Canadian Armed Forces, in view of the fact that we are not able to give them the necessary budgets to carry on in the manner we would all like to see them carry on, ise rationalizing, making its operations more efficient and so on. From time to time operations are moved from one location to another.

Winnipeg remains the headquarters of the air wing of the armed forces and will continue to remain. The presence of the military, the air force in particular, in Winnipeg and Manitoba is assured for as long as anybody can see into the future.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Someone said they don't like Manitoba; I am starting to believe it.

[Translation]

The government is again abandoning Manitoba, and this is not good news. We still remember the aerospace contract we lost a few years ago. I want to ask the minister why the government is penalizing Manitoba, and Winnipeg in particular, by relocating this vital industry, the aerospace industry.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, of course the hon. member who is a representative from Manitoba is very worried and very interested, and quite rightly so, in the defence activities in his province because of the jobs that are created there.

Therefore he surely must be pleased that such a large proportion of the subcontracts on the EH-101 are going to Winnipeg first and will generate so many high-tech, high quality jobs. He must be absolutely delighted with the information put out recently by the Minister of Agriculture pointing out that, I think, Manitoba is only second in the country in terms of the provinces in regard to the amount of federal assistance, federal contributions and federal activities that go to that province.

I think the hon. member in looking at the position of Manitoba vis-à-vis the other provinces in Canada must be very delighted at how generous this government has been to his province.

TRADE

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade or his surrogate.

Currently the United States, Canada and Mexico are engaged in negotiations under an agreement known as the North American free trade agreement. Parallel accords are part of that agreement. The United States has stated clearly that it will not sign an agreement without parallel accords regarding labour, health and safety standards and the environment.

Currently after second reading in this House we have sent the bill to committee where already we have been notified of closure.

How can we deal with the bill in committee with closure when we do not have in front of us or in front of the House the content of even the drafts of the parallel accords? How can we go ahead with it when the parallel accords have not even been presented to the House?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member what my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, has said very often in the House, that NAFTA stands on its own. As for the parallel accord, we were way ahead of the Americans and the Mexicans in wanting to explore these issues.

• (1145)

The hon. member should allow me to remind the House of the very extensive consultation that has taken place. The standing committee had 27 meetings, 203 witnesses appeared and there were 93 submissions.

Mr. Barrett: Where are the parallel accords?

Mr. Loiselle: There was a subcommittee that looked at all these issues. It held 29 meetings, heard 124 witnesses and studied 95 submissions. I could continue with the number of days spent in this House looking at these issues.

NAFTA stands on its own. It has been studied fully and we are prepared to move ahead with it.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, this is a miracle that should go down in world history. The suggestion by the minister is that NAFTA has been considered fully by these committees and these hearings right across Canada. However we have never seen the drafts of the parallel accords. How can we study something we have never seen? That is the miracle that should go down in the records.

The government has stupidly passed the bill at second reading, sent it to committee and abandoned its bargaining position on the parallel accords by notifying Mexico and the United States it is prepared to go ahead with anything.

How does the minister justify putting Canada in jeopardy with this legislation by asking a committee of this House and the Chamber here to deal with a bill of which not all of the details have been presented and on which the negotiations have not been completed?

If he has not abandoned our policy at least he has abandoned our leverage on the parallel accords and that leads to a sellout of Canadian interests.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, of course I disagree with the view of the hon. member.

The parallel accords have not been signed, do not exist and so they cannot be brought in front of this House. The treaty exists, has already been signed by the three countries and should proceed.

Mr. Barrett: That is my point. They do not exist.

Mr. Loiselle: When the parallel accords are developed—they are parallel—we will look at them. We are the country pushing for these kinds of agreements and we will be glad to bring them to the House when the time comes.

AIRLINES

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Barrett: That is sheer stupidity. You have abandoned our position.

Mr. Mazankowski: Get thrown out and you will get a little attention.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

An hon. member: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Thank you. I would very much like to hear the hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. Manley: Madam Speaker, the Competition Tribunal in its decision yesterday warned: "Existing charter carriers, even if they expand upon Canadian's exit, cannot compensate for Canadian's removal. The possibility of new entry is remote and will not provide adequate competitive discipline to Air Canada".

My question for the minister is this. Does he have any plan to deal with the emergence of a domestic airline monopoly which has been predicted by the Competition Tribunal in its decision?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I do not know on what basis the hon. member reaches that conclusion.

The matter is being examined at the present time by the NTA. There was a decision yesterday by the Competition Tribunal which I understand is going to be appealed by Canadian Airlines. We cannot conclude as the member erroneously does at this time that there is imminent danger of a monopoly.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I presume from the minister's answer he rejects the conclusions of the Competition Tribunal which I quoted.

No one is asking him to comment on the substance. What I would like to know is whether he continues to believe, as he claimed in the House a year ago to do: "It is in the best interests of consumers and the travelling public in this country to have two airline companies".

What is this minister's bottom line for the Canadian airline industry?

• (1150)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the bottom line is that we should let the present process proceed through the different tribunal and quasi-judicial agencies. When it is finished we will know exactly what the situation will be at that time.

OZONE LAYER

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Already this year on the few sunny days we have had in Canada we have seen the results of an unusual number of Canadians who have been out in the sun, obviously unaware that the ozone layer over Canada has thinned to such an extent that the risk of sunburn and cancer is at record levels.

The Minister of the Environment has known for some time that we face increased danger this spring and summer. Why has the Minister of the Environment failed to launch a massive and aggressive campaign to warn Canadians of these new dangers and how to protect themselves and their children from the new risks of sunburn and cancer as a result of the thinning ozone layer over Canada?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I would like to bring to my hon. colleague's attention that that in fact is what the minister has done.

We have introduced two programs that deal with providing information to the public about the ozone layer. One is called the Ozone Watch Program where every Friday there is a reporting of just what is the status of the ozone layer. We get that through all the media sources.

The second program is called the UV index and was launched in May of last year. We get that information on a daily basis. Every day we get the information about what is happening and how Canadians can take measures. We encourage Canadians, particularly those who are subject to sun, to take protective measures.

I would like to add one more thing. The real issue is how do we deal with this problem effectively in terms of reducing the substances which add to the problem. That is where Canada really is in a leadership position, not only through the implementation of the Montreal protocol but the co-operative work that is now going on between the federal and the provincial governments. We are all coming to grips with introducing the consumption and—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the minister will have an opportunity to continue later.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

A minister who is serious about reducing health costs would have mounted a major prevention campaign this spring to warn Canadians about increased dangers to their health. A minister serious about stopping destruction of the ozone layer would have reacted when only one Canadian province met its obligations under the national action plan to protect the ozone layer.

I ask the associate minister when we can expect national leadership from the Minister of the Environment, given the risk that we now know exists to our health and to our children's health?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I can assure my colleague that is exactly what is happening. We are providing the information. We are one of the leading countries in being able to provide it. We are also taking steps to deal with the long-term problem.

I remind my hon. colleague that eight of the ten provinces now have the appropriate regulatory environment by which they will start the recovery of the substances which contribute to this problem.

We have set our goals. We have set our standards. We have the plan of action in place. Obviously Canada is one of the leaders in this field and will continue to be a leader under the minister's very progressive policies.

THE BUDGET

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and concerns his budget of Monday.

As the minister knows, a majority of the provincial governments have brought down their budgets. The federal budget is later than they had expected.

In light of the debt crisis and the problems the provinces are having, can the minister give us a guarantee that on Monday in his budget there will be no unilateral changes to the formula for transfer payments? It is very important to the fiscal position of those governments and jobs in the provinces like Saskatchewan, Manitoba and others.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member will just have to wait and see. I think he recognizes, as he alluded to it, that all provinces recognize the serious national debt problem we face.

• (1155)

I noted this morning the provincial treasurer of Ontario brought out an expenditure control plan which affects all the sectors of government spending in Ontario. I noted that he said: "We must deal aggressively with the debt problem so that it does not overwhelm the economy". I think that is a view shared by all governments in Canada.

It is also noted that Ontario has cut transfer payments to the municipalities. It has cut its payments in lieu to education and social services—

Mr. McKnight: As has Saskatchewan.

Mr. Mazankowski: —as has Saskatchewan. This is in recognition of the tight fiscal situation in which we all find ourselves.

Bearing those things in mind, we will always ensure that the interests of Canada are taken into account. We hope we will be able to bring forward a budget that has balance and is achievable.

Mr. Milliken: You have not done anything for nine years. Why the conversion?

Mr. Mazankowski: For nine years members opposite voted against every restraint measure that we brought forward.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, the reason I asked the question is that in the past the government has been offloading its debt problems on to the backs of the provinces.

Saskatchewan for example is $500 million short of where we would have been without the changes in the formulas for transfers to the provinces.

As a supplementary question I want to ask whether this minister, who is the Deputy Prime Minister and who has a lot of clout across the way, can give us an assurance that in the future as long as this government is in office there will not be unilateral changes to the formula for transfer payments at all.

If there are any changes, will there be consultation with the provinces ahead of time?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the hon. member referred to the province of Saskatchewan.

Transfers to the province of Saskatchewan have grown at a rate of 7.4 per cent per year since 1984–85. It is the largest rate of increase of probably any of the provinces, amounting to something like $1,450 per person.

That is 7.4 per cent per year when over–all program expenditures of the government were growing at 4 per cent or less.

LOBSTER FISHERY

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, my question is for the parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries, clams and lobsters.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Casey: The Cumberland North Fishermen's Association has unanimously asked the DFO to increase the minimum lobster size in the Northumberland Strait area. It has asked this over and over again. It is strictly as a conservation measure at its own expense.

Is there any way this area along the Northumberland Strait can be designated to have an increased minimum lobster size?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question is being asked on behalf of the fishermen in the Northumberland Strait.

It is a very contentious issue in the total area. In the adjacent province fishermen do not want to see the carapace size raised at this time. There have been extensive consultations but they were not able to be concluded in time to make an announcement for this spring.

Consequently the minister at the end of March said there would be no increase in size in any of the areas this year. The short answer to his question is no, it will not happen this year.

Routine Proceedings

NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. John A. MacDougall (Timiskaming—French River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Earlier today I learned that the incoming president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women first is not a Canadian, and second does not have a work permit for this country.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister believe that the immigration department should review this person's work status in Canada? Does the Deputy Prime Minister believe that the taxpayers of Canada should be funding such an organization with an illegal immigrant as its head?

Hon. Mary Collins (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Environment) and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women): Madam Speaker, I do not think it would be appropriate for me to comment on the first part of the member's question. That question should be put to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I could comment on behalf of my colleague, the Secretary of State who is responsible for the women's program, about the purpose of that program. It really is not often well understood.

I know my colleague will disagree with many of the policies or statements of NAC. I do from time to time as well. Nevertheless we have a women's program in place which has been absolutely critical to the advancement of the legal, economic and social equality of women in this country.

There are many women's organizations from the Association of Women in Universities to the National Women's Council, including NAC that count on certain elements of support from that program. It enables both them and the government to work in partnership toward achieving that equality.

• (1200)

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will finish with a single question. The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

LAND CLAIMS

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister speaking for the minister of Indian affairs.

The minister of Indian affairs is aware that I brought to his attention the crisis surrounding the Dunnville Dam and Weir Rehabilitation Project which stems from 20 unresolved land claims presently being reviewed by the Department of Justice. The first four are related to Dunnville. Until these claims are settled, chances of an agreement to make the necessary repairs on the dam and weirs are minimal.

Will the minister instruct the Department of Justice to give the issue priority status in order to minimize any environmental damage that might be caused by the delays?

Is the minister prepared to speed up the decision on these land claims? Is he committed to fast tracking these claims in order to help remove this crisis?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the minister, the hon. member is fully aware that the Dunnville dam and weirs are a provincial-municipal responsibility. The Welland canal claim which impacts on that area is a high priority claim.

The hon. member and other members of the House understand the priority the government and the minister have put on settling outstanding land claims on behalf of Indian people. Since 1984 the government has settled more land claims and disputes put forward by Indian people in the last nine years than had been done in the previous quarter century.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBERS AND PAGES HOCKEY GAME

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, at the request of several members of the House I would like to table the official score sheet of the hockey game between MPs and pages last night.

Several members have expressed interest. Some were not able to play because of age, physical condition or duties and I know they would be interested in knowing that this tradition is continued. It was a very interesting and hard-fought game.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sure we have unanimous consent for that. What was the score?

An hon. member: The score was 8 to 7.

Mr. Fee: Mr. Speaker, if it was not for a referee from Hansard who was a little blind and missed my goal in the third period we would have tied the game.

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

88TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 88th report of the Standing Committee on House Management regarding the selection of votable items among Private Members' Business.

Pursuant to Standing Order 92(2), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the table.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

12TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour to present, in both official languages, the 12th report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

This report deals with the issue of tax arrangements for foreign affiliates. Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee requests the government's response to this report as soon as possible.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition to the honourable House of Commons in Parliament assembled.

The undersigned residents of the metropolitan area of Quebec City humbly sheweth:

That the Miranda family should have Canadian resident status. The family consists of Mrs. Carolina Miranda, her son Samael, and little Gonzalo Ignacio who was born here in Canada.

Mrs. Miranda and her son Samael are from Guatemala. Although under an agreement, Guatemalan nationals are able to return to their country, it has been confirmed by the Quebec—Central America Committee, Amnesty International and other organizations that the human rights situation in Guatemala is not improving.

Mrs. Miranda is afraid her son Samael will be kidnapped and used as a hostage, to try to flush out his father, Armanda Castillo, a Guatemalan who disappeared several years ago. He is apparently still alive and being sought by people who, since then, have killed two of his brothers, Samael's uncles.

Considering that Samael has adjusted to life in Quebec, plays hockey and speaks French like all little Quebecers, and considering that Gonzalo Ignacio was born in Canada and thus has Canadian citizenship, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider this a humanitarian case and keep this family in Canada.

[English]

SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, the petitioners who signed my first petition ask the government to delay the decision with respect to the merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council.

They point out that Canada's greatest challenges today are in the area of social problems, whether we talk about the deficit, the debt, poverty, unemployment, social assistance, food banks and many others. They simply ask the government to defer the decision and study it again. If it then feels this is a good decision then it should go forward. However, to date the government has proven no savings and no increased effectiveness, and therefore that is their request.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in my second petition I have a group of petitioners who ask Parliament to ensure that the CRTC makes absolutely certain that the use of foul language, abuse and violence on radio and television does not occur. They point out that it goes contrary to their efforts to raise their families in a particular way. They also emphasize that it is not necessary to use foul language to entertain in English or in French.

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and privilege of presenting a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 signed by residents of my constituency from the communities of Hafford, Goodsoil, Pierceland, and Blaine Lake, Saskatchewan.

The petitioners acknowledge that studies have shown a link between violence in entertainment and desensitization to violence in our society. They note that part of this culture of violence is a serial killer board game which has as its point murdering defenceless children and adults.

The petitioners state that the laws of Canada do not deal with material such as this and they call upon Parliament to consider amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that violent and degrading material, such as the serial killer board game, can be kept from being distributed in Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 466 and 467.

[Text]

Question No. 466—Mr. Boudria:

With respect to the Department of Finance, (a) how many persons are employed to administer the goods and services tax (b) what does it cost to administer the tax?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): With respect to the Department of Finance, (a) none, (b) nil.

Question No. 467—Mr. Boudria:

With respect to the Department of National Revenue, (a) how many persons are employed to administer the goods and services tax (b) what does it cost to administer the tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): (a) It is forecast that in 1993–94 there will be approximately 4,400 full-time equivalents in Revenue Canada to administer the goods and services tax.

(b) It is forecast that in 1993–94 it will cost approximately $390 million in Revenue Canada to administer and collect the GST.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Belsher: I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION (GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATIONS) ACT, 1992

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C–93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons on February 25, 1992, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member for St. Boniface had the floor. He has 34 minutes remaining. There are no questions or comments.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate being given the opportunity to continue my address on Bill C–93. As I pointed out, it is a massive bill that attempts to give a very false impression. The government is trying to suggest that it is streamlining government. It is saying that it will save money and bring about increased efficiency and effectiveness. Of course this is blatantly false.

No government official has given any proof of that. What is worse, there have been no studies to show it. We have called upon them time and time again. We know full well it is an attempt to reach the Reform Party's agenda, the Conservatives' kissing cousins.

There are no savings. There is no proof that there are. There is no increased effectiveness or efficiency. There is no proof that there is. There are no studies, but now in a moment of panic all of a sudden we see new figures appearing. Obviously the big hand of someone has come down and said: You better buttress our case. That is your job. I am sorry for the government, but it is too late.

Treasury Board officials provided no proof. Mr. Speaker, you should have been there because you would have felt, as I did, that it was so sad to see these poor officials out there trying to defend the indefensible.

An hon. member: Hung out to dry.

Mr. Duhamel: They were hung out to dry. Then they brought in the big shooters from the Privy Council and I thought perhaps we would get some answers then. To be perfectly frank and without being unkind in any way, the best I can say is that it was no better than the first set of proofs. It was probably worse. In some instances it will cost more money to the Government of Canada. That is part of the testimony that was made.

Who is opposed to this bill? The government likes to pretend that it is us on this side of the House, and that is true. However virtually everyone who has been involved in this is opposed to this bill. The government has absolutely dismally failed to produce any shred of evidence, but what is worse, it has failed to produce even one credible witness who would say this is a good idea. That is how bad the government's case is.

I think you would agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that when one has such a flimsy case one should withdraw, one should restudy, one should reconsider, one should consult and one should see what could be done.

This bill deals with a number of agencies but let me focus on just a couple of them. For example, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was an economic development tool in one of the regions of the country that needs this kind of assistance. It is a region where the unemployment rate is high and where the number of people who require social assistance is high. What does the government do? It merged it. For what reason? To give the impression that it is doing something significant.

Let us go to one of the more contentious parts, which is the merging of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council.

[Translation]

In fact, Bill C-93 calls for the merger of several agencies operating in a totally different way. As you know, Mr. Speaker, Canada is faced with numerous serious social problems such as family violence, environmental problems, constitutional uncertainty, native issues, new reproductive technologies, illiteracy, sexual abuse, to name a few. These problems cannot be solved without contribution from social sciences and humanities.

The Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, created in 1977, was given the responsibility for the programs managed by the Social Sciences and Humanities Division of the Canada Council. It got that responsibility. The government is now trying to eliminate an efficient human sciences research framework. That is what it is doing. The government proposal to merge this agency with the Canada Council is a step back and will in no way help to improve the level of federal support for human sciences research. It is unfortunate because we already have serious problems. Funding is inadequate and the social sciences and humanities community was never consulted about that merger. There was no consultation at all. I urge government to postpone the decision to merge the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council. It would be a courageous gesture on their part and I ask government members to consider it.

• (1215)

As you know Mr. Speaker, in 1978, the government decided to create the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council as an entirely separate agency from the Canada Council. Over the years, we saw them develop very different traditions. In the area of social sciences, scientists work mainly within universities. They have developed a research activity and project evaluation system based on the scientific tradition of peer review. That is very important and we should not let it disappear.

[English]

I understand that it is one group testifying against the other and talking about efficiency, savings and effectiveness. Let me use an analogy. It will be appreciated.

Say I have doctors telling me that this is what I have from a physical, emotional or what have you perspective and that this is the treatment that I need. Say, on the other hand, that there are well intentioned people telling me something diametrically opposed to this. That is the case here. I am going to go with the doctors. I am going to go with what they say and not with what the well intentioned people say.

The doctors on these issues have told me something about the merging of Enterprise Cape Breton with the Atlantic Opportunities Agency, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council, the program for Canadian Studies Abroad also with the Canada Council as well as the Agricultural Products Board with the the Ministry of Agriculture as well as the winding up of the Canadian Copyright Board and the transferral of the functions of the Registrar of Trademarks that are currently exercised by the Trade-Marks Opposition Board into a new tribunal to be called the Intellectual Property Tribunal. It is that the current government deserves to be slapped with a nasty malpractice suit. That is what it deserves.

These mergers make as must sense as merging the regressive Conservative Party with the NDP. That is as much sense as it makes.

[Translation]

In any case I think it is very clear that this merger was denounced by all concerned. All the organizations that know about the situation of social research in Canada, as well as my party and the party to my left, have asked that Part III, which is the part that provides for the merger of the Canada Council and SSHRC, be withdrawn or, at least amended significantly. Of course, the government carries on and turns a deaf ear to the unanimous appeals made by the academic, scientific and artistic communities.

[English]

The government has opted for one stop shopping in its hopes to save money. I wish it were so. It hopes to recoup the popularity of the Canadian people. Unfortunately for those involved in Canada as a whole, this type of one stop shopping may well result in confusion rather than efficiency. That is exactly what is going to happen. One knows that.

There is another reason why I do not like this bill when we talk of effectiveness. Let me say why I do not think that a whole lot of thinking has gone into this. For example, we have had no assurance that the peer review of the government will continue, which is a fundamental principle with respect to research. We have no assurance that the board that will eventually be struck will be representative of the significant people who understand the new mandate. To that effect, I put in an amendment and the government rejected it.

[Translation]

This bill is so full of holes that one could drive a Mack truck through it and one big Mack truck, I assure you.

With regard to the removal of the academic relations division and the Canadian studies program from External Affairs, one can say that this useless transfer will generate more expenditures, while reducing the effectiveness of the programs. Let me give you just one example. The Deparment of External Affairs uses the diplomatic bag to reach the numerous foreigners who are linked to programs under the responsibility of academic relations. By being transferred to the Canada Council, this division will no longer enjoy that privilege. This represents tens of thousands of dollars more in postage, for each program. Do you see the contradiction? It is an obvious contradiction.

• (1220)

[English]

The International Council for Canadian Studies is concerned about this section of the bill on four counts. First, there is no assurance that the program of Canadian studies abroad will be maintained at its current level. There is none whatsoever. Second, its integrity may not be preserved separately from domestic programs. That is a serious one as well. Third, the essential link between foreign policy and priorities and program policy and delivery will be jeopardized. Fourth, the program will be more costly and less effective.

The fusion or merger of SSHRC with the Canada Council risks, as a parade of witnesses before the committee clearly pointed out, negating the progress that has been made. Just take a look at what is happening.

The government created separate councils in 1978. They proved themselves to be fiscally lean and responsible and then the government throws them back together. Those people still have the gall to call themselves the Progressive Conservative Party.

In my opinion such a bill has proven once and for all that the party across the floor is indeed the regressive party of Canada. It has taken several ingredients that simply do not mix, put them together and thrown them against the wall hoping that they will stick.

In committee the following groups made up of responsible people opposed the bill: The Canadian Conference on the Arts, the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, the Canadian Federation of the Humanities, the Social Science Federation of Canada and the Canadian Association of University Teachers as well as most university presidents.

That is an impressive list of witnesses. Not one single witness had anything positive to say about this merger.

It is also worth noting that no studies were forthcoming. I want to stress this; there were no studies. Can one imagine going after a change like this with no studies as to the financial savings? Treasury Board officials did point to a $1 million start up cost for one of those initiatives. Can one imagine that? This once again has insignificant savings over the long run. If there was a $1 million start up cost savings in the long run, then one could argue that—

[Translation]

Moreover, a group of academics from four Canadian universities, namely Laval University, University of Québec in Montreal, University of Montreal, University of Québec in Trois-Rivières and the University of Ottawa, rightly attacked shamelessly this bill in a Montreal daily, because they demonstrated, once again, that there would be no savings and that it would not be possible to increase the efficiency of that body.

[English]

I suppose it is quite appropriate for people to say: "Oh, yes, you think that; you are the critic; you are in fact in opposition". However, what has been said about this bill by other responsible people? I have an article here by Hugh Winsor dated February 27, 1993. He refers to two civil servants and says:

> The government again responded by sending civil servants from something known as the machinery of government section of the Privy Council Office to the barricades.

That was the second set of witnesses because the first set of witnesses failed dismally. Referring to one senior government officials he said:

> Why these particular 46 groups were chosen was not for him to say. His only concern, as an expert in government organization, was whether or not the merger was doable.

It is important to note whether or not it could be done. Referring to the other senior civil servant, and I appreciate this fact:

> His sidekick— even admitted that it didn't really matter to a government bent on streamlining and reorganization for reorganization's sake whether the clients of the two agencies in question liked the change.

It did not matter.

> Service to the public was a secondary consideration.

This article was by Hugh Winsor. This is not Ron Duhamel the member for St. Boniface. This is Mr. Winsor.

• (1225)

Is that all? Oh, no. We have an article entitled: "Ottawa's shotgun wedding wounds two agencies". It wounds them, perhaps even fatally. Let me quote from this article:

> Many in the academic community see a real danger that SSHRC will face the deep budget cuts that have affected the cultural community.

That is what they fear. This is a smoke-screen for exactly that.

> Despite their strong opposition of Bill C-93, academic and cultural organizations have not behaved inflexibly in this dispute.

That is a laudable point. That is an honourable position. They have not behaved inflexibly.

> A number of amendments to Bill C-93 have been proposed, the most important of which would ensure that parliamentary allocations for academic research and international programs are kept separate from endowment funds to support the arts and culture, and that the new council is well and fully representative of the various communities served.

This is by Claude Lajeunesse and Keith Kelly. This is what these people are saying. These are not irresponsible people. These are highly respected Canadians.

Is that all? No. None other than Jeffrey Simpson says that the Canada Council merger fails the basic test of common sense. Let me quote:

> Nothing in the country could replace the Economic Council—

We have not talked a whole lot about that.

> —or the Science Council.
> The agenda had little—

He is speaking about government.

> —or nothing to do with the agencies in question. The Tories, circa February, 1992, were simply feeling antsy about the Reform Party, especially in western Canada. As a sop to this sentiment, the agencies were axed and Bill C-93 took form.
> The basic problem with the bill—one pointed out by a parade of witnesses before a Commons committee—is that the Canada Council, SSHRC, and External Affairs' cultural policies have quite different missions. Lumping them together will make things harder for both the expanded Canada Council and for the groups that deal with it.

As I indicated before it makes as much sense as trying to merge the party that forms the government that calls themselves Progressive Conservatives—I call them regressive Conservatives— with the NDP. It makes no sense.

> Bill C-93, driven by politics but rationalized on grounds of efficiency, may turn the Canada Council into one of those proverbial camels that emerged from a committee trying to design a horse.

Have you heard that story, Mr. Speaker?

> The opposition parties are quite right to kick up a fuss.

That is what Mr. Simpson says. The opposition parties are quite right to kick up a fuss because the government has been dishonest.

I have relayed what some notable Canadians and journalists have said. Let me give some excerpts from committee testimony. We had eminent people such as the assistant secretary of the Treasury Board. I will not go any further. Let me give some quotes: "Bill C-93 is a modest proposal, if you like, from a savings perspective". Did one hear that? "But one will not know what, in reality, has happened until it has". One does not know what is going to happen until it has happened and then it may be too late to correct what has happened.

Let me give another quotation: "C-93 is very much a housekeeping bill". If that were all. I ask if one can tell me whether or not the new board membership will be sufficiently diverse to represent all of the various interests. The Treasury Board has no comment: "I do not have any comments about any of the program budgeting issue in the estimates".

It goes on in response to another question. This is important: "That is an estimate which is in some respects one of the weaker estimates which we have". That was with respect to the merging of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council. "We are expecting the numbers which will result, the savings which will result in the SSHRC and Canada Council amalgamation to be generated essentially by the management when this is done".

We all know that those organizations could have been called in and told: "Here are the budgetary savings we need. Bring us a plan". We did not have to go through all this major surgery, but we did because they wanted to try to impress Canadians.

That is why we see the moral fibre falling out of this. I asked: "Are there studies? If there are, can and will they be tabled?" I said I was not clear on that in spite of my repeated questioning. Here are some of the responses: "The estimates of savings were made by the officials acting in preparation for a budget. There would be no studies which I understand could be released on that subject". Later on in the testimony: "We have no particular studies on costings of these savings". These are statements by senior officials from Treasury Board and Privy Council. It is not the hon. member for St. Boniface who said that. This is the testimony they gave. Is that not deplorable?

I want to share as well a letter I received from the Canadian Federation for the Humanities. Actually it was addressed to the Leader of the Opposition. I want to read three paragraphs:

> As you will know from earlier correspondence and various press releases, Canadian Federation for the Humanities strongly opposes passage of part III of Bill C-93. So does every other academic and artistic group in Canada—no group has endorsed the government's policy.
> We have tried to deal in a very reasonable way with the government, meeting them more than half-way on their policy that ways must be found to reduce wasteful government spending. We have simply asked the government to accept that the proposed merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC) and the cultural exchange programs of External Affairs with the Canada Council could easily cost taxpayers millions of dollars and serious losses in productivity.
> The government has consistently been unable to produce any evidence that would support its contention that this merger will produce net savings. Their projections are based solely on the belief that mergers must inevitably produce savings.

That is an assumption and is not a proven one. It goes on:

> This sort of inflexibility, in our view, is disastrous. We favour a much more empirical, though no less vigorous, approach to the management of federal expenditures.

This is the Canadian Federation for the Humanities, a highly responsible group staffed by the finest men and women in the country. Why are we doing this? To meet the Reform agenda.

I have a letter as well from the Social Science Federation of Canada. I want to share a few of its remarks. This is an open letter to the members of Parliament: "The savings are ridiculously small. The merger brings together two agencies that operate quite differently. The merger provides no guarantees for continued effective support for social sciences research.

The amalgamation has taken place without any consultation". I could read more of this into the text but I think I have made my point. "Again we are not at all opposed to sensible, indeed vigorous, economies in the administration of the present councils. The country obviously faces an urgent financial problem, but we are convinced that the costs of this merger greatly outweigh the benefits" and the letter is signed by Robert Nadeau, president.

These are responsible men and women from some of the country's most prestigious organizations and this is what they had to say.

Everyone will be interested in this. There were government members who recognized they had no case. There are sensible government members; I have never said otherwise. They recognized that they had no case. Then they started talking to their political masters to see if there could not be some sort of compromise, some sort of understanding, some sort of meaningful solution.

• (1235)

We had proposed, as had the party to the left of me, that perhaps we could strike part III, just set it aside and study it again. Then if the facts proved that the government's agenda was correct we would go forward. Of course we had a lot of confidence that that was not so but the government did not want to take the risk. Some members wanted to take the risk. They talked to their political masters, but the political masters came down with their big hands and said no, no, no. It stopped at that. We had an opportunity to do what was right.

When I saw that the government would not be sensible, would not remove part III in spite of all of the evidence from the senior bureaucrats at Treasury Board, from Privy Council, the journalists, the various organizations, university presidents and all of those national organizations that are held in high esteem, I asked what it was that could be done. Could there still be something done?

I thought of amendments. Let us at least talk to the organizations and see what amendments might perhaps make a bad thing a little less bad. I moved amendments which would substantially improve the bill as well as address serious concerns expressed by the various communities involved.

For example, I proposed a name change which would much more adequately reflect the composition of the new council. Did the government even look at that? No. I also proposed that separate budgetary appropriation votes be held so that funds to be used for arts were designated as such, so that funding for the social sciences and humanities were used for that purpose and so that money to be used for the administration of the council was used for that purpose. Did the government look at that? No.

These are reasonable proposals: change the name to reflect the various realities; have separate votes to give some additional security to those who are being deeply shaken with these changes. Through amendments supported by the Social Science Federation and the Association of Universities and Colleges, I also proposed that board membership be representative and that board members have a certain degree of expertise in the areas in question. That is what I proposed.

[Translation]

I suggested changing the name to reflect the reality of what was happening, to ensure that these various organizations could be identified. I proposed that separate budgetary appropriation votes be held so that we could see exactly how much would be spent in each sector.

Mr. Speaker, it is important and I know that you understand and are sensitive to it. I also suggested ensuring that any appointees to a board of directors to represent the organization and help run it should come from the various sectors that were merged to be part of this new entity.

I also asked that the men and women chosen be people who know the field, in order to avoid partisanship and appointing one's chums, one's friends and family members and so on. I wanted to ensure that there would be men and women—and there are many here in Canada—who thoroughly understand these different sectors and can give them outstanding leadership, because that is what it will take and you realize that because, frankly, this is a creation that does not stand up.

[English]

The government even refused that.

I had difficulty in understanding why it would refuse rescinding part III. I had a great deal of difficulty particularly after I saw some colleagues who were willing to talk, but they wanted to save face. I do not think it was a good enough reason in view of all of the evidence, but I thought surely they would look at some of those amendments.

I made those amendments with respect to the merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council, but I also made additional amendments with respect to the review. The organizations told me that my amendment with respect to the review was superior to the government's. Would it look at mine? Absolutely not. It was as bone-headed as it could be and went forward with what it had.

• (1240)

SOCAN had contacted me because it was concerned with the wording in certain sections of the bill and felt that it would be unfair. Did the government look at that? No. Copyright tribunal individuals had difficulties and suggestions were made. Did it look at those? No. One can see how reasonable the opposition has been. It has been extremely reasonable. Let me review the large parts.

This bill was presented a long time ago as a result of budget decisions made by the government. People asked what was going on because there had been no consultation. We recognized immediately that key organizations such as the Economic Council of Canada were being removed. Everyone knows the government needs help in the area of the economy. When there are 1.5 million people unemployed, 2.7 million people receiving welfare, over 2 million people being fed by the food banks this year, a deficit that is over $30 billion and a debt that has almost tripled since 1984, the government needs expert advice, but no. It zaps those councils and those associations that could have been of great assistance to it.

We tried to rescind the most critical part. What happened? Nothing. We put forward reasonable amendments to try to fix it a bit, to make something terrible at least more or less palatable. What did government do? It was totally inflexible. Totally, totally inflexible.

Of course, the government comes to this House today suggesting that it is we, the opposition. Well, I am sorry. Yes it is we the opposition, but it is also all those organizations I mentioned and many others throughout the land who are saying that this is no good, that there are no savings, that this is a smoke-screen and there are no increased efficiencies or effectiveness. This is a government agenda to try to get Canadians to rally to its cause.

With this kind of smoke-screen and with this kind of deceit and manipulation, it is not going to happen. It is not going to happen. The government has been unreasonable. It had plenty of opportunity to fix it. It had many opportunities and it has failed. It would not listen.

I for one am deeply disappointed. I would have thought at the last minute that common sense would have set in. No, in spite of the fact that all witnesses were against it, not one single credible witness was brought forward, despite statements quoted today by its officials that this was a bill that would not save substantial moneys. Even one of the politicians said that it was primarily a symbolic measure. I thank that hon. member for having been that honest.

The government wants Canadians to trust it. Yes, one of the leadership contenders said that. "Trust me." Believe you me, Mr. Speaker, Canadians are not going to trust this government any more because of the decisions it makes.

Initially, the parliamentary secretary pointed out that Liberals have consistently opposed legislation which his government has put forth. We will continue to oppose legislation that does not put the people of Canada first. This bill does not put the people of Canada first. I will not support it and my colleagues will not support it. Canadians will not support it or this government at the next general election.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it is really not with pleasure that I rise today on third reading of Bill C-93. In fact it saddens me.

Unfortunately what I suspect is being completed here today makes it a sad day. It is a sad day for research in this country. It is a sad day for the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada. It is a sad day for the external cultural programs of our country. As well it is a sad day for our parliamentary tradition and our parliamentary institution.

• (1245)

The area of the bill we are debating that concerns me most is part III. It brings together the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, the cultural programs of External Affairs, the old Canada Council and folds them all into a new agency.

It is sad because the motivation behind this—I will come back to that at length in a little while—is purely political and short term. The idea grew out of the minds of a few people in Finance. We understand there was no consultation with the appropriate departments or ministers. Certainly there was absolutely no consultation with the social scientists and the humanities nor with the arts community. It was a decision made solely by a few individuals in Finance.

As has been pointed out over and over again in discussions in this House, when we had officials from the government, the Privy Council, the Department of Finance and Treasury Board none of them were able to give us any justification for the statement that there would be cost savings. In fact we obtained through freedom of information the government's own estimate of what the savings would be. That document showed there would be zero savings in the next five years.

I tried in committee to get the head of the new Canada Council as well as the ministers in front of us but that was turned down by government members on the committee.

I kept asking why they were doing this. The only rationale was it might save us some money. When we pushed them to prove this to us they were not able to do it. It was finally admitted by somebody from Privy Council that it was doable.

How sad it is that public policy on something as important as this is being determined purely on the political notion that it somehow or other might appease the right wing and that the right wing might continue to support the Conservation Party. That is the only rationale which really makes sense.

The parliamentary secretary lambasted us earlier in his comments. He said we are making the accusation that the government's motivation is purely political in order to appease the right wing.

I am not making that charge. My party and the opposition has not made that charge. The person who said that was Conservative Senator Finlay MacDonald. He is quoted in The Globe and Mail dated February 27, 1993: "The whole exercise might be nothing more than a symbolic act to protect the party's right flank from the attacks from the dreaded Reform Party, to cause sufficient pain and spill enough blood to impress the voters. If true this might be good politics in the short term but it is not good public policy in the long run". Despite the accusations of the parliamentary secretary it is a Conservative senator who has made this charge.

Why are we so upset with this? First of all a few people in Finance who I suspect have no notion or understanding or appreciation what the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is all about made this unilateral decision.

• (1250)

It is important to the social scientists because in 1987, as a result of recommendations of the Lamontagne royal commission looking into science policies, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council was separated from the Canada Council. It was done after much discussion and consultation. At that time it was considered a victory for the social sciences because the social sciences and the humanities were recognized as a legitimate form of scientific inquiry, that the social sciences was a science and not an art. This is important. It is important we recognize that the social sciences and the humanities are a legitimate form of scientific inquiry and how important they are in this day and age.

We all hear about how fast the world is changing, the globalization, the scientific and technological changes. All of our lives are thrown into this mad rush of constant change. Our societies and our cultures are in constant total change. The only thing constant is change; psychological change, economic change, cultural change, technological change.

As we try to live with this, as we near the end of this millennium, it is essential for us as human beings if we are going to survive to begin to get an understanding of these forces of change. We need to use the best methods and tools available to us as human beings, which are our scientific tools, in order to begin to get some understanding and some grasp of these tremendous forces that are creating such a horrendous change in our lives.

I remember a few years ago attending the habitat conference in Vancouver and listening to Buckminster Fuller. He stated that most of the major discoveries which have occurred in the history of the human race occurred in his lifetime. I think that conference was in 1975.

What we see here today is the government, through its short-term political agenda, now moving the clock back. It is now stating that the social sciences are not really a proper scientific body and that they belong with the arts. We hear government members saying this. We heard the member from Winnipeg. I am sorry but I do not know her constituency. She said in the House the other day that the social sciences and the humanities were with the Canada Council for 20 years and what was good enough then is good enough now.

I am frightened when I hear such points being raised in the House of Commons of Canada. It is scary because one of the important tools, as I mentioned, in which we can begin to survive and get some control over the changes affecting our lives is through proper research, study and investigation of the social sciences. To again think of them as really being like the arts is a step back. It is a step that weakens one of the important tools we have as human beings.

What are some of the areas in which the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council are involved? It is involved in some of the research programs that deal with physical and monetary policy, urban development, productivity, economic and strategic planning, managing for global competitiveness, scientific and technological policy, family violence, the aging population, racism, sexism and youth unemployment. All of these are questions that concern social scientists. The type of debt we have is a question that concerns social scientists. It requires scientific study so we can begin to work our way out of the tremendous debt problem we have both at the federal and provincial levels. What the sciences attempt to do is minimize the human harm.

I could go on and on as to the importance of the social sciences. I wish that members of the Department of Finance would recognize that and would recognize the distinctiveness and the importance of keeping distinct research in the social sciences and the humanities.

They did not because of the reason that Senator Finlay MacDonald mentioned, because of short-term political interest. I would tend to think that is quite misguided because I do not think one Tory will save his or her seat from the Reform Party because of what is being done today. But because of that the barbarians of the finance department were at the gates and they raped and plundered, if I may use those terms, all that has been built up since 1978, the work of establishing the social sciences and the humanities as a legitimate form of scientific research.

The government today is trying to justify all this, trying to put modest clothing over this bare political work and attempting to justify it by saying that it is going to save money. The parliamentary secretary lambastes the opposition saying we are not interested in saving, we are not interested in efficiency, we are plundering the pockets of the taxpayers, we are trying to hold up debate, we are filibustering, we are doing all sorts of terrible things.

I suspect that the parliamentary secretary, having been devoid of reason, uses the broad brush of slander. What he said is not true. In fact, if we look at his own comments we find the contradiction. Earlier on in his comments he mentioned that members of the opposition are supportive of parts of Bill C-93 because they do away with some agencies that should have been done away with a long time ago.

We are also very much interested in savings and efficiencies. We recognize the horrendous debt that is like a cancer choking and killing public programs. Of course we have to come to terms with that. We are saying that what the government is attempting to do in part III of Bill C-93 does the very opposite; it does not produce efficiency, it does not save money.

It is not just us saying it. We heard the testimony from members of Finance and from the Privy Council saying no, there were no efficiencies. But the government now has come up with the $5 million a year figure. Let me deal with that.

It first was raised at report stage. The parliamentary secretary said he had information that we are going to save $5 million a year. On Wednesday he invited us to phone the Canada Council and confirm this and I did. I phoned them yesterday morning and I talked to Dr. Paule Leduc. From my notes, this is what I have. She said yes. She confirmed that they had met with the Treasury Board and they made some quick analysis. She said it is difficult to say how much is going to be saved, but it is possible that over five years $5 million could be saved.

What a difference from what we hear government members saying. They talk about saving $5 million a year. They say it as though next year we are going to save $5 million, and every year after that we are going to save $5 million. What Dr. Leduc told me on the phone, according to my notes, is that it is possible that over five years $5 million can be saved. She said it was impossible to give more details because they are only now preparing the documents and reviewing all the programs. She said again that it is impossible to put any numbers now. It is too soon. Then she said that $5 million per year is not what she said at all. I asked her whether she had ever said or concluded that $5 million a year could be saved. She said that that is not what she said at all.

I spoke to her at 11.37 yesterday morning. Last night just before I went home I checked my fax machine and that was at 5.59. I faxed this letter that the parliamentary secretary has now tabled. The letter is quite different from what was said to me over the phone.

I wonder who got through to Dr. Paule Leduc. What is going on here? All at once we see that there can be savings realized. In the first paragraph she said: "I think we can reasonably expect that ongoing savings in the order of $5 million annually could be achieved after four to five years of the existence of the new combined agency".

It is really close in terms of $5 million over the next five years, but then in the next paragraph she back pedals a little more by saying: "I also expect that savings will occur earlier in this process, probably as soon as three years, but at this stage I cannot give a definite amount".

That is all very intriguing. Of course what is missing in here is any discussion about what it costs.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are indicating that my time is rapidly expiring, so with your indulgence, Sir, I will quickly terminate my remarks.

What we have here is new information that was not given to us in committee. We asked for it. At report stage and now at third reading we have this new information. It is not complete, far from it. The justification for this bill is to save money, and yet there is serious doubt whether it does that.

Properly speaking, this bill should be referred back to the legislative committee so that we can find out what the real savings and costs are. After all, the justification for this bill is to save money. We maintain that it is not going to save money. All the social scientists, university professors and the whole academic community from coast to coast are totally up in arms about it. The arts community is up in arms about it. I commend the arts community for coming to the aid of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. They are all up in arms about it.

The justification ends up that it has to save money. There is serious doubt about this. New information has been introduced. Therefore I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word that and substituting the following therefor:
> Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons, February 25, 1993, be not now read a third time but be referred back to the legislative committee for the purposes of reconsidering clauses 35 through 71 inclusive and that the Legislative Committee on Bill C-93, an act to implement certain government organization provisions of the budget tabled in the House of Commons, February 25, 1993, be reconstituted for the purpose of this reconsideration.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, first, I want to thank my colleague for the remarks he made and with which I identify as well as the amendment. My questions are as follows.

The government was given an opportunity to rescind part III. The government was given an opportunity to accept certain amendments that would have made a bad bill a little less bad. The hon. member has just given it another opportunity that it should accept. If it was smart it would accept to take it back to committee and start all over again which is what those various organizations actually want.

They did not even say to the government: "Do not do it". They said: "Just delay it and restudy it. If you can come up with your savings, increased effectiveness and efficiency, which you have not been able to do to date, then do it". However the government has not been able to do that.

My question is this. This government has a flimsy case, no basis, no one standing up and defending it and not one credible voice. Why in the world would it not seize those opportunities that we have given it to let it save face to do the right thing for those various organizations? Why?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, my friend and colleague from Winnipeg raises a very good question. It is a question that I also raised several times in committee: "Why are you doing this?" It is a type of political macho I suspect. The government figures it has set its course and lo and behold it is not going to be moved away from this at all.

I find it politically stupid on the government's part. It is really dumb and stupid. Here it has just totally upset all of the academic community. I have a petition of 1,700 social scientists who are eminent scholars. Lettivar published a list of 40 from the University of Ottawa, McGill University and the University of Montreal. From coast to coast, artists, academics and everybody is totally upset with something they have grave difficulty justifying in terms of saving dollars and cents on. Yet this politically macho government says: "No, we are going to stick our ground". I find this politically stupid.

It would be politically smart if the government would say it made a mistake or at least say that with all these eminent people objecting to this it would have a second look. I think the government would win much credibility because then it would appear at least to be open. We talk about a new type of politics where individual members of Parliament can have some input. Then it could say: "You see, we are practising the new politics. We are in fact consulting. This is the new politics of inclusion. We are practising this". The government has a golden opportunity to demonstrate this.

I challenge all the leadership candidates. I notice that one was here earlier today. I challenge them. Where are they going to stand on this? This is their opportunity to give flesh to the notion of the new politics of being open. It is not as the parliamentary secretary was suggesting, done by painting us with a black brush: "This is only political manipulation on the part of the opposition". No, it is not so.

We co-operated with regard to many parts of Bill C-93. It is the part that every reasonable person in this country is standing up and objecting to that we are giving the government the opportunity of now saying let us practise the new politics here.

• (1310)

Let us see if this does save money. Let us see if this does create efficiencies. What more does it need? Every expert, including its own officials in its own departments, admits that it is not going to save money and is not going to increase efficiencies.

For God's sake, listen to some reason. Get off the high horse and practise the open, inclusive, new politics, please, gentlemen.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I was particularly heartened to see the academics, the scientists and people from the arts working together on this.

It was heart warming to see people from various different constituencies come together, have dialogue and bring forward cogent arguments. However, I have another question.

I think the biggest piece of evidence indicating that the government is in trouble and that it has not made a case comes when all of a sudden we see some new figures floating up to suggest that there is more there than there was before. I want to ask my colleague to comment on this.

If Treasury Board and Privy Council officials could not come up with the facts then, why are certain figures coming up now? It is my feeling that those members think they are sinking. They are trying to patch that boat. I wonder if my colleague would care to comment on that. Is that what is happening? Is that why we are getting these different messages?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I certainly believe so. That is why I raised a question of privilege earlier in the day and that is why I moved the amendment. I wanted to get it back to committee to study these new figures because they are important.

Are there really savings? If so, let us have a look at them. We did not get them in committee. We tried. I tried and the hon. member tried to get the minister in front of the committee. We tried to get the head of Canada Council in front of the committee to explore fully what the savings are.

Now we hear that there is going to be some $5 million a year saved. I have some serious questions. Dr. Leduc says as well that this saving will occur by bringing the administration together.

Here is one of the questions I would ask in committee as well. There was also a verbal commitment made by the government that it will keep separate administrations between the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council. Verbally, the government has been very committal. Even though it did not accept the amendments that would put flesh to that it said: "Trust us. We will keep social sciences and humanities separate from the Canada Council".

However, if all at once it is going to start saving $5 million a year in administrative costs, I wonder how much of a separation there is going to be. Are they indeed going to be melded together? Are some of the worst fears of those in the social sciences and the arts going to be realized?

These are questions that have to be explored in committee. Again, I agree with the hon. member. Where do these figures come from at the 12th hour? The government produces these new figures. There are contradictions in what was said to me over the telephone and what hurriedly got to be a fax late last night delivered to me.

There are all sorts of contradictions. There are all sorts of questions that need to be asked. That is why again I urge that when this House votes on my amendment it should give serious and positive consideration to my amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I thought you were rising to deal specifically with the amendment. If that is what we are dealing with, I was not going to rise. If there is going to be continuing debate I am ready to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the whole bill, but if there is going to be debate then the hon. member for Ontario has the floor on debate.

• (1315)

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, I truly thought you were rising on the amendment, to put that one on the record.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must say I thought the House was ready for the question. I did not see anybody rising. I am sorry I did not see the hon. member rising, but if it is on debate the hon. member has the floor.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I do want to speak on this very important bill, Bill C-93. I want to speak on it for some very fundamental reasons.

We have heard from many Canadians, whether they are in my constituency, across Canada or opposition members, as surprising as that may sound, that government has to find ways of controlling its expenses, it has to eliminate duplication, and it has to cut the levels of service. It must do so not so that there are fewer programs but that there is a more efficient way of delivering those items to the Canadian public. Bill C-93 is a direct result of some of those requests by Canadians.

The minister in the budget of a year ago, in February 1992, announced we were going to make a number of changes to the way in which the government delivered some of its programs through some of its agencies.

I am pleased that the government is doing that. I find it interesting in terms of the members of the opposition that come election time we will have one party talking about how it is going to reduce the deficit and the debt as part of the GNP but yet it will not identify how it is going to do it.

Today in Ontario the NDP have finally recognized that it cannot spend money like drunken sailors and it has to take some responsibility for its actions. It is going to wind up a few things, and that is most appropriate.

The difference between us here in Ottawa, the Government of Canada, and the Ontario NDP, the Government of Ontario, is that in Ontario it chose last year to spend the money and now it has to explain how it is not going to spend it, how it is going to withdraw some of the spending it did.

Well, here we are. We did not spend the money in last year's budget. We said that rather than spend it we are going to find ways of reducing our expenditures. These changes marginally affect the 1992 budget, but they have ongoing implications in years two, three, four and five as we get into the implementation of these changes.

Those kinds of savings, a dollar here, a dollar there, are very important to the over-all budget of Canada. I do not want to suggest that there are only dollars involved in these savings because there is substantially more than that.

It is important to understand the process from where we start because while we sit here and debate the issues that face Canada there are new issues that we face all the time. There are new problems that our constituents are demanding we face and that we find funds to deal with. That is always a challenge because the taxpayers at the same time argue we need new programs. They want these issues dealt with but they do not want us to spend any more money because they do not want us to raise taxes.

The Government of Canada implemented a bill called the Spending Control Act. That bill basically limited the amount of money the government can spend each year. That bill went out some four or five years into the future and said that each year we can increase by about 2.5 per cent or 3 per cent. That bill was put in place.

That bill said if we want to fund a new program, if we want to solve a new problem that has come along, if we want to spend some more money we are going to have to take that money from somewhere else in the system.

Mr. Milliken: Unless they amend the act.

Mr. Soetens: The member is obviously right. Parliament is ultimately its own master, but the fact of the matter is it set a policy that we believe in.

I note the opposition is totally opposed to spending controls. Not only is it opposed to spending controls, it votes that way in the House, but when it had the chance to be the government in Ottawa it increased spending by 14 per cent or 15 per cent a year.

• (1320)

When the Liberals got kicked out of Ottawa and unfortunately took over in Ontario they increased spending in Ontario by some 13 per cent or 14 per cent a year and the NDP, which said that it would show how to control it, managed to do the same thing in the first year. In the second year it said how great it was because it only increased spending at 6 per cent when the inflation rate was 2 per cent.

The NDP can take credit for saying that in its last budget it increased spending less than had been increased in the previous seven years of Ontario government history, but it spent money it did not have. It did not want to raise taxes, even though it did, and now it has to announce that the money it announced it was spending last year, the year before and the year before and the thousands of employees that it keeps adding helter-skelter for no reason, now must be cut back. If the NDP had made the decision two, three and four years ago it would not have that problem.

We made those decisions two, three and four years ago. It was not easy for us to say to our public servants: We are sorry, your salary is frozen. We got the static. Certainly in my riding as an MP I got the static. We froze the salaries of the federal Public Service while the provincial public service was getting salary increases of 8 per cent, 10 per cent and 12 per cent. Nobody knew where the money was coming from, and it is rather evident today that the provincial government still does not know where it is coming from. It is now trying to figure out ways of not having to pay the salaries by some new thing called a social contract. It will be interesting to see just what that says. Is there some polite way of saying to people: We are sorry, you cannot have a raise? I guess they will find out what it is. It will be interesting to see.

The member for Kingston and the Islands really wants to participate in this debate. I have no doubt that as soon as my time is up he will get up on his feet and have some really energizing ideas about how he agrees with us controlling our spending. I will ask him maybe to stand up and indicate whether he agrees that we ought to control spending because that is fundamentally what Bill C-93 is about. It controls expenses.

In Canada we have a multiplicity of boards and agencies which no longer serve a purpose or serve a purpose that can be delivered in a different fashion. Bill C-93 proposes to amalgamate, to change, to consolidate and to allow some things to be delivered in a different fashion.

All the speakers seemed to have spent an awful lot of time discussing the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. I am sorry that the government is even keeping the group going because if I took some time to do a survey of my constituents to see just how much money this group ought to get my constituents would say to give it nothing. I might have some sympathy for that position, but I also understand that although some of these agencies may not serve a purpose that I personally agree with there are other interests and other needs that need to be served in Canada and this agency does that.

The member talks about reports about phone calls and whether there will be a saving as a result of the merger of the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. I noticed that the parliamentary secretary tabled a letter from the Canada Council on that very subject this morning.

It is important to understand that we have operated in a fashion so that all these boards and agencies are at arm's length from government. We give them a certain amount of money, a budget, and they are to operate as they see best with that money.

I have a copy here of a letter that was issued by Paule Leduc. It is really quite clear and I do not know why the member would question this. I would like to read two paragraphs from it because it is rather relevant and it is from the Canada Council. The letter reads:

> Following our discussions concerning future savings resulting from the merger of SSHRC and the Canada Council I think we can reasonably expect that ongoing savings in the order of $5 million annually could be achieved after four to five years of the existence of the new combined agency.
> It is also expected that savings will occur earlier in the process, probably as soon as year three. But at this stage I cannot give a definite amount.

The letter goes on a bit but the important point is that we are setting the stage. We may not today see a specific saving that results in a reduction in this year's budget but we all know as members of Parliament that three, four or five years from now there are going to be people out there saying: We want x, this is something new and we need some money to deal with it. The Government of Canada will want to respond to that.

• (1325)

What I read here is that there could potentially be a saving of some $5 million in this program which could be used to reduce the taxes of all Canadians, which I am sure many of us in this House would like to do, or the $5 million could be used to satisfy the concerns of the member for Kingston and the Islands. I am sure he has some pet project for which he would love the Government of Canada to come into his riding and spend some money. Unfortunately he will not be here in three or four years to encourage that $5 million to be spent, but needless to say when we have the ribbon cutting in his riding we will probably send him an invitation if he is still in Kingston.

I think it is important. Why is the government doing these things? Let us talk about the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

Mr. Duhamel: It is trying to get elected and you know it.

Mr. Soetens: Now we are hearing from Manitoba. It is always interesting to have input from members on the other side. They continue to oppose any method of government restraint. They will stand up and argue against billion dollar cuts. Here they are arguing about one that is not necessarily going to cut a program. It is going to save through efficiencies in the delivery of the programs some $5 million. They are arguing against that. It does not come as a surprise to me because they would argue against anything that saves money. They would certainly argue in favour of everything that spends money as long as it is being spent in their ridings.

Why is the government doing this? The two councils have the same function. The Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council have the same function. They are both granting councils. By granting councils we mean that they take taxpayers' money and give it to somebody for a project, whatever that project is. They decide whether the project is worthy or not. They both use a process of review in which they bring individuals into the process to determine whether the program or the idea should be funded, whether they should give a grant. It has worked in the past. They were together for some 25 years. Why should they not be together today?

Bringing them together will in the long run, as has been clearly indicated by Dr. Leduc from the Canada Council, save the taxpayers some $5 million.

Mr. Milliken: What utter rubbish.

Mr. Soetens: They are opposed to that over there. Of course the member for Kingston and the Islands says nonsense. He is not interested in saving money. That is what the nonsense is about in this debate.

It goes a little further than that. We will arrive at the $5 million saving by combining two administrative and support structures, things like personnel, financial, and information. We are going to roll that all into one agency. We are going to have a single governing council of 21 people rather than two councils for a combined total of 43. That is an excellent saving.

They will not need double the space. They will use less space and therefore lower the costs. There will be streamlined procedures and simpler, more flexible financial management.

We can make all those changes and not affect the interests of the artists or social scientists.

The mandate of the new council will combine the powers and functions of the two existing councils and maintain the arm's length relationship with the government. Hopefully in the budget next Monday the Minister of Finance, if he takes some advice I have extended to him, will make sure it has a little less money to deal with. That would be just fine as well.

Whatever money it will have to deal with it will be able to do so at arm's length from the politicians, whether they are Conservatives, Liberals, the NDP, Reform, Bloc Quebecois, Independent, or whoever else sits on that side of the House. Those are very positive steps.

There are some other things in this budget. I realize the opposition thinks there is only one agency being wound up. After listening to their speeches one would certainly have that impression. There are some other agencies that are being wound up that are very good. Some of the wind-ups do not save an awful lot of money. If it is possible to reduce one person here, two people there and four in another area, all those things cumulatively add up to a very beneficial saving. Conversely what has happened in Ontario with the NDP, as we have found, is that one person is added here, one person there, six here, eight there and ten there, or 500 here and 1,000 there. Before we know it we have to figure out how to find 8,000 positions or 10,000 positions to cut. That is the problem the NDP in Ontario has to face.

We in Ottawa are saying that we realize the problem and that is why, certainly in the last two budgets and hopefully in the one next Monday, we will continue to find places where we are prepared to tighten the budget as it should be done.

One agency that is being wound up is the Petroleum Monitoring Agency. Its functions are being undertaken by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which will continue to analyse confidential reports from the industry on the state of petroleum supplies and pricing.

Do we need that separate agency? Do we need two or three people or in fact the eight people involved in that particular agency? I would suggest we do not need that. Do we really care? I do not care who owns the gas station at the end of the street. If I see a gas station I am going to pull in and I am going to buy gas.

I am not opposed to foreign investment. Maybe others in this House are and that is fine. That is their prerogative. I know that in my constituency and in many constituencies across the country foreign investment has played an integral part in providing opportunities for jobs, development, new initiatives and new ideas. I do not think we particularly need this agency. I would be quite happy to have it go.

Another one that is going is Emergency Preparedness Canada. We have a Department of National Defence. Hopefully it can handle whatever emergency we might have to deal with. This group is being rolled back into the Department of National Defence. It will deal with co-ordination of civil emergency preparedness. In this day and age of reduced problems we have to take control.

The Procurement Review Board, the Canadian Commercial Corporation, Agricultural Products Board, Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation and the Intellectual Property Tribunal and a whole series of other boards are being wound up. That is absolutely great. I wish I had more time to convince all these people opposite about the merits of this bill, but I respect my time has now ended.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to my colleague with a great deal of interest. Most speakers on this side of the House, if not all of them, have said there has not been any concrete proof that this reorganization would give the savings alleged by the government side.

Different figures have been bandied about: $5 million a year and $1.5 million a year. Let us just cast these figures aside and look in a general sense at what this means.

The government is trying to create an atmosphere that it wants to trim, cut and streamline. If I could see one shred of evidence this is in fact what it is doing, I could vote for this legislation, but that evidence is lacking. When we do not see an apparent benefit, why change the structure?

There are some benefits. I would ask my colleague to consider the benefits of reorganization in a different sense, benefits which are obvious to most Canadians and things that the government could do right away. I am not going to be talking about the helicopter situation. I do not know how many times we have spent the $5 billion or $6 billion over and over and over. Other things could be done which would probably be more logical.

I have a question for my colleague. Why not combine the Ministry of Finance and Revenue Canada? Why not give the provinces that already are dealing with tourism this power completely, not have a Tourism Canada and let the provinces be responsible?

• (1335)

Over the past 25 years I have dealt with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs as a consumer protection advocate. Why not let it be decentralized and let the provinces be responsible for corporate affairs as they are right now for financial institutions and for consumer protection? I have been very much impressed by what the provinces have done in the area of consumer protection.

I am saying this in a non-partisan way to my hon. colleague. Has he considered it? Would he be able to vote for an elimination of the doubling up of services which are costing us so much nowadays?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly a very appropriate question. I will very quickly respond to it.

Although the hon. member has not seen the savings that may emanate from Bill C-93, his colleague did receive a letter from the Canada Council indicating savings of some $5 million. There were savings of about $1 million by the consolidation of the RCMP Public Complaints Commission, which is very important, and the Canada Commercial Corporation savings of $1 million. He is voting against savings which are small but nonetheless there.

Now he asks me whether I would support the merger of finance and revenue. Mergers of a number of departments would be very appropriate. For example, merging the Revenue Canada operation of sales tax with the provincial operation of sales tax would be very important. That proposal would be interesting in that it makes an awful lot of sense. I am sure we will bring that forward in our next mandate. Unfortunately the hon. member will not be here. However, if he were here, I know full well he would be standing on his feet, voting against the very proposal that today he asks us whether we would support.

A number of those kinds of ministries could be folded into each other if they are federal jurisdiction. In some cases we may do some things federally that can be better done provincially. I would hazard to say that some things which are done provincially may be better done federally. We have a massive shopping mall complex in my riding that went bankrupt because the financial institution providing the funding was not regulated federally. I am not sure it might not have happened anyway, but at least we have federal regulators who may have prevented it from happening.

When that institution went broke it took some 5,000 senior citizens' money out of the Niagara Peninsula with it. By letting the federal government regulate all financial institutions, whether they are banks, trust companies or insurance companies, by letting it take on the whole gamut, we would benefit by a reduction of duplication.

I know full well that when we bring those ideas forward in the next Parliament, those who managed to survive the next election on the other side will rise to their feet to vote in opposition to every one of those ideas.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my colleague mentioned the Expenditure Control Act. I was wondering if he could comment on the efficiency of the act when virtually every single year since they have been in government they have had a deficit in excess of $30 billion. Just to make sure we understand each other, that is over $30,000 million short every single year. What an efficient piece of legislation.

Would he not agree that the Expenditure Control Act is flawed? Just as with this one they pretend it is going to be doing something it is not going to do to try to persuade Canadians that they should come back to their side. Canadians will not be fooled. They will not be fooled again.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely right. We have had some very large deficits in the country, all of them a direct result of compound interest on the debt left by the opposition.

It is interesting. The spending control bill he is critical of basically says to the government that—

Mr. Duhamel: Nobody believes that any more. It is nonsense.

Mr. Allmand: The Canadian people will decide. Let's have an election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I cannot hear the hon. member. The hon. member for Ontario has the floor. Anybody else who wants to get up for a question or comment will have a turn.

• (1340)

Mr. Soetens: The spending control act in fact takes the existing programs of the Government of Canada and says that they will not spend more than about 2.5 per cent in each of the following three years. That bill only came into effect last year. I note that it really was not very well supported by the opposition at that time.

When the minister brings down his budget next week I presume he will stick to the requirement that we will not exceed the limitations within the spending control act. I look forward to the member suggesting next week that the government was right on, that it honoured its spending control commitment not to increase spending even though I know that if there are some cuts in the budget, and I hope there are, that member, along with his colleagues, will stand in the House and vote against every one of those spending cuts without even knowing what they are.

I can say today that the people on that side of the House will vote against every spending cut. As brilliant, as well conceived, as much as it is wanted by the people of the country, those members over there will stand to vote against all our cuts.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in third reading of Bill C-93 and being able to follow my learned and distinguished colleague from Ontario. He has made a number of observations on government restraint and government cutbacks as they relate to the deficit.

My colleague opposite comes to this Chamber with great sincerity and with perhaps a sense of false security about his future which is obvious to all those who understand the political nature of the country. We also know that repeatedly the hon. member for Ontario has shown himself to be a man who has focused himself and his political career, short lived that it will be, on the elimination of the deficit.

The hon. member in achieving his goal of deficit elimination has not been very successful because he and his colleague, particularly the President of the Treasury Board who happens to join with us today, have been inept. I am forced to use the word and regrettably so, but I am sure you will understand, Mr. Speaker. They have been incompetent in understanding the game or the practice of how to reinvigorate an economy which has been in recession for an extended period of time. I have listened and I have learned from members opposite that they do not possess the political will or the know-how to address the issue of deficit reduction.

Deficit reduction is directly related to economic growth. Without economic growth there will not be a reduction in the deficit. Somehow the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Agriculture who travel the world in various forms have not learned or do not understand that we must have a growing economy to reduce the deficit.

We have heard from minister after minister, leadership candidate after leadership candidate, that their only purpose in public life is to cut, cut, cut. If we were to follow the logic of the opponent of the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of the Environment who says he will eliminate the deficit in four years, we would have to get rid of old age security. We would have to do away with medicare. We would have to do away with veterans affairs. Is that what they want in this country? I think the answer is no.

• (1345)

I am a little reluctant to say anything further on the remarks of the hon. member for Ontario who is not here at the moment, but he has made some outlandish statements with regard to controlling the deficit. He makes specific reference to Bill C–93. In his remarks he said: "Another board that will save lots of money is Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation".

I spoke on this matter at second reading as well as at report stage and I presented a number of amendments thereto which unfortunately were not accepted by members opposite. Nevertheless, I think it is worthwhile to note that that particular agency was earmarked to be a tool for economic development on the island of Cape Breton.

It is not I but the Tory senator who for all practical purposes is now running the campaign for one of the leadership hopefuls, the Minister of National Defence. The senator in question is Senator Lowell Murray of the other place. He is the gentleman who said not less than five years ago in the Hansard of the other place that Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation was a nation-building exercise. It was a nation-building measure, to be certain. That is what he said then. It was to foster economic development in an area of the country stricken with high unemployment. In fact, just the other day the statistics became available. It is 29.4 per cent, a shamefully high level of unemployment.

What is the government's response to that? It does away with the very corporation it put in existence several years before which had the mandate to increase, develop and facilitate economic development. Now it is doing away with that. It does not make sense. It does not make sense to the people in Saskatchewan. It does not make sense to the people in Quebec. It does not make sense to the people in Ontario nor the Canadians who happen to live on the island of Cape Breton.

I would have thought that since the senator in the other place is such an influential individual that the Minister of Finance would have seen his way and said: "We better go back and look at what has been said about this corporation and maintain it for its purposes are laudable. Its goals ought to be achievable and its results, if obtained, will have an immediate and positive impact on a society of our country", but that has not happened at all. In point of fact the Government of Canada is doing away with it because it does not enjoy the support. I say so. You, Sir, being a distinguished and learned person of this Chamber might find my remarks to be somewhat cynical.

However, that agency is no longer in existence because it does not enjoy the support of the federal cabinet minister from Central Nova. It does not enjoy the support of the province of Nova Scotia, particularly the premier, Mr. Don Cameron. Those two individuals have been grossly, and I underline the word grossly, negligent. They have shown wanton disregard for those individuals living in that area of the country. By not standing up and fighting openly and publicly for the reinstatement of this agency, that for me, my constituents and the people living next door to me is a demonstrable sign that the compassion one expects from a national government just does not exist for those across the way.

I say that with great regret because there are good Tories. There are good Tories in my district. There are good Tories on the island of Cape Breton. I ask my good Tory friends: Do you agree with this measure to choke off this agency whose sole purpose was to create and enhance economic development? Do you now agree with the government of the day that it is no longer useful to maintain this particular operation?

I would have thought that the Minister of Agriculture would have stood in his place today and taken me to task for some of the comments I have made about him and his role in terms of the government cutbacks. However it falls now to the President of the Treasury Board to stand in his place and say that his colleagues have done the right thing, that the senator in the other place was either lying to the people of Canada, in particular to the people of Cape Breton, or as they say in my district and I say with great regret, that the senator in the other place was being careless with the truth.

We know that not only was he careless with the truth but he was also doing it for the sole political purpose in 1988 of trying to win seats in the province of Nova Scotia. Today they are capitulating to the provincial government of Don Cameron by doing away with Enterprise Cape Breton. The sole reason is that it is a political manoeuvre by the provincial premier and the hon. member from Central Nova. It is to punish those of us who have seen the wisdom as hundreds of thousands of Canadians have registered from coast to coast that the government opposite is not just incompetent, it no longer deserves the support of the Canadian people.

We are being punished as a society. The President of the Treasury Board has a great knowledge of the distinct society and what it means for the province of Quebec. I hope he will tell those individuals in Cape Breton who also believe themselves to be a distinct society in many respects as to why they are being denied the opportunity to fully participate in the Canadian economy. I hope the minister will have the intestinal fortitude to stand in his place moments from now and defend this reckless and wanton disregard for a people whose region has an unemployment rate of 29.4 per cent.

Is it fair, Mr. Speaker? I know you, Sir. I have known you for a long time. You are distinguished and you are learned. You are responsible and fair. Is it fair? Is it fair to cut people adrift?

Now the minister will stand in his place and he will take out one of his pieces of paper and he will say: "This is what we have given those people down there. They are on Canada pension. They are on Canada pension disability. We have done this for Devco and we have done that".

We are not looking for handouts. We are looking for an opportunity to participate fully in the Canadian economy. We do not need any minister of the Crown doing the shameless things that have been done to the people of Cape Breton over the last number of years and more recently with the elimination of this particular development agency.

I say through you, Mr. Speaker, to all ministers opposite. I stand here today and I speak for those thousands of young people who are without work, whose only hope is to migrate out of that area to somewhere else. Then again the Canadian economy is so weak that there is nowhere else where the talents they have to offer can be accepted. I speak for the senior citizens down there who wish that their sons and daughters had an opportunity to make a meaningful life and to participate fully in the Canadian economy. I speak for the coal miners and all of those resource people in my constituency and other constituencies who wish to have meaningful work so that they can make a contribution to their community, a contribution that many of us take for granted.

However, cutting this agency adrift will do absolutely nothing to enhance economic development. It will retard economic development on the island of Cape Breton.

• (1355)

I hope as this debate comes to an end the real reason will be given clearly in this Chamber. It is that we are being penalized in Cape Breton by the minister from Central Nova and the premier of the province, Don Cameron, because of the way in which we have voted in previous elections.

This was supposed to be the new wave, a different way of doing business, but it is the old practices of the Mulroney government at best, the Diefenbaker regime, and of course the Stanfield years in the province of Nova Scotia: Hit often but hit low; hit those that are least able to stand for themselves and hit those areas of the country that are least able to engender and to foster economic development.

That is what Bill C–93 does. It eliminates the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation. It eliminates those jobs and that purpose from government and from the national government. When I hear the hon. member from Ontario who stood in his place not moments ago and just made a passing reference, does he wonder why there is such antipathy? Does he wonder why there are such ill feelings toward other regions of the country, when we are treated like second class citizens? We do not want to be treated like second class citizens, because we are not second class citizens. It is high time that the government opposite took that into careful consideration when planning its mandate and election platform.

I fear that with this continual erosion of an economic base and the consistent and persistent battering of a community that there are very few alternatives left for that society to take. I make mention of civil disobedience, not to condone it, make no mistake about that.

However, I have seen far too many unemployed young people, far too many students who do not have sufficient income to pursue a post–secondary education, far too many senior citizens who do not have sufficient moneys to care for themselves and their families, far too many residents without the appropriate housing, far too many municipalities without the appropriate infrastructure. I have seen an uncaring, unwilling and untrusting government which has once again played its hand in a very negative way against the people of my district and indeed the people of Cape Breton.

Mr. Speaker, in the time that I have remaining which you have indicated is approximately 20 minutes—oh, two minutes, I am sorry. I thought there might be unanimous consent for me to continue.

An hon. member: There is.

An hon member: There is not.

Mr. Dingwall: I say to the members opposite that I will be travelling in the province of Nova Scotia during the next number of weeks. I will be in my own district campaigning on behalf of my party. I am sure hon. members opposite will be doing the same. I have never said and I have never played the game that the Tories opposite have been playing. I said in this House and in the public forum that it is a shameful act for the Government of Canada to play one poor region off against another poor region.

I want to say that some day, somewhere, in the next number of years there will be the opportunity for a debate with the provincial premier and I hope the member for Central Nova, if he has the intestinal fortitude or the guts, as we say in my district. I will have the opportunity to debate and discuss with them in an open public forum the ways in which they have divided our province.

I say to the House with all the sincerity I can muster, that it is not fair, it is not just, it is not in the public interest to be devastating one area of a province to assist another at its expense. It is a shameful act. It will be remembered as a shameful act. It will be written as a shameful act.

I will be there, whether in public life or not, defending the best interests of a people whose over-all objective is not to seek handouts from the Government of Canada but to be full partners in participating in the Canadian economy and making a contribution to their community as their ancestors have done and as generations of Cape Bretoners have done before them.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on what was said by my hon. colleague.

He said the government was incompetent in the way it planned its budget. I must say I agree with him, but I was somewhat surprised at the reaction of one of our government colleagues, who said that whenever the opposition had a chance to vote in favour of cutting or streamlining government spending, they systematically voted against these measures.

I have been here for only three years, but I remember that at one point, we did have a unanimous vote in the House, when members of the various parties endorsed and supported a number of government bills.

I have the following question for my colleague: would he agree that the government is wrong to say that the opposition always opposes the government? Could he mention a few instances of almost unanimous co-operation on certain bills? As you know, we are here to protect the interests of all Canadians, not to oppose legislation as a matter of course.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague for the question. He asked an important question.

My colleague should not be sucked into the ideology of the right which says in its essence, in its very form, that the only manner in which a deficit can be cut is to eliminate programs. Yes, there are programs. Yes, there are cuts that one could say, intellectually speaking that is, that we would agree with. However, where the Canadian economy is at the present time has to be one aspect of a much broader picture.

There is a crisis with the deficit but there is a crisis in unemployment. There is a crisis with interest rates in terms of the spread between Canada and the United States. The monetary policies of the government have not added anything. The mere fact is that the government has said its sole purpose was to fight inflation. You must have not only one goal, you must have several goals. It must be a balanced approach. Yes, there has to be deficit reduction, but it cannot be done in isolation from other things. We cannot forget the unemployed, as my leader said quite aptly.

If you listen to the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of the Environment, Mr. Speaker, by getting rid of Veterans Affairs, old age security and medicare and have an unemployment rate of 25 per cent, you know what you have, you have a revolution on your hands. People are not going to put up with that. Therefore, it must be a balanced approach.

• (1405)

I say affirmatively to my colleague in answer to his first question that it must be part of a balanced program taking other matters such as unemployment, interest rates, property values, what have you, into consideration.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am enjoying the comments of the member from Cape Breton. I think the point I made when discussing report stage is that while the government again justifies the move as one with increased efficiencies, the documents obtained under freedom of information do not show any savings whatsoever. That is the estimate of Treasury Board.

Earlier today we heard the parliamentary secretary white-washing the study from Treasury Board, saying it was done before the government announced this decision. I find this strange reasoning on his part because Treasury Board figured it was going to cost a million dollars to do away with the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation.

I also appreciate his remarks that we are going to have increased inefficiencies. It is going to prevent the local people from having some control over their own destinies and development. While we have seen the government attempting to cut the deficit and the budget by slashing and burning, invariably it has had the opposite effect because the accumulated debt has doubled during its mandate.

Obviously its attempts at deficit reduction has the opposite effect. I would suspect as well that the move they are making with the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation will have the opposite effect. It will not increase efficiency but will increase inefficiencies. It will not save money. It will cost more money. As well it will further create the sense of lack of power of the people of Cape Breton.

I know the member is a senior member of the Liberal Party and involved in decision-making. Earlier today I was made aware that the Canadian Federation for the Humanities has addressed a letter to his leader, asking if the Liberals should form the next government or be involved in forming the next government, would a Liberal government undertake to dismantle what Bill C-93 does. Of course the humanities are particularly concerned with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council being folded into the Canada Council.

During second reading of this bill I asked a member of the Liberal Party what the position of the Liberal Party would be and was given the assurance that a Liberal government would undo what this government is attempting to do in Bill C-93. I wonder if the hon. member for Cape Breton can give us as well the assurance that a Liberal government would do everything in its power to separate again the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council from the Canada Council.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, there were a lot of questions in the preamble to which one could respond. In essence my hon. friend has asked me as a lonely MP in a great political party whether or not I believe this could be reinstated or restored under a Liberal government. He used a phrase which I think I have to explain "if" we become the government.

I would hope that my hon. friend, when we are on that side of the floor and they are over here as the Official Opposition in the next Parliament, will support us in our attempts to reinstate the pith and substance of Bill C-93 which has, I believe, far-reaching concerns in terms of the efficiency of the government but also certainly will have, if it goes through as I anticipate it will, negative effects. The answer to my hon. colleague's question is that we will attempt with urgency, dispatch, vigour, enthusiasm but within a sense of realism, the objectives that we believe to be important.

• (1410)

I emphasize that some of those objectives have been edified by my colleague from St. Boniface. We will attempt as best we can to try to reinstate some of the agencies that the government has done away with.

I would hope reciprocally that my colleague to the far left will support us in our attempt as we become, after the next election, the government and the NDP becomes the Official Opposition. The members across the way will become the third or fourth party.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that no member of the government sees fit to rise to participate in the debate at this stage. I can understand why.

We have had two apologies from the government for a bill that frankly ought not to be before the House. It is really a shocking piece of legislation and I have had occasion to say so before.

I am delighted to have this opportunity to participate today in spite of the absence of government members from participation. I am glad to see some here. It is unusual on a Friday afternoon to have so many. That is very nice.

An hon. member: They came to hear you Peter.

Mr. Milliken: I would like to think that was true. It probably is not but I appreciate the thoughtfulness of his comment.

I know the President of the Treasury Board may have come for my speech because I know he enjoys my speeches. That is all right. I do not want to be immodest, as the hon. member would suggest.

What surprised me as I prepared my remarks for today's debate was the amazing fact that I found a newspaper article to support the Liberal Party's position from a Tory pamphlet writer. Our good friend, Jeffrey Simpson, who writes a frequent column in The Globe and Mail and who is invariably writing columns that support the government's position, has written one that criticizes the government's position on this bill.

I urge the ministers and the members in the House on the other side to heed what Mr. Simpson said. Normally, as they all know, he is writing apologies for the blundering errors and gaffs that the government makes on such a regular basis. Today he has written something which says the government has made a mistake. He says the opposition parties are quite right to kick up a fuss. That is the concluding statement in the column. We are getting up and kicking. We have been kicking on this but the government has brought in closure as it usually does on unpopular measures.

Mr. Belsher: Time allocation, entirely different.

Mr. Milliken: It restricts debate. Lately on every unpopular bill the government has used closure.

The extraordinary thing is the government House leader who pretends to be so interested in Parliament got two bills through the House the other day with practically no debate. Things just went sailing through, three bills in one day. Yet we have closure for the rest of the week on both stages of this bill.

I suggest this is not the way to run Parliament. This is an abuse of the process of the House. One day on third reading and a Friday at that is not enough time for debate on a bill of the importance that parts of this bill have.

I see the hon. member for Ontario sitting there and grinning from ear to ear with this Cheshire cat grin.

Mr. Soetens: I wanted to hear your speech.

Mr. Milliken: He has come back for my speech. I recognize that. I enjoyed his and I know he enjoyed my heckling.

I want to say to him that his speech was not convincing. He talked about some of the parameters of the bill as ones that would produce great savings for the Government of Canada. We are saving $15 million by this tremendous package that we are passing today. I believe it is $15 million over five years.

Mr. Belsher: It's a start in the right direction.

Mr. Milliken: I can understand why the government House leader is using closure. He does not think this bill is very important. In some ways it is not because it is not saving very much money. It is probably costing us more to debate it in the House than it will save over the five years.

Mr. Soetens: Sit down then and we'll double the savings.

Mr. Milliken: That is beside the point. It is typical of the government and it is typical of the Government Expenditure Restraint Act it introduced, which was a lot of nonsense too, as I suggested to the hon. member in his speech earlier. I want to talk about this bill. There are some positive aspects to it. I have said that before. I said it at second reading stage. What is wrong with this bill is that the government is merging SSHRC with the Canada Council.

• (1415)

There was evidence tendered before the legislative committee that studied this particular bill. I wish the hon. member for Ontario had read the evidence before that committee before he made his speech. I think he might have recanted some of the statements he made. Really, he got carried away.

What happened in this case is that the minister quailed at the prospect of appearing before the committee to try to defend this policy. He sent some of his minions to appear before the committee to try to explain away the government's policy.

These minions were left in a terrible position because I suspect that they had the brains to disagree with the policy. I suspect that they realized that somebody had thought this up the night before the budget and stuck it in at the last minute in some effort to make it look as though the government was doing something to save money by abolishing some 40 organizations. I think that is what the government trumpeted in the budget speech. It was going to merge, amalgamate or phase out all these government organizations. This is the second bill we have had in implementing the budget in that respect.

In spite of all that, in spite of all this window dressing, the total savings as a result of these changes amounts to $15 million over five years. That is $3 million a year if I have figured that out correctly. What a bonanza: $3 million a year when the deficit is $35 billion a year. This is this government's idea of saving money and cutting back.

The government says that we vote against all its efforts to save money. I think that even it might understand why we voted against saving $3 million when it is running a deficit of $35 billion, which it told us would be gone by this year when it had its first budget back in 1984.

Mr. Soetens: You and I were not here.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for Ontario is right. He and I were not here. Here is the interesting thing. I was not here back in the Trudeau years either, which he and the Prime Minister keep blaming for all the country's ills. Yet he points at me every time and says: "It is those big spending Liberals". He puts me into this kettle of fish.

I fully support my party and I am not embarrassed by the record. I could suggest to him that he ought to be ashamed of his government's record. It was not just pre-1988 because the same blundering incompetence has continued uninterrupted without even a suggestion of a hint of change since 1988. It has carried on right until now and that is why we have this serious financial crisis in Canada. This bill is supposed to be doing something about it but in fact it is doing almost nothing.

Look at the estimates that were presented in committee. The hon. member for Ontario in his speech this morning said that this particular item, this SSHRC-Canada Council merger, was going to save $5 million over five years. Where he got this figure, I do not know. Certainly the minions that the minister sent to the committee did not come up with that figure. I would like to quote Mr. Patriquin from page 33 of issue number 1 of the committee's proceedings.

The hon. member is waving some paper at me. I am sure the government members have dug up something since because they had to go and do some research to back up the answers that could not be given at this committee.

Let me read what Mr. Patriquin said in answer to the question:

> The estimates of savings were made by the officials, acting in preparation for a budget, and there would be no studies that I understand could be released on that subject.

I presume Mr. Patriquin said that because the government does not release pre-budget studies. Fine, but I suspect also that there were not any. Then he said:

> There are other studies that have been referred to that were the genesis of at least one of the proposals referred to earlier, which is indeed in the public domain, I believe. But we would have no particular studies on costing of these savings that are to be released. It has essentially been part of the normal resource allocation process in government.

In other words, for this particular item it had almost nothing to back up the calculated savings.

In fact, earlier on Mr. Patriquin in his testimony suggested that of all the ones they had costed, all the ones they had predicted savings for, this was the one that was least well prepared. In other words they really had no idea that they would save anything whatever by amalgamating SSHRC with the Canada Council.

As my very distinguished colleague from Mount Royal pointed out in the course of her questions before the committee, these two bodies that had once been together are now divorced. Somehow the hon. member for Ontario was trying to suggest that because they had been divorced then it was logical to put them back together.

• (1420)

That makes as much logic as suggesting to some married couple that has been divorced that they should remarry. They may want to, but if they do not want to we do not force them. Yet the government is forcing these bodies to do that. Neither wants it, neither asked for it and neither was consulted as to whether they would even consider it. The government just announced this silly policy in a budget speech. The Minister of Finance did not know what else to suggest because he was so bankrupt of ideas on how to save any money and how to manage the Canadian economy in any sensible way. This whole bill is a disgrace.

I have an open letter that was sent by the Social Science Federation of Canada to some members of Parliament who had the good sense to oppose this bill. It is signed by some 25 very distinguished Canadian academics who are appalled that the government would proceed in this high-handed way to deal with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council.

Mr. Soetens: From Queen's.

Mr. Milliken: One of them is from Queen's, the hon. member for Ontario is correct, but most of them are not. Most of them are from other universities across the country. I realize there may not be one in Whitby but I suspect that if he looked and dug a little deeper he might find that some of these people live in his constituency. In any event, there are people from the University of Toronto, University of Ottawa, University of British Columbia, Université de Montréal, Acadia University, Sir Wilfred Laurier University, University of Guelph, Carleton University, Dalhousie University, Université Laval, University of Regina, University of Calgary and I could go on.

These people are appalled that this government would fail to listen to the voices of Canadians in the social science community of this country who feel their independence is being done away with and who see, in the short-sighted goal to save possibly $500,000 over five years and no more, that this government is selling them down the river. It shows a complete disregard for arts funding in this country and for interest in the arts and social sciences. By lumping these two together the government is ignoring the pleas of these people to leave them alone and let them continue to do their jobs. Indeed, all they get met with is a group of cuts.

I see my very distinguished colleague from Winnipeg South Centre has appeared to participate in this debate. Given the time limitations that I fear may be in place because of the use of closure, I would be happy to give the remaining 10 minutes of my 20 minutes to him so that he could make his remarks subject to the question and comment period that I know will follow.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I just have a very brief comment and question for my colleague.

My colleague has indicated that a number of prominent Canadians have condemned this particular bill. Does he know of any prominent Canadian from any of those communities, the artistic, academic or research communities, who has supported this bill? If so, would he please name that individual.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I will admit to knowing one. It is the government House leader. I understand he has a Ph.D. in chemical engineering. I believe Dr. Andre has supported this bill.

Some hon. members: Who?

Mr. Milliken: Dr. Harvie Andre, the government House leader. However he is the only academic of any stature that I am aware of who has supported this bill.

Mr. Duhamel: I did say academic stature.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. gentleman does have a post-graduate degree so I am giving him the benefit of the doubt. I realize he is no longer an academic, but I understand—

An hon. member: I do not think he ever was an academic.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member says perhaps he never was an academic. I do not know, but I thought that perhaps many years ago, before his election to Parliament, he was an academic. I do not know what profession he had, but I know that he has these excellent qualifications. He is the only one I know of who supports this bill. No one that I am aware of who is currently teaching in a university supports this bill. I have not heard any support come from the university community in my constituency. There are two of them there.

Queen's University and the Royal Military College are both in Kingston and the Islands and I have had no support indicated for this bill from anyone in those two academic institutions. I have not received any letters of support for this bill from any other academic in any other part of Canada. I have had a fair bit of correspondence on this and I believe it was all in opposition. None of the letters were in support.

To answer my hon. friend's question, aside from the government House leader, whose academic stature could perhaps be questioned as he has been a politician for a long time, I am aware of no one who is supporting this bill.

• (1425)

Frankly, I think if he were not in this House he probably would not support the bill either. However, because he is a member of a cabinet that slashes and cuts all over the place I guess he is supporting it.

I have just been handed a note. There are two other members of the cabinet who have doctorates. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development apparently has some academic qualifications, and he supports it. The Minister of State for Small Businesses also has a doctorate, and he supports it. However there are other academics in this House, including the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who is about to entertain us with his speech. I know he does not support this bill. He has told me how awful this bill is and I am sure he will want to tell the House how awful it is. I am looking forward to his address.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I particularly want to thank my colleague from Kingston and the Islands for his generous invitation to share with the House the very stimulating and passionate exchanges we have had about this bill over the past several months. I can say that I do represent that small but doughty group of people in the House of Commons who came from academic life, albeit a long time ago, and who find the purpose of this bill to be both nonsensical and particularly galling in terms of the objectives set out by the government.

It is interesting that we are debating this bill when a new budget is about to be presented on Monday. There is a very important lesson to be learned in this debate about how not to do budgets. I recall vividly the grand announcements made by the Minister of Finance about all the new mergers, integrations and combinations he was going to make in order to save taxpayers' money.

Bill C–93 was a direct product of that commitment, but lo and behold there is no money to be saved. This is a massive renovation that will substantially undermine the academic external university relations of this country and is to no purpose at all other than cosmetic reasons. It is simply action for its own sake. This is a government that has lost any connection between ends and means. It is unable to relate a piece of legislation to an objective. It is all done with the purpose of trying to create the illusion of action. The end result is to undermine, weaken and erode some very substantial institutions in this country.

I want to speak in particular to an aspect of the bill that has been brought to my attention and which I feel sorrowful about. That is the way in which the international academic relations program of the Department of External Affairs is being torn away from the international foreign policy agency of our country and merged into a new creation without any particular rationale given. Certainly nobody was talked to and nobody was asked for their opinion.

It comes at perhaps one of the most important turning points in the history of this country. We are beginning to realize the impact of globalization and are beginning to understand that the security, prosperity and well–being of this country is now very dependent upon our establishing a whole range of links throughout the world.

One of the most important connections we can make is in the area of academic exchange through having other countries understand more about Canada and having teachers and researchers working in their countries to ensure they understand the benefits of Canadian science, social sciences, humanities and culture. One of the most effective programs for undertaking that outreach on behalf of Canadians to the rest of the world has been the international academic relations program which has ensured a very constant and creative flow of people and ideas emanating from Canada around the world. It is part of our foreign policy. Foreign policy is no longer just a group of diplomats meeting in embassies to talk about affairs of state. Foreign policy is now about the environment. It is about the movement of people. It is about the exchange of ideas. It is about developing new relationships between business and labour and universities and cultural organizations. One of the great and important impulses in the world ahead will be to broaden and enrich that diversity of connections and linkages.

• (1430)

At the time when an institution had been put in place, had been tempered by experience, was in a position to begin developing and expanding its role, what does the Conservative government do? It lops it off, turns it into a new agency, and the end result will be this. This new creation, whatever it is called, CHARC or CASH, I forget what the the acronym will be, is going to have to develop its own international outreach, its own officers, its own officials working in an international context which will compete with our own embassies abroad. We will now have a duplicate of function rather than an integrated function. We will be creating a competitive agency, having to go through all the pangs of start-up, getting new relations established, hiring people and beginning to reinvent the program all over again.

As a serious, rational thinker, Mr. Speaker, can you accept that as good public policy? Does that make sense in your eyes? It certainly does not make sense in the eyes of a wide range of institutions around the world. I have a file full of letters from different universities and research institutes around the world saying this is folly, this makes no sense, the government has gone cuckoo.

If people abroad can recognize that I guess the question is why cannot members of the caucus recognize it? I say to these members, if in the so-called time of constraint you had a legitimate case to make that actually large amounts of money were going to be saved, that it was going to be more efficient and more effective and more realistic and more rational, then all right. However every single piece of evidence, all testimony, every representation made by everybody who appeared before the committee or who have written letters, have said it simply is not going to work.

I put that on the table as an exhibit and a caution, that when we come to the next budget exercise and hear all the grand announcements on Monday, with the great waves of applause emanating from the government benches about the new rationalization, remember Bill C-93. Remember what it does and does not do. It will not save money. It will create duplication, more bureaucracy, more competition at less cost and saving, and undermine a perfectly good program that has worked effectively on behalf of Canadians.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague outlining his reasons for not supporting Bill C-93. He feels, as I feel, there is not sufficient proof to show there would really be that much saving or that much efficiency. I agree with him. I have not seen any proof either.

There has been ample opportunity through the hearings in committee and through the letters we as members of Parliament have received. We have not received one letter showing that there would be substantial savings. If you do not have this kind of proof I do not see how you could support legislation, a bill that purports to make for efficient government administration or one that is supposed to save money.

I have heard that we are talking about $5 million, one and a half million dollars per year. Different amounts of money have been bandied about, and I am not sure really whether those numbers are verifiable or not, but there are some numbers that are verifiable.

• (1435)

In my comment I would just like to say the government will have the opportunity to show how it can streamline, how it can get lean, how it can cut into the deficit with the budget we are expecting some time next week.

There are certain things we could suggest here. One is not to pass Bill C-93 because it is certainly not the kind of approach we would like to see taken, but there are some things the government could do.

Being from Quebec, everyone knows the province of Quebec has been one of the most vociferous provinces in its demands that duplication of responsibilities, organizations and ministries be reduced as much as possible. In a spirit of non-partisanship and in the spirit of just looking logically at the situation, earlier I had asked one of my colleagues on the government side whether we could not look at perhaps fusing the Department of Finance and Revenue Canada.

I would also look at areas such as devolving to the provincial side the control of regional development. That would be very important. It would no longer be a slush fund where different ministers just before an election could create a Hibernia or all sorts of other programs which really do not have much bearing in reality or are not commercially sound.

I believe it is time for us to seriously look at cutting the expense of government but not necessarily the programs. We begin by sending a message to the electorate that we are serious about cutting certain government expenses that can easily be done away with. That is before going into the programs because then there would be no choice. If we do not move right away we will not have to trim programs but we will have to start eliminating them and I do not want to do that.

The question to my colleague is this.

An hon. member: It is about time.

Mr. Edmonston: You are right it is about time.

Does he see anything positive about Bill C-93? One of his colleagues said earlier in committee that he mentioned there were some positive aspects. Does he see anything positive at all or is it just entirely negative?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as I said in my remarks perhaps the most positive thing about the bill is its demonstration of how not to go about streamlining, rationalizing or making change. It has become more of an exercise in futility than an exercise in frugality and that has been part of the problem.

The necessary groundwork was not undertaken to develop an effective program on which we would give grants to culture, social sciences and international academic organizations. No one was consulted. No examination was done. No one was asked for their opinion. It was simply a fiat from the Department of Finance and the minister. I do not know the particular grudge it has against these organizations.

I think it was concocted more in the bowels of a public relations agency in trying to create the fantasy that something was being done to save the taxpayers money as opposed to a serious policy analysis. If there is any heuristic value in this motion—I find it hard both to say the word and attribute such a noble motive to the government—it would be as a good way of how badly it governs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. Shall I call it 2.45 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 2.45 p.m., pursuant to an order made Wednesday, April 21, 1993 in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the third reading stage of the bill now before the House.

The question is on the amendment. It is the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to the order made Thursday, April 22, 1993, the recorded division stands deferred until six o'clock p.m., Tuesday, April 27, 1993.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. The hon. member whose motion was to be debated in private members' hour today unfortunately has fallen ill. She fell ill yesterday and was unable to notify the Speaker because of her illness that she could not proceed today.

Accordingly, the private members' hour will be cancelled when three o'clock arrives. I am willing to call it three o'clock for that purpose. In light of the fact that she is ill, I wonder if there might be unanimous consent to allow her motion to stay in the order of precedence at the bottom of the order of precedence rather than be stricken off the order of precedence altogether.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Accordingly this House now stands adjourned until Monday at eleven o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 2.46 p.m.

PUBLIC SECTOR BONUSES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. Duhamel that Bill C–339, an act to eliminate the payments of bonuses in the public sector of Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Human Resources envelope.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate though my voice does not have its normal strength. I know it will distress all members present that I will be a little more low key than usual. However, this is such an important issue my hon. friend from St. Boniface has brought before the House that I did want to have an opportunity to make a few remarks.

I do not know exactly what his intent is but in reading this proposed piece of legislation I must say I have some concerns. I know it was not his intent to suggest that members of the Public Service of Canada ought not to receive fair, adequate compensation or anything like that. What this bill proposes to do is to take away the principle of incentive in relation to performance. Some people will disagree with that of course but it certainly is my belief that people work best when they have some incentive to do so. Fair compensation for employment and reasonable, safe working conditions are very important.

The advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service known as the Burns group was named after the current chairman, Mr. James Burns, who is deputy chairman of Power Corporation. The group expressed the opinion and strongly held view that there should be a portion of the compensation package for senior executives put at risk, to use the group's expression, so there is some incentive.

I am not suggesting for one minute that people in senior positions in the Public Service of Canada would not give 100 per cent if their salaries were 100 per cent guaranteed. However, I think the concept that people should have incentives to work hard by having a percentage of the compensation made available by way of some sort of a bonus is important.

That is obviously one with which the advisory group agrees. I might say also it is one with which Public Service executives agree. They have agreed to that basis for compensation in their own bargaining process. I am sure it is not the intent of my hon. friend opposite to interfere with the collective bargaining process.

I realize if I start talking about the sanctity of the collective bargaining process I am sure members opposite are going to remind me very quickly it was this government that interfered with that process through the imposition of the wage restraint program on the Public Service a couple of years ago. That restraint program applied not only to members of the Public Service but also to members of this House and all people paid by the government.

That action is not normal practice. Certainly it is not the normal practice of this government because this government respects that the best way for these decisions to be made is through the collective bargaining process on the basis of market demand and so forth.

• (1120)

I simply remind my hon. friend and others who may wish to support this legislation that there is some potential problem inherent in an arbitrary decision being taken by Parliament. Certainly that would fly in the face of the position he and a number of his colleagues took with respect to the public sector contract that was there a year or so ago. I merely bring that to his attention.

Maybe part of the problem lies in the use of the word bonus. A bonus to me is like getting a little prize in a Cracker Jacks box. It is something extra, something one had not necessarily expected and presumably therefore is in addition to what is expected. All that is really expected inside a box of Corn Flakes or Cheerios is the cereal but a little prize might be found inside. That is a bonus because it is something extra. I suspect the root of the legislation in part may be in the use of that particular term when in fact one might prefer the term incentive.

It is important to recall the history of this particular provision. It was taken off the compensation package at the time when this process was implemented so that if there was a salary budget equal to 100 per cent a certain percentage of that was taken back. I believe it was 15 per cent. I may be wrong about my percentages but I am talking about the principle.

What has been done in effect is to not provide a bonus as an add on. The group of employees impacted by this provision is told it is guaranteed a certain amount, which is in fact lower, 85 per cent, and there is the opportunity based on performance to earn an extra amount. I think it is important to bear that in mind.

I recall when the subject of these bonuses came up in the House a year ago, there were very flamboyant speeches by some of my hon. friends about the size of those bonuses. I think that created the context in which people thought this was not an appropriate thing.

It is important for everybody to understand that these bonuses are not an add on. In fact they are a component of the salary package that is and was already there when it was brought in.

Having said that, a bonus which is paid automatically really ceases to be an incentive. It ceases to be what it was intended to be with the use of the nefarious word bonus. If there is concern about this, what would be helpful and might warrant review is some determination or clarification of the criteria by which it will or will not be paid.

It is not easy to determine or quantify progress in some Public Service jobs. These nights whether we want to or not, when we turn on our television sets we are being treated to hockey games. It is very easy to determine whether a hockey player gets a bonus. How many goals did he get last year? How many assists did he get? How many minutes in the penalty box? How many games did the team win? However, it is much more difficult to assess a public servant. Certainly it is difficult to quantify the performance of the individual.

If one is to determine criteria and have a clear process by which decisions will be made as to whether or not people in fact qualify for an incentive, I can understand that. The point to be made is that we must have clear criteria. It must be understood that people have to earn the incentive. It is an assumption that possibly everybody is not going to automatically get it. The automatic aspect to it can also create some progress.

At the same time however, an unattainable incentive is not really an incentive at all. When a compensation system is set up that is targeted at rewarding a person's performance, then that particular criteria should be one that if a legitimate bona fide effort is made by the individual the intent is that he or she will obtain that. In other words, the intent of the process is to encourage high performance by rewarding individual employees for the work they have done.

• (1125)

Administered automatically, it is a very successful system. I think it can be a beneficial system, both for the public servants impacted and Canadian taxpayers. To change that system right now would create quite a disruption. I think that a kind of political mischief was played with the system in this House a year or so ago. Except when that goes on the system works well. It serves Canadians and it serves public servants.

At the same time it provides an opportunity and a recognition for the government to be aware of the fact that Canada does have a high quality of public servants. I think all members of this House will agree that although sometimes when issues get flowing back and forth, people sometimes forget that Canadians are very well served by their public servants. We have some extraordinarily capable people.

In the case of our senior people, the compensation is often not competitive with what might be earned in the private sector. But they are just like members of Parliament. We know when we take the job what the salary and the compensation will be. That is the deal and if one does not like it then do not run for office.

I conclude with those remarks. I commend my hon. friend for bringing forward his initiative. However I cannot support it and I urge fellow members of the House to turn down this proposal also.

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, I have given much consideration to Bill C-339. My constituents are continually expressing concern about our national debt and deficit each year. Therefore, I am always looking for ways to reduce spending. But I also want to take into consideration the effect that any changes we make will have on the efficiency of government and also on the people affected.

I would like to remind everyone that the present situation has the salaries of federal civil servants frozen for three years. This means last year, this year and next year there will be no bonuses paid.

Bill C-339 proposes to eliminate the payment of bonuses in the public sector of Canada. It demonstrates a lack of understanding of the performance bonus system in place for senior public servants.

I would like to briefly go into the history. In 1981 when a management category was created, it was decided to allocate a portion of the senior level's compensation package to annual re-earnable performance awards—or lump sum payments—rather than having these sums permanently built into the base salary.

The advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service, a private sector group made up of senior executives from the Canadian business community, has been providing advice and recommendations to successive governments over the past 24 years.

The advisory group first recommended and still supports the performance bonus approach to pay. The principle that a certain portion of the compensation package for executives should be put at risk, that is individual rewards determined on the basis of their contribution to the organization, is very widespread in the private sector. Performance lump sum awards were introduced for public servants by reducing the salary range maximum to compensate for lump sum performance payments.

• (1130)

Therefore the replacement of the base salary adjustments with bonuses represents a cost saving because the lump sums are not compounded from one year to the next. Performance lump sums do not represent an extra payment but rather an alternative, a more cost efficient and effective method of distributing the same compensation envelope. We are talking about the same compensation envelope.

I would also like to point out that the elimination of performance bonuses would mean moving to a system which provides permanent base salary adjustments equal for all regardless of their level of performance or their contribution to the organization. Not only would this be counterproductive but also unfair and most of all, my greatest concern, more costly.

I would like to add that the passage of this bill would be going against the current trend in the private sector. Many of my constituents have advocated that we go this way. This was reported by the Conference Board of Canada and other consulting firms on the increasing portion of the compensation package that is variable or performance related.

Finally, the proposed act would have the effect of reducing the flexibility of the compensation system in favour of a rigid and more costly method of compensation. The government has the responsibility to ensure that public servants' compensation is fair and equitable compared to compensation paid in other sectors of the Canadian economy while being attentive to the interest of the Canadian taxpayers.

To date, the advice of bodies such as the advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service has been determinant in establishing the current compensation system for executives which is recognized as one of the best systems by many other countries. We should continue to rely on those with the necessary expertise to make compensation recommendations.

I would like to do a synopsis of what this means. The advisory group on executive compensation in the Public Service expressed the opinion that a certain portion of the compensation package for senior executives should be put at risk, in line with the private sector thinking. That is what a number of my constituents are asking for and have continued to ask for.

Directly linked to performance it is misleading to suggest to Canadian taxpayers that the current system is overly generous. It is not. Performance pay does not represent additional compensation. The system of performance pay is looked at in many countries as one of the best systems in the world.

Misconceptions abound about how and why these bonuses are being paid. Performance pay is not a bonus but rather one part of a total compensation scheme for Public Service executives. Five per cent of the total package for Public Service executives is normally set aside for performance pay. I said normally because for three years it has been discontinued temporarily.

• (1135)

Performance pay encourages high performance by rewarding individual employees. It is an effective and economical way of encouraging high performance and is a system recognized as being cost effective.

Bill C-339 would necessarily entail changes to the salary administration plan. Automatic salary increments that are permanently added to a base salary would be a major disruption to a system that has been working well.

I will conclude by saying that I do not see any immediate or prospective gain to be achieved, at this time, by passing Bill C-339.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my colleague from St. Boniface has introduced a private member's bill dealing with a pay item that has been the cause of much frustration. Lump sum payments commonly referred to as bonuses, be they bilingual bonuses, performance bonuses or what not, have been criticized for many years.

Generally, bonuses are paid in respect of performance, which sounds reasonable to me, and in respect of bilingual capabilities, which was a commendable initiative. But over the years we have come to that conclusion. That is why the hon. member for St. Boniface saw fit, and rightly so, to deal with this problem which should have been dealt with a long time ago. Should we pay bonuses to a few supposedly qualified people, Public Service managers, or look at the system as a whole instead and tell all those who are working to make it better, especially by making it more effective and efficient, that they deserve a lump sum payment or bonus?

My colleague made a few points and I agree with him that we should have a fair and equitable system under which all Public Service employees who have helped improve efficiency should get a bonus.

Other organizations that have been overlooked in this analysis would indeed deserve the same deal. My colleague from St. Boniface pointed out to me that some organizations are missing from the list and others, such as the NRC and all other departmental agencies, should be included. In the end, no one should be excluded.

The nearly $66 million paid in bonuses is quite a lot of money. Many people are realizing that big money is spent on bonuses, and many of those who are not getting a bonus do believe they have contributed to improved efficiency. So this is becoming a source of frustration for them, and that is understandable. Over 375,000 people work for the central government throughout the public and parapublic sector in Canada. That is a lot of people. It is essential that we have a system in which the people feel they are all working together and where bonuses are not just for a few managers according to the standards.

The question of course is that these bonuses in relation to individual compensation are disproportionate; the bonuses are very high compared to the salary. So that raises questions. My colleague from St. Boniface wonders if the time has not come to refer this issue to committee where it can be thoroughly examined, because we are not just dealing with a few thousand dollars here, but tens of millions of dollars paid in bonuses. Like my colleague, I believe it is essential to discuss this problem in committee, and in good faith of course, because these are our employees and they deserve that we take a look at the rules and criteria governing the payment of bonuses. I am convinced that the situation can be improved.

Right now there is a perception that this system is not fair. If you stop and think about it, a lot of questions come to mind. Therefore it is important that in a system like ours perception match reality. Right now it does not fit reality and the perception that people have clearly demonstrates that the system is not fair.

One wonders if the system is objective. Of course, in the face of so much criticism, we are led to believe that there is certainly a flaw somewhere. It is therefore very important that in people's minds this system be objective and fair.

As the representative of a constituency located in the national capital region, on the Quebec side where a lot of civil servants reside, I have had the opportunity to hear this issue debated on numerous occasions. I do not claim to know all the elements that should be taken into consideration to solve the problem, because I noticed that there are people who can talk about this issue for hours on end. My colleague from St. Boniface tabled a motion regarding this issue and I do not think it is a partisan initiative. It is absolutely clear that only in committee, with the co-operation of all the parties in this House, will we be able to review this issue thoroughly. Several people have worked on this issue and we must examine the different criteria in order to make this system fair. I am convinced there are ways to achieve this objective.

Moreover, we must ensure that the perception, not only on the federal government's employees' part, but also among the general public, is that the system is fair and objective.

These are essentially the comments I wanted to make altough a lot more could probably be said about this issue. I simply want to mention, for the benefit of all those who get these bonuses as well as for the many who do not, that we want this system to undergo a review. I am convinced that with good faith this can be done, thereby making the system fair for all federal public and quasi-public employees.

[English]

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, there is a question to be asked: Where does fairness begin and where does it end?

The two members on the government side of the House, the member for South Shore and the member for Wild Rose, both said that we must be fairer in dealing with civil servants. I can agree with that. I think we should be fairer, but does fairness begin with the 4,750 managers in the Public Service and stop there? Does it not apply at all to the more than 200,000 who are not managers, who are not affected by this bonus program and who do not benefit from it? They get no bonuses regardless of their performance, but the managers are entitled to bonuses.

The member for South Shore in particular said that it was based strictly on merit and performance and that if it were any other way it would not be proper. I can also agree with that. However I would like to ask the member for South Shore how many of the managers did not get a bonus? How many of the people entitled to participate in this program did not get a bonus? It would be interesting to see what the figures were and also to get some idea of what the ranges were. We know that no one outside the top 4,750 received a bonus, but how many within the group did not get one?

Both members on the government side said that it was not an add-on, that there was a deduction from the pay package and this was made available to them so they could make up what they had lost. They did not deny the possibility that they might come out ahead as well. Again, I would be very interested in seeing the figures to see how much of a deduction there was in anyone's salary before this bonus system came into effect.

I would like to make a small wager with my friend from South Shore, if we could talk about this later. I will bet there was no reduction in salaries put into effect and that people had to prove by their performance before the amount of pay they had been getting for the same work in the same position could be re-established. That is another way in which the program we have now is not fair. It is just not fair to be treating people that way.

The people in managerial positions are the ones who are getting top pay now. They average much in excess of what the people in the bargaining units are getting. Yet the bonus is available only to those in the top brackets, not to those in the lower brackets.

The freeze on salaries for those in the bargaining units will be in effect according to legislation for a period of four years now. For four years they are frozen with no movement at all. Is that fair in light of the fact that it is gradually being eaten away by what is certainly a reduced increase in the cost of living but is still a gradual increase? They are steadily losing some of their salary. Over a period of four years there will be a substantial reduction.

These other people in managerial positions have an opportunity to make that up, and perhaps even a little more, with their performance bonuses. However the people below them are taking all the heat. They are the ones on the firing line, who are dealing with line-ups of people applying for unemployment insurance, who are really stressed out, who are having problems and who are getting paid the least. Many of them are women, women who are the heads of single families. They know their salaries are frozen for a period of four years. Is it fair to them?

If we are talking about being fair to 4,750 managers how could we totally leave out of the discussion the concept of fairness with respect to the more than 200,000 who are doing the work, some of which the managers may be getting credit for when their performance bonuses are calculated? I agree we should be fair, but it is not fair to do what we are doing to the people in the bargaining unit. That is to say to them that they shall do without but those who are in charge of them and who are responsible for them are going to get performance bonuses.

It is not just performance bonuses. Reclassifications are available to people. From what we have heard through problems in our ridings and in our critic areas we know that the people in the upper ranks are being reclassified into higher and higher salary positions while people who are actually on the firing line, sometimes literally, are not.

For example, I am thinking of fisheries officers who are armed in some cases because of the hazards of their occupation. They have been trying for years before this freeze ever came into effect to get reclassification in line with their training and that take into account the hazards of the job, which is hazardous to the extent that in some cases they must carry arms. They cannot get reclassification yet the people who are supervising them, the people who are in the managerial positions, do get reclassifications as well as performance bonuses. Is that fair? I submit it is not. The government's arguments about fairness are falling on deaf ears when it is talking to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 220,000 public servants.

This program, this freeze, was initiated because of the financial condition of the government of the country, because of the amount of money that we owe, particularly internationally. It is not making much difference there but nevertheless it is supposed to make them feel they are part of the campaign to fight the deficit, and eventually to fight the debt one would hope.

Is it fair to freeze the ones at the very bottom of the pay level and say that there will be no adjustment in their pay but the government is going to reward the ones at the top for having suggested that one way of not spending so much within the department was to freeze salaries for the ones at the bottom and to give performance bonuses to the ones at the top?

People will sacrifice. They will do their share to fight the deficit. People will do without. However if they see that this program is being applied unfairly, if the people at the top are continuing to get rewards and the people at the bottom are being denied even the possibility of maintaining their status then they are not going to feel so enthusiastic about fighting the deficit, not if the weight of fighting that deficit is placed on the shoulders of the ones who have no possible way of fighting it and no possible way of maintaining their position.

I suppose one of the things that bothered a lot of them, and we get headlines for this and sometimes perhaps there should not be, was that the Governor of the Bank of Canada had his pay scale increased by something like 25 per cent at the very time at which he was taking credit for having destroyed the economy of southern Ontario and with that eventually the economy of Canada as a whole. He wrestled inflation to the ground, regardless of the cost to Canada, regardless of the increased unemployment, regardless of the fact that the Conference Board of Canada said at the time that it was the first time in history that we were in a made-in-Canada recession. Since then it has become much worse. A performance bonus perhaps, but it was certainly a reclassification to a much higher level of salary.

How can they talk about fairness when they are leaving out of the equation any concept of treating employees fairly in the face of giving managers something extra, when they are allowing certain individuals, heads of Crown corporations for example, to move upward within their ranges and then when they reach the top of the range they increase the range higher so those individuals are able to get regular increases? When the employees see that going on they know it is not fair.

Bill C-339 is an attempt to convince people that there will again be some kind of fairness applied. I am not saying I agree with Bill C-339, after all it is imposing something. It is doing something by handing it down, by giving a reward to somebody on the basis that they have earned a reward. That is not the way of negotiation and we do believe in negotiation.

The government's program is wrong, there is no question about that. This bill might make it look a little better for the time being, but it is not the answer in the long run. The answer in the long run is to deal fairly with everyone. That means everyone, not just the ones at the top or the ones at the bottom but all public servants. That is what this legislation should be trying to accomplish.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party must be going through a period of profound reflection and rethinking its philosophy.

A few moments ago we heard the NDP member for Nanaimo—Cowichan talk about deficit reduction and expenditure control. This is a new departure for NDP members because so far spending and borrowing money has been uppermost in their minds. That is why I was astonished, to say the least, to hear the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan of the New Democratic Party talk the way he did. This is a fundamental change in policy.

To get back to Bill C-339 introduced by the hon. member for St. Boniface, I had a chance to hear the hon. member's arguments when he presented his bill before the subcommittee on private members business. I listened to his arguments very carefully, and I must say, after giving a lot of thought to the purpose of the bill, that the hon. member for St. Boniface failed to convince me it was a good bill. There are a number of reasons for this, which I will try to explain as clearly as possible for the benefit of the members of this House, who will be asked to vote on the bill either later today or later this week.

The purpose of Bill C-339 is basically and specifically to eliminate the payment of performance bonuses in the federal Public Service. First of all, I want to say that as the bill is worded, if it were approved by this House, the government would have to eliminate all bonuses now offered in the federal Public Service, including bilingualism bonuses, isolation allowances or any kind of bonus paid by the federal government to its employees for specific reasons, in addition to performance bonuses.

• (1155)

My hon. colleague's bill would eliminate or abolish these bonuses. There is a whole series of them. I mentioned some just now, like bilingual bonuses, the bonuses for on-the-job training or for working in remote regions of Canada and the bonuses given to those who provide special education, for example.

Of course I am not prepared to approve this bill. I cannot approve it or vote for it because had it just concerned performance and efficiency bonuses I might have given it another look, but eliminating all the other bonuses is reason enough for me not to support it.

Furthermore, the other fundamental point on which the bill causes serious problems is that it goes against agreements reached between the federal government and its employees in collective agreements and collective bargaining. Bonuses are paid which are an integral part of the collective agreements and salary agreements that the federal government has concluded with its employees. For the government, going back on these agreements would simply mean that the employer has decided not to respect that part of the collective agreements and this would be quite unacceptable.

I listened to the argument of the member for Gatineau—La Lièvre who spoke of $66 million paid in bonuses. For the benefit of those listening to us today, Canadian taxpayers, I must say that this money is already in the Public Service salary budget of the managers for whom it is intended. This is not new money that the federal government has to pay. These are not additional amounts that the federal government must provide in its budgets. They are already in the payroll package.

When the bonus system was implement 5 per cent of the Public Service payroll of those for whom these bonuses were meant, the managers who met the program criteria, was set aside to pay the bonuses. This is not new or extra money.

I have thus submitted three reasons for which I must vote against the bill presented by my colleague from St. Boniface. I hope that the other members of this House will recognize that it is important for the federal government to reward its managers who do their jobs well, who look for ways to reduce spending and cut needless expenditures in the Public Service. I therefore trust that hon. members, when they recognize how effective Public Service managers are, will vote against the bill of my colleague from St. Boniface.

[English]

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to be able to take a few moments to speak on Bill C–339 this morning.

There is a perception in the public mind's eye that we are talking today about something that has become part of a system that somehow or another is abusive.

It behoves all of us to speak in defence of senior public servants who have been the recipients of performance pay since 1981, if indeed their performance warranted, to clear up the notion that what we are talking about is not just another Christmas bonus a government has decided to reward its senior managers with.

We have a system whereby senior executives are rewarded much the same as they would be if they were involved in the private sector. It is important that we have the opportunity to attract people who are competent and capable of performing jobs which are vital to the country. We need those who are as interested in becoming public servants as they would be interested in the private sector.

• (1200)

I have hardly begun and my time is already up. I am sorry that I do not have more time to deal with this very important topic, but suffice to say in closing we are fortunate indeed to have senior public servants in place who are professional at their jobs. It is the compensation package in place that in part attracts them to the jobs.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, as reported (without amendment) from the legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are seven motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–109, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Radiocommunication Act, all in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 will be grouped for the purposes of debate and the vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motions Nos. 2 and 3.

Motions Nos. 4 and 7 will be grouped for debate and voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 5 and 6 go beyond the scope of Bill C–109 since they attempt to introduce new concepts into the bill. The Chair must rule them out of order in accordance with citation No. 698(1) of Beauchesne's sixth edition. They will not be selected.

[Translation]

I will now submit Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to the House.

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Before we proceed with the debate on Motions Nos. 1 through 7, I have read and listened very carefully to Your Honour's decision on the grouping of amendments at report stage.

I do accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, however I must express my disappointment. I was wondering whether the Chair could assist in satisfying my concerns by indicating to me whether the Chair and the Table took into consideration that the intent of this particular bill, Bill C–109, in part is to protect cellular privacy, to protect people from the snooping and eavesdropping that occurs out there.

I would like an explanation, if you would not mind, on how Motion No. 4 which deals with the use of scanners was acceptable whereas Motions Nos. 5 and 6 which you have ruled out of order deal with the availability of scanners. In my view they both address scanners and their availability. The one talks about preventing the import, distribution and sale as has been done in the United States in order to control access to the information that is being exchanged on a cellular telephone.

I wonder if the Chair could assist me and perhaps might even reconsider the debate around Motion No. 5.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I understand the hon. member's disappointment, but I want to reassure her that before making its decision, the Chair followed the rules and tradition in this kind of situation, where the Speaker seeks to group together motions that have the same theme.

On this point, without wanting to get into a discussion with the hon. member, I am not a procedural expert but I know that in their recommendations, the Table carefully considered the scope and substance of the amendments submitted by the hon. member. I wish to reassure her that the decision was made in accordance with the tradition and rules of this House.

• (1205)

[English]

Mr. Edmonston: Mr. Speaker, I had a similar question to that of my hon. colleague because we are going to be discussing the purchasing and possession of scanners.

It certainly would be helpful for us if before getting into this discussion we would be able to make ourselves privy of the information that perhaps was discussed and decided by the Clerk so that we would see the exact mindset on the particular question of scanners.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, in that same vein I too have a concern. My concern is that when we are looking at the whole question of scanners we are looking at cellular phones not being telephones, so to speak, but more or less being radios and having the phones' conversations picked up by scanners.

If we are allowed to sell scanners, manufacture scanners and import scanners it goes directly to the absolute use of the scanners. With the experience in the United States and other countries there is an inter–relationship where the whole picture has to be looked at. I too am rather confused as to how the differentiation was made and why the distinction not to allow Motions Nos. 5 and 6 was determined.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair's decisions cannot be appealed. I am somewhat embarrassed to have to discuss this ruling. I am quite prepared to review it in the light of the arguments hon. members have just presented. I submit that we could at least begin the debate on the first few motions and I could check again. But, once more, I would not like us to debate the Chair's decision, which cannot be appealed in this kind of case, let us not forget. This is what I suggest: let us begin right away and the Chair could review the decision in light of the facts that were just presented.

Therefore I submit Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to the House.

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C–109 be amended in Clause 4 by striking out lines 21 to 36 at page 8.

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C–109 be amended by deleting Clause 12.

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C–109 be amended in Clause 13 by striking out line 27 at page 14 and substituting the following:

"section 184 or 193 may, on the".

She said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment removes the government's proposal to create an indictable offence with a penalty of up to five years in prison for anyone who maliciously or for gain intercepts a radio based telecommunication or telephone conversation.

On this issue I would like to point out that we concur with the privacy commissioner who said at the legislative committee: "I favour a technical answer if one can be found". I will elaborate on "if one can be found" in a moment. He went on to say: "If limitations on the manufacture and distribution of scanning equipment were the answer I would find favour with that too".

Like the privacy commissioner, I have not been convinced by those who said that a technical approach would not work. We have to try it first and it has not been tried. Should we not try the banner scanning approach before moving on to jailing people for the interception of radio based telephone or cellular calls? I think that all of us in the House know how overcrowded the cells are in this country and how costly it is to maintain people in prison. This in a sense is a white collar kind of crime that could lead to a very serious infringement that could impact on the stock market. It could impact on the personal lives of people.

All that being said, where there is the potential for constraining this kind of action rather than moving immediately into the Criminal Code and into the criminal system, I think one has to look at other avenues and at the civil remedies already in the Radio Act.

I believe we should think of this as a balanced approach. It makes sense before one moves hastily into the Criminal Code, heavy sanctions, heavy fines and the long term that we have to get to that point perhaps down the road. However, it should only be as a last resort, not as the first resort, as this government moves for the first time to take a look at what is happening with the potential for scanning conversations on private cellular telephones.

I would like to point out that the cellular telephone is given a certain band width. That band width is allocated by the Department of Communications. The companies that manufacture and sell cellular telephones are using a precious public airwave. They have a certain obligation and responsibility if they are going to sell this piece of equipment without the proper kind of protection. We know that one can encrypt these phones. We also know that with the speedy changes taking place in technology today we are digitizing phone calls and with the digitalization there is a much easier way of encoding or encrypting, whichever word you care to use, the message and the voice that are going across that air space.

There are hubs. There are distribution and radio centres on the wires across this land that transmit one's voice. One can encrypt it for the use, let us say, of the ministers, deputy ministers, army or police of this land. Then why does one not consider it equally important to stop the snooping and the eavesdropping which can be very damaging? One has just to hark back to Madam Wilhelmy and the impact on Mr. Bourassa, his credibility, and the whole argument around the constitutional accord.

I am saying there is the need for the government to find the kind of technological answers because the technology is there today. It must therefore take responsibility when it issues licences for cellular telephones to ensure that there is encrypting or protection on those lines in accordance with what the FCC is doing. The FCC has rules requiring that scanner receivers be incapable of tuning, or readily being altered to tune, within the bands allocated to the domestic public cellular radio telecommunications services.

The United States has rules and regulations and laws in this regard that will prevent and prohibit frequency converters being used in conjunction with scanners that receive or can easily be modified to receive cellular transmissions and require that scanners be incapable of converting digital cellular transmissions to voice audio. It therefore seems to me that Canada, which is in the forefront and on the leading edge of the technology and technological research certainly in the field of telecommunications, we can insist on this as a first step before we put people behind bars and we give them with incredibly high fines.

As I said, we are not encouraging the interception of cellular calls. We have a great deal of difficulty with creating an offence that could see these jails stuffed. Right now we have not moved to this control. Although the Department of Communications' functionaries tended to use an argument that there are 900,000 scanners out there, we know how ill-founded and peculiarly conceived those figures were.

• (1215)

In fact, when the department officials appeared before us we discovered that the figures they used included technology on the microwave, the oven in the home and the electronic door. They are talking about umpteen other things. It is not necessarily the scanners that you can go to Radio Shack to buy. However, one cannot, unless one deliberately manipulates it, have access to the band width which has the cellular telephone on it.

While we support the ban on scanners we want it to be a real act. We want this to have the kind of teeth that the minister said it would have to control snooping and eavesdropping.

I know at the heart of this matter is the whole question of the delicate balancing act between the right of individuals to privacy versus the legitimate needs of government or business to gather information. That is all very well and good. However, when I use a telephone, the fact that this is a radio phone has not been taken into consideration. This has been sold to the population as a telephone. Telephones over the twin copper wires that we are used to around this country have always protected my right to privacy and my conversation. The fact is that when I buy a cellular telephone it is not a normal telephone. I love this signal that they use to indicate a telephone, but it is really a radio. People are using the broadcasting airwaves.

There must be a way in which cellular telephone vendors make sure that one signs a document of consent so that one is made aware of the fact that one is buying a radio and not a telephone. One must be aware of the fact that one can buy encryption. Conversely, we may insist through the Department of Communications that they protect that telephone part of the spectrum. It is not then an acceptable first step to throw people into prison and to charge them under the Criminal Code when already they can be charged under the civil code through the Radiocommunication Act.

The other part of the amendment that I am bringing forward is a consequential amendment to the first one with respect to removing the Criminal Code. The third amendment that one sees in here relates to the fact that no person shall use any electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device receiving transmissions in the frequencies allocated to radio-based telephone communications that could be readily altered by the user to receive transmissions in such frequencies.

If we truly believe that we want to stop this kind of eavesdropping, that it can be damaging to families, to business, to industry and the stock exchange and that in every kind of way it can be mischievous if not dangerous, then I think one has to do the other things first. We do not have to move immediately into the Criminal Code. Therefore, I had recommended the other steps prior to moving in this direction.

I hope the government will listen, follow through and agree to this series of amendments and try technical solutions first. That is the reason why we have submitted the nature of the amendments that we propose to you. It is so that the use of those scanners is made inappropriate. It is not the Canadian way. We will use all mechanisms and all manners and all methods prior to going the Criminal Code route. Until we have given people the opportunity to know that they are infringing in a malicious and dangerous way, then it is not fair to apply a criminal sanction to this extent. I think we have other obligations first as legislators.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to support the amendments to Bill C-109 proposed by my colleague. I support them precisely for the same reasons she just gave.

• (1220)

We might call this bill the "Diane Wilhelmy Bill" or the "Bud Smith Bill", because there are now almost a million users of cellular phones in Canada and, up until now, that is before the two incidents involving Bud Smith, former solicitor general of British Columbia, and Diane Wilhelmy, a constitutional affairs assistant to Robert Bourassa, the premier of Quebec, we never had any problems with cellular phone communication. Never, Mr. Speaker. Do not forget that more than one million people are using cellular phones.

In my opinion, using the Criminal Code to jail people or fine them $25,000 for listening—sorry, not simply listening—you can listen to a private conversation, but you cannot say what you heard. That is the strange part about this bill that I call the "Diane Wilhelmy Bill". If you disclose the content of a conversation you intercepted maliciously or for gain, you are guilty of an offence.

I consider this bill worthy of George Orwell's 1984, except it is late, since we are in 1993. Nine years later, George Orwell is among us. It is shameful that we should go against a precedent in the sense that protection is already provided by the Broadcasting Act. Here we are dealing with radio-based telephone communication not hard wire telephone communication. I am sure that none of the ministers opposite sincerely believe that their conversations on cellular phones are private and cannot be heard. They know very well that anyone could be listening.

This bill does not prevent anyone from listening to cellular phone communications but it prevents you from saying what you heard. That is strange.

Moreover, sanctions provided by the Criminal Code are so severe that, first, they would be very hard to apply and, second, they would allow prosecution of a person who, as a result of poor judgment, relates to his brother-in-law, his mother or a friend the content of a conversation he heard by mistake on a cellular. Do we really want that kind of Canada?

Had I heard hundreds of complaints in committee from Canadians saying: "Listen, here are the problems I have had. They have used my credit card number. They have plotted illegal or immoral activities," but there was no evidence to that effect, except for a former minister in British Columbia who made a date with his mistress. This was published in the papers and he had to deal with his wife and face his constituency. It was very embarrassing for him.

Here is what I think about what Diane Wilhelmy disclosed concerning the Charlottetown accord negotiations on constitutional issues.

• (1225)

I am glad to know what Ms. Wilhelmy said. I do not feel any of it was a state secret. I do not see anything wrong with the Montreal radio station CJMS or CJRP in Quebec broadcasting the information disclosed by Ms. Wilhelmy. I do not believe such action should be punished by sending a CJRP reporter to jail for a year or making him pay a $25,000 fine. That is ridiculous. It is not right.

We must ask ourselves this: Do we want to limit the interception of calls made on cellular phones? The New Democratic Party, my party, and I say yes. We believe that people should be entitled to privileged, private conversations. But is there no better way of ensuring this than by sending people to jail for a year or setting $25,000 fines? I think there is. A better alternative would be to do what the Americans have been doing for quite a while in the United States. They have simply banned the manufacture and especially the sale in the U.S. of modified devices capable of intercepting cellular phone conversations.

I must tell you that in order to pick up a cellular phone conversation, most scanners or other devices to intercept such transmissions must be tuned extremely carefully if you want to hear anything. I can tell you that even with those devices it is not easy.

There is another way. Cellphone companies are offering their customers a way to code all their conversations for $15 or $20 a month. Members of the B.C. legislature would no longer have a problem making a date with their girlfriend. Those working on the constitutional issue in Quebec would no longer risk being overheard by CJMS, CKVL or CJRP. They could speak freely. There are ways to do it.

Finally there is another method which most companies are using themselves. They would encode conversations themselves and then sell the idea that your conversation is safe from interception by other users. This is coming soon. Conversations will be coded. Why would we pass a bill to fix a problem that does not really exist? I find that disturbing when we complain that this government is always getting in the way, is too big and is introducing a bill which, for one thing, is unnecessary and second, penalizes Canadians for something that is not worth it.

In conclusion, I support my colleague's amendments and hope that the government will reconsider this bill because it is ridiculous and dangerous.

[English]

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to add some comments concerning this motion by the member for Mount Royal.

There is a definite contradiction here. I frankly do not like what we are doing in using the law to market a particular product. That is essentially what is happening.

• (1230)

As has been said by the member for Mount Royal and the member for Chambly, this is not a phone. It is a radio. Until now the airwaves have been open. They have been open for anyone to use, and we have used them for radio and television purposes.

A cellular phone is a radio, and I think that has been stated and agreed to by the Minister of Communications. We are also saying in this House, in the ruling that has been just handed down by Your Honour, that we should not really restrict the importation of scanners. What we are really doing with this bill is allowing scanners that can pick up cellular phone conversations. That activity is all right. It is not all right in the United States but it is all right in Canada.

In Motion No. 1 we are talking about the amendments to section 184.5(1) of the Criminal Code. It says:

> Every person who intercepts, by means of an electro-magnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device, maliciously or for gain, a radio-based telephone communication, if the originator of the communication or the person intended by the originator of the communication to receive it is in Canada, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years.

In Canada a lot of people are using cellular phones. Telecommunications companies want to sell cellular phones. It seems that the idea is to make cellular phones as attractive as we possibly can. How are we going to do this? We cannot say to people that their conversations on cellular phones are going to be private because we are allowing scanners to pick up the conversations. We are not telling people that anything they say on these cellular phones is not going to be used against them, is not going to be relayed to somebody else.

What we are then going to say, to step in and protect the large communication companies and the market for cellular phones, is that if people do relay the information they hear on a cellular phone through a scanner which is perfectly legal then they are going to be guilty of an indictable offence under the Criminal Code, not just a summary offence but an indictable offence for which they may spend five years in incarceration. That is incredibly severe.

Why have we done that? We have done that to try to deter people from listening in on cellular phone conversations. The fact is that people are listening on scanners all the time and it will be exceedingly difficult to prove this offence. It will be exceedingly difficult to say who told whom what. It will be exceedingly difficult even to say who listened in on the conversation. We are taking airwaves that have until now been open to the public and scanners which are perfectly legal and saying that people can use them and listen in but they cannot say what they have heard. Why?

There are two reasons. The first is to try to allow cellular phones a larger share of the marketplace. The second is to try to ease the fears of people by assuring them their conversations are going to be private. They are not going to be private. There is nothing here that indicates these conversations are going to be private. We are going to punish people if we can prove they have listened into a conversation and relayed the contents of that conversation to somebody else.

• (1235)

What we are doing is very misleading. We are trying to ease the fears of people. We are trying to make them believe that everything is going to be all right if they speak on a cellular phone. We are not saying the government has to outlaw cellular phones, but I think it is vital that we be straightforward with people. It is vital they know that if they use a cellular phone what they say is subject to interception.

There is nothing horrendous about that. People are still going to use cellular phones. They are a convenience. We have them in our cars and in our homes. The amount of usage will increase. That is a given. They are not going to disappear. They are too convenient in this modern age.

There is nothing wrong in qualifying what we say over the cellular phone. There is nothing wrong with that. If there is something vital that we want to say, something of tremendous importance that we do not want anyone else to know, then we should stop our car and go somewhere else and pick up another phone, one that is not a radio, and use it to relay that information. That is not a lot to ask. It may be somewhat of an inconvenience but the fact of the matter is that there is a security issue, and thereby we would not be using the law to promote cellular phones.

The use of the law is all wrong here. It is wrong. We are using it as a marketing ploy. That is not fair to Canadians. That is not fair to those who are accused. It is not fair to make that precedent. If we want to say we are going to do what we can to safeguard phones then, as the member for Mount Royal has said, we should ban scanners, at least a certain scanner. We should be aware of the technology.

There is nothing here which forces the government, the Department of Communications, to monitor the technology of the cellular phone and the scanners so that we are doing what we can to make sure we have the best technological input possible to make the cellular phone as high a grade of technology as possible so it cannot be intercepted and to make the scanners that would be able to intercept this higher technology illegal.

There must be some protection for the people we are going to accuse and perhaps incarcerate for listening in and relaying certain information. It is wrong to use the law for that purpose, I am totally opposed to this. It is wrong for the government to have the cellular phone provisions in this bill. They should be in a separate bill. This is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to stand down for the moment. I see someone else would like to make some comments.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to follow my colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys on report stage of this bill.

As I was sitting here waiting for my opportunity to speak I thought of a commercial that most of us have probably seen on television. It is a commercial with regard to how Cadbury gets the caramel into the Caramilk bar. It is a big thing about technology. There are aliens from outer space who are trying to figure out the technology that gets the caramel into the Caramilk bar.

• (1240)

It appears to me that the same sort of logic has gone into this bill. Instead of figuring out the simple way the technology works the Department of Communications, led by its minister, has gone the difficult route. The difficult route is this attempt to use a cannon against a mouse. It is a perversion of the Criminal Code. It is not something that we on this side of the House can tolerate.

I doubt if there is anyone, except possibly a resident alien from Mars, who is not aware of the ability almost anybody has to intercept communications on cellular phones. They are not telephones in the real sense of the word. They are radios and the radio waves are being intercepted.

Most of us in the House have cellular phones in our cars. They are a great convenience. They are a convenience because we can pick up our cellular phones, call ahead to the next meeting and say we are going to be five minutes or ten minutes late. We can call our offices to find something out. We might call a constituent to get some information. Surely most rational human beings, with the possible exception of some members of the Royal Family, know that cellular phones are not the place for communications that we would not want to read about on the front pages of local newspapers. That should be a given.

I have had conversations with friends and colleagues. One friend said to me after one such conversation on a cellular phone: "Look, will you phone me when you get home so I can find out what we were talking about?" We are all aware of the very simple way in which these conversations can be intercepted.

My colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys is absolutely right when he says: "If you are going to ban something ban the scanners or at least the specific kind of scanner that does the most damage in this particular area". We are concerned in this party about cellular privacy, but we believe that the wrong instrument has been chosen by the government in this bill.

To use the full force of the Criminal Code as a first resort is really overkill. We believe the Criminal Code should be the last resort as a method of maintaining cellular privacy. The privacy commissioner himself said at the legislative committee he would have preferred that technical means be found to deal with cellular privacy. We could not agree more.

The general intent of our amendments to Bill C-109 is to remove the Criminal Code offences and the Radiocommunications Act offences because we believe they are the wrong instruments for dealing with cellular privacy at this time. However we are doing something very concrete to improve cellular privacy and doing so by using strong technical means, that is the banning of scanners. We believe this is supported by much of the industry. Certainly it is also supported by no one less than the privacy commissioner himself.

If we use the full force of the Criminal Code we get into a whole series of problems which we on this side of the House believe to be untenable. It is not necessary to do it at this time. Among other things—and there are times that this happens totally by accident—I have had the experience on my own cellular phone of having crossed wires and picking up somebody else's conversation through my phone. I have had the situation with the new kind of phone that I have in my car right now that suddenly something will come blaring through the speaker on that telephone when I have not even pushed a button.

If someone picks up some information with absolutely no intent and nothing other than having the equipment in the car, what exactly are the ramifications for that person if the person should use the information in some way, shape or form? The whole sense and sensibility of using Criminal Code amendments in this particular area are nonsensical. It is just unacceptable.

The privacy commissioner was not convinced by those who said that a technical approach would not work. He thinks, and we agree, that we should try it first. That is why we are so very keen on the banning of scanners. Why should we not try the banning of scanners approach before moving on to jailing people for the interception of radio-based telephone or cellular calls? We think that this is a more balanced approach and that it makes sense before this hasty move into the Criminal Code. It may be that at some point further down the road, if we discover that the banning of scanners is insufficient, we might then have resort to the Criminal Code. It would be much simpler and much better, both as an example to set for the people of Canada and a way to enforce privacy, to do it by technical means rather than the use of criminal sanctions.

• (1245)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, George Orwell is alive and well. He is right here somewhere in the government lobby across the way directing the debate on this bill. Perhaps he is even in the House right now. What on earth is going on with the government across the way? Why would we want to have a bill that does this?

Picture this situation. The scanner is not illegal. You can sit there in front of your scanner in your underwear drinking beer, as the minister of defence would put it. We know the special affection she has for people who drink beer in their underwear. You could listen to conversations of people. If you dare say "Wilma, come and listen to this", you have committed a crime. It is a criminal offence to have said: "Wilma, come and listen to this". Is that just a trifle Orwellian or what? You do not even have to tell the next person the content of the phone call. Revealing merely the fact that such a conversation exists to your wife is a criminal act.

Where do those people across the way come from? What kind of a mindset would lead anyone to adopt legislation like that? The hon. member for Mount Royal proposed something reasonable: remove that clause from the bill. It does not make sense. It is Orwellian.

The minister across the way knows better. Heaven forbid that he would not. Otherwise no wonder our transportation industry is in a mess, if he does not know any better than that. Why can we not instead outlaw scanners if we do not want people to have them? They can have scanners. They can listen to them but to tell someone else the content or that they did listen to the conversation is illegal. To make it worse, not only is it illegal but it is a criminal offence.

Could we imagine five years later going to the Solicitor General of Canada, begging on our knees and saying: "I want a pardon. I want a Solicitor General's pardon because I have a criminal record. I told my wife that someone was speaking on the cellular phone".

How is that? Why do we want to make people criminals? Why are we doing this? It is because someone heard Mrs. Wilhelmy on her phone. There is no other reason. We would not be talking about this bill otherwise. If that is our concern, why do we need a Criminal Code amendment? We do not, and government members know it. The privacy commissioner has suggested an alternative way. People across the way will not listen to common sense.

Mrs. Finestone: That is the justice department. It does not know anything about communications.

Mr. Boudria: I do not know. There is a problem. If the justice department and others will not listen to common sense, I say to members of the House: Those who were elected here were not elected by the officials of the justice department. They were sent here by their electors to do what is right. No wonder the member for Niagara Falls is uncomfortable with this. He should be.

• (1250)

We look forward to having a recorded division on this particular vote. We want to know who is in favour of an Orwellian measure like that. We want to know if the Minister of Transport is going to spend his time putting people in jail for having told their friends that they listened to someone else's call on a cellular phone. If this government has nothing better to do than to propose measures like that, it is high time it stepped aside and let someone else provide some leadership for this country.

That section of the bill is offensive. There are other measures in the bill that are good. My colleague for Mount Royal has spoken eloquently in the past and today. But that particular provision is wrong.

I say to the minister and to all his colleagues: Get on the cellular phone and phone the Minister of Communications even at the risk of someone else listening, even at the risk of some criminal telling his wife that he heard you speak. Tell the Minister of Communications to remove that offensive provision and to listen instead to the constructive advice provided by Liberal members, in particular the hon. member for Mount Royal who has suggested a better way of doing it. Listen to the privacy commissioner who has suggested a better way of doing it.

Why is it that only the Conservatives think they have the right way of doing this and everyone else is wrong? It is a little bit of the mentality that everyone else is crazy except me that they have across the way. This time they are very wrong, hopelessly wrong. This is using a sledge-hammer to kill a fly and it is very offensive to all of us. It is certainly a good case of overkill, as the member for Chambly puts it, but it does more than that.

I believe that by adopting measures like this we are cheapening the Criminal Code. The Criminal Code is a serious document. I am not one of those MPs who is learned in the law, but I have respect for that document. It identifies those beliefs that are important and those things that are to be forbidden. It is an important document. By putting nonsense like this in the Criminal Code we are cheapening the whole thing. We are making the whole Criminal Code look absurd.

Imagine being the police and enforcing this stupidity. Imagine being the police and arresting someone for doing that. At the same time that contraband is coming into this country, that narcotics are being sold, that people are being murdered we are going to interrupt that important program, set it all aside to arrest and charge someone with the criminal act of having told another person that he had previously listened to a phone call.

No, my colleagues and I want no part of it, no part of it whatsoever. I say to the minister across the way that surely he should be more reasonable. I say to the parliamentary secretary: Come on, get serious. Surely we have better things to do in this Parliament than to make criminals out of ordinary Canadians for nothing.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there are three motions before the House. Motion No. 3 is consequential on the first two. The first two are removing the offence of intercepting and disclosing radio-based telephone communications. Members of the opposition take exception to that. They use the very standard opposition technique of always giving a solution which is impractical, unworkable or impossible.

• (1255)

We have heard just about every opposition member indicate the way to go is to ban scanners, that we should look at the United States and that is the way to go. There are subsequent amendments proposed by the hon. member for Mount Royal that go to what they believe is the problem, the use of the scanners.

First of all I consider that proposal to be unworkable and I believe the example used to be incorrect. The United States has not banned scanners. The United States is proposing to ban the importation and manufacture of scanners. That is not even in effect right now and it would have the effect of grandfathering all the existing scanners. At one point it was suggested the solution to this problem was the American solution. In my opinion, that does not get at the problem at all.

The member for Mount Royal also mentioned the problem as to how many scanners there are. You bet there is a problem as to how many scanners there are in Canada because it is very difficult to define what is a scanner and what is not. It is a fact for instance that cellular or cordless telephone conversations have been picked up on AM radios. Again it is very difficult to define the problem exactly. I have no problem and I am sure other members on this side have no problem with exploring what can be done in that particular area.

However, just to say it is the use of scanners that we are going to go after, we all know scanners have legitimate uses in some cases. Many legitimate businesses operate with the use of scanners, anything from ambulance services to delivery services. I do not think it is enough to say that if certain bands are used it will be outside the law. I see the definition proposed by the opposition as including those scanners that can be readily adapted or used. Just about any scanner can be adapted to pick up cellular telephone conversations.

The whole idea to take the American route and ban the scanners is not an option, as the Americans are finding out. They are finding difficulties with this and I do not think it is one that commends itself to this House.

What we have done is to go after the act we find objectionable. That act is the disclosing and the intercepting of radio-based telecommunications. The wording that applies to the first motion is that everyone who maliciously or for gain intercepts a radio-based communication, and the second one is those who wilfully use and disclose that communication. Members of the opposition find that infuriating and offensive.

There are many Canadians, including members on this side of the House, who find the interception of their telephone conversations to be objectionable. The hon. member for Chambly in talking about conversations recorded during the constitutional negotiations said he was very pleased to know about those conversations. Well we obviously have a difference of opinion. Canadians have a reasonable expectation that what they say during a telephone conversation, even on a cellular telephone, should be kept private. As the hon. member for Mount Royal says, these conversations do impact on the lives of people. When they are disclosed or when individuals are intercepting them maliciously or for gain it is impacting on the lives of individuals. I for one happen to think that is wrong. That is why we have gone directly after what it is we want.

• (1300)

The hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys and other opposition members may portray these people as innocent, happy-go-lucky individuals who just happen to be picking up some conversations. I do not view them in that way at all. The British Columbia example, the example during the constitutional negotiations and the example of the conversations of the Royal Family, innocent individuals did not just happen to come across those conversations. These individuals are spending time, money and effort in trying to destroy other individuals. That is the type of person we are talking about and this is what these amendments to the Criminal Code are addressing.

At one point in the debate it was said that one must realize this if one of these things is being used. How about the individual who is using a land-based telephone and gets a call from somebody who is using a cellular telephone? With the technology it is very difficult and maybe impossible to tell when it is one of those conversations. What reasonable expectation does that individual have? Obviously what we are trying to do is to fill in the gaps. We are trying to make it complete so that if a land-based telephone is used there is the same expectation of privacy whether the user is speaking to someone on a cellular telephone or not. There is that.

I suggest to members of the opposition that inasmuch as there is no workable alternative at the present time to what the government is doing and inasmuch as we are going after them, I like the wording "those individuals who maliciously or for gain intercept". These are not just beautiful individuals, good upstanding Canadians; these are not the kind of people who should be protected under the present law.

As I say, my sympathies are with those individuals who do have their lives impacted and those individuals who do have their conversations intercepted. It seems to me that the sympathies and the support of the House should be with those individuals and not the individuals who for profit or for gain try to intercept those private communications.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), a recorded division on Motion No. 1 stands deferred.

If the House is agreeable, before proceeding to consideration of Motions Nos. 4 and 7, I would like to get back to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mount Royal and by the hon. members for Chambly and Cape Breton—The Sydneys, regarding the fact that the Chair did not allow Motions Nos. 5 and 6.

I want to thank the members for explaining their position. However, after due consideration the Chair does not feel it is necessary to reverse its ruling for the following reasons. Motion No. 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal, concerns use. As you know, clause 24 prohibits the use of a telephone communication, and the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mount Royal would extend this prohibition to the use of the device to intercept a telephone communication, which reflects the intent of the legislation before the House. However Motion No. 5, also standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal, concerns the manufacture, importing, distribution, lease and sale of an electromagnetic device.

• (1305)

This is a concept that does not appear in the bill before us today, since the bill concerns the use of a telephone communication and not manufacturing, importing, distributing or leasing. This may be an interesting concept, and the Chair would not wish to judge the content of the amendment standing in the name of the hon. member for Mount Royal, although technically, according to parliamentary procedure, this amendment goes beyond the scope of Bill C–109.

That is why I suggest the hon. member seek other remedies under the Standing Orders if she wishes to pursue Motion No. 5. However, procedurally speaking, the Chair must abide by the principle approved on second reading of this bill, in other words, use of a telephone communication.

We shall now proceed to consideration of Motions No. 4 and 7, which are grouped for the purpose of debate.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal) moved:

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C–109 be amended in Clause 24 by adding immediately after line 31 at page 23 the following:

"(3) Except as prescribed, no person shall use any electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device capable of

(a) receiving transmissions in the frequencies allocated to radio-based telephone communication; or

(b) readily being altered by the user to receive transmissions in such frequencies."

Motion No. 7.

That Bill C–109 be amended in Clause 26 by striking out lines 18 to 29 at page 24.

She said: Mr. Speaker, thank you for your analysis and your explanation of the reasons that prevented the Chair from allowing the amendment as proposed. I also appreciate the Chair's implied conclusion that I will probably have to introduce a private member's bill if I really want to bring about some satisfactory changes. Thank you, and, although I do so with regret, I accept your ruling.

[English]

This second group of amendments allows the use of scanners as opposed to my recommendations on their manufacture, sale or importation which have been, in a sense, disallowed. I find it ironic and illusory that we can discuss the use of scanners in this bill when we cannot discuss where they come from or prevent their use. As I think we all know, scanners are not manufactured in Canada. They are imported and therefore we cannot control access to them. We just increase the potential for their misuse by allowing a place for them in this country.

It is important for us to know that the scanners we are speaking about are not only those capable of receiving cellular frequencies. I am not saying we should ban all scanners. We are not talking about every last scanner or every hobbyist's scanner, just those within the cellular band.

My hon. colleague from Niagara Falls said the solutions I presented were impractical, impossible and unusual. Perhaps they are unusual for this government, this member and his ministry because they have not had the opportunity to stop and realize that this bill is full of illusions with no practical suggestions.

Mr. Lewis: I agree with him.

Mrs. Finestone: I cannot imagine why. That would be amazing.

• (1310)

We are not talking about the hobbyist scanners. I am somewhat amused when I think about the remarks made by the member for Niagara Falls. The figures that were bandied about were one million cellular telephones, which are really cellular radios. I know the government talked about 900,000 scanners but within those 900,000 scanners are the microwaves.

I would like to point out that to my knowledge the receiver capable of reception in the cellular band is not the microwave. The moment we find the mechanism to transform the microwave to receive cellular telephone calls I will agree with the figure of 900,000 scanners. Until such time we know the figures are totally false and inaccurate. They include all kinds of silly nonsense we are not referring to when it comes to the kind of serious matters we are referring to in this bill.

The government would prefer to go with the concept of malicious or for gain and forget that we are talking about those people who are going to talk about having intercepted a phone call and will say: "I heard my friend talking about her problem yesterday". It may have to do with a divorce settlement, her work or a purchase on the stock exchange. She may work for a company involved in some kind of program or project that is within the realm of secrecy. She may be interested in this whole matter and talk about it on her telephone, except it is not a telephone, it is a radio phone.

As my colleague from Cape Breton pointed out, not everyone stops to think and gets out of the car to use a pay telephone where there is safety and security and no interception. Here we have interceptions.

We are not talking about all the scanners capable of picking up calls in the cellular frequency and it does not ban every last scanner. When we refer to the use of scanners it is not intended to impede hobbyists who use them. I think my colleague talked about his dad who loves to listen to the police calls and follow what is going on in terms of safety in the streets. He has a particular interest as a retired policeman. That is perfectly legal. We can have those scanners as I understand it but we are talking about an entirely different matter.

In clause 4 I strongly recommend that we allow for the use of scanners. We talk about the disallowance of the use of scanners. Except as prescribed, no person shall use any electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device or receive transmissions in the frequencies allocated to radio-based telephone communications. Under this section I am trying to amend, scanners shall not be altered by the user to receive transmissions in such frequencies. It bans those scanners capable of receiving radio-based cellular telephone communications.

Mr. Speaker, you disallowed and explained the disallowance of Motion No. 5 and I accept your ruling. You have disallowed my Motion No. 6 on the manufacture, import, distribution, lease or offer for sale of any electromagnetic, acoustic, mechanical or other device and you will not allow that to be considered an offence.

You accepted the amendment that strikes out lines 18 to 29 because clause 26 generally creates the right of civil action against those contravening section 9(1.1) of the act. I suggest that we support this section because our amendment, Motion No. 6, which I read to you, Mr. Speaker, stops the summary conviction penalty from being applied to those who intercept cellular calls. It is not possible for the proceedings of such an action to be used as part of a civil action, therefore this subsection should be removed.

I think the whole area of criminality is like using a sledge-hammer unnecessarily. We are trying to do something in the technical field because the criminal field should be considered a last resort in answering the whole question of cellular privacy which is important as this becomes more and more the tool of tomorrow.

• (1315)

The question of privacy goes beyond the scope of what we are discussing in this bill and is increasingly becoming a serious issue in our society. There is the manipulation of information from 1-900 and 1-800 phone calls. Advertisers are looking for new mediums and because advertising is so expensive they want target markets. They are moving to get more and more information.

The privacy commissioner said that people's names are manipulated three to four times or more every day. The issue we are dealing with when we talk about privacy should be done at a substantive level, not at this illusory level. This does not end the interference that is creating a serious problem in our society. I think it is very important to examine the whole aspect.

In regard to this particular bill I share the view that was expressed by my colleague from Cape Breton. This particular cellular privacy issue has been inserted into a bill that looks at the very serious responsibilities of our police forces. They are charged with the security of this country and must have certain rights under certain terms and prescriptions such as the right to have a hidden camera or body pack and to overhear and pick up conversations. All that is very important. It is a shame that this bill, which we support in the sense of the amendments to the Criminal Code, has this ridiculous, poorly conceived, illusory approach. It is quite typical of how this Conservative government answers serious issues by making pictures and illusions. It does not take a practical approach and does not answer the question.

I hope the government will see its way clear to adopting the approach I have taken which my colleagues support. The opposition and the New Democratic Party see it as a favourable move in the direction of responding to privacy.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, once again I have the honour of rising to support Motion No. 4 and others which unfortunately were not allowed by the Chair. We are hearing good common sense motions from the opposition and I think we should give them the attention they deserve.

The question of scanners is very important because Bill C-109 is putting the cart before the horse. I think we want to emphasize that those particular scanners which can capture cellular telephone conversations should be gotten rid of and made illegal but that is not what we are doing.

The obvious thing about this piece of legislation is that when we talk about radio phone privacy it is actually a contradiction of terms. The radio aspect of a phone conversation uses the radio waves on the public airways. Because radio phones or cellular phones transmit over the public airways, it is practically impossible to enforce this type of legislation. That is the first problem we have with this legislation.

• (1320)

It is incumbent upon the government to show a serious, urgent problem when one considers how fast this legislation has been pushed through the House to this stage. Where is the urgent, serious problem that we are faced with?

I said somewhat facetiously that we could call this the Diane Wilhelmy bill or the Bud Smith bill in reference to the Solicitor General from British Columbia, I believe, who got caught making a date on a cellular phone with someone who was certainly not his wife.

He paid a political price for that. The journalists had heard it and had printed pretty much what he had said. I am sure that everyone is aware of the Diane Wilhelmy case in Quebec. She was a woman who worked in the constitutional affairs office of Mr. Bourassa's office in Quebec. She simply said how unhappy she was.

She said that the premier had caved in. I do not think he caved in on the constitutional talks. She gave some information that I am sure the premier's office would have liked kept out of the realm of the public. It is just as here on the other side of the House when the Prime Minister of Canada wanted to keep out of public hands as long as possible the poll results during the whole Charlottetown constitutional debacle. It showed from the beginning that the Canadian public was not in favour of this Charlottetown sellout of our country.

Unfortunately, now the government is trying to protect what it considers its interests are and let the public be damned. I do not think any minister or member of Parliament in this House believes for one moment that a conversation on a cellular phone right now cannot be overheard by anybody.

We know that. All one has to do is be aware of that. If one says in private what one says in public then there is no problem. If one has two different discourses or lifestyles or stories, then one is going to be in serious trouble.

I think essentially we are looking for a piece of legislation, as far as my party is concerned, which is balanced. We can support, obviously, the aspect of Bill C-109 that deals with giving police the powers they need in order to combat crime. There is no problem with that. It is a very important part of the bill.

We also support that part of the bill that gives citizens the right to sue for damages in a civil court, of course, whenever their conversations have been intercepted and treated with malice. Perhaps they lost money or the people have earned money by intercepting these conversations. That is fine. That is not in the Criminal Code. It is in the civil code. It would be in the civil code and one could do so.

We can support that as a political party. What we cannot support are the problems that this bill would create. There are some serious problems.

First, the bill attacks what it considers an urgent situation which is not really there. There is a saying: "If something is not broken, do not fix it". There is not a hue and cry across the country coming from citizens saying: "We need this legislation".

I have yet to hear of anyone saying: "Our credit card was stolen" or "The stock tip I had was known by many other people because of my cellular phone transmission". We are not getting this at all.

When we asked the government to come up with some examples of where, apart from government members being embarrassed, the urgency was, we did not see it. There is no urgency, no proof and no problem.

What this does do in causing problems is the following. Let us take a look at where the government did not consider the consequences of the bill, but where it could have serious consequences.

Suppose a bank president wants to monitor some of bank employees' calls and they know they are being monitored to make sure the right information is being given.

Suppose a consumer organization wants to make sure that the counsellors in the office are giving out the right information to consumers who call with a problem.

• (1325)

The employees know that their phone calls are being monitored. This happens all the time in business. Phone calls are monitored to make sure that customers are being served well and that the employees know exactly what the company's policies are. What happens is that it would be a violation of the law under this piece of legislation if one listens in to that call and the person calling through a cellular phone does not know that he or she is being monitored. Only the employee knows it. I hope the parliamentary secretary is taking note of this point. This would be a violation because this party that represents small business to a certain degree and large business to a great degree has decided that it is going to have the equivalent of this blockbuster bill to treat a problem that does not exist and which is going to create a problem with business.

I ask my hon. colleague who is the parliamentary secretary, through you, Mr. Speaker, whether he has ever listened in on a conversation between one of his employees and a consumer in order to see how well that employee understands the business and is transmitting what that consumer can expect from the business? Has he? I have. Other responsible businesses do. He would send me or him to jail or another business person to jail because we wanted to give good service to customers?

He had better go after Bell Canada, General Motors and Ford because they monitor the telephone service of their customer accounts.

Did he not know that? It is pretty late in the game right now when he has a Criminal Code violation to send these people to jail and fine them $25,000 because they want to make the service in their business competent and efficient. That is ridiculous.

Why do we have to cause people problems? Why do we have to have big government when just one easy solution is involved? That is simple. It goes back to what my colleague from Mount Royal says in her motion about restricting the use of these scanners. We do not have to ban scanners entirely. We can just make sure that the restricted use is on only those scanners that can monitor the particular radio band that picks up cellular telephone calls.

I hope and I expect the parliamentary secretary will respond to the point I raised as to what does business do if they want to listen to their employees to see how well they represent their companies. At the same time I would appreciate the parliamentary secretary looking once again at the question of those scanners that only pick up cellular telephone conversations and not all scanners as he said before.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to thank the Speaker for his clarification of the earlier ruling of Motions Nos. 5 and 6. I can appreciate, as the member for Mount Royal has said, the position and the points brought forward by the Speaker. Most of all, however, I particularly appreciate the time and effort he took to bring forward the clarification.

Certainly I accept the ruling of the Speaker. I see no problem with that. I was just looking at it from a certain point of view. If we do not have scanners or if we feel that scanners are the problem, how do we not allow the scanners to become a factor? That was the point I am sure the member for Mount Royal was also making.

I also want to refer to the point made by the member for Niagara Falls. He said that the U.S. has not really banned scanners. It has prohibited the manufacture and importation of scanners. I think that is a fair clarification. I think there is a distinction there. However, the importance of the distinction depends on the individual because of how people feel about this matter. It would be a subjective point as well.

• (1330)

This is the point I am concerned with. The point of view in the United States is that scanners per se are not banned but the manufacture and importation of scanners is going to be prohibited. I think it still provides quite a distinction between that country and Canada.

They are saying that inevitably in the United States there is going to be an improvement in the technology of cellular phones. Cellular phones are not going to be at the state that they are now. This technology is more or less in its infancy. Cellular phones are going to improve. One is eventually going to have to have a special frequency to intercept a cellular phone call.

One is not going to be able to pick it up in an ordinary scanner, a doctored radio or a scanner that picks up police calls or ambulance calls. One is not just going to be able to make a small adjustment there to pick up the cellular phone conversations.

One will have to buy a sophisticated piece of equipment to really intercept the cellular phone calls of the future. The Americans are looking at that. They say they may have a problem right now. However, the fact of the matter, marketing being what it is, is that the cellular phone manufacturing companies are going to want to say: "We are striving to make our product safer. We are striving to give you more security. When we give you this additional security we are going to give it to you in the form of the scanners not being available to intercept your calls".

I think that is significant because there is a carrot forcing the technology companies in the United States to advance, not to mention a stick beating them from behind in the form of reduced sales.

Here we do not have that. We do not have that stick and carrot at all. We are saying that scanners are going to remain as they are or they can be approved. It does not matter.

An hon. member: There will always be a way.

Mr. MacLellan: There may always be a way but the fact of the matter is that what we are leaving in Canada is the wherewithal for companies to make a better scanner. The better scanners will be manufactured and imported, whereas in the United States with the thrust they are taking they will not be able to put that better scanner on the market or to import that better scanner. Here we will always have that incentive to bring it in. The only restriction is that if one passes along the information then it is against the law.

There are those who say: "Heck, now you can intercept phone calls and tap phone lines". There is a considerable difference between having a scanner that happens to pick up a cellular phone conversation and someone making the concerted and detailed effort of tapping a phone line. Certainly it can be done by police forces quite easily but it is not done by the ordinary citizen. The ordinary citizen would not do that sort of thing. It is perhaps out of fear of being electrocuted if for no other reason, but they would not do it. There is a major difference.

Perhaps the analogy about a cellular phone conversation being picked up by a scanner would be perhaps a party line where someone is called, one is speaking on the phone and someone else on the party line picks up the phone and listens in on your conversation.

I think we all know of information that has been picked up perhaps not correctly and perhaps it was immoral to listen in to people's conversations, but certainly none of these people have been brought before the law. None of these people have been charged under the Criminal Code for listening in on phone conversations. When people had party lines they knew they had to be careful what they were saying. They could not say just anything at all if they wanted their conversations to remain between the person speaking and the intended recipient of the phone call. However a party line was different in one significant way. If a person did not want to speak on the party line he or she could not go to another room and use another phone. He or she might have to go to another county and use another phone. If someone has a cellular phone in a car or home and wants to say something and have security, he or she can go into the other room and use the other phone.

• (1335)

If we are talking about service to the public, it was more of a crying need in the time of the party line than it is now with the cellular phone. The security is now there but the government is not trying to increase that security as the United States government is. That does not necessarily make what is going on correct even with what the United States is doing. I think it recognizes the shortcomings and is trying to compensate.

This government is either ignorant of the shortcomings or does not care about compensating. I think that is wrong. It is not doing the best it can for the people of Canada. I think in that regard there is a problem with the law. I hope this is challenged in the Supreme Court of Canada because I am very interested in the determination of the ruling of the Supreme Court. I do not want to give any hypothetical situations but so many come to mind it is hard to say where it would go. I am interested in the challenges of this particular legislation and these particular provisions.

I agree with the member for Mount Royal that it is unfortunate these provisions on the cellular phone are included in this bill because there are some very good things in this bill as far as the security of the public is concerned.

I would like to deal with them without having to deal with the marketing aids for these communications companies. These technological advancements make it more convenient for the public but there is a security problem. I think the public should be made aware of this. There is a real danger of telephone conversations being picked up and this is not being addressed. We are trying to use the law to market these products and I think that is wrong.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, again we on this side of the House concur with the general suggestion of the privacy commissioner that we need to try a technical solution. My hon. colleague from Cape Breton—The Sydneys agrees, the hon. member for Mount Royal agrees and I agree for the second time today that the Criminal Code is not the place to go. We must go to the amendments and use technology to deal with technology.

The problem of cellular interceptions can be dealt with by banning the kinds of scanners that can intercept these transmissions. We believe it is only sensible to at least attempt to deal with this by-law in this manner before introducing the Criminal Code and the full force of such amendments. It is important to note that this particular amendment deals only with scanners capable of picking up calls in the cellular frequencies and does not ban every scanner. This is particularly intended to not impede the use of scanners by hobbyists. Obviously we do not want to interfere with those people who use scanners for a hobby and do not intercept various communications with any nefarious intent.

• (1340)

I really cannot believe that anyone who has access to the technology of cellular phones is not fully aware of just how easily interceptable they are. I go back to a particularly unhappy experience that the Nova Scotia Liberal Party had with technology when we were electing our provincial leader.

Mr. Lewis: He is going to make a heck of a leader of the opposition.

Ms. Clancy: I say to the Solicitor General that we got a good leader out of it. He is going to make a very good premier come May 25 as you will all see.

I did not realize I would have an opportunity to do a free time political broadcast but I thank the Solicitor General for the opportunity.

We had what was known as "dial a Grit" in Nova Scotia. It did not work the first time but the second time they got the glitches out. Someone within the phone company bureaucracy made a phone call on a cellular phone and allegedly said what the totals were for the various candidates at that point in the election. A person intercepted that call, sold the tape to CBC and the next thing we knew it was on air. This created a certain amount of consternation in the ranks. It created a lot of consternation in a lot of ranks. But when those of us who were waiting to see if the day would ever come to an end heard that story our first response was to wonder how someone, and particularly someone who worked for the phone company could be so stupid and not realize this would happen, I go back to an adage that I learned in my convent school days: "God helps those who help themselves".

Mr. Lewis: There goes the phone vote.

Ms. Clancy: The Solicitor General never had any training like that at all.

We cannot protect people who do not wish to be protected. We cannot help people who are going to do stupid things. That should be some sort of basic axiom. It certainly should be an axiom of the Solicitor General.

People are going to use cellular phones and we should hope they are intelligent enough not to have the kinds of conversations they would not want to read about in the public press, particularly if they happen to be public figures. We have all seen enough horrendous examples of this interception to be aware of it.

As I said in my previous comments to the other amendments, the cellular phone is a convenience, particularly for people like us in this House. It is a convenience in communicating with our office, with the people we are dealing with as we go through a series of functions in our constituencies or here in Ottawa. It is clearly not the technology to use to have an in-depth discussion about your own private thoughts, your own private political thoughts or anything else you would not want to be made public. That is only sensible.

Consequently, to talk about using far too severe methods to regulate the privacy of cellular phones is both on the face of it and in depth a ridiculous response. The response of this government and the response of this bill should be to deal first and foremost with the technology. If, in banning scanners as our amendment calls for, we discover down the road this has not been a sufficient deterrent, then the government may want to look at Criminal Code sanctions. It is far too early, far too soon in the development of this technology to call upon the resources of the Criminal Code to deal with this matter.

As the privacy commissioner said, it would obviate the necessity of going around with a lot of people. If they could not do something in the first place because the technical means did not exist for them to do it, we would not require the criminal aspect.

• (1345)

It is only sensible that if the scanners are banned they cannot be used and calls cannot be intercepted. That is much simpler, much better and everybody has a chance to maintain his or her privacy.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak for a few minutes on these particular amendments.

The over-all intent of a lot of the changes is very positive. The government is trying to put in a regulatory regime which will solve a lot of the problems that have been identified by users and people in the industry for quite a long period of time. However when the government starts talking about using the heavy hand of the law to solve every problem that comes along, people should be concerned.

To bring the Criminal Code into force to stop people from eavesdropping or stealing a person's private conversation is a problem. I am not saying it should be open to everybody and there should not be a law against it. But it bothers me that the amendments which were proposed by our party are probably not going to get the support of the members opposite.
