House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Thursday, March 12, 1931

SECOND SESSION—SEVENTEENTH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

The parliament which had been prorogued from time to time to the 12th day of March, 1931, met this day at Ottawa, for the despatch of business.

The house met at three o'clock, the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the acting secretary to the Administrator, announcing that the Right Honourable Lyman P. Duff, Administrator, would proceed to the Senate chamber at three p.m. on this day, for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion parliament.

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Administrator desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And the house being returned to the Commons chamber:

VACANCIES

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that during the recess I received communications from several members, notifying me that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation viz:

Of George Septimus Rennie, member for the electoral district of Hamilton East, by decease, and Arthur Bettez, member for the electoral district of Three Rivers-St. Maurice, by decease.

I accordingly issued my several warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts, respectively.

OATHS OF OFFICE

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 1, respecting the administration of oaths of office.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that when the house did attend His Excellency the Administrator this day in the Senate chamber His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I welcome you to your duties at a time when the nations of the world are passing through a period of great economic depression. Canada has not escaped it. But the Canadian people have met the trials of the moment with patience and fortitude, and are facing the future with the courage and faith which must triumph over every difficulty. In prosperity they were united. In adversity that union is made still stronger by the spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding which is the surest bulwark of the nation's welfare and happiness.

These attributes of Canadianism are national assets of real value, and, upon their possession, I do profoundly congratulate you.

It will be your privilege to consider certain measures designed by my ministers to ameliorate existing conditions, to provide further means by which our people may go forward to achieve a prosperity heretofore unattained and to furnish them with all possible safeguards against a recurrence of the present subordination to world forces.

The fact that in this period of universal distress Canada has been spared the same acute degree of hardship which many other nations have been called upon to bear, will not, I know, blind you to the fact that between this country as it is and as it should be, there is a gulf to be bridged by the industry and zeal of all those who have the welfare of the nation in their keeping. The problems which stand between us and ultimate prosperity are manifold and great. To be effectually met, they must first be understood. Confusion between cause and effect will but delay their solution.

My government has explored the origins of our difficulties and is firmly of the belief that many of our problems do not arise out of world wide depression, but are antecedent to it; and that domestic factors have also largely determined the degree of economic distress from which this country is suffering.

It was this belief which impelled my ministers at the emergency session of parliament held in September last to remove one of the root weaknesses in our industrial system by effecting such then possible changes in the tariff as would, in their opinion, provide substantial security against harmful world competition. Although in the interval world conditions have changed but little for the better, this tariff legislation has resulted in a marked improvement in the domestic situation through the strengthening of established industries, and in addition many others, formerly exporters to Canada, have now become producers in Canada.

The operation of The Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, has proved equally beneficial. While the grant authorized by this act could not immediately have checked unemployment arising from causes of which you have full knowledge, yet its careful administration by my ministers, ably aided by the provincial and municipal governments and the two great railway systems, has resulted in the institution of a nation wide program of public undertakings, each one a unit in a scheme of national development, which have collectively provided work for the greatest number of men who have ever been employed through the direct efforts of the federal government.

Since the last session of parliament four of my ministers attended the Imperial and Imperial economic conferences in London. Several constitutional questions, arising largely out of the resolutions of the Imperial conference of 1926, were fully discussed and, in principle, approved. My ministers, however, held the view that before certain constitutional changes embodied in these resolutions should be made effective by a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the provinces of Canada should be given an opportunity of further considering them and of satisfying themselves that these proposed changes do not in any way restrict their constitutional rights. Unanimous concurrence in this view having been given by the representatives of Great Britain, the Irish Free State and the other dominions, my ministers have called a provincial conference to be held at Ottawa in the month of April for the consideration of the proposed changes. Following the conference you will be asked to take appropriate action.

Exhaustive consideration of the means most likely to ensure a lasting and mutually advantageous scheme of empire economic cooperation was also commenced at the Imperial conference, and many matters preliminary to a final conclusion were then disposed of. Searching investigation into the merits of alternative schemes by the governments concerned is continuing, and it is confidently hoped that, at the adjourned conference to meet at Ottawa during the ensuing summer, agreements will be concluded for closer empire trade, which will strengthen still more the bonds of empire and bring to every part of it great and enduring prosperity.

Pursuant to the fixed policy of my government to combat all influences which are inimical to the social and economic welfare of this Dominion, an order in council has been passed prohibiting the importation of certain commodities into Canada from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

My ministers have completed the organization approved by legislation at the last session of the sixteenth parliament for administering the Pension Act as amended, and have taken steps to ensure that every care shall be exercised to obtain the just and equitable satisfaction of all legitimate claims.

My ministers have had under anxious consideration the means by which an orderly marketing of the wheat crop of western Canada may be assured, and have already taken such effective action towards that end as the circumstances appear to justify. My ministers are aware that changing conditions in the world's markets may necessitate further intervention by my government, which is prepared to render whatever additional assistance may be deemed advisable in the national interest. The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing of the wheat crop and of providing more stable markets, as the welfare of all parts of Canada is involved in satisfactory returns being received by the grain growers.

The broad outline of the general scheme of national development undertaken by my government, including provision for old age pensions, aid to agriculture, technical education and highway construction, has already been made known. My ministers are persuaded that this general scheme cannot advantageously be altered. Careful consideration has therefore been given to the progressive stages by which it will be carried out, and you will be asked to consider measures sanctioning such action as the current economic situation warrants, and such as can be undertaken without undue demands upon the national exchequer.

You will be asked to consider such further revision of the tariff as may be carried out with but incidental adjustments to the British preference schedules now in force.

You will have before you for consideration a bill to create a tariff board, the purposes of which will be to ensure stability of trade, opportunities for the development of our home market by Canadian producers in fair competition with those of other nations, and the protection of our consumers from exploitation.

Amongst other measures to which your attention will be invited are bills for the more effective control of national finance; for the revision of the existing provisions for government purchases; for amending the Naturalization Act; and for amending the Copyright Act.

The reference to the Supreme Court of Canada of the respective jurisdictions of the Dominion and provinces over radio broadcasting necessarily postpones any definite legislative action being taken until the opinion of the court of last resort has been obtained.

Members of the House of Commons:

The public accounts for the last fiscal year and the estimates for the coming year will be submitted at an early date. The estimates will manifest my ministers' resolve that, until the revenues of the country reflect a definite improvement in the economic situation, every economy compatible with the proper administration of the state will be exercised.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

The policies and measures I have outlined are based upon the firm belief of my government that this country is soon to enter upon a new era of prosperity, and that the proper development of its vast resources by a people pledged to unity and cooperation, and endowed with courage and industry, will ensure to Canada a leading place among the nations. I pray that Divine Providence, which has made you citizens of this favoured land, may guide and bless your deliberations.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That the speech of His Excellency the Administrator to both houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next and that this order have precedence over all other business, except the introduction of bills, until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this house under standing order 63, said committee to be composed of Messrs. Rhodes, Dupré, Simpson (Algoma West), Stewart (Edmonton West) and Casgrain.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) presented the following message from His Excellency the Administrator:

The Administrator transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved minute of council, appointing the Honourable E. N. Rhodes, Minister of Fisheries; the Honourable D. M. Sutherland, Minister of National Defence; the Honourable T. G. Murphy, Minister of the Interior and the Honourable Maurice Dupré, Solicitor General, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of chapter 145 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, intituled An Act respecting the House of Commons.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Sergeant-at-arms, with my approval, has appointed Lieutenant J. L. Williams to be his deputy during the present session of parliament.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 4.10 p.m.

22110—1½

Friday, March 13, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE

PRINTING OF SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS AND APPENDICES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I beg to lay on the table of the house a summary of proceedings and appendices of the Imperial conference of 1930, and to move in that regard:

That 1,000 copies be printed in English and 700 copies in French of the summary of proceedings and appendices of the Imperial conference of 1930; and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my right hon. friend if these documents have already been printed, and if so, if they will be distributed immediately?

Mr. BENNETT: The usual custom has been followed. They have been printed but not distributed. They have been distributed in England for some time, as my right hon. friend knows, but I understand that the rule here is that they should not be distributed until parliament has given its formal sanction to the motion. Once the motion is passed, copies will be distributed without further delay.

Motion agreed to.

THE PRINCESS ROYAL

RESOLUTION OF REGRET AND CONDOLENCE UPON DEATH OF HER ROYAL HIGHNESS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Majesty to express the deep concern of this house at the loss which His Majesty has sustained by the death of Her Royal Highness, the Princess Royal; and to condole, with His Majesty and to assure His Majesty that this house participates with the most affectionate and dutiful attachment in whatever concerns the feelings and interests of His Majesty.

He said: Mr. Speaker, death takes its toll from the family circle of the King or from his humblest subject, alike from the ruler and the ruled. Sometimes we are fain to forget that those who sit on thrones have the same human impulses, emotions and sufferings as fall to the lot of all mankind. On this occasion we are reminded that our sovereign king, who is the Crown to us, has suffered a great bereavement through the death of his beloved sister. It is fitting at this time that we should record our deep concern at the loss he has sustained and the sorrow he has endured.

That touch of nature that makes the whole world kin, the hand of death, affords us the opportunity to express our concern not only in this present sorrow but in all that affects the welfare and happiness of our King, who is the sign and symbol of that single authority which binds together a quarter of the world's surface into what we know as the British empire.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): I support and am pleased to have the privilege of seconding the motion for an address to His Majesty expressive of the sympathy of this house in his recent bereavement. I have nothing to add to what the right hon. the Prime Minister, in his capacity as leader of this house, has just said. I am sure he has expressed the views of all of us not only appropriately but also felicitously. On behalf of the official opposition which I represent may I say we wish to be associated with those sentiments expressive of sympathy to His Majesty in the loss of his beloved sister.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): On behalf of the Independent group in this house may I be permitted to join with the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition and all members of the house in expressing to His Majesty our regret at the loss of his sister. We share His Majesty's sense of loss and we desire to convey to His Majesty an expression of our deep sympathy.

Motion agreed to.

TRIBUTES TO DECEASED MEMBERS

THE LATE GEORGE SEPTIMUS RENNIE—THE LATE ARTHUR BETTEZ

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, sometimes I have thought that the melancholy duty which devolves upon the leader of the House of Commons at the opening of parliament is one which he would like to be spared. We are reminded that since we last met two of our members have been called to their long homes. From this part of the house we have lost the member for East Hamilton, Colonel George Septimus Rennie; on the other side of the house my right hon. friend and his supporters have lost the services of the member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice, the late Arthur Bettez. Colonel Rennie was a Canadian, born and educated in this country. He proceeded abroad to complete his medical education and while abroad he obtained that knowledge which enabled him thereafter to become one of the famous practitioners in that part of Canada in which he resided. He was always interested in military matters and in fact was associated with the batteries of artillery in the city of Hamilton. In the service of the artillery he gained the rank of commanding officer. At the outbreak of the war he offered his services to his king and country and proceeded to England where he was in charge of an area for some time. Later he proceeded to France where he served until the close of the war. Three times he was mentioned in despatches, and he retired bearing the rank of colonel. I am told by those who are well able to judge that the services which he rendered in his capacity as medical officer and his wide knowledge and experience and very superior training in the great universities of the old land, both in Great Britain and continental Europe, enabled him to discharge the onerous duties which devolved upon him with a skill equalled by few and to the complete satisfaction of those with whom he served. At any rate his services were so recognized and his courage was indicated by the three despatches I have mentioned. Returning to Canada he once more interested himself in the artillery, with which he had been associated in his pre-war days, and continued to take an active interest not only in the welfare of that section of the militia but also in the public affairs of the community in which he lived. He was not often heard in this house. His experiences in the war made him think sometimes that there was something unreal in parliamentary procedure as contrasted with his observations and experiences abroad. He loved this country however and was profoundly interested in its progress and welfare. In his passing we on this side of the house have lost a loyal and devoted colleague and his constituents a faithful and conscientious representative.

I offer my sympathy to the right hon. gentleman and his followers upon the death of Mr. Bettez. He was also a Canadian. His interest in his younger days in municipal institutions is familiar to those who have watched the progress of the constituency of Three Rivers-St. Maurice. I learned that Mr. Bettez had a very strong hold upon the feelings of the people whom he represented in this parliament. He had a personal following which was not measured by his political support, and those peoples among whom he lived moved and had his being have lost a very firm and devoted friend. His party has lost a most charming colleague; he was not often heard but his interest was always great in matters touching the life of his municipality, educational institutions and the welfare of his country. We sorrow with those who are left behind.

We believe however that those who have passed from us have not lived in vain and that the influence of their activities will continue to be felt in the promotion of the interests of our country.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. the Prime Minister has just given expression to feelings which I am sure will be shared by all hon. members of this house. We who constitute this parliament come from many parts of a large Dominion. The fact is, however, comparatively we are a small company with the result that when one of our number is taken away we feel the loss individually and collectively. There are few places in which there is borne in upon us more frequently or impressively the uncertainty and the brevity of our allotted span than in these halls of parliament where from day to day we contend with each other in debate and then in a moment become silent and united in our sympathy as we think of those whose voices we shall hear no more. It were well were we also reminded of the charity which we do well at all times to accord to those with whom our lot may in different ways and places be cast.

The two hon. members who have passed away since we were last assembled here had been in parliament about the same time, but it was for but a short period. The member for East Hamilton, the late Colonel Rennie, was returned to parliament at the general elections of 1926, and the late Arthur Bettez, member for Three Rivers-St. Maurice, was returned at the general elections of the year preceding. The fact that they were in the House of Commons for but about five years all told doubtless is the reason why they were less known to the public through their activities in parliament than through their activities in other spheres of public service, and particularly their services to the communities in which they lived, where the appreciation of their interest in civic and public affairs won for them the recognition which brought them to this house as the representatives of their respective constituencies.

Colonel Rennie, as the Prime Minister has just said, held a foremost place in his profession as a physician and a surgeon. He was also prominent as a soldier. The services which he rendered alike to his profession and to the army during the period of the Great war won him real distinction. He had close and intimate friends among members on both sides of the house, and I extend to the right hon. Prime Minister and to those who are associated with him my very sincere sympathy in the loss of one who was a personal friend and a loyal supporter of the party to which they belong.

May I also thank the Prime Minister for the sympathy which he has extended to myself and those of us who belong to the Liberal party in the loss which we have sustained through the passing of the late Arthur Bettez. His loss will be felt very much on this side, but by no one more than by myself, to whom at all times he accorded a close friendship and a very loyal support. Mr. Bettez's activities were mostly associated with the city of Three Rivers in which he was born and where he lived throughout his life. He was in 1913 elected an alderman and held that position for nearly a decade. In 1923 and again in 1925 he was elected mayor and continued to hold that office until the time of his death. His capacity for civic affairs and his experience and interest in them caused him to be chosen as vice-president of the Canadian Union of Municipalities. He was returned to parliament three times, on the last two occasions by very large majorities.

As the Prime Minister has said, Mr. Bettez owed the position he achieved in municipal-federal politics very much to his own personality and to the deep and abiding interest which he had in the well-being of the working classes whose representative he was in a very true sense alike in municipal, provincial-federal fields. His political battles were far from easy ones but they won to his side a large personal as well as political following. He will be remembered by all who knew him as a fearless fighter, and sturdy champion of the people to whose cause he gave much in the way of personal sacrifice.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will convey to those who have been bereaved, to Mrs. Rennie and to Madame Bettez, and also the son and daughter of the latter, the sympathy which this house extends to them.

Before resuming my seat may I be permitted to add, Mr. Speaker, how pleased we all are that Your Honour has fully recovered from the indisposition from which unfortunately you had been suffering until within the past day or two. Also may I say that I am sure that it is deeply gratifying to members in all parts of the house that two of our number who during the period of the recess had had very serious illnesses are being restored to complete health and strength. There was general delight yesterday to see the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe), the ex-Minister of Justice in his seat. May I say I am sure all are equally gratified to know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) is progressing very favourably, and that we hope that it will not be long before he has fully recovered and is again able to take his accustomed part in the proceedings of this house.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, it is always distressing that at the beginning of each session we have to record the death of one of our members. May I say that I got to know the late Colonel Rennie very well indeed when as a member of the Conservative party he sat in opposition on this side of the house. Colonel Rennie was seated close to our group and of the two members whose loss we regret to-day, I knew him better probably because of that circumstance. We regret the loss of Colonel Rennie and Mr. Bettez and join with the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition in expressing to the relatives of these deceased members our sympathy in their bereavement.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, while there is no formal motion, may I take it that you will convey to the widow of the late Colonel Rennie and to the widow and children of the late Mr. Bettez this expression of the sympathy of the members of this house in their great loss and bereavement?

Mr. SPEAKER: The wishes of the house as expressed by the right hon. Prime Minister will be carried out.

BRITISH EMPIRE TRADE FAIR

ARRIVAL AT BUENOS AIRES OF SIR GEORGE PERLEY AND PARTY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps members of the house will be pleased to know that at two o'clock to-day we were in telephonic communication with one of our members, Sir George Perley, who arrived at Buenos Aires this morning with his party. He stated they were all in excellent health and spirits, but the weather had been rather hot. As indicative of the remarkable triumphs of science in the field of telephony, I may say that we were able to hear him just as clearly as if he had been speaking to us in this chamber.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF AND CUSTOMS ACTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn, may I have the attention of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister for a moment. We should like, if it is at all possible, to have at a very early date copies of orders in council which have been passed under the legislation enacted at the last session of parliament. I mention this now because I believe it will expedite the debate on the address if the orders can be brought down at an early date.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): All orders in council required to be published in the Gazette have been so published, and everybody, including my right hon. friend, has access to the Gazette. I apprehend he means orders in council that are not required to be published in the Gazette?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes; such orders as have been passed under the Unemployment Relief Act, and also such orders as have been passed under the Customs Act as amended last session.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to the Unemployment Relief Act of 1930, the statute itself requires us to lay on the table within fifteen days of the opening of the house a record of the whole administration of the act, and of course that will be done. That record is in course of preparation. Whether or not it can be completed between now and Monday or Tuesday I am sure my right hon. friend knows it would be impossible for me to say. But next week in any event we propose to have the record completed and placed on the table of the house.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 3.35 p.m.

Monday, March 16, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

REPRESENTATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 2, to amend the Representation Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HEENAN: Mr. Speaker this is a bill which was introduced by the government last year, but it became mixed with other matters of a controversial nature. Its purpose is to extend the franchise to between five and six hundred men located in the Patricia district immediately north of the Kenora-Rainy River riding. The district was not included in the last redistribution and its inhabitants have not the right to vote in any electoral district of the province of Ontario. Before the last provincial election and in consequence of the opening up of new mining areas the legislature of Ontario extended the territory into the Patricia district. The people there were permitted to vote in the provincial election but because they were left out in the redistribution they were not allowed to vote at the last two federal elections. The purpose of this bill is to extend the privilege of the franchise to the district west of the fifth meridian.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ALEXANDRA TOLSTOY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Is it a fact as reported in the press that Alexandra Tolstoy the daughter of Count Tolstoy, has been forbidden to visit the Dominion of Canada? According to press reports Miss Tolstoy was refused admission on the ground that she could not obtain a passport from the Soviet authorities. I think we ought to have an explanation from the Minister of Immigration.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, the matter to which the hon. member has referred has not been drawn to my attention. If the question is placed on the order paper it will be answered.

VANCOUVER—SECOND NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I ask the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) if he is in receipt of the report of the commission which investigated the Second Narrows bridge at Vancouver, and if so does he purpose to have it published?

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): In answer to my hon. friend I will say that we have received that report but up to the present time we have not considered it.

CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I wish to ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) if census commissioners have been appointed and if so who are the commissioners appointed for the province of Manitoba?

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): In reply I would ask my hon. friend to put the question on the order paper.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

ADDRESS IN REPLY MOVED BY MR. MAX. D. CORMIER AND SECONDED BY MR. VICTOR C. PORTEOUS

The house proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Administrator at the opening of the session.

Mr. MAX. D. CORMIER (Restigouche-Madawaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous) that a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Administrator of Canada, to thank His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, at the opening of this session.

Mr. Speaker, it is an honour which reverts to the constituency I am proud to represent; a burden which I personally must bear. I hope, however, that the customary indulgence of this house towards new members will facilitate the difficult task with which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his hon. colleagues have been kind enough to entrust me.

I believe that this is the first time an Acadian has been so honoured. It was also desired that my first words uttered, as a member of the House of Commons of Canada, should be in the language of my forefathers as well as my own. In my own name and on behalf of my French-speaking constituents of Madawaska and Restigouche, I wish to offer, to whom it may concern my humble token of sincere gratitude.

The hon. members who preceded me in the difficult task which I must fulfil may often have been, and with truth, able to boast of Canada's prosperity and thank Providence for its bounty in this respect. Can I, however, say to-day that the country is prosperous? The speech from the throne mentions the fact that the nations of the world are passing through an economic crisis and that Canada has not been spared.

If we cannot thank Providence for the difficulties with which we are beset, we can and must sincerely thank Providence for having assisted us to place at the head of the affairs of this country an administration which will take the necessary measures to relieve the situation and provide in the future against the return of present conditions.

His Excellency also tells us that, although Canada has not felt the pangs which other nations have, the situation of our country is not what it should be, and that many of our problems are not the sequel of a universal crisis.

If Canada had had, since 1921, a cautious administration, a government determined to toil for the welfare of the people rather than seek the support of a group whose vision did not embrace all parts of Canada, a young country like ours, immensely rich in natural resources of all kinds, with a population less than ten millions, could have passed through this world crisis without difficulty. Theorists, of the old schools, however, setting aside the lessons of our tariff history since 1878, despising the post-war example of almost every country of the world in tariff matters, swerved and began the wilful destruction of the Canadian tariff. The consequence of this fatal policy was soon felt. The closing of mills, foreign purchases, an unrest among the working classes, a decrease in the purchasing power of our currency and the decline of the home market for our farmers. These are a few immediate results of the policy of a government that the people has punished and which they will not soon forget.

Abraham Lincoln once spoke in this strain. I know very little about tariff. I do know, however, that when we purchase rails from a foreign country, we have the rails and the foreigner has our money; but when we purchase rails in our own country, we have both the rails and the money. This is the simple but clear explanation of a great economic principle. This principle can be applied to all products manufactured or not that the Canadian people purchase abroad and which should be produced and bought in our own country.

That is why, as soon as legally possible, the right hon. Prime Minister, in less than a month and a half after the general elections of July last, called an emergency session of parliament, in keeping with his pledge; tariff changes were enacted and put into force and immediately an improvement in domestic conditions was felt; foreign industries were invited to establish themselves in Canada; the people's morale rose, and the country began anew its ascending march towards progress.

Owing to its geographical situation, Canada needs an adequate protection for its industries and various products. The speech from the throne intimates that changes in the tariff will be submitted at this session of parliament, that a bill providing for a new tariff commission will be brought down, and that this commission will undertake to stabilize trade and give the Canadian producers a chance of developing our domestic market under loyal competitive conditions towards foreign producers while protecting the consumers of this country against all exploitation. I feel certain that the whole country will applaud these statements of a lofty political order, and that the house will enact these measures which aim at developing our industries, thus relieving unemployment and bringing back to the Canadian fatherland happiness and prosperity.

The unemployment relief measure adopted at the session of September last, has proved beneficial. This emergency and purely charitable legislation, with the aid of provincial governments, municipalities and our two great railway systems, was the means of providing the daily bread to hundreds of thousands of citizens during the winter. In my own riding this wholesome and providential measure gave to numerous families the necessities of life which had been denied them owing to the decrease in lumbering operations.

I do not wish to take up the time of the house in quoting statistics, but I want to draw your attention, sir, to a report of the hon. Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson), published on the 11th inst. in the Ottawa Journal. The report states that 231,351 people had benefited from the help given the unemployed, that the days of work secured by the joint assistance of the federal and provincial governments and railways, amounted to 3,975,355, that these outstanding figures did not include the report of the Quebec government. Moreover, there had been direct assistance given to families and individuals in all parts of the country.

When the final report is made public, the figures which I have just quoted will be greatly increased. The pledge given by the right hon. Prime Minister, to take immediate steps after the elections to relieve unemployment, is in striking contrast with the dilly-dallying policy of the late administration which contended that the unemployment crisis existed only in the imagination of the then opposition, and continued blindly to fill the country with immigrants to the number of about 100,000 annually.

The present government has shut the door against all those who cannot provide for themselves and, as regards certain countries, it has closed the door definitely, so long as present conditions do not entirely disappear. This sound legislation has received the approbation of the Canadian people. The house knows, and so does the country, that when an illness is aggravated by the lack of proper care the convalescence is slow. The opposition, through its speakers and press, rebukes the new administration for not having cured, in a few months, the ills from which the country is suffering. They are not in earnest. The late government should have foreseen this. To govern is to foresee. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. This lack of foresight is the direct cause of a great number of our difficulties and the Canadian people have already and will continue to place the blame where it belongs.

The speech from the throne mentions the imperial and economic conferences held in London last autumn. Constitutional questions were discussed and agreed upon in principle; however, the resolutions approved will not be put into force until the provinces of Canada have had the opportunity of studying them. An interprovincial conference will be held in the capital, in April next, with the view of considering these constitutional changes and making sure that the rights of the provinces are not violated. The Canadian people are happy to learn that the representatives of all the Dominions of the Empire will meet in Ottawa, in th course of next summer, to discuss the problems already broached at the London conferences, to settle upon plans for closer trade relations between the various parts of the empire and to thus assure a lasting and advantageous policy for Canada and the empire. The Canadian people will closely follow these various conferences which, we hope, without infringing on provincial rights, will result in more happiness and prosperity for our people.

The speech from the throne also mentions the order in council prohibiting the imports into Canada of certain products having their origin in the socialistic and sovietic republics, in other words, the Russian embargo. This measure was so favourably commented upon throughout Canada that it is unnecessary to debate it at length in the house. This order is dated February 27, 1931, but it had its source in an Act passed at the special session of the Dominion parliament in September last. Let it suffice to state that the Quebec legislature, by a motion, has shown its appreciation to the Dominion government for having prohibited the importation of Russian products which compete with those of this country. Since the Quebec legislature has deemed proper to congratulate the present government on its action, the measure enacted must be of the utmost importance for all classes of the community.

The Pensions Act adopted at the last session of the sixteenth parliament will be amended. The act as it exists is not satisfactory. The federal treasury pays 50 per cent of these pensions to the provinces which undertake to pay the other half. Seeing that the financial state of many provinces does not allow the carrying out of this act, those governments which are not in a position to benefit by it are forced to-day to pay their quota, without receiving any advantages. An amendment was necessary. The provinces of Canada will be relieved of a heavy load and those whose infirmities of old age preclude from earning their living will bless the hand that assists them.

The grants to technical schools will be highly welcomed by the people. Technical training deserves to be encouraged by this house. In my own riding, at Edmundston, we have a technical school which justifies its existence. We expended a considerable initial capital believing that the Dominion government would continue the grant already voted. When we learned that the late government had decided to discontinue this grant, there was almost a panic in our town. This meant the closing of this institution which is almost indispensable to our young people who wish to learn a trade in order to better earn their living. I must therefore congratulate the government on taking measures to continue these grants to technical schools.

Time precludes me from dealing with all the measures enumerated in the Speech from the Throne; however, these measures herald a period of great prosperity for this country. Among them we find: tariff revision, the appointment of a new tariff commission, economy in our finances, amendments to the Naturalization Act and the Copyright Act; amendments to the Pensions Act, assistance to agriculture, technical education and Trans-Canada highways; assistance in the sale of our wheat crops, interprovincial and imperial conferences at Ottawa; better control of government purchases. It is a policy implying, that the pledges given to the people were given seriously, not mere vote-catchers, but pledges which were destined to be carried out, ensuring a return to prosperous conditions which should exist in this beautiful and vast country.

The other day, in Quebec, a veteran of our Canadian politics, the Hon. Thomas Chapais, stated: On July 28 last, the electoral verdict has placed at the helm of this country that eminent statesman, Mr. Bennett, one of the greatest that Canada has produced. And mind you, he added, such will be the verdict of history. That distinguished statesman, beloved and respected by those who will long sit on your right, Mr. Speaker, can depend, in this house and throughout the country, on the support of a united and loyal party. He may also depend on the votes of the people of Canada. The province of New Brunswick, his native province, is proud of him and the Canadian people now realize that they have found a saviour.

It has been said, Mr. Speaker, that history was in the making when last week, for the first time since confederation, His Excellency the Governor General was not present at the opening of parliament.

If my information is correct, it is also the first time since confederation that an Acadian has received the honour of moving the resolution in reply to the Speech from the Throne. The event may be of little historical importance to the rest of Canada. Acadians, however, an important element of our eastern population, will long remember the occasion and the broadmindedness of the right hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues in this behalf. Permit me to say that the Acadians are law-abiding citizens, proud of their ancestry, proud of their customs and their language, but prouder still of their connection with the British crown. Any move to weaken the ties which bind them to the mother country would be deeply resented. I appreciate to the full the honour conferred upon me. The honour is not due to me personally, but is due to my electors for the loyal support they gave our party on July 28th of last year.

The electoral district of Restigouche-Madawaska is inhabited by citizens of mixed racial origins and mixed religious beliefs. I am pleased to say that we live happily together; we are friendly and neighbourly; we mix socially and in business affairs; the race problem there has long been eliminated, if it ever existed. The county of Madawaska, mostly French, for years elected to this house the late Hon. John Costigan. In the local legislature we have had as representatives Mr. Thomas Clair and Colonel Jesse W. Baker. In the town of Edmundston, 85 per cent French, since our incorporation, we have elected as mayor, Mr. Burpee, Mr. Hall and Mr. Lawson. In the county of Restigouche, about 65 per cent French, we elect for the local legislature a member of English origin and one of French origin. In the town of Campbellton, English-speaking in the majority the mayor is of English origin whilst the president of the local board of trade is of French origin. In the last federal election the English-speaking sections of my constituency gave me a most loyal support, although my opponent was English-speaking.

This harmonious working together of different races and different religions is most worthy of commendation, and it is in deference to the English-speaking members of this House and in appreciation and gratitude to my English-speaking constituents that I make these few remarks in the English language in this my first address in the House of Commons, an address which, by custom, is delivered in the French language.

Moderation in all things is a virtue. The principle of give and take in a mixed community makes for good understanding. If we would only follow the golden rule and the teachings of the Sermon on the Mount, how much useless rancour and strife would be eliminated from the face of the earth!

I said a moment ago that history was in the making. When the political history of Madawaska county is written, it will be recorded that it voted Conservative from 1867 to 1900; then in 1900, unfortunately for itself and for the rest of the country, it went wrong and until 1930 supported Liberal candidates by very large majorities. It went so wrong that in 1908 it gave our party only 84 votes. Last July the difference between the votes given the two parties was 87, in spite of base appeals promiscuously scattered throughout the length and breadth of the county by our opponents at a time when such appeals could not be met. Mr. Speaker, the prodigal son is coming back home and will never leave it again!

I have said that moderation is a virtue. When the political history of Canada is written, if it is written according to the facts, it will record that in times of national crisis the moderates, and therefore the virtuous of both parties in Canada joined together to defend political principles which made for the betterment and the happiness of the people. It happened in 1854, and the result of that union was confederation. It happened again at the election of 1878, when hard times had come over the land. It happened again in 1911, when reciprocity with another nation threatened the economic life of Canada. It happened again during the great war when the moderates of both parties joined together for the common good. And it happened in 1930, when starvation was staring us in the face; again the moderates of both political parties in Canada joined hands to give the country one of the ablest statesmen it has ever produced.

The energy, the courage, the determination shown by our beloved leader, since he accepted that elevated position are so well known to Canadians and so fresh in their memory that it is useless for me to dwell upon the subject. Let me assure this house, however, that in spite of newspaper talk from sources very well known to us all, in the words of the Montreal Star:

. . . . he will have the support of a loyal and united party, and he may be assured that he enjoys in the country a popular confidence won by his courageous enunciation of a national policy and the demonstration of an unmistakable determination to prosecute such policy to the end that greater economic development shall set the Dominion's course to new advancement and hasten material prosperity, and in lines that will be parallel and in unison with a sound and broadminded plan directed to increase trade with the empire. With the Prime Minister's great capacity for work goes an equally great capacity to get things done. He does not move in a circle, but marches direct to the goal. Depending upon these qualities, Canadians have a firm belief that Mr. Bennett will accomplish successfully and in due season the great task that lies in front of him.

Mr. V. C. PORTEOUS (North Grey): Mr. Speaker, on rising to second the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne, if you will permit me, I would like first to touch briefly on a few matters which affect me personally. The first intimation I had that I would be associated with this motion, was that I would be the mover, but I am indeed pleased to have the opportunity of stepping aside to give to the French speaking members of this house and the French speaking people of this Dominion, whom I most highly respect, their just and proper rights according to our customary procedure.

I appreciate to the fullest extent the honour the government have conferred on me in having chosen me to be associated with this motion and, while I feel entirely unworthy, I will try to perform my duty to the best of my ability having had from both sides of the house the assurance of a patient hearing. I am proud to be the representative of North Grey and to be able, as such, to pass on to that constituency any honour that may result from the fact that for the first time in Canadian history a representative of that riding has been chosen to second the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

We have in the constituency of North Grey a riding which, while not rich in the traditions of any one party, has sent many honest, upright representatives to both houses, from both parties. It is a constituency which has at heart the welfare not only of North Grey but of the entire Dominion and which has contributed of its manhood and womanhood to the upbuilding throughout Canada, especially in the western provinces, of agricultural, industrial, marine and business life. I share with the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) the honour of representing what is in many respects the leading agricultural county in the province of Ontario.

I am proud also in this capacity to represent the farmers of this Dominion, for while we are at present in a period of depression and feeling it keenly, we are not downhearted. We all know that whatever may happen in the future, agriculture is still the basic industry of Canada. I am glad to have been chosen as a farmer because it goes to show me, and the people of this Dominion, that the farmers will receive just recognition from this government.

We have been welcomed to our duties, Mr. Speaker, at a time of great world economic depression. May we fulfil those duties having ever in mind the hardship that is evident, especially among our labouring classes and our farmers; may we discharge those duties having the welfare of our Canadian citizens at heart, particularly those citizens who at this time and as a result of the depression, are feeling distress, hoping that by sane measures and just administration Canada may be restored to that condition of prosperity which a country so rich in natural resources, should enjoy. We will be called upon to consider means and measures which we believe will bring back prosperity to Canada. We believe there are measures which may be put in force that will have the desired effect; we believe in a country such as Canada, with its agricultural, mineral, transportation, power and industrial wealth, there should not be the depression that exists at the present moment.

For the purpose of dealing promptly and effectually with the situation the government called a special emergency session of parliament last September when tariff measures were passed which we believed would improve conditions. The action taken was not merely a revival of the historic national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald, but rather it was the fulfilment of that policy. Never during the lifetime of Canada's great Conservative prime minister did protection receive the wholesale test which parliament gave it last September. The result has been the revival of industry. Many industries which had closed their doors have again commenced to operate, and many others which were running only part time are now operating to capacity. The restoration of buying power to people who previously had been out of the market has reacted on Canadian industry, which feels not only the stimulus from without due to the elimination of foreign competition, but also from within, due to the increased purchasing power of Canadian workmen. This has been done without increasing the price to the consumer, an act unprecedented in Canadian history, but what gives us greater hope is that governing bodies of industries, both within and without our Dominion, are placing their confidence in this administration as an efficient, stable and protective government, and are planning to build new industries and enlarge those now in operation without fear of sudden changes in the fiscal policy of the country.

The Unemployment Relief Act, passed last September, has done much to relieve distress in many families and, while only a temporary measure, it has served the purpose for which it was passed to the joy and comfort of thousands of Canadian citizens from coast to coast.

In the fall of 1930 Canada was represented at the Imperial and Imperial economic conferences. These representatives discharged their duties despite no small amount of ridicule from parties holding other political faiths and from countries outside the empire. Canada's attitude with regard to imperial trade, was presented in a capable manner, the result of which, we believe, will yet bind together the British Empire by a policy which will be beneficial to all concerned and will create a greater market for Canadian agricultural products and make for a stronger and a better empire.

This government has seen fit to prohibit, by order in council, importations of certain commodities from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. We believe that by so doing we not only protect our own social and economic welfare, but will eventually protect the citizen of that country as well, against a system which we do not endorse. We have learned that there are better means of opposing the objects of a country than by warfare.

Through the organization which we have under the Pension Act, we are convinced that justice will be administered and no legitimate claims will be ignored.

In agriculture we have a condition such as we on Canadian farms have never had to contend with before. The prices of agricultural products never before declined to such an extent as they have in the past twelve months. The reason is that in relation to price, agricultural products, like other raw materials, are directly responsive to supply and demand; therefore they are the first to come down. Others will follow, but not so suddenly. We must endeavour to bring about better conditions in the agricultural districts of Canada, both in the east and in the west, which alike are suffering from the depression of the present period. This may be done by different means.

[Mr. Porteous.]

We must try to obtain markets for our products both at home and abroad. This we are endeavouring to do, first, by keeping our people employed at home, and second, by procuring markets in other countries for our products. We must, if possible, lessen transportation costs on agricultural products by using the cheapest means, and to that end we expect the Hudson Bay route to be beneficial. We must cut down the cost of marketing farm products as far as is within our power as a government, and we must cheapen the cost of production as far as possible by using more scientific methods. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the cost of production on Canadian farms varies greatly. I believe that in my short period of life production costs have been cut by fifty per cent on many farms by practising better, and more scientific, methods. I believe there is much still to be done along these lines.

We have in Canada the best farm land in the world. We have the best farmers to be found anywhere. We produce farm products unequalled by any other country and we can and we will reduce production costs in competition with any country.

This government is striving to find the cheapest methods of producing quality products which we can sell on the home and also on the foreign market at a profit. To my mind it is not a question so much of reducing production as it is of reducing production costs. If this can be done, it will alleviate to a great extent the depression in agriculture. Then we must strive to relieve the farmer from such high taxation. This is proposed to be done by relieving the municipalities of the burden of the old age pension. When we again bring agriculture to a profitable basis, we will make a more prosperous Canada, both rural and urban.

We must stand together in this unsettled condition, as perhaps we have never been called upon to stand before, remembering that for one class to succeed the other must succeed also. We are a country of diversified occupations and business, but by that diversity we create strength if we all work together. This is no time for one class to try to take advantage of another, or for one industry to try to take advantage of another, or for the rich to try to take advantage of the poor, or for the poor to try to take advantage of the rich; but we must unite in fair competition for the welfare of our country.

Here I should like to quote a verse from Edgar A. Guest's poem Our Country in The Path to Home:

God grant that we shall never see
Our country slave to lust and greed;
God grant that men shall always be United for our nation's need.
Here selfishness has never reigned,
Here freedom all who come may know;
By tyranny our flag's unstained!
God grant that we may keep it so.

And in conclusion, sir, the people of Canada may feel assured of the future progress of our country, under the able policies which are being carried into effect by the sagacity and determination which have characterized the present government and won the confidence of the people in the short time which they have had for the introduction of their principles.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons always listens with great interest to the maiden speeches of its new members, particularly so when they are the mover and seconder of the address to His Excellency the Governor General, who in this instance happens to be His Excellency the Administrator, thanking him for the speech which he has delivered to parliament.

Speaking in the House of Commons is not an easy matter at any time. It is a particularly difficult one to those who come into the house for the first time, and the difficulty increases where the occasion is, like the present, an important one having relation to the particular resolution which has just been moved and seconded. Parliament allows the fullest latitude in discussions on the address, but distinct limitations are placed upon the mover and seconder. They are expected to have regard primarily to what appears in the address itself and they are chosen because it is believed they will endorse everything the address contains and that they will say nothing but good of the administration. These are very distinct limitations, particularly with respect to the address which this year has been given to parliament by His Excellency, as I think I shall be able to show when I come to point out the extent and more particularly, the nature of the legislation which is set forth as that for consideration during this session.

Having regard to these circumstances, I can say, and say with all sincerity, that those of us who sit on this side of the house, though we do not agree with much that the hon. gentlemen have said, nevertheless can accord to them very warmly our congratulations on the manner in which they have presented their views.

The hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier) has set an example such as we get, I think, only, certainly mostly, from those of this house who are of French descent and all of whom seem to be able to speak with equal fluency in the French or in the English language. I think he is to be congratulated and commended for having made use at this time of both languages. He has had much experience as a public man and in the administration of affairs also in his profession at the bar as well as in other ways, and it was to have been expected that he would present his argument in an able manner. I wish he had not read his speech although that is perhaps quite excusable in the circumstances; but I hope it is a precedent that will not be followed. I believe in his case, it was unnecessary, because after listening to him I am sure there is every reason to believe that had he attempted to speak without notes he would probably have been even more eloquent than he was with the aid of manuscript.

May I say to my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Porteous) that while he may not have had the experience which the mover of the address (Mr. Cormier) has had in public affairs, he has the advantage of youth and he will find that to be more and more of an asset as he continues to play a part in the affairs of this house. We congratulate him very cordially, especially on many of the sentiments to which he gave expression.

In listening to both speakers I could not but be impressed with the sentiments, with the aims and with the object which they have in view. We on this side of the house can give to many of the sentiments expressed most hearty assent and accord. I fear, however, cherishing the sentiments they do, they will have to get their leader to change more than one of his policies or they will never be able to see their ideals realized.

With these words, Mr. Speaker, may I repeat how cordially we of the opposition congratulate the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska and the hon. member for North Grey on their maiden addresses.

Reference has been made in the speech of the mover of the resolution to the circumstance that this year parliament was opened by His Excellency the Administrator, in the person of one who is a distinguished citizen of our own Dominion. That calls to mind the fact that this is due to the approaching appointment of His Excellency Lord Willingdon, who still is our Governor General, to possibly the most important office in the gift of His Majesty's government in Britain, namely, that of Viceroy of India. I am sure that all citizens of Canada, irrespective of party, will realize that the appointment is being made because of His Excellency's exceptional abilities as an administrator, his qualities of heart and mind, his great career in the public service, the part already played by him in India as Governor of Bombay and Madras, and the manner in which he carried out the duties of the high office of representative of His Majesty in this Dominion. We in Canada who cherish constitutional self-government and who wish to see it developed to the full in all parts of the British Empire feel that it is fortunate for India that His Excellency Lord Willingdon, has been chosen as viceroy of that country. We believe that at this critical time in the affairs of India no better choice could have been made for the high and responsible position of king's representative in that part of the empire. I am sure I speak in the name of all parties and all classes in our country when I say that Lord Willingdon in entering upon this great responsibility carries with him the heartfelt good wishes, the hopes and the prayers of the Canadian people.

I shall come at once to the address which has been presented by His Excellency the Administrator. It falls into five subdivisions which are easily distinguishable. The first subdivision relates to economic conditions throughout the world and in Canada; the second to the legislation passed at the last session; the third to the Imperial conference and the Imperial economic conference which met last year in London; the fourth to certain legislative enactments since the last special session, and the fifth—taking a corresponding proportion of the whole address—to the proposed legislative program of this session.

I will comment briefly upon these different divisions. The first, which relates to the economic condition of the world and of Canada, is partly in the nature of a sermon and partly in the nature of a diagnosis. How good a sermon and how good a diagnosis will depend upon the meaning to be ascribed to certain of the phrases in that part of the address. I am assuming that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has put into the lips of His Excellency the Administrator the phrases which appear here, and I am therefore in no way reflecting upon the Administrator in commenting on the wording of the address. With this in mind, I wish to draw the attention of the House to one or two passages in the address. As I said before, how good a sermon it is will depend upon the meaning to be attached to certain phrases appearing therein. For example, referring to economic conditions the address contains this paragraph:

> It will be your privilege to consider certain measures designed by my ministers to ameliorate existing conditions, to provide further means by which our people may go forward to achieve a prosperity heretofore unattained and to furnish them with all possible safeguards against a recurrence of the present subordination to world forces.

What is meant by "subordination to world forces"? Does the Prime Minister intend that to mean that Canada is to be put in a position of isloation, a position so completely self-contained as to exclude trade with other countries so that no matter what happens in other parts of the world Canada will not be affected thereby? When we consider the policies which he has presented to this country and which he inteneds further to present to parliament, there is reason to believe that he believes he can make of Canada a self-contained, non-trading country. During this session we will have to consider very carefully, assuming that such an end could be reached, whether it would be in the interests of this country, either immediately or in the long run.

In another portion of the address my right hon. friend speaks of the gulf which has to be bridged between conditions as they are at the present time and conditions as he hopes they will be in the course of time. As regards the conditions existing to-day in Canada, I think we all recognize the fact that a very large gulf will have to be bridged if Canada is to be started on the way to prosperity, but whether or not that gulf will be bridged successfully will depend very much upon the policies of the administration. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that if hon. gentlemen opposite continue to put into effect the policies which thus far they have tried to put into effect, then the gulf will come more and more to resemble the gulf between Dives and Lazarus, on the one side, we will have the rich becoming richer, and on the other, the poor becoming poorer, to the great detriment of the future well-being of our country.

My right hon. friend goes on to say in the speech from the throne that many of our problems arise out of world conditions. It is interesting to notice the stress that hon. gentlemen opposite are putting to-day upon world conditions. They are contending that the situation in Canada is to be expected, that it is a natural result of world influences and that world conditions are affecting this Dominion. We did not hear that kind of statement from the lips of the present Prime Minister or other of his supporters when they were appealing last year to the country for support. They were not telling the people at that time that world conditions had anything to do with the situation then existing; it was all put upon the shoulders of the government of the day, which was blamed wholly and exclusively for conditions as they were. But hon. gentlemen had not been in office five minutes before their whole tune changed, and they began to talk about world conditions being responsible for the situation they were about to face.

My right hon. friend speaks about certain conditions antecedent to the world-wide depression—

> . . . . that many of our problems do not arise out of world-wide depression, but are antecedent to it; and that domestic factors have also largely determined the degree of economic distress from which this country is suffering.

Here again we must ask ourselves what is meant in that particular paragraph by "antecedent conditions". What are the antecedent conditions to which my right hon. friend refers? If I am to judge by some of his correspondence which has been shown to me by different persons, I would assume he is there referring to the great load which he says he is carrying at the present time, a legacy the like of which except in war time no prime minister of Canada has heretofore had to carry. I have seen correspondence of that kind signed by my right hon. friend, but I notice—

Mr. BENNETT: Will my right hon. friend produce it and read it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can produce some of it.

Mr. BENNETT: If my right hon. friend refers to it he should produce it and read it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I can get permission to produce some of it.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is personal correspondence, reference should not be made to it; otherwise if he refers to correspondence, he is bound to produce it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said that I was referring to certain correspondence which had been shown to me.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not sufficient. I rise to a point of order. We might as well have a thorough understanding that the amenities of debate are to be observed in this house, and one of them is that no hon. member can paraphrase what someone else says if it is in writing, unless he produces it, because he puts on it his own interpretation and not the meaning of the writer. This anonymous letter business should not be heard of in this house. Let the correspondence be produced or not referred to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let my right hon. friend wiggle as he pleases at this particular moment—

Mr. BENNETT: I am not the wiggler.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is quite apparent that my right hon. friend is fully conscious of certain of his correspondence which was marked "personal" but which was shown to me by the one to whom it was addressed.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a rule of the house on that point. What does the house think of a leader of the opposition who reads a personal letter which he had no right to see and talks of it? In a court of law, any counsel who did that would be dealt with by the judge, and the rule holds good in any decent society such as this house surely is. It is wholly out of order for any hon. member to refer to personal correspondence which someone has shown to him but which he should not have seen, and try to paraphrase what it means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the Prime Minister had sent me a letter and marked it as "personal" I would have regarded it as such. In reply to a workingman in this country who was complaining about the failure of my right hon. friend and his government to make good their pledges to labour, my right hon. friend took upon himself to write to this man an effusive communication which only helped to add insult to his injury and the man showed the letter to me.

Mr. BENNETT: I ask for a ruling on a point of order. May any member refer to correspondence written to some other person by another member and marked "personal", without producing it? The rule is that no member should put his interpretation upon another man's words without the writing being produced, because the other members are quite as capable of understanding what is meant as is the hon. member speaking. I think the rule is quite clear. It is frequently acted upon in the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the right hon. gentleman will admit that correspondence such as that to which he refers should not be quoted unless the intention is to produce it. If it is a public letter it should be produced. If it is a private letter, it should not; but I think the right hon. gentleman will agree in principle that quotations should not be made from letters unless they are to be produced.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was giving the house my reasons for saying that my right hon. friend has a way of taking the whole load upon his own shoulders, of telling people that the load is all on his shoulders. He never refers to any of his colleagues; you never hear any mention of the cabinet; it is all of the burden that has fallen upon the one individual who for the time being has a more difficult task than has fallen to the lot of any other citizen of Canada. If he would take less of the burden on himself and distribute more amongst his colleagues and the government generally, he would be better playing the part that is expected of him as leader of the administration; because after all, it is government by cabinet and not government by an individual that we are expected to have in this country.

I shall not pursue that point further at the moment, but may I come back to what I was about to say as to this supposed burden, this legacy that my right hon. friend is so fond of telling the country is upon his shoulders and that he has to carry? He seeks to have it appear that this comes as an inheritance of the years during which the administration which immediately preceded his was in office. How are we to judge of the success of a government in the administration of a country's affairs? If matters have been so conducted that the country has not been prosperous, that will be made fully apparent by certain well-known indices. For example, there are the figures with respect to trade; there are the statistics with reference to the public debt; there are the figures with regard to surpluses and deficits; there is the record with regard to taxation. There is all that pertains to unity, harmony and progress to which reference can be made in seeking to discover whether any assumed legacy is what some hon. gentleman would have it believed to be. Just in case my right hon. friend should, when he follows me, or during the course of the session, say that his difficulties are due to what has happened in the past, may I put on record a few figures that will illustrate the position of Canada under the previous administration?

First of all, let me take the figures relating to trade, because the great question in the course of this session and this parliament is going to be whether the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite will serve to promote or to cripple the trade of the country. I believe it can be shown that the most serious of all the results of the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite will be the very certain contraction in trade that we shall find on all sides, a contraction that will affect all classes; whether they be employers of labour or employees, whether they be the heads of large industries, transportation companies, financiers, wholesale merchants, retail merchants or others, all are going to feel the effects of the contracted trade of this country as a result of the policies hon. gentlemen opposite are putting into force. Let me give the figures in regard to trade. When the Liberal administration, of which I had the honour to be the head, came into office in 1921, we found the country facing a position very similar to that which at present exists. Trade was in a state of stagnation; the industries of the country were running part-time, there was general unemployment and a very serious business depression. Then gradually came a marked improvement. The total aggregate trade of Canada for the fiscal years ending March 31, is as follows:

Fiscal year ending March 31	Aggregate Trade
1922	$1,502,000,000
1923	1,748,000,000
1924	1,952,000,000
1925	1,878,000,000
1926	2,256,000,000
1927	2,298,000,000
1928	2,360,000,000
1929	2,655,000,000
1930	2,393,000,000

Hon. members will notice how greatly the aggregate trade of the Dominion increased while we were in office.

The most important part of these statistics is that which refers to export trade. Let me examine the figures with regard to that phase of the matter. I shall give in a moment the figures dealing with that portion of the export trade which was purely domestic. Export trade in Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1922, amounted to $754,000,000; in 1923 it was $945,000,000; by 1924 it had jumped to $1,059,000,000, and so on. The table is as follows:

Fiscal year ending March 31	Total Exports
1922	$ 754,000,000
1923	945,000,000
1924	1,059,000,000
1925	1,081,000,000
1926	1,329,000,000
1927	1,268,000,000
1928	1,251,000,000
1929	1,389,000,000
1930	1,145,000,000

Let us now consider the domestic exports which relate to our surplus production. Here, Mr. Speaker, may I emphasize the importance which is to be attached to the export of surplus products from Canada? That is a business on which about 2,000,000 of our population are dependent. Whatever adversely affects surplus exports adversely affects all classes in our country. The domestic exports are as follows:

Fiscal year ending March 31	Domestic Exports
1922	$ 740,000,000
1923	931,000,000
1924	1,045,000,000
1925	1,069,000,000
1926	1,315,000,000
1927	1,252,000,000
1928	1,228,000,000
1929	1,364,000,000

Hon. members will notice that there is an increase from $740,000,000 in 1922 to $1,120,000,000 in 1930, and higher even than that in the four years preceding. That is one indication of the prosperity in Canada in the period immediately preceding the present one.

May I refer to another phase of the matter which illustrates whether or not there was satisfactory administration of public affairs during that period. I refer to the public debt of the country. Public debt increases where there are deficits and decreases where there are surpluses. For years preceding the regime of the previous administration Canada had deficit after deficit. The public debt had enormously increased. There was the most serious problem with which we had to grapple, but what was the result? The result was that in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1924, instead of a deficit there was a surplus of $35,993,594, and from then on till our last year of office there were surpluses each year. The surpluses which I shall now read indicate the extent to which the public debt of the country was reduced from 1923 to 1930:

Fiscal year ending March 31	Decreases in Debt
1925	345,589
1926	27,706,587
1927	41,896,729
1928	50,984,137
1930	47,740,746

These figures go to show that in seven successive years out of the eight and a half years during which the Liberal administration held office we had surpluses instead of deficits. These surpluses moreover total the enormous sum of over $275,000,000 I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether or not that is a favourable legacy to leave a succeeding administration? May I further draw the attention of the house to the fact that these surpluses were effected not by any system of borrowing; during the entire period the Liberal administration held office the capital as well as the ordinary expenditures were met out of current revenues. These surpluses were over and above all that had been spent on capital and current account.

Another indication of our success is shown by the reduction in taxation imposed.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): Six per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find that the six per cent will return before very long. In order to place the finances of the country in a position that would make it possible to meet the obligations that had arisen from the administration preceding ours and to balance the budget we were obliged for a time to levy additional taxes. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to remember however that we faced the situation squarely and that we met our obligations by taxation and not by borrowing. The country will expect the present administration to do likewise. It will expect that the obligations incurred so readily to serve the ends of a general election will be met out of taxation and not from additional borrowings which will entail a further baneful legacy upon the country.

When we found that it was possible out of existing revenues to balance our budget we began immediately to reduce taxation. Hon. members will remember that we reduced the indirect taxation in connection with customs duties. I shall not refer to that particular reduction in the figures I am about to quote at this time. It is estimated that the revenue remitted by the reduction of taxation in other forms amounted in the year 1026 to $25,000,000; in 1927 that the reduction amounted to $27,000,000; in 1928, to $19,000,000; in 1929, to $25,000,000 and last year, 1930, to $22,000,000. A conservative estimate of reductions of taxation in the last five years shows that there has been a remission of taxation which now amounts to the vast total of $116,000,000 a year, because the reduction which was made each year was a reduction which continued for and applied to each successive year.

Fiscal Year	Estimated Taxation Reduction (other than Customs)
1926-27	$25,000,000
1927-28	27,000,000
1928-29	19,000,000

Those, Mr. Speaker, are figures which speak for themselves. Those are the indices by which the country will find it possible to estimate whether or not the business of the country was being satisfactorily administered under the government which preceded the present one. These are the indices which tell whether the policies which were being applied were wise, right and helpful. Under the policies of the Liberal administration we had this vast increases in trade and this decrease of public debt. In seven out of eight and a half years we had a surplus. There was a steady decrease of taxation, and all was accompanied by a spirit of harmony, unity and good will between the governments of the provinces and the government of the Dominion, a spirit such as had not prevailed for many years previously. Unquestionably we have not that spirit at the present time. In addition, Mr. Speaker, we had a spirit of unity and good will between this country and other parts of the British Empire and particularly between Great Britain and Canada. That also is something which cannot be said to exist at the present time.

Let me come now, Mr. Speaker, to the references in the speech from the throne to the legislation passed at the special session. I shall not go into that at any length at the moment except to direct attention to the fact that even the government itself has not ventured to assert that it has in any way redeemed the pledges and the promises which it gave to the electors at the last general election. My right hon. friend opposite came into power in virtue of certain definite and distinct promises which he then made to the electorate. He said he would end unemployment, he said he would end rural distress; he said he would do all of these things, or perish in the attempt. He has not ended rural distress; he has not ended unemployment; and he has not yet perished in the attempt. He has not ever fulfilled that promise, but I tell him he will perish in the attempt before the other promises are ever fulfilled, because he will never be able to fulfil them.

The address says:

> Although in the interval world conditions have changed but little for the better, this tariff legislation has resulted in a marked improvement in the domestic situation.

Market improvement! Where is the market improvement! I am not going to take up the time of this house by endeavouring to tell hon. members and the country what they all know. It is not necessary for any one to assert that conditions have not improved, that they are worse than they were, because every man, woman and child knows that to be the case. The mere putting of these words into the lips of His Excellency the Administrator will give little in the way of comfort and satisfaction to those men and women in all parts of Canada who to-day are still seeking employment, who are still trying to meet the obligations on their farms, who are still trying to avoid placing mortgages on their homes, who are seeking a bare livelihood and trying to get free of being obliged to resort to the good offices of the Red Cross society and other charitable organizations for whatever sustenance they have. I say, Mr. Speaker, that conditions are apparent and well known by the country generally. Everyone who has studied conditions in Canada at all to-day knows that unfortunately it is only too true that so far as certain parts of our country are concerned—and I refer more particularly now to the middle west—matters are in a desperate plight, that many people there are on the verge of destitution. In short, a condition exists in this country at the moment the like of which, fortunately, it has not witnessed at any time heretofore in our history.

An hon. MEMBER: When did you notice it first?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Notice it? It has been noticed by everyone since this administration came into office. Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say—and I wish to make this point very clear, for it helps to answer the interruption of my hon. friend—the government can in no way say that they have been impeded in any of the policies that they have put forward, that they have been in any way obstructed in the carrying out of the pledges or promises which they made to the electorate. I think I can say without fear of contradiction that with the exception of what it became necessary for me to say publicly in the short period of two weeks during which we had the special session of parliament, I have not raised my voice publicly in criticism, or with one or two exceptions, by way of comment, from the day the present administration took office until this afternoon. What I am saying with respect to myself is equally true with respect to the great body of members of this house who belong to the party which I have the honour to lead. We have given to hon. gentlemen opposite the freest possible hand. We have done that in order that they might demonstrate, if they could, what their policies were capable of doing. May I say this also, Mr.

Speaker, that we have recognized the seriousness of conditions in Canada. We recognized them throughout the campaign, we spoke of them and of their causes, world and domestic causes, in the course of that campaign, and we indicated policies that we believed would help to relieve the situation. When the electorate decided that it preferred to accept the promises and pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite, we said, "All right, it is for the electorate to make its choice; we will not interfere in the least with the putting into force of any policies which hon. gentlemen opposite wish to put into force; we will give them a fair chance to show what they can do." They have had now nearly eight months; they have had a special session of parliament where they were free to bring down whatever legislation they pleased, and no restriction was placed upon them whatever in voting the money they asked for, or in amending the customs tariff in the way in which they desired to amend it, or the Customs Act so far as they desired to amend it. They were free to bring in whatever legislation they wished. They were given a free hand at the Imperial conference. They have had everything their own way, and if today conditions in Canada are worse instead of better the fault lies on the shoulders of my right hon. friend and his colleagues and followers. From this time on, I think he can no longer claim exemption from criticism by the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: He has never claimed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says he has never claimed any exemption from criticism. What was the substance of the speech he made at Regina when he began to talk about the extent to which those who ought to know better were putting obstacles and difficulties in his way?

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is very quick to say he never claimed exemption from criticism, but there is not a man living who is so sensitive to criticism as my right hon. friend. If, Mr. Speaker, you want evidence of that fact you have only to notice the way in which my right hon. friend has risen to the bait two or three times already.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise as a matter of common decency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There my right hon. friend is biting again.

Mr. BENNETT: I rise as a matter of common decency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wonder at hon. members laughing at my right hon. friend's sensitiveness.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of common decency personal letters should not be published.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my right hon. friend still biting?

Mr. BENNETT: No. He is hurt to think that an ex-Prime Minister is capable of such a thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is the matter?

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing in the world. I simply said, and I repeat it now, there is nothing I have seen in the history of parliament that quite equals an ex-Prime Minister giving the purport of a letter marked "personal."

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, that shot must have gone pretty deep. It wounded my right hon. friend twenty minutes ago and he is still licking the wound. May I come now to the next clause of the speech from the throne which refers to the Unemployment Relief Act. Here we are told that this also has proved "equally beneficial." Well, I think "equally beneficial" is probably accurate when you compare the beneficial results of that enactment with the beneficial results that came from the other legislation then passed, but it does not say much for the extent of the benefit in either case. But, curiously enough, in that very paragraph the administration admits the extent of unemployment to be greater than it has ever been at any time in Canada. Take the last half of the paragraph:

> —yet its careful administration by my ministers, ably aided by the provincial and municipal governments and the two great railway systems, has resulted in the institution of a nation wide program of public undertakings, each one a unit in a scheme of national development, which have collectively provided work for the greatest number of men who have ever been employed through the direct efforts of the federal government.

In other words, there never was a time in the history of Canada when the federal government had to come to the relief of so many men. This appears in the speech from the throne itself, confirming the very view which, we have all along contended was the correct one.

May I now refer to the third subdivision, which has to do with the Imperial conference. I intend to speak at perhaps a little greater length with regard to the Imperial conference than with regard to any other subject this afternoon, so I shall pass over that for the moment except to draw attention to the fact that there were two conferences, the so-called Imperial conference and the Imperial economic conference. It is of the Imperial economic conference I intend to speak this afternoon, because I assume that with regard to the other conference, and in fact with regard to both, we will have an opportunity for discussion in this house at a later day. One feature with regard to the Imperial conference to which I wish to refer, however, is the fact that in the speech from the throne the government states that it has approved in principle all that was done at the conference of 1926. The speech reads:

> Several constitutional questions, arising largely out of the resolutions of the Imperial conference of 1926, were fully discussed, and, in principle, approved.

Hon. members who were in this house after the conference of 1926 will recall that the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and others on the opposite side denounced my colleague the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and myself because we ventured to contend that the conference of 1926 had asserted a certain status for Canada and that as a result certain changes would have to be made to get rid of some anachronisms in existing statutes. They ridiculed and belittled the whole business; they said it was an outrageous boast that we should come back and contend that anything of a substantial nature had been accomplished. Now we have the present Prime Minister and leader of the Conservative party saying, in a speech from the throne that will be of record for all time to come, that in principle his government has endorsed all that was done at the 1926 conference.

The fourth division, Mr. Speaker, refers to certain administrative actions of the government since the last session. The first is a reference to an order in council which was passed prohibiting the importation of certain goods from Russia. I imagine we will hear a good deal of discussion with regard to that matter during the course of the present session. I may refer to it a little later on in my remarks this afternoon, but if I do not do so at that time I will do so later on.

The next reference is to organization having been completed under the Pension Act. That is true, but in the speech from the throne my hon. friends have not told us that although the amendments to the Pension Act were drafted and supported by representatives of all political parties in this house, in the appointments which have been made the government have appointed virtually only members of their own party.

Let me come to the next reference, which has to do with the situation in the west. The speech from the throne contains the following words:

> My ministers have had under anxious consideration the means by which an orderly marketing of the wheat crop of western Canada may be assured, and have already taken such effective action towards that end as the circumstances appear to justify.

I hope that when the Prime Minister gets up to speak he will tell us what the effective actions were, whether he means the instructions that were given in writing by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to all the trade commissioners in different parts of the world to do what they could towards helping Canadian trade; whether it is the trade with Bolivia upon which we are to enter shortly; whether it is the credits that are to be given to China for the purchase of Canadian wheat. I hope the Prime Minister will tell us whether those are the effective measures. If not, perhaps he will tell us what they are, because I believe up to the present time the country has been looking and searching in vain for anything which indicates a measure that will be at all helpful to agriculture and western agriculture in particular. The other day I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) did undertake on certain conditions to pay the transportation charges on cattle from one part of Canada to another, out of the public revenues derived from taxation. I suppose that is all right so far as it goes, but if that is the extent of the effective legislation looking to wider markets I am afraid the farmers of Canada will be far from satisfied with the record of the government.

Now I come to the legislative program. In the speech from the throne my right hon. friend says:

> The broad outline of the general scheme of national development undertaken by my government, including provision for old age pensions, aid to agriculture, technical education and highway construction, has already been made known.

That is true; heaven knows it was made known often enough, but what was not made known was what appears in the next paragraph, that these things will only be proceeded with, when?

> Careful consideration has therefore been given to the progressive stages by which it will be carried out, and you will be asked to consider measures sanctioning such action as the current economic situation warrants. . . .

Mr. HANSON: Surely.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says "surely." In the last campaign he and others continually said that the current economic situation required that these things should be done at once, and not only at once but regardless of expense. We were to have a national highway running all the way from the Atlantic to the Pacific by an all-Canadian route; we were to have a St. Lawrence waterway, also by an all-Canadian route; we were to have the Peace river outlet to the ocean; we were to have other routes to Hudson bay. Everything was to be done at once. There was to be more in the way of aid to agriculture, technical education and old age pensions. Every old man and old woman who had a vote was made to believe that he and she were going to get full pensions as soon as this parliament met, but now they are told that they will get pensions as soon as the current economic situation warrants. Then listen to the next words:

. . . . and such as can be undertaken without undue demands upon the national exchequer.

When the late Liberal administration was in office, Mr. Speaker, that administration had control of the exchequer of this country. If we had wished to play in the campaign the part which was played by hon. gentlemen opposite we could have said, "Here is the exchequer in our hands. We will take the moneys out of this exchequer to provide old age pensions for everyone, aid to agriculture for every one, more in the way of technical education for everyone and highways across the country for everyone. We will do it immediately and out of the money of the people of this country." We could have said all that and we might have achieved the result which was achieved by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. COTNAM: Are you sorry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should say not, but I should think hon. gentlemen opposite might well be sorry, and I think they will be still more sorry before they have been in office very long. What I want to make perfectly clear is that we understood what these obligations amounted to. We knew what would be required in the way of taxation to do these things, and we were honest with the people.

Now may I refer to what is said in regard to the revision of the tariff and the establishment of a tariff board. I assume that the revisions will be of the character of those made at the special session, more revisions upward, and I will have something to say in that regard a little later on. With regard to the tariff board we will naturally wait and see what functions this board will be expected to exercise before pronouncing upon it. The first act of my hon. friend, after coming into office, was to dismiss the existing tariff board, which had collected a great deal of most valuable information and which had given satisfaction to all classes in this country, industry, agriculture, labour and others. So far as it is humanly possible for any one organization to reconcile differences of opinion and find common ground to help keep groups and parties united, this was done by the tariff board under the administration of Mr. Moore. But my hon. friend abolished the board immediately upon his assumption of office. Now he proposes to establish another tariff board. Was the abolition simply for the purpose of placing partisans on the board, simply to get a new board composed of those who were of his own political persuasion, or is the tariff board to be another instrument designed to wrest from parliament its authority over taxation and the control of tariffs and hence also of moneys of the people? If my hon. friend has in mind giving to any board the power to adjust the tariff at its will, without the consent of this parliament in the first instance, I will tell him now that he will have to fight pretty hard before he will succeed in a step of the kind. May I remind my right hon. friend this is not a special session of parliament. Let me tell him further that we assume the postponed conference is going to take place, and that he had better fix the date of that conference at a period when he may be expected to have leisure to deal with it. Do not let him think that because last year he succeeded in using the Imperial conference as a reason for proroguing parliament and getting through the business of this house in a rush, he is going to succeed by any device of that kind this year. We shall get through the business of the house in an orderly way or the country will know the reason why.

The next measures mentioned are those that refer to the control of finances and to the Naturalization Act and the Copyright Act. We shall have to wait until those measures are down before saying anything about them. That concludes the program with the exception of the reference to public accounts, which contains this interesting statement:

The estimates will manifest my ministers' resolve that, until the revenues of the country reflect a definite improvement in the economic situation, every economy compatible with the proper administration of the state will be exercised.

I wonder what is to come after the revenues begin to improve, should they ever improve, if that is to be the condition laid down. Are we to have economy compatible with the proper administration of the state only until such time as the revenues of the country will allow them to do something different? We shall wait and see what is meant.

There is in the speech from the throne one paragraph to which I wish to call the attention of parliament. May I say it is a paragraph with which I for one am in entire agreement. The paragraph which I am about to read has been inserted, I have no doubt, like many of the paragraphs that appear in statements of my hon. friend, for the purpose of window dressing; it is an assertion of fact with which I think everyone will agree. It is made however, to look like something in the nature of a policy. I believe that anyone who studies the present condition of Canada will conclude that what it asserts is correct. It is as follows:

> The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing of the wheat crop and of providing more stable markets, as the welfare of all parts of Canada is involved in satisfactory returns being received by the grain growers.

That paragraph, to my mind, states the crux of the situation not only as it is to-day but as it has been for some time past. It states the situation exactly as it was when parliament was in session this time a year ago. Let me read it in reference to the situation as it was in Canada this time a year ago so that hon. members may judge whether it was not equally applicable then:

> The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing of the wheat crop and of providing more stable markets, as the welfare of all parts of Canada is involved in satisfactory returns being received by the grain growers.

That was the contention of the government of the day a year ago—that the most important of all facts in connection with Canada's economic situation was the position of the grain growers in this country. How was a market to be found for western wheat, to express it in small compass. The outstanding economic problem of Canada, the problem of problems, is summed up in that one question: How are markets to be found for our western wheat? Enlarge that question and ask how markets are to be found for our surplus agricultural and other natural products, and you have a still broader aspect of the trade question. Enlarge it still further so as to include not only natural products but manufactured products as well, and ask how markets are to be found for our wheat, for our other surplus agricultural and natural products, and for the surplus manufactures of the country, and you have the trade problem of Canada in its broad aspect and outline. That is the situation.

I am happy that hon. gentlemen opposite and those who sit on this side are in agreement—I think I am right in saying that we are in agreement—as to what the problem is. That, after all, enables us to get somewhere in the process of debate.

May I say that my remarks this afternoon, from now on, will be directed not so much by way of criticism as criticism, as by a sincere desire, in a constructive way, to point out wherein I believe the situation as outlined can best be met, and wherein I fear the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of meeting, will defeat it.

Let me say to my right hon. friend, and say it at once: I believe he is thoroughly sincere in his motives with respect to his policies; I believe he thinks the policies which he has laid down will be best for Canada now and in the long run. I think he is thoroughly sincere in that. And I hope he will give to us on this side credit for like sincerity when we say that we cannot see the matter in the same light as he does, that we think his policies are wrong, that his methods are wrong, and that, instead of improving conditions, the policies he has put into force, and is putting into force will lead to a worse state than we have at the present time.

That is the ground of difference between us. We are agreed as to the need for an export trade for our surplus products, and my right hon. friend has certain policies which he believes will help to improve the situation. We believe those policies will work injury instead of helping matters. The debate on that question did not start to-day; it is one that has been going on in different forms, off and on, for a long time past. But it took very concrete form in the last session of the last parliament. At that time we all recognized the position as set forth in this paragraph. In what way did we recognize it? In the first place, we saw—and there was agreement on this point—that the former markets for Canadian wheat were being lost, that some countries, for example, Germany, France and Italy, were putting up tariff walls and making it more difficult for our farmers to compete in those particular markets and sell their grain there. Not only did we agree that the available markets were becoming fewer, but we were also in agreement that the British market was the best that Canada could possibly have, that Britain was our best customer, and that to secure, in the British market, something that would maintain our position and expand and develop it was after all the great objective at which we should aim. We were further agreed as to this: that the problem of unemployment would be solved in the last analysis only by solving the question of Canada's export trade. I think I am right in that, though there was not the same emphasis laid on that phase by hon. gentlemen opposite. We on this side stressed that point; hon. gentlemen opposite maintained that unemployment was mainly due to the policies of the then administration. They did not say, as we said and still contend, that the reason there was unemployment in Canada, and the reason there is to-day, is that agriculture in this country is not getting an opportunity to export its commodities to the extent to which it should, that the grain growers have not the markets they should have. As a consequence there is not the purchasing power in western Canada to afford a home market for many of our manufactures, because the home market is not a locality; it is purchasing power. It is a fund of purchasing power. A large part of that fund, in the first instance, has to come from the sale of wheat and agricultural products. We were in agreement on one further point, and that was that the Imperial economic conference which was to be held in October had an important bearing on the situation. That conference was called to discuss economic conditions and questions of inter-empire trade, and that was the reason, among other things, why the appeal was made to the country when it was—so that the people might have an opportunity before the conference took place of pronouncing on the respective policies of the parties. When we were in office we realized that if we obtained the endorsation of the people of Canada to the policies as set out in the Dunning budget, we could go to the Imperial conference armed with the support of the people and that in all probability we would get out of that conference something which would mean a good deal to western agriculture and indeed to all agriculture in this country. I do not intend to go over the ground as to why we did not succeed in that appeal, but the fact remains that we put our policies before the people and we gave as our reason for them a desire to get more largely into the British market.

That being the agreement all along the line, where does the difference arise? The difference arises not over any question as to what the situation is, but over the method of approach and policy. If hon. members will be so kind, I am going to ask them to pay a good deal of attention to what I say this afternoon with respect to the difference of methods of approach on these important subjects, because there is a fundamental difference in the attitude adopted by the two parties. There is a real difference between my right hon. friend and myself in this matter of approach, and I do not think he will deny it—he will perhaps correct me if in this I am in error. In approaching these questions he has a certain belief in what he calls bargaining and in action which is in the nature of coercion. Personally, I do not believe that that method of approach, the method of coercion, gets anywhere in the long run. It may win for a day, it may win for a week or for a year, but it brings very strange results and reversals after a time. I believe that the method of conciliatory approach is much better than an approach by means of coercion. I believe that the method of creating an atmosphere of good will and discovering if possible common ground will do more in bringing about agreement than will talk of might, power and force, whether it is economic force or any other kind of force that is to be used. There is the difference between my right hon. friend, and those who sit around him, and myself and those who sit on this side of the house. We differ as to the method of approach, and in fact, as a result, there is a difference also in our policies. The policies of hon. gentlemen opposite are based on this method of approach, and our policies are based on the methods we believe in and have always followed.

Having in mind the Imperial conference and knowing the questions which were to come up, we shaped our course accordingly. We sought to prepare the way for creating a favourable atmosphere in Britain towards what we might seek at the Imperial conference. We sought by the legislation which we passed in this parliament to create through the voluntary giving of preferences a situation which would in the natural order of things place Great Britain and other governments of the empire under certain obligations to this country. If we did not succeed with that method there was still time for parliament to deal with the matter in some other way, but we believed that that was the correct method of approach and we proceeded along those lines.

So that there may be no doubt as to that matter, I will quote the concluding words of the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in introducing his budget. What was the nature of that budget? In a word, we sought so to arrange trade as to favour in our trading those who traded with us. The country to the south had by an act of its own, which was within its own right, raised tariffs against Canada and made it more difficult for us to trade with them. Britain had been our best customer and had taken no similar action. We said: We will seek by means of legislation to transfer to Britain certain purchases that are now being made in the United States so that what has to be purchased outside can be purchased from Britain rather than from the United States. That was not working an injury to any interest or to any industry or class in this country. During the discussions in parliament, on the hustings and through the campaign you never heard anyone come forward and say, "My business is being injured by the Dunning budget; my business is hurt by the steps being taken in connection with the preferences being given to Britain." The matter was so arranged that what we were doing for Britain was being done in a way that would create a helpful atmosphere in that country, and would in turn prove immediately helpful to the consumers in this country and those manufacturers who later on hoped to get their home market through what might come from sales of our own across the sea in return for what we were buying from them. The whole purpose of the approach was to create that atmosphere and to help if possible to get that additional opportunity of trade.

In order to be clear as to the purport of the Dunning budget in reference to what it was hoped might be accomplished as a consequence of the Imperial conference, let me as already said, quote the concluding words of the then Minister of Finance. They will be found on Hansard of May, 1, 1930, at page 1631, and are as follows:

> These tariff favours to those who favour our products are not the result of any bargain with any other country but of an attitude in international relations which we believe to be mutually beneficial and are an expression of the spirit in which Canada will approach the Imperial economic conference in a few months time. In other words we do not intend to meet the other countries of the British commonwealth of nations in a spirit of party bargaining but rather in the broad spirit of willingness to become in ever increasing measure good customers to those who treat us in like manner. This is the spirit in which we desire to meet all nations, but we believe that within the British community of nations lies the greatest measure of opportunity for mutual development of trade because of our common heritage, kindred institutions and a common patriotism.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

That was the statement of the Liberal position. It is quite true that in parliament at that time my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) did not say very much against the preference features then announced. He did say something against them in the last hours of the campaign, and his action at the special session was altogether in the direction of wiping out those preferences. Of this entirely different attitude I shall have something to say later on. The position while parliament was in session was as set forth by Mr. Dunning. When we went to the country that was the attitude which hon. members on this side of the house supporting our policies took from one end of the country to the other. We made it perfectly clear that the Imperial conference had an all important bearing on the question of the sale of western wheat, and we stressed over and over again how all-important to Canada was the question of which party was to represent this country at that conference. We stressed that, not merely in relation to individuals, although the names of individuals were mentioned because there was reason to believe that from the part they had taken in previous conferences they would be the best qualified to obtain beneficial results; but we stressed it because we believed the policies we had adopted were going to be helpful to Canada. We stressed those points with emphasis right up to the very close of the campaign.

In order that I may do no injustice to my right hon. friend by any possible misrepresentation of our respective points of view, I would ask the house to allow me to make reference to speeches made during the campaign which related to this question of policies and methods of approach. I ask hon. members again to keep in mind the Liberal point of view as expressed in voluntary preference, and the point of view, if I may say so, of the Conservative party as expressed in bargaining, and consider these opposing points of view. Our attitude was in the nature of a conciliatory approach; the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite was in the nature of economic coercion. If I quote from my last address of all in the campaign, perhaps I shall be setting forth more emphatically than in any other way the policies upon which above all we were making our appeal to the people. The last address that I gave in the course of the campaign and which was broadcast from one end of Canada to the other, contained mention of our policies, our methods and of the significance of the right policy in regard to the great economic problem Canada was facing and the problem of western Canada in particular. It was largely a repetition of what had been said from every platform, but it gained emphasis, perhaps, as being the last appeal of the campaign. These are the words as they were reported in the press on the day of the election itself:

In the life of every nation, there are moments when its people are called upon to make a great decision, affecting not merely the immediate present, but the whole trend of its future development. Such a moment, I believe, has come to the Canadian people at this time in relation to the all-important question of inter-empire trade. In this situation, the people are entitled to expect their political leaders to deal with them fairly and frankly, to meet the issue without hesitation, and to enlighten them as to its true significance in relation to their interests.

A little further on, with special reference to a market in Britain for Canadian wheat, I said:

The Liberal budget of 1930 is not only a forward move in the direction of inter-empire trade and a new influence towards the great object of closer cooperation between Canada and the other members of the British commonwealth, it is also intended to meet one of the greatest economic problems confronting us at the present time, namely the necessity of obtaining a secure and permanent market for Canadian wheat and thereby ensuring a continuous flow to Canada of that purchasing power in the prairie provinces, upon which the prosperity of our country so largely depends.

The words which follow are as true as prophecy could possibly be with respect to what Canada has since witnessed:

Travelling as I did, throughout the western wheat fields, less than a fortnight ago, I have been appalled at the danger which confronts the economic life of the Dominion if we do not find the means of securing a market for this greatest of our primary products, and the greatest single source of the purchasing power which provides traffic for our transportation systems and orders for our factories and business for our retail and wholesale merchants.

The close relationship betwen the solution of the problem of unemployment and a market for Canadian wheat was further emphasized as follows:

The wheat of western Canada is the greatest single source of purchasing power in the Dominion. When this purchasing power is contracted, as was the case last year, it has its inevitable effect upon every link in the series which extends from the consumer through retail and wholesale merchants, back to the manufacturer and transportation companies, the greatest employers of labour throughout the country. Apart from the world-wide depression, with its resultant drop in commodity prices, the chief cause of unemployment in Canada was the short wheat crop of last year and the curtailment of export of Canadian wheat to Great Britain.

I also said:

The great proposals for empire trade which are laid down in the Liberal budget of 1930 constitute the only real and permanent solution of this great problem of unemployment.

Let me come now to the Conservative attitude in the campaign. I referred to it also in the broadcast of which I have spoken. Here may I again draw attention to the fact, already pointed out, that in the campaign very little was said by hon. gentlemen opposite in respect of the economic conference. I feel they were hardly fair with the electorate of Canada in that particular. I think they knew or they ought to have known, and they ought to have explained the bearing of their policies and what they had in mind on the economic conference. I would also draw attention to the fact that very little was said at the outset of the campaign about any changes in the tariff. The special session that was going to be called was to deal with unemployment. Unemployment was what was stressed throughout the country. There are hon. gentlemen sitting opposite from western constituencies who would not be seated on that side of the house to-day had their leader told the people throughout the campaign that he intended to deal with the tariff last session. May I pause to say this word to my friends in western Canada: I hope the people of western Canada will realize that they have the remedy in their own hands. I hope they will realize that parliamentary institutions have a great background; that, after all, what we have in parliament is something that has come into being, not in a day, but through many years of struggle to give to men the right of freedom of expression and to secure the laws they wish to have. If western Canada feels the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite are not suited to the needs of western Canada, then it is not for the people of western Canada to talk about secession or anything of that kind; it is for them to demand of those who sit in this house that they will support only policies that are in the interest of western Canada. I do not say to hon. gentlemen opposite who come from western constituencies which are suffering at the present time and which are going to suffer still more from conditions as they will become under these policies, that they must desert their leader. I am not for a moment putting that suggestion to them, but they have not only a right but a duty to point out to their leader wherein the policies that he has adopted and that he proposes to enact at this very session of parliament are going to work a further injury to the people of the west, and to plead with him, in the name of the party to which they are giving support, that he modify his view so that it will not work the harm that we believe it will.

Mr. IRVINE: Would the right hon. gentleman kindly indicate in what way he thinks a different approach to the British people would have resulted in their paying a higher price for Canadian wheat than that at which they could purchase wheat from any other country?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I am interested in is that the people of Britain should feel it to be not only to their interest but a privilege to buy Canadian wheat in preference to any other, provided that the price is the same as can be obtained elsewhere. I believe that if the policies laid down in the Dunning budget had been accepted by the people of this country, the people of Great Britain would have so viewed their obligations, and that as a result of the last Imperial conference we would have had, either through a quota or in some other way, a means whereby Canadian wheat would to-day have a favoured position in Great Britain.

Let me give the Conservative position as I referred to it on the last night of the campaign:

> Now in the closing days of the campaign, Mr. Bennett has announced his intention to summon a special session of parliament to bring about an all-round increase in the tariff, which means, so far as the Conservative party is concerned, they propose to reject this great movement towards empire trade, and deal with the mother country only as they deal with foreign countries, upon a basis of hard bargaining, and upon the condition that the people of Great Britain must change a fiscal policy which they have maintained for almost a century.

That was a pretty good forecast of what has since taken place. That was a statement made in July, 1930, to the electorate of Canada at large. I will say this in regard to my right hon. friend, that before the end of the campaign he made it plain that he intended to introduce higher tariff policies, and to ask Great Britain to change her fiscal policy. I would not for a moment say that my right hon. friend has been inconsistent. He has been consistent, but his very consistency is leading him nearer and nearer to destruction.

Mr. SPENCE: Surely my right hon. friend is not worrying about him?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am worrying about the condition of this country. I wish to state to my right hon. friend that I do not in the least distrust his sincerity, but I do distrust his policy. I do distrust his methods, because I do not believe in them. I think he makes a mistake when he relies too exclusively upon his own judgment and is not prepared to accept the judgment even of his own ministers. I say, Mr. Speaker, that cabinet government as it applies in British parliamentary institutions was devised to prevent the will of any one person dominating an entire situation. Cabinet government has come into being through the belief that out of collective wisdom the best judgment may be formed. There is no collective wisdom in the formation of judgment in the government of my right hon. friend. Ask any minister of the crown how far his opinion goes when it is in conflict with that expressed by my right hon. friend.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Where does my right hon. friend get that information?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I get it on every side, and from the look in the face of my right hon. friend (Mr. Ryckman) when he comes out of the council chamber. May I say to my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that I do not believe he is acting fairly either by his colleagues or the country when he takes to himself all the responsibility. It was never intended that there should not be a Minister of Finance other than the Prime Minister; it was never intended that the Prime Minister should function in that office. Surely there must be somewhere in the Conservative party at least one member whose abilities could be usefully employed at the head of the Department of Finance. Under present circumstances when a difference of opinion arises between the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, how is it settled? If I am not mistaken my right hon. friend told us at the last session that the reason he did not appoint a Minister of Finance was that he did not want any minister to have the burden of the measures he intended for the session. He did not think it would be fair to any other man to ask him to put through all those important financial measures. I ask my right hon. friend if that is not correct.

Mr. BENNETT: No, my right hon. friend is not quite correct, but it is as near correct as he can get.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have passed the special session and we have now reached the general session. I say that my right hon. friend is not fair to himself or to others and is not doing what is right when he attempts to fill so many offices himself; I say that he should without delay bring into his ministry, if he can be found, someone well qualified to serve as Minister of Finance.

An hon. MEMBER: Hurry up.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I draw the attention of this house to one fact: For over six months I have left hon. gentlemen opposite entirely to themselves to say and do as they pleased. Surely they will now have the patience to let me have at least an hour or two to myself to say what I please. I repeat my right hon. friend should enlarge his cabinet to the extent indicated and also should give to hon. members of his cabinet a little more say than they have had in the shaping of policies.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): My right hon. friend should learn to run his own party.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To return to the position taken by my right hon. friend during the campaign, may I set forth the manner in which he dealt with certain matters. In opening the campaign for the Conservative party at Winnipeg on June 9, 1930, my right hon. friend the present leader of the government, at that time leader of the opposition, made his coercive attitude perfectly plain. He made perfectly clear that it was by the method of "fighting" and "blasting" that he intended to find markets for Canadian wheat and surplus products generally. The language he used is all the more remarkable because my right hon. friend told us that the speech was written out, and that in most part it was read. The part of the speech from which I wish to quote was in the nature of a direct appeal to the farmers of our country and to the west in particular. Here are his words:

> Listen you agriculturists from the west and all the other parts of Canada, you have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

Then, after making further promises of what would be done in the nature of drastic adjustments and improvements, he made the following pledge, couched in language of the greatest tenderness:

> You will have broader markets, and will have them for all time. You have known suffering and have been patient. Let us end it. Take heart.

Another promise, not to relieve, but to end distress! I wonder what the agriculturists of all Canada, and of the west in particular, are saying to my right hon. friend to-day about their suffering and their patience!

The assurance given with respect to "blasting" was repeated at Victoria on June 17 without being restricted to agricultural products.

I quote these extracts because they are not chance phrases. When I refer to "blasting" my hon. friend nods his head in approval. The method he proposes represents one entirely opposed to that which those of us on this side of the house have employed.

An hon. MEMBER: My right hon. friend is a peaceful man.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not ashamed of having the desire to use peaceful methods. We have passed through a devastating world war; hon. gentlemen opposite apparently think that by now starting an economic war they are going to make conditions better. My hon. friends have a mistaken idea however of what is required for prosperity. To illustrate the intent of my right hon. friend when dealing with the question of markets I shall quote from the Victoria Colonist of June 17;

> It is true we must have foreign markets, and as I said the other evening, we will blast a way to those markets on a world-wide basis with any exportable surpluses. Wo do not have to worry about that.

And at Vancouver, on the same day, resort to the same method was promised as a cure for all troubles and difficulties. I quote from the Montreal Gazette of June 19:

> So will I, when the government is mine, continue to blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note that statement, "So will I, when the government is mine, continue to blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties." In that quotation my right hon. friend was speaking of a time when he might become Prime Minister. Well, that time has come. Now the government is his, and the fighting and the blasting have commenced. Those operations commenced the moment it was his. He might have been a little happier in his choice of words, although it is true we get the truth often in most unexpected ways. My right hon. friend speaks of the government as "his." He might, having regard to what he owes to others, have referred to the government as that of the Conservative party or the government as being that of himself and his colleagues. He might even with propriety have referred to it as the government of His Excellency the Governor General, of whose ministers he was one, primus inter pares, the first among equals. But no, the government is his, he is the first and the last, alpha and omega—all. Well, again I say my right hon. friend is quite sincere.

And the government being his, the blasting has commenced. It commenced at the special session. I am reviewing the situation as I am because the methods which have been adopted are going to continue, and the country will have to make up its mind whether such is the way it wishes to be governed, whether it wishes to have its affairs so conducted in relation to other countries of the world. No longer is there an opportunity for saying that "blasting" is a chance phrase used in the heat of a political campaign or debate. It is a method deliberately selected and that is believed in by my right hon. friend, a method which he intends to pursue in his policies, a method which he has shown us already he intends to pursue even in this parliament as far as he can, namely, the method of coercion. Because that in a word is what it is—not the conciliatory method, but the method of coercion, the getting things done by force of economic might—that is the method he intends to adopt.

Having the opportunity and the power he started at once to use that method in the special session. As all know, the special session of parliament was called for the purpose, nominally, of relieving unemployment. We were no sooner assembled than we discovered that the relief of the unemployed was a mere subterfuge, that the session in reality was to revise tariff schedules upward and to amend the Customs Tariff Act so as to give powers to the governor in council to do what council pleased with respect to many matters affecting the tariff. Throughout the campaign it was never thought that at the special session there would be changes of any extent in the tariff. My hon. friend made use of the session as he made use of the Imperial conference—as an instrument of coercion—the use he made of the forthcoming meeting of the conference was as effective as any form of closure. Hon. members know that.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We met here nominally to pass a vote for the relief of unemployment. As was repeatedly said, that could have been done by a governor general's warrant. A governor general's warrant could have been issued for $20,000,000 without a word of criticism in the circumstances.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say without a word of criticism for this reason, that in the campaign over and over again I said that the money if necessity demanded it could be taken by governor general's warrant for that purpose pending the assembling of parliament immediately after the conference. What criticism could I have directed at the administration after having made that perfectly clear? But in my heart I knew very well that my right hon. friend was not thinking of the unemployed primarily in connection with that session. He was thinking of the special interests that came to his rescue towards the end of the campaign and helped to put him where he is at the present time. It was not until the very last days of the campaign that he uttered any expression which gave the country the slightest idea that he intended to put up the tariff against Britain. The campaign had then about run its course and this phase passed unnoticed by the public at large; it was not unnoticed by those who expected to profit by it. But he did make this representation in the very last days of the campaign, and I drew attention to it in the speech to which I have just referred. It was necessary to wait until almost the last night of the campaign to draw attention to this statement, because my right hon. friend had gone up and down the country appealing to the necessities of the people, making their needs the excuse for the promises and pledges that he then made, and it was not until the very last days of the campaign that he told the people what in his own mind he was determined to do, namely, to raise the tariff at the first opportunity in a way that would serve to their great advantage certain special interests in this country. So he called the special session to force those measures through. Supposing we of the opposition at the special session, had said, "We do not intend to allow this arbitrary and high-handed method of procedure. We are going to stay here and see that every item in this tariff program is discussed as it should be and its bearings properly considered." Supposing we had taken that position—a position which many think the opposition ought to have taken—what would have been the result? My right hon. friend made it plain the first day of the session when he said, "I will not go to any Imperial conference unless I get every bit of this program through." But in Toronto only a few days before he had said that the question of the solution of unemployment and the wheat situation hinged largely on the Imperial conference. Well, if we had taken a step of that kind, and my right hon. friend had not gone to the Imperial conference, we would have been told to-day that wheat was not going from Canada into Great Britain on any improved basis because we had prevented the leader of the government from being present at the Imperial conference. We let him go. The point I wish to bring out very clearly is this, that his whole attitude was one of coercing this parliament into passing those particular measures. Usually when large sums of money are to be spent a supply bill is brought down and is discussed in committee of supply. No supply bill was brought down at the special session, but in orded to limit discussion, a special bill appropriating this $20,000,000 was introduced. Usually when the tariff is being changed the Minister of Finance brings down a budget and shows the bearing of the changes upon the revenues of the country and the taxes of the people. There was no budget brought down at the special session, but my right hon. friend brought down special measures, which he drove through in a certain time by his threat not to go to the Imperial conference until he had witnessed their enactment. Under that form of closure, by those coercive methods he put through his legislation.

And what was the nature of it? There were three bills, one relating to the relief of unemployment, one to amend the Customs Act, and another to amend the customs tariff. The most extraordinary thing of all is that on the eve of going to an Imperial conference my right hon. friend should have put up the tariff against Britain herself. I wish he would give us his explanation of that particular action when he gets up to speak. Let me come back to what I said at the outset. We were agreed that the selling of Canadian wheat in the British market was the most important of all objectives, as it is still the most important. How can he possibly reconcile with that objective his action at the special session in putting up the duties against Britain, wiping out the preferences that were granted under the Dunning budget? Not only that, but raising the duties to a point that in many cases prevented any inflow of goods from Great Britain into this country. I hope my right hon. friend will give some explanation of his action in that regard. I should not like to think it was simply because he had made promises to certain interests that if he were returned that was what he would do. We all know that there are certain selfish interests in this country that would like to shut out all competition from Great Britain. We know that they are afraaid, from the point of view of their monopoly, of British competition even more than of competition from the United States. I hope it was not from motives of that kind that my right hon. friend made the changes he did make. And I hope that it was not from a belief in his power to coerce the British government. Did he think when he raised the tariff against Britain that he was going to find it possible to coerce the government of the United Kingdom by such a step? Was that what he had in mind? If he thought anything of the kind he should have been fair to this parliament and told us.

I want to say to my right hon. friend that he did not treat parliament fairly with respect to the Imperial conference. I asked him politely at the beginning of the special session to give us a statement of what he intended to do at the Imperial conference, to make known his policies. He was also asked by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) to advise parliament. He spoke on the Imperial conference two or three times, but he never told this house what he had in mind. I say that was not fair to parliament and it was not fair to the country. I think we all assumed that my right hon. friend was busy and that he had little time to think of these matters, and naturally we did not press him. But if he had in mind going to Britain to coerce that country; if he had in mind going to Britain to put up to the British government a proposal which he knew could not be accepted by any government in that country he should have told us.

I say he should have made known to parliament what his intentions were, and here again may I say I think it is worth considering whether it is consonant with procedure under British parliamentary institutions for any individual or for that matter any cabinet to promote policies with respect to great imperial matters, policies that affect the whole future and development of the British empire and to launch those policies publicly before the world without any discussion in the first instance either in parliament or throughout the country. After all, public opinion is a factor in government quite as much as anything else, and it is part of the system of government under British institutions that there should be the fullest discussion of policies on the platform, in parliament and certainly also in the cabinet. I do not know what has transpired in the cabinet, but I have very grave doubts in my mind as to whether my right hon. friend ever told his cabinet what he intended to do when he got to London. If he did so, I am amazed to see certain hon. gentlemen sitting beside him to-day. I believe, with respect to one or two of them at least that if they had known in advance that this was the approach that was to be made to Britain, they would have been manly enough to say, "I will resign before I will remain in this cabinet and be a party to that procedure." If that is not the case, then they were all parties to it as indeed, they are under our theory of the collective responsibility of the cabinet. It is my belief that the policies of my right hon. friend were not revealed to his own government. Certainly they were not revealed to this parliament; certainly they were not disclosed to the country, and in all those things I think he has offended against the best traditions of parliamentary procedure and government.

But the serious part is this, and I come back again to the question of the selling of Canadian wheat in Britain. We do not need to go to the conference in London to find out why the Prime Minister failed; we do not need to discuss what took place in London to see why there has been no enlargement of the market for Canadian wheat in Britain as a consequence of what took place at the conference. The Prime Minister was doomed to failure before he left this country, if he had in mind the particular policies which he subsequently proposed; he was doomed to failure when in this parliament, on the eve of going to England, he forced through those increases in the tariff which changed the whole feeling and view of the British public mind in relation to this country. I repeat that I am at a loss to understand his action or the motive behind it. I have asked myself this question: Can it be that promises were made which he had not expected would have to be redeemed and that, being a man of his word, he felt bound regardless of consequences to see they were carried out? I have asked myself this question: Is it because he believes in coercion and because he thinks he will be strong enough to carry that policy even against the government of Great Britain? I have come back to this thought, and perhaps he will tell me if I am wrong. I believe that what he had in mind was a desire to further his conception of a Canadian economic unit, as he calls it; to make out of this country a self-sufficing economic unit, non-trading, beyond its borders, a country that will work exclusively within itself and confine its trade to itself; that in his heart of hearts he believes that this is going to be in the interests of Canada, though how he can believe it surpasses human comprehension. How this country, made into an isolated economic unit, is to prosper and develop along with the other nations of the world, is something indeed very difficult to understand, but the more I follow his actions here and at the Imperial conference the more I come to believe that this has been the actuating motive, that the proposals he made were made with a view to their being rejected so that it would be a little easier for him to put up the tariff again against Great Britain, if need be, in order to avoid trade from that source and so further to secure monopoly to those special interests already protected behind the highest of tariff walls. If that is not the case, I hope my right hon. friend will so inform the house when he gets up to speak.

I will give to the house one or two references which bear out what I have just said. The change in front with respect to the British preference is remarkable in view of what my hon. friend said during the last session when the Dunning budget was introduced. At that time the preferences were there; they were known to my right hon. friend; we were discussing the Imperial conference, and at that time in this House of Commons, standing where I am standing at this moment, my right hon. friend told this parliament that as an expression of affection and goodwill towards the mother country he approved of these preferences. What transpired between that moment and the time when my right hon. friend went to England to rid him entirely of that feeling of affection and goodwill towards the mother country? Perhaps he will answer that question. Let me read his words, which will be found in Hansard of May 6, 1930, at page 1833. They are as follows:

> In order that there may be no misunderstanding as to our position with respect to British preference, I wish to say the following: As an earnest of our affection and good-will, as an expression of the hope we all have that some day a closer economic alliance of empire states may find being, I commend the measures for British preference which the minister proposes.

That speech was made here; it was made to do duty for the Conservative party throughout the campaign. When my hon. friends were speaking in parts of the country where there were those who were known to be favourable to the British preference the words of the present Prime Minister were read as favouring the preference as an expression of goodwill and affection towards the mother country. I ask my right hon. friend, when he gets up to speak, to tell this house and the country what transpired during the course of that campaign which caused him to alter his whole view in that particular and, at a special session of parliament, to wipe out these very preferences which he said should stand as an earnest of affection and good-will in connection with our relations with the mother country.

I need not remind hon. members of what I said during the course of the short session as to what would be the effect of my hon. friend's action at the Imperial conference. Inasmuch however as some of his remarks and the comments of others have been capable of being taken as meaning that it was due to some action or lack of action of the present British government, the Labour government which is at present in office, that my right hon. friend was unable to get anything done at the Imperial conference, I feel I ought to read to the house exactly what I said to him before he left for England as to the fate of any course such as the one he in fact adopted. The Prime Minister I repeat was doomed to failure as far as the Imperial conference was concerned, before he left Canada at all, having in mind his proposals and the methods which he intended to adopt. The quotation which I am about to give will be found in revised Hansard for September 9, at page 37, and in the unrevised Hansard at pages 41 and 42, where I am reported as having spoken as follows:

My hon. friend seems to have very little faith in voluntary agreements. Let me say to him that when he goes to London I think he will find that the only things he will be able to accomplish or that any government will be able to accomplish in the matter of trade as between the different countries of the British Empire will be by voluntary agreement, by cooperation. He will find it very difficult to get very far along on any other path.

Does my hon. friend believe he has a mandate from the Canadian people to-day to blast his way into the British market? Is that the mandate he has? What is the position? Is he, in the measures he is about to bring down, to increase the tariff against Britain as well as against other countries? That was the statement he made, that he was going to put up the tariff against Britain as well as against other countries. Is that the step he proposes to take in advance of proceeding to an Imperial economic conference? Does he believe he is going to strengthen his hand in that fashion?

After making his speech about blasting his way into the markets of the world, my hon. friend when taken to task said that after all it was not blasting he meant so much as it was blazing, that it was not the warrior attitude so much as the crusader attitude which he was adopting, that all he was claiming was to be first in the long line of great men who have helped to blaze the path of Canada and of the empire. Then when he went on to explain what he meant by "blazing," he came to the term "bargaining," and said that some bargaining process was the only way he was going to trade, whether with other parts of the world or with other parts of the British Empire.

What does that mean? According to his own statements it means putting up the tariff in this country, to begin with; that is to be the first part of it. And then on the other hand, so far as the other countries of the British Empire are concerned, it means that they are to be obliged to change their fiscal policies in order to make them accord with the fiscal policies of this country. My hon. friend knows very well that the British Empire is founded on self-government, and that as far as self-government is concerned, it means autonomy in everything and in nothing more than in the matter of fiscal policy. If he is proceeding to England with any idea of trying to influence the parties in Great Britain in the matter of their fiscal policy, his time would be very much better spent at home. If he expects to make a bargain counter out of the council table at Downing street, he will not get very far in serving the interest either of Canada or of the British Empire. I say he should tell us very plainly what his particular policies are going to be, and his attitude with respect to the questions which may come up at the Imperial conference.

When that statement was made to my hon. friend, when, as leader of the opposition speaking to the leader of the government, I indicated that we at least believed that if he were going to make a demand which involved a change of fiscal policy in Britain, if he were going to try coercive methods, he would get nowhere, I say that if those were the things he intended to do, he should have taken parliament into his confidence and given the house and his own followers an opportunity to express their views on a procedure of that kind.

On September 17 I again referred to the futility of hoping to extend trade within the empire by tactics such as the raising of the tariff against Britain on the eve of the conference, or of extending the market for Canadian wheat by any process of bargaining or "blasting." I think what was prophesied at the time has turned out to be true, pretty much to the letter. These were the remarks I made to my right hon. friend; they will be found in the unrevised Hansard for September 17, 1930, at page 340, and in the revised Hansard at page 315:

I have only one further word, and that is to repeat with emphasis what I said a moment ago about this legislation being introduced on the eve of the Imperial conference. The Prime Minister well knows that there is no problem quite so serious for Canada at the present time as that of the marketing of our western grain and of surplus farm products generally. He knows that the purchasing power of the middle west, in the last analysis, will determine the extent to which other branches of industry will thrive, and that this depends in very large part on the degree to which we can secure a market overseas for the grain of western Canada. He knows that many of the markets which we formerly had are closed or are being closed against us to-day, for instance, the markets of France, of Germany and of Italy. He knows also that protection is no cure for unemployment. He has only to look across the border in the United States, the most highly protected country in the world and see how extensive unemployment is there, to know that protection is no cure for unemployment. One would have felt my hon. friend, at least on the eve of a great economic conference which is to consider matters of trade within the empire, would have thought it desirable on the part of his government, and on the part of this parliament as representing the people of Canada, to have maintained toward Great Britain an attitude of a character calculated to meet a hearty response from the people of the British Isles to such demands as he might reasonably make for the improvement in trade between the two countries. How can he expect to get from the British government or the British people any response in the way of opportunities for increasing our markets in Great Britain when his last step before he leaves Canada is to raise the duties against British goods coming into this country, and his first word when he reaches the British Isles is to announce the extent of the increases which he has made? This is a most extraordinary proceeding on the part of my hon. friend. It may be he has in mind blasting or blazing or bargaining as a result of the steps he has taken, but I would like to repeat to him what I said before that I think he will find those particular methods are of very little avail as within the British Empire itself, and that only through voluntary cooperation and an attitude of friendship and good-will are we likely to achieve much in the way of permanent development of inter-imperial trade.

May I say this. We heard in a previous election a good deal with respect to "the parting of the ways." We heard something of it in the last election. It was my hope that, as a result of the attitude which the government previously in office took, we would so far as the different parts of the British Empire are concerned discover ourselves at the meeting of the ways, in the matter of inter-imperial trade, when the Imperial conference is held in London, and that Canada's example would be an example which would be followed by all other parts of the British Empire. But I am afraid that the stand which my hon. friend has taken to-day has put us, so far as inter-imperial trade is concerned, not at the meeting of the ways, but I greatly regret to say very much at the parting of the ways so far as the further development of trade within the empire is concerned.

I have covered the situation up to the time when my right hon. friend left for the Imperial conference. I hope I have made clear the line of difference between us—the method which my right hon. friend proposes to take and has taken, the method of blasting, of economic coercion and the method which we would have taken, one of conciliatory approach; an endeavour to create an atmosphere of friendliness with a view to discovering common ground. I believe I have made it clear that my right hon. friend was not fair with the country when he spoke of having a special session for the purpose of relieving unemployment and, on the plea of relieving the necessities of the poor, came to this parliament and enacted legislation which makes wider than ever the gulf between the rich and the poor; the gulf between those who have plenty and those who lack many of the necessities of life. I hope I have made it clear that he was equally unfair to this parliament, holding as he did views of the character here described not to have told us of his intentions; also, that by talking of blasting a way into the markets of Britain and by contemplating proposals which could not be entertained, he was taking, before leaving for England, and before the conference was under way, an attitude which he must have known was bound to change the feeling in Britain towards Canada. I believe I have made it clear that before he left Canada at all he had made impossible any success for himself or his party, or for our country, at the Imperial conference.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, before I refer to the Imperial conference and to the attitude taken by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister at the conference, may I say to him what I have heard him say at different times speaking from the position I now occupy, as leader of the opposition, that nothing could be more embarrassing than the duty which is sometimes placed upon the one who holds this office of saying things which, while unpleasant, must, in the public interest be stated. To me personally it would be much more satisfactory and agreeable to be able to compliment my right hon. friend on the part he had played at the Imperial conference. Indeed when he left I hope I manifested the desire I sought to evince at the time, namely that he might succeed, and I hope that by withholding any comments while he was at the Imperial conference I had made it clear that I wished in no way to embarrass him. Indeed it was my desire to save him from all embarrassment in the matter of attaining what was, according to his own statement, the great and main object that of maintaining and enlarging the market for Canadian wheat in Great Britain.

The Prime Minister must be judged with respect to his action at the Imperial conference by his attitude of approach, by his utterances and by his policies. For a short time this evening I intend to review these three features of his presentation of Canada's case at the Imperial conference. We will judge the outcome of his mission by its results. It is fair to ask: are conditions better to-day in this country than they were when my right hon. friend went to the conference, and are they better as a result of his having participated in it? Are the relations between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain better to-day than they were in the past? These are fair questions and we are entitled to judge of the results of his visit to London by the answers to be given to them.

The house is well aware that there is a well-known method of procedure followed at all Imperial conferences. This was not the first Imperial conference, nor was it the first Imperial economic conference. If I am not mistaken there have been altogether some twelve or fourteen different conferences during the last thirty or forty years. In that period of time public men belonging to different political parties have met and discussed the affairs which they went into conference for the purpose of considering. In that period of time there have grown up certain methods of procedure, certain practices and certain precedents, all of which have a bearing upon the work of Imperial conferences. These practices and precedents are well known, and the business of conferences is so arranged as to meet the difficult and perplexing situations that arise, particularly inasmuch as the business of conferences has to be conducted in relation to the possible opinion which foreign countries may get of the empire from the discussions which take place in the attempted solution of the different problems. In order to facilitate the work of the conference considerable preparation is made in advance. The different governments to be represented make known to each other what subjects they wish to have taken up; and the order in which the subjects are to be taken up is set forth in an agenda. The conference opens in a manner intended to help to create a favourable atmosphere for discussion. The first meetings are intended for informal discussion and for the making of such statements as can be given immediately to the public expressive of the attitude towards each other of the different governments represented at the conference. It is important to keep in mind that conferences are exactly what they are termed to be—they are conferences. They are neither cabinets laying down Imperial policies, nor are they parliaments in which members meet to discuss in public matters of mutual concern. Unless it were understood there was to be a certain method of approach and a certain amount of privacy thrown around the proceedings at the outset, it would be impossible to get governments to go into conference with each other. If my right hon. friend says that all that is to be discussed at a conference ought to be proclaimed from the rooftops right from the outset, that all should be made known, I would say that if that is to be the known procedure, governments will refuse to go into conferences with each other. They must be secured to a certain extent, at least until all positions are known, against having their positions publicly criticized. Let me make myself plain by saying that I am the last one who would sympathize with any proposal that whatever is done must be done wholly in camera, or that policies should be made is secret. A conference has no power to lay down a policy. The different representatives at a conference may present to one another their own points of view; they may present views which in their opinion will be of the greatest service, but they are expected to do so in a manner which will not embarrass the governments to which they are speaking or which are there represented.

It has always been understood at Imperial conferences that any member of the conference is free to state to his own parliament when he returns the position that he took and the objections, if any, which were offered to his attitude and proposals. He is perfectly free to make to his own parliament whatever statement he pleases, so that every phase of the situation may be well known; but he is not expected to embarrass all proceedings by talking publicly at the very outset an attitude which makes all conference impossible.

So obvious are these things that it is extraordinary that one has to mention them. In an Imperial conference, just as in all conferences between governments, each government must of necessity respect what it knows to be the known policies and domestic affairs of another government. No government has any right in a conference to criticize the domestic affairs of another, to take up matters of domestic policy, or to find fault with the policies of the governments with which it is conferring. It may seek to bring about a change but not to force a change. When in conference governments have to respect the position of the other, they have to respect the point of view of the other. If a Conservative government is in office in Great Britain and a Liberal government goes there to represent Canada, as was the case in 1923 and 1926, it would be highly improper for the head of the Liberal administration to find fault at the outset with the Conservative government for having certain Conservative policies with respect to taxation, tariffs, and the like. It would have been extremely resented by this parliament if, when my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and I were at the last conference, we had at the outset stated that we were not in sympathy with the policies of Mr. Baldwin and his government and that unless those policies were changed there was possible a dismemberment of the empire or something of the kind. I say it does not matter what the particular political complexion of the government of the day is, that government has a right to have its policies respected.

Moreover, the government in office represents the people of the country. It may in some instances be unfortunate that such is so—I think it is very unfortunate that such is the case as respects hon. gentlemen opposite—but they do represent the country. When my right hon. friend went to England to speak at the conference he expected that he would be regarded as speaking in the name of the country. Unfortunately, his party feeling got a little the better of him. He told the conference at the outset that he represented the Conservative party, rather an extraordinary statement to make to any conference of governments; but if we set that aside, the point that will be clear and self-evident is this, that each government must respect the governments of the day represented at the conference and have respect for their policies. The position, so far as the recent Imperial conference is concerned, was the more critical in that Great Britain was the hostess, so to speak, on this occasion. She had invited to the conference the governments of the different dominions and she was in a position where the whole procedure had to be shaped accordingly. In the same Canada will be the hostess at the conference that is to take place later in the year when the procedure no doubt will be arranged not to have Canada the first to speak and to lay down her proposals but to hear the others first. Great Britain's position was, as I say, that of the hostess of the conference and matters were so arranged as to give to the Prime Minister of Canda, as representing the oldest dominion, the first right to speak. Under those circumstances the Prime Minister owed it especially to the country he was representing to proceed in the proper way, in a courteous way, in a way that would have regard to the precedents that had been laid down and for the procedure that had been adopted at previous conferences. He was at fault many times, but one of the worst mistakes he made was in ignoring altogether the precedents and procedure of preceding conferences. In his rough-and-ready fashion he simply swept to one side the whole accepted method of procedure, went into the conference and laid down the law to everyone present before anyone else had had a chance to be heard. He made no reference to the governments which he was addressing, no reference to the British government, no reference to the governments of the other dominions, no reference to the Prime Minister or the other prime ministers present. The first and only reference was to himself as the Prime Minister of Canada and the policies which he stood for and was going to stand for at the conference.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear" and applaud. I hope the country will notice their attitude—they are running true to form—an attitude of assurance and arrogance, the like of which has never been known in Canada before.

I am going to discuss the Prime Minister's attitude and actions from four points of view. First of all I intend to speak of his method of approach, to which I have already alluded. Then I intend to refer to the proposals he made to the conference, then a word or two about his petulant and childish outburst against the mild form of criticism of his proposal in the British House of Commons and lastly I should like to say something about the interference in the domestic affairs of other countries, the taking of sides with political parties in other countries, when one is supposed to be representing one's country as a whole, not any political party, and to have regard for all the amenities that pertain to public life and affairs in any land.

As to the method of approach, may I say that my right hon. friend in his very first remarks said that in the course of a day or two he would give to the conference his reasoned views. This shows that evidently, when he was here at the special session of parliament, he had in mind the line of procedure which he was going to take, the policy that he was going to lay down. Every step was calculated, was carefully worked out. He took the position that he did, presented his proposals as he did, in order to help to draw attention to them publicly, notwithstanding that, as he must have known, they were proposals extremely embarrassing to the government that he was meeting in conference in the old land. I do not know that I can do better than to take the words of my right hon. friend and read to the house from his speech. I will not read the whole of it; I will read parts that will illustrate his method of approach.

This method of approach, if I may pause for a moment to say so, resembled nothing more closely than the presentation of an ultimatum to an unfriendly nation on the eve of war. That was the nature of it. It was a proposal which the Prime Minister must have known was impossible of acceptance. It must have been presented deliberately with a view to having it turned down. That is the way in which quarrels are deliberately made between nations, the way in which trouble has been bred at all times in international relations—proposals made which are known to be in the nature of an affront to the government to which they are directed, proposals which it is known are bound to meet with rejection, and then action taken as a consequence of their rejection. That was the method of approach, accompanied by all of the extreme of language that usually goes with an ultimatum presented in that way. Mark you, this is Canada's way of getting a market for her wheat in Britain. What I want hon. members of the house and parliament and the country generally and hon. gentlemen opposite who are applauding this method of procedure, to keep in mind is that the Prime Minister himself stated that his object was to get a market for the sale of Canadian wheat. This is the way he went about getting in Britain a market, and a preference that other countries would not have. Let me read what he said. As I have already pointed out, no reference is made to any prime minister present other than himself, whom he introduces as the great "I am."

Mr. GOTT: Childish.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is not childish. They are the exact words used by the Prime Minister. I intend to quote them in a moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The right hon. member will be sorry for this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I ask you to note the remarks of my hon. friend who says I will be sorry for this. He is following his usual practice of making threats across the floor of the house. Everyone knows the arrogant tongue that my hon. friend has. He may until doomsday tell me that I will be sorry, but I am going to stand here and say what I believe the people of Canada desire to have said at this time. Let me quote the words of the Prime Minister, his pleasing words of introduction. This is taken from the text and if in any particular I err, I hope my right hon. friend will correct me.

> Before offering to this conference the plan which, once effective, will in my opinion make for greater prosperity in all parts of the empire, I shall briefly state the fiscal policy of the Canadian administration, of which I am the head.

There are the words "I am." He then proceeds in the name, not of Canada, or of the people of Canada, or even of the government of Canada, but of the Conservative party of Canada:

> The Conservative party—

This is in England at the conference.

> —of Canada believes in, and employe the principle of protection of the home producer of agricultural and fabricated products from harmful interference by foreign competitors.

Note these words:

> This policy of the Conservative party has come to be known as the policy of "Canada first." In approaching the economic problems of our empire, I stand four-square behind that policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall ask the house to watch the applause of my hon. friends opposite when for sake of illustration a little later on I use similar words and language coming supposedly from the lips of the British Prime Minister, The quotation continues:

> The primary concern of Canada to-day is profitably to sell its wheat. We believe that we shall be reaching towards a solution of that problem if we can establish a better market in Great Britain. This market we want, and for it we are willing to pay by giving in the Canadian market a preference for British goods. . . .
> And so, I propose that we of the British Empire, in our joint and several interests, do subscribe to the principle of an empire preference, and that we take, without delay, the steps necessary to put it into effective operation.

Note those words, "the principle of an empire preference."

> First, we must approve or reject the principle. I put the question definitely to you, and definitely it should be answered. There is here no room for compromise, and there is no possibility of avoiding the issue. This is a time for plain speaking, and I speak plainly when I say the day is now at hand when the peoples of the empire must decide, once and for all, whether our welfare lies in closer economic union, or whether it does not. Delay is hazardous; further discussion of the principle is surely unnecessary. The time for action has come.

Projects other than the one I propose have been placed before you. They have been carefully canvassed by our delegation, and, while we would avoid anything which might savour of premature condemnation, we are constrained to state that none of them can be accepted by Canada as alternatives at all likely to achieve the purpose we have in mind.

Until this principle is accepted it would be profitless to discuss the application of it in any great detail. . . .

Then follows the so-called "offer" to "the mother country and to all other parts of the empire"—"based upon a 10 per cent increase in prevailing general tariffs or upon tariffs yet to be created," and the Prime Minister's conception of the manner in which the principle may be employed, and the method of its application. Emphasis is laid upon the fact that "the basis of the proposal is the adequate protection to industries now existent, or yet to be established," and this is further emphasized by the statement:

It follows, therefore, that this proposed preference should not be considered as a step towards empire free trade. In our opinion empire free trade is neither desirable nor possible, for it would defeat the very purpose we are striving to achieve.

Of the "offer" I shall speak in a moment. Then follows:

But whatever modifications may be found necessary, these will not adversely affect—nay, they cannot but make more beneficial and lasting—the broad principle of empire protection. . . .

Consistent with the fullest inquiry into the application of the principle of an empire preference, our deliberations must be governed by the time factor. If this change in our economic relationship is to be made, it must be made without undue delay. . . .

Here the suggestion is made to the conference, "if it approve the principle, to constitute such committees as may, with the greatest expedition and thoroughness, consider the various questions incident to its operation." The Prime Minister adds:

I am satisfied that whatever modifications in the general plan Canada may have to suggest will be ready for submission within a period of six months. I assume that you are all capable of a like measure of expedition.

Then follows an invitation to the conference to meet at Ottawa early this year, and the following as a final word of warning:

I have said that the time is now at hand when the doctrine of closer empire economic association must be embraced, if we would not have it slip forever beyond our powers of recall. Once again it were vain to suppose that lesser existing empire agreements will long outlive it, and, that being so, the day will come when we must fight in the markets of the empire the countries of the world shorn of that advantage which it should be in our individual interest to secure and maintain.

To me that is unthinkable, and I appeal to the national representatives here assembled in conference to forget, each one, those prejudices which forbid the realization of that empire-building plan by which we all may advance to greater prosperity.

I await your decision with confidence.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what possibly could be the result of approaching the British government in that manner? There is no reference whatever to any policy of that government; there is no reference to their views and no reference to the views of the other dominions. It refers only to the Dominion of Canada and to the Conservative party of this country. With that policy the entire conference must be content. The conference was told it could not proceed with its deliberations until it had approved of the principle set out by my right hon. friend.

What reception would Mr. Ramsay MacDonald have received from my right hon. friend if the conference had been held in Ottawa instead of in England as it was originally hoped it might be, and if Mr. Ramsay MacDonald when first called upon to address the conference had proceeded in the manner adopted by my right hon. friend? Mr. Ramsay MacDonald has as much right to his views as has my right hon. friend as to what will bring about empire unity and prosperity. Let us suppose Mr. MacDonald had said that the government in office in Great Britain, the Labour government, believed in the policy of free trade, and that he thought the British Empire had become great by virtue of the policy of free trade which has existed for a hundred years in the British Isles; that the policy of free trade had led to an extension of the empire. Supposing Mr. Ramsay MacDonald had gone on to say: "That is the policy of the Labour party in England; I stand four square behind that policy and I am not prepared to consider anything until this conference endorses the principle of free trade, the principle our government has adopted. This is the time for action; this is not the time for words. Time is slipping from us. There will be no use discussing the situation unless you will agree to the policy I have laid before you." What kind of reception would my right hon. friend have given Mr. Ramsay MacDonald? Supposing Mr. MacDonald had then gone on to present certain proposals to the government of which my right hon. friend is the head; supposing he had suggested proposals in accordance with his views to reduce or abolish tariffs. Supposing Mr. MacDonald had said: "We want to sell our goods to Canada. We are prepared to pay the price for it. We are prepared to give you a chance to trade in the British market but we tell you that before you consider the matter we want you to subscribe to the principle of free trade. We want you to agree to reduce your tariff or to abolish it altogether. Unless you will do so immediately there is no use of our discussing the matter any further."

That was the attitude taken by my right hon. friend. I do not hear very much applause from the other side of the house.

What kind of reception would Mr. MacDonald have received in Canada if he had made statements such as those which were made by the Prime Minister of Canada in Great Britain? I ask my hon. friends what kind of reception would representatives from Australia, New Zealand or South Africa have received in this dominion if they had spoken in the manner adopted by my right hon. friend? I wonder what would have happened to the object of their respective missions? In case I have done the Prime Minister the slightest injustice may I read as if it had come from the lips of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald a statement as nearly identical as it can be made with the statement which was made by my right hon. friend to the British government. I have substituted of course the policy of free trade which has been adopted by the MacDonald government for the policy of high protection adopted by the government of my right hon. friend. Let us suppose for the moment that Mr. Ramsay MacDonald is speaking. We will have to assume the fact because nothing could be more remote than the possibility of any other person on earth but my right hon. friend using such language. Let us use as if used by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald words as nearly as possible identical. He would then have said:

> Before offering to this conference the plan which, once effective, will in my opinion make for greater prosperity in all parts of the empire, I shall briefly state the fiscal policy of the administration of Great Britain, of which I am the head.
> The Labour party of Great Britain believes in, and employs, the principle of free trade as of most advantage to the home producer of agricultural and fabricated products in world competition.
> This policy of the Labour party has come to be known as the policy of "Great Britain First." In approaching the economic problems of our Empire, I stand four square behind that policy. . . .

Where is the applause from my hon. friends opposite? This is the kind of utterance of the Prime Minister which they applauded a few minutes ago. Why do they not now applaud?

> The primary concern of Great Britain to-day is profitably to sell her manufactures. We believe that we shall be reaching towards a solution of that problem if we can establish a better market in Canada. This market we want, and for it we are willing to pay by giving in the British market a preference for Canadian goods. . . .
> And so, I propose that we of the British Empire, in our joint and several interests, do subscribe to the principle of empire free trade, and that we take, without delay, the steps necessary to put it into effective operation.
> First we must approve or reject the principle. I put the question definitely to you, and definitely it should be answered. There is here no room for compromise, and there is no possibility of avoiding the issue. This is a time for plain speaking, and I speak plainly when I say the day is now at hand when the peoples of the empire must decide, once and for all, whether our welfare lies in closer economic union, thus secured, or whether it does not. Delay is hazardous; further discussion of the principle is surely unnecessary. The time for action has come.

No wonder the Prime Minister himself will not applaud even his own sentiments!

> Projects other than the one I propose have been placed before you. They have been carefully canvassed by our delegation, and, while we would avoid anything which might savour of premature condemnation, we are constrained to state that none of them can be accepted by Great Britain as an alternative at all likely to achieve the purpose we have in mind.
> Until this principle is accepted it would be profitless to discuss the application of it in any great detail.

Then would follow the so-called "offer" to "Canada and to all the other parts of empire" —"based upon a 10 per cent reduction in prevailing general tariffs or upon tariffs yet to be created," and the Prime Minister of Britain's conception of the manner in which the principle may be employed, and the method of its application. Emphasis would be laid on the fact that he proposed free trade, and that it followed that what was proposed could not be considered as a step towards empire protection, that in the opinion of Great Britain empire protection was neither desirable nor possible, for it would defeat the very purpose they were trying to achieve. Mr. MacDonald would then have proceeded:

> But whatever modifications may be found necessary these will not adversely affect—nay, they cannot but make more beneficial and lasting—the broad principle of empire free trade. . . .
> Consistent with the fullest inquiry into the application of the principle of empire free trade, our deliberations must be governed by the time factor. If this change in our economic relationship is to be made it must be made without undue delay.

Here the suggestion would be made, "if we approve the principle," to constitute such committees as may, with the greatest expedition and thoroughness, consider the various questions incident to its operation. The Prime Minister of Britain would then have added:

I am satisfied that whatever modifications in the general plan Britain may have to suggest will be ready for submission within a period of six months. I assume that you are all capable of a like measure of expedition.

There would follow an invitation to the conference to meet at London early this year, and the following as a final word of warning:

I have said that the time is now at hand when the doctrine of closer empire economic association, based on free trade within the empire, must be embraced, if we would not have it slip forever beyond our powers of recall. Once gone it were vain to suppose that lesser existing empire agreements will long outlive it, and, that being so, the day will come when we must fight in the markets of the empire the countries of the world shorn of that advantage which it should be in our individual interest to secure and maintain.

To me that is unthinkable. and I appeal to the national representatives here assembled in conference to forget, each one, those prejudices which forbid the realization of that empire-building plan by which we all may advance to greater prosperity.

I await your decision with confidence. . . .

I ask, Mr. Speaker—and I take the silence of hon. gentlemen opposite to be more eloquent than all their words and all their applause—I ask you, Sir, what would have happened had Mr. Ramsay MacDonald come to this country and addressed the right hon. Prime Minister and his government in that fashion? I venture to say there would have been an explosion the like of which we have not experienced in our time. My right hon. friend would never have stood for anything of the kind, and the people of this country would have backed him up in his resentment. But when we consider that this was done for the alleged reason of securing the market in Great Britain for Canadian wheat, it becomes impossible to conceive of how my right hon. friend thought he was going to succeed in that way. Supposing I had gone to the conference and had made a statement of that kind?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wonder at my hon. friends opposite saying, "Oh, oh." If I had spoken as the right hon. Prime Minister spoke at that conference, every hon. gentleman opposite would have been down at the seaside to prevent me from landing on the shores of Canada. We certainly would have had a full chorus.

In all seriousness I ask the house if human nature is any different in Great Britain from what it is here; whether the people of Great Britain are any less sensitive to the manner in which they are approached than are the people of Canada. They have shown very fine restraint in the old land in the way in which they have accepted this attitude on the part of my right hon. friend—a restraint, I am obliged to say, very different from what he would have exercised had anything similar taken place here. But we must not be deceived by the measure of restraint which has been exercised by the people of Great Britain. That has been done out of courtesy, out of a just regard for the relation of the different parts of the empire, one to the other and in an endeavour to help preserve their right relation. It has not been done out of any acquiescence in the particular kind of thing which the Prime Minister has proposed, or in the way in which he went about it.

Again I come back to what I said this afternoon: I cannot attribute my right hon. friend's action as related at all to the sale of the wheat of Canada in Great Britain. The only explanation that satisfies me, having knowledge to some extent of the working of my right hon. friend's mind, is that he wanted this offer refused for reasons best known to himself. Whether it was he thought he was thereby going to help along the idea of an empire economic unit I do not know. But we all know that there is a strong suspicion that my right hon. friend does not find the Labour government of Britain congenial, that he would much rather see the Conservative party in office there; and there are some who have had in mind that my right hon. friend's action was due to the fact that he was becoming, secretly or openly, as you care to put it, an ally of the political party in Great Britain that holds views somewhat similar to his own, that he was anxious to create a prejudice against the Labour government and put them in a position where they would appear to have refused the offer of Canada, to have been unwilling to accept such a simple principle as that of preference and the like. That opinion has become very general. Personally I do not entertain it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I may be wrong. After all, my hon. friends understand the Tory mentality better than I do. They certainly gave away their hand when they made that interruption. I will leave it, Mr. Speaker, to the public to draw its own conclusion, and perhaps my right hon. friend can give us his statement of the position. But I say that when under the ostensible reason of finding a market for Canadian wheat, the government in office in Great Britain was approached in such a manner we have to look for other explanations, and that one seems to many, the most plausible of any.

I come now to the proposals themselves. The method of approach was bad enuogh; the proposals were even worse. The proposals were of a character that could not possibly be entertained by the government in office in Great Britain to-day, or by any government that might be formed there at the present time. I think I shall be able to make that clear. I hope this country will get a true appreciation of what these proposals were. Up to the present time the people for the most part, do not understand just what it was my right hon. friend proposed to the British government, because he sought to befog the whole matter with the use he made of the acceptance of the so-called principle of the preference.

One point I hope I have already made clear, with respect to my hon. friend's proposal is that they were peremptory in their character. Let me quote a few of the phrases that appeared in the presentation of the proposals to the British government: "This market we want," "subscribe without delay", "must approve or reject", "a time for plain speaking", "the day is now at hand", "decide once and for all", "further discussion .....is .....unnecessary", "time for action", "deliberations must be governed by the time factor", "change.....must be made without undue delay", "the time is now at hand when the doctrine must be embraced", "I await your decision." These are samples of the persuasive methods adopted by my right hon. friend in his now-or-never, take-it-or-leave-it attitude at the Imperial conference.

Let me give the exact terms of the proposals. I wish to do my hon. friend full justice, and therefore I will read the proposals in his own words. They are very simple; to understand them aright there are three paragraphs which must be read together. The proposal first of all was to grant a preference in the Canadian market by an increase in the tariff of 10 per cent; on condition of a similar increase in the British tariff. Next, the basis on which the proposal was made was adequate protection for all industries in Canada. The Prime Minister went on to explain elsewhere that by "adequate protection" he meant that anything that could be produced or manufactured in this country should be produced and manufactured here and in no way subjected to competition from without. In the third place he laid down the doctrine that the principle of preference must be accepted. That, as it stands, sounds very plausible. But when one examines his words, it will be seen that what he meant by the principle of preference, what the public understood he meant and what most of the hon. members of this house even now understand, I venture to say, as having been meant by "preference" is not at all what my hon. friend had in mind. He had reference to a brand of preference of his own, fashioned deliberately in a manner which made it wholly impossible of acceptance by the British government.

In order to give the Prime Minister's exact words let me quote the proposal:

> I offer to the mother country and to all the other parts of the empire a preference in the Canadian market in exchange for a like preference in theirs, based upon the addition of a 10 per centum increase in prevailing general tariffs or upon tariffs yet to be created. In the universal acceptance of this offer, and in like proposals and acceptances by all the other parts of the empire, we attain to the ideal of empire preference.

Now, as to the basis on which the offer is made, the paragraph immediately following amplifies and explains the offer. It is as follows:

> I amplify and explain this offer in the following ways. In the first place, the rate I have mentioned cannot be uniformly applied. The basis of the proposal is the adequate protection to industries now existent or yet to be established. Because of this we must ensure a certain flexibility in the preferential tariff having regard to the fundamental need for stability in trade conditions, and must take account of such prevailing preferences as are now higher than the general one I suggested.

Then the principle of preference is to be approved of. The offer thus amplified is conditioned upon the acceptance of an empire preference, the nature of which is more or less apparent from the offer as explained. It was referred to at the outset as acceptance of the principle of preference, and I have already read the language in which this condition was set forth. I shall not repeat it in full but will extract the essential paragraphs:

> And so I propose that we of the British Empire, in our joint and several interests, do subscribe to the principle of an empire preference and that we take without delay the steps necessary to put it into effective operation. . . .
> First we must approve or reject the principle. . . .
> Until this principle is accepted, it would be profitless to discuss the application of it in any great detail.

The offer, therefore, reduces itself to three simple propositions or terms, each of which must be taken in conjunction with the other. Here is the whole offer in a nutshell: it is an offer of a preference in the Canadian market, first of all in exchange for a like preference, based upon the addition of a 10 per cent increase in the prevailing general tariffs or upon tariffs yet to be created. The basis of the proposal is the adequate protection to industries now existent or yet to be established. Parties must first subscribe to the principle of an empire preference meaning by "empire preference" what my right hon. friend desired it to mean.

The first thing to be noted about the offer, Mr. Speaker, is the ambiguity of every section of it. The offer is ambiguous with respect to the meaning of the 10 per cent increase; it is ambiguous as to what is meant by adequate protection; it is ambiguous as to the principle of preference which my hon. friend says must be subscribed to at once and first of all. Let us take those three and examine them for a moment. The offer was that of a preference in the Canadian market based upon a 10 per cent increase in existing tariffs or tariffs yet to be created. When that proposal was made the public in England, the public in this country, and indeed the Canadian Press correspondent and others who cabled despatches to this country gave the impression, which was generally prevalent, that the 10 per cent increase meant 10 per cent in addition to the existing tariff, not 10 per cent of the tariff already in effect. To use the words used by the Prime Minister himself, in interpretation it was to be a 10 per cent increase "of" and not "in" the tariff. In other words, if a tariff stood at 30 per cent then the preference was to be created not by raising it to 40 per cent but by making it 33 per cent. The general public was under the impression that what my hon. friend meant was that as against foreign countries the tariff was to be increased by an additional 10 per cent. That was the impression that led so many tariff reformers in Great Britain to hail his offer at the outset as meaning something to Great Britain. As I have said, that offer did not mean an increase of 10 per cent; it meant an increase of only about 3 per cent when the actual facts came to be known.

The point to notice carefully, however, is this: the preference was not to be a preference created in the manner in which heretofore all preferences have been created, by reducing an existing tariff in order to give an advantage to another country to get into the market by a reduction in the tariff; it was a preference created only by additions to tariffs already existing. That kind of thing has never been considered heretofore, in any part of the British Empire, in any discussions of the matter, as the way to create a preference, and that is where so much confusion has arisen with respect to my right hon. friend's offer. In all previous discussions, when Canada talked of giving Britain a preference she meant that if, for example, her tariff stood at 30 per cent against other countries it would stand at some lower per cent, say 20 per cent, with regard to Great Britain. That was not what my hon. friend was suggesting; he said, "My preference is going to be made in this way: I have put up the tariffs already against Great Britain and against every other country as high as I can. Now my offer is this: If you will give us a chance to sell our wheat in the British market, give us a preference here, we will, as against foreign countries, add another 10 per cent to this high tariff we have already put up."

That was the offer. Do you wonder that the people of Great Britain were against it, and indignant, into the bargain, in having a proposal of that kind made to them? Again I ask the house, how could my hon. friend expect to add to the market for Canadian wheat on a basis of that kind? What did it mean as far as Great Britain was concerned? I will come, perhaps a little later, to how much Britain was going to get out of anything of that kind. But notice, first, that the preference was of necessity to be of a reciprocal nature; it could be carried out only by each country doing the same kind of thing. That meant that Britain had to put up a tariff first of all, and only when she put up a tariff was it that Canada would get the preference in her market. It meant a change in the whole fiscal policy of Britain, and that change was to be made in relation to food and raw materials. That change was to put a tariff on wheat and other commodities of that character going into the British market.

The fact must always be taken into account, that Britain had to consider not only the request of my right hon. friend, but what, under the circumstances, would have to be done for the other dominions as well. If Canada's wheat was to get a special advantage, through a wall being put up in Britain against wheat coming from other countries, then Australia being interested in some other commodities, New Zealand and South Africa being similarly interested, and tariff walls would have to be raised as well against other countries in respct of the particular commodities in which those Dominions might be interested. So that what my right hon. friend was proposing to the British government was that Britain should change her whole fiscal policy, putting up a tariff wall against all other nations, while he in return would give them a preference, not by reducing a wall already so high that they could not get their goods into Canada, but by raising still higher the wall against all other nations in the world. That was the offer.

My right hon. friend emphasized very carefully, so far as Canada was concerned in relation to goods coming from Britain, the prohibitive nature of the tariff proposals which he was making by saying that it must never be forgotten that they were based on the idea of adequate protection to Canadian industry. And he was to be the judge of what constituted adequate protection. He has told us that his policy was to make Canada an economic unit, to see that whatever was produced or could be produced or manufactured here should be produced or manfactured here and should not come from anywhere else. It is only after that wall has been created, after Canada has been made an economic unit in this way, that Britain is to be allowed to try to get over that wall with any commodities she may have to sell. In other words, his offer was that Canada should have the right to sell her wheat in the British market, but Britain was not to have the right to sell her commodities in the Canadian market. That is the position.

Now let me go a step further as to what was meant by subscribing to the principle of the preference—because, in my opinion, that is most important. It is most unfair to the British government, it is most unfair to other governments that were present at the conference, to have it appear that anyone of them was seeking to reject the principle of preference. The British government made it perfectly clear that, with respect to certain commodities on which to-day there is a tariff in Britain, a preference is being given to Canada by Canada having her goods admitted at a lower rate. The Right Hon. Mr. Snowden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, undertook that the preference should be maintained for three years, at least so long as the tariffs themselves were maintained. All other dominions had preferences existing in their tariffs, so that there could be no question that every government there was prepared to subscribe to the principle of preference. Yet my right hon. friend makes his statement, his appeals to the country, in a manner that would have it appear that the British government was not prepared to accept the principle which all other dominions wanted. He will probably tell us that he was joined by all other dominions in the demand for preference. Certainly; because all those other dominions have protective walls around their countries at the present time, and they were quite prepared to follow the course which they pursue to-day, of continuing a preference to Britain, hoping to get a further preference in the British market. Every government in Canada, Liberal and Conservative alike, has taken the view that we should like to get a preference. But we never made our wishes known in the form of an ultimatum. No other prime minister of Canada has addressed the British government in the fashion my right hon. friend has done; no other prime minister has delivered to the British government an ultimatum of the kind he presented, calling upon the government to subscribe to a principle determined in his own way. My right hon. friend's principle of preference was entirely different from what was meant by preference to others present at the conference. I want him to correct me if I am wrong, so that the shall be no mistake as to what sort of preference he meant, or what it was he meant by the principle of preference. He does not mean a preference granted by reducing duties; that is perfectly clear. My right hon. friend admits it by his silence.

Mr. BENNETT: He does not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the proposal, whether he admits it or not.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes it is; that is the proposal. I shall be glad to have my right hon. friend make a statement when the time comes, but I want to get the position of the matter correctly stated. I wish to repeat, because I think it is all important that it should be understood, that the proposal which my right hon. friend made with regard to the preference, so far as Canada was concerned, was not for a preference by the reducing of duties as they are at the present time, but that it was a preference to be created by the addition in relation to other countries of duties to the duties that already exist. It was that feature of it that made the principle so objectionable to the British government. More than that, my right hon friend uses the term "empire preference," and by "empire preference" he means a certain kind of two sided or reciprocal preference. He has stated over and over again—all his discussions are along these lines—that a preference of the kind to which I have just referred, the reducing of the tariff in any country, is a one-sided preference. He says that is no kind of preference—failing to appreciate that the purpose of a preference is to help to encourage trade, that all exchange is valuable to both sides, that consumers may benefit on one side and producers on the other, or vice versa, that trade begets trade, and that anything that helps trade in one direction helps it in another. My right hon. friend will not admit that the reduction of duties to afford a preference is in any way a thing of advantage. He says it must be what he calls mutual, failing to realize that there would be no trade at all, whether there were preference or no preference unless the benefit were mutual. It takes two to trade. He is not satisfied even with a preference on both sides, a mutual preference professedly such. And here again I will ask him to correct me if I am wrong. The preference has to be a preference created over and above existing tariffs on both sides. Take for example Lord Beaverbrook's crusade in Britain at the present time. What is it? It is a crusade based on the idea of tariffs raised for the purpose of giving a preference by doing away with the tariff, or lowering it, as within the empire itself. My right hon. friend expressedly said, "That is not a preference at all within my meaning of the word. That is impossible. So far as my offer is concerned, it defeats the very end I have in view, because my offer is not to encourage free trade or greater freedom of trade within the empire; it is the very opposite; it is to make a self-contained unit of the Dominion."

I think it is very important that this should be clearly understood, because it must affect the whole discussion and our views in regard to the question; and I venture to say that there are many hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house who have never clearly seen the position taken by my right hon. friend in this respect.

In order to make it perfectly clear that such was the view the British government took of the matter, let me read what was said by Lord Passfield in the House of Lords in stating the position of the British government. And in passing may I remark that it is very little wonder that the Prime Minister of Great Britain, when addressing his own parliament, felt obliged to say, in reference to the proposed offer, "tax wheat—we cannot do it." That was the terse reply which the Prime Minister of Great Britain gave to his house. Tax wheat? Put up a tariff wall first of all? That was the condition. To get the reciprocal nature of it, the empire aspect of the preference as my right hon. friend desired it, Britain had to put on a tariff against food and raw materials in the first instance. Mr. MacDonald saw that; they all saw it. He said, "How can we do it? Tax wheat? We cannot do it." That was his answer, and anyone who knows the position of Britain must know that that was the answer that would be made by any prime minister of Great Britain to any such proposal. Lord Passfield spoke in the House of Lords on December 2. Lord Passfield, it will be remembered, was for a time Secretary of State for the Dominions and is now Secretary of State for the colonies. He was present at all the meetings of the conference—

Let me give what Lord Passfield said in the House of Lords on December 2. Lord Passfield, it will be remembered, was for a time Secretary of State for the Dominions and is now Secretary of State for the colonies. He was present at all the meetings of the conference—

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, some of them. He was present long enough to understand the offers and the nature of them, and he has given an admirable summing up of the whole subject. The record of the House of Lords of December 2, records Lord Passfield as saying:

> The main proposal, which is summed up in the proposal that Mr. Bennett made, at what is called the second plenary session, was the principle of preference, which he then and there asked the conference, including the United Kingdom representatives, to subscribe to in principle. It has always been treated as if it was a question of preference, but we quickly found it was not a question of preference as ordinarily understood. It was a question, not of this country or the dominions allowing a preference off customs duties which were in existence, or put on for their own sake, or to meet the needs of the government, but we were asked to subscribe to putting a duty on foodstuffs coming into this country, and especially wheat coming into this country, not because a customs duty was required, or there was any reason for a customs duty in this country, but deliberately in order that we might allow a substantial preference off that duty to empire wheat. . . . That was a proposition to which, mind you, His Majesty's government were invited to subscribe before it was examined in its details. . . .
> The Ottawa conference was a proposal of Mr. Bennett himself made at the very outset, and accepted at the very outset for the obvious reason that there was not adequate time to go into this question now. Mr. Bennett's statement, which appears in to-day's newspapers (December 2nd)—

That was the broadside he issued over the "humbug" incident.

> —has been quoted, that during the whole period of the conference neither the principle of tariff preferences, nor his plans to make them operative, was seriously discussed. . . .
> Nothing was referred to any committee during that Imperial conference except by the unanimous consent of the delegations. And if what Mr. Bennett called the principle of preferences, including a duty on foodstuffs, especially wheat, was not referred to the economic committee, I will go so far as to say that it was not at the dictation of His Majesty's government that it was not so referred; it was because it was impossible to get the unanimous assent of the delegations to its being so referred. . . . In the result Mr. Bennett is able to say that they were not discussed, and, I think, seriously discussed, in the meetings of the heads of delegations. . . . Your lordships will find in the press reports day by day a good deal of evidence that it was discussed at the meetings of heads of delegations. And I myself was present day after day when these things were discussed. But it is quite true they were only discussed as a sort of second reading discussion because, as Mr. Bennett has said in his speech at the second plenary meeting, he wanted the conference to subscribe to the principle before any more minute examination took place. We never did manage to subscribe to the principle. . . . Because, remember what Mr. Bennett's principle was. It was not the principle of preference that many guileless people have supposed. It was not even the principle of extending that preference to every customs duty that was in existence, or might be brought into existence. It was that a new customs duty should be put upon foodstuffs imported into this country, and this country only, or that this country only should be required to put a substantial customs duty upon foodstuffs, and especially upon wheat in order to give a substantial preference to the dominions in respect of all those things. All that was included in Mr. Bennett's principle, and will be found as a part of his speech which has been reported verbatim.

After listening to a statement of that kind can one wonder that a proposal of the kind was characterized as "humbug." How could the British people consider it as anything else? They were asked to put a tax upon food and raw materials coming into their country and in return there was not to be any lowering in Canada of higher duties which had been placed upon their commodities at the last session, but still higher duties were to be placed upon similar goods coming into this country from other lands. That is the proposal which was made. Again I go back to the question: how did the Prime Minister of Canada think that under a proposal of that kind he was going to get Canadian wheat into the British market? That is a question which keeps reiterating itself in one's mind. One is forced to the conclusion that some object other than that must have been in his mind, and so I come back to the view that the object he had so far as Canada was concerned was to make this country, as he has stated over and over again, an economic unit, a so-called self-sufficing unit, a country which will produce everything within its own borders and which will not have to import anything from any other part of the world; it will all be done here. He believes that that is a wise policy to pursue, and extending that idea into the realm of empire, he talks about an empire economic unit wherein, after each part has been made self-sufficing, the empire shall exclude itself from the rest of the world. With such an idea in mind one can understand such a proposal being put up although certain to be rejected, but as a means of selling Canadian wheat in the British market I say it is impossible of interpretation upon any such basis.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the right hon. gentleman explain how a tariff preference can be given in the English market for Canadian wheat except there be tariffs against foreign wheats entering that market?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know that I am called upon to explain the matter in just the way my right hon. friend has put the question, but I will say this to him: the trouble with my hon. friend and with those who think like him is this, they can only admit in their mind one kind of preference, and that of a tariff preference. They cannot understand that there may be such a thing as a voluntary preference.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. members may laugh at that, but they cannot understand any such thing as a recognition of good will or a recognition of the fact of our being part of one great British community. I repeat, they cannot understand how there can be such a thing as a voluntary preference.

Mr. CAHAN: What does "voluntary" mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not surprised that my hon. friend asks what it means. It means exactly what it says, something that is done voluntarily from any motive, not as a result of bargaining but as a result possibly of offers, of proposals, of the adoption of an attitude which it is believed is merited or which it is hoped and believed will bring something in return.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it voluntary preference which is given to Russian wheat in the British market?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The voluntary preference I have referred to is the kind of preference which was introduced by Mr. Fielding in this parliament in 1897, a preference that time and again was extended in the Laurier and Fielding tariffs, a preference which was maintained by Sir Robert Borden and his government, and which has been endorsed by every government during the last thirty years.

Mr. CAHAN: But is that not the voluntary preference, so-called by the hon. gentleman, which has not been reciprocated throughout those thirty years?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is where I differ entirely from my hon. friend. My hon. friend knows the figures with respect to trade between this country and Britain. He knows that Britain has been Canada's best customer and he knows that Britain has bought year after year more of Canadian goods than we have bought of British goods. Does he mean to say that none of that has been the result of the attitude which Canada has taken and which was so admirably explained by—

Mr. CAHAN: She never bought one dollar's worth of goods unless they could be bought cheaper in Canada than elsewhere.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask a question of the leader of the opposition? Does not the right hon. gentleman believe that the Prime Minister made a great mistake in not taking the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) to the old country with him?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I answer my hon. friend still further: there is another form of preference which is just as important as a tariff preference, and that is what is termed an administrative preference. What was the position when the former Liberal government came into office with respect to the shipment of cattle to Britain? Cattle were excluded from the British market due to an embargo which had been in force for some years. One of the first acts of the then High Commissioner for Canada in London, the Hon. Peter Larkin, acting under instructions from the government of the day, was to take up with the British government the repeal of that embargo against Canadian cattle. Our argument was in part on the score that when Canada had given to Britain a preference in her market, it was unfair for Britain to continue that embargo against Canada. The embargo was removed and Canadian cattle were given entrance to the British market, not as a result of bargaining, but as a result of a courteous attitude taken towards Britain, in our interests as much as her own, an attitude which was reciprocated in a courteous way. I am not surprised at my hon. friend of all men not understanding the effect of courtesy because he is one of the most courteous gentlemen I know.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. CAHAN: I intended to be courteous to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULLINS: Does the right hon. gentleman not know that the embargo was off before Mr. Larkin ever reached England?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is mistaken. I hapen to know it was not off. I happen to know the instructions given to Mr. Larkin and the proceedings that took place.

Mr. MULLINS: I was in Great Britain when the matter came up before the House of Commons and the right hon. gentleman has no right to take the credit to himself for having the embargo removed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I maintain the accuracy of what I have just said, but whether it was off or not does not affect my argument; my point remains the same, that if the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite had prevailed, the embargo would not have been off yet. There would have been no result; but because there had been a preference given voluntarily to Britain in our markets, so there was an additional reason afforded the British government that finally helped the entrance there of our cattle. If I am not mistaken, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) within the last two weeks has been taking up with the British government some questions with regard to the provisions to be laid down concerning the shipment of cattle to Great Britain. If he expects to get his requests met, is it to be as a result of bargaining which will exclude British commodities from this country. May I say further: there may be voluntary preferences; there may be administrative preferences; there may be tariff preferences, but inter-imperial negotiation has been in large part the result of voluntary preferences.

Let me ask my hon. friend this question: What is occurring in the Argentine republic to-day? What is the significance of all that British officials are doing in the Argentine? Argentine has sought to create an atmosphere favourable to a market for Argentine wheat in Britain. Britain has taken an attitude in response to that taken by the Argentine people towards her, namely: If you are prepared to trade with us, we are prepared to trade with you. Why is there in respect to trade a closer drawing together of the Argentine republic and Britain—the sale of wheat on the one hand and the sale of commodities on the other—while there is not the same drawing together of this country and Great Britain? My right hon. friend wants everything as the result of bargaining on a basis laid down by himself, ignoring everybody else and not wanting to make what is in the nature of an agreement of mutual advantage on a voluntary basis.

I do not wish to take up any undue time in discussing the so-called "humbug" incident. As however there has been a great deal of discussion over the question whether this offer was humbug or not, it would be as well to know exactly what was meant by Mr. Thomas, the member of the government in Britain who used that expression in reference to the offer. Perhaps I cannot do better in this connection than to read to the house just what Mr. Thomas said to the British House of Commons and leave hon. members to judge whether under the circumstances the British minister was not more than justified in using that particular term. What was it that the Right Hon. Mr. Thomas said that occasioned all the furore? The record will be found in the British Hansard debates of November 27, 1930, at page 1550. Reporting Mr. Thomas, the following appears:

> We are censured because we refused to consider the offer made by the dominions. What was the offer? I say clearly and definitely that if any offer were made that would help the trade of this country, would give employment to our people, and not injure them, not only would we have considered it, but it would have been our duty to accept it. (An honourable member: "Why did you not do it?") For the simple reason, I assure you, that there never was such humbug as this proposal.

Mr. Thomas went on to explain why the proposal was humbug. He said:

> We were asked first, clearly and definitely, to agree to put a tax on foodstuffs. That was the first proposal made. There can be no mistake about it. (Honourable members: "Who did?") Mr. Bennett and the whole of the other dominions. . . . I repeat that the first proposal made to us was that we, the British government, should agree to a tax on foodstuffs, and, in return for it, the Canadian government were prepared to put on an additional tax of ten per cent on the duties then in operation on foreign goods. They did not say to us—let me make it quite clear—"We will remove any tax at all where you compete with us." On the contrary, let me say in fairness to them—I do not complain: I am only stating the facts—they said, "No. So far as we are concerned we will give nobody a preference that is going to compete with the things that we ourselves can make." That was made perfectly clear. In other words, they said, "We want you to change your fiscal principles, but we will only change certain details of ours." . . .

Later in his speech (see page 1554), referring to his use of the word "humbug," Mr. Thomas said:

> Obviously, I never said, never intended to say, that of any individual. I said distinctly the proposals were humbug.

In further explanation of what was meant, Mr. Thomas gave the following:

> In exchange for ten per cent on foodstuffs, British soft coal, which is now taxed one shilling seven and a half pence per ton into Canada, would get a benefit of five cents per ton. Germany, the Argentine, the United States and the Netherlands all admit our coal free now. Railroad rails—and I am only choosing the big industries where there is unemployment—have a duty in Australia of two shilling four pence per cwt. The Netherlands and Argentine admit them free. The foreign rate is very much more, but let us see what that means. Suppose that a tariff rate is fixed that precludes the possibility of our competing, of what value is any preference? The whole thing becomes absurd. I could go through a long list, cotton goods, woollen goods. I could show that sewing machines, not an unimportant manufacture in this country, have a preferential rate into Australia of 15 per cent against us, while Germany only imposes 9 against us. Cotton goods: 55 per cent in Australia, Canada 15 per cent, Germany 6, France 10, Netherlands and Argentine free. Cotton piece goods an important industry: Canada 31 per cent, Netherlands 8 per cent, Argentine 15 per cent. Woollen goods: Canada 37 per cent. Australia 61 per cent, Germany 22 per cent, France 12 per cent.

Finally in order to make quite clear that it was the proposals, the so-called offer, of Canada's Prime Minister that he was characterizing as "humbug," and in no sense the motives of the Prime Minister, or the Prime Minister himself, Mr. Thomas, referring to a previous speaker, said at page 1562:

> If he says for one moment that I inferred that Mr. Bennett did not mean them as genuine, I must make that clear. I never said anything of the kind.

In other words, Mr. Thomas was prepared to say of the proposals that my right hon. friend meant them as genuine, but they were discovered to be humbug when he came to see what they really amounted to so far as Great Britain was concerned.

Let me give to my right hon. friend the view of a very eminent authority on preference with respect to proposals on preference based as this one is on a tariff that is already so high that the preference really means nothing in effect. The Prime Minister is, I am sure, a great admirer of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain. No doubt he sees himself as a second Joe Chamberlain, the Joe Chamberlain of the dominions of to-day who is going to inaugurate this policy of the new empire unit. I have before me a statement made by Mr. Chamberlain at the conference held in 1902:

> The very valuable experience which we have derived from the history of the Canadian tariff shows that, while we may most readily and most gratefully accept from you any preference which you may be willing voluntarily to accord to us, we cannot bargain with you for it, we cannot pay you for it, unless you go much further and enable us to enter your home market on terms of greater equality. . . . So long as a preferential tariff, even a munificent preference, is still sufficiently protective to exclude us altogether, or nearly so, from your markets, it is no satisfaction to us that you have imposed even greater disability upon the same goods if they come from foreign markets.

That was exactly the nature of the proposal as made by my right hon. friend. British goods had already been excluded from the Canadian market. There was as a consequence very little satisfaction to Great Britain in the offer made by my right hon. friend when its only effect was to impose even greater disability upon the same goods if they came from foreign markets.

I think I have made clear wherein the proposals were humbug in so far as Great Britain was concerned. Let us now look at the situation from the Canadian point of view. I ask hon. members could anything, so far as Canada is concerned, more closely approach humbug than the proposal which my right hon. friend made on our behalf. What was that proposal? First of all it provided that no goods were to be permitted entry into Canada from Great Britain if they were already being produced and manufactured in this country or could be produced or manufactured here. It further provided that if tariffs did not already exist to keep goods out, such tariffs were to be set up. Would that procedure be of advantage to this country? I do not hear the hon. members opposite say, yes; I do not hear one of them. Well, that was the proposal of the right hon. gentleman, and in my opinion it was humbug in the purest sense of the word.

What was the proposal when viewed from another standpoint? Great Britain is already our best customer. We have experienced difficulty in reaching the overseas markets in other parts of the world. The proposals of my right hon. friend would make it still more difficult to get many of our surplus products into the British market, because Britain was to change her fiscal policy; she was to put on a tariff, and our preference was to come as a result of that tariff. Where would that have led with respect to the importation of wheat? Could anybody expect that once a tariff wall went up in Great Britain with respect to manufactured goods to help certain interests, the agricultural interests of Great Britain would remain silent? Does anybody suppose that with tariff walls on all sides the British agriculturist would not ask for a tariff wall to protect his agricultural produce? When in such circumstances will there be a government in Great Britain which could resist such demands on the part of agriculturists? And if the tariff wall were raised to protect the British farmers, where would we be in the British markets with respect to the sale of our wheat? The last condition would be infinitely worse than the first, and so I say that from the point of view of Canada as well as of Great Britain the proposals of my right hon. friend amount to the greatest humbug conceivable.

If anything more is needed to show the humbug of this proposition may I state that not merely the Labour government in England to-day, but no government in England could negotiate an agreement with the government of Canada on the basis proposed by my right hon. friend. This is a most important fact, because the conference is scheduled to meet her again next fall and unless my right hon. friend changes his proposals in the interval nothing can then be done, even if there were a change of government in Great Britain during the interval as he might desire.

Let me review the situation. So far as the Labour government is concerned, we know there can be no negotiations with the Labour government on the basis set out by my right hon. friend. That government may or may not be in office next fall, but at any rate if it is in office no negotiations could be made with it as the offer at present stands. So far as attempting any agreement it would be better to call off the conference right now—that is the point I wish to emphasize because it has been already made clear in Great Britain that the British government will not change its fiscal policy. The proposal of my right hon. friend involves a change of the fiscal policy of Great Britain.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: How does anybody known anything? By using ordinary intelligence. The Prime Minister knew before he went to England that the present government in England would not change its fiscal policy. The Liberal party in England has for generations been committed to the policy of free trade. Will it change? Will it negotiate on a basis which would alter the fiscal policy of Great Britain? Nothing could be done by negotiating with the Liberal party, and yet that party combined with the Labour party represent by far the majority of the British people. Come to the Conservative party. So far as the Lord Beaverbrook wing is concerned, that is the Empire Crusaders, my right hon. friend made the statement in plain English, "We will have nothing to do with you," and they were ruled out. What have we left? We have left a certain section of the official Conservative opposition in Great Britain. But what do they want the preference for in England? What do they want protection for? Their idea of securing a preference was to work out a scheme which would allow them to sell their goods in other markets. My right hon. friend has said to them, "Remember our preference is based on the Canada first policy." "Canada first," means that anything that can be produced and manufactured in Canada is not to come in. The only preference which could arise would be one which might result from the erection of still higher tariff walls. That is what my right hon. friend has called empire preference. Empire preference as outlined by my right hon. friend is this "Canada first" idea wrapped in tinfoil with a union jack pasted on the outside. That is all that it means. It excludes in the first place all possibility of commodities coming to this country from Great Britain if they can be produced or manufactured here. No matter what government is in office in Great Britain, so long as this offer of my right hon. friend stands in its present form no negotiations can be successfully carried on with the mother country.

Now, what about the word "humbug"? I do not know why my right hon. friend should have been so sensitive about the use of the word, unless he was caught on the raw, because after all it is a very mild expression. Some of the terms used by the right hon. gentleman himself when he was leader of the opposition with respect to the preference by the then administration were much stronger. As a matter of fact in the last regular session of parliament my right hon. friend criticized very strongly the government of which I happened to be the head. Did he use the word "humbug"? No, that was too mild an expression for him; he used the word "deception."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, an offensive term, and he incorporated it in a resolution introduced in this house. Yet when a member of the administration in Great Britain used the word "humbug" with respect to my right hon. friend's proposals he immediately sent a broadside to the British press directed against the British government as a whole, two columns of the London Times directed not against an individual minister but against the whole British government. He told the government of Great Britain that he had waited a day or two to see if they would not dismiss the minister who had dared to criticize his proposals. In his view the government of Canada could not have further successful relations with the British government if that attitude was to be maintained. We came very near having complete severance of relations between the governments of Canada and Great Britain as a result of his action. If anyone is of the opinion that I am exaggerating let him read the words of my right hon. friend for himself.

I was interested to learn the real significance of the word "humbug." My right hon. friend is fond of quoting the Oxford dictionary. I consulted that book to learn what it said about "humbug", not knowing whether or not the word be there. But sure enough it was there, and here is the definition given of it.

> Fraud, sham, deception, nonsense.

Deception—the very word that he had used himself, as leader of the opposition and for his party in this parliament, in describing the preference part of the proposal of Mr Dunning—a proposal that did not merit that particular characterization, whereas this proposal more than merited it.

Other dictionaries might be quoted—Murray, for example. The New English dictionary gives the following as one definition:

> A thing which is not really what it pretends to be; an imposture, a deception, fraud, sham.

Now, this dictionary even cites as an example of the use of the word in its application to legislation the following from words of Lord Randolph Churchill in 1884:

> The whole legislation of the government has been a gigantic humbug.

Surely if Lord Randolph Churchill could describe the whole legislation of the imperial government of that day as "humbug," it ought to be within the bounds of parliamentary etiquette to describe proposals intended to be translated into legislation as "humbug"; and that was the extent of the offences committed with respect to which the right hon. gentleman opposite raised such a furore in Great Britain.

It is interesting—although I do not say this applies in any particular to our own parliament—that the same authority a little further on in citing wherein the words may be applicable to individuals as well as to proposals or offers has the following (1807 in Sheridaniana 211):

> "I think, father," said he, "that many men who are called great patriots in the House of Commons, are great humbugs."

The Imperial dictionary—and that ought to be a good authority in connection with all that takes place at an Imperial conference—discloses the near relationship of the term "humbug" and "deception". It defines humbug in one place as:

> Spirit of deception, or imposition.

It is particularly helpful in disclosing the real meaning of the term by giving its derivation. It is as follows:

> Humbug—no doubt from 'hum' and 'bug,' 'hum' having probably its sense of to deceive, and 'bug' its old meaning of 'bugbear'; hence it equals false alarm. The association of 'hum' with 'bug' was perhaps partly suggested by the fact that 'bug' meant also a beetle or other insect, partly from the words 'hum' and 'buzz' having been employed in conjunction to typify sound without sense.

There, I think, Mr. Speaker, we have a definition which exactly fits the situation, "sound without sense."

I am inclined to think that Mr. Thomas came to use that phrase through association with the present High Commissioner for Canada in London. I noticed when Mr. Howard Ferguson was campaigning with my right hon. friend that this was the term he used in describing the preference proposals of the government of the day. He said that the proposals were "humbug" and "hypocrisy."

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend says, "hear, hear."

Mr. BENNETT: No, I did not say anything.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I beg my right hon. friend's pardon; someone immediately behind him expressed approval of that expression. Apparently what really took place was that Mr. Thomas and Mr. Ferguson had been associating together, and Mr. Thomas doubtless employed a phrase that he thought would be well understood in this part of the world.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to a phase of this situation which I deem as serious as any single matter of imperial concern can possibly be, and that is the action on the part of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister in attempting to interfere in the domestic politics of Great Britain. As I said, from the time he left here, and indeed before his departure, I considered that he had made one mistake after another, simply getting in deeper and deeper all the time as he went on in his bargaining processes of selling Canadian wheat. The most serious thing of all—because if it is once countenanced it is going to have a very far-reaching effect on the future of the British Empire—was the attempt of this part of the empire to interfere with the affairs of another part. As I said a little while ago, at these Imperial conferences it is absolutely necessary on the part of any government that there should be full regard for the domestic policies of all governments. Every government must respect the domestic policies of another government. What right has any part of the empire to criticize the domestic policies of another part? Much less has it any right to seek to coerce another part of the empire into changing its domestic policies by trying to influence public opinion, as my right hon. friend sought to do in the address which he made at that conference and which was published far and wide. Not only did he then confront the British government with a proposal necessitating a change in their fiscal policy and speak of the possible dismemberment of the empire if it were not accepted, but he also gave a radio address to the people of the British nation—and there are some of us here at home who heard him across the sea—in which in a sense he appealed over the head of the government to the British nation. In there referring to what he had set forth at the conference he said: I did not mean it as a threat. How could any thought of a threat have come into his mind unless it was lurking there or known to be in the minds of some of the British people? He went on to say that the chance might pass forever if his particular offer was not accepted and the principle that he had laid down was not subscribed to.

We all know the political battles that have been waged in England between the Conservative party and the Liberal party and between the Conservative party and the Labour party on certain fiscal questions, and I say no one from this Dominion has any right to go to Great Britain and attempt by words spoken there to influence British public opinion in reference to matters of domestic policy. If our prime ministers are to have that right, then the prime ministers of other parts of the empire must have a similar right. What would my right hon. friend say if Mr. Ramsay MacDonald came over here to-morrow and spoke here as my right hon. friend spoke in Britain and were to tell him he must change the policy of protection; and then were to address the Canadian nation over the radio and say that unless this change were made immediately he would not be responsible for the dismemberment of the empire that might come later ? My right hon. friend knows that his words are going to be made use of by a political party in Great Britain in the next campaign. Can anything worse be conceived in relation to the interests of the empire as a whole than that the name of this country should be dragged into the political controversies of England in an effort to influence the British electorate one way or the other? And if a change in British fiscal policy ever did come about by Canada's name being injected into Great Britain's domestic affairs, and if later times became bad due to other causes, or of the fiscal change itself, what would likely become of the relations of the different parts of the empire one to the other once an effort was made to change a bargain that had grown out of conditions forced in that way?

There are many people to-day who are questioning very much in their minds whether there can be any future conferences between different parts of the empire unless there is a pretty clear understanding that this kind of thing is never going to be repeated. I doubt if it will be found that any government will go into conference with another government, unless above all the right of every country to have its own fiscal policy is upheld by all. Why, Mr. Speaker, one of the sections of this very conference in England was working on certain resolutions growing out of the conference of 1926; and what was it that the conference of 1926 laid down? It laid down a definition of the present position of the different dominions and Great Britain. How was that position described? It is set out very clearly in the Balfour report, which has been endorsed by this very government while it was negotiating in Great Britain. What does that report say? With repect to Great Britain and the dominions it says:

> Their position and mutual relation may be readily defined. They are autonomous communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

In other words, you have there a distinct statement that each part of the empire has the right to make its own fiscal policy, that it must be so recognized and that there shall be no coercion in any particular way with regard to it. Indeed, it seems part of the irony of fate that it should have been one of Sir John A. Macdonald's ministers who took this very position as long ago as before confederation. My right hon. friend likes to speak of his policy as the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald, but one of Sir John Macdonald's ministers made very clear to the Briitsh government just prior to confederation that Canada would not stand for any dictation on the part of Great Britain with respect to her tariff. That was as long ago as 1859. Let me read from the communications sent by Sir Alexander Galt to the Duke of Newcastle, who at that time was Colonial Secretary. Here is what Sir Alexander Galt, Sir John A. Macdonald's minister of Finance of that day, said:

> Respect to the Imperial government must always dictate the desire to satisfy them that the policy of this country is neither hastily nor wisely formed; and that due regard is had to the interests of the mother country as well as of the province. But the government of Canada, acting for its legislature and people, cannot, through those feelings of deference which they owe to the Imperial authorities, in any manner waive or diminish the right of the people of Canada to decide for themselves both as to the mode and extent to which taxation shall be imposed. Self-government would be utterly annihilated if the view of the Imperial government were to be preferred to those of the people of Canada. It is, therefore, the duty of the present government distinctly to affirm the right of the Canadian legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best, even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the Imperial ministry.

I never thought the day would come in this parliament, Mr. Speaker, when it would fall to the lot of any member of this House of Commons to protest against a Canadian ministry in its attempt to coerce a British ministry, but since that day has come there appears to be an element of poetic justice in the circumstance that I have the privilege of being the first to make that protest. I do make it very strongly indeed, that any ministry from Canada should seek, by means of coercion, to influence the government of Great Britain with respect to any matter of policy which is entirely within its own rights. If we cherish autonomy in our own country; if we respect it; if we wish to maintain it, it will be only by our adopting an attitude towards others which we will expect to have adopted towards ourselves. What would my right hon. friend say were Mr. Ramsay MacDonald or Mr Lloyd George or Mr. Churchill or any other British public man to come to Canada and denounce the policy of protection, saying it was essential that we should have free trade in order to save the empire? He would be the first to tell him never to come back to this country again, and we would have the press from one end of this country to the other speaking about interference in the domestic affairs of this country. That situation would not be tolerated for a moment. Then why should the Ramsay MacDonald government, struggling as it is with great problems, have this problem in addition and be embarrassed in this way by the Canadian administration?

I should like to quote one or two other authorities on this point, authorities very much respected in this parliament. I could quote a great many, but I will give only two, representing both sides of political feeling here. Sir Wilfrid Laurier spoke on this matter many times, and in this parliament on March 27, 1907, prior to the Imperial conference of that year, he made as the Prime Minister of the day a statement which I desire to quote: It will be found in Hansard for the session of 1906-07, at page 5538, and is as follows:

> We would not accept the idea that the British public should force upon us their own fiscal views, and no more would they tolerate the idea that we should force upon them our own fiscal views; and, therefore, the only way in which the British Empire can be maintained upon its present foundation is by allowing to every nation composing it the measure of liberty that it has, and also the free choice of the fiscal policy which it is to maintain.

The other authority I wish to quote is Sir Robert Borden, also a former Prime Minister of Canada and leader of the Conservative party. The reference is to a luncheon given in his honour at the Savoy Hotel in London on July 31, 1918, reported in the London Times of the day following. It is as follows:

> Sir Robert Borden stated that it should be clearly understood that the question of preference had not been considered this year by either the Imperial war cabinet or the Imperial war conference. The recent announcement on the subject was made on behalf of the British government as a statement of the domestic policy of the United Kingdom. As Canada claimed and exercised the right absolutely to control her own fiscal policy, Sir Robert said, so the representatives of the Dominions necessarily refrained from attempting any interference in the fiscal policy of the United Kingdom.

That position is diametrically opposed to the position taken by the present Prime Minister. Sir Robert continued:

> Moreover, the people of Canada would not desire the people of the United Kingdom to shape or modify their fiscal policy solely to give a preference to the products of Canada, especially if such change should involve any supposed injustice, or should be regarded as unfair or oppressive by a considerable portion of the people of the United Kingdom.

Then after his return to Canada Sir Robert spoke in Toronto, and again he made a reference to the advisability of not attempting to influence British political action. He is reported in the Toronto Globe of September 3, 1918, as saying:

> We hold ourselves free to work out the problem of preference according to Canadian needs and conditions. For the same reason Canada must avoid any attempt at interference with the domestic policy of Great Britain.

I might quote also the position taken by Right Hon. George P. Graham, who was one of Canada's representaives at the Imperial conference of 1923, and the position taken by myself at that conference in discussions having to do with preference, which came up at the time. Those positions were precisely the same; they were to the effect that if the British government, for reasons of its own and suiting its own needs, wished to give Canada a preference, certainly we would be glad to have that preference though we would not bargain for it. We would not force it. We made it clear that if there were ever a tariff imposed in Britain, Canada would expect a preference under such tariff, but that it was for Britain herself to determine her own fiscal policy. That is the position which had been taken right along by all prime ministers. It has remained for my right hon. friend to change that precedent, which I believe to be more important than any other single precedent that can be cited, as securing the autonomous rights of each part of the empire.

To conclude this part, may I say that there are different forms of coercion, and that coercion has taken its toll in different ways in the past. For a long time military coercion was the thing that had to be watched as between different parts of the empire. Military coercion cost the British government that portion of North America which to-day is represented by the United States of America. Military coercion on the part of any one part of the empire against another is a thing which I hope we can regard as forever past. But that is not the only form of coercion possible within the empire. You may have coercion by legislative enactment, and that is a form of coercion which, so far as the dominions are concerned, might easily have made itself felt had statesmen been prepared to act in that way. Indeed, this very conference was seeking to remove what remained in the nature of coercion by legislative enactment by erasing from the statutes of Britain certain enactments which took away the full rights and liberties from this parliament with respect to its legislation. That is a form of coercion that is disappearing.

But there is to-day the danger of another form of coercion, and it is perhaps the most serious of any: it is economic coercion. When one government seeks to influence the fiscal policy of another government by threats as to what may happen to the empire as a whole, undoubtedly it is exercising economic coercion and, as such, taking a step which is exceedingly dangerous. I fancy there is no single danger to the future of the empire greater than that which might follow from a step of the kind.

I trust hon. members will pardon me for the length of time I have spoken. Perhaps they will feel I am entitled to a little longer time than usual, seeing that for about six or eight months I have said nothing which could occasion them the least embarrassment.

Up to the moment I have confined my remarks to the relations between Canada and Britain. But my right hon. friend's proposals, when you study them, go a step further; they take in the larger idea of making out of the empire, as he terms it, an economic unit or an economic union. That is his ultimate objective. Many think as he does on that particular matter, but I doubt whether anyone has quite the conception that he has of how that empire unit is to be brought about. He begins by forming a number of individual economic units out of the dominions in the first instance. At any rate, I consider it important that it should be recognized that this is part of what my right hon. friend has in mind—the creation of an economic union—sometimes he calls it an economic union and at other times an economic unit—and that this is his ultimate objective; in other words, he wants the British Empire to trade wholly within itself, or as much so as possible. He starts with the idea of Canada doing all its trading and manufacturing within its own boundaries, but somewhow or other he feels that some things may be developed or grown or manufactured in other parts of the world which are not grown or manufactured or developed here, and he says, "Let us then throw a great wall around the empire as a whole so that we shall be sure to get these things from within some part of the British Empire itself."

This proposal, to put it in a graphic way so that it may be easily understood, is as like the organization of the old Empire of China as anything can be which is different in kind. In China, for fear of barbarians and outsiders, the system was to have every city walled, thus making of it a self-contained community. Then, the Chinese believing they had achieved something in that way, and considering it advisable to cut themselves off from the rest of the world, conceived the idea of another wall around the whole Chinese Empire. That is exactly what my right hon. friend is proposing for the present British Empire in regard to tariffs. He proposes, first, to wall around each dominion in order to make it a self-sufficing, non-trading community; then he proposes another wall around the empire as a whole which will make it an economic unit. But there is this difference between the Chinese proposal and his—and I think the Chinese is a much more sensible one: The Chinese proposal did not exclude trade altogether with the outside world; in the wall which the Chinese put around a city they left apertures through which people could go in and come out—they could go in on a level and come out on a level and trade in that way, getting in for the purposes of exchange when there was a willingness to exchange. But my right hon. friend does not propose to have his entrances made in that way. He proposes to have the apertures, not in the lower portion of his wall, where people can enter, but apertures over and above the wall, made by erecting another wall on top of the original, leaving a little open space for trade to pass in and out. That is exactly the empire economic unit set out in his proposals as the ideal. I do not think I am exaggerating; read his proposals carefully and you will see that that is precisely what he advocates.

But let me say this to my right hon. friend. Supposing he were successful in achieving what he is aiming at, making of the empire an economic unit: Would that be a desirable thing? I know he thinks it would be, but I believe experience will show that it would be a most unfortunate thing. What would happen? Read his policy a little further as stated to the conference. He tells you how it would be developed. We are to have all the trade within the empire carried in ships belonging to the empire; to get special privileges those ships are to make use of the different ports of the empire. Everything is to be done within the empire itself. That is his aim and objective—to make colossal fortunes for a few, out of fortunes already enormous, while trade generally is restricted. What would happen if the empire tomorrow were to accept the suggestions of my right hon. friend? These trade routes thus monopolized by ships belonging to different parts of the empire would have to be protected. Jealousies will arise on the part of the countries denied the privilege of carrying on trade with any part of the empire. My right hon. friend being the creator of this new form of empire would be expected to take his part in protection of a different character to be sure, from that which we are discussing at the moment—the protection of these trade routes. And that is what is at the back of the minds of all those who up to the present time in the old country have been talking about the empire as an economic unit. They wish to shift the burden of military and naval armaments over the empire as a whole, to get the trade routes so distributed that the dominions themselves would have to take care of the burden of naval armaments as a means of protection. That is what is at the back of my right hon. friend's scheme as a part of what would inevitably follow. Is that going to help to cement relations between the different parts of the empire? More than that: if you are going to have an empire on that model you must have an imperial council to lay down policies; you must have a seat of government somewhere where all these matters will be shaped by one council. There, again, is where my right hon. friend has made a serious mistake. He has gone to England and tried to make out of the conference a cabinet for the shaping of imperial policies. Only after the last conference, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) was very strong in pointing out how Sir Wilfrid Laurier and others had taken the position that a conference was a conference and that an imperial conference was not for the purpose of laying down policies for the empire as a whole. Yet this is an empire policy, a policy which all were told they must subscribe to at once and seek to develop immediately. So that my right hon. friend, in so doing, has taken one of the most serious steps which any Prime Minister has ever thus far thought of, let alone attempted.

Let me ask in conclusion, what has been the result of my right hon. friend's visit to England? What has been the result of the Imperial conference thus far? There is no doubt in the world—my right hon. friend admits it himself, though he is inclined to put the blame on the British government—that the conference was a huge failure, that it was a fiasco, that it failed altogether to accomplish anything. When he gets up to speak he will probably say that the conference is not over, that we shall have some more of it this fall. But the part of the conference that took place in London, the conference that was expected to achieve so much for the sale of our wheat in Britain—that part of the conference is over and has been a complete failure, a complete fiasco. May I say this in passing, that I do not think it is due to any lack of ability on the part of the Ramsay MacDonald government to handle conferences. Side by side with this conference was another conference relating to a much more serious and critical condition than matters of trade, a conference affecting the whole of the Indian Empire, dealing with peoples of different races, castes and classes, and that conference, presided over by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, as this one was, will go down into history as one of the greatest triumphs of any government. The Ramsay MacDonald government cannot be blamed for the failure of this conference. As I said a moment ago, so far as Canada's participation in it was concerned, there was failure before my hon. friend left the shores of Canada. Owing to the manner in which he presented his proposals, they could not possibly have been accepted. In attempting to change the fiscal policy of the British government he took a position which made the thing more impossible than ever.

Not only has there been failure; there was developed resentment as well. Is it not true that to-day Canada's relations with Britain are more strained than they have been at any time in the past? In view of what took place at this last Imperial conference can anyone assume that the relations between my hon. friend's government and the present government in Great Britain can be as friendly and as cordial as they ought to be and of the kind we would like to see? Not only have our relations with Britain been changed, but our relations with the whole empire have suffered as a result of what took place at that conference. From beginning to close, the conference was more in the nature of a quarrel than it was of a conference, a quarrel which started with the take-it-or-leave-it attitude of Canada's Prime Minister when he presented his ultimatum to the British government and which ended with the broadside which my hon. friend fired on the eve of his departure from England. To-day the prestige of Canada is lower in Britain than it has been at any time in the past.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, it is unfortunate, but Canada's prestige in Britain never was so low as it is at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: It is higher than it has been during the past ten years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have failed to extend in Britain the market for our wheat. Not only have we failed to obtain security for the sale of our wheat in the British market, but in every way our competitors have gained.

This afternoon I spoke of the Argentine. What is taking place in the Argentine at this very moment? All through the campaign of last year we stressed the possibility of Britain turning to the Argentine for more of her wheat unless it were found possible to bring about closer relations with Canada. Only this morning His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales is reported in the press as emphasizing the necessity of trade and exchange and pointing out what it means to Britain to have the good will of the Argentine, not by bargaining, but by good will and voluntary cooperation in the matter of trade. Why do we not hear similar sentiments uttered in Canada to-day?

Hon. gentlemen opposite have been talking about Russia. We will hear a good deal about Russia before the next few years are over, and I would ask them this question: do they think they have improved the chances of the sale of Canadian wheat in the markets of the world by the summary way in which they have dealt with Russia? Have they had put before them any single request from the government of Russia which has called forth the particular action to which reference is made in the speech from the throne? Have they had any communication of any character from the government which has necessitated the putting through in the manner it was that particular order in council? I do not intend to discuss the order at the moment, but I do wish to deal generally with the manner in which things are being done by this present administration.

Reference has been made to the possibility of conferences being called to rationalize as it is termed, the wheat supply of the world. Some day the different governments of the world may sit down together to see if they cannot come to some agreement among themselves which will enable each one to send its supply of wheat in a particular direction. As I understand anything I have read of overtures that have been made, Russia has indicated the possibility of something of the kind; that at some time she would be prepared to confer with other governments to reach if possible agreement in the matter of the distribution of the world's supply of wheat. If such a conference ever took place, would not Canada feel certain of getting her appropriate share of the British market? Should she not feel entitled to expect that she could rely on Britain to see that she got a first chance in the British market? But what is the position to-day? Suppose Russia has already taken offence at what my hon. friend has done? Suppose the Russian government says: We have not been competing with Canada in any appreciable way, we have not entered her markets, but we have been ostracized because we were prepared to send to her both money and commodities in exchange for the opportunity of buying from her certain commodities. Suppose Russia says that as a result of all this she will enter the markets of the world to compete with Canada and will carry on competition in a way never dreamed of before. Suppose she says: We will show Canada whether or not she can ostracize us from the markets of the world. Where are our farmers in western Canada going to be as the result of action of that kind?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friends opposite called a special session to put up tariffs under the guise of alleviating the necessitous condition of the poor; they put on the cloak of charity in introducing that legislation for their special interests. In the name of patriotism they talked about "Canada first." For what purpose? To give more protection and thus to help their special interests. Now in the name of religion they pursue the same protectionist ends and say that because of certain religious doctrines adopted by Russia this country is to cut itself off from trade with another part of the empire.

Mr. BENNETT: Another part of the empire?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With another part of the world and affecting other parts of the empire. The attitude adopted by my hon. friend affects very much the relations of the empire with Russia. I am not commenting at the moment upon what he may have had in view; what I am speaking of is the manner in which he did what he did, and also the consequence of it in the light of world conditions. There again is where we have suffered as a result of this conference. Our competitors have got the better of us and are getting the better of us more than ever.

When Britain finds, as she will find, that it is more difficult to trade with Canada because of what has been done in increasing tariffs for bargaining purposes, she will look elsewhere for her trade and we will be unable to hold even the market that we have there to-day. The war taught us that markets once lost are very difficult to regain, and it matters not whether the war be one of arms or an economic war, if the tactics adopted are of the kind which seek to exclude certain nations from trade with each other the result is bound to be the same so far as the loss of markets is concerned.

This question is all important when one considers the fact that another economic conference is to be held this fall. I have spoken on this matter at length because of the fact that that conference is to be held. I want to see that conference succeed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen opposite may jeer; that may be their attitude, but it is not mine. I want to see that conference succeed, and that is why I am placing the facts upon Hansard so that they may be a matter of permanent record. I want to oblige this government to take notice of the nature of its proposals and their effect. We do not want a second failure; we want to avoid further quarrels and ruptures. I want to help to create public opinion in this country and I intend if need be to go from one end of the country to the other in order to do so. I intend to try to see that hon. gentlemen opposite, for the sake of protecting a few of their special friends and special interests, and in order to create more monopolies in this country, shall not make more difficult the lot of the farmer and of the workingman of Canada.

My hon. friends know, as I said this afternoon, that these proposals as they stand cannot succeed. The government must change its proposals if it wants to get anywhere in the conference this fall. I have spoken at the length I have for the further reason that the speech from the throne, referred to this afternoon, indicates, not that the government is modifying its extraordinary view, but that it intends to go on with its policy of increasing tariffs and giving to itself added powers with reference thereto. If that extraordinary attitude is persisted in conditions in this country will go from bad to worse. We have on that account to watch very carefully the policy of the present administration as related to the course of events.

May I state further that already we are beginning to experience in a very critical way the effects of the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite as put through at the last special session. Look at the figures on trade and see how trade is diminishing. Look at the figures with respect to national revenue and see how the national revenue from customs dues is shrinking. Wait until the budget comes down and see what the additional taxation will be. Already we can see the effect upon the western farmers in loss of purchasing power. The western farmers not being able to sell their grain, and the producers generally not being able to get rid of their surplus products, where are we going to get the purchasing power to stimulate our industries? It may be true that here and there, where a protecting wall has been thrown around an individual industry, there has been created a temporary boom. That undoubtedly happens, and will happen in certain cases where competition from without is suddenly checked. But what takes place after the point has been reached where there is no one to purchase the products of the industries thus artificially stimulated? When the demand falls off, what will happen to the transportation companies, the banks, the wholesale and retail businesses of the country? What is to be the lot of every householder in the land when we experience more contraction in the trade of the country? These things are of the greatest importance and cannot receive too much in the way of consideration. Why is it that the right hon. gentleman, in view of all these things, holds to the course he does?

I have said and I repeat, that I believe my right hon. friend is sincere in his belief that the creation of an economic unit in Canada, of an economic unit throughout the empire, is a good thing, is an ideal to be aimed at; but he has not examined carefully into all phases of these matters, nor understood them, otherwise he would not have proceeded in the way he has.

The trouble with hon. gentlemen opposite is this: they have started with false assumptions; they have assumed that this idea of an economic unit, because it has unity about it, is a good thing in itself, without examining what in reality is meant and where it is going to lead. They have started out with the idea that an economic unit is a good thing, without carefully examining whether the realization of such a conception is going to lead in the matter of international trade. The mistake that they are making all through is that they are confusing an abstract idea with a concrete proposal. I ask hon. members to consider that. There are certain abstract ideals which all hold in common: "Canada first", yes, in a true sense of the term; "empire first", yes, in a true sense of the term; Canadian unity, yes; imperial unity, yes; all these matters if you like. These abstract ideals are very fine, but let us see what in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite they are being made to mean. My hon. friends opposite identify them with concrete proposals and these concrete proposals when put into operation will not realize the ideals which are aimed at.

Take the ideal of "Canada first". If by "Canada first" is meant that in national affairs a man should think of his own country first and will naturally do what is in the interest of his own country, everyone is for "Canada first". But if you mean a particular economic policy, which my right hon. friend says is what he means, a particular extreme form of protection which he told the British government is what "Canada first" means, this economic unit idea, a high tariff that will exclude goods from other countries from coming into this country at all, that will put an end to trade; if you call that concrete proposal "Canada first" you will never realize any worthy ideal of "Canada first" you may have. It is like speaking of "home first", as regards a man in his domestic relations. Naturally everyone will think of his own home first, but when you come to translate that aim or ideal into a concrete proposal such as hon. gentlemen opposite have translated "Canada first" into, you get something resembling what would take place were a man to put a great wall around his garden, his grounds, thereby excluding everybody and saying this is "home first." That is a parallel case. Similarly if by imperial unity, is meant that the preservation of unity throughout the different parts of the empire is a good thing no possible exception can be taken but when you come to analyse what hon. gentlemen opposite mean by it, you find the means with which they identify the aim will not gain that particular end. Similarly with regard to preference. We are all in favour of preference as rightly understood; but when you identify it with an empire preference based on tariff walls in the first instance and brought into being only as something over and above these walls, you get something that does injustice to, nay something that may wholly negative the object in view.

Not only have hon. gentlemen opposite the wrong attitude, but they also make the further mistake, that they will not admit that any other view can possibly be right. They will not see and they will not admit to themselves that there be any other conception, any other way of bringing about imperial unity, of furthering the interests of Canada and of the empire than the particular means which they themselves advocate.

In conclusion may I say this word to my right hon. friend. He will find some day that "Canada first," rightly understood, is something very different from anything that can be embodied in a fiscal policy let alone a fiscal policy which is based on an extreme form of protection. He will find that "empire first," if he wishes to use that particular phrase, is also something very different from anything than can be expressed in terms of a fiscal policy, let alone a policy in the nature of centralized economic imperialism. They differ in kind. Fiscal policies are not a thing of the spirit. All that relates to "Canada first" and "Empire first" in any true sense is of the spirit; not a thing of matter, whether it be material substances or material force. He will find that the primary position of this Dominion, the primary position of the British Empire is due to something more profound than any fiscal policy let alone a fiscal policy that seeks to isolate the Dominion and to isolate the Empire. What has made the British Empire what it is, what has made Canada what it is, is not any fiscal policy. It is a thing of the spirit; it is the spirit that has sent the missionary and the explorer into distant lands, the coureur de bois into the hidden recesses of the forests, the pioneer and the trader beyond the bounds of settlement; the spirit that has sent British ships across all the oceans of the globe and caused the British flag to find a place in every clime. It is the enlightened spirit that has broken down barriers, not the benighted spirit that has erected them, the spirit of freedom that in the world of commerce and in trade, as in the world of politics, has made for larger liberty, and ever wider contacts with mankind; the spirit not of one nation only, or of one empire only but the spirit of the League of Nations; the spirit not of fear but the spirit of faith.

We on this side believe in those policies which have helped to advance Canada, and which have helped to advance the empire. We on this side believe that by the same spirit being given its opportunity, our country will develop and more in the way of freedom and happiness will result. We believe that in the extremes to which my right hon. friend is going in his policies we are not helping to unite Canada, we are not helping to create harmony, unity or progress in this country. We believe harmony, unity and progress will come about only as the result of policies which will have like concern for the well-being of all. We take the view that the policies that have led to unity, harmony and progress in this country in the past will do so again if they are continued. But we also take the view that no extreme of policy, I care not whether it be the extreme of protection or the extreme of free trade, in a country of diversified interests like Canada will ever unite the country and keep it harmonious and on the path of progress. A policy which will bring about unity, harmony and progress must be one that will have regard for all classes and all conditions, that will help to reconcile differences as they arise.

My hon. friend will find too, that it is the policy of conciliation and not that of coercion that in the end will win the day.

The extreme of economic policy, national, imperial and international as propounded by the present Prime Minister, and the coercive methods by which he seeks to advance them are the negation of all that makes for harmony, all that makes for unity, all that makes for progress in our country in the empire and throughout the world. To these methods and policies in the extremes in which they are put forth, we who seek the preservation of the true spirit of our country and of the British Commonwealth of Nations are unalterably opposed. We wish to see our country first and our empire first; not first in assurance and arrogance, and in the methods of the blaster and the gunman, but first in those characteristics of true greatness which have given to Canada and to the empire the primacy which they to-day enjoy.

I beg to move, Mr. Speaker, seconded by Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) that the following be added to the address to His Excellency:

We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that this house, while recognizing the serious economic conditions prevailing throughout the world, regrets that the policies of His Majety's government have not only failed to afford a remedy for employment and agricultural distress, as pledged by the Prime Minister and his colleagues, but have served further to prejudice the deplorable position of the agricultural interests, thereby causing additional unemployment and substantially reducing the national revenue.

The house believes that the proposals made to the Imperial economic conference and the manner in which they were submitted and discussed by the Prime Minister of Canada were responsible for the failure of the conference to accomplish its purpose in London, and that the successful development of Canada's trade relations with Great Britain has been adversely affected thereby.

The house is further of the opinion that, if these proposals and certain other of the policies of the government are persisted in, as would appear to be the intention of the government as outlined in the speech from the throne, the very serious condition which exists at the present time will be intensified rather than relieved.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

Tuesday, March 17, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

ILLEGAL WARFARE CLAIMS

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State): I beg to lay on the table of the house the interim report made to His Excellency the Administrator of the government in council.

dated March 6, 1931, by Errol M. McDougall, Esquire, a commissioner appointed to investigate and report upon illegal warfare claims and reparations payable in respect thereof.

With the leave of the house I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Ryckman:

That five hundred copies in the English language and two hundred copies in the French language of the interim report to His Excellency the Administrator of the government in council, dated March 6, 1931, made by Errol M. McDougall, Esquire, a commissioner appointed to investigate and report upon illegal warfare claims and reparations payable in respect thereof, laid on the table of the house this day, be printed forthwith, and that standing order 64 in relation thereto be suspended.

Motion agreed to.

NATURALIZATION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 3 to amend the Naturalization Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend section 13 of the Naturalization Act, chapter 138 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1927, which provides that the wife of a British subject shall be deemed to be a British subject and the wife of an alien shall be deemed to be an alien.

In 1923 a select committee of the parliament of the United Kingdom reported in favour of an amendment to that clause. It arose out of the fact that women who were British subjects and who had married American citizens were placed in an almost impossible position by reason of the enactment of the so-called Cable Act by the United States congress, passed on December 22nd, 1922, which provides that an alien woman who marries a citizen of the United States does not by virtue of such marriage become an American citizen. On the other hand, the law of the United Kingdom and the dominions is that the wife of an alien shall be deemed to be an alien. As a result there are in Canada some hundreds of women who were British subjects and Canadian nationals, but who, having married American citizens, did not thereby become American citizens, but who by the very fact of such marriage ceased to be British subjects and Canadian nationals. Consequently they are unable to obtain passports in the United States or in Canada to go abroad.

The late government in order to rectify this disability became parties to the nationality convention adopted at the Hague in 1930, of which certain articles were submitted to the last Imperial conference and then approved by the representatives of the Imperial and dominion governments. This bill is simply intended to carry into effect the articles of the Hague convention which were then approved.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, March 16 consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) suggests, it may be a one man government, but certainly it has more than one man's support.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We realize that.

Mr. BENNETT: Some people act as though they did not realize it. May I, in rising to resume the debate, congratulate the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) upon the addresses with which they made the motion that now stands on the order paper. It is always pleasing to congratulate new members upon their speeches, especially on an occasion such as this. The fact that the mover was born in the province of my own birth adds something to the joy with which I felicitate him upon the speech which he delivered in two languages, and the thoughtful speech of the hon. member for North Grey indicates that he too is alive to the problems that confront this country at this time.

I was somewhat surprised, shall I say, that the right hon. leader of the opposition, with his experience, should have made even a slight criticism of the fact that one of the hon. members did read from his manuscript, but in that, as in everything else with which the right hon. gentleman has to do he was not quite consistent, for he proceeded to read the major part of his own address. I may explain that it is not my purpose to traverse at any great length the preelection address of the right hon. gentleman. He has, however, overlooked one thing which I think he should remember. That is that in every part of this Dominion, from east to west, I told the electorate that there was one thing of which they could be perfectly certain, and that one thing was that if our party were elected to power, at the very first opportunity we would enact legislation that would deal not only with unemployment but also with the question of affording to Canadians an equal opportunity with their competitors to carry on the development of Canada, and that they should have fair competition in the work in which they were engaged.

That was dealt with in part at the short session of last fall. It was dealt with in part only because it was realized that the time was not sufficient to enable it to be dealt with in full. It was dealt with in part because it was realized that unless it was dealt with immediately the disaster to industry would be such that it could not be overtaken. In the nine years during which the right hon. gentleman presided over the destinies of this country the result was stagnation in industry with which it became necessary to deal at that session. I fling back to him the positive denial that it was not done because of any promises given to the so-called special interests, but because of the promise that was given to the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other that this would be done if we came into power, tariff legislation would be passed.

I desire further to say to the right hon gentleman that if he has the courage to make direct statements let him make them; do not insinuate them. If he desires for a single moment to suggest that because of any understanding or agreement with so-called special interests certain legislation was introduced in this house, then let him make the statement, for if any man living should know what the hold of the special interests was upon the government, it should be the right hon. gentleman who presided over the last administration. When the true conditions with respect to financial and other matters in this country are made known during the progress of the session he will realize fully just what that means and he will have ample opportunity then to give effect to the promise he made yesterday, that the business of the session would not be hurried through. It will not be hurried. There will be ample time to investigate these very matters to which he has referred, and I do not think either he or the gentlemen who sit behind him will then be making statements of that kind in this house by innuendo rather than by direct statements, by inference rather than directly, for apparently they lack courage to make them directly. They think that by the old means, at which they are experts, they will be able thus to delude the people of this country into believing that they are their custodians, that they are the guardians of their happiness, that they and they only are the people who care for the well-being, as my right hon. friend said yesterday with tears in his voice, of the labourer and the farmer.

When the right hon. gentleman spent so much time yesterday in dictionary definitions of the word "humbug," I could not but think that he probably defined the word so clearly in order that the people of Canada and the members of this house might have a clear understanding of just what was meant by it as applied to himself and his government during the past nine years. There we had them, free traders, the death-knell of protection, a tariff for revenue, all bunched together, appealing in the east for the one and in the west for the other, and then yesterday we had a grand plea for national unity. Why, sir, we all heard the pathetic appeal for national unity made yesterday by the right hon. gentleman opposite, and the covert insinuation at the close of his speech with regard to a navy. Did you realize what that was for, Mr. Speaker? Was there a man in this house who for a moment did not realize what my right hon. friend was again endeavouring to do? We all remember the cry of the La Presse newspaper in the days before the election; we remember the cries of Taschereau and the appeals to the passion and prejudice of the people of this country, designed to arouse the people of Quebec to the thought that I was trying to create a navy. This is the right hon. gentleman who talked about national unity yesterday, and then lightly dealt with one of the most difficult problems confronting the Canadian people to-day in connection with Russia. This is the right hon. gentleman who says there is nothing we will not do; that we are ready to support our appeals in the name of patriotism, self interest and in the name of religion itself. This came from the right hon. gentleman who in 1927 passed an order in council terminating our relations with Russia and sending its minister out of this country because, he said, their fifteen cases of posters and literature did not satisfy him that what they were doing was not inimical to the public interest. Then a few minutes later in his address he turned to the people of this country, through this house, and said "A man does not live by material things alone; there are things of the spirit as well," and this two minutes after he had been talking about the material advantage of Russia to Canada. Thus my right hon. friend illustrates in his own person and his own speech the real meaning of the word "humbug."

As I have said, I do not propose to traverse at great length the measures which we offer to this house for its consideration. These measures of necessity must be considered as the business of the house proceeds, and it would be wasting time to anticipate the discussion of them because, as I have said, they will be discussed upon the second readings, in committee and on third readings if necessary, so there will be the fullest possible opportunity to consider every phase of every measure that may be brought forward. Therefore I pass them by, except to say that the measures which will be submitted to this house are measures which it is believed by the administration will advance the interests, the welfare and the well-being of the Canadian people. We commend them to this house and to the investigation, consideration and discussion of members of the house, certain that if they are approached from that angle, and that angle only, they will meet the requirements I have mentioned.

Now let us proceed to a matter to which the right hon. gentleman directed the major part of his address. After all, four and a half hours is a fairly reasonable time in which to make up for a silence of six months. When one thinks of the enormous amount of toil that must have been involved in this analysis of all that has gone by, and this gazing into the future with the eyes of a would-be seer, but after all with the vision of nothing more than a very poor prophet, one wonders what the four and a half hour speech was all about. What was it all about? He said that the speech from the throne divided itself into two parts, the sermon and the diagnosis. Well, upon the sermon he founded diatribe and abuse of a character seldom heard in this house, while upon the diagnosis he performed a surgical operation that resulted at least in disaster to those about him.

Why is it that present conditions prevail in Canada? Do you realize that this new land, in the present world-wide depression, should have been able, had its policies been adequate, to escape such results? Do you realize that if this country had been making thoughtful provision for the future, if its leaders had been looking into the future with eyes of vision, there should not have come this disaster to the Canadian people? Do you realize that this government has been in power eight months and that whatever conditions prevail in Canada to-day are attributable, not to it but to the governments that preceded it? What would the right hon. gentleman have said if, eight months after he came into power in 1921, he had been charged with responsibility for the conditions that then existed? What did he then do? What did he say? What was his position? He freed himself from all responsibility and declared that his predecessors had been responsible for the conditions that then prevailed. And now he comes before the Canadian people and says to them that this government, having been in power seven or eight months, having inherited the conditions that confronted them when they took office, are responsible and alone responsible for those conditions. Do you think any man in this country, thoughtful and fair-minded, has any such opinion? Do you think any people in Canada who approach these problems with an attitude of just criticism have any such idea?

Let me ask my right hon. friend and this house this question: Where would this country have been had it not been for the session last fall which gave employment to upwards of two hundred thousand people? Study if you will for a moment the figures of industry. In eight months new factories cannot be equipped and built, but they can be commenced, and the numbers that have been commenced in this country during those eight months are more than those during any other similar period in recent years. New factories? How many men in the counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite are now finding full time employment against the short days and poor rations preceding the 28th of July? How many of them? What about cotton mills? What about woollen mills?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Duff) knows less about cotton mills than about cotton sails.

Mr. DUFF: Excuse me, I did not open my mouth.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I entirely withdraw the remark.

Mr. DUFF: I am listening attentively to my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Then I will say that my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough knows far more about cotton sails than about the cotton industry.

Mr. DUFF: I have a question on the order paper now.

Mr. BENNETT: When it is asserted by the leader of the Liberal party that you can secure a governor general's warrant to provide for unemployment and agreements with the provinces, that is a nullification of the whole principle of the responsibility of representative institutions. It never has been done and I trust never will be done in this country. There had to be a session of parliament, as there was, and it gave employment to upwards of two hundred thousand people. So that, with the industrial life of this country stimulated, with improved conditions with respect to employment, with the added employment of hundreds of thousands in the way of unemployment relief, I say that conditions in Canada, bad as they are, are not comparable to what they would have been had we not taken the action that we did. What is more, that is an opinion very generally held by thoughtful people in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: What about agriculture?

Mr. BENNETT: I shall deal with agriculture. That opinion, I say, is held by thoughtful observers from one end of Canada to the other, and I am proud that this government has been privileged to have the opportunity to serve the people of this country in that way at this time. We do not belong to that school of thought, of which you find evidence among leaders in the Liberal party, who go about the country saying, "We are so thankful the responsibility is not ours; we are so grateful, so glad that somebody else has it." Sir, it is a proud thing to be a Canadian and to have some opportunity to serve the country. We are not going around making excuses of that kind, and we will not. The burden is heavy; of course it is. The difficulties are many; of course they are. But it is a privilege to be able to think that with such ability as we have, such talents as this government has, we are able to give this service to the country. And I say this to my right hon. friend opposite and his friends. It sounds very amusing and touching to speak of the Prime Minister being the government. I doubt if there has been in this country for years a government whose relations inter se have been more harmonious and pleasant. I doubt if there has ever been a government in which there has been a fuller discussion and consideration of every question affecting the public interest before action is taken. And in fairness to my colleagues—I am not at all concerned about myself—I only desire to say that there never has been any effort on the part of the head of the government to obtrude or force his opinions on the cabinet, but that after discussion the conclusions arrived at are the united opinion of the cabinet and for the public welfare. That has been and will continue to be our attitude; and if at times this government has taken action more expeditiously than has been the wont of the government in recent years, and has believed that anything that is worth doing should be done as well as possible and as quickly as possible —if these be faults, then you can lay the blame if you please, at my door and not at that of the administration.

The comment is made that I am holding too many offices myself. Well, I hold one more than did the former Prime Minister. It is true I hold the portfolio of Finance; and the reason I gave for this in the first session, the reason which I still give, I will now indicate. I had made certain very definite promises in every part of Canada. I came into power—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Our government came into being. It is the custom sometimes for Prime Ministers to refer to themselves in this way, using the personal pronoun I; if you desire any evidence on that point I can furnish you abundantly with precedents from the opposite side. The personal pronoun sometimes has to be used, although we avoid it as much as possible. However, let me say this. Having gathered together certain information which I thought might be valuable, I used it at the special session in connection with the tariff measures which we passed. I went to the Imperial conference, and as Minister of Finance I received a great deal of further information and correlated to one another many facts from various parts of the empire; and when the conference was adjourned I believed it was desirable, rather than endeavour to hand over to someone else the knowledge I had gained and the information that had come to me, that, even though it might involve greater toil than I felt at my age disposed to undertake, it was my duty to carry on until that conference was ended. And with the help of Providence I propose to do so. That is all I can say in that respect.

Now, as to these indices of the country's prosperity, I do not know at times what to admire most on the part of the leader of the opposition; he is either assuming that the people who have not been able to discover the facts are lacking in intelligence or he has unwittingly misrepresented them.

Yesterday he spoke about the reduction in taxation. I have the figures here which show that during the last year of Liberal administration there was taken from the people of this country by taxation the sum of $395,000,000, which was $100,000,000 more than in 1925, and greater than any amount taken during any previous year. The figures for 1931 have not been published, but for the year ending March 30, 1930, there was taken from the Canadian people in taxation the sum of $378,000,000. That is a larger amount than for any year but one since 1925.

Mr. RALSTON: But we did more business.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not talking about that, but that statement is not correct. The right hon. gentleman was not talking about that yesterday, he was talking about the reduction in taxation which his government had accomplished. Here are the facts in round figures:

1925	$293,000,000
1926	327,000,000
1927	346,000,000
1928	364,000,000
1929	395,000,000
1930	378,000,000

There has been less taxation taken out of the Canadian people during the last eight months than for any eight months in the last ten years. One would think that that would be some encouragement to hon. gentlemen opposite, but they do not seem to like it.

An hon. MEMBER: Do you?

Mr. BENNETT: And then the question of trade was taken up by the right hon. gentleman. This is an old story which appears in Hansard in nearly every speech on the budget. No allowance was made for the depreciated value of the purchasing power of money in determining the value of wheat, for instance, nor of wood pulp or paper exported from this country this year as compared with the year before. Had these signs of prosperity been such as he suggested it would have brought about a condition which would have enabled the people to have met the storm of adversity without difficulty.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Those prices were supposed to go up after July 28.

Mr. BENNETT: When comparisons are made with previous years it is always desirable to adjust prices. I merely mention that in passing.

Then came the matter of the sale of our western crops. In listening to the right hon. gentleman one would have thought that his administration had taken an active part in an endeavour to sell wheat in the markets of the world, that they had behind them a record so unassailable that no one could for one moment cavil at their actions. Perhaps the western members will recall the words of the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) when he said: "We are not concerned with the sale of wheat as wheat finds its own place in the markets of the world. That was the contribution made by the right hon. gentleman to the sale of wheat in the markets of the world—we are not concerned about it, it finds its own place. In reviewing some of the speeches made by the hon. gentleman's friends one would think that more Canadian wheat had been sold in England last year than during the year we have now entered upon. Here are the facts. For the seven months commencing with August, 1930, we sold to Great Britain 90,000,000 bushels of wheat, while the total sales during the corresponding seven months of 1929-30 amounted to 65,000,000 bushels.

Mr. VALLANCE: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: Has the—

Mr. BENNETT: The total purchase price of the wheat sold in 1931 amounted to only $67,000,000 for the 90,000,000 bushels, while the 65,000,000 bushels sold in 1930 brought $88,000,000. Perhaps that is what the hon. gentleman desires to know? Why that difference in price?

Mr. YOUNG: The tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: I am satisfied that if the hon. gentleman's constituents could have heard him make that statement they would have thought much less of him than when he was going around the country with a pair of white stockings.

Mr. McINTOSH: They had a good cutter.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the hon. gentleman remembers that.

Mr. VALLANCE: It won the election.

Mr. BENNETT: It did not.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member is sitting in the house.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well to ask the right hon. gentleman why the price of wheat has fallen so in England. That is the crux of the question. Canadian wheat was not the first to fall in price, the wheat which came in from Russia during last fall fixed the price.

Mr. YOUNG: Came in?

Mr. BENNETT: Came into England, yes, and Russian wheat is still coming in.

Mr. VALLANCE: Because you would not take Russian coal.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman seems to forget the fact that we are taking a million tons of Welsh anthracite coal.

Mr. VALLANCE: And American coal as well.

Mr. BENNETT: And it was possible to sell that million tons of Welsh anthracite coal because the unfair Russian competition was removed.

Mr. DONNELLY: American coal is still coming in.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps you will maintain some order, Mr. Speaker. These mutterings of discontent with the truth are not new at all, they are as old as time.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is true.

Mr. BENNETT: The introduction of Russian wheat into the British market has spoiled the market for Canadian wheat, as has the introduction of lumber from northern Russia spoiled the market for Canadian lumber. In order to avoid any misunderstanding, I took the trouble to ascertain the number of cargoes of wheat which came into England during the time I was there, and the price at which they were sold. I realized that the price was less than the cost of production in western Canada. The effect was that Canadian wheat at once reached a lower price level than it had reached before in years. There was more than 200,000,000 bushels of wheat from Russia that were being offered in competition with Canadian wheat, and we are threatened with a larger quantity of wheat.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not 200,000,000 bushels?

Mr. BENNETT: I said 200,000,000 bushels.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): From Russia?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. VALLANCE: In the British market?

Mr. BENNETT: No. I said "being offered". Of course all of it did not reach the British market, but from my personal knowledge something over 60,000,000 bushels have reached that market. Just what it has now reached I cannot say, but this I do say—and with respect to this there should be no difficulty—the free introduction of that wheat on the markets of Liverpool, London and other ports of Great Britain fixed for wheat a price that it was impossible for Canadians to accept without losing money. That is the story and that was the situation when we reached England.

I shall make only a few observations with respect to the Imperial conference so far as leaving here is concerned. We came into power on the seventh day of August; we had to get our government elected. That took us along towards the end of August. The conference was to meet the first of October. The late government had set up a committee to prepare certain information and figures with respect to matters that would there be considered. I had made known to the people of this country, so far as it was humanly possible, both in the house and out of it, just what the policy of the government was and would be at that conference, namely, an effort to secure reciprocal preferences within the empire. That was our effort; that is what we promised. That is what the people of the country were told in the house and out of it. The conference met, and on the first day certain messages of welcome were read and tributes paid to those who were gone. Then it was agreed that a plenary session would open at a later date. Let us see what dominions sat around that council board. First in point of age was Canada, then Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, the Irish Free State, Newfoundland, and of course the mother land herself. At the second plenary meeting statements were made by the prime ministers of each of these dominions and a portion of what I said on that occasion was read to the house last evening. At page 31 of the appendices of the summary of proceedings will be found the commencement of the observations which I made. I endeavoured to point out that reciprocal trade agreements were absolutely essential for the preservation and maintenance of the economic life of our empire. You will find these words:

> And if this conference is to meet these problems and provide an effective solution of them, it seems to me that my attitude towards my own country will be the attitude of you all towards yours. On no other basis can we hope to effect an enduring agreement of benefit to each one of us. I will determine what my country needs, and, if you do likewise, then we may come together and search out the means by which we can be of mutual assistance in satisfying those needs.
> I rejoice that the government of Canada finds, in the empire scheme I have to propose, the surest promise that its duty to its own country will be fulfilled. For we believe that through the broadening of the home markets of empire states to empire products, in preference to the products of foreign countries, every unit of this empire will benefit. This does not mean, of course, that an attempt should be made to exclude from empire markets the goods of other countries.

We must have—all of us—markets without the empire, and to make those markets sure, and greater, we must place no insuperable barrier in the road of reciprocal world trade. What it does mean, however, is that we should direct the present flow of trade into more permanent empire channels by preferring empire goods to those of other countries. That can be done only in one way—by creating a preference in favour of empire goods.

Now far from denying that we would be dealing in world markets, you will observe that I said the exact opposite, and when the right hon. gentleman last night charged me with endeavouring to create a closed, walled empire, or a closed, walled country, he either did not read what I said at that conference, or, having read it, deliberately misrepresented and left it out. I again repeat these words which will be found on page 31:

> This does not mean, of course, that an attempt should be made to exclude from empire markets the goods of other countries. We must have—all of us—markets without the empire, and to make those markets sure, and greater, we must place no insuperable barrier in the road of reciprocal world trade.

And then I spoke about the empire. There at once is the contradiction on the record of the statement made to the house and the country last night by the leader of the opposition, when he must have known that the above observations were a part of the address I made on that occasion, because he could not have read the preceding paragraph from which he made his quotation without realizing what my attitude was. Then I proceeded:

> We have considered what such a scheme of preference will mean to Canada and to the other parts of the empire, and our conclusion is, that we of the empire states have within our own control the means to advance the interests of each one of us, by developing a plan of economic cooperation, based on the principle of empire preferences.

Further on I said:

> Again, it is conceivable that this preferential rate should be lower in the case of raw products, or where the empire supply does not meet the empire demand. On the other hand, the preference may be increased beyond ten per centum where that rate, in relation to the main tariff, is inadequate to afford empire goods an appreciable advantage over those of foreign countries.

Then I continued as will be found at page 33:

> All these are matters requiring the most careful consideration. Some of them might readily be resolved into difficulties so definite as to defy removal, unless the greatest care is taken to anticipate and avoid them. They must, therefore, be subjected to searching analysis by the economists of all the countries concerned.

I put to the house and the country this query: Could any Canadian worthy of the name, at a conference such as that, say less? Could any Canadian say less than that his first duty and obligation was to the country that sent him there, that had honoured him with its confidence and support? He would go further and say that we hoped to work out plans that would be advantageous to us and the other parts of the empire, at the same time realizing that we must not shut the doors in any way to reciprocal world trade, for every man knows that must be so. If it had then ended, there might have been some force in the observations made last night by the former Prime Minister. But did he tell the house yesterday during that long four-hour speech what attitude was taken by the prime ministers of the other self-governing dominions of the empire?

Then in his endeavour to make a failure of this conference that will be held in Ottawa this fall, in his endeavour to destroy any possibility this government might have of success in that regard, what did he do? He tried to fasten upon the representative of his own country blame that did not attach to him unless it attached to every prime minister of every other dominion of the British empire.

Mr. Scullin, the Prime Minister of Australia, followed me. I had spoken first, as the representative of the senior dominion. What did Mr. Scullin say?

> I entirely agree with Mr. Bennett that we must come to some decision on that principle. Already that principle has been conceded. Already there is a measure of preference in operation reciprocally between the dominions and the United Kingdom. Already there are treaties in existence between certain dominion governments. We have accepted to a large extent the principle of preference, but it is our duty at this conference first of all to affirm the maintenance of that principle and the extension of its operation.

He then took up in detail a consideration of the various measures which his own country had passed and dealt with the preferences that were enjoyed by Australia in the British market. Then he said:

> I have outlined in broad principle what Australia is prepared to do, and what I believe we at this conference ought to agree to do. If those principles are accepted, I suggest that a committee of this conference be formed, when I shall be prepared to suggest in detail proposals to give practical effect to this policy of economic cooperation.

That is what Mr. Scullin said. He was followed by Mr. Forbes, the Prime Minister of New Zealand. Mr. Forbes, at very great length, and with figures, dealt with the whole situation, and at the end he arrived at his conclusion. These are his words at page 107:

> As a first step, I cannot too strongly urge that the representatives of the United Kingdom—

Note, the representatives of the United Kingdom, not the representatives of his own country, not the representatives of his own government or of his own people. He continued:

> As a first step, I cannot too strongly urge that the representatives of the United Kingdom should seriously consider the provision of some adequate assistance to the languishing industries of this country, and this, in my opinion, can be afforded effectively by tariff protection against the "dumping" of the surplus products of other countries whose tariff walls prevent the free flow of trade and against the competition of imported goods, often on an unfair basis and invariably on terms of advantage as compared with the article produced in the United Kingdom.

He went a step further. Mr. Forbes went on to say:

> As a second step, I feel that a tariff preference in this country in favour of empire products (including foodstuffs), accompanied by increased preference in favour of British goods in the overseas empire, would be the greatest single factor in increasing inter-imperial trade. It is my view that trade within the empire must play, in the future, a far more important part in the economics of the commonwealth than ever in the past, and the utmost effort should be made to foster and increase the sentiment in favour of the purchase of empire goods.

So you have Australia and New Zealand behind Canada.

Then Mr. Havenga, Minister of Finance for the Union of South Africa, also made his statement, in terms somewhat stronger. He said:

> The remedy must, so far as the Union is concerned be looked for in directions outside free trade, and we are willing and anxious to explore every avenue to that end.
> The question appears to be capable of being stated very simply; Great Britain, with her industrial difficulties, seeks markets for her manufactures in the dominions, while the dominions, in their agricultural troubles, are anxious to extend their markets in Great Britain for their produce.

He went on and discussed at length the various items which he thought should be considered by the committee.

Then came the representative of the Irish Free State, Mr. McGilligan. He put his position very frankly before the gathering by saying that so far as the economic situation was concerned, the Irish Free State would have to consider each problem as it arose because of its geographical relation to the United Kingdom. He speaks of that under the heading, The Relation of Geographical Factors to Economic Policy, and as a matter of fact he shortly afterwards put into force the principle there alluded to

He was followed by Sir Richard Squires, the Prime Minister of Newfoundland, who said:

I refer to Mr. Bennett particularly because the policy and program of the Dominion of Canada, a territory removed but eighty miles by sea from Newfoundland, must naturally affect my own country, separated both politically and geographically though we be. I join with him and the other distinguished Empire leaders who have preceded me in their view that now is the time for action; that this is the body to which not only the entire Empire but the whole world is looking for constructive thought; not merely thought expressed in polished periods, but thought expressed in action. The policy of imperial preference, so ably indicated by Mr. Bennett, will certainly have the enthusiastic support of Newfoundland.

There you have the whole matter.

I had intended at a later date to deal with one particular feature of the discussions at the conference, but it seems desirable that it should be dealt with now. When the committees were appointed and questions considered in detail it was suggested that a quota might meet our views; that is, if England would say that her own requirements would be purchased on a quota basis, about 15 per cent, we will say, home production, and 55 per cent British Empire production, making 70 per cent, and 30 per cent from foreign countries, something might be done for preference. Evidence was taken and opinions were expressed, and as a matter of fact Dr. Addison had a bill prepared that dealt with the quota for domestic wheat. But then the mind of the committee changed, and the government thought it not desirable, because of lack of information, to pursue the inquiry further at that time, and so it dropped for the time being, the opinion being expressed that the question should be further explored if the conference adjourned to Ottawa.

Now let us see what happened in the concluding days of the conference. At page 225 you will find the concluding speeches, on November 14, 1930. You will find the observations made by myself on behalf of the Canadian delegation, and there is one matter that I should like to mention now, because it becomes somewhat important in view of an observation made yesterday. You will find at the bottom of page 225 these words:

Mr. Bennett: I will not do more than say that the experience of succeeding years confirms me in the view, from which I have never departed, that the traditional policy of the party which I have the honour to lead, is best for Canada. I have explained this policy to the conference in a definite way, and there is therefore no need for me to restate my position, except to amplify it by saying that, in view of the report of the committee on economic cooperation which we have had under consideration, and in view of my own personal inquiries into the agricultural situation in this country, I consider it proper to say that we from the Dominion of Canada are prepared to consider the desirability of accepting the quota system as a solution of the problem of marketing our Empire wheat in the United Kingdom, having regard especially to importations from foreign countries. This view I have already expressed to heads of delegations and it, therefore, seems to me proper that I should now relate it to the view expressed at the second plenary meeting of the conference, which view in no other respect am I prepared to modify in any way whatever. The offer which I then extended to this conference is still open, and will, I confidently believe, be accepted by all at Ottawa.

I therefore move, Mr. Chairman, that the economic section of the conference adjourn to Ottawa to meet within the next twelve months at a date to be mutually agreed upon.

Mr. Scullin followed and said:

Therefore, we are forced to adjourn that section of the conference for further consideration and deliberation after we have had further examination into all the facts. But the economic side of the conference has by no means been a failure.

Then Mr. Forbes made observations in the same sense. Mr. Hertzog said:

I and my colleagues came here with the knowledge that we should have to see that our expectations did not run too high, and our expectations not having run too high we have no great disappointments to carry away with us.

Mr. McGilligan said:

Much may happen between this and then, and if we have then to view these matters in a somewhat aloof and detached way, we shall nevertheless look with interest to see whether climatic conditions can bring about the reconciliation of the many views that in this climate appear to be so irreconciliable.

I am content to leave myself in the judgment of this house and of the country as to whether or not the attitude taken by Canada on that occasion was not the attitude that was taken by the representatives of every one of the dominions represented at the conference. Only some of them spoke in terms somewhat stronger than I with respect to the desirability, nay, the necessity, of immediate action being taken by the government of the United Kingdom to change its attitude on some of these questions.

Let me turn to the view of the conference expressed by Mr. Richard Jebb. I direct the careful attention of hon. members to an article by him in the Nineteenth Century for December last entitled From Referendum to Free Hand. At page 698 will be found the following:

For the past thirty years they have shown themselves only too willing to do business whenever we might be ready.

That is Canada and the other dominions.

As to Canada in particular, Laurier's original offer of 1902 has been lying on the table ever since, awaiting our willingness to tax foreign wheat. It was on precisely the same lines as Mr. Bennett's. Let us recall that Laurier (a) specified the market for wheat as Canada's special interest; (b) required our government first to "accept the principle," i.e., of putting—or rather keeping—a duty on foreign wheat; and (c) offered on that basis to negotiate in detail an extension of British preference in Canada. Mr. Bennett offered no more and no less.

Mr. Bennett offered no more and no less.

An hon. MEMBER: In different language.

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to show the house that the language is about the same. Complaint has been made of something in his manner that lacked the cool repose of a Vere de Vere. But at any rate the right hon. gentleman in looking through the records has found that I was frank in statement; there was no circumlocution, there was no uncertainty as to what I meant. It is so difficult for the right hon. gentleman to understand any man acting in that way. I am bound to say that perhaps from his long experience in maintaining a government without a majority, subject to the whims and caprices of those who might induce him to change his mind almost overnight, I can readily understand he would have had the representatives of Canada endeavour, if not in an oleaginous at least in a saponaceous manner or by the exercise of flattery, endeavour to induce other persons to change their attitude. Then at the end of the four and a half hours this is what he is talking about. I can only say that the presentation of the case from the Canadian standpoint before the second plenary conference took exactly seventeen minutes by the clock, and there was at least one Canadian there who, although not a member of the delegation, listened and thought it was as clear and as concise a presentation as it was possible to make.

An hon. MEMBER: Howard Ferguson.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not Mr. Ferguson. I can only say that if the hon. gentleman ever approaches him in brains and capacity he will be much better off than he is to-day.

Now I turn to the record of the 1902 Imperial conference referred to by Mr. Richard Jebb in the Nineteenth Century. At least one or two hon. members will recall the attitude taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his ministers on that occasion. I wonder how many in this house realize just exactly the language then employed. On page 36 of the report it will be found that Sir Wilfrid Laurier with others agreed to this statement:

The general resolution that was finally adopted as covering the principle underlying the several proposals comprised in Mr. Balfour's memorandum, was as follows:

1. That this conference recognizes that the principle of preferential trade between the United Kingdom and His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas would stimulate and facilitate mutual commercial intercourse, and would, by promoting the development of the resources and industries of the several parts, strengthen the empire.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the hon. gentleman was not saying "hear, hear" yesterday when the leader of the opposition was reading what I said. Let me continue:

2. That this conference recognizes that, in the present circumstances of the colonies, it is not practicable to adopt a general system of free trade as between the mother country and the British dominions beyond the seas.

That also hon. members will find in the address which I made at the second plenary conference.

3. That with a view however, to promoting the increase of trade within the empire, it is desirable that those colonies which have not already adopted such a policy should, as far as their circumstances permit, give substantial preferential treatment to the products and manufactures of the United Kingdom.

4. That the Prime Ministers of the colonies respectfully urge on His Majesty's government the expediency of granting in the United Kingdom preferential treatment to the products and manufactures of the colonies, either by exemption from or reduction of duties now or hereafter imposed.

5. That the Prime Ministers present at the conference undertake to submit to their respective governments at the earliest opportunity the principle of the resolution, and to request them to take such measures as may be necessary to give effect to it.

But Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not content to let it rest there. He handed in a special memorandum covering a page and a half of this book. I want the house to listen to the words and see what difference there is between the language employed by the Prime Minister of Canada in 1930 and the Prime Minister of Canada in 1902 in respect to this matter. There may be, and always are, differences of phrasing, but here is a matter that was agreed to in a memorandum by Canada's minister. Mr. Chamberlain, the then Colonial Secretary, was present. The Dominions department had not yet come into being. This is the memorandum in part:

From the beginning of the proceedings the Canadian ministers have claimed that in consideration of the substantial preference given by Canada for some years to the products of the mother country, Canadian food products should be exempted in the United Kingdom from the duties recently imposed. Representations to this effect previously made through the High Commissioner for Canada were supplemented by the ministers, both in writing and in the personal interviews with the imperial ministers.

Twenty-eight years ago that was urged. Last fall Canada again urged it. That is all. But Canada did it in a somewhat different form, as I shall presently point out. Now let us go a step further:

Mr. Chamberlain, on behalf of the Imperial government, was unable to agree to the proposals of the Canadian ministers. He represented that the Imperial government, while highly appreciating the good feeling manifested by Canada in the granting of preferential treatment, did not think the material results to the trade of the United Kingdom were as great as the Canadian ministers claimed. He further said that the change desired by Canada would be an important departure from the established fiscal policy of the kingdom, and that if the proposals could be entertained at all, as to which he was not prepared to commit himself, it would be necessary for Canada to offer some material tariff concessions beyond those which she had already voluntarily given.

The Canadian ministers, therefore, submitted a memorandum on the subject of the advantages already received by Great Britain from the Canadian preferential tariff, with a view to showing that these were of much value, and entitled to weight in the consideration of the whole subject.

Now here are the words to which I direct the careful attention of the house:

While urging that the benefits of the preference were such as to entitle Canada to the desired exemption from the duties on food products in the United Kingdom, the Canadian ministers stated that within certain limitations they were prepared to consider the request of Mr. Chamberlain for further concessions in return for the desired preference in the markets of the United Kingdom. While it was not deemed necessary to enter into questions as to the wisdom or unwisdom of the policy adopted by all governments in Canada—

Mark you, "by all governments in Canada."

—of raising the revenues chiefly from customs duties, the Canadian ministers pointed out that under that policy large industries had grown up which had to be considered in connection with proposed tariff changes. Large reductions of duties had been made in recent years, especially on British imports.

And so on. Now, I ask this house and the country if there is any difference in substance between that proposal and the proposal we made in 1930. Mr. Jebb says they are exactly the same. Let us go a step further:

The Canadian ministers stated that if they could be assured that the Imperial government would accept the principle of preferential trade generally, and particularly grant to the food products of Canada in the United Kingdom exemption from duties now levied, or hereafter imposed, they, the Canadian ministers, would be prepared to go further into the subject, and endeavour to give to the British manufacturer some increased advantage over his foregn competitors in the markets of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it not delightful to hear that cheer now for the sentiment hon. members opposite opposed yesterday? Is it any wonder the right hon. gentleman is an expert in the use of that word? Mr. Speaker, there is the proposal submitted by the Canadian ministers in amplification of the statements that were made before the conference on August 11, 1902.

An hon. MEMBER: That is different.

Mr. BENNETT: I leave the question as to whether it is different. For my part I might perhaps be prejudiced, but great as is my admiration for Canadians I still believe that Richard Jebb has a mental capacity at least equal to that of those who have raised the issue here, especially the last one I heard.

Now let us discuss that matter fairly. That was the proposal of 1902, and it has been lying upon the table ever since, as Mr. Jebb says. But I have not read the most damning part of this statement; it is the part I want to read, containing the threat of so mild a mannered man as the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I wanted to finish before I heard your cheers, but I would like to hear some cheers now. Listen to these words:

Meanwhile the Canadian ministers determined to present to the conference a resolution affirming the principle of preferential trade, and the desirability of its adoption by the colonies generally, and also expressing the opinion of the prime ministers of the colonies that His Majesty's government should reciprocate by granting preferential terms to the products of the colonies in the markets of the mother country.

In 1902 they had not any hesitation in presenting such a resolution; they were not bothered about the fine point as to whether it might or might not please Mr. Chamberlain. They did not bother about that any more than I did. Then listen to these words:

The Canadian ministers desired to have it understood that they took this course with the strong hope and expectation that the principle of preferential trade would be more widely accepted by the colonies, and that the mother country would at an early day apply the same principle by exempting the products of the colonies from customs duties.

That was twenty-eight years ago. Then listen to these words:

If, after using every effort to bring about such a readjustment of the fiscal policy of the empire, the Canadian government should find that the principle of preferential trade is not acceptable to the colonies generally, or the mother country, then Canada should be free to take such action as might be deemed necessary in the presence of such conditions.

What did Canada say in 1930, twenty-eight years later? Of course a great war intervened; there were the conferences of 1917, 1923 and 1926, and oh, those glorious platitudes, those beautiful words. How they sound, those oleaginous statements of what a beautiful thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity, and all that sort of thing. Is it any wonder that when the British papers published in full the seventeen minute address they said, "Well, we are thankful we have passed the age of platitudes." Why, anyone who listened yesterday to the right hon. gentleman could realize how at a conference such as that of last fall he would not make a statement such as that I have just read. Oh no; he would say, "Give me spirit and faith; these are finer than the things of the world. But do not take away the market in Russia."

The right hon. gentleman has talked about the severing of relations with the empire. That is the exaggerated ego, unable to believe that it is possible for anyone except himself to represent Canada in any capacity whatever. When I used the language I did, the language which was published in the statement regarding Mr. Thomas, that we must look for inter-empire arrangements regardless of what the mother country did, I but gave voice to the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, uttered twenty-eight years before. It is true that I had not had five or six years of experience as a prime minister before doing so, as he then had; it is true also that I perhaps used blunter language, but it was more easily understood. When the right hon. gentleman yonder complains of the language I used I say this to him: I will not discuss that question beyond saying that every newspaper but one in Great Britain expressed gratitude that someone had put the issue clearly up to the people. It is only necessary to take the clippings of that day and read them in order to determine the truth of that statement. There was no talk of severing relations and even the statement made after the conference closed, in response to Mr. Thomas, was characterized as moderate and dignified by the British journals. That is all, but the right hon. leader of the opposition, in order to create a prejudice in the minds of our own people, speaks of that language as being petulant and childish. I will take the opinion of the greatest journal in the world in respect to that.

There is one other matter which remains to be considered. I have not gone into these matters in great detail, but I felt it was desirable to place before this house the circumstances which led us to take the position we did take. The right hon. gentleman said yesterday that we should not talk about preference within the empire, that anyone would think we were talking at an empire conference. I say we were talking at an empire conference, and we were talking about just what Sir Wilfrid Laurier referred to, empire preference. We did not refer to preference between Great Britain and Canada but between every part of the empire, reciprocal preference between every part, to the mutual advantage and general benefit of all. That is what we were endeavouring to do. We were not dealing with a preference as between Australia and Canada, Great Britain and Canada, or Great Britain and South Africa; we were dealing with a reciprocal preference, a British Empire preference touching every part of the empire. That is what Laurier was dealing with in 1902; that is what we were dealing with in 1930; that is what we have been endeavouring to deal with and will deal with when this conference meets here this fall, representing every part of the British Empire, for the purpose of determining whether or not the investigations which have been set in motion will result in some concrete plans being made by which we can give effect to an idea which is common alike to those who agree with us and those who do not agree with us on questions of preference and free trade, namely an empire preference. We believe that preference might be best worked out by a system of tariff preferences, but there were those who believed it might be worked out by a quota system, with reference to grain and certain other commodities. We said, let the investigations proceed in order that it may be determined to what extent this is true. That is the position to-day. And I say it ill becomes any Canadian leader of a great party, whose greatest leader adopted language similar to our own, when a conference is not yet concluded, when it only stands adjourned, when he knows that in the very nature of things I cannot go into a discussion of many of the matters which he raised yesterday, inasmuch as they are sub judice before that conference, to come here and go back upon the past of his party in order that he may find an opportunity to make an attack, wholly baseless and unwarranted, upon the method by which Canada had her case presented to that conference. I have nothing to withdraw with respect to that presentation, not a word, not a syllable, not a line. It was put in fifteen minutes—seventeen to be exact—from the time it started until it ended; and in that time we but summarised what had gone before. We said, "Twenty-eight or thirty years is long enough to wait, and the time has come when the Canadian people will determine whether or not we shall go forward to realize the dream, the end aimed at by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902, and others in the years before that; whether or not we shall endeavour among ourselves, regardless of the attitude of the mother country, to work out a system of preferences.

There were two or three other matters referred to yesterday upon which I think it is necessary that I should make at least a passing comment. One of them dealt with the question of what was called the attitude of mind, the atmosphere of the relations between the British government and our own. I have indicated that the language used by other parts of the empire was not different from my own, and I think the British government will receive, in no spirit of, shall I say, pleasure, the assertion made by the leader of the opposition of this country that the relations between that government and the government of Canada are other than of the most harmonious character. I know such is not the case. I know that my relations, even with the sternest and most unbending of those who were in that conference, one whose views on fiscal questions are well known, were such that my views at least compelled his acknowledged and admitted respect. And my experience with British public men has been entirely different, shall I say, from that of the right hon. gentleman opposite. I have never found them desirous of lip service, as was said by one of them at the conference. I have never seen them desiring to be the victims of flattery or of the oleaginous patronage of any one in the world. But I have seen them always anxious to have frank, plain, blunt statements made, statements which they can understand and appreciate. And if I say that my experience with them has been that our relations have been improved rather than otherwise as a result of the conference, I but state the simple truth. I should not like to have the opinion sent abroad to the four quarters of our world that these gentlemen are in any sense coming as unwilling guests to Canada at an early date. I would not have them think that the leader of the opposition voices the sentiment or the thought of the Canadian people. I should like to have it known that these gentlemen will be welcome guests of ours, and I believe my relations with them will always compare favourably with the relations of my right hon. friend with any people in the world. If there is any virtue in frankness as against circumlocution, if there is any virtue in a plain statement of the case as distinguished from flowery platitudes and rhetoric, then I have no doubt as to what the position is.

In fairness at least to one of the members of this house it is my duty to correct one misstatement. Yesterday something was said about the cattle embargo. I happened to be in the gallery when the motion in connection with the cattle embargo was made both in the House of Commons and in the Lords in London, at one time in one place and on another occasion in the other. The fact is that in 1917, when Sir Robert Borden, Mr. Rogers, Sir George Perley and Sir Douglas Hazen represented Canada at the Imperial conference, the question of the cattle embargo was taken up. Mr. Walter Long, afterwards Viscount Long of Wraxall, presided at that gathering as Secretary of State for the Colonies, and he said that Sir Robert Borden had pressed upon him the desirablility, yea, the necessity of something being done to remove this "stigma" and "slur" from Canadian cattle. Mr. Prothero, afterwards Baron Ernle, said, "Yes, we will take it off". Thereupon Mr. Rogers said—the record is here—"I think we should have a motion". Mr. Long said, "Surely you do not want a motion. However, we will put it down", and down it went. Then the war ended. They did not want to take the embargo off despite that pledge. A conference was appointed, presided over by Viscount Findlay. Mr. Tolmie, now Prime Minister of British Columbia, was really responsible for the presentation of the case—a case never more admirably presented anywhere, according to the authorities who heard it submitted. Then the claim to remove the embargo was pressed, and strange as it may sound, Mr. Prothero, then Baron Ernle, in the House of Lords said that no pledge had been given and it would be disastrous to England to remove the embargo. He took that view. Viscount Birkenhead was then chancellor, and he took a strong position with respect to that pledge. Then the Duke of Devonshire spoke and said: "All I can say is this, that the Canadian people believed, when Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Rogers returned, that the pledge meant that the word of England was given that the embargo would be taken off, and we must remove it." Then Viscount Long of Wraxall reviewed the whole case and said, "Even though it involves hardship our pledge must be kept". In the Commons the same thing transpired; and despite the fact that a desperate effort was made to prevent that embargo being taken off, the pledge was implemented. But the atmosphere was not what one would call very nice just at that particular time. That was not any atmosphere of conciliation, as my right hon. friend calls it, whatever it may mean. It was contended that a pledge had been given and must be kept. That was the attitude of Mr. Larkin. He asked me to speak to one gentleman in particular who was opposed to that embargo, and I did. I said, "You cannot maintain your place having given a pledge such as that and not implementing it". And the gentleman who saw that it was made a pledge, upon which the decision eventually turned, is the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers).

Now I have mentioned that because I think that in fairness it should be done. And it illustrates again the position. The right hon. gentleman has said that in conciliation and smooth words lies the pathway to success; and he charges that I have been guilty of coercion and of coercive methods. Well, if to state the facts frankly, if to set down one's views without malice, if to believe that words should be used to express thought and not to disguise it—if this is of value, then I can say that this is all the coercion that has been practised. One will not review the derivation of the word "coercion"; but to suggest that there has been coercion, to suggest that I have done more than Sir Wilfrid Laurier did in 1902, is entirely beside the record. The facts are there. The problem of the sale of Canada's wheat is still a problem that must be solved, if we continue to produce as we have produced; and I think it might be well to say here, as I think hon. gentlemen know, that the consuming capacity of England does not exceed 250,000,000 bushels of wheat, perhaps going as high as 275,000,000 depending upon circumstances. To say that this government or any other government can change the policy of Great Britain in favour of Canada at a time when her own people are losing £5 per acre in the production of wheat indicates a lack of understanding. One 500 acre field was pointed out to me as being the best field in Essex and the owner was losing £5 per acre in an endeavour to compete against foreign wheat. I have read the statements made by prime ministers from other parts of the empire with respect to these matters. It has been said by the right hon. leader of the opposition that we should have found a market for this wheat, and one of his supporters actually went so far as to say that if Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Dunning had gone to the conferences a market would have been found. That statement was made publicly.

An hon. MEMBER: That was just chaff.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not chaff, it was deception. I hope there will be ample opportunity for the hon. gentleman's mutterings to find expression.

One other charge has been levelled against us, and that is that the prestige of this country has been adversely affected by the attitude taken by Canada last fall. If the opinion of those best able to express an opinion is considered, it never stood higher than it is to-day. I take no credit to myself with respect to that, but I think it is realized, as it was in connection with the embargo, that the Canadian people have made up their minds that thirty years is long enough to wait and that if we cannot arrive at a solution we will have to look elsewhere.

The amendment is directed largely to that particular point, but I will not say more with respect to it than to say that a group of Canadians elected by their fellow citizens are endeavouring to implement the pledges given to the Canadian people that gave them power. That cannot be done in eight months. It never was suggested that it would be. Effect will continue to be given to their convictions with respect to those pledges. We are not unmindful of the fact that recourse is being had to the old time-honored policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, to create distrust and suspicion on the part of the people based upon their geographical location. They are going to and fro talking about the big interests and raising trouble, prejudices and difficulties. I do not think the Canadian people will be deceived any longer in that way. Mr. J. G. Gardiner, who is no longer leader of a Liberal government in Saskatchewan, on Wednesday, March 19, 1926, expressed himself before the United Farmers of Manitoba as follows:

> The most harmful slogan ever introduced into the consideration of western public matters was the cry, "down with eastern vested interests," which has developed into an attempt to organize the east against the west and the west against the east. Members of the party to which I belong, in the past were responsible for the introduction of that cry, and I pledged myself as a leader of that party to put forth every effort to remove from the appeals of the organization to which I belong, any such unworthy sentiment.

I have quoted from a verbatim report of a speech delivered at the annual banquet of the United Farmers of Manitoba and which appeared in the Regina Leader on Wednesday, March 10, 1926. He stated as Premier of Saskatchewan that the party to which he belonged in the past were responsible for the introduction of that cry. I ask hon. gentlemen opposite to consider that statement in view of the appeals to prejudices and passions which are now being made and the suggestions being put forth that this government is dominated by the large interests. Canadians have endeavoured to develop the great resources which have been placed in their trust and they have demanded that they be given an equal opportunity with other peoples in other countries to develop their resources as have other countries and that they should have the fair competition to which they are entitled if it is within the power of any government to grant such fairness in competition.

In connection with agriculture I do not intend to say more than that we took such action as to prevent a panic in connection with wheat, an action which I think any government would have taken had it been seized with a thorough appreciation of the seriousness of the condition then existing. That action had the result at least of saving the situation at the moment. I can only say that whatever may be necessary for the purpose of enabling agriculture to be placed upon a firm and stable basis, we will do, but no man who has followed the history of world movements during these last eighteen months can fail to understand that the failure to appreciate what was coming had been responsible for what is. The right hon. gentleman mentioned yesterday the necessity for study and deliberation, and I have read in the Liberal press the statement that he did not decide quickly but, oh, so deeply. It was said that he looked into the future, but let me give you two or three illustrations. He made a treaty with Australia and it was only by a modus vivendi that we have been able to save the dairy industry of Canada from being put into the position it was during the old regime. The same thing was done with New Zealand through an order in council, and he then said: How could we know that it would come out in this way? What happened? He gave notice of the termination of the treaty and trade agreement. The relations between New Zealand and Canada are at present so strained that it is difficult to understand their being worse. By the treaty made by order in council he created a channel of trade and the people of New Zealand became accustomed to following that channel. We purchased 50,000,000 pounds of butter from New Zealand during last year when a few years before we had purchased none. This channel of trade was suddenly terminated with the result that a new channel had to be found by that country. It would have been better had New Zealand not had that market at all than to have had happen what did happen. That is an example of vision, foresight and statecraft which in anybody else would be considered as most reprehensible.

Then consider the treaty with France and how its provisions touch the lives of the people of this country. As the right hon. gentleman said yesterday, both Italy and France have been raising their tariffs against Canadian wheat higher and higher, but we cannot do anything, we have to be satisfied with the minimum under the treaties.

I turn now to another point. He asked why we passed legislation here dealing as we did with the old country tariff preferences before we went to the Imperial conference. I will tell the house why we did it, and every businessman knows why we did it. Does anyone suppose we were going over to England with those tariffs as they stood, to try to make a bargain or deal of any kind? Everybody knew we could not do that, but we did what the late James Robb tried to do and could not. As will be remembered he tried to raise the duty before the Australian treaty was put through, but he could not accomplish this because some of his party would not let him. He had not a majority, but we had and were able to do it. My hon. friends opposite have no trouble in understanding that.

Lastly, we were told that we should not be bargaining at an Imperial conference. Almost two breaths later, however, my right hon. friend referred to the Argentine republic. What is the situation there? A bargain was made by the British ambassador and a trade mission whereby Argentina is to deliver to Great Britain so many bushels of wheat in return for so much manufactured goods, and figures are given as to the kind of goods. That is the only kind of bargaining you will ever be able to make them understand, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer told me he personally went to the banks in connection with the necessary credit.

Mr. DONNELLY: They are selling their wheat.

Mr. BENNETT: At what price?

Mr. DONNELLY: Better than ours.

Mr. BENNETT: No. I hope the hon. gentleman knows better than that. As a matter of fact, our wheat sales in Great Britain as I said, are 25,000,000 bushels more than they were last year.

Mr. DONNELLY: They are giving it away.

Mr. BENNETT: If that be so, Russia is paying a bonus for purchasers to take it.

May I point out that bargaining has been the basis of all British agreements. Are there any members present who recall Cobden's agreement with France, that treaty after the repeal of the Corn Laws. Read the life of Cobden and the difficulty in connection with that. Take our present treaty with France; all treaties that are of any value mean bargain, bargain, bargain. Those who have no interest beyond the academic in these matters always denounce the actions of practical men. We are a practical government, and under those circumstances we propose to continue to make bargains. We have been negotiating bargains with other parts of the empire and will continue to do so as occasion offers.

I have trespassed upon the time of the house much longer than I had expected to do when I rose to my feet, but I can only reiterate that I am conscious of no neglect of my duties to the cause of Canada, and I certainly have as great a love of empire as hon. gentlemen opposite. I do not propose for a single moment to depart from the general principles that have governed us in dealing with the economic problems of Canada at the Imperial conference that will meet at an adjourned session in this city during the succeeding months.

One word more. The right hon. gentleman opposite has suggested that we might endeavour to drive legislation through with undue haste, and he warns us that we shall not be able to do so. We welcome that, for the fuller the discussion of any measures, the better they will be; but I will say we do not propose to listen to any vaudeville effusions such as we had last session from the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). An intelligent discussion is one thing; but the discussions that then took place were merely endeavours to wear out the patience of the minister in charge, and I think most of the hon. gentleman's friends held the same view.

I am deeply grateful to the house for having listened with such patience and I can only add we are conscious of no neglect of duty, no failure in our devotion to the cause of Canada and the empire in every thing that has been done. Guided by that thought and sustained and inspired by the support of an intelligent electorate which has rallied round us in the past and will do so in the future, we shall go forward and discharge the duties that have devolved upon us.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the house only the Prime Minister and the leader of the official opposition have the opportunity of speaking for more than forty minutes. Under this handicap may I be forgiven by the previous speakers if I refer only incidentally to their speeches and confine myself very largely to stating our own position. There is, perhaps, some difficulty in the atmosphere of Ottawa in maintaining the sense of the over-shadowing importance of the needs of the labouring men and farmers whom we represent. Ottawa is interested in the fortunes of the Conservative and Liberal parties, interested in the social functions connected with the opening of the house; interested in the coming of the new Governor General; interested in the prospective visit of the King of Siam; interested in the gossip connected with the new plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to the United States. May I venture to read the headlines on the front page of the Manitoba Free Press issued the day I left Winnipeg, February 26. This will perhaps bring us back to realities:

> Police wield batons on paraders' heads to quell disorder—Exciting clashes mark procession of 4,000 unemployed and communists—Minor clashes mark jobless gathering—Dominion-wide unemployment demonstrations checked by police—Unemployment relief problem is grappled with by legislation—Bracken's bill to ratify projects to aid workless gets third reading—Time wealthy were fully aware of present situation, declares Haig—Russia makes trade proposal to Canada—United Farmers of Canada convention moves last barrier to political action—by overwhelming vote, delegates wipe out ruling objecting to political alliances—Charter of liberty, with exception of threat of secession, is adopted.

I turn to an inside page and I read: "Sixteen nations agree to buy European wheat stocks." This really means that Europe is isolating herself as far as possible from America. Another heading relates to the closing of Brandon college:

> At the regular chapel exercises at Brandon college, Doctor J. R. C. Evans referred to the recent press announcement regarding the inability of the Baptist union to finance the college until the close of the current academic year.

No finances! Still another heading:

> Brookland's schools are to be closed—Compulsory holiday for children is caused by lack of finances.

Brooklands, I may say, is a suburb of the city of Winnipeg, and these school children are being thrown on the streets because the teachers cannot be paid.

In order to understand what this unemployment means in actual cash, may I quote the figures from the last report on unemployment in my own city? It shows the number of single men unemployed as 4,148, and that the cost of relief for each single man in December averaged $22.82, making a total of $94,657 a month. The married men numbered 2,325, and the average cost for each was $37.57, making a monthly cost of $87,370. The total monthly cost of unemployment in Winnipeg just now is therefore at the rate of approximately $182,000 a month, of which the city itself pays $69,000 a month. I have said that that represents the financial cost. I do not think that anyone could begin to picture the moral degradation and the mental hardships that are involved in such figures as those.

I come east and I find that at least the financial papers, and, indeed, most of the daily papers are not recognizing the existence of any very great depression. I find in the Montreal Standard, for instance, of January 3, that although the dividend payments to be distributed are somewhat less than the amount distributed last year, they still amount to $21,557,937, and that there are certain large corporations which are paying bonuses in addition. For instance, there is a bonus of $5 by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, and so on. I turn to another corporation as an illustration. The last annual report of Montreal Light, Heat and Power Consolidated, shows a gross revenue for 1930 of $23,484,079.70, and expenses of $11,401,894.62, leaving a net revenue of $12,082,185.08. The expenses, including Sir Herbert Holt's salary, and so forth, make up only 48 per cent of the receipts, and to the absentee owners goes the remaining 52 per cent. One might almost conclude that everything was lovely in the city of Montreal and in the east generally, and yet I think that there is another aspect even to that, for I find this statement in the joint Christmas appeal made by the Royal Edward institute and the Bruchesi institute:

> A much larger amount will be necessary this year in order to cope with the great increase in the number of cases of tuberculosis which are already showing, and which are due—> —to the privations consequent upon the unemployment situation throughout the year.

Again in the Montreal Daily Star, which cannot be accused of being a Socialist paper, I find running in January a series of advertisements by the Advertising Club of Montreal, sponsored by such well-known firms as Case Limited, Dunfields Limited, Dupuis Freres Limitee, Fit-Reform Wardrobe, Henry Marks, John Henderson & Company, Max Beauvais Limited, James A. Ogilvy Limited, Riley Hern Inc., R. J. Tooke Limited, the Robert Simpson Company, Montreal, Limited. The advertisements are appropriately illustrated with cartoons, and I find in one advertisement the statement, beside the picture of a labouring man, that his wages will buy food, but not clothes. It says:

> Dozens of men are working for wages which will provide only the bare essentials for themselves and their families. Their earnings will not permit the purchase of necessary clothing. Help a needy fellow-citizen through the rigours of a Montreal winter. Buy a smart new suit yourself and donate your old one to some needy man. Such a kindly act may keep his wife and family from actual hardship and suffering this winter.

In view of such advertisements as that, I must say that I am not very enthusiastic over the statement in the speech from the throne that:

> In prosperity they (the Canadian people) were united. In adversity that union is made still stronger by the spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding which is the surest bulwark of the national welfare and happiness.

Is that the cooperation which is intended? I read another advertisement from the same source:

> Here's the sort of philanthropy you've dreamed about—the sort that will cost you next to nothing. It will increase your self-respect in more ways than one—and it may mean a job for an unemployed man—at least it will keep him warm. Buy yourself a new suit—give your old suit to the unemployed. What you discard is a luxury to the man in tatters. It will increase his self-respect too. Think of the chap who has to shovel snow to tide him over to the next job in his trade.

Such is the situation in the financial capital of Canada.

In spite of what the Prime Minister or the leader of the opposition may say, the present depression is due largely to causes that are world-wide in character, many of us believe to the evils inherent in the present system of competition. I think that ought to be frankly recognized, and there is very little that can be done by the Prime Minister along the lines that he has suggested that will alleviate the trouble to any great extent. In corroboration of that statement, I should like to read a paragraph or two from a recent paper published by the Carnegie Foundation, entitled "Studies in World Economy." This paper is by a very well-known authority, a former Canadian, Professor James T. Shotwell. He says:

> The outstanding fact at the present time is that, owing to the fact that all nations are suffering similarly from the same economic depression, the questioning of the nature of business itself is for the first time in history taking place on all sides of every political frontier. There is no doubt but that every part of the civilized world is affected by the maladjustments in the process which produces and distributes the world's supply of goods. Among bankers there is a preoccupation with the frozen credits of crippled industry and the price and movement of gold or silver. In agricultural sections, there is at the same time starvation and over-production of food. In the industrial world, consumption fails to keep pace with the capacity for mass production, but without any lessening of fundamental needs. So deep is the cleavage between the production of wealth and the capacity for its absorption that the criticisms of to-day are as wide as the sweep of world trade and as far-reaching as the capitalist system itself.

Again he says, and I hope that the very few members now present on the government side of the house will pay some attention to these words of Professor Shotwell:

The bigger the business, and the more it is organized according to sound principles and not dependent upon the temporary support which tariffs yield by a tax upon the consumers either here or abroad, the more it must look toward increasing that democratization of wealth which enables the common man to buy the goods which he produces. Wages must be increased, not to some limited point which the experience of the past assigns, but proportionately with the development of industry itself.

Let me quote another very striking statement which was made recently (January 14) by George Soule on behalf of the editors of The New Republic, after they had very deliberately considered the whole situation:

To-day there are in the United States, according to the census director, something like nine million men out of work; our cities are scenes of privation and misery on a scale which sickens the imagination; our agricultural life is bankrupt; our industry, in shifting to the south, has returned almost to the horrible conditions of the English factories of a hundred years ago and the fight of the unions there for recognition is all to begin again; so many banks are failing that the newspapers do not dare to print the truth about them. And when we look to Europe, west of Russia, or to South America, we see only the same economic chaos, the same lack of will or capacity to deal with it and the same resultant poverty and suffering. May we not well fear that what this year has broken down is not simply the machinery of representative government, but the capitalist system itself?—and that, even with the best will in the world, it may be impossible for capitalism to guarantee not merely social justice but even security and order? May we not fear lest our American society—may not eventually collapse—as ignominiously as the feudal regime of Russia or France?

And if there is anything that would make one fear this danger in Canada it would be the speeches to which we have listened so far in this debate, in which there has been not one scintilla of hope, nothing to show that either the leader of the opposition or the Prime Minister is aware of the seriousness of the situation or is prepared to offer anything constructive in the way of remedy.

Again may I quote another very important article which has recently appeared in Harpers' Magazine for November, last entitled "The Enemy of Prosperity—Overproduction." In this article Stuart Chase, a prominent writer on economics, calls attention to the fact that under present conditions the better we do things the worse off we are; the more potential goods with which we are capable of blessing mankind, the worse off is mankind. He shows that the United States has kept its nose above water until the present depression because of its enormous home market, its prodigious natural resources, its mounting population curve, its automobile industry which created 4,000,000 jobs, its installment selling, and its policy of the economy of high wages. But he goes on to point out that even in the automobile industry the new market has largely given way to a replacement market. He shows that in boots and shoes the United States is capable of producing three times the volume that the people can now buy. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, when all the Canadian woollen factories are set up and begin to produce where they are going to sell their output. Mr. Chase points out that the coal mines of the United States can produce 750,000,000 tons and the market can absorb only 500,000,000 and so on. There are to-day too many oil wells, too many refineries, a multiplicity of filling stations. Each individual in business goes ahead and expands as he sees fit, unaware that the demand of which he is conscious is only a temporary demand.

Mr. Chase continues:

It has been proposed that we sell our surplus abroad. Unfortunately this has also been proposed in all other nations, many with the same kind of exportable surplus. Doubly unfortunately, all follow, or propose shortly to follow, our spirited lead in penalizing imports by a tariff wall as high as the tower of Babel.

And our present government is among those nations. Let me quote this concluding paragraph, and it is significant from a man of the standing of Mr. Chase:

In Russia they build no more shoe factories than are necessary to supply Russians with shoes. The Kremlin is attempting scientifically to articulate supply to demand, and the results so far under the five-year plan have given the whole world pause. Our ways are not Russian ways, but have we less in the way of brains, human wisdom and human foresight? I am enough of a patriot to doubt it. But I am cursed with sufficient prophetic sense to be profoundly sure that if we do not embark upon a program of industrial coordination after our own fashion, and that shortly, we shall be driven some day, after God knows what suffering and bloodshed, to the Russian formula. The challenge presented by overproduction in the age of a billion horse-power is, to my mind, just as ominous as that.

As I think of the tariff increases and the extremes in policy and promises to which the Prime Minister has been driven, I am reminded of the characterization of the right hon. gentleman by a man in my own city of Winnipeg. He said: "Mr. Bennett is trying to persuade us we can all sit in to a game of poker and all make money."

Now, I have tried to suggest that our problems are simply part of world problems. That should be clearly understood, for our problems can be solved only as we cooperate in the solution of world problems. I propose very hurriedly to try and give my analysis of the situation in the west, for whether we are labour men or business men or farmers, we are all interested in the western wheat situation. The west is largely dependent on agriculture. There has been a tendency to blame and threaten the pool. In a pamphlet which has been widely quoted, and which would seem almost as if it had been inspired, Mr. Sydney S. Gampell made this statement:

> If the pool desire to continue the tactics of recent years, the Canadian bankers, who know what business is, will not permit them.

The emphasis on the division between the east and the west has been deprecated by the Prime Minister. It is such statements and such threats from the banks and the lack of understanding they display that are responsible for any ill-feeling between the east and the west. I have no time, nor is it necessary, to enter into a defence of the wheat pool, but let me make just two or three remarks with respect to it. The pool has been censured for its large carry over. For the five-year period 1925-26 to 1929-30 the pool marketed an average of 51.4 per cent of the Canadian crop and carried over 43.6 per cent of the total carry over. The pool's carry over was not proportionately as large as that of the other agencies. Further, the pool has been criticized for "withholding" for a higher price. Let me say there was no such criticism at the time. The Grain Trade News as late as November 30, 1929, said:

> Prices have risen considerably and appear likely to maintain their position.

Of course, hind sight is a great deal better than foresight, and the pool may have been to blame, but I am suggesting that if so the pool is not the only one to blame. Again, as to the attempt to maintain prices by regulating sales, even the Prime Minister says one of the great objects of his government is to maintain orderly marketing. The pool itself points out some of the world factors that enter into the situation:

(1) The tremendous world wheat production of 1928, amounting to over 450 million bushels more than the average world production for the five-year period 1923-27, during which year also, Europe alone harvested 171 million bushels more than for the same five-year period.

(2) A second record European crop in 1929 amounting to 175 million bushels more than the European average for 1923-27 and making a total above-average production for Europe alone in those two years of 346 million bushels.

(3) A consequent reduction in European imports in 1929-30, to 490 millions, or a reduction of 143 millions from the 633 million average of the five-year period 1923-27.

(4) Gradual growth of unemployment in Europe as a result of the restriction of United States credit and further development of post-war conditions.

(5) The financial crash in United States stock markets, which affected values the world over and announced the present period of world-wide economic depression.

(6) The remarkable uprearing of European tariffs against imported grains, as a consequence of abundant European supplies and political effort to support European agriculture, as well as to create favourable balances of trade.

Now, what is the present situation in the west? Again let me just give in the very barest outline possible what seem to me to be some of the main factors. Take the tremendous drop in wheat prices from January, 1930, of $1.39 a bushel to the November, 1930 price of 60 cents. What does this mean to the west and to Canada? Wheat and wheat flour comprise 36.2 per cent of the total value of Canadian exports for the fiscal year 1929. It has been put in this way: The earning power of an acre of wheat in Saskatchewan was $20.40 in 1925 while in 1930, six years later, it was only $6.92. The Winnipeg Free Press has been carrying a series of articles which I would commend to eastern readers. I should like to give only two statements which summarize their findings. For six million bushels more delivered this year the valuation is well over $113,000,000 less. And again: In three months of the year 1930 we exported over 40,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour more than we exported during the same three months in 1929, but we received only $7,000,000 more in return. Again: The buying power of the western farmer has been more than cut in two. This next statement is of interest to the east as well as to the west: Canada, as stated by the Manitoba Free Press, December 6, 1930, has suffered a loss of $51,000,000 on the export of approximately 25 per cent of her surplus wheat, on the basis of last year's values.

What are the solutions that have been offered? Mr. E. W. Beatty comes forward with the suggestion of an agricultural credit corporation. This is the same Mr. Beatty who has been urging us to increase our acreage and to bring in more immigrants. I should like to ask just a few questions, since I have not time to discuss the matter in detail. If it is necessary to have a $5,000,000 credit corporation, what is wrong with the present banking system? It seems to me this is the greatest indictment that has been made as yet against the banking system of Canada, when conditions are such that even the Minister of Agriculture is quoted as saying in Montreal, on February 16:

> Farmers with gilt-edged securities cannot get credit from financial institutions, even for buying steers to feed for a market for their coarse grains.

When that is true it is easily understood that there is a need for some other institution. I say this is a very serious indictment of our present banking monopoly.

Again I ask, why should this corporation be privately owned? How far would $5,000,000 really go in setting us up in the west? Where are the markets for all the butter and eggs and coarse grains that we produce? Recently in many parts of the west eggs have been selling for 10 cents a dozen for fresh firsts. My hon. friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) says they have sold for eight cents. I am speaking of the areas near the larger centres, while my hon. friend is from farther west. In addition to that, although we boast of our fine agricultural lands, almost half our entire wheat acreage in the west—the Winnipeg Free Press puts it at 11,000,000 acres out of a total of some 24,000,000 acres—is wholly unsuitable for mixed farming.

What are we going to do with that acreage? The Minister of Agriculture and also Mr. John I. McFarland, the general manager of the pool selling agency, urge a decreased acreage, but I would like to ask these gentlemen how far we should decrease. Should we go only to the limit of our own needs? If so, what would that mean? The western wheat field, in the twenty-five years since 1905, has grown from less than 5,000,000 acres to over 24,000,000 acres. What are we to do with all the surplus wheat land? Let me read an extract from one of the articles which appeared in the Manitoba Free Press:

> ...five million five hundred thousand acres would be ample to produce all the wheat Canada's present population could dispose of as bread, feed for stock, seed, and reasonable carry over. On the basis of the seeded area of 1930, which was 23,960,000 acres, this would leave over 18,000,000 acres of wheat land to be put to other uses.

What are we to do? Some of the farmers have suggested fixed wheat prices, pegged wheat prices, and so on, and probably these matters will be discussed this session. On the face of it I would say that if other industries are to be bonused and helped in one way and another there is no reason why agriculture should not be helped also, but I do not regard that as an economic or permanent solution.

Further than that, we are told that we should have new markets. Where are they to be found? Let me point out that this is in line with something the Prime Minister said, but I do not think the figures are just the same. The British consumption of imported wheat is only about 190,000,000 bushels, while the Canadian surplus is 250,000,000 bushels and the Australian surplus is 100,000,000 bushels, a total surplus of 350,000,000 bushels of wheat. Where are we to dispose of that surplus unless we go outside the empire? We are told that we should have cheaper production. I suppose with careful organization we could put in more mechanization, but possibly that would lead to the production of even more wheat. I think the simpler way would be to cut down the cost of production, and to that I should like to refer again. But as soon as we suggest that, we are up against the fact that the present government is determined to increase the costs of production by way of a higher tariff.

There is also the question of lower freight rates, to which I shall refer later, but there again we are confronted by great obstacles. To conclude this brief review I would urge upon this house that the trouble is that the western farmers are really up against the proposition of world over-production. That is, they are producing more wheat than there is a market for at the present time or that there is purchasing power to buy. I should like to give two authorities on that point. An estimate by the Bristol Corn Trade Association places the exportable world surplus of wheat for the grain year ending July 1 last at 1,224,000,000 bushels and the total requirements of wheat importing countries of the world at 752,000,000 bushels. The National City Bank of New York, in a bulletin of December, 1930, places the crops for 1930-31 of the United States, Canada, Argentine and Australia at 1,831,000,000 bushels; the carry over at 496,000,000 bushels, making a total supply of 2,327,000,000 bushels, while the net imports of twenty European countries will amount only to from 580,000,000 to 650,000,000 bushels.

What does this mean? If it is a world condition there must be some sort of world solution. That may involve a world pool; it may involve an international agreement, but as soon as we come to this the government begins to say it will not have any dealings with certain great exporting countries. I urge, Mr. Speaker, that we cannot leave Russia or the Argentine or Australia out of this matter. We must take them all into consideration before we can solve this problem. Some of us believe that before it is solved we will require an entire change in our economic system, but since the government of the day revolts at anything like an international or socialist solution I would say the next most promising policy in a competitive economy is that of lower costs of production. If we are bound to maintain this cut-throat method of doing things, we in the west will have to lower our costs in order to compete with the Argentine and Russia.

What will that mean? Remember, I am putting this as an alternative policy. If the government refuses to allow us to adopt an international arrangement as a solution they will have to face some such program as this: First, lower freight rates. Why not cut the freight rates down? Let me say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has done fairly well during the last few years. I have under my hand the figures showing how that company and its subsidiaries have been prospering. We are all more or less familiar with the facts. The Board of Railway Commissioners allows them a profit of 10 per cent, 7 per cent on their actual railway operations and 3 per cent on the other operations. Why not cut that 10 per cent in two? I cannot for the life of me see why a great corporation such as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should be practically guaranteed ten per cent, while many a farmer is not only not making one per cent but is actually running in the hole every year. Of course, Mr. Beatty immediately comes forward and resents anything like governmental interference. Let me say that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and similar corporations owe their very existence to governmental interference, and the sooner they realize that the better. Why not cut interest charges in two, or at any rate substantially reduce them?

The annual statements of the banks show, notwithstanding all the reserves they have, that they have been getting along tolerably well, and this monopoly which the government is granting to them enables them to make not only the profits that are shown in their balance sheets but to secure a great many other financial advantages that go to the directors through the system of interlocking directorates which have been established. If there is any constitutional difficulty in introducing legislation which will be effective in reducing interest rates I would suggest that the Finance department could itself go into the money market under our own present legislation and thus effect a lower interest rate.

Then again the cost of living should be cut down. I have under my hand a very interesting graph which was published in some of the farm papers, and which with the consent of the house I should like to have placed on Hansard. It shows the trend of prices from November, 1929, to November, 1930. Iron and steel has declined only 4·3 per cent. Hardware, which is something we all use, only 1·6 per cent. Farm products as a whole have come down 34 per cent, while western grains show a decline of 59 per cent. I suggest that this great discrepancy in price between manufactured goods and agricultural products should in some way or other be reduced. Either you have to lower the cost of living to the farmer or raise the price of grain to him. That is the problem with which we are faced to-day. If you do not do this we are faced with the ruin of agriculture in the west.

The graph follows:

I wish I had time to go into a question which is of very great interest to me, namely, the ban which has been placed upon Russian imports. It is not so much the order in council even that I object to as the statement which accompanied that order in council:

> The government is convinced that there is forced labour in the cutting and transport of timber, and the mining of coal, that political prisoners are exploited, that the standard of living is below any level conceived of in Canada, and that, broadly speaking, all employment is in control of the Communist government which regulates all conditions of work and seeks to impose its will upon the whole world. This is communism, its creed and its fruits, which we as a country oppose and must refuse to support by interchange of trade.

I regard that as an absolutely gratuitous insult. The charges with regard to the mining of coal have not been proven. It is stated that political prisoners are exploited. What about political prisoners in Italy? It is stated that the standard of living in Soviet Russia is low. I will admit that, but it is higher than that under the Czarist regime and higher than the standard of living in China or in India. It seems to me we have here a theory of trade, that is, we must not trade with people of whose morals or manners we disapprove. I should like to call the attention of the house to a very interesting article which appears in the current issue of Foreign Affairs, edited by Sir Norman Angell. After a criticism of many of the policies of Russia, Sir Norman Angell says:

> The experiment on the material side is working. This does not mean that the standard of life is higher in Russia than in the west—it is probably a good deal lower. It does mean that in many respects it is far better than the old Russian standard, has prospects of great improvement, and—most important of all—that the great mass of Russians have come to believe in it and support it. A hundred million peasants are seeing that land which never in the past adequately fed, warmed, clothed or sheltered them, suddenly rendered, in parts of it at least, enormously more productive; already here and there pouring forth its fruits in a great flood, where originally there was a feeble and intermittent trickle. . . It is precisely this hopefulness, the blazing conviction of salvation revealed by the Russian millions, side by side with the pessimism of the west, which is perhaps the most important feature of the whole situation.

Had I time I should like to have quoted a few paragraphs from the report of the conference of the Institute of Politics held at Williamstown, Massachusetts, in August, 1930, a conference on the internal and external problems of Russia. The chairman was Mr. Ivy Lee, who is well known to all business men in America as an outstanding public relations counsel. The paper from which I wish to quote was one delivered by Colonel Hugh L. Cooper, head of the firm of Hugh L. Cooper & Company, Incorporated, which has been engaged for the last five years in Russia in putting in a great hydro-electric plant which will cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $110,000,000.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: What wages were paid to the men who put the plant in?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not the figures here.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: You would not make the statement if you had.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, I would. Colonel Cooper states:

> At the outset, let me impress on you that I do not believe in the dogmas of communism, socialism, fascism, or any other "ism" opposed to good American common sense-ism, or that omits recognition of the fundamental laws of human psychology.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I am informed that his time is up.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Will you permit me, Mr. Speaker, to finish the quotation?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Certainly.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The article continues:

> On the contrary, I am a firm believer in the form of capitalism we have in the United States, imperfect as it is, and I believe that our American system of government is the best yet conceived by man and offers the greatest world hope for the advancement of the human race. . . . the performances of the workmen have so improved that there is now no doubt in my mind as to the capacity of Russian labour to be eventually trained to an efficient performance in any line of skilled work that future industrial needs may require . . . . . we cannot ignore the 150,000,000 people in Russia, who occupy one-sixth of the world's landed area and hold in their possession a wealth of undeveloped natural resources undoubtedly greater than are to be found in the balance of Europe. . . . During the last seven or eight years more than $600,000,000 of actual business has been carried out between American business men and Russia and never in a single instance has a penny of graft been suggested or given. . . . Another point I wish to bring out is that the communist leaders in Russia are for the most part men of great intellectual ability and that they practise what they preach.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, my first word will be one of congratulation to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As my leader has so well stated, it is no small ordeal for two young men new to the proceedings and atmosphere of parliament to deliver their maiden speeches on an occasion such as this. Both hon. members acquitted themselves with distinction, and my only regret is that two bright young men such as these should be found on the other side of the house. Having only forty minutes in which to say the few things that one feels called upon to say, one must of necessity spend but a very short time upon the preliminaries.

The speech from the throne was no surprise to hon. members on this side of the house. Yesterday my hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) discussed the speech at some length and covered most of the points arising out of the statements it contains. He made very plain the position of the Liberal party with respect to the speech, as well as with respect to the performance of the government which has now been in office for some eight months. The reply made to-day by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was not quite so lengthy, but I could not help thinking that when he occupied the office of leader of the opposition he was very much happier and much more effective than he was this afternoon. I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for a good many years and I have heard him make some very brilliant speeches, but I am bound to say that the defence he offered for the actions of his government was not up to the calibre of the speeches he has delivered in former days.

He said that my leader had accused him of conducting a one-man government and in reply stated that if it were a one-man government he would have a great deal of support behind him. We know that, and undoubtedly it will be impressed upon us further before this session concludes. We have no hope of making any impression upon the gentlemen who support the Prime Minister; they will vote for him upon any and every occasion; our only hope is that when the time comes the people of this country will give him the kind of answer he will deserve unless he changes his legislative program very materially during the next two or three years.

He blames the Liberal government for many of his difficulties. Why should he blame that government? Did not our friends tell the electors from one end of this country to the other that if they were put into office they would immediately cure the situation or would perish in the attempt? Why blame the Liberal government for any of the troubles which they have inherited? The Prime Minister at the time of his appeal to the electorate of this country was the most prolific promiser Canada has ever seen. The record appears in every province in Canada of his having promised something to every individual whom he thought he could change by his persuasive tactics. Promises were made as to what he would dole out to them if they were good enough to support him and put him in office. I cannot see where my right hon. friend has any complaint on that score.

Then he complains that he has inherited unemployment, but he told every elector in Canada that if he were put into office he would cure unemployment,. that the remedies he would apply would bring about immediate results. We have been patient and have waited for some time—I think we can be lenient and say we are willing to wait a little longer—but if he continues to impose increased duties then the cure of unemployment will be long in the future.

He complained that the Liberal government collected $100,000,000 by way of taxation more than they should have. The right hon. gentleman and his supporters cannot and never have been able to understand how taxation can be reduced and yet more revenue be obtained, but that is exactly what the Liberal government did between 1924 and 1930. How could we be taking more money out of the pockets of the individual taxpayer if we were reducing the levy upon him every year? It was due to the policies inaugurated by the Liberal government that the people from one end of the country to the other were enabled to pay their taxes and greater returns were obtained from business because of the buoyant conditions. I do not think I need to spend very much time in discussing this phase of the subject.

Then the right hon. gentleman spoke about the embargo on Russian coal and sought to imply that we had taken similar action when we ordered the trade envoys out of Canada because they were circulating literature which we thought was not in the best interests of the Canadian people. Did we at any time place an embargo upon trade with Russia? Never. I do not intend to voice any complaint with regard to this embargo, because the responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the right hon. gentleman and his followers. If in their wisdom they think it is a good thing to shut out trade from Russia, China or India, that is their business. They are adepts at that sort of thing; my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) is doing it almost every day, not only against Russia but against many other countries. That action is taken whenever it is thought that such trade infringes upon the manufacturing industries of this country.

My right hon. friend said that the importation of Russian coal was shutting out the importation of British anthracite coal. Surely he is acquainted with the returns with respect to the importation into Canada of British coal. He knows that but a few years ago only about 10,000 tons of British coal came into Canada, and he knows that the government which preceded his used its best endeavours to encourage the importation of British coal. With what result? We began with 10,000 tons and last year almost 900,000 tons were imported. I hope my right hon. friend is correct when he says that this year nearly 1,000,000 tons of British coal will come into Canada. I hope we will continue to import all the British anthracite coal that they can supply for our needs. By no manner of means did the 150,000 tons or 200,000 tons of Russian coal interfere with the imports of British anthracite. All it did was to displace a certain tonnage of the American product. My right hon. friend cannot claim that one ton of Russian coal displaced a similar amount of the imports from Britain.

Then he adroitly attempted to get under the mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In 1902 Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced the British preference.

An hon. MEMBER: No, 1897.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In 1897. When the British preference was first introduced it was not upon the basis of bargaining, it was a free will offer in the hope that it would benefit Canada. Anyone who contended that he had not the interest of Canada at heart when he was making the agreements with Great Britain and the other overseas dominions would be stating something that is not true. We are all for Canada first.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The adoption of that slogan by my hon. friends during the last election was an endeavour on their part to appropriate to themselves a slogan which never belonged to them in the slightest degree. They succeeded in making the people of Canada believe that. For the first time during the forty years I have been engaged in public life and taking part in election campaigns, they were willing to admit that they had a slight love for Canada in preference even to the mother country. They were always the party of loyalty, they were always the party that stood up in defence of the empire. But on this occasion, "Canada first" was the slogan; all others came second. What would have been said of my leader and his followers, what would have been the tirade hurled against them by hon. gentlemen opposite had they taken that position? But the fact remains that any trade arrangement we make, I care not with whom, must always have as its first proviso the ample protection of our interests. Never was anything else thought of by the government of Sir Robert Borden, by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by all the governments which have preceded the one that is in office to-day, than that Canada's interests should be fully protected.

My right hon. friend cannot claim that he is going to don the mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and in a moment or two I shall explain why. He stated that all the overseas ministers were behind him in his demand that this should be an agreement, a bargaining by all the overseas dominions through their representatives at the Imperial conference. I have looked through the records, not very carefully, but in no particular instance do I find the overseas dominions or their representatives other than Canada having taken the precaution to increase tariffs before starting for the conference, nor do they by word or utterance upon any occasion intimate that that was in their minds. That was reserved for this government, which took the precaution, as my right hon. friend stated to the house this afternoon, to increase the tariff in order that they might have something to bargain with. Then the Prime Minister said further: We did exactly what Mr. Robb, when he was negotiating the Australian treaty would have done had he not been prevented by members of his own party. Will any hon. gentleman claim that the Hon. Mr. Robb ever by word or deed indicated an intention to raise the tariff against Great Britain or any of the overseas dominions? Never on any occasion did he do so That was not Mr. Robb's proposal, and my right hon. friend needs to be put right on that point. Mr. Robb's proposal was to increase the general tariff in order to give the Australians a preference in our market, but by no process of reasoning can my right hon. friend claim that he assumed the mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier or the Hon. Mr. Robb, both departed, when he took upon himself the responsibility of increasing the tariffs against Great Britain. Is it not strange to see the means taken by the present government for the purpose of increasing Canadian trade at a time when, heaven knows, it needs to be taken care of if ever it did? What did we do at the short session? We were hurrying through in order that these envoys might go from Canada to the conference to do something in the interests of Canada. We expected them at that session to do something in the interests of this country, but what did they do? The first thing they did was to take printed and dyed cotton fabric, which we were importing from Great Britain to the extent of $4,000,000 worth and on which we had a British preference of 20 per cent, and to increase that to 22½ per cent and add a specific duty of three cents a pound. On woollen yarns, of which we imported from Great Britain $1,000,000 worth, they decreased the duty from 12½ per cent to 10 per cent but added a specific duty of ten cents a pound. On worsteds and serges, on which we had a duty of 27½ per cent, under the reductions that we had put into effect only the previous May, they increased the duty to 30 per cent plus a specific duty of twenty-five cents a pound. On stockings, of which we imported nearly $3,000,000 worth from Great Britain—

Mr. GOTT: White stockings.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, they were white stockings. Stockings were free from Great Britain. The white ones came in free. That is why the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) was complaining. They increased the tariff on stockings which were formerly free, to 30 per cent, and imposed an added duty of one dollar a dozen pairs. No wonder my hon. friend was taking white stockings round to the ladies in his constituency. I do not wonder my hon. friend is complaining against such an outrageous advance in the duty on that commodity. On electrical apparatus—I am taking only instances where there are imports from Great Britain—they increased the duty from 15 to 25 per cent, and on boots and shoes from 17½ per cent to 25 per cent.

My right hon. friend went to Great Britain to an imperial conference, and what did he say? Let me give you his own words; he quoted them this afternoon, but just for fear some of my hon. friends should forget, I shall read from page 32 of the second part of the report of the Imperial conference. This is what the Prime Minister said:

> I offer to the mother country, and to all the other parts of empire, a preference in the Canadian market in exchange for a like preference in theirs, based upon the addition of a ten per centum increase in prevailing general tariffs, or upon tariffs yet to be created. In the universal acceptance of this offer, and in like proposals and acceptances by all the other parts of empire, we attain to the ideal of empire preference.
> I amplify and explain this offer in the following ways:
> In the first place, the rate I have mentioned, cannot be uniformly applied. The basis of the proposal is the adequate protection to industries now existent, or yet to be established.

That was the offer. This was the increase in tariffs before he went to the Imperial conference. Over this increase British imports must come to Canada and on top of this increase they were to be protected by a 10 per cent further increase in order to allow them to enter Canada. Do hon. members think they were going to get in over a tariff like that? Yet our government was terribly wrong in the supposition that if we wanted to increase British trade in order that they might buy more goods from us, we should increase the British preference, or our hon. friends opposite no more can boast about their loyalty to British connections, because I fail to understand how any British manufacturer can get over a tariff of that kind. It is an utter impossibility and an absolute absurdity. One cannot conceive of anything more absurd than for a body of intelligent men to go to a group of intelligent men in Great Britain, make such suggestion to them and say: Here we are offering you something for which we ask something in exchange. If my right hon. friend had said: We propose to make the duty such that we may trade with you; if we can exchange our commodities on a free basis, then I am ready to do that—that would have been reasonable. But he does not say that; he never says that. What he aims to do and what his colleagues aim to do is to shut out of Canada every import of any sort that can interfere with the Canadian manufactured product.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is what he aims to do, and they are doing it every day. They allow nothing to get into Canada to compete with what is being manufactured here. That is the object they have in view. They are going to make a small isolated, North American colony of Canada. That will be the result of a policy of this kind.

I will confess, Mr. Speaker, that I am rather glad that for once the Tory party are having the courage of their convictions, and are putting their policies into effect. We are pretty poor in western Canada just now. Almost seventy-five per cent of the farmers of that country are in a rather serious financial position. They do not know whether or not they should go on. Why? Because there is not a vestige of hope for them in the immediate future. I have lived in that country for twenty-five years and have seen some pretty hard times, but never in all my experience have I seen conditions in the west as bad as they are to-day. My hon. friends opposite stated during the election that they had a panacea for the difficulties of western Canada. They put a duty of eight cents a pound on butter, and increased the duty on eggs; but when have eggs and butter been as cheap as they are to-day?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, when they were as cheap as they are to-day, and that was in the dying days of the old national policy. We in the west are told by this government: You do not need to raise wheat any longer. Go into the dairy and poultry business. It serves you right for raising so much wheat and refusing to take advantage of the opportunity at your doors to sell poultry and eggs, and bacon, if you please. That is the sort of thing, Mr. Speaker, this government offers to relieve the difficulties of the western farmer. The farmer is selling eggs at 10 cents a dozen. In 1893 I sold pork, deadweight, in the town of Barrie at 4 cents a pound, and I will have to sell it at that price again if this government remains long in office. I am glad, however, that the demonstration of the effects of their policy will make plain the fallacy of the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite that protection is going to be beneficial to the people of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have increased the tariff to help the manufacturing industry. They are going to provide employment for 250,000 men in Canada right away. They were going to cure unemployment by means of the tariff. I shall not say anything about the $20,000,000 for unemployment relief, except that it has my full support. I say, however, that there was no necessity for the government calling a special session for the purpose of voting that money, despite what the leader of the government has said this afternoon. If he had asked for a governor general's warrant for that amount I am sure he would have received the support of both sides of the house. But that was not his object. He was going to cure unemployment by increasing the tariff. What has happened? We have had now eight months of this policy. Highly paid writers are contributing articles to the Montreal Star, claiming improvement in the manufacturing industry, and if you do not happen to read the paper they are good enough to send you a pamphlet containing these articles. My right hon. friend the leader of the government this afternoon told us with bated breath that there were prospects of industries establishing themselves in this country. I doubt, Mr. Speaker, if there will be any more textile industries established here, because I have it on the best authority that the warehouses of the textile industry in Canada are pretty well filled to-day and they have no market in which to sell their goods. I would like someone to tell me what the wages in the textile industry are.

It is said that we have seasonal unemployment in the winter. Of course we have, but we have it to-day on a much larger scale than ever before, despite the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite have spent $20,000,000, or a proportion of that sum, to help relieve unemployment. Unemployment, hon. gentlemen opposite said during the last election, was so serious that it had become a national question, and the late government, they said, was recreant in its duty because they did not recognize it as a national question. Unemployment had reached such proportions, they said, that it had become a national question, and it was the duty of the federal government to go into the field, give leadership and cure this national calamity that had come upon us. What did we say, Mr. Speaker, about unemployment? We said that if any province or municipality was in difficulties, we were prepared to secure at once a governor general's warrant. Hon. gentlemen opposite had said that there were people starving in the country. The leader of the government himself told us that he had discovered a lady with a child in this condition; his heart bled for the penury in which he found them, and he was going to cure that situation at once. I want the house to remember that: He was going to cure that unemployment situation at once, because his heart bled for the poverty and distress that he saw throughout the land. It was a national question that demanded immediate attention. The Liberal party offered, if such were the actual situation, to get a governor general's warrant, and we could have got such a warrant had we been returned to power, and in that way have given immediate relief. But we did not have the opportunity of doing so; the public thought otherwise. Our policy had been to have a three-way contribution, one-third from the federal government, one-third from the municipality, and one-third from the province. But this government was going to see that there would be no delay. Unemployment had become a national problem and relief was to be furnished at once. So we had the special session and voted the money. This government came into office on the 7th of August last, and before they were ready to distribute relief, it was well on into November. In the meantime what about that woman and child who were in want? What about those starving people that my right hon. friend saw all through this country? What happened to them during the interval? According to a statement made by the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson), when this government had allocated $11,000,000 for unemployment relief, the provinces and the municipalities spent over $63,000,000; that is, the federal government contributed in the proportion of one to six. That was the extent to which unemployment was taken care of by this government. That is the basis upon which they have been administering unemployment relief. It is the old story of Tory administration, always doing something to stick the provinces and the municipalities. I say here and now, Mr. Speaker, that the municipalities in Canada are in a very serious financial state indeed. They cannot stand very much more of this kind of thing. I fail to understand why, if this was a national problem, my hon. friends opposite backed away from it so carefully, and why they spent only one-sixth, instead of one-third, in helping out the provinces and municipalities in what they said was a national calamity.

I come back to the tariff and to the question of how it affects employment. I am not going to say how it has affected employment on the farm, because there is no such thing as employment on the farm to-day. But how has it affected employment in manufacturing? I am going to give figures covering the winter season during the last five or six years, so that we may judge what effect the expenditure of this $20,000,000, which has led, we are told, to a total expenditure of $90,000,000 has had upon unemployment in this country; and secondly, what has been the effect of an increase in the tariff, which hon. gentlemen opposite said was going to cure the unemployment situation immediately. In 1921 the seasonal drop in employment in the manufacturing industries was 11·4; in 1922, 9·1; in 1923, 14 flat; in 1924, 9·8, in 1925, 6·8; in 1926, 10·1; in 1927, 8·6; in 1928, 8·9; in 1929, 13·3; in 1930, 14·5. I imagine my right hon. friend will say, "Well, in 1922-23 it was quite as bad." For his information I may say that despite what all my hon. friends opposite said about unemployment last July, conditions were infinitely worse in 1922 and 1923 than they ever were in July 1930—infinitely worse. I happen to have lived through both periods and know whereof I speak. The worst that could be said by the most ardent Conservative speakers during the campaign in 1930 was that there were 150,000 workmen out of employment at that time. But what is the figure now? Over 300,000.

My right hon. friend said that this condition was the responsibility of the late government, that we brought it about. We said, "No, it was the result of world conditions." And how anxious hon. members opposite are to talk about world conditions to-day! Of course it was world conditions. Nobody who has given any consideration to the question will deny that for a moment; but that was not what hon. gentlemen opposite said last year. I am not going to hold the government altogether responsible for the difficulties confronting Canada to-day. But my right hon. friend and his supporters said they would cure those difficulties. Only this afternoon he said that had we known our business as administrators of the nation's affairs we should have foreseen what has come about. I challenge him or any of his supporters to state one single thing the late government might have done that was not done to avert the calamity that has overtaken Canada in common with all other countries of the world. Surely other countries must be taken into comparison in this connection. All the countries that were engaged in the great war have sought to cure their difficulties by raising their tariff barriers—no one will deny that—and the United States perhaps has gone furthest in this direction. But did the United States, did Australia, did New Zealand, did France, did Germany—did any of these countries escape the depression that swept over the world a year ago? No, not one of them escaped. And yet my hon. friends opposite have the hardihood to assert that the policies of the late government brought about the difficulties now confronting Canada.

Last year my right hon. friend said to the people of western Canada, "Put me in office and I will get you out of this difficult situation in which you find yourselves in regard to the sale of your wheat." What did he mean by that promise? Was he going to fix a price for wheat? Would anybody be so foolish as to think that the price of a commodity that must be sold in the markets of the world could be controlled by the government? It will be many a day before the Canadian people will be able to consume all the wheat they can produce, and until then they must find markets abroad for their surplus production.

But what has the right hon. gentleman done? He says he has done something, he has come to the rescue of the banks and, incidentally, of the farmers who are behind the banks upon this occasion, by guaranteeing their accounts. Well, he was not willing to do that last fall when the premiers of the three prairie provinces came here to interview him with respect to their difficulties. I am bound to say that I give him considerable credit for what he has done for this year's crop. I think he has helped the situation materially by the steps he has taken. But so far as the price of wheat is concerned, the farmer to-day is not receiving as much for his product to meet his overhead costs as the railway companies are receiving for hauling it. That is the situation in western Canada. And may I say that if the business interests in this country had suffered the depreciation that the farmers of Canada have suffered—because it is not entirely western in its aspect, it affects all our farmers—very few business establishments would have escaped bankruptcy

Now, the tariff increases which were made at the special session last fall must have helped to some extent, because I notice that the sale price of steel and steel products has dropped only 3¼ per cent, manufactured products only 4½ per cent, and textiles only 13 per cent; but the sale price of Canadian farm products has dropped 34 per cent, and field grains 45 per cent—almost one-half of their value. In the face of that 45 per cent reduction in the selling price of grains the farmers are forced to buy everything they use in their homes and on their farms at the prices resulting from the imposition of higher tariffs, the only purpose of which was to keep commodity prices from reaching their proper levels. While that tariff legislation was before the house during the special session my hon. friends opposite were very careful to say that they had received undertakings from all the manufacturing companies that they would not increase prices if they were granted the increased protection they sought. At the time we pointed out that commodity prices were due for a drop. Was our prophecy wrong in that respect? Certainly not. We pointed out further that the tariff increases then proposed would prevent the natural drop in these commodities and force the consuming public of Canada to pay that much more. I submit that the imposition of higher tariffs will not cure unemployment. The labour statistics of any country where increased protection has been resorted to disclose the fact that instead of ameliorating it has only aggravated the unemployment condition.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, being precluded by the rules of the house as well as by my old age from speaking at any great length, I shall confine my remarks this evening to a consideration of the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of some parts of his speech, reserving for myself the right that belongs to all members to speak on the main motion, if necessary, after the amendment has been disposed of.

I must confess, sir, that I am not quite prepared to say whether I will vote for or against this motion. It is rather embarrassing because, although I agree with a good deal of it, I disagree with part of it. Perhaps while talking through it I shall find my way out of this difficulty.

With the first paragraph of the amendment I agree largely. Every man and every woman in this country is perfectly convinced, I think, that,—using the language of the motion——the policies of His Majesty's government have not only failed to offer a remedy for employment and agricultural distress, but have served further to prejudice the deplorable condition of the agricultural interests.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Of that I am firmly convinced, and I made it quite clear during the campaign which preceded my re-election last summer. I am not going to dwell upon that point, reserving to the debate on the budget what may be said in this regard. Then the motion goes on:

. . . . thereby causing additional unemployment and substantially reducing the national revenue.

If I had the responsibility of stating a policy, or rather a declaration of policy, in contradistinction to that propounded by the government, I would not go that far. I do not think the policy of the government is altogether the cause of the additional unemployment which may be prevalent now, or of reducing the revenue. On this point I take the position which I took during the special session and also during the general election. I think it would be just as unfair and untrue to load the full responsibility for the present situation upon this government as it was unfair on the part of the Conservative party to load upon the Liberal government the responsibility for the situation in which Canada found itself a year ago.

With the last paragraph I also agree. I am decidedly "of the opinion that if the proposals" of the government "and certain other of the policies of the government, are persisted in, as would appear to be the intention of the government as outlined in the speech from the throne, the very serious condition which exists at the present time will be intensified rather than relieved". That I think, is absolutely true; although I might differ with my right hon. friend to my right as to what those "certain" things are.

The gist of my remarks I intend to devote to the middle paragraph, and as far as that is concerned I am altogether in disagreement with my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, for the same reasons, which I gave when I spoke on the last Dunning budget, the same reasons which I gave last session and which I have given during the last thirty years, in opposition to that so-called preferential policy adopted in 1900 by the Liberal government and maintained ever since by all administrations.

The right hon. gentleman, in his most eloquent speech,—one of the ablest he ever delivered in this house, although I might say one which would not have been spoiled by some curtailment,—dwelt at length upon the preferential policy of the Liberal government, which he dated back to 1897. I have stated I think twice at least in this house, since I came back to it, that I will never let such a statement go unchallenged, because it is unwarranted. On previous occasions, I have explained the circumstances, and I will repeat them now, because I think I am the last witness in this house who knows the facts out of which were born that essential humbug, the policy which has been called the preferential tariff. For many years previous to the general election of 1896 the Liberal party, through its leaders and most of its candidates and by its public organs, had pledged itself to eradicate the last vestige of protection from the Canadian tariff. That was their public pledge to the people of Canada; but on the eve of that general election of 1896 there was a dawn of hope. The then economic crisis, the school mess of Manitoba and various other things gave the Liberal party the hope that it could win; but as one of their newly acquired friends, Mr. Tarte, stated, "elections are not won by prayers". Therefore they wanted some money to support the current of opinion which was showing itself in their favour. They received subscriptions from the manufacturers' association, from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, from the Bank of Montreal and from other large concerns, although those subscriptions were modest as compared to those which these highly moral institutions now give to both parties at every election, and very modest as compared to what was then given to the Conservative party which was still in power. However, with the help of public sentiment, they were sufficient to carry the election.

When the time came to frame the first budget of the Liberal government, in order to balance things between the public pledges given to the people and the private pledges given to the manufacturers of Canada, they maintained protection as the basis of the Liberal policy and introduced the so-called preferential tariff as a sop to the people who had been crying for free trade, and who, like my hon. friend from West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart), had been sounding the death-knell of protection for twenty years back. But, at least, so far so good; this policy, immoral as it might have been in its conception, was not bad, on the whole; and I may say that, ignorant greenhorn as I was then, I voted for it in absolute good faith. But what did I vote for, and what did the whole of the Liberal party vote for in 1897? They voted for a reduction in the tariff to every country, British or foreign, that would meet Canada on a fair basis of reciprocity. The Liberal party had not then decided to outdo the Tory party in their lip professions of loyalty, or their professions of lip loyalty to the British empire. This was adopted as a Canadian policy, for the benefit of the people of Canada.

It was in the midst of our first fits of Imperial delirium tremens, in 1900, that Mr. Fielding very cleverly had a friend from Nova Scotia, a highly cultured gentleman who at least had the sincerity of his convictions as an imperialist—one of the rare Liberal imperialists of those days—move an amendment to the motion to go into committee of the whole. Mr. Fielding had Mr. Russell, one of the members for Halifax, get up in the house and move a resolution in amendment to the motion of the Minister of Finance to go into committee of the whole expressing the hope that the principle of British preference would be adopted. I am not quoting the exact words of the amendment; I am speaking from memory, but I know this was the gist of the motion. At that time the motherland was engaged in the struggle in South Africa, and the motion referred to the debt of gratitude owed by this country to the motherland then engaged in gathering the forces of the mightiest empire the world had ever seen in order to crush two puny nations the total population of which was not equal to that of the city of Hamilton. The sentiment was expressed that in order to show our loyalty to that generous empire, then busy in accomplishing one of the worst crimes committed during the last century—and I take those words from the lips of some of the most respectable English statesmen of the period, and belonging to all parties in England—we should create a third tariff, lower than the rest, and apply it to British goods alone. That was the inception of the British preference, advocated then by the Liberal government and opposed by the Conservative party, to which I joined my humble and single vote.

Then came the conference of 1902, which Mr. Fielding attended. Well, from 1900 to 1902 the Liberal government and all Canadians had absorbed a sufficient dose of matters conducive to sobriety of thought to enable them to reason out those things; and it was there and then that Mr. Fielding prepared that memorandum from which the right hon. Prime Minister quoted this afternoon, a memorandum which concluded with a sentence, a replica of which is almost contained in that famous explosion of the right hon. gentleman, of the 2nd of December, to which I shall refer later on. So that when both parties are defying each other, in the manner of those heroes of Homer or of Virgil, with a deep gulf between the two, as to which is the most loyal to the empire, as to which is doing the most to sustain the ideals of empire, I am bound to repeat, in the sensible words of a sensible Englishman,—"humbug," both ways. Is not this quite impartial, Mr. Speaker?

Those closing words of Mr. Fielding meant something or meant nothing. If they meant something, they meant that the Canadian government was going to recommend to the Canadian parliament, at the next session, a revision of their policy. It was never done; it remained on paper, a declaration of policy which never materialized, and one which, had it been spoken, a phrase very aptly used by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition would exactly fit—"sound without sense", and without results.

My right hon. friend devoted much of his eloquent address to the demonstration that the practical result of that gesture of imperial loyalty on the part of the Liberal party, of that demonstration of good will, was the removal of the embargo on our Canadian cattle. Here I am on familiar ground. I had as my deskmate in that parliament of 1896 Mr. Robert Bickerdike, who represented the constituency of St. Lawrence, a predecessor long since of my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). Mr. Bickerdike's trade, like that of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins), was largely concerned with that embargo; and every session, from 1896 to 1907, when I left, and later on, until his death, he had always two motions on the order paper and always prepared a good speech in support of each—the abolition of the death penalty and the removal of the embargo. And he succeeded as well with one as with the other.

That embargo had been imposed by England, in 1892, under false pretences. The British ministers did not want to admit that they were imposing a measure of protection in favour of the cattle raisers of Scotland, of England and especially of Ireland, so they stamped Canadian cattle with a lie: they said they were diseased. The Canadian government, Conservative and Liberal alike, demonstrated by the most expert testimony that could be obtained, that it was untrue. But the British government maintained the embargo. The year 1897 came, with the first preference; the embargo was retained. The years 1899 and 1900 came with a display of oratory, with spending of money, the sending of Canadian boys to conquer South Africa for the benefit of the hoarders of gold in Rhodesia. The embargo was maintained. Then came 1911 and 1913 with the two proposals of both parties to help in fighting the battles of the empire on sea—the Liberal proposal, with that so-called Canadian navy in time of peace and imperial in time of war, as described by Mr. Fielding himself, and then the statesmanlike proposal of Sir Robert Borden to take from the public exchequer of this wealthy nation the sum of $35,000,000 to go to the rescue of poor, downtrodden England, crushed under the burden of her gold and the predominance of her trade the world over. This mighty Canadian nation had to make a gift of $35,000,000 to poor, little England. I shall never forget the remark of my dear old friend Lord Fisher, who once asked me, "Which is the most foolish of the two parties in Canada?" Still the embargo was kept on. Then the war of 1914 came. We declared war against Germany before England did. We began sending our human flesh to the slaughter market of Europe, and the British government was mighty glad to accept it. But the embargo on Canadian cattle was still maintained, because the interests of the cattle raisers of the British Isles predominated in the British government, whatever might be the party in power, over the sentimental stock phrases used by Canadians. Finally, it was raised, I think, in 1924.

Now, if my good friends to the right had been returned to power last year, what would be the situation? And I did my level best to keep them in power, just as I did something to prevent them from falling from power a couple of years previously; they were then very attentive to my remarks, for the majority was small. In 1930 the majority was larger and their budget was adopted. Suppose they had been supported by the people of Canada and had gone to England. Perhaps some hon. gentlemen remember my suggestion. My idea was—and it still is—that the present leader of the opposition should have gone to London with the late Minister of Justice, to sit at the Imperial conference, so-called, the political one. But I said that I would rather trust the staunch imperialist on the other side of the house to stand as against English selfishness for the preservation of Canadian interests, because he is connected with selfish Canadian interests, and there is nothing like two egotisms in fighting each other. Of course, that could not be. But suppose the late government had been maintained in power. Suppose my right hon. friend had gone with

Mr. Dunning, with that fine speech, with a new reduction in the tariff as affecting the importation of British goods, a greater preference, and with those fine declarations about no petty spirit of bargaining. Well, perhaps after thirty-two years some relief might have come to the farmers of the west to the extent of a few pence more for their wheat on the British market—provided that, in the interval, means had been found of raising the price of wheat grown in other parts of the world.

Because Mr. Speaker—and this is one of the reasons for which, in spite of many misdeeds which I have denounced in the policy of the British government, I remain, and am still more every day, a deep admirer of the nation—the British people, while thinking of the conditions prevailing throughout the world, and while being prepared to bargain fairly with all nations including their associates within the empire, think of themselves first, second and last and put themselves on a fair basis to bargain. What means all this talk about bargaining, that there should be no such thing as bargaining? Sheer nonsense! Who is that great English or French jurist who said that after all every question of right—right generally, mind you—the greatest thing on earth in the government of nations and the maintenance of order as among men and peoples—every question of right could be brought within the four corners of the law of contract, properly understood and interpreted. Likewise every diplomatic question, every matter at issue between governments and nations must of necessity be a matter of bargaining. The only question is, will you bargain fairly, honestly and with statesmanship, or will you bargain as a miser? Napoleon once called the English nation a nation of shopkeepers; but, as Lord Rosebery, his great admirer, said in later years, the English made a great mistake in being so angry at that qualification of Napoleon's. What has made their greatness? Not their soldiers, not their sailors, not even their statesmen, but their shopkeepers, their merchants and their industrialists, because, while having constant regard to their corporate or individual interests, they never lost sight of their duty to their people and to their nation. Canada, Australia and other parts of the British empire will be in a position to deal with Britain on a footing of equality—not of legal equality, that is nothing—but on a footing of moral, social and economic equality, to strike a fair, honest and proper bargain with the British nation, when they have learned, first, to stand on their own ground, to realize their real interests, and then confront their position with that of the British government. So long as we go on—I was going to say, waving the British flag, but that is not the proper expression—so long as one party goes on making a bed cover of the British flag in order to prevent the people from looking under the cover, and the other party makes use of it as a pocket handkerchief to wipe its nose every time it has a cold in its head, so long as we make such silly use of the British flag instead of adopting for our own use what is best in British traditions, we will not be in a position to make a fair bargain with the British government or, at that, with any other nation or government.

I consider, and I make this statement quite deliberately, that the position taken by the Prime Minister at the opening of the conference was the proper one to take. But what happened? The Prime Minister lost sight of a few things, as my right hon. friend has lost sight of a few other things. The Prime Minister is quite right when he says that he practically imitated the example set by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902; but so far he has not gone the length of following the example set by Sir John Macdonald when accused by his Liberal opponents, in one of their first fits of feigned loyalty, of endangering British connection by the adoption of his national policy. He said: "All I have to reply is, so much the worse for the British connection. I am not adopting that policy to oppose British interests, I am adopting it to serve Canadian interests. I hope the British people will find a way to accommodate themselves to it, but anyway it is my policy." The right hon. leader of the opposition read quite properly an extract from a letter from another robust Canadian, Sir Alexander Galt, on the right of Canada to exercise her fiscal autonomy. He might have read also the letters exchanged between the government of Sandfield Macdonald and the same Duke of Newcastle, to the effect that Canada intended to keep her own sons upon her own territory and not to lend them to any government in London in order to advance British interests. Both parties could obtain valuable lessons from those old records. The incidentals of the national policy of 1878 might have been wrong and the assumption that protection was a cure for all evils might be erroneous. I did not believe so, years ago, when I was elected. Strange to say I was elected as a protectionist Liberal. I could not see my way clear to professing free trade in my county and voting protection in the house. After I had secured a mandate from the people I could not bring myself to present one phase of the situation to the people and another phase to the house.

An hon. MEMBER: You could not be a good Liberal.

Mr. BOURASSA: Nor do I think I would be a very good Tory. In fact, I do not think it is possible to be a good Tory.

Where the Prime Minister was wrong, in London, was in imagining that he could play the part of Neptune and silence the agitated waters of the sea, that he could, all by himself, make of the British Empire the greatest human community that has ever existed. That was but part of it. He could not expect that to be accepted by the English people. Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, nearly as powerful a man as the right hon. gentleman, tried it and perished in the attempt. Previously another Englishman, who truly might not compare with our lion-hearted Richard, Sir Charles Dilke, made the attempt and perished. Therefore, he ought to have been prepared with a fuller degree of humour and wit, and such humility as he could find in himself, to receive the answer of Mr. Thomas. His mistake was in answering Mr. Thomas in the way he did. The trouble with most of our men when they go to London is to think that Englishmen, accustomed as they are to deal with the whole world, will take them as seriously as they take themselves. That has been the trouble with all our representatives in London. I think that what Mr. Thomas did was quite right and proper, and the mistake made by my right hon. friend was in being too serious about it. The right hon. Prime Minister thought that it would be the end of the British Empire if everybody did not listen to him, and likewise the leader of the opposition is wrong when he thinks that because his opponent has been a little noisy in his assertions in England and because he replied in the way he did, that means the end of the British Empire. No such thing will happen. This government will pass and perhaps the hon. gentlemen on this side of the house will come to power again. Canada will follow the trend of the world, will grow and at times will pass through many crises. There is no doubt that some day the British Empire will end because it is a human institution. It will end as did the Roman Empire and all other human fabrics, but it will not end because of either of these two excellent bachelors in this house.

By a strange coincidence, the explosion of December 2nd was published on the anniversary of the famous coup d'etat, which in 1851 changed the fate of the French republic. This one did not have exactly the same effect. People did not rise in rebellion. It is true that, as the right hon. gentleman said, there was approval of his proposal in most of the British papers. But the approval meant really that he had impressed most of the British papers with the difficulties of the situation, because the policy propounded was so impossible for England that no responsible leader could approve it, and that explains the rejoicing of the British papers. When he came with his explosion of the second of December everybody got away in order to escape the smell of the fuming gases and the heat of the powerless steam hissing out from the broken machine. But fortunately for him and fortunately for us, the right hon. gentleman survived. He certainly has something to accomplish, and he will accomplish much if he does not attempt to rule the world. He came back in good health; and now I hope he will start with a sound and modest Canadian policy, along the lines that he has generally adopted. But let him beware of imperial ventures and not attempt to preach a new gospel to an old nation that has known pretty well how to rule itself for the last seven or eight centuries.

Mr. F. H. PICKEL (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I should extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address, and also I wish to extend my felicitations to the last speaker on his historical oration. The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) mentioned that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had stated that the late government should have foreseen the catastrophe which was facing the Canadian people and taken means to prevent it. There is a good deal of truth in that.

Since 1925, by the operation of the Australian trade treaty, which included New Zealand, the largest and best group of citizens that we have in Canada has been practically put out of business. I refer to the dairy, poultry and market garden farmers of Canada. For forty-five years at least, I have been engaged quite extensively in farming operations. I am also practising medicine, and I assure the house that during the last six years it has taken all I could earn in a protected profession to keep my farm going. I can take you into my county and show you farm after farm that has been deserted since 1925 owing to the operations of the Australian treaty. I could take you upon one road of eleven miles through a good farming section and show you forty-seven houses boarded up. I could take you on another road of six miles and show you twelve houses boarded up, and that is the case throughout the county. As it is in Brome-

Missisquoi, so it is through the whole of the eastern townships. I think it is safe to say that in the eastern townships there are 3,000 farms abandoned because they cannot make them pay. Why? Simply because of legislation passed in 1925 allowing Australia and New Zealand to ship their products into this country under a duty of one cent a pound.

The western farmers complain that they are pretty hard hit. I agree with them, and I extend my hearty sympathy to them. I would certainly do anything in my power to assist them, but in the west they do not know what hard times are. Eastern Canadian dairy farmers since 1925 have been losing all they had accumulated in a lifetime. They are down and out. The people in the west have been suffering for a year.

Mr. DONNELLY: Has the hon. member ever been there?

Mr. PICKEL: I have. Previously the westerners got good prices; they were doing well; but we in the eastern townships have been suffering for seven years, and we are pretty hard hit. The wheat situation is very serious. The people in the east are sympathetic and they are quite willing to do anything that can be done to remedy conditions in the west. I cannot say what should be done, but I am ready to support any measures for the purpose of alleviating the conditions of the western farmer.

When we speak of agriculture in this house, the eastern dairy farmer never enters the mind of hon. members. It is the grain growers of the west who are meant, and this has been so for a long time. About the only information the majority of the members have of the condition of the eastern farmer is what is obtained from the milkman who, from the excessive price he is charging for his milk, spreads the propaganda that the farmer is robbing him. He does not at the same time tell the consumer that while the farmer is getting one dollar, the milkman is getting three dollars. I ask hon. members to consider seriously the position of the eastern dairy farmer. During the last six years, since 1925, the experimental and demonstration farms of this country have shown us that it costs forty cents to produce a pound of butter with bran at $30 a ton and middlings at $38 a ton; but with bran at $40 a ton and middlings at $50 a ton, which we had to pay for four or five of those years, the cost of production was over fifty cents a pound, and the farmers in the dairy section, by remaining in the business, lost ten cents on every pound of butter they produced. Our farmers would have been better off if they had closed up their farms in 1925 and waited—

An hon. MEMBER: For a change in government?

Mr. PICKEL: —for a change in government.

A great deal has been said about the tariff and about the hardship that the tariff works. During the special session or last September the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), speaking of the increased duties that were then proposed, cited the fact that the rubber business was doing well. In order not to prolong the debate I did not at that time ask him to tell the house why it was doing well. In 1878 we did not manufacture rubbers in this country, and from 1878 to 1885 or 1886 I could save my return fare by going twenty miles to a little town across the line to buy two pair of rubbers. To-day, Mr. Speaker, we can buy rubbers that are even a little bit better made in Canada by Canadian workmen at as cheap a price as they sell for across the line. That is what protection has done for the rubber industry, and it is what protection will do for any industry. Industries must have protection, not only manufacturing industries but the great industry of agriculture also. Agriculture must be protected. The people of the west raise a great deal more farm produce than we can consume in this country. If the production of the farmers of the west was limited to the consumption of this country, would they not be crying for a tariff against Russia?

I wish to deal for a few moments with the dairy industry in Canada. Representing a dairying constituency, I am intensely interested in the dairy business, and I would ask that every consideration be given to the eastern dairy farmer. I think that he can be helped. To-day we are not producing as much butter as we consume. We have in cold storage in Montreal about four million pounds of New Zealand butter and about three million dozen of foreign eggs. They are being kept in cold storage as a lever to keep the price down, and when the production of butter commences in this country in the spring, it will be bought up at a cheap price and be put into cold storage, so that the same thing may be done again next winter. In the year 1924 we exported twenty-four million pounds of butter, graded No. 1, the best butter in the world. For the last two years, however, we have exported practically no butter, and there is no grading at all. The consequence is that we have lost the art of butter making in Canada. It has gone from us. The Australian trade treaty made it necessary for us to find a market for our dairy produce outside Canada. New Zealand captured our own market for butter, and we had to ship our milk and cream to the United States, and so we stopped making butter, and we have lost the art. We will have to begin over again. If dairying in this country is made to pay, you do not need to worry, Mr. Speaker, about our not producing enough. If it pays to produce it, we will produce it; if it does not pay, we cannot produce it.

We have also imported five million pounds of bacon. Imagine importing that amount of bacon into an agricultural country like Canada! I say it is a crime. Altogether we imported thirty million pounds of meat and meat products from the United States last year. That is a condition that should not be tolerated. We must do something to encourage agriculture in the east. I understand that a movement is on foot to get the western farmer to go into mixed farming. There is one reason why it might not be very successful in western Canada, and that is because most of the western farmers that I know left the east for the west so that they would not have to work. Farming in the east means fifteen or sixteen hours labour every day from the 1st of January to the 1st of January. Does the western farmer want that? Not a bit. For that fifteen or sixteen hours' labour the farmer gets nothing, worse than nothing. The farmer is not suffering from any unemployment, not a particle. He is in the position that he is unable to accomplish the work he should do, and he is unable to hire help.

I would like to say a word or two about the industrial expansion in my part of the country since the tariff was increased last September. Even amongst the dairy farmers there is a better feeling to-day than there was then, for they know that no more butter is coming in from New Zealand unless it pays a duty of eight cents a pound. They would also like to see that provision extended to Australia, and if that were done I think they would be satisfied. I think myself that the tariff should be ten or twelve cents a pound, and certainly it should be extended to Australia.

A factory in my town, which last September employed 180 hands, to-day employs 500. Silk is being produced at a price less than that prevailing before the protection was granted. Another factory in my town, one of the largest factories in Canada, which employed thirty hands last September now has seventy-five. The plush factory in Farnham which was closed last September is now open and employing fifty-two hands. I may add that it is increasing its operations every day. We have built a $2,000,000 linoleum plant there too. I think hon. members from the eastern townships will agree with me that as a result of this improved industrial condition brought about by the tariff legislation last fall, there is a better feeling throughout the district than prevailed last year. This expansion of eastern industrial concerns is going to make a better home market for the farmer. The improved condition of affairs in my little section we want to see prevail all over the Dominion.

I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if you have a tariff you should make it high enough. What in the world is the object of having a low tariff when you are sure it will not protect the manufacturer. If a tariff of 30 per cent keeps out foreign competition, what does it matter whether you make it 50 per cent or higher so long as you accomplish the purpose in view—to preserve the home market for the Canadian manufacturer and so protect his workmen, and inasmuch as the government assures us the consumer will not be exploited.

In the speech from the throne mention is made of the proposed creation of a tariff commission. Well, I hope we shall have a workable tariff commission, not a tariff commission such as the late tariff advisory board, which operated simply to reduce the tariff as low as possible and still keep people travelling round on their feet. Certainly we do not want a tariff commission such as we had in conjunction with the defunct consumers' league, which operated simply for the good of a party and not for the good of the country.

Something has been said about a one-man government. Well, if he is the right man it is the best kind of government on earth. Of course, democratic government has come to stay, for the simple reason that usually any autocratic form of government is terminated by death, and however beneficial that government may have been, the resultant confusion following the removal of the autocrat more than offsets any benefits that may have accrued to the country. But I do not see where hon. gentlemen opposite get their premises for the assertion that this is a one-man government. It is simply a supposition put forward by someone—well, he has had a dream. I submit that with the gifted and resourceful leader that we have, supported by a solid party, we shall have good government and the national interests will be looked after in a way that they were not looked after while our friends opposite were in office.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the rules of the house limit me to forty minutes, so I am not able to follow in detail the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Pickel) who has just spoken. Indeed I intend to devote most of my attention to one paragraph in the speech from the throne which deals with western conditions. It says in part:

My ministers have had under anxious consideration the means by which an orderly marketing of the wheat crop of western Canada may be assured, and have already taken such effective action towards that end as the circumstances appear to justify.

Reading that sentence, I am led to believe that the government are not fully aware of the conditions that do exist in western Canada. The speech continues:

My ministers are aware that changing conditions in the world's markets may necessitate further intervention by my government, which is prepared to render whatever additional assistance may be deemed advisable in the national interest.

I am led by that sentence, Mr. Speaker, to take heart. It may be that the government has not been kept fully aware of the changing conditions. Then the speech proceeds:

The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing of the wheat crop and of providing more stable markets, as the welfare of all parts of Canada is involved in satisfactory returns being received by the grain growers.

I feel it my duty, sir, to bring to your attention and to the attention of the house the prices which are received to-day by the grain growers. The following figures are taken from the Calgary Herald of March 13, and are street prices, or the prices paid for grain delivered at the line company elevators in Alberta at points taking the 26 cent freight rate to Fort William:

Wheat: No. 1, 36 cents; No. 2, 33 cents; No. 3, 29 cents; No. 4, 25 cents; No. 5, 23 cents; No. 6, 23 cents per bushel.
Oats: No. 2 CW, 15 cents per bushel.

That is the highest grade.

No. 1 feed oats, 10 cents per bushel.
Barley: No. 3 CW, 14 cents; No. 4 CW, 11 cents per bushel.
Rye: No. 2 CW, 12 cents; No. 3 CW, 10 cents per bushel.

I am sure that no one would consider these prices satisfactory. In fact they are so unsatisfactory that I think it is impossible to have stable business conditions in Canada until they are changed. May I give to the house one or two instances of the wrong relationship of prices that now exists? A few weeks ago a gentleman told me that it took five bushels of his wheat to pay for the half-soling of his boy's shoes; that was No. 2 grade wheat. I heard of another case where a man took 60 bushels of barley to pay for a pair of workshoes for himself. I know of a man who, having brought eleven dozen eggs to town and succeeded in getting a dollar for them, thought he had made a good deal. He had his boy with him and they went over to the restaurant to get their lunch. It cost him 90 cents for the two meals. With the remaining 10 cents he bought a pair of shoelaces for the boy. Even at that there was nothing to pay for the gasoline which he used in driving to town and back again. It takes just 75 bushels of No. 1 feed oats to buy a pair of ploughshares. One man told me that when the present Minister of Railways was in western Canada during the campaign he was lamenting the fact that it took two bushels of barley to buy a package of cigarettes at some place in Manitoba, but this man said to me, "When you go to Ottawa now tell him that in our district it takes three bushels of barley to buy a package of cigarettes."

The result of these low prices, Mr. Speaker, is that the morale of the western farmer never has been as low as it is to-day, and that is not to be wondered at. Out of the prices which I quoted must be deducted all the expenses of the farmer, including threshing, the hauling of grain to town, stooking, twine, the board of his harvesters, repairs to his binder and all the expenses which must have gone before in preparing the land for the crop. As a result he is unable, in many cases, to pay his store bills, his taxes, or the interest on his mortgage or bank loan. I have here a clipping from the Calgary Herald containing a despatch from Edmonton which says that the Retail Merchants' Association of that province interviewed the provincial government, and they stated that the total amount owing the merchants of the province on farmers' accounts was estimated at $40,000,000. I was told a few years ago that there were 70,000 farmers in Alberta, so anyone can figure out just how much that averages out for each farmer on his store debt.

Many of our farmers are in this position: They are depending upon a tractor with which to do their seeding operations this spring, but they have not the money left with which to buy gasoline or oil to run the tractor, and in many cases credit has been absolutely refused. How is the crop to be put in this spring? That is the burning question, and I hope this house and this government will consider it before the end of this month. I was told by one gentleman that a bank manager expressed the opinion to him that in his particular district one-third of the land would not be seeded this spring because the farmers could not get credit with which to go ahead with their farming operations. I know of one school district, not the worst district in Alberta by any means where only three farmers have been able to pay their taxes for 1930. If these men cannot get credit for their farming or seeding operations this spring certainly they will not be able to pay taxes in 1931. Without taxes we cannot have schools, and without schools what civilization have we that is worth while?

Mr. Speaker, this paragraph which I read mentions that the government is concerned with the question of securing lower production costs. I want to say that if the farmer in western Canada has to wait for the betterment of his condition until we can get these lower production costs, the farmers now there will have disappeared, because it is impossible for them to carry on under present conditions. I am not even going to touch on the tariff to-night. If the farmer has to wait until we get a lower tariff for him, he will have disappeared by the time it is put into effect.

To-night, in the few minutes at my disposal, I want to suggest to this house and to the government that at this session we should give serious consideration to our currency problem. I am going to suggest that we abandon the gold basis in Canada, and do it very soon. From 1914 until 1926 the suspension of redemption of our notes in gold obtained in this country, and I do not think anyone was the worse off for it. It was necessary in 1914, and in my opinion it is just as necessary to-day. I want to quote very briefly from the Calgary Albertan, in which appears a portion of a speech delivered before the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce by Viscount D'Abernon, who I understand is a very prominent banker there. I will not take time to read very much of this press report, but in his speech the viscount attacked the gold standard and wound up by saying:

> If you desire a return of good market conditions in cotton or wheat or any other commodity, if you wish for higher freights and more trade activity—you will achieve these with greater certainty and greater speed by dealing with the gold and currency problem than by any other means.

I believe the viscount is right, and that is the reason I am taking this opportunity to discuss this problem. The plight of the farmer to-day is caused by low prices, and the most effective remedy would be higher prices. This federal government has been approached by the premiers of the prairie provinces, who have asked that the federal government guarantee to pay to the farmers 70 cents per bushel for No. 1 wheat at Fort William. That only means 50 cents a bushel to the farmer in my constituency, which is less than cost of production and certainly will not encourage the over-production of wheat. No one will produce wheat at that price if he can find anything else in the world to do with his farm.

I am well aware that there is a great deal of objection to this suggestion, but I want to say in all fairness to the people of the prairie provinces, who I think are almost solidly behind their premiers in this request, that the government of Australia are guaranteeing their farmers 68 cents per bushel for wheat. It takes only 8 cents per bushel, I am told, to move wheat from the railway siding in Australia to the seaboard, which means that the farmer receives 60 cents a bushel. If Canada will not do something more for her farmers than has been done so far it simply means that the individual Canadian farmer is in competition with the Australian nation when he goes to sell his wheat in the markets of the world. Surely that is not fair.

Now I come to the case of Russia. Under date of November 24 I find an article in the Calgary Herald entitled "Red Trade Menace" written by Mr. Knickerbocker for the New York Evening Post. I think perhaps I should read this quotation, which is as follows:

> Wheat Farmers Well Paid
> "Union Grain," the government grain trading organization, is paying this year to private peasants and to collective farms throughout the soviet union an average price of one rouble forty kopeks a pood for wheat, according to official information given me by the government planning commission. Reckoning the rouble at par, or the Soviet State bank rate of one rouble ninety-four kopeks to the dollar, this amounts to $1.20 a bushel.

According to that article, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian farmer is in competition with the Russian nation as well as with Australia. In the United States the government, through the federal farm board, has spent millions of dollars in an endeavour to peg the price of wheat. Perhaps it is true that this has not been entirely successful, but as I see it the result is that in the United States wheat is quoted at approximately 19 cents above the price of wheat in Canada, although for a long period of years Canadian wheat was quoted above United States wheat, until this federal farm loan board took action.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that Canada can afford to let her wheat growers disappear. Because of her geographical position Canada always must be a very large importer if we are to have a decent standard of living for our people. Canada's climatic conditions are such that we must import large quantities of certain commodities. The only way we can pay for these commodities is by exports, and I find by examination of our export trade figures that in 1928, out of total exports amounting to $1,228,000,000, wheat amounted to $352,000,000, or 28 per cent. In 1929 our total exports amounted to $1,363,000,000, of which wheat amounted to $428,000,000, or 31 per cent. During 1930 our total exports fell off; they amounted to $1,120,000,000, of which only $215,000,000, or 19 per cent, represented wheat. In 1930 our total exports were $243,000,000 less than in 1929, and of that total loss wheat accounted for $213,000,000. I think that is a serious situation as far as our export trade is concerned. The figures which I quoted do not include flour. In 1928 our export of flour was 59,000,000; in 1929, 65,000,000; and in 1930, 45,000,000.

I feel that if no action is taken to assist the Canadian wheat grower he will have to disappear. He cannot continue to operate under these conditions. The growers in Australia and Argentine have another distinct advantage over our producers, one that is perhaps more serious than the government recognize. According to a bulletin I received last week from the National City Bank of New York, London exchange owned in Australia commands a premium of 30 per cent in that country. The effect of this is to increase by 30 per cent the price to the producers in Australia of wheat and other exports when these funds are exchanged into Australian currency. Exactly the same position exists with regard to the Argentine. The National City bank bulletin says:

> The suspension of gold payments in the face of an unfavourable balance of payments resulted in currency depreciation which is now about 30 per cent.

The result of this is undoubtedly to increase the returns to the growers of wheat in Argentine by 30 per cent in Argentine funds. If Canada would suspend payment in gold as she did in 1914, and as has been done in the Argentine, I do not think there is any doubt that our dollar would depreciate; that is, if the government would cease floating foreign loans.

I should like to show by a quotation from the Commercial Intelligence Journal under date February 14 just how this is affecting growers in Australia. This was a despatch sent by our trade commissioner in Australia under date of January 5, before their exchange had depreciated to the extent it has now. It says:

> The manager of the Victorian wheat pool has expressed the view that the advance in exchange should increase the net returns to growers of approximately 1¾d. (3½ cents) per bushel. The advantage in the case of wheat will obviously be applicable to exports of Australian goods and products to the United Kingdom and other countries.

There is absolutely no doubt in the world as to how it works.

If Canada is to go into mixed farming to a large extent and is going to produce bacon and cheese and other commodities for export, we have to go into the old country market and fight for our share of that market. How are we going to do so if we remain on a gold basis with the appreciated dollar which we have to-day?

I have here a memorandum which I secured from the Department of Agriculture about six or seven years ago, dealing with Danish bacon. The memorandum says in part:

> What is probably of as much importance as anything is the rate of exchange which has prevailed since the war between Danish and English currency, the prevailing rate being 24 to 25 kronen per pound sterling. Thus, because of their depreciated currency, the Danish farmer is receiving approximately 1/3 more when sterling has been transferred into his own currency than he would under normal conditions, while we are on every English pound losing anywhere from 15 to 50 cents in exchange. This may not seem a great point, still it has meant that prices for hogs in Danish currency have been sufficiently high to influence the Danish farmer in volume production just as our Canadian farmers were enthused in volume production by the high prices here during the war and this factor has contributed in no small measure to the greatly increased hog killings in Denmark during the past year.

I want to make it clear that this increase in value in Canadian currency of our wheat which is exported would apply equally to all exports, and it is the exporters in Canada to-day who are in such a difficult position. The stated policy of this government is to give fair conditions in the home market to the home manufacturer. But what about the exporter? He is left to shift for himself. Last year at the special session the government introduced very drastic legislation to prevent any goods being dumped into Canada; yet every bushel of wheat we produce in Canada, whether consumed here or elsewhere, is sold at a dumped price. Everyone knows it. What is being done about it?

In support of my contention that this would increase the prices of wheat and other exports, I wish to quote from Hansard of June 8, 1922, a speech delivered by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). In this speech the hon. gentleman was dealing with the question of depreciated currency, pointing out to Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, that it was impossible for manufacturers in Great Britain, in the United States or in Canada to compete with German manufacturers. He then went on to quote the words of Dr. Melchior, who was the German economist officially attached to the German delegation that negotiated the treaty of Versailles. That authority is quoted as having said:

> The falling currency has, it is true, brought apparent prosperity to German industry by means of a premium on exports which at the same time cripples the industries of the competing countries.

Our chief competitors in the wheat export business are the Argentine, Australia and Russia. The Argentine is our foremost competitor, and that country has a depreciated currency of 30 per cent. So has Australia. If the words of Doctor Melchior are true, and I do not think they can be denied, these two countries have a distinct advantage over us because of this premium on exports; and repeating his last words, they are crippling the industries of competing countries. They are crippling the wheat industry of Canada. Australia is taking our market in China very largely because she has this depreciated currency, which makes it so easy for her to sell to China at a price under which her wheat growers can carry on. And the same is true in relation to the Argentine in the British market. It is very unfortunate for us. What can be done about it? I suggest that we should allow our dollar to depreciate. Keeping our dollar at par is playing into the hands of the United States. The United States is more responsible than any other country for the world wide depression that exists. I could quote good authority for that statement.

Perhaps I should offer some evidence that our dollar would depreciate if it were allowed to do so. There are three ways of keeping the dollar at par: first, by the export of commodities; secondly, the export of gold; and thirdly, the sale of our bonds in foreign countries. Our trade balance has fallen behind to a considerable extent this year. I have secured from the Bureau of Statistics a bulletin dealing with our international settlement, and according to that bulletin the invisible items in our balance of trade last year, taking them all together, showed a debit balance against us of $88,000,000. I assume there will be very little change so far as these items are concerned this year. For the first eight months of the present fiscal year the actual commodity trade balance was against us to the extent of $80,000,000, so that it is fair to assume that for the current year the actual total balance against us will be about $200,000,000. How is our dollar to be kept at par in face of such a situation? We produce all told only between $30,000,000 and $40,000,400 in gold in Canada. We cannot export gold to keep it up. The gold in the hands of the government to-day is very little more than required as a reserve for our Dominion notes.

Mr. BENNETT: About ten millions.

Mr. COOTE: We cannot afford to export enough gold to keep it up. I believe that our dollar would have been depreciated already if the government had not floated last fall in New York a loan of $100,000,000. The proceeds of that loan were just as effective in keeping up the rate of exchange as though we had sold to that country another $100,000,000 worth of goods. If our trade balance is not large enough to keep our dollar at par, are we justified in attempting to keep it there? Are we justified if in doing it we are killing industry, and bleeding the farmers and the exporters of this country? We are putting the farming industry into bankruptcy and making it increasingly difficult for nearly half our population to carry on. Supposing our dollar were depreciated to the extent it was in 1920, about 20 per cent, it would add 15 cents per bushel to the price of wheat and that would make all the difference in the world to the trade of Canada generally.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. member does not mean that?

Mr. COOTE: That 15 cents would put heart in our farmers, it would allow the pool to make another payment and it would permit many men to buy gasoline in order to operate their tractors during this spring.

The drop in the price of wheat is chiefly responsible for the drop in our export trade. That is what would cause the dollar to depreciate, and for that reason this depreciation should be allowed to take place. It would soften the blow which the farmers of Canada are taking, and it would save many of them from going into bankruptcy. Millions of dollars of debt hang over the farmers of western Canada which cannot be paid. Many of these debts are not worth 50 cents on the dollar; many of them are not worth 25 cents on the dollar, but if this depreciation in our currency were permitted I believe it would increase the price of wheat sufficiently so that the bulk of these debts could be paid in full. What better condition could we have than the determination of our people to pay one hundred cents on the dollar? The present conditions are making it absolutely impossible for many men to pay their debts, men who never dreamed of doing anything else.

One of the objections which will be raised to this proposal is that it will increase the cost of living. Some people go so far as to say that it would increase in proportion to the depreciation which took place in our currency. I challenge that statement. That is a theory which was put forth by some economists before the war, but the experience of many countries after the war proved that it was not so. I have here an article which has been in my files for some six or seven years—these old files come in handy sometimes. This editorial deals with an article by Mr. Arthur Greenwood, M.P., which appeared in The Contemporary Review, dealing with the claim of English manufacturers that they could not compete with French manufactures of woollen goods because they had a depreciated currency. The editorial reads as follows:

> But Mr. Greenwood thinks that the advantages which the French manufacturer now enjoys in the British market are not due to the depreciation of the French exchange, but to the difference between the internal and external values of the franc. Prices in France have not risen—and therefore costs of production have not risen—

I quote again from the remarks of Mr. Stevens in 1922, in which he quotes Mr. Maynard Keynes as follows:

> During the summer of 1921 the mark gold equalled 20 marks paper. The internal purchasing power of the paper mark for the purposes of consumption was still nearly double its corresponding value abroad.

Then Mr. Stevens continues to quote Doctor Melchior as follows:

> The internal purchasing power of the mark . . . . is at present (April, 1922), between two and three times its international value. . . .

I think it is very easy to dispose of the contention that the increased cost of living will be sufficient to take up any advantage accruing from a depreciated currency.

I stated a moment ago that all this was working to the advantage of the United States and that that country was chiefly responsible for the present world depression which has affected the price of wheat and which is having such a serious effect upon our farmers. Why should we continue on a gold monetary basis, the very thing the United States wants us to do because it delivers us into their hands, they having accumulated 40 per cent of the world's gold? In support of my contention I will quote from a speech delivered at the annual meeting of the Royal Bank of Canada by Mr. Neil, vice-president and general manager, as follows:

> If the central banks of all the countries on a gold basis should deliberately adopt a common policy they could within a certain time lag, raise or lower the price level almost at will. Without a common policy, movements of gold would in due course arrest action of one country not in harmony with the policies of others, although the United States, with a huge stock of gold, could probably afford to loose a quantity which no country or group of countries would be willing to receive. On the other hand, she has during the period of 1921-1925 received gold on an unprecedented scale without allowing such receipts to create inflation.
> It is because the United States is in such a commanding position of wealth, with forty per cent of the world's gold supply, that the main responsibility for the world price level rests with that country.

I had one or two other quotations which I desired to give, but I do not believe my time will permit. Even although they could be effected, and I do not believe they can, a reduction in the cost of production and a reduction in the cost of living would not be sufficient to place our farmer in a proper position to carry on. A reduction in the cost of living will not reduce his debts or his interest or his taxes, and the payments on those three accounts take up almost one-third of his income. A depreciated dollar would pay just as many debts, and just as much taxes and interest as would the appreciated dollar. He is paying these accounts with a dollar which cost him at least two dollars to obtain. This injustice continues because we are following this gold monetary policy. I would like to give a quotation from an article by Professor B. K. Sandwell entitled Shall We Abandon the Gold Basis which appeared in the Toronto Saturday Night, as follows:

> By the carrying out of these policies, the United States and France are directly affecting the value of every debt due in Canada and expressed in terms of Canadian currency. The Canadian dollar is now worth about twice as much in commodities as it was three years ago, and the change is not due to any alteration in the standard or volume of the Canadian currency or indeed to anything that Canada has done. It is due simply to an illogical policy on the part of the United States and a very logical but repudiationist policy on the part of France.
> It therefore seems to the present writer that this is a time for every serious consideration of the question whether we desire a currency which can be thus manipulated at the will of other nations. The main argument in favour of the gold standard has always been that its value could only be affected by natural forces such as the volume of gold produced in a given period. it is obvious that in the present circumstances the force of this argument is almost entirely destroyed. Should Canada, then, continue oven the pretence of keeping her currency linked as to value with that of the United States and with the legally depreciated franc of France?

The article continues:

The Canadian business situation would be very materially relieved if the Canadian dollar were again allowed to depreciate to something like the figure which it reached at the close of the war, and in allowing it so to depreciate the Canadian people would be doing no more than exercising their sovereign right to keep their unit of currency at a value as near as possible to that of a given body of assorted commodities.

And again:

The object of the apparent depreciation which I am discussing is to correct an already existing appreciation or in other words to maintain stability. Depreciation to-day would merely reduce the value of the claims of creditors to something like what it was when they made their loans.

I want to make it very clear that I am not advocating this as a cure for all the ills from which the farmers of Canada are suffering. I am sugggesting it as a very proper remedy which might be applied to help out at the present time. It would assist the farmer in the very difficult situation in which he at present finds himself. It is only one remedy which should be applied. It is not placing any burden upon the federal treasury. It is not an artificial bolstering up of prices. In reality, what I am suggesting is that we should cease holding our dollar at par by giving our note to buy gold to keep it there and I consider my suggestion thoroughly logical. I am sure if the Prime Minister were discussing a farmer's case he would say to him: You should keep your expenditure within your income, and I think at this time Canada is very foolish to go outside of Canada to secure its loans. I am unable to understand the policy of any government which would say: You must buy Canadian goods even if they cost you 40 to 50 per cent more, and who, when they want a little money, would run outside of Canada to get it if they could save one-quarter of one per cent. That seems entirely illogical. The suggestion I have made is perfectly natural; there is nothing artificial about it, and it has this distinct advantage, that if, by the adoption of this suggestion, our exports are stimulated to the point where, after a year or two or three years, our exports balance our imports, the dollar will then have come back to par because of the balancing of our international trade. I think justice in the case demands that my suggestion should be accepted.

In closing, I hope this suggestion will receive very serious consideration by parliament and the government before we prorogue, because something must be done to place our farmers in a better position otherwise, they must discontinue the business of exporting wheat from Canada.

[Mr. Coote.]

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): Mr. Speaker, it is now some months since the close of the recent short session of the house, and much has taken place during the interval. I am pleased indeed to notice the reception of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett) by the great universities of the motherland, and I know we are all pleased to address him as the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada, but he is still the arch minister of promises unredeemed. It is quite true he was instrumental in calling the recent emergency session primarily for the purpose of ending unemployment in Canada by federal means, but in about as little time as it takes to tell it, his government scrapped the theory of federal responsibility to end unemployment, and announced a scheme whereby over four-fifths of the burden was saddled upon the municipalities and provinces.

It is also true that his government has had enacted some of the most detrimental legislation ever forced through the parliament of any country, legislation whereby the people of Canada have been driven away back before the days of the Magna Charta, the day of the signing of the great charter of English liberty for the protection of the rights of the people.

But at the moment what I wish more particularly to draw to the attention of the house and the country is that one of the most solemn promises the Prime Minister gave was his pledge to Canadian agriculture, when after his statement at Calgary "the basic industry of Canada is agriculture" and at Ormstown, Quebec, "agriculture stands first in Canadian development", he said at Woodstock, New Brunswick, "I shall regard it as my great responsibility if elected on July 28, 1930, to see that the collective weight and power of the Dominion of Canada is placed behind agriculture. I would be lacking in qualifications entitling me to head a Canadian government if I failed to do so." There is his pledge to Canadian agriculture given in the clearest and most unequivocal terms. What has he and his government done to implement that pledge? He knows that the first requirement of the Canadian farmer is to secure wider and better markets for his surplus agricultural products. He knows that if the Canadian farmer could only secure entry into the United States market on favourable terms, it is the world's best market, and although the present United States government still remains obdurate there is no doubt a rapidly growing favourable feeling among the people of that country as a whole.

He knows also that during the five years between 1915 and 1920, when the then United States government did open that market to the free entry of finished live stock, fresh meats, dairy produce, wheat flour and potatoes, it was a boon to the Canadian farmers, but never once during that time did the then Canadian Tory government lift its hand to reciprocate or show its appreciation in any way. It is no wonder that under such treatment the United States government soon withdrew the privilege. But now, when the Hawley-Smoot tariff has shut out the United States market, our only other available market is that of the motherland which has always maintained a free open door to Canadian agricultural products.

More than that, if the right hon. gentleman knows anything about the elementary laws of trade and economics, he knows that goods sold must be paid for by the acceptance of goods in exchange, so that if we would sell our wheat or other products in Britain we must be prepared to accept British goods in return payment. And knowing, according to his own words, "the primary concern of Canada is to sell its wheat," what did the right hon. gentleman do? His first proposal in parliament as Prime Minister of Canada was "that as far as possible the requirements of the 10,000,000 Canadian people shall be produced at home," showing at once that his government did not wish to encourage international trade at all.

His next act was to jack up the tariff on British goods to the prohibitive point, thus ejecting British goods at the toe of the boot from Canadian markets which they had enjoyed for a century. Then, in big stick fashion, he goes off to Britain to blast his way into the British market! How does he do it? By peremptorily demanding that the British government must impose a tax on foreign foodstuffs, thus identifying in the minds of millions of Britishers the once-honoured and respected name of Canada with the odious and much-feared policy of taxing the food of the British people; and then he became wildly uprorious and left Great Britain with the veiled threat of economic separation because a British minister, Mr. Thomas, mildly designated the whole proceeding as "humbug." His designation was mild indeed. He gave fact and figure, chapter and verse, in corroboration. He showed that while the foreign nations of Germany, Argentina, the United States and the Netherlands, allowed British coal in free of duty, Canada charges 1s. 7½d. per ton, and that:

British railway rails Australia charges 2s. 4d. per cwt.; Canada charges $4.50 per ton; Argentine admits free; Netherlands admits free.

On British sewing machines Canada charges 20 per cent; Australia charges 15 per cent; Germany charges 9 per cent.

On British cranes and hoists Australia charges 55 per cent; Canada charges 15 per cent; France charges 10 per cent; Germany charges 6 per cent; Argentine admits free; Netherlands admits free.

On British cotton piece goods Canada charges 21 per cent; Netherlands charges 8 per cent; Argentine admits free.

On British woollen goods av. duty Australia 61 per cent; Canada 37 per cent; Germany 22 per cent; France 12 per cent.

And, mark you, coal, iron and steel, cotton and woollen goods are among the key manufacturing industries of Great Britain.

The dominions did not disguise from us that their policy led on by the Prime Minister of Canada, was "Canada first," "Australia first" and "South Africa first." When the British government saw their disposition, was it to be condemned for saying, "Well, in that case our policy must be 'Great Britain first,'" when last year Britain bought from the dominions $150,000,000 worth more goods than the dominions bought from Britain.

No wonder the Bennett proposal was so unceremoniously turned down! The very idea of any government—or rather I should say, of any one man, because this is a one-man government, with a following so meek and submissive and lifeless during the last session that you would almost think a condition of hibernation had taken possession of the most of them,—the very idea I say, of any leader expecting to get a market in Britain for Canadian wheat or any other commodity by such treatment of the motherland is beyond the comprehension of any reasonable man. No set of reasonable men could be expected for a moment to entertain any such proposition presented in such a manner.

Former Canadian prime ministers who have represented Canada at previous Imperial conferences in old London have always manifested a high degree of sagacity and wisdom, especially when dealing with matters pertaining to British home government. But, sir, of the attitude of the present Prime Minister, what shall we say? His whole attitude while in the old land shows unmistakably that there are bees in the hon. gentleman's bonnet. He must have become possessed of a most exaggerated opinion of his own importance. Is it any wonder that the unofficial organ of the British government described the Bennett proposal as the "very bankruptcy of statesmanship and as demonstrably and intently foolish and useless".

To my mind there is only one explanation of such a strange proceeding. I entirely absolve the hon. gentleman of any intentional wrong doing. But the fact remains that after having sniffed the salt air at some point in the Atlantic he must have become so mentally aberrated that when he reached Great Britain he at once began roving around seeking whom he might attack. He first stirred up the British cabinet by his peremptory demand for the taxation of British foodstuffs. Then followed his charge that the Northampton boot and shoe makers were employing cheap labour and dumping their goods into the Canadian market, and when the British boot and shoe makers denied and resented his assertion and sought an interview on the matter, according to press reports, he refused them.

He next fell foul of the Lancashire cotton manufacturers, accusing them in the same way. These are but instances of his blasting process heralded all over Canada during the election campaingn.

I followed in my younger days a sea-faring life more or less for over twenty years and I know that there are cases of serious mental affection on the sea. On one occasion I met a neighbour as he landed on the docks in Glasgow and his captain insisted that he be handed to the health authorities for careful mental supervision. I pleaded to be allowed to convey him to his friends in Edinburgh, which was done. There he was placed under the most careful medical supervision for over six weeks, but with no improvement; then he was allowed to return home. On his return he told me that when he reached a certain zone in the Atlantic, where he had become mentally indisposed, his usually good sane condition returned at once. If this is really what happened to the right hon. gentleman he has my sincere sympathy, but we see no indication of a sensible condition or he would hasten to make sufficient amends to the British government at least.

If our honoured leader were to talk and make such a mess of his business while representing Canada in the old land, we would challenge him at once. However, it is only right to know, and we have the right to ask, what hon. gentlemen opposite think and intend doing regarding the action of a leader in so trampling on the good name of Canada and so abusing the trust which has been placed in his keeping?

The people of Canada are demanding to know what is and what will be the attitude of the right hon. gentleman's own supporters in this matter of burning significance to the good name of Canada. Scores of good citizens have said to me that this government would never last its term out, but my reply has been "Yes, it will; it will last its term out, unless its own supporters in this house rise in protest and rebellion against this kind of thing." When I would relate how this government's own followers sat dumb as oysters and swallowed the whole proceedings and high-handed legislation of the recent short session, they marvelled at their simplicity, and when I instanced how the power and authority of their leader over his followers was so absolute, that when, for instance, the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) rose on one occasion to address the house, the Prime Minister without ever rising from his seat, simply turned his head and commanded him to sit down, saying that that matter could be discussed at some other time, they were amazed that any member would cringe in submissiveness and remain silent under such a rebuke.

But what else can you expect under the direction of a small coterie of millionaire manipulators, who have amply demonstrated that they care not a straw for the hard-worn farmers and wealth producers of this country? I feel there must be many hon. gentlemen in this house sitting behind this government who in their hearts do not approve of this government's record, and the sooner they rise in the majesty of their manhood, break through such party chains and assert what they believe to be for the best interests of this country, the better it will be for themselves and this country as a whole.

Compare the record of the present Prime Minister at the Imperial conference with that of his predecessors in office. The leader of this government, by his declarations at the Imperial economic conference, has identified himself with the protectionist element of the Conservative party in Great Britain and has become embroiled in the party strife of the old land. This is in marked contrast with the restraint shown by the representatives of Canada at previous Imperial conferences. Consider the wise words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier on a similar occasion:

> We Canadians would not accept the idea that the British public should force upon us their own fiscal views, and no more would they tolerate the idea that we would force upon them our own fiscal views; therefore the only way in which the British Empire can be maintained upon its present foundation is by allowing every nation composing it the measure of liberty that it has, and also the free choice of the fiscal policy it is to maintain.

Surely these are words of courtesy and common sense. Consider also the expression of Sir Robert Borden on a similar occasion:

We Canadians hold ourselves free to work out the problem or preference according to Canadian needs and conditions. For the same reason Canada must avoid any attempt at interference with the domestic policy of Great Britain.

Words equally courteous and sensible. The same may be said of Mr. Mackenzie King who, as the result of his wise and circumspect action, enjoys the respect and admiration of all the great leaders in British public life, and we are glad to know that he enjoys the proud distinction of being at least the peer of any statesman in the British realm.

Consider also the preference proposals of the Dunning budget and the trend of thought which inspired them. In presenting his budget with such substantial additional preferences to British goods with 589 items on the free list out of 1,188 items in all, Mr. Dunning said:

These tariff favours to those who favour our products are not the result of any bargain with any other country but of an attitude in international relations which we believe to be mutually beneficial. In other words, we do not intend to meet the other countries of the British Commonwealth of Nations in any spirit of petty bargaining but rather in the broad spirit of willingness to become in ever-increasing measure good customers to those who meet us in like manner. This is the spirit in which we desire to meet all nations, but we believe that within the British Commonwealth of Nations lies the greatest opportunity for mutual development of trade because of a common heritage, kindred institutions and a common patriotism.

That budget with its accompanying remarks had the effect of almost electrifying the great body of the British people as well as all the great leaders in British public life. Most favourable comments appeared in the British press. The Manchester Guardian, Liberal, described the Canadian budget as a rich gesture, the generosity of which every Britisher must appreciate. The Conservative press said:

The Dunning budget constitutes the greatest advance in imperial relations that has been seen since the war.

J. L. Garvin, in the Observer (Independent), wrote:

The Canadian budget is one of those rare strokes of policy, which, like the Laurier British preference, illuminate the realities of empire.

Ramsay MacDonald declared:

Canada's last budget is an example of how the dominions can and will help.

But, Mr. Speaker, the dominions can and will help only when the reins of power are in the hands of the right-minded party. Unhappily for the good of all that is not the case in Canada to-day. Unfortunately, very unfortunately for Canada and the whole empire, those glowing expectations were not to be realized during the past year. In its place what benefit has Canada received to date? The reply cannot be given in more appropriate words than those of General Smuts to his followers when he said:

What might have been the most brilliant and successful of all imperial conferences, has ended in disillusionment and disappointment for every part of the commonwealth of nations. If the final settlement of dominion status had gone hand-in-hand with a great gesture of friendship and comradeship, and with the holding out and grasping of helpful hands all around in this common hour of trial, what a landmark would this conference not have been in the history of the empire.

I cannot help but feel that every time the Prime Minister thinks of how lamentably he missed the mark, it must make him heartsick.

The former premier of South Africa sees in the conference a severing of old bonds without anything accomplished to replace them. A dangerous void has been left, and in language more in sorrow than in anger he exclaims:

I am sure the spirit is there, but it is a thousand pities it found no expression at the Imperial conference.

The conference took action to settle the status question, declaring on paper for a dominion independence which already existed in full sufficiency. Then the various units, led on by the Prime Minister of Canada, tried to bargain on lines of selfish interest. Well may we recall those poetic lines:

> But oh! mankind are unco' weak
> And little to be trusted,
> When self the wavering balance thrusts,
> It's rarely right adjusted.

This is what General Smuts deplores, and instead of which he would have a new spirit of cooperation and helpfulness in our mutual relations.

If there had been present at that conference a Laurier, a Sir Robert Borden, a General Smuts, or a Mackenzie King and a Lapointe, there would have been accomplishments so substantial of which every British citizen might well be proud. But as it was there is nothing beneficial, but rather a condition very much the reverse.

If the opposition in this house had adopted a critical attitude towards the Prime Minister in his proceedings leading up to the conference, it might have been said that if we had left matters alone the result might have been different. Now, however, it must be evident to everyone that he has had every opportunity to show what he could do, but instead of bettering conditions his policies have only served to make them immeasurably worse. Meanwhile I very much fear that on the continent of Europe, as well as in the motherland, his blatant avowal of "Canada first" will bring about a policy of "Canada last" with the nations thus penalized, when it comes to buying foodstuffs.

Canadians had been hoping for further markets for Canadian agricultural products, but the chill which succeeded the warmth of enthusiam leading up to the conference is too manifest to need any comment. Much greater trade with Britain is imperative to restore our usual prosperity. As Ramsay MacDonald said:

> We are going out for a program of mutual help. Preference is not our formula. Ours is a program of greater interchange of trade.

With a policy of practical free trade how could they give more preference to Canadian goods? The Labour government's trade and tariff policy was expressed boldly and frequently long before the conference was summoned, and no Dominion delegation had any reason for assuming that it would be changed. They had no right to demand or expect any change; that prerogative belongs to the British electors. It was the first duty of the overseas delegates to recognize the fiscal policy of Great Britain as it stands, which has always been the policy recognized, as I have said, by all previous prime ministers of Canada. The present leader of the opposition and his colleagues have always refused to throw Canada on the side of any political party in Great Britain, and until the proceedings of the recent conference this position was accepted as wise, sound and courteous by the statesmen of both political parties in Canada.

Now, however, we have a so-called statesman at the head of affairs who has changed all this kind of thing, one who, when he sniffed the salt water, according to press reports, became so brutally frank that he began roving around seeking all whom he might attack, with the result that Canada is now made to appear hostile to two of the great political parties in Britain which at the last election polled 13,676,614 votes out of a total vote of 22,500,000, the Tory party on that occasion polling less than 8,700,000 votes. Thousands, if not millions, of those voters were opposed to any system of protection.

This was not only an unwarranted interference with the domestic affairs of Great Britain but a grave injustice to the people of Canada, who in the last election voted for no such policy and have no desire to see the present government of Great Britain replaced by a protectionist administration. The present prime minister of Canada while in Great Britain had no right to place them in that false position. More than that, Mr. Speaker, by his attitude at that conference he has forfeited his high position as the representative of the Canadian people in throwing the good name of Canada right into the cauldron of British home politics and demanding as a condition of empire preference that Great Britain must necessarily establish a system of protection against foreign importations, a system which all parties in Great Britain have discarded for well nigh a century.

To all such mischievous propaganda the British chancellor of the exchequer did well to reply in an important speech in which "no protection" was the keynote. The following is the associated press report:

> Protection would lead Great Britain into interminable industrial strife and chaos. An unfounded rumour has appeared in the press that the government is considering an all-round 10 per cent import duty for revenue purposes. No government in which I am in charge of the national finances will ever give serious consideration to such a proposal...
> If we alone were suffering and all protectionist countries were prosperous there would be a prima facie case for enquiring whether it was our fiscal policy which was responsible for our depression...
>
> The world crisis is temporary. It is driving many people to a state of panic. Before we have a change it must be proved beyond all dispute that the policy we have pursued for the last century is not the best policy for this country...
> Introduction of a tariff system into this country would strike at the purity of the political life of this nation. Parliament would become a sink of corruption. Members of parliament would go there not to represent the national interests but pledged to support the selfish interests of particular industries...
> Once begin a policy of protection and you are on a slippery slope that leads to a bottomless pit.

I commend these words to every would-be protectionist, because it is the most scathing challenge to the operation of such a policy that I have ever read. Mr. Snowden declared that the imperial preference, vigorously debated in Britain since the opening of the Imperial conference, could only be carried out by a tax on food. The Dominion premiers had made their policy clear; they asked Britain to change her fiscal policy so that preferential rates could be given to produce they sent to Britain.

When the proceedings of the conference were afterwards discussed in the British House of Commons Mr. Snowden again took a hand in the discussion and used language which should be intensely interesting to every Canadian. The only opportunity the British government had missed, he said, had been one to tax the food of the people. He described Mr. Bennett's proposal as follows:

> The only proposal put before the conference by the Dominions was Mr. Bennett's whose offer was—"I am not going to reduce the tariff against the United Kingdom but I will raise the tariff against the foreigner by 10 per cent of the present rate."
> This meant that the duty of 30 per cent would be raised to 33 per cent against the foreigner. . . . .
> The Canadian Prime Minister had made arrangements for this conference. He had been returned to power a few weeks before its opening and for a fortnight before he left Canada he was engaged in preparing for the conference by making large additions to Canadian duties on British products. Then Mr. Bennett came here and said. "If you will tax foreign wheat I will give you, not reciprocity but I will keep the tariff against this country as it was." That tariff . . . . was a prohibitive tariff. Both Mr. Bennett and Mr. Scullin (the Australian Prime Minister) were perfectly honest when they said their policy was to give preference to British imports where they must import these goods, but where British goods competed with Canadian or Australian goods, then they would impose a duty as protection for their own goods. . . . .
> The dominions, continued Mr. Snowden, are putting up a tariff wall such as to compel us to dismantle our mills here, as was done a few weeks ago in the case of a Yorkshire mill whose machinery was sent to Canada.

Such was the essence of the Canadian proposal, which was the only proposal before the conference, put in definite form. Mr. Snowden suggested the Conservatives in England would now appeal to the country on behalf of imperial unity to enable the dominions to keep out British goods and to increase unemployment in Britain. The Conservative program also said:

> We ask you to tax yourselves for the benefit of the dominions and we want the British people to pay the dominions for raising tariffs which will keep out British goods.

Who will not say this is not an accurate analysis of the Prime Minister's proposal? Certainly none of his supporters can consistently repudiate this version. And further, I say that the Prime Minister and his government had no mandate whatever, from the Canadian people to make any such proposition on their behalf. No such proposition ever was discussed before the Canadian electorate and if he would ask for a verdict on any such measure, he would not have a leg to stand on. Both he and his government would be whipped to a finish.

What other decision could you expect from British statesmen to a proposal which, if accepted, would at once hamstring British trade. It is a proposal which does not merit a moment's favourable consideration at the hands of intelligent Canadians. If the members of this house would only free themselves from all party bias they would at once arise in their might and consign any government which would entertain any such proposition to that political oblivion whence it should never have emerged. And I call upon them one and all to do so now.

On motion of Mr. Rinfret the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 18, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. YOUNG

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. Yesterday when the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was concluding his speech he assured the house that at this session the fullest opportunity would be given thoroughly to discuss and consider all the legislation brought down, but he added that the house would not listen or the government did not propose to listen to such vaudeville effusions as emanated from the member for Weyburn during the short session.

I know my right hon. friend has been working very hard. I know he is tired and his nerves are on edge, and I am prepared to make every possible allowance—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) would be better advised to make his remarks when we come to the orders of the day rather than at the present time, if he should be in order then.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I submit that a question of privilege is in order at any time. As a matter of fact, the rules of the house indicate that the sooner such a question is raised the better. I humbly submit—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for Weyburn is raising a question of privilege he is in order. I did not understand him to be so doing.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, your honour, it is a question of personal privilege.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): He certainly was not discussing a question of privilege when called to order.

Mr. YOUNG: I am prepared to state the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The question, as it appears to me and to everybody with whom I have discussed it since the statement was made by my right hon. friend yesterday, is this: Has the Prime Minister of this country the right or the power to say that a member shall or shall not be heard in this house?

An hon. MEMBER: That is not privilege.

Mr. YOUNG: Anything that I said during the short session was very much to the point.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. YOUNG: I repeat, it was very much to the point.

An hon. MEMBER: What point?

Mr. YOUNG: To the point under discussion. If my right hon. friend or any of his supporters wish to silence the member for Weyburn, all they have to do is demolish his argument;—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. YOUNG: —but if the Prime Minister undertakes to say with respect to any member whether he shall or shall not speak in this house, I submit—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. When the right hon. Prime Minister undertakes to interfere with the privileges of the hon. member for Weyburn or of any other hon. member, it will be time enough to deal with the matter. I would suggest that the hon. member for Weyburn cannot now anticipate anything of the sort.

Mr. YOUNG: He made the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. Prime Minister in referring to the remarks made by the hon. member for Weyburn last session may have expressed his disapproval of those remarks, but until some action is attempted by the Prime Minister or by some other member to interfere with the rights of the hon. member for Weyburn it is idle for him to anticipate such action. The hon. member for Weyburn has all the rights and privileges of a member of this house, and I am sure the Prime Minister would not wish to interfere with them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say a word, Mr. Speaker, on the privilege of the house itself in matters of this kind. The statement I wish to draw to your honour's attention occurred in the course of the speech the right hon. Prime Minister made yesterday. I did not like to interrupt my right hon. friend while he was speaking, but I certainly intended to comment on the uncalled-for reference he made to the hon. member for Weyburn. As reported in Hansard of yesterday, at page 71, the right hon. gentleman said:

> I will say we do not propose to listen to any vaudeville effusions such as we had last session from the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young). An intelligent discussion is one thing; but the discussions that then took place were merely endeavours to wear out the patience of the minister in charge, and I think most of the hon. gentleman's friends held the same view.

I would refer the house to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, section 157, in which there is the following reference from May's Parliamentary Practice (12th edition):

> Interference with or reflections upon members have been resented as indignities to the house itself.

Speaking for the opposition, I wish to say that we regard as an indignity upon the house itself the remarks made by the Prime Minister yesterday in reference to the hon. member for Weyburn, and as such I feel they cannot be too strongly resented. They were reflections upon an hon. gentleman who performed his duties as a member in a most efficient and effective manner during the session referred to. His offence, in the mind of my right hon. friend, was that his duties were performed so efficiently and effectively.

I would also direct attention to section 158, also quoting May:

> In the Commons, on the 12th April, 1733, and on the 1st June, 1780, it was resolved that it was a high infringement of the privilege of the house, a crime and misdemeanor, to assault, insult or menace any member of the house, in his coming or going from the house, or upon the account of his behaviour in parliament.

I ask your honour if the words used yesterday by the Prime Minister were not in the nature of a menacing statement and a threat to an hon. member of this house with respect to his behaviour, which he described as "vaudeville effusions."

Mr. BENNETT: It was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Prime Minister says it was. Then I say he is again offending the dignities of this house in making that statement. May I say further, Mr. Speaker, that the action of the Prime Minister in that particular is the more amazing in view of the great courtesy which was shown him by all hon. members on this side at the last session of parliament.

Mr. C. W. BELL (West Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the right hon. gentleman cannot address your honour as he is doing now unless he states the question of privilege—

Some hon. MEMBERS: He has stated it.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): —that it is not debatable, and that having made his statement he is restricted to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have made my statement. I am speaking on the rules with respect to the dignities of this house and the privileges of hon. members, and my remarks have been very carefully confined to that point. I wish to repeat that the statement made yesterday by the right hon. Prime Minister was the more amazing and astounding in view of the extreme courtesy that was shown him and his colleagues at the special session of parliament. The Prime Minister—

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): Mr. Speaker, I ask for a ruling upon the point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Apparently the right hon. gentleman is stating a question of privilege.

Mr. BELL (Hamilton): I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he is making a speech. I ask for your honour's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: I rule that the right hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, it is evident that some hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied in seeking to coerce this side of the house; they desire as well to coerce your honour.

Mr. BENNETT: That is out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is one thing we are going to watch very carefully during this session, and—

Mr. BENNETT: Keep on watching.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —this arrogant and intolerant manner of my right hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: What a spectacle!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —and the example he is setting his followers in that particular—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: —cannot be persisted in if he hopes to get any business through the house this session.

Mr. BENNETT: Such a spectacle!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I tell my right hon. friend at once that we of the opposition propose to exercise to the full our rights of free discussion, and as long as hon. members do their duty in discussing fully and freely any subject that is before the house they are entitled to the protection of his honour and indeed to the support of all hon. members. The Prime Minister owes it not only to the hon. member for Weyburn but to this house to give an assurance now that his remarks yesterday were not intended to be offensive, were not intended as a threat, and that he is prepared to allow the hon. member the same rights that he expects to have conceded to himself in the discussions of this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question of privilege has been fully stated and, as I said at the outset, the hon. member for Weyburn and every other hon. member will at all times be accorded their proper privileges.

PRIVILEGE—MR. QUINN

Mr. F. P. QUINN (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to draw the attention of the house to an article which appeared in the morning and evening editions of the Ottawa Citizen of March 17. That article reflects upon me and upon my conduct in this house. I will read it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. QUINN: Under the heading of "Claquers" appears the following:

> Mr. Mackenzie King has profound respect for parliamentary institutions. He admonished Premier Bennett yesterday to be more heedful of the advice of ministers and members around him. The level of political intelligence as reflected by noisy interrupters on the government side, however, would amply justify the prime minister's somewhat scant regard for this current form of political democracy. Members like Messrs. Cotnam, Felix Quinn, Eccles Gott and others, normal individuals outside the chamber, seem to labour under the belief that the claquer is an essential part of the machinery of parliament. They should really be furnished with paper caps and penny rattles.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to contradict what is imputed to me in this article. I did not in any way whatever interrupt or interfere with the address of the right hon. gentleman, and through you, sir, I am going to ask the Ottawa Citizen to give my denial as much prominence as it gave this article which I have just read.

Mr. POULIOT: Did the hon. gentleman speak for his colleagues as well.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (Secretary of State) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 4, to amend the Copyright Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. CAHAN: This amendment to the existing Copyright Act is intended to provide, among other sections, one authorizing the governor in council to deposit at Rome ratification on behalf of Canada of the Rome Copyright convention of 1928, which was then signed on behalf of Canada by a representative of the preceding government; to insert certain definitions in the act so as to cover changes necessary for the enforcement of certain provisions of the Rome Copyright convention; to modify section 40 of the existing act with regard to registration, concerning which complaints were made to the previous government as to its not being in strict conformity with the Berne convention, which the Rome convention now modifies; and lastly to provide for the regulation of companies, associations and societies which engage in the business of granting performing rights in respect of works in which copyright subsists. After the second reading of the bill, if it passes second reading, I propose to ask the house to refer it to a special committee to consider its provisions, as the questions involved in copyright are very complex. We have received a great number of representations in regard to it; and it may meet the approval of the house to refer the bill to a special committee for further consideration after second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS ACT

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. MANION: This bill is for the purpose of increasing the number of directors of the Canadian National Railways from fifteen to seventeen, with the object ultimately of giving representation to two of the provinces which at the present time have no representatives on the railway board. There is a second section which is merely intended to correct a technical error in the existing legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

FISH INSPECTION ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. E. N. RHODES (Minister of Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 6, to amend the Fish Inspection Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. RHODES: This bill proposes certain amendments to the existing Fish Inspection Act. Their object is to make more effective the methods of inspection including, in certain cases, compulsory inspection. The bill also provides for the inspection of containers for fish, and their marking as specified by regulation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. ARMAND R. LAVERGNE (Montmagny) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 7, to amend the Criminal Code.

He said: The object of the bill is to amend the Criminal Code in order, first, that the defence shall address the jury after the crown has done so. Up to the present time an accused has had to defend himself before knowing exactly how he would be attacked before the jury. The bill provides, secondly, that the judge presiding at the court should be allowed to comment on law only and not on facts. The third provision is that the assizes in the province of Quebec shall be presided over by judges of the session of appeal instead of judges of the Court of King's Bench.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ARMISTICE DAY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 8, to amend the Armistice Day Act.

He said: The Armistice Day Act, passed in 1921, comprises two sections. It provides that the Armistice day celebration shall be held on the Monday in the week in which November 11 falls. The second section provides that Thanksgiving day shall be held on the same day. The bill I now ask leave to introduce repeals both these sections, substituting for them one section which provides that the celebration of Armistice day shall be held on November 11 in each year and on no other day. It makes no reference to Thanksgiving day and therefore the procedure in regard to that will revert to the practice that prevailed prior to 1921, when by proclamation the government could fix the day at any time they liked. I do not say anything in this bill as to Thanksgiving day, I leave that entirely open; I provide in one section that Armistice day shall be celebrated on November 11 and upon no other day.

Mr. BOURASSA: I am opposed to that.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VANCOUVER—SEYMOUR NARROWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. I. A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) whether he has as yet received a report from the commission investigating the question of the ripple rock at the entrance to the Seymour Narrows in British Columbia, and if so, when he intends to present the same to parliament.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): The report has been received but has not yet been considered by my department.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) advise the house if he has yet received the report from his department as to the route of the Peace River railway?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) was good enough to advise me a couple of days ago that he was going to ask this question and I made inquiry thereon. I have been informed by the officers of the department that all reports which have been received have been already tabled in the house. Those that have been tabled are procurable at the distribution office. I believe the last one tabled was in May, 1929, and referred to branch lines. If my hon. friend has any other report in mind and will advise me I shall be glad to look into it further.

CIVIL SERVICE

CHARGES OF POLITICAL PARTISANSHIP AGAINST OFFICIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) if he is aware that letters are being sent out, at least from one department, the Post Office Department, and possibly from others, to persons in the civil service accusing them of partisanship without giving the name of the accuser or any information with regard to the charge. Members of the civil service are being called upon to make an affidavit proving themselves innocent on pain of dismissal if that affidavit is not made. This practice is contrary to the usual rule and I think the Minister of Justice will be the first to appreciate that a man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. Will the hon. minister consider having these letters recalled in view of their infraction of the rules and regulations which have existed in connection with the civil service?

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice): I do not know of anything which has been done in any department not in accordance with the usual practice in such matters, nor have I any personal knowledge of the letters to which my hon. friend has referred. I shall make inquiry into the matter and if I find that there is anything amiss I shall have no objection to calling the attention of the department to that matter. So far I have heard of nothing which departs from the usual practice in such matters.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—LIMOILOU SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) to the fact that the Canadian National shops at Limoilou were burned yesterday. Owing to the fact that several hundred employees were deported from Rivière du Loup to St. Malo in 1920, do the Canadian National railways intend to send some of the men formerly employed at Limoilou shops to Rivière du Loup?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The point raised by the hon. member is entirely of an administrative character but I shall be very glad to bring his remarks to the attention of the management.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (St. James): Mr. Speaker, the main argument of the Conservative party during the last campaign was that a disastrous situation existed in Canada, that the country was on the verge of ruin and bankruptcy because of the actions of the King government, and that if the Conservative party were put into power that conditions would at once be remedied. Those remarks were thrice fallacious. In the first place the conditions then prevailing were grossly exaggerated to suit the purposes of my hon. friends and to facilitate their election campaign. In the second place no attention was paid to the fact that the crisis was world wide, that Canada was perhaps less involved in it than most other countries, and therefore this situation could not be possibly ascribed to the King government.

My hon. friends opposite should have known that if they were put into power it would not be possible to cure this situation at once, a situation which was not wholly Canadian and which did not result from any governmental action. My hon. friends opposite seem to realize that now; indeed in my humble opinion they never at any time failed to realize it. When they claimed that conditions in Canada should be ascribed to the Liberal party and that they could at once cure all our economic ills they knew very well that they could not do so. At that time they asked for power to do it, now they are asking for time to do it, and they claim that having been in power only eight months it is not fair for us to challenge their record in this regard. I invite the attention of hon. members to the collective efforts made by my right hon. friend and especially by his ministers to dissipate the impression they created during the last election campaign and to do away with the pessimism which to a certain degree they succeeded in spreading throughout Canada. By their pronouncements and official declarations since the election they have tried to avoid the effects of the false impression which they created during the campaign.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) yesterday resented the reference to his government as a one-man government, and claimed that he has the cooperation of his colleagues. Well, in his efforts to dissipate the wrong impression which he himself created by his campaign speeches he has had the cooperation at least of some of his colleagues, because quite a number of them have endeavoured to show the country that after all the conditions existing in Canada are not as bad as they claimed they were prior to July 28, 1930. It would require the putting on Hansard of a whole scrap book if I were to endeavour to give the house all the quotations from the different speeches which relate to this endeavour, but perhaps I may be permitted to give a few quotations from some of the official declarations of the present government.

About a month after the elections, on August 22 to be exact, the press of this country published a report which emanated from the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) and I do not think there will be any objection if I read one paragraph of this official document which is in vivid contrast with the statements made by the Conservative party during the election. I quote one paragraph from the Montreal Gazette giving the text of the report of the Minister of Labour, as follows:

> I do not for one moment suggest that the present unemployment is due to any governmental or lack of governmental activity. Unemployment is not a purely Canadian problem. It is world-wide. But it is not the business of the government of Canada to look after the world as a whole. It seems to me the problem first to be faced is for the government to look after the people of Canada and assist them to look after themselves.

This is a very fair statement; the only fault I find with it is that it came a month too late. It should have been presented to the Canadian people not after, but before they had an opportunity to vote.

The next official declaration that I should like to place upon Hansard is one that was given to the country on Thanksgiving Day —which happened to be the eleventh of November, may I say to the hon. gentleman beside me (Mr. Neill)—by the then Acting Prime Minister of Canada (Sir George Perley) who said—and this was on official declaration, mark you!—

> The world has been passing through a period of serious economic and political disturbance. Canada has not escaped its share of the difficulties of readjustment. Many of our fellow-citizens are still suffering hardship and uncertainty. The testing time, however, has only served to prove the strength and solidity of the Canadian economic structure, and the determination and mutual helpfulness of our people. Few countries have been as fortunate.

Imagine the Acting Prime Minister of this country thanking the Almighty that this country was not such as his friends had depicted it to the electorate! I have to pass over many such quotations to come to a declaration which was made by the Prime Minister when he returned from England and which had much the same flavour. This is what the Prime Minister gave to the Montreal Standard on the 14th day of December, 1930:

> I can only repeat to you what I said before, and I hope to make another statement soon. Our difficulties are the lesser ones. They are those of a younger country, and incidental to its development. Nevertheless, they can be mastered only by coordinated effort which must be based upon a true realization of the causes from which the ills have arisen.

I could quote another declaration made by by the same right hon. gentleman on the first day of January, 1931, to a similar effect, namely that while this country has reached a certain state of depression, that while it has suffered somewhat from the reflex action, may I say, of the world crisis, at least we can congratulate ourselves that, as the Prime Minister puts it, our difficulties are the lesser ones, and if we compare Canada with other countries we find ourselves indeed in a very felicitous position. But another statement which is perhaps even more to the point was given by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) to the Annual Financial Review of the Montreal Gazette which is published in the early days of each year. I read there the following under the signature of the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

> While the Dominion has been less affected than most other countries, as is evidenced by the comparative position of our securities on the money markets of London and New York—

But which was very little evidenced by the campaign speeches of the Conservative party.

> —yet the country has undoubtedly suffered severely from the repercussions of the world situation. The immediate cause of the depression has been a great and disproportionate decline in wholesale prices throughout the world, affecting more particularly the food products and raw materials which we supply in large quantities to other countries.

I could go on for a long time quoting speeches and official declarations to that effect, showing that at last my hon. friends opposite have a certain sense of repentance and that now when they look upon the ill effects of their own campaigns, they are anxious to try to minimize, ameliorate and dissipate as much as they can the effects of their pronouncements of June and July last.

Even in the speech from the throne we have declarations similar to the ones I have just read, coming from the lips of His Excellency the Administrator, but as everyone knows, really emanating from the government. Possibly some hon. gentlemen may think I stress the point too strongly, but really all these declarations are to the effect—it was hard to prove it to the people during the last campaign—not only that the King government was not responsible for the conditions existing in Canada in June and July last, but that if we want to be just to that government we should give them credit for the fact that in this world-wide crisis Canada was one of the countries less affected, one of the countries able to come through the crisis much better than most of the other countries of the world.

I do not believe in harping too long on what took place some time ago—the election is lost and we must make the best of it—but the point that particularly interests me now is the promise made by hon. gentlemen opposite that they would cure the situation and cure it at once. What do we hear from the Prime Minister himself? What do we hear from every one of the ministers, these great statesmen, these great economists, these marvelous doctors and magicians who were going to spread happiness over the whole of Canada? Has butter sold at sixty cents since they were elected? Have eggs sold at higher prices so that everyone wants to raise them in this country? My hon. friends wanted power. They said: Give us time; we have been in power only six months; we have been in power only eight months. How much more time do my hon. friends want? How long will it take for them to make good their promises to the electors? Will it be six months more? Will it be a year more? Will it be four years more? They do not know; we do not know, and unfortunately the poor electorate does not know either, but the people are just waiting, selling their butter at a cheaper price than it ever sold at before, selling their eggs for less than they ever before obtained for them, and generally enduring conditions that have not been improved, but that in many parts of the country are worse than they were previously. I suppose after two or three years have passed, in the ordinary trend of events and the normal evolution of business conditions throughout the world this country, notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friends are in power, will again reach the point it had attained two or three years ago, and then my hon. friends will say: We have done it; give us credit for it; we have cured the evil, not at once, but it cured itself without our aid. Give us credit for it. We have at last redeemed our election promises.

My hon. friends opposite are prone to say that they made good their promise to convene a special emergency session during the month of September last. The convening of that special session would be what I would call, Mr. Speaker, redeeming the letter of their promise. As a matter of fact, I fully share the stand taken by my hon. leader that it was quite unnecessary to have a special emergency session merely for the purpose of voting a certain amount of money. In the situation that existed at that time, and after the campaign that had been waged throughout the country, the government would certainly have been fully justified in securing money, not by convening the members of this house from every part of the country, but merely by a governor general's warrant. The reason for the special emergency session, as I have said, was in the first place to redeem the letter of the promise of the government; and in the second place, as I shall try to show later, its purpose was to put through certain tariff resolutions which had nothing to do with the unemployment situation, but which had much to do with the desires of the Prime Minister.

After voting $20,000,000 last September and following the session, a conference took place between the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) and certain provincial ministers, and we are told that the cooperation of a number of the provincial governments was secured to start a certain number of public works.

I am quite willing to believe that, but so far as the city of Montreal, from which I come, is concerned, most of the government works that are now going on are works which not merely had nothing to do with the voting of the $20,000,000 at the special session but were works decided upon and for which money was voted by the King government in the previous session of 1930. By bill, Mr. Speaker, this house had voted the sum of $50,000,000 in the previous session for the building of terminal and railway facilities for the Canadian National Railways in the city of Montreal. That is a sum more than twice the amount which this government asked parliament to vote during the special session last September for the whole Dominion of Canada. Not only is this work for which the King government provided being carried on in the city of Montreal, furnishing employment to a great number of persons, but I wish to state to the house that it is going on notwithstanding the active opposition of Conservative forces in Montreal who have done everything in their power to prevent that work from being carried out.

The King government voted $5,000,000 for the harbour of Montreal, and a large proportion of that sum was available to perform work in the harbour of Montreal. In the month of January you could read in almost every paper in the city of Montreal, letters inquiring why certain work involving the expenditure of $1,500,000 at the Windmill Point wharf was not being done by this government or by the harbour commission. That was another instance, Mr. Speaker, of money that had been voted by the King government not being actually spent in the city of Montreal. For certain reasons unknown to me, but certainly known to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) either the harbour commission or the government delayed that work which should have gone on and been paid for out of moneys voted by the Liberal government, moneys voted in the regular course of events previous to the emergency session.

What about the tunnel under the Lachine canal? That is another work in the city of Montreal that is being credited to the unemployment program of the special session. But who is there in this house from the city of Montreal that does not know that this work has been in contemplation for a long time, and had actually been promised by the Hon. Mr. Dunning and the Hon. Mr. Crerar. I want to qualify that: It was not only promised but it was understood that the money would be available just as soon as the city authorities of Montreal would be in a position to commence the work.

Such are the works, Mr. Speaker, that are being performed, or delayed, in the city of Montreal, and for which credit is claimed by the Conservative party as a part of their program for unemployment relief. As far as we are concerned, I say that if there had been no change of government in July last, and no emergency session, not only would these moneys have been expended in the city of Montreal, but they would have been expended without the undue delay that a change of government brought about in this country.

But the real purpose of the special session, Mr. Speaker, was not to vote money which could have been appropriated in some other way, but to effect changes in the tariff. Hon. members will remember the tariff resolutions, covering 20 pages of Hansard, brought down at the special emergency session, and upon which we were asked to pass judgment without having had opportunity to give the slighest consideration to the individual tariff items. My point is that these changes in the tariff should not have been made for many reasons. I claim that the government itself had not had time properly to consider the changes it proposed, and that such changes were proposed upon inadequate information.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister after being returned to power, abolished the tariff board. That was a body which had been established for the purpose of gathering information on tariff matters, and to help the government in framing its tariff policy. I regret very much that my right hon. friend should have chosen to abolish that tariff board, but I regret even more that having abolished it, the Prime Minister went ahead as if all the time he was being supplied with adequate information upon which to base the changes in the tariff which he proposed at the special session. True, and this is very interesting, I must give the Prime Minister credit for having tried in a certain way to revive some kind of a tariff commission by having certain members of the cabinet sit in a ring to gather information from the general public on particular tariff matters. May I be permitted to put on record an account of the way in which that committee of cabinet ministers proceeded in a certain instance, as it shows the intense desire they evinced to gather information on fiscal matters?

I was in Ottawa on the 16th of February, and this report of that first tariff meeting of cabinet ministers is dated Ottawa, February 17. I am quoting from a report in the Montreal Gazette. A tariff meeting of that special committee of cabinet ministers on fiscal matters had been scheduled for February 16, but there was some misunderstanding as to the time the committee should sit. Certain people thought the hour was 10 o'clock, and others thought it was 11. What happened? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), I believe, proceeded to some room in the House of Commons, and sat there for about one minute, and when they found that nobody had arrived, they decided to adjourn the meeting sine die; and that concluded the hearing so far as that meeting was concerned. If that is an example, Mr. Speaker, of the high-handed discipline that my right hon. friend wants to institute in the public affairs of this country, it may perhaps be somewhat commended; but as an example of gathering information on fiscal matters, it certainly was not very encouraging. But there is more. When the Prime Minister adjourned that meeting, even his own ministers had not arrived. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will not believe that. Let me quote from the Montreal Gazette. It says:

> Ministers who arrived too late for the sitting were: Hon. T. G. Murphy, Minister of the Interior, Hon. Alfred Duranleau, Minister of Marine, and Hon. Arthur Sauve, Postmaster General. Even officials of the National Revenue department, including Robert W. Breadner, commissioner of customs, were uncertain as to the hour of opening and came on the assumption that the hearing would commence at eleven o'clock.

And the meeting was adjourned, Mr. Speaker, at exactly 10.31, by the Prime Minister of Canada. If you admit at all the principle of cabinet solidarity, you must come to the conclusion that the Prime Minister adjourned the meeting before he had actually arrived as a government. The eminent economist who now presides over the destinies of this country is willing to establish contacts with the common people and gather information upon which to base his fiscal policy. No wonder he made such a terrible blunder when he dealt with the glass items in the schedules. I am not sure I will have time to go fully into that matter but may I say briefly that the increases in the glass items were something tremendous. We were importing glass from Belgium bearing an ad valorem duty of 12½ per cent. After securing certain information this government decided that the importation of glass should be stopped and it placed thereon a duty of so much per pound. I learned from people in Montreal who were interested in the glass business that a duty of 26 cents on an article valued at $2.30, or about 12½ per cent, would have amounted to something like $3, $3.50 or $4 under the revised schedule. The Prime Minister stated that from the information gathered from all corners of Canada, in his opinion, the price did not matter because we in Canada were going to produce glass. His view was that it did not matter what the duty would be because no more glass would have to be imported. I take as an example the position of one of the hon. members of this house, Mr. Bell (Hamilton), who stated that the measure would protect the industry in his constituency. The language used by the hon. gentleman was similar to that we heard throughout the session. He said he had investigated the position with extreme care and in his opinion within ten days from the time he was speaking there would be an increase from 150 to 500 in the number of men working in a certain plant.

Mr. VENIOT: He is still looking for the plant.

Mr. RINFRET: What was the result? The price of glass increased immediately and tremendously. Not only did it increase on the imported product but also on glass which had been stored throughout the country. The increase was of such an extreme nature that my hon. friend, the genial Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), at once made use of his discretionary powers and inserted in that wonderful schedule the necessary corrective measure. He did away with that item. There was no more question of opening a plant and employing so many hundred men; in at least one instance he recognized the government had been very hasty in its action and that the schedules had to be reconsidered. As a conclusion to the whole matter there was an editorial in the old Conservative newspaper, the Gazette, reviewing the whole matter under the very suggestive title, "A tragedy of errors."

We had another reason for resentment in the fact that the schedules were hurried through. Not only was this schedule put on the table in a state of unpreparedness but we were given no opportunity to discuss it. We were told very abruptly by the Prime Minister that we must either accept these items at once and put them through as they then existed or he would not go to the London conference. At the time we thought Canada should be represented at the conference. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that if we could have foreseen the policy which was to be propounded by the right hon. gentleman, the manner in which he would present it and the way in which he would be received, I am not so sure but that it would have been good business to keep him here a little longer. Time passes however and I am only too happy to avail myself the most admirable description of the Imperial conference which was given Monday last by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). The speech of my right hon. leader has shown not only why the blasting process of the Prime Minister failed so lamentably but also how the whole procedure of the right hon. gentleman was doomed to utter failure. The Prime Minister has said that he did nothing more than was done in 1902 by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. If he meant in a general way that at different times in the history of this country Canadian governments had sought preferences in the British market I will not deny his statement. I hope he does not intend however to parallel his action with the suave, diplomatic, mellow tone adopted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I hope he will not compare the blunt, aggressive and as he himself has called it, "brutal" way he addressed the Imperial conference with the manner adopted by the former leader of the Liberal party. It does not matter however whether his attitude was similar to that taken about thirty years ago when conditions were totally different, or whether he thought it best to present his case in that way or in some other way. The bare fact remains that he went to London in an effort to find a market for our wheat and he came back empty handed. That fact cannot be denied, Mr. Speaker. To quote a parallel incident which occurred thirty years ago does not in the least help the west to sell one bushel of wheat in the English market to-day. In my estimation the difficulty with my right hon. friend is that he puts too much faith in the policy of protection and in his own blunt way of presenting it. I think we must all admit that the problems facing the world to-day are over-production and under-marketing. The world has been producing too much and has not been able to get a wide enough distribution for that product. That is the problem, Mr. Speaker, but that was not the problem in the year 1902. We must face the problem of 1931. The great need is not so much to increase home production as to dispose of our surplus products in the markets of the world. My hon. friends talk about a policy of high protection but when they propose to grant a preference to some one it means they are further protecting someone else. That is their idea of a proper fiscal policy for Canada, and they call it the Canada-first policy. We know that the Conservative party has always claimed a monopoly of patriotism. It was a great Conservative leader who said once, "A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die," as if he was the only person to whom these things were likely to happen. That hon. gentleman propounded a tariff policy and was pleased to call it a national policy insinuating that any other procedure in fiscal matters would be anti-national just because it did not happen to be the policy with which he agreed. We had a similar situation in 1911. At that time I was not very old but I have not forgotten the discussions which were reported in the Montreal Star during the reciprocity campaign. We remember reading the words "Under which flag will you live?" Who is going to contend seriously that if Sir Wilfrid Laurier had won the election of 1911 we would not still be living under the British flag? The same applies to the present situation. My right hon. friend has been pleased to call his policy the Canada-first policy. But who will deny that any statesman in this country has not primarily the interests of Canada at heart? This is not a matter of pronouncement, it is a matter of performance and the means to be employed. For myself I do not believe that a policy of high protection is a good Canada-first policy. I do not believe in placing Canada behind high and impenetrable tariff walls, expecting to sell to all the countries of the world and refusing to buy from any. That is not a Canada-first policy. That is a policy of Canada alone, Canada ignoring the rest of the world, Canada isolated from all the markets of the world. We too want a Canada-first policy, but we do not want to isolate our country behind the high walls of protection. We want Canada to face the world in all confidence, relying on her vast natural resources and the good will and resourcefulness of her people. In a word, we want Canada to trade with other countries, to sell her products to them in exchange for their products. I repeat, we too want a Canada-first policy—a policy that will place our porducts in all the markets of the world.

Mr. F. W. TURNBULL (Regina): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to join those hon. members who have already spoken in their congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) upon the able manner in which they acquitted themselves. May I also extend my congratulations to you, sir, and to the house on Your Honour's recovery from your recent indisposition, a recovery which makes it possible for us during this session to sit under your presidency. And may I also congratulate the member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) who during the recess had conferred upon him the distinguished honour of the presidency of the United Farmers of Alberta.

I should like further to congratulate the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the recovery of his belief in the principle of unity. And might I congratulate also the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), who by reason of the kindness of the recent government to his constituency was able to get along without a special session of parliament. I may remark that if his constituency and Montreal generally were so well taken care of with millions of dollars, there were other parts of the country that were not quite so well served, but it may be a subject for congratulation, for had it not been for those extensive votes on the eve of the general election we might not have had the privilege of listening to his delightful speech this afternoon.

I am glad the Liberal party is returning to the principle of unity and harmony. They never ran an election in western Canada, at least within the last twenty years, without the most bitter appeals to sectionalism. Elections in western Canada have been fought by my hon. friends opposite on the basis of telling our foreign-born citizens that if the Conservatives should be elected to office in the federal or in the provincial field their churches would be burned down, their school houses closed, their homesteads taken away from them, and they themselves deported to the land from which they came. They also resorted to the tactics of frightening the foreign-born element by stories of Egyptian and Turkish wars should the Conservatives be returned to power. To these possible wars they have now added the danger of a war with England. Well, there is at least one feature about that war if it ever materializes—and my right hon. friend from Prince Albert does not think it will—they will not be able to accuse us of lending our Canadian forces to aid Great Britain.

Yesterday we heard from the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) what I might call a confession of repentance by the Hon. Mr. Gardiner, the Liberal leader in the province of Saskatchewan. That statement was delivered at Portage la Prairie, shortly after Mr. Gardiner became premier of the province. But I fear that soon after he must have been disciplined by his leader in Ottawa, because he very speedily abandoned that profession, and in the fall of 1926 we find that the right hon. member for Prince Albert, instead of trying to promote unity and harmony in this country, was trying to build up a bloc, preaching the doctrine of a solid Saskatchewan and a solid Quebec to govern Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: It cannot be done, and you know it.

Mr. TURNBULL: You know it.

Mr. VALLANCE: Sixty-five and twenty-one—that is eighty-six out of two hundred and forty five.

Mr. TURNBULL: I am prepared to take care of all helpful interruptions even during my forty minutes, but I commend some hon. gentlemen opposite to the attention of the Ottawa Citizen. Now I wish to quote from the Saskatoon Daily Star of August 9, 1926, a paper supporting my hon. friends opposite. It reported the then Prime Minister of Canada, now the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition, as follows:

> When Quebec and Saskatchewan get together at a common table stating their points of view and coming to a common decision, we have the keynote to unity and success.

One of the bright features of the last election, apart from the replacement of a government of vacillation by a government of action, was the fact that the solid blocs, gained by misrepresentation as I have described, were broken up, and Saskatchewan and Quebec are now sitting together at the council table, not alone but in common with the other provinces of Canada. It is only by decisions arrived at under such conditions that the unity and harmony we all desire can be achieved.

To satisfy this house that Mr. Gardiner's action must have received the disapproval of his leader in Ottawa, I find that he did not follow along the lines of his confession of repentance very long. During the last session of the Saskatchewan legislature we had him making declarations in favour of the so-called sessionists. Let me quote from the Regina Leader-Post of January 13, 1931, which reports Mr. Gardiner as follows:

> We have more in common with our natural customers in Britain than with this group of bloated plutocrats in Toronto and Montreal who fatten on our labour, declared the Liberal chieftain. I am far more concerned with keeping the empire together than in the relation between Regina and Montreal.

That is how our friends in Saskatchewan uphold the doctrines of unity that are preached so eloquently in the halls of Ottawa.

Let me say that there is no substantial secessionist movement in western Canada, and the people there, when they read the press, will resent the suggestion from the leader of the Liberal party in this house that the west is secessionist or that the people in the west are.

Some hon. MEMBERS: He never said so.

Mr. TURNBULL: If my hon. friends will turn to page 25 of Hansard they will find the words.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will the hon. member state what the leader of the opposition said?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Read page 25 of Hansard.

Mr. TURNBULL: He said this:

> If western Canada feels the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite are not suited to the needs of western Canada, then it is not for the people of western Canada to talk about secession or anything of that kind.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: Go on.

Mr. TURNBULL: The only talk of secession in western Canada arose from a meeting of six gentlemen in the town of Wilkie in the constituency of my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance).

Mr. VALLANCE: And it is not correct.

Mr. TURNBULL: And the only person who knows about secession in western Canada is the hon. gentleman who represents that constituency. With regard to the Imperial conference I have very little to say. For the first time within my recollection, in the history of imperial conferences, and I speak subject to correction, there were taken to that gathering representatives of the grain marketing interests of Canada, including representatives of the farming interests and western economists, in the persons of Mr. John I. McFarland, a retired grain merchant, Dr. D. A. MacGibbon, vice-chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners, Dr. W. W. Swanson, head of the department of Economics of the university of Saskatchewan, and Mr. A. J. McPhail, president of the central selling agency of the Canadian wheat pool. There was at least an attempt on the part of those who represented Canada at that conference to solve the wheat marketing problem of western Canada, and until that conference is closed no one has any right to say that these wheat marketing problems will not be solved.

So far as the conduct of the Prime Minister at that conference is concerned, and so far as his proposals go, I can only say that they had the approval of the financial interests of Great Britain. They were accepted by the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, and they had the support of all the other dominion premiers at the conference, the only exception being the Prime Minister of the motherland. And they had the support of these professors and economists who went with the Prime Minister from Ottawa.

I have here a statement made in Toronto by Professor Swanson, reported under date of November 28, 1930. He is not a follower of the Conservative party, but he is reported to have said:

> Dr. Swanson declared himself a born free trader, but nevertheless he was actively in favour of Premier Bennett's preference offer. In supporting it in London, he declared: "I conceived that I was doing more service to the ideal world freedom of trade than I could have accomplished in any other manner—I felt I was assisting at the mobilization of the greatest army in history for the penetration of unjust trade barriers raised by foreign powers."

And this out and out free trader added:

> The Imperial conference was an outstanding personal success for the Prime Minister of Canada.

For my part I would rather accept the opinion of Doctor Swanson than anything I have heard here since the opening of the session. But let us discuss Canada, because it is in the present condition of Canada that we are interested. I have listened, during the few days the house has been in session, for some suggestion from hon. gentlemen opposite as to what cure could be put into effect for the known economic ills of the country and I have heard no broad statement of economic policy. There has come no ray of hope from Liberal ranks, but merely criticism and sniping. I have heard an attempted description of Conservative policies, and having listened to them I have only this to say, that if my hon. friends across the aisle were no more successful in describing their own policies to the electors of Canada than they have been in describing Conservative policies to this house, I do not wonder that they sit to the left of Mr. Speaker.

There is no doubt that conditions in western Canada are not as good as they might be, but it is also true that they are not as bad as they might be either; and they are far from being as bad as my hon. friends have been painting them. Western Canada is not whining about blue ruin or talking in desperation. Western Canada is not starving. But western Canada to-day realizes that it is up against an economic struggle and its people, with their backs to the wall, are digging in and making the best of the situation. Things are not so bad in the west as you might expect them. They are bad in spots it is true, because there are areas in southern Saskatchewan where there were crop failures in two successive years, where the farmers had not a bushel of grain and had no feed for their cattle. These conditions are beyond the control of any government; they were beyond the control of the government of my hon. friend. But no guaranteed price of wheat would be of advantage to people who had no wheat, and this constituted a large part of our trouble in Saskatchewan. After all, the question is not exactly what are conditions in western Canada but, to some extent, whose responsibility is it that conditions in the west are as they are. And, after that, the question is, what steps shall be taken to remedy these conditions. Personally, as representative of the capital city of Saskatchewan, I am listening anxiously for any word from any side of the house that will point a ray of hope and progress to this Dominion, and I have heard nothing at all from my friends across the way except the suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) that we should have a depreciated currency in this country.

What has happened to our markets in western Canada, and under whose dominion have these things occurred? I have in my hand a table showing what happened to the exports between 1920 and 1929. There was a decrease in exports of mutton and lamb of 340 per cent; in butter, of 240 per cent; in eggs, of 140 per cent; in sheep and lambs, of 90 per cent; in hog products, of 80 per cent; in dressed beef, of 61 per cent; in live cattle, of 52 per cent, and in cheese, of 12 per cent. And the fact that we have had a decrease of over 100 per cent in certain items—

An hon. MEMBER: How could there be?

Mr. TURNBULL:—is explained by the circumstances that we went off an export basis and heavily on to an import basis.

Mr. RALSTON: Now for production.

Mr. TURNBULL: That net result of the reduction in these items was an unfavourable balance against us of $257,000,000 a year; and, as my hon. friends say, markets once lost are a little bit difficult to regain. Now it was between 1920 and 1929, under nine years of Liberal rule, that these markets for farm products were lost. We lost our markets for wheat. We had a declining price for wheat. But the price of wheat did not start to drop on the 28th of July; it dropped twice as much in the preceding year as it has done since. However, the price of wheat started to drop as a result of a gradually increasing piling-up of surpluses not only in Canada but in other wheat producing countries in the world. While these wheat surpluses were piling up, the Department of Trade and Commerce, which should have been interesting itself in our markets, was not paying any attention to what was happening to the farmers of Canada. Other countries of the world were alive to this situation, and back in 1927 a conference was called in Rome by Benito Mussolini as a result of which the vineyards in Italy were torn up and planted with wheat, and what Mr. Mussolini called the battle of wheat began. It extended into France and Germany, and while we had a trade treaty with France this department stood supinely by and allowed France to shut our wheat completely out of their markets. The same thing took place in Germany and other European countries. During nine years of Liberal rule fifty-three trade treaties were entered into, but not one sold a single bushel of wheat. The Liberal party told the farmers of western Canada how interested they were in their problems and how much the Conservative party was the friend of the big interests. That "farmer against big interests" cry has been part of the history of western Canada for many years. The Department of Trade and Commerce allowed our markets one by one to slip from our grasp.

What has this department done? On March 14, 1929, the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) said:

The Department of Trade and Commerce is not exercised over the sale of such commodities as wheat, because those commodities find their own markets; but we are interested in assisting the sale of manufactured products.

That statement is made by a member of a party who tell us that the Conservatives are the friends of the manufacturers and big interests while the Liberals are the friends of the poor down-trodden farmer. The hon. member went on to say, as appears on page 948 of Hansard of last year:

Without unduly flattering the officers of my department, I believe we have representing the Dominion throughout the world as intelligent and aggressive a group of trade commissioners as any country could wish to possess.

It was not the fault of his personnel that these markets disappeared. Speaking on the New Zealand trade treaty, he says at page 946:

Do we want to get $15,000,000 worth of manufactured goods into New Zealand? If we do want to trade with New Zealand there is only one thing that New Zealand can sell us.

Those are the people who claimed to be the friends of the farmer, but how did they take care of them? On page 944 of Hansard the hon. member is reported as saying:

Providence provides opportunities for an industrious man to profit by the bounties provided.

Trade treaties were made for the betterment of the manufacturers and Canadian markets were given over to the farm products of other countries, while Providence took care of the poor farmer.

In the campaign literature used during the last elections in Saskatchewan it was stated that we had lost all our markets for wheat with the exception of one, the market in Great Britain, and that if the Dunning budget did not succeed in selling our wheat in that country then all was lost. That was the only remedy that the Liberal party could provide for our ills, and if that failed they were unable to provide anything else. The people of western Canada said that they would not take a chance on a party which had only one remedy left.

I have in my hand the Dominion report on the grain trade of Canada for the crop year ending July 31, 1926, wherein is listed the names and places to which we shipped grain. On page 146 appears a table showing the exports of Canadian wheat and wheat flour from United States Atlantic seaboard ports, by countries of destination, during the crop year ended July, 1926, and this table shows that we shipped from United States seaboard ports to forty-six different countries in the world. If the campaign literature of the Liberal party told the truth, then within five years we have lost forty-five markets for our wheat. That is a wonderful record for any government which professes to be interested in the farmer. We made fifty-three trade treaties in nine years and lost forty-five markets in five years. Of course the statement that we had only one market left was exaggerated, as was most of the campaign literature; we had more markets than that. Canada's position to-day is not due to the lack of intelligence on the part of the trade commissioners but rather that their attention was directed towards manufactured goods. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not know what the situation was, because he is reported in the Regina Leader-Post of July 19, 1930, as follows:

Canada, in her effort to develop trade, had made certain treaties. "When the treaty was entered into with New Zealand, there was about as much thought of butter coming from New Zealand as there is of grain coming from Great Britain," Mr. King asserted.

The Department of Trade and Commerce negotiated a treaty which resulted in 50,000,000 pounds of butter coming into this country within one year, as well as considerable quantities in other years, without considering the posibility that that butter would come into this country.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Will the hon. member tell the house when the agreement to which he has referred was entered into with New Zealand, or whether there is such an agreement?

An hon. MEMBER: An order in council.

Mr. TURNBULL: By order in council of December, 1925, the advantages of the Australian treaty were extended to New Zealand, which is another instance of the Liberal lack of intelligence as to trade conditions.

No one regrets more than I do that conditions are not as they should be in western Canada, but these conditions did not arise from anything which has happened since July 28, 1930; they are the result of an economic policy which has existed for years. What would you think of a man who started a loaded toboggan down a hill and then blamed the fellow who came upon the scene when the toboggan had almost reached the bottom because he could not stop it before he hit the bottom? That is exactly the position of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the decrease in the price of our products.

The west is turning to the production of butter and dairy products. The production for January and February of 1931 has increased by 80 per cent over the production for January and February of 1930. I agree with hon. gentlemen that the price of butter is not what it should be, but they must remember that there is a considerable amount of New Zealand butter still in storage. This butter came in before the order in council was revoked on October 12. The suggestion has been offered that the people of western Canada should go into mixed farming, but I believe that to do that on a large scale would be disastrous until such time as markets for our products can be developed, which must be done by orderly marketing in the consuming countries of the world. We are not getting our fair share of the markets, and we must have a steady supply of quality goods to offer. When that happens, then mixed farming in western Canada will follow.

I think there should be some decrease in the western domestic freight rate. If the domestic rate to the coast on wheat and wheat products were reduced to somewhere near the export rate it would provide an outlet for considerable feed from the province of Alberta and that would be of inestimable benefit to the farmers of the Fraser River valley and to the poultry raisers of Vancouver and other parts of British Columbia. Some of those things might be done. We might get out and try to sell our wheat on quality for a little while instead of letting it find its own market. We have experiments conducted in Winnipeg to show the difference between a loaf made with European flour and a loaf made with Canadian flour, with varying quantities of Canadian flour in the mix. An expression of the difference between those loaves would, I think, go a long way towards bringing back to Canada the place it once had in the markets of the world, because no other wheat has the same qualities for bread-making as Canadian wheat has. We have a quality product; let us sell on quality, working back into our markets by negotiation and business merchandising.

I hope the Hudson Bay railway will assist us in the export of live stock, and I trust with respect to wheat we shall take advantage of the grain congress which is to be held in Regina in 1932 to invite the international experts of the world to meet us there and discuss the wheat marketing situation of the world.

An hon. MEMBER: Including Russia.

Mr. TURNBULL: If we can get Russia to carry out her agreement, yes.

This is no time for talking about party politics in particular or for talking about desperate situations or for getting into any panic. Canada is one of the finest countries in the world. It is true it has been bedeviled for nine years by a government that paid little or no attention to its needs, being more devoted to stirring up sectional jealousies in their desire to gain power than endeavouring to attain their objective by a business presentation of the facts. We have in this country huge supplies of raw products, depleted to some extent, it is true, by a wasteful method of handling them. We have abundant and cheap water power, also allowed, in places, to be over-capitalized. We have transportation facilities by land and water unequalled by any other country in the world. We have abundant supplies of capital. Canadian money to the amount of $2,000,000,000 is invested abroad because the people who had it placed more confidence in the governments of foreign countries than they did in the government of Canada. We have an industrious and intelligent population. We have all that to draw upon, and with a government of action in power, a government that the people can trust, the future is one of hope. If we do our part in trying to guide Canada along business lines, Canada will again take her place as the most prosperous nation of the world and her people will have reaped a reward of welfare and prosperity that should have been theirs during the nine years that have gone by.

One of the most impressive features of campaign literature that I had during the last election was a booklet entitled From Gloom and Depression to Unparalleled Prosperity, and all you had to do was to take the book up, read the title page, tell the people who the authors of it were and ask them if they felt the unparalleled prosperity that this book so glowingly depicted. There has been a change in Canada; there is a feeling of prosperity coming over the people. I want to congratulate my friends of the manufacturing interests—and when I say my friends of the manufacturing interests, I mean the labourers who work in those factories—who have obtained employment as a result of what we did at the last session of parliament. We in western Canada are big and broad enough to extend to those labourers our congratulations that they have been able to find work. We expect in return that we shall have the sympathy and assistance of our friends in eastern Canada in an attempt to improve conditions in western Canada; and when the east pulls with the west instead of being divided against the west, when we have cooperation between the manufacturer and the farmer instead of the dissension that has been too much preached in this country, then we shall solve the difficulties of this Canada of ours and place her once again on the pedestal where she belongs.

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate so far, and the gesture of the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous) to the French Canadian people of Canada in foregoing his right to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as he had been asked to do in favour of the member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier) is something that will commend itself to every fair-minded citizen of this country. I was wondering—and I make this statement in view of the remarks to which I have just listened from the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) in connection with sectional appeals—what the Conservative representatives from Saskatchewan think of that gesture. One of the appeals, and the strongest appeal, made to the voters of Saskatchewan in the last three or four years by both the Conservative party and the Conservative press, was that under Liberal administration there was French domination in Canada. Of course there was nothing to it. Thanks to wise administration in the past, the two races, the Anglo-Saxon and the French, have lived side by side in perfect peace and harmony. The monument in Quebec to Wolfe and Montcalm, the victor and the vanquished, the conqueror and the conquered, is the best evidence of unity to be found in any country in the world. The major credit for that is due to that grand old French Canadian who, for over thirty years, led the Liberal party in this country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's faith in Canada and in British institutions is nowhere better expressed than in his address delivered during the celebration of three hundred years of French life in Canada. This is what he said:

> As I advance in years I appreciate the more the wisdom of that British Constitution under which I was born and brought up, and under which I have grown old, which has given to the various positions of the empire their separate free governments. It is our proud boast that Canada is the freest country in the world. It is our proud boast that in this country liberty of all kinds—civil and religious liberty—flourish to the highest degree.

The hon. member for North Grey is therefore to be complimented on his recognition of the rights of the French people in this country. What about his colleagues from the province of Saskatchewan? The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) has introduced this matter, and he will pardon me if I follow him. One of the cries raised by the Conservative party and the Conservative press in western Canada, as I said before, has been French domination of Canada under Liberal government. I have in my hand a news item that appeared in the Orange Sentinel, and I do not think the hon. member for Regina will dispute it. It reads:

> Strongly protest bilingual stamps. Regina brethren call on M.P.'s to raise matter at Ottawa.
> The new bilingual special delivery postage stamp issued by Hon. Arthur Sauve, Postmaster-General in the Bennett government, came to the front as an issue at the annual dinner of Sam Hughes Orange lodge in the Champlain hotel here on October 30.
> The attack was launched in the course of a speech by R.W. Bro. R. J. Gibson, Saskatchewan, Past Grand Master, who called upon F. W. Turnbull, M.P. for Regina, and Dr. W. D. Cowan, M.P. for Long Lake, who were sitting at the head table, to fight the bilingual stamp policy of the new government, and to stand true to the principles "for which we believe they have been standing."

Mr. GOTT: What paper is that from?

Mr. McPHEE: The Orange Sentinel. I have here also the editorial page of the Regina Star, a Conservative paper in Saskatchewan, which in its issue of November 1, 1930, just a little more than four months ago, dealing with the issue of bilingual stamps and the publication of government pamphlets in French, says:

> There is not a tittle of authorization of the French language for postal forms, postage and revenue stamps, radio applications, government reports and departmental forms. These are all without legal authorization. It is an abuse of the processes of thought and an insult to the intelligence of the English-speaking people of Canada, for Hon. Mr. Veniot to suggest that his illegal bilingual issue of stamps, and his other various efforts to force the French language illegally down the throats of the non-French people of Canada will "tend to bind more closely together the two races."

Then listen to this:

> The mandate which Premier Bennett got from the west was for the cessation of these unconstitutional and offensive efforts at bilingual propaganda through the machinery of the federal government, equally with his mandate on the economic issue. On this matter of bilingualism the people of the west expect to see their wishes respected.

Now will my hon. friend say that it is the Liberal party that makes sectional appeals? What has my hon. friend from Regina to say; what have other members from Saskatchewan sitting on the Conservative side of the house, who were elected as a result of that very racial cry, who have subscribed to that very doctrine, to say with regard to this highly to be commended gesture of the hon. member for North Grey to the French-speaking people of Canada?

I wish to address myself now more particularly to the problems that afflict the people of western Canada as a result of the actions of the present government. The thought that is uppermost in the mind of every farmer in western Canada and of everyone dependent upon the farmer is, what can be done to improve conditions? What can be done to get the farmer out of the slough of despond in which he finds himself placed at the present time? Before one suggests a remedy, one must diagnose the disease. One must examine all the circumstances which have led to the farmer finding himself in the position in which he finds himself to-day. I say, Mr. Speaker, that first and last the trouble is due to a false fiscal policy. The countries of the world, with the exception of Great Britain, since the war more particularly, have gone in for a drunken orgy of protection. Great Britain of all countries in the world has refused to listen to the protectionist cry, and what has been the result? During the past three years Great Britain sold $10,000,000,000 of her own products to protectionist countries, overcoming the disadvantage of high tariff walls by the cheapness and superiority of her goods. The exports of the cotton industry of Lancashire exceeded the combined exports of cotton of the United States, Germany, France, Japan and Czechoslovakia. Great Britain to-day is building over one-half of all the ships constructed in the world. During the first nine months of this year 34 per cent of Great Britain's trade was with Europe, 21 per cent with Asia and 18 per cent with Africa. These facts are the more enlightening when considered in relation to the action of the Prime Minister of Canada both before and at the Imperial conference—before, when he increased the duties against British manufactured goods, and at the conference, when he demanded that the British people impose a tax on foodstuffs in order to give Canada a preference in the British market.

Sir George Paish, the eminent British economist, three years ago wrote an article which exemplifies what I have said with regard to Great Britain and protection. I think it is worth while to put it on Hansard. He says:

> Nations dependent upon world markets for the sale of their products are in almost as much danger as nations which must buy foreign products in order to support their peoples.
> The agricultural industries of all nations, and more particularly of what are known as the young countries, are heavily in debt, and if they cannot sell their products in anything like the present quantity, and can sell the reduced quantity only at a much lower level of prices, their distress will indeed be great.
> But if these agricultural countries will not buy manufactured or other goods in sufficient quantity to enable the manufacturing nations to buy their foodstuffs, raw materials, and tobacco, how can they sell their products?
> And if the agriculturists of the world cannot sell their products in sufficient quantity at reasonable prices, how can they buy anything like the quantity of goods they have bought in recent years from the manufacturers of their own countries? They cannot, and in turn, the manufacturers and merchants of all nations will be in difficulties.
> Thus, with all the world in debt as never before, the present policy of the nations, of high tariffs and trade restrictions, means a complete breakdown of the great machine of credit and of trade.
> But such a policy, and such a situation, cannot be permitted to continue. Its consequences will be so disastrous that not only will the business machine be wrecked, but the political machine as well.
> The remedy, and the only effective remedy, for the present dangerous situation is to remove all the artificial tariff and other barriers to trade and to permit the products of the world to be bought and sold without hindrances of any kind.
> Experience proves conclusively that a policy of unhampered trade will bring about so great an expansion of income in all countries that the present credit difficulties of nations and individuals will be successfully and permanently surmounted.
> Only by reversing the present universal policy of high tariffs, and pursuing without further delay the policy of tariff reduction, so strongly urged by the International Chamber of Commerce and by the great bankers and industrialists of Europe, America and this country, as well as by the Brussels financial conference and by the world economic conference convened by the League of Nations, can the nations overcome the grave danger which now confronts them.

Then we have this statement by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Snowden, in a speech which he delivered at the time of the Imperial economic conference:

> Introduction of a tariff system into this country would strike at the purity of the political life of this nation. Parliament would become a sink of corruption. Members of parliament would go there not to represent national interests but pledged to support the selfish interest of particular industries. Once begin a policy of protection and you are on a slippery slope that leads to a bottomless pit.

Following up my argument against the policy of my right hon. friend opposite, I was very much impressed by an article written by a well-known industrialist and published in a businessman's magazine. Undoubtedly the author of this article is intimately known to my right hon. friend as he is the head of the great Swedish Match Company which operates in Poland Peru, Greece, Ecuador, Esthonia and many other countries of the world. That gentleman is reported as follows:

I do not know how to commence an expression of my business philosophy in any simpler fashion than to say that the world is swiftly casting off its provincial habit of mind. Nations will remain nations, of course, but the minds of men are broadening to an international horizon. In this machine age we produce so enormously, so rapidly, that home markets—national markets—are not enough. We must go abroad to sell a large part of our production. Tell me, to what nation this does not apply? To all, we know.

Well then, how is business gained? Do we win customers by blows and abuse or by smiles and little acts of friendship and service? The question is absurd, of course. Yet nations must act precisely as individuals act if they are to achieve proportionate results.

I may be pardoned, I trust, for referring to your tariff. I doubt if America has done anything in the past twenty years to stir up more ill feeling and resentment abroad—all over the world—than she has done by putting up this high tariff wall over which European business can hardly climb. From my viewpoint, seeing the business world as a whole, knowing the feeling abroad and informed of the reprisals that are in the making, I say that your tariff is a very dangerous piece of legislation for the good of your business. You are inviting costly trade wars.

Upon that occasion he was addressing himself to the American people.

Now I come to the Canadian agricultural situation. Last July and previous to the election the right hon. gentleman who leads the Conservative party stated that if that party were put into power he immediately would put into effect a high protective tariff by which the farmers of this country would be benefited by increased prices for their wheat and for their dairy produce. He was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. In order to keep the records straight perhaps I had better read his exact words:

Listen, you agriculturists from the west and all the other parts of Canada, you have been taught to mock at tariffs and applaud free trade. Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? Tell me, when did free trade fight for you? You say tariffs are only for the manufacturers. I will make them fight for you as well. I will use them to blast a way into the markets that have been closed to you.

What has been the result of this blasting? As a result of the iniquitous tariff legislation enacted last September, whereby the ordinary flow of trade has been hampered, the western farmer of to-day is selling his wheat for one-half the price he received last July. He sells his eggs at the rate of two dozens for twenty-five cents, butter fat is sold at ten to twelve cents per pound less than it was last July. The price of wheat is below the cost of production and the farmer in western Canada cannot exist under the present protective tariff. The farmer is a primary producer and his products by any stretch of the imagination cannot be consumed in Canada. He must depend upon the markets of the world. If those markets are closed to him because of high protection there must be stagnation such as we in western Canada are experiencing. Reading an Associated Press despatch after the visit of my hon. friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), I was amused to find he had stated that in western Canada he had found a strong turning toward the principle of protection. With whom did my hon. friend consult?

Mr. RYCKMAN: The best people out there.

Mr. VALLANCE: The gophers.

Mr. McPHEE: My hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) says it must have been the gophers. Well, for the benefit of those hon. gentlemen from the east who might not be particularly acquainted with the little animal, I may say that in many respects there is similarity between a gopher and a good Tory. The gopher is a sleek little animal and he pilfers the farmers' grain. In the day of his greatest pilfering he develops a paunch and I would say that gopherism and Toryism might be synonymous terms. They are synonymous because both are pests and humbugs. As a matter of fact if I were asked to choose between the gopher and the Tory I believe I would prefer the gopher because its depredations would be by instinct and not by design.

Having turned down the trade with Great Britain, the European countries and the United States, my right hon. friend the leader of the government endeavoured to negotiate with China a sale of Canadian wheat. I remember very well his address delivered in the city of Regina on December 30 last. Two weeks previously the speech had been heralded by the Tory newspapers of western Canada. We were told that he would deliver this great message of deliverance. It happened that around that time there was a by-election in the district of Estevan in the province of Saskatchewan, and the heralded visit of the right hon. gentleman to western Canada was most timely. The present leader of the government made his speech and I happened to be one of several in the neighbourhood who listened over the radio. Here was the message: "My fellow Canadians who are now within sound of my voice, just at this moment the Canadian ambassador to Tokyo, Mr. Marler, is on his way to China to negotiate the sale of your wheat with that great nation." When I heard the right hon. gentleman make that statement over the radio I thought how convenient for him it was that Mr. Marler happened to be in Japan, because I remember an occasion in this house two or three years ago when an estimate was brought down for the establishment of a Japanese legation, and I remember particularly that the measure was opposed by my right hon. friend in a vigorous speech. It was opposed also by one of his colleagues who moved that the item be reduced from $50,000 to $10,000. If my right hon. friend had had his wish on that occasion there would have been no legation in Japan; Mr. Marler would not have been there to go to China on this mission of selling Canadian wheat. What happened after Mr. Marler's visit to China? How much wheat was sold as a result of that visit? Here was a man who was going to enter into a treaty with a great nation to sell Canadian wheat, and after his return we read his statement as published in the press:

> At present China is purchasing large quantities of wheat from Australia which owing to the decline in exchange rates, Australians will be able to sell as much as four dollars a short ton under Canadian prices.
> This fact, Mr. Marler added, eliminates every possibility of Canada and the United States competing with Australia in the Chinese market during the current season.

Then we have a Mr. Lockhart, the adviser of the Chinese government in railway matters, giving an interview in the month of January last, which is reported in a Victoria newspaper as follows:

> Primarily an agricultural country, China's vast areas will produce more than enough wheat for its own people, and you must look at her as a competitor when she brings the fertile plains of Manchuria to the state of full production.
> In this connection the silver loan which is now suggested might be used to excellent advantage, provided it could be applied honestly and straightforwardly to put the country on a productive basis. However, that is not likely to happen. If all the contributory nations would consent to place the fund's administration in the hands of a select committee of the league of nations, the difficulty might be solved to a great extent, but such a suggestion will probably not be accepted.
> At any rate, I cannot believe it will be good business to extend this loan unless it can be preguarded. No question of sentimentality should enter into this negotiation.

Touching on Canada's proposal to participate in this suggested credit of several million dollars in silver, Mr. Lockhart stated:

> If Canada's portion was advanced contingent upon wheat sales alone, it could not achieve its object.

Later on we have the Chinese Minister of Finance informing my right hon. friend and the world at large that China has all the silver she wants, that her banks are full of silver, and to pour more silver into them would not in any way improve the purchasing power of her people. He said:

> China owes so much that she does not wish for any further loan either of gold or of silver.

And so this great message of deliverance, like the pre-election promises, amounts to nothing. But the farmer's wheat is selling in western Canada at the lowest price in our history, away below the cost of production. Truly my right hon. friend and his associates are on the slippery slope that leads to the bottomless pit. And yet he is still blasting his way to trade. At this point I might put on record for his benefit a poem composed by a former Conservative colleague of his in the territorial council in the early days, but who is now one of his most uncompromising opponents. Entitled "The Blaster Blasted," it is in the following words:

> There once was a blaster who blasted;
> From blasting he could not refrain;
> Opportunity came and he passed it,
> And all of his blasting was vain.
> Friends and foes were alike flabbergasted
> By this "builder of castles in Spain";
> He nailed the wrong flag to the masthead,
> His blast was no boon, 'twas a bane.
> Let us pray that the blasts of this blaster,
> Like hail on a field of ripe grain,
> Portentous of loss and disaster
> May bring nothing worse in its train.

High tariffs impede trade. Under the Dunning budget the purchasing power of this country would have been improved because we would have had free of duty a large number of imports from Great Britain. Reference was made the other day to the good-will offering of preference to the mother country. I think the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) questioned my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition with regard to it. I remember during the election campaign reading an article from an old country newspaper which illustrates the fact that lower tariffs mean increased trade and increased good-will between Canada and the motherland. Right after the Dunning budget was brought down last May the city of Bristol put on a Canada Week campaign.

For the benefit of my hon. friends opposite who doubt the wisdom of lower tariffs and freer trade, let me point out what that gesture on the part of Canada meant to our trade in Great Britain at that time. This is the article to which I refer:

"Canada Week" designed as part of the publicity campaign that is bringing to the notice of British people the immense variety of Canada's products has just been successfully held in Bristol, England.

Five hundred leading stores gave up their windows to attractive displays of Canadian goods and tens of thousands of the public entered for a competition based on the varying popularity of what they saw or purchased.

Importers and wholesalers report a marked increase in demand and it may be said that Canada is definitely on the map so far as the west of England is concerned.

The lord mayor and city council gave the "Canada Week" the fullest civic support. Premises were taken in the heart of the city for the headquarters of the campaign to "boost" Canadian products and here thousands of samples were sold every day.

Canada must abandon her protective tariff. Wider markets and freer trade are the only solution for the western Canadian farmer. If the present protective policy is persisted in western Canada will demand a free port of entry at Churchill. I propose to have more to say on that before the close of the session. Not secession, not sovietism, not communism, not bolshevism, will be the solution of western Canada's difficulties. We have no place in Canada for that sort of thing. We are a British country with a love for law and order, and nothing can be gained by resistance to law and order. The remedy is an immediate abandonment of the policy of protection in favour of a policy of wider markets and freer trade. Under such a policy this country will take its place among the nations of the world, a place which Providence intended it should take by virtue of the almost illimitable natural resources which have been placed at our disposal.

Mr. F. T. SHAVER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, as one of the new members of the house I shall endeavour as briefly as possible to discuss a few of the problems that have engaged our attention so far in this debate. But before attempting to do that I should like to congratulate the two hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In this corner of the house we are pleased to have a young man with the ability and power of expression of my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Porteous). As the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) said in congratulating him on his speech, he has youth on his side, in addition to his capacity for making a good speech, and I predict for him a successful future in this house.

I am also very glad to have an opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier). I was particularly pleased with his remarks because he represents a constituency that in many respects is similar to my own—a bilingual constituency. I was very glad to hear of the amity and good-will that obtain among all classes of people in the county which he represents, and it is a pleasure to me to bear testimony to the fact that that is exactly the condition obtaining in the county of Stormont.

At this juncture I should like to invite hon. members and particularly those who live in remote portions of Canada, when the roads are good in the spring, to come out over the Prescott highway or the highway to Morrisburg some Saturday or Sunday, after they have been to church in the morning, and visit the county of Stormont, an old historic county which was described by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), when he visited it for the first time as leader of the opposition, as being a cross-section of the economic and national life of Canada. It is a cross-section of the national life of Canada, because it contains the various elements that make up the population of our country. We have a large number of those citizens who first came up the St. Lawrence—and it shows how time is passing, for it will soon be four centuries since they first came—and founded the civilization of Christianity in this northern part of the North American continent. We have also in the front townships a large number of those heroic souls, some of them of German extraction, others of Scottish, Irish and English descent, who nearly a century and a half ago left comfortable homes and came up into this wilderness in the north that they might remain under the British flag. We have too in the county of Stormont a great many people who came from various parts of the British Isles, or are descendants of people who came from the British Isles and from practically every country in Europe.

I am glad to say that in the town of Cornwall, a large industrial town with a population, including the suburbs, of about 17,000, we have at the present time serving his second term as mayor a gentleman of the Jewish faith. We have in that council members who are both French and English speaking, and there is in the town of Cornwall and the county of Stormont the greatest spirit of harmony and good will among all classes. That is the spirit we need in Canada, and I do deplore the fact that the hon. gentleman who preceded me attempted to raise any sectional feeling among the various classes of opinion in the country in which we live.

I shall endeavour to deal just for a few moments with some of the problems that have been raised. I was very much interested, as a new member naturally would be, in hearing the discusison during this debate as well as in the debate which took place in the short session, and in hearing members from various sections of Canada explain the difficulties that afflict their particular localities and the problems in which they are especially interested. I was particularly interested in the debate which took place between the right hon. the Prime Minister and the right hon. the leader of the opposition. The leader of the opposition made a very long speech. I am sure many of us envy him his remarkable fluency of expression, his ability to take a shopworn or commonplace expression and surround it with such a multiplicity of words as to make it look fairly passable. I should like to contrast with that the clear and incisive reasoning of the Prime Minister, who in one third the time answered completely every argument that was presented by the leader of the opposition. I noticed one statement made by the leader of the opposition near the beginning of his address regarding the spirit of harmony. He said that during the time he was Prime Minister:

> There was a steady decrease of taxation, and all was accompanied by a spirit of harmony, unity and good-will between the governments of the provinces and the government of the Dominion, a spirit such as had not prevailed for many years previously.

It seemed very strange to me that he should make a statement of that kind. I remember that in the months just preceding the election there was not that particular spirit of harmony and good will between the government which he headed and the governments of some of the provinces which happened to be under Conservative administration, and which could not expect even a plugged nickle from the Prime Minister of that day for the relief of unemployment. I cannot see how that spirit of harmony and good will was promoted to the extent which he claims. In addition to that, the leader of the opposition at the beginning of his speech gave long strings of statistics, long columns, to prove that Canada was in a prosperous condition when he handed over the reins of office. It reminds me of an incident that occurred in the town of Cornwall. The leader of the opposition spoke there on the Friday immediately preceding the election and I heard his speech over the radio. He gave the statistics which he quoted in different places throughout Canada, attempting to prove by a set of figures that the people of this country were prosperous. I met a working man on the street the next day and asked him how he liked Mr. King's speech. Let me say by the way that he was not a Conservative. He replied, "I was disappointed. Mr. King came to the town of Cornwall. I have been out of work for six months and I expected that he would have something to offer, but instead of bread he handed us a stone." And the people of Cornwall showed their appreciation of the arguments used by the then Prime Minister on that occasion by the vote which they polled on the following Monday.

There is one thing which the leader of the opposition omitted from his speech and which I expected him to mention. I remember he dealt at considerable length in his address at Cornwall, on that Friday preceding the election, with the great danger that confronted Canada then if a Conservative government were returned to power in the Dominion, with Conservative administrations extending over Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We were going to be robbed of that great heritage which had been handed down to us by our ancestors, that heritage of freedom for which they had sacrificed themselves and given their lives. An oligarchy would be formed, consisting of the Conservative Prime Minister of the Dominion and the Conservative premiers of the provinces, which would in some mysterious way rob us of our freedom. But the unexpected to the Prime Minister of that day has happened, and I do not think that at this time any of us are suffering from any of the ills which he predicted. On the other hand, the right hon. gentleman has given up the role of champion of the freedom of the people of Canada which he assumed prior to the election and has now come forward in the present debate in the role of champion of the freedom of the people of Great Britain from the oppression of the present Prime Minister of Canada.

The leader of the opposition condemned bargaining; he called it economic coercion. He said he would rather adopt the method which he had followed during his administration, the method of conciliatory approach. How can you do business on such a basis? Can private individuals do business by the method of conciliatory approach, leaving bargaining out of the question? To my mind business between nations is on exactly the same plane as business between two private individuals. Suppose Farmer Brown said to one of his boys: "That brown horse of ours doesn't match very well with the black; he doesn't get up fast enough. Neighbour Jones has a horse which I think would make a splendid mate for our black horse. You had better go over and trade horses with him but, my boy, I do not want you to do any bargaining—assume a conciliatory approach. Take this horse over to neighbour Brown, put it in his stable and say 'Neighbour Brown, I have brought you this horse and if you choose to send us a horse in return, well and good.'" The boy thinks that is a funny way of doing business, but he takes the horse over and he puts it in the stable and tells neighbour Brown that he has brought him the horse. Neighbour Brown begins to think that old man Jones has gone out of his mind and decides there must be something wrong with the horse he sent over, so he sends in return the old gray mare with the two spavins. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) thinks that business between nations should be carried on in a like manner.

During his address the leader of the opposition mentioned the fact that he had attended economic conferences in Great Britain in 1923 and 1926. If that conciliatory attitude had been adopted in 1923 and then continued with increased momentum until 1926, it should have been strong enough by the time 1929 was reached to have enabled Great Britain to take all the surplus Canadian wheat. I am sure the right hon. gentleman had plenty of opportunities during the nine years he was in office to put into effect that spirit of conciliatory approach. I say that the people of Canada were wise last July in selecting as a leader a gentleman who believes in the plain business method of bargaining.

The right hon. leader of the opposition said that conditions are becoming worse. That statement has been made by many other hon. gentlemen who have addressed the house from the opposite side. They state that conditions have been getting worse ever since the present government came into office. Speaking for the county in which I live, I desire to say distinctly that conditions decidedly are not getting worse, neither in the rural part of the county nor in the industrial sections of the town of Cornwall. I was told the other day by a farmer, not of Conservative persuasion, that at last a ray of hope was given to the farmers of eastern Canada by having as Minister of Agriculture a gentleman who is alive to their interests. A program was laid down by this minister and published in a recent issue of MacLean's Magazine, which program will be far-reaching in its effect. It is the program of a man of vision and, as we all know, a man of energy. This farmer advised me that he was getting about the same price for butter fat as a year ago, but he wondered what would have happened if butter had been coming into Canada during the past winter in the same volume as during the winter of 1930, at the rate of 50,000,000 pounds per year.

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. SHAVER: Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the hon. gentleman say that no New Zealand or Australian butter came into Canada since October 12, 1930?

Mr. SHAVER: No New Zealand butter.

Mr. POULIOT: No Australian butter?

Mr. SHAVER: A very small quantity came in on the basis of 32 cents a pound.

Before I left home on Saturday I took the trouble to inquire into the average grade price of eggs, and I found that it is two cents less than it was a year ago. What would have happened if our market had been flooded with the tremendous quantity of eggs which came in last year? A considerable deflation has taken place in the price of various products, but if American eggs had been permitted to come into this country in the volume they did last year the farmers of eastern Ontario would be getting only about half the price they are getting at the present time. In January, 1930, there were imported into Canada from the United States 529,048 dozens of eggs having a value of $215,067, and from other countries, 7,800 dozens with a value of $1,852. In February of last year our imports from the United States amounted to 1,060,922 dozens having a value of $373,032, and from other countries, 6,454 dozens with a value of $1,479. In March our imports from the United States amounted to 1,168,073 dozens with a value of $322,830, and from other countries, 9,440 dozens valued at $2,408. I will give a comparison between January and February of this year with January and February of last year, because those are the only figures we have for the present year. In January and February last year we imported a total quantity of 1,604,224 dozens of eggs, valued at $591,430, while for the same period this year when a protective tariff was in force we imported 15,557 dozens valued at $5,754. Is that not good business for the egg producers of Canada?

Mr. BERTRAND: When it was impossible to sell eggs in British Columbia during those two months, why was there any importation?

Mr. SHAVER: You mean during the present year?

Mr. BERTRAND: Yes.

Mr. SHAVER: The total value of the importations during this period was only $5,754, and no doubt many of these eggs were for hatching purposes. Last year, under the previous administration, which I presume the hon. member supported, we imported to the value of $591,430.

A very vital matter to the farmers of eastern Ontario is the finding of a market for their bacon. I do not intend to go into this at any great length, but we do know that the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), who for many years held the position of Minister of Agriculture, is reported in Hansard as having made a tour of Great Britain in an automobile, and one would have expected to have seen an increase in the sale of bacon products. I remember he sent out a questionnaire a couple of years ago to the farmers almost pleading with them to increase their production, and we are very fortunate in having to-day at the head of this department a gentleman who has a real live policy in this respect. He is trying to encourage the farmers of Canada to raise bacon hogs for the British market.

Just in passing, I should like to pay a tribute to the tact and good judgment of the Minister of Agriculture, in dealing with the various perplexing questions which arise. The county of Stormont is part of an area that is being tested for freedom from tuberculosis. This was rather a delicate matter but through tact and methods of conciliation, everyone is satisfied, the cattle are tested and the people of the county of Stormont are highly pleased with the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir).

I believe one of the things that will help to solve the problems of western Canada is a suggestion I heard made by a Conservative member from the west during the short session of parliament. He said that instead of using Argentine and United States corn in eastern Canada we should use western barley and wheat. I think that would be a good thing, and I know in our own feed business in the village of Aultsville, in the county of Stormont and in various other sections of the county, to a very large extent we have displaced Argentine and United States corn with western barley and wheat. We have been urging the farmers to use these and they have seen the necessity for doing so. They are finding ways of utilizing this feed and it has proved a better feed in many respects than the corn they had formerly been using. Those are ways in which the east can help the west. I should like to say that the farmers in the east have a great deal of sympathy for the farmers in the west. The western farmers know that we in the east have problems to face. We in the east know that the western farmers have problems that may be entirely different, but we want them to succeed as I am sure they want us to succeed in the east.

With regard to the revival of industry which has taken place since the present government came into power, nearly every speaker of the opposition side has said that industry has not revived or that the revival is a fictitious one, and so forth. Since last September, twenty branch factories have been located in Canada involving a capital expenditure of $5,000,000 and the employment of 2,000 Canadians; there has been a plant extension program by nine Canadian industries entailing an expenditure of $7,000,000 and the employment, when this program is completed, of 3,500 more workers, and there has been the establishment of five new Canadian industries with an expenditure totalling $1,600,000 and the employment of 500 people. Those are just a few of the things that have taken place in various industrial sections throughout Canada, but I should like to speak particularly of industrial conditions in the constituency which I represent. In the town of Cornwall, we have a large textile industry consisting of three cotton mills. The cotton industry of Canada was in a very bad way prior to the last general election. The government, headed by the present leader of the opposition, reduced the tariff at different times. It will be remembered that just a couple of years ago there was a 10 per cent increase in the British preference, the most-favoured nation clause applied to various countries which export cotton, and the result was, as far as the cotton industry in Cornwall was concerned, that whereas their normal production working at full capacity was about $10,000,000, it dropped in 1929 to $8,000,000. During the whole of 1929 and 1930 up to last September, most of their employees were working three or four days a week. What is the result to-day? When hon. gentlemen tell us that conditions have not improved, I can give a concrete illustration of the manner in which they have improved. The 1,300 employees of these cotton mills in Cornwall are at present working full-time, and in one mill they have been working overtime for two or three weeks. An hon. gentleman suggests that they may be storing up the manufactured cloth. I do not think they are so foolish as to make their men work overtime in order that they may store up cotton goods; they are not so altruistic as that. The men are working full-time and in the town of Cornwall there is being paid to the cotton mill workers as wages $6,000 a week or at the rate of $300,000 a year more than was paid to them prior to the last general election. In the town of Cornwall a certain doctor who supported me during the last campaign—and this is a very pertinent illustration—said to me that a lady came into his office last January and said: "I want to thank you, doctor, for the advice you gave me last summer." He did not remember what advice he had given her, and he said: "What is that?" She replied: "You told me before the election to vote for Shaver and better times"—that was our slogan in the county of Stormont—"I want to tell you I thank God for our family; the better times have come."

Mr. POULIOT: Have they been changed since?

Mr. SHAVER: I am stating what the times were as they existed for this particular woman, a woman with a family. She said: "For eighteen months my husband was working three or four days a week, and it was a tremendously hard struggle to get along, but for the last month he has been bringing home every week a full pay cheque." That is a direct result of the policy of the present government.

During the recent short session practically every hon. gentleman opposite from the hon. gentleman who a few years ago was going to sound the death knell of protection down to some who were new members like myself, said: You cannot raise the tariff without raising prices. For the very industry of which I have just been speaking where they are now paying in wages $6,000 a week more than they did prior to the last general election, I have the price lists of March 17, 1930, September 26, 1930 and March 1, 1931. This covers a period of a year and intervening is the period just after the short session of parliament when the new tariff came into effect. I have picked at random four items from the price list, and the following table shows the reductions in prices and the percentage of reduction in price per yard:

Price List

Article	Mar. 17, 1930	Sept. 26, 1930	Mar. 1, 1931	Percentage of reduction
Shirting. . .	15¾ cts.	15 cts.	14 cts.	11%

This is the ordinary shirting used in making a workingman's shirt.

Price List

Article	Mar. 17, 1930	Sept. 26, 1930	Mar. 1, 1931	Percentage of reduction
A.C.A. ticking	26½ cts.	23 cts.	22 cts.	17%
8-oz. denim. .	21¼ cts.	19½ cts.	18 cts.	15%

This denim is used in making the ordinary heavy-weight overalls for workingmen.

Price List

Article	Mar. 17, 1930	Sept. 26, 1930	Mar. 1, 1931	Percentage of reduction
28-inch galatea	17½ cts.	16¼ cts.	16 cts.	9%

This 28-inch galatea medium weight is used for making children's dresses and other things of a similar nature. The average reduction in these items, going all through the price list, is 14 or 15 per cent.

Mr. RALSTON: Has my hon. friend the percentage reductions in the United States for the same period?

Mr. SHAVER: I am not talking about the United States at the present. I am dealing with the argument that was used by the former Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). He used the argument that if you put up the tariff, up go prices.

Mr. RALSTON: I used the argument that where there would be a decided falling in prices in view of world conditions, prices in Canada would not fall in the same proportion in view of this tariff; and I adhere to that position.

Mr. SHAVER: Prices have fallen in very large proportion.

Mr. RALSTON: Not in the same proportion as in the United States. I am simply asking my hon. friend to give the figures for the United States to show if the reductions here have been equal to the reductions in the United States.

Mr. SHAVER: I will tell you what happened in the United States in one mill.

Mr. RALSTON: Tell us about the prices.

Mr. SHAVER: They reduced their wages in the United States, but this mill I am speaking of did not. The argument that was used by the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) in this debate was that the tariff prevented a natural falling in prices.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are quoting me correctly.

Mr. SHAVER: If hon. gentlemen opposite wear overalls, and I presume that the hon. member for West Edmonton wore them some time ago at least—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I certainly did.

Mr. SHAVER: Well, they can buy a pair of overalls to-day at a reduction of all the way up to 25 per cent from prices last spring, and that applies to all kinds of workingmen's clothes. We were told at the September session that that could not possibly happen. I know, of course, that the hon. member for West Edmonton is the gentleman who sounded the deathknell of protection. Judging by the remarks made by the hon. member who preceded me, the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee), he is an ardent believer in free trade, one of those gentlemen who regard the words of Richard Cobden almost as the voice of Allah himself, and perhaps look upon R. J. Deachman as the chief Canadian prophet.

The rayon industry is a very important one in the town of Cornwall. It has been operating there for five and a half years, and has had to face unfair foreign competition. The conditions in that industry have been similar to the conditions I mentioned in regard to the cotton industry. As an example of the competition which some of these industries have had to face from foreign manufacturers in Europe, let me give the scale of wages paid in different countries of the world in the rayon industry, and these figures will apply as well to the cotton industry and many others:

Wages Per Week

	France	Italy	Holland	Germany (Cologne)	Canada
Mechanics	$9 24	$7 54	$12 65	$15 20	$31 20
Spinners (male)	8 51	7 30	8 76	13 13	21 60
Reelers (female)	3 89	3 89	4 86	6 85	12 to $12 96

Those wages paid in foreign countries are one of the reasons why Canadian industries need protection.

An hon. gentleman a few moments ago pictured the condition of Great Britain as ideal, from the labour standpoint, I suppose, and every other, because Great Britain was pledged to the principle of free trade. Let me point out that in Cornwall, in the rayon industry, the spinners work on one shift from eight in the morning until four in the afternoon, and then go for a week on a night shift. They get $21.60 per week. In England men working at the same kind of work earn 54 shillings a week, working four shifts every other week, and on the alternate week they are on the dole. Those are the conditions in England in exactly the same type of industry.

Within two weeks after the tariff increases made during the special session came into effect, Courtauld's commenced building a $2,000,000 addition to their plant at Cornwall. They are paying a weekly wage bill on construction of $17,000, and are at present employing one thousand people working full time. When the addition to the plant is completed about the 1st of September next, the number employed will be increased to fourteen hundred. Is that good for the people of Canada or is it bad?

With regard to the paper industry, tariff item 1060 was wiped out at the special session. That tariff item allowed book paper to come into Canada with an 80 per cent rebate, which brought the tariff on American paper down to 5 per cent, a totally inadequate tariff. The industry might as well have had free trade as 5 per cent protection. That item was wiped out at the special session, and as a result the paper mills in Stormont are now shipping out carloads of book paper to different magazine publishers in Canada who last year got their supplies from the United States.

We have been told during the course of this debate that our leader is autocratic. As one of the new members, with not very much experience in political affairs outside my own county, I want to pay a very sincere tribute to the kindness and helpfulness of the present Prime Minister and to his readiness to receive suggestions from even the humblest of his followers. I am sure that that has been the experience of every hon. member on this side of the house, and I believe the people of Canada recognize that we have as Prime Minister at the present time one of the ablest statesmen who has ever conducted the affairs of Canada since the beginning of its history. With the loyal support of his party, which he is sure to receive during this and succeeding sessions, I am sure that he will be able to solve the great problems confronting the Canadian people at the present time.

On motion of Mr. Spencer the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

Thursday, March 19, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the following message has been received from the Senate informing this house:

That the Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Senators Aylesworth, Sir Allen, Beaubien, Chapais, Gillis, Gordon, Griesbach, Hatfield, Laird, Lemieux, Lewis, Logan, McDougald, McLennan, Poirier, Taylor and Wilson (Rockliffe), have been appointed a committee to assist the Honourable the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both houses on the said library.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the following message has been received from the Senate informing this house:

That the Honourable Senators Aylesworth, Sir Allen, Buchanan, Chapais, Donnelly, Farrell, Green, Hatfield, Horsey, Legris Lewis, McDonald, McLean, McLennan, Pope, Raymond, Robertson, Sharpe, Taylor, Todd, White (Inkerman), and White (Pembroke), have been appointed a committee to superintend the printing of the Senate during the present session, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both houses on the subject of the printing of parliament.

[Mr. Shaver.]

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the following message has been received from the Senate informing this house:

That the Honourable the Speaker, the Honourable Senators Hardy, Logan, McMeans, Sharpe, Tanner, and Taylor, have been appointed a committee to assist the Honourable the Speaker in the direction of the restaurant of parliament, so far as the interests of the Senate are concerned, and to act on behalf of the Senate as members of a joint committee of both houses on the said restaurant.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AGREEMENT FOR JOINT USE OF PREMISES AT REGINA

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 9, to ratify and confirm certain agreements respecting the joint use by Canadian National Railways of certain tracks and premises of Canadian Pacific Railway Company at Regina.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. MANION: There is very little explanation. The title of the bill really indicates its purpose. It is to ratify and confirm certain agreements between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways for the joint use of terminals and premises of the Canadian Pacific Railway in Regina.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Before the orders of the day are proceeded with, in view of the interest manifested by some hon. members, particularly from the maritime provinces, in the matter of our trade relations with Cuba, I think it well to advise that the Hon. J. A. Macdonald, member of the administration without portfolio, has been asked to go to Cuba to discuss with officials there such trade relations, especially with respect to the entry of potatoes into that market.

Mr. DUFF: Has the right hon. gentleman considered the question of the duty on fish?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that will also be considered.

THE MINISTER OF LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether it is the intention of the government to have a Minister of Labour sitting in this house?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The intentions of the government will be made manifest by its actions.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not hear the answer.

Mr. BENNETT: I said, the intentions of the government will be made manifest by its actions.

Mr. HEAPS: They are not very manifest at the present time.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. H. E. SPENCER (Battle River): I trust the hon. member who preceded me in the debate will not consider me discourteous if I do not refer to the very able address he gave us yesterday. The time limit on speeches in this house has its disadvantages as well as its advantages, and as I shall not have any more time in the forty minutes allowed me than to put forward what I wish, particularly in regard to the condition of western Canada at the present time, it will not be possible for me to engage in those courtesies I should like to in referring to the hon. gentleman who has immediately preceded me.

When I arrived in Ottawa a short time ago someone said to me, "I trust that when the House of Commons does open we shall not have a lot of speeches with regard to blue ruin in different parts of Canada." I replied: "If the poor condition of any part of Canada or of any particular industry is well known to the whole of Canada and therefore understood by the House of Commons, it is certainly not necessary to lay stress on those individual cases. But where any particular industry is in distress, where parts of Canada, very regretfully, at least so far as I am concerned, do not understand and probably wish to understand the conditions prevailing in other parts, then I think it is very important that the facts should be laid perfectly bare regarding the conditions in those parts of the country which are suffering distress."

I am not by any means a pessimist, Mr. Speaker. I believe that Canada has a great future, and particularly do I think so if we take every possible advantage of science and invention to produce the goods we need. But at the same time we must bring about a sane, safe and just economic system which will make it possible for the people of this country to buy the goods that are produced.

It is not a pleasant duty to come into this House of Commons and lay before it conditions which, certainly, to many members, will not be very welcome. At the same time I do not think I should be doing my duty to my constituency or to that part of Canada from which I have the honour to come, if I did not lay perfectly bare the conditions as I left them. Knowing the conditions as I do, knowing the privations which people are enduring, knowing the dark future which is before them, I certainly was much disappointed in reading the slight reference to agriculture in the speech from the throne. The first reference I see reads:

> My ministers have had under anxious consideration the means by which an orderly marketing of the wheat crop of western Canada may be assured, and have already taken such effective action towards that end as the circumstances appear to justify.

When one considers the bankrupt condition of western Canada—I say bankrupt because the only reason it is not actually so, is that creditors are not pressing—and the fact that stock and crops have been sold below cost of production; the suffering, privation and hardships that have to be endured; and the infinitesimally small amount of help that has been given by the Dominion government, the above seems to me to be neither more nor less than a hollow mockery. And continuing from the speech from the throne, I read:

> My ministers are aware that changing conditions in the world's markets may necessitate further intervention by my government, which is prepared to render whatever additional assistance may be deemed advisable in the national interests. The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing of the wheat crop, and of providing more stable markets, as the welfare of all parts of Canada is involved in satisfactory returns being received by the grain growers.

I am pleased to see that the government of the day recognizes that the welfare of Canada as a whole is wrapped up in the prosperity of the three prairie provinces.

I listened yesterday with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull), but after hearing his remarks I came to the conclusion that it was possibly such members as he that the government of the day had called into consultation before preparing the speech from the throne. Although this hon. member is a western man and should know the conditions existing in that part of the country, he said "they were bad only in spots." I have lived in western Canada for twenty-three years and have gone through some very serious times, particularly during periods of deflation, but I have never seen anything like the conditions existing at the present time. The hon. member would have been closer to the truth if he had stated that conditions were good in spots. Then he said that conditions were not as bad as they might be. If they were any worse than they are, then God help western Canada. He concluded his remarks by stating that a feeling of hopefulness was coming over the people. Perhaps the hon. member has the advantage, or it may be the disadvantage of living in the city of Regina. That spirit of hopefulness may be coming over those in his own particular legal calling, but that feeling certainly does not exist in the hearts of those following the great industry of agriculture.

If I did not know the conditions existing in Saskatchewan I would not have attempted to reply to the statements made by the hon. gentleman, but I had the opportunity and pleasure of attending the convention of the United Farmers of Canada held in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan. This is the most representative body of agriculturists in that great province, and after attending that convention for three days, I came to the conclusion that if conditions in Alberta were bad, they were as bad if not worse in Saskatchewan.

The government has known for six months of the tremendous drop in the market value of grain and other products of the farm. The members in this corner of the house wish every success to the government of the day, whatever that government may be, in solving the problems of this country. We do not claim for one moment the position of opposition because we know that the government has the responsibility and we give them our best wishes in solving their problems. If they are sucessful they will have our praise, but if they are not, then they will have our criticism. Six months have passed since those in power first knew of the market conditions, but what has been done? From the speech from the throne it would appear that it is another case of Nero fiddling while Rome burns.

In putting on record the facts which I propose to present, some people may think that I am pulling a long bow, but it is very difficult indeed to get the facts across to those who do not understand the true conditions. However, in fairness to the part of the country which I have the honour to represent I am going to place myself before this House of Commons as clearly as possible.

I have in my hand a sample of No. 3 wheat, so-called tough because it has a small amount of moisture in it. This wheat makes a very good brand of flour, but it may be a surprise to some hon. members in this house to know that when this sample was taken to an elevator in my locality in central Alberta, the price offered was 20 cents per bushel—pool payment—if sold by the carload, or 17½ cents per bushel in smaller lots. I have known the pool first payment to be within one cent of the open market price. The next grade, No. 4, went down to the low price of 13½ cents per bushel, which is the price the farmer has to pay at that particular point to get his grain to Fort William.

Let us consider the man who obtained 20 cents per bushel because he was fortunate enough to be able to sell in carload lots. What use does he have to make of that money? It costs him an average of five cents per bushel to haul his grain to the railway; then it costs him 10 cents per bushel for threshing, and about five cents per bushel for harvesting. His total proceeds are gone and he has nothing left to cover the expenses of capital investment, seeding, cultivation, rent, taxes and other expenses. That is the situation in which the western farmer finds himself at the present time.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What does it cost the farmer in western Canada to produce a bushel of wheat?

Mr. SPENCER: That varies greatly.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: What has been the hon. member's experience? What does it cost him, as a farmer in western Canada, to produce a bushel of wheat?

Mr. SPENCER: It varies greatly, but I do not suppose the average farmer can produce a bushel of wheat under 70 or 75 cents per bushel, taking it year in and year out.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Take your own case, does it cost you that much?

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member will have forty minutes of the time of this house in which to present his side of the case.

I know of cases in western Canada where the price of oats and rye has been so low that the farmers have not considered it worth while to cut. These crops will be eliminated in the spring by the easy method of applying a match to them. Conditions are bad when such things as this must be done. I know of one man within a mile and a half of town, which means a low hauling cost, who had a splendid crop of rye, but on account of the very low price which had been offered at the elevators, and which was four cents a bushel at that time, he could not see his way to harvest it. I know of another man who this year took off some 25,000 bushels of grain in wheat, oats and rye. After taking off that crop, which was one of the best he had ever had in western Canada, and after deducting the expenses of selling the crop, he found that he was $2,000 in the hole.

We hear a great deal about mixed farming. The hon. member across the floor who attempted to interrupt a few minutes ago would be one of those who would suggest that the western farmers go into mixed farming. This is a very interesting piece of advice, because it is always given by those whom we term "arm-chair farmers." I wonder how the arm-chair farmer who offers the advice would like to go into mixed farming at these prices. Last year sheep were bringing in western Canada the enormous sum of from $1 to $3 a head. Cattle are down to six cents a pound. Hogs are down to from four to five cents a pound and we expect a severe drop next year because the farmers, on account of the quantity of rough feed they have, are going largely into the raising of hogs to get rid of it. In February of this year butter was selling on the prairies at as low as fifteen cents a pound, and eggs are selling at as low as from eight to fifteen cents a dozen. Wool has been the lowest for years. What is the result? Debts have been accruing; mortgage interest goes on; many bank loans cannot be wiped off; taxes cannot be met, and the people generally are wondering not only how they are going to carry on, but how they are going to live. Through all this trouble the one business institution in Canada that might have given some help—I refer to the private banking system—has been more or less of an irritant than anything else to the whole situation. I shall say a few words about that later.

What has been the action of the federal government through all this? Can we say that outside of the very lavish promises made last July they have done anything except one or two things that I shall mention in a moment. I want to pay a compliment, however, to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), a man who had the pluck to come out openly and criticize what all the people wanted to criticize, that is, the banking system of this country. Although the price of farm products has dropped, we find that interest charges are being maintained to the limit, eight or nine per cent being charged for bank loans. We find also that we are being charged exactly the same freight rates to haul our grain to Fort William when wheat is worth only ten cents or 20 cents a bushel as when it was worth $1.50 a bushel. Why should the farmer have to take all the loss? We find Mr. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific railway coming forward with a recommendation that a loan company be formed to enable farmers to go into debt for mixed farming. We appreciate Mr. Beatty's offer in this respect, but we would have thought a great deal more of him had he come forward, knowing the condition of the western farmer, and how he had been stranded, and offered to cut freight rates on our grain and stock. I believe Mr. Beatty is the same gentleman who only a very short time ago was spending money to bring more people into this country to go on the land, to break up more sod, grow more grain and, incidentally, create more freight, to pay more dividends to the shareholders of the Canadian Pacific.

I shall now give a few comparisons of prices between industry and agriculture. If, a year ago, the farmer had bought a twenty-four-row seeder, this year, taking average grade, not taking the highest or the lowest by any means but a good average, when he sold his grain in the fall, he would have to sell no less than 2,000 bushels of grain to pay for the seeder. If he wanted to buy a pair of boots, he would have the choice of three things: he could sell thirty bushels of wheat or sixty bushels of oats, or if his rye had any ergot in it he would have to sell 150 bushels of rye. If he wanted to have a good hearty meal on the diner of either of the Canadian railways he would have to take a sheep to market and sell it before he would get enough to pay for that meal. Actually this winter if the farmer were taking his butter to the store he would be fortunate if with the proceeds he obtained for each pound of butter, he got enough to buy in each case a pound of axle-grease. But if he wanted a ton of bran he would then have to turn around and hunt all over the country to find some man who had No. 1 northern, the best grade of wheat in the world, and turn over a ton of No. 1 northern hard wheat for a ton of bran. These are a few of the extraordinary cases I could mention.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) last year in Winnipeg. Two items stay in my memory. On the one hand he promised that he would make the tariff fight for the farmer, and the second was that he would find a market for Canadian grain. Later on we had the special session. Whether it was necessary or not I am not going to say, but during that special session the most we did was to vote $20,000,000 out of the public purse for unemployment and raise the tariffs on a large number of articles that enter Canada. Neither of those things helped agriculture. If you take the price of agricultural implements and compare it with the price of the grain we produce, the disparity in prices is far greater now than it was then. It is now eight months since the election. What has been done? What has happened? We find grain is very much lower and cattle are half the price now than they were a year ago. Butter is at an unprofitable figure. Barley, oats and rye are all being produced at a loss, rye as I said before, being as low as four cents a bushel.

The Prime Minister went to the Imperial conference. I am not going to comment on that as I have not the time, and it has been very ably dealt with by others. We all looked forward to his return to Canada. We knew he had been kept in contact with conditions as they existed in this country, and therefore when he returned and decided to speak in Saskatchewan, the centre of the grain growing area, we were all interested to hear his Regina speech. What were we told in that speech? First of all, he turned down the request made by the premiers of the three prairie provinces and pool organizations to peg the price of wheat at seventy cents a bushel. Seventy cents a bushel would not have met the needs of the farming industry; it would not have encouraged people to go into raising wheat, but it would have helped to tide over the most difficult situation that we have ever faced. That was turned down. The banks, however, were given a guarantee against any loss in the handling of pool wheat. I admit that this was probably of some assistance to the farmer, but while it helped the farmer a little, it guaranteed the banks 100 per cent against taking any loss at all. This year, I think I am quite safe in saying the financial interests of Canada have been able to announce their usual fat dividends in their respective businesses, while the industries, particularly the farming industry, from which they derive their profits have never been at a lower ebb.

There was one thing which the Prime Minister did offer. I do not think he could have looked very closely into the matter when he made the offer that the farmers should have seed grain. As a matter of fact, we never have had so much seed grain, and such cheap seed grain, as we have to-day in the western provinces. The few spots that the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) mentioned in his address could easily obtain seed grain at no very great distance.

We were also promised a market in China by credits being established for that purpose. That proposal has not developed. We were also told that a large order for wheat had been promised by France, but on looking into the matter we find that it is just about the usual quantity that France takes from us.

There was one statement which the Prime Minister made which I prefer to think was more or less of a slip, because I believe he really knows better. According to the press, he is reported to have said:

> The banks have no money to help move the grain crop except that left with them by savings bank depositors.

The Prime Minister must know that the handling of credit forms by far the larger part of the banking business. I shall take only a short time to quote one or two confirmations of that statement. Under the heading, "How can the supply of money be increased?" I find that the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna says:

> The amount of money in existence varies only with the action of the banks in increasing or diminishing deposits. We know how this is effected. Every bank loan creates a deposit, and every repayment of a bank loan destroys one.

Here is a quotation from H. D. McLeod, who, in his book, "Elements of Banking," says:

> The essential and distinctive feature of a "bank" and of "a banker" is to issue credit payable on demand, and this credit may be put into circulation and serve as money.

From the same author I quote:

> When it is said that a great London joint stock bank has perhaps twenty-five million pounds of deposits, it is almost universally believed that it has twenty-five million pounds of actual money to lend out, as it is erroneously called. It is a complete and entire delusion. These deposits are not deposits in cash at all. They are nothing but an enormous superstructure of credit.

Lastly I wish to quote from J. M. Keynes, the well-known economist, who in "A Tract on Monetary Reform" says:

> It is not easy, it seems, for men to apprehend that their money is a mere intermediary without significance in itself, and disappears when its work is done from the sum of a nation's wealth.

I wish to refer for a few moments to the service, or lack of service, that the private banking interests of Canada have been giving to agriculture. I find that the banks are still breaking the law by charging more than the legal rate of interest. The rate is nearly always from eight to nine per cent in the west. An hon. member behind me says that they are the government, and probably there is more truth than fiction in that. Secondly, we find that although in an industry like agriculture, credit is needed for at least from one to three years; the agriculturists are forced to renew their notes every three of four months at compound interest. That is an unnecessary hardship. For some months during this crisis I have been receiving a great number of letters from farmers who claim that the banks have only too readily promised to reloan money to the farmer, so that he may pay up his local debts, if only he will first of all pay off his present indebtedness to the bank. This promise unfortunately has not always been kept.

When the second snow fell in October last year, we had only a small proportion of the threshing done in certain parts of the west, particularly in Alberta. The men who have been in that country from twenty to thirty years, good stable men who have helped to build up the country, have raised their families there, built schools, made roads, bought land and equipment, and who had no wish at all to leave the country, surely were worth a small amount being advanced to them to help them tide over the winter. In most cases they had no cash, and they needed money for food and clothing during the winter months. But they were abruptly turned down by the banks in nearly every case. Of the numerous letters that I have received, I shall quote only one, because I do not wish to take up the time of the house. One man writes me that although he had not had to borrow from any bank in years past, he had to go to them this year for ready cash. He listed his assets with the bank, which the banker admitted were about $17,000, and his liabilities were considered about $400. After a good deal of talking, the banker grudgingly loaned this man $150, and when advancing the money he said, "Do not tell anybody in your vicinity about it, because my instructions are not to loan."

These conditions, Mr. Speaker, have forced many farmers to get their necessities from the local stores on credit, and that naturally has had a bad effect on business, because the storekeepers should not be asked to carry the country. In the province of Alberta, conditions became so bad that a delegation of retailers waited on the premier of the province in January last and informed him that they were carrying such a load that they thought they could not go on; that they themselves were fearing pressure from those who supplied them with goods. They informed the premier that on their books alone they were carrying no less a sum than $40,000,000. When we consider that volume of indebtedness in a province with a population of not many more than 680,000, you can see how serious the situation is.

We are face to face with one of the most serious deflations that have been brought about from time to time. I want to quote a few words from the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, who, speaking in 1923 with regard to forced deflation, said:

> Very little argument is needed to show that a policy of driving or keeping down prices by a restriction of purchasing power must depress trade. . . . What is the consequence? Men and women are thrown out of employment, less is paid in wages, and the amount spent upon consumption is reduced.

If the Prime Minister of this country would pay a little more attention to the subject of finance and a little less attention to tariff barriers, in the long run the country would be better off. Realizing the difficulties with which we are faced in selling the crop either now or in future years the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta held in January last passed the following resolution:

> Whereas, the present price of wheat is far below the cost of production, and
> Whereas, a continuation of such a condition will inevitably mean a lower standard of living for agriculture, and
> Whereas, no benefit of the low price is being passed on to the consumer in the way of cheaper bread:
> Therefore be it resolved, that an international conference be called representative of all wheat exporting countries, with the aim of stabilizing the producing of, and the export price for wheat, to enable the grower to meet the cost of production and obtain a reasonable profit, and Further be it resolved that Canada, through her Prime Minister be the convener of such conference, which should be called at the earliest possible date.

What has been the answer? Within the last few weeks we have been cut off almost completely from one great exporting country. The effect to-day is indeed very, very serious. By cooperating with those who are competing with us in world trade we may gain something; but by antagonizing those competitors we can do a great deal of harm. In my opinion the sale of Canada's wheat is the most important problem with which we are faced. Had time permitted I would like to have said a few words in support of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) that Canada should go off the gold basis, which would give us a fair chance to compete with Australia, Argentine and Russia.

In conclusion may I state that we find agriculture struggling to exist. Mr. Brownlee, the premier of Alberta, went so far as to say that we cannot allow agriculture to be destroyed, realizing that it was likely to be destroyed. Other industries depend on agriculture because it is basic to our industrial life. If something is not done I see only two courses open: Either people will leave the farms in great numbers or if they remain and attempt to compete they will have to accept a reduced standard of living. Either alternative would be very regrettable indeed. I appeal with ample cause therefore to the government of the day to aid agriculture before it is too late.

Hon. P. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, as, under the rule, I am limited to a period of forty minutes, I shall merely offer congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address without entering upon an extended discussion of their remarks. I will say a word or two however with reference to the mover of the address. The hon. gentleman is of my own race. I congratulate him upon the manner in which he performed the task entrusted to him but while doing so I cannot congratulate him upon the arguments he used on behalf of the government. My hon. friend quite properly thanked the government for conferring upon the Acadian race through him the honour of moving the address. With his statements in that regard I am in hearty accord and I feel that I too should thank the government for recognizing the Acadian people in the maritime provinces. If however one were to listen to and accept all that the honourable gentleman said one would be inclined to believe that this was the first time justice had been done by any government to the Acadian people. My hon. friends opposite should not forget that the greatest act of justice to those people must be credited to a Liberal government. In 1926 for the first time the government recognized that justice should be done in Acadia and with that in mind one of our people was called to preside over one of the most important government departments. If however the government of to-day has not seen fit to repeat that act of justice then with the mover of the address I say, "Thank them, and at the same time thank the Lord for small gifts received."

My hon. friend referred to the bonne entente which existed between the English and French speaking people of the province of New Brunswick. With him I am in accord on that point. There is a bonne entente between those two races which compose the population of the province. I hope that condition will long continue but I fear Mr. Speaker that, through the actions of certain members of the Conservative party in the last Dominion election in the province of New Brunswick as well as in the province of Prince Edward Island, the entente in a very short time may cease to exist. When one reviews the election campaign of last July he discovers that certain persons acting on behalf of or in the interest of the Conservative party sent through the mails thousands of circulars calling upon the people of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island to vote against the Liberal government because it had dealt too justly with the Acadian people. It is high time such actions were frowned upon and exposed in this house. The sooner they are exposed the sooner will this method of warfare disappear. Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to place on Hansard to-day, not for the sake of arousing prejudice or making political capital, evidence of the sordid tactics employed during the heat of the recent political battle. In my hand I hold a circular which was sent broadcast through the provinces of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. I cannot speak for Nova Scotia because I have no evidence in connection with that province, but I have evidence concerning the two former provinces. I wish to place the contents of this circular on Hansard to show the tactics adopted during the last federal election in at least two provinces with the purpose of leading the people astray. This circular begins:

Are we a British dominion?

Then follows:

List of Roman Catholic cabinet ministers and chairmen of important committees in the House of Commons, 1930. The Minister of Justice, Hon. Ernest Lapointe, French; the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Hon. P. J. A. Cardin, French; the Solicitor General, Hon. L. Cannon, French; Postmaster General, P. J. Veniot, French;

And proud of it too.

The Secretary of State, Hon. F. Rinfret, French; the Minister of Labour, Hon. Peter Heenan, Roman Catholic—

They do not give his nationality. Not satisfied with that they take up the officials of the House of Commons and the chairman of the several committees of the house and in that connection we have the following:

The Speaker of the House of Commons, Hon. R. Lemieux, French.

He had that distinction by virtue of an unwritten law of the House of Commons that French and English alternately shall fill the position which you occupy to-day, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk of the House of Commons, A. Beauchesne, French; Deputy Clerk, T. M. Fraser, Roman Catholic.

Coming as he does from good old Presbyterian stock in the county of Pictou I am sure his ancestors would turn in their graves if they could see this publication.

Chief Liberal whip, Pierre Casgrain, French.

Everybody knows he is French.

Chairmen of standing committees, 1930—
Railways, F. S. Cahill, Roman Catholic.
Private Bills, G. Parent, French.
Standing Orders, L. S. R. Morin, French.
Printing, Hon. C. Marcil, French.
Mines, Forests and Waters, E. A. Lapierre, French.
Canadian National Railways, Sir E. Fiset, French.

Listen to this:

Soldiers' Pensions, et cetera, C. G. Power, half French and Irish.

And then the statement winds up as follows:

With compliments of Roy N. Stapleford, field secretary of the Loyal Orange Association of New Brunswick.

I am not holding the Conservative party responsible for this, but the gentleman who issued the circular. He was not fair enough to state that of the sixteen or seventeen ministers in the late government, five were of French and one of Irish Catholic origin. He was not fair enough to state that out of seventeen committees of this house only six or seven had French or Irish Catholics at their head. The evident intention was to arouse a feeling of prejudice in the people of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island against the Liberal party.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having exposed those tactics, let me come back to some of the arguments used by the hon. gentleman who moved the address (Mr. Cormier). He spoke of the great improvement brought about in New Brunswick since the present government came into power. He forgot, though, to tell the house that since the special session at which the customs tariff was increased, out of four cotton mills that we had in the province one has been closed down and dismantled. He forgot to tell the house that the money expended through the co-operation of the federal and provincial governments has resulted in the operators of the lumber camps of New Brunswick reducing the wages of their employees almost to the vanishing point—to a point where they are almost as bad as the scale of wages purported to be paid to a similar class of labour in Russia. He forgot to tell the house that while the provincial government reduced the stumpage on lumber in order to aid and encourage the lumbermen to develop their industry to a greater extent, the federal treasury, paid every dollar of that reduced stumpage to the tune of $60,000, and yet the lumbermen forced down the wages of their workmen to $18 to $28 a month. Notwithstanding this wage-reduction the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) never took any steps to see that the fair wage clause was enforced to protect those men. And I ask the hon. gentleman what reply did he get from the Minister of Labour when in his capacity as the representative of Madawaska-Restigouche he appealed to the minister to see that the proper wages were paid to those men. The hon. gentleman has forgotten to tell the house that since that time the chief industry in his home town, one of the largest pulp and newsprint industries in the Dominion, has been going steadily behind until to-day it is running only to about 60 per cent of its capacity; and that he as mayor of the city of Edmundston should know that the civic authorities have been called upon to maintain no less than one hundred families whose breadwinners could not get employment. Those are things that the hon. gentleman has forgotten to tell the house.

He has forgotten further to inform this house that not one cent from the Dominion treasury has reached in direct aid the unemployed of New Brunswick and especially his own county. He forgot to tell the house that the Minister of Public Works of the province who has the determination of the policy to be adopted for the expenditure of money in cooperation with the federal authorities in aid of unemployment, has publicly stated that he would recommend that no aid be given to the municipal authorities in the province, but that any federal grant for unemployment should be expended on the construction of roads and bridges, in winter time in the province, where there are four or five feet of snow at that season of the year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. member be good enough to tell the house when Mr. Stewart said anything of the sort, giving the time and place.

Mr. VENIOT: Yes. He said it at a conference at Bathurst in reply to a question I put to him myself, and there were fifty people present who heard him.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I referred a moment ago to the closing down of industries in New Brunswick. If I am not mistaken the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) mentioned the great benefit Cornwall was deriving from the increased labour in the cotton mills of his home town, brought about by the increased tariff passed at the special session last September. What may have been a blessing for his riding has turned out to be a disaster for New Brunswick. Let me relate a circumstance connected with the closing down of the cotton mill in the city of St. John. A rumour got abroad that the mill was to close its doors in the month of December. The city of St. John, through its mayor, appealed to the premier of New Brunswick, and he in turn appealed to the Canadian Cottons Limited not to close the mill. As a result of agitation a public meeting was called in the city of St. John, to which Mr. Dawson, the president of the Canadian Cottons Limited, was invited. Mr. Dawson met the premier of the province, the mayor of the city and the aldermen, as well as members of the board of trade and a large number of the leading business men. He met also my friend the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). He was appealed to not to close the mill, but that appeal was in vain. He told them distinctly that that mill was closed and would remain closed. They were dismantling the mill and they would finish dismantling it. Apparently the appeal of the Premier of New Brunswick to the federal government had no effect on Mr. Dawson. What do we find? During the progress of the discussion at that conference there was also present the hon. the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren), the representative of the province of New Brunswick in the present government. And if one is to judge from the newspaper reports the meeting was almost a Donnybrook fair. But Mr. Dawson stood firmly by his guns; he took no backwater whatever. The St. John Telegraph-Journal, reporting the occasion, has this to say:

> Mr. Dawson issued an ultimatum that he would not only not reopen the Cornwall cotton mill but that he would also close the York mill (the second mill in St. John) if its operation proved unprofitable. Mr. Dawson went further and said if the financial standing of the Canadian Cottons Limited did not improve he would also close the Milltown and Marysville mills.

The Marysville mills are situated in the county of York-Sunbury. In an editorial based on the result of the meeting the Telegraph-Journal has this further to say:

> In other words, Mr. Dawson, speaking on behalf of his own company, has made a clear-cut statement that in his opinion, backed by his directors, the Canadian tariff is designed—> —to benefit the central provinces, and should not concern itself with the maritime provinces, when the interests of the company are prejudiced. That is to say, he places the interests of his concern above the national interests of Canada, unmindful of the fact that all Canadians are taxed to create employment and not to benefit industrialists. If Mr. Dawson is sincere in his convictions, he has made one of the finest contributions to a free trade campaign in this country that has been offered by any manufacturer for a good many years. As a group who has long sought protection, the president of the Canadian Cottons Limited and his directors have taken a position which may react on them in a manner which may prove their undoing.

Now let hon. members from the province of New Brunswick listen to this.

Premier Baxter obtained from Mr. Dawson the information, that in sixteen years the mills had broken even. He then demanded to know why they were closing this mill. According to the report in the press, and according to Mr. Baxter, Mr. Dawson had tried to place the blame on the federal Prime Minister. Premier Baxter contended that:

> It was not for the government to run cotton mills, but it was for the people to see that no group shall have the benefit of tariff and at the same time pick and choose what parts of the country were to benefit. It would be better to bring cotton in from Lancashire free of duty.

That phrase comes from one of the strongest protectionists and high tariff men in the Dominion of Canada. The Telegraph-Journal then comes back in another editorial and says:

> Mr. Dawson for the third time expressed the opinion that the closing of the St. John mills must be laid on the doorstep of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. He told his listeners that Mr. Bennett's policy provided that efficiency and the consequent maintaining of present price levels was the essential of the recently adopted tariff.

The Telegraph-Journal then goes on and argues that Mr. Dawson completely ignores the principle laid down by the Prime Minister during the debate on this tariff item at the special session of parliament when he said that he would expect the cotton interests to keep their promises made to him that the unemployed in idle cotton mills would again be provided with work. The way the cotton magnates are keeping that pledge to the Prime Minister is that they are closing down the Cornwall mill. They closed it down and reduced the number of employees in the York cotton mill at St. John, and that mill is working only four days a week now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member mean to suggest that the closing of the Cornwall mill was due to the increase in the tariff? Does he not know the reason is entirely different?

Mr. VENIOT: I am not saying anything of the kind; I will come to that in a moment. I did not say that the increase in the tariff caused the closing of the Cornwall mill. The Prime Minister told us last September that the increase would keep that mill going, and it has not done so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They transferred the business to Marysville.

Mr. VENIOT: According to the Canadian Cottons Limited they cannot give increased employment and at the same time maintain the present price level; they must decrease the number of their mills and throw thousands out of employment. Or, if they carry out the principle laid down by the Prime Minister, they must increase the price to the consumer.

That is the situation Mr. Dawson has laid before the people in St. John. I do not know who is right in the interpretation of the effect of this increased tariff. Is it Mr. Dawson, who states that it will not accomplish what the Prime Minister says?—Mr. Dawson who is considered to be an expert in these matters. Or is it the Prime Minister who blindly went into the matter of increasing the tariff without obtaining proper information from proper sources, but, when increasing the tariff, considered only the interests of the manufacturers, never taking time or trouble to consult the consumers? In reply to the Minister of Pensions and National Health, Mr. Dawson said that:

> If the tariff did not help, the elimination would go on and the least profitable mills be closed down.

And we find that my friend the hon. member for York-Sunbury stated that it was not the intention of the government in increasing the tariff to bring about the centralization of manufacturing. To that the Premier of New Brunswick replied: "Then, if that was not the intention, let them change the tariff."

So now you have the history of the closing-down of the cotton industry in New Brunswick. But Mr. Dawson was asked—Why not close down the industry at Marysville instead of the industry at St. John? He stated that they had too great an investment in the large number of brick dwelling houses which had been erected some twenty or twenty-five years ago by the late Alexander Gibson to permit of their being done away with. That was the only reason given for not closing the cotton mill at Marysville, within the county represented by the hon. member for York-Sunbury. I have not heard the hon. member for York-Sunbury, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) or the junior member for St. John (Mr. Bell) raise one single protest since their return to Ottawa. There is nothing to show what action they took in defence of the destruction of an industry in their own province. May I be permitted as the lone star on the Liberal side from the province of New Brunswick to raise my voice, since the Conservative members will not do it, on behalf of the people not only of St. John, the commercial capital of the province, but of the whole province of New Brunswick. I appeal to the government to listen to Premier Baxter in his protest against the closing of this cotton mill, and acceed to his request that the federal government invoke the power given to them under the amended act of last September and either cancel or lower the tariff on cotton so that the people of New Brunswick will not have to suffer this injustice any longer. As the saying is, that was the last straw that broke the camel's back, because it was after this and after the Conservative province of New Brunswick headed by the premier of that province had pleaded for better terms from this government in railway matters, that the Premier of New Brunswick gave vent to that expression which was broadcast throughout the Dominion of Canada, that the maritime provinces had a right to secede from confederation.

An hon. MEMBER: Surely not.

Mr. VENIOT: If those words had fallen from the lips of a Liberal he would have been condemned for all time to come and paraded as the most disloyal man in Canada.

My time is limited but I have another subject upon which I desire to touch. During the last campaign the Liberal party were blamed for the depression which existed at that time in Canada, but I draw the attention of the house to two speeches delivered by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) after the elections. He delivered two speeches in Regina, one at a luncheon given to him by the Conservative Association and the other at a public meeting held that night. In his first speech he is reported as stating:

> Attempts were being made and would be made to fasten on the present government responsibility for the present day conditions. But nobody could deny that the present depression was only the culmination of nine years of total disregard for fundamental principles of constitutional government and disregard of the elementary laws of economics.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: I hear, "Hear, hear." I wonder what my hon. friend will say to the next quotation, taken from his second speech, as follows:

> The present depression is the greatest world-wide depression on record, for news of hard times in all other parts of the world had a cumulative depressing effect on the psychology of Canadians.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. VENIOT: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." Let me quote another hon. gentleman, in whom I know the hon. member has great faith, and see if he can reconcile the attitude of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) with the attitude taken by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought it incumbent upon himself to make a New Year's address to the people of Canada, in which he said:

> The year 1930 was a year of serious depression in Canada, as in practically every other nation.

He continued:

> Owing to its basic wealth Canada was less affected than most other countries.

He at least displays more fairness in his appreciation of the situation than did the Prime Minister. The greeting continued:

> The blame for world-wide depression was due to declines in wholesale prices, particularly food products and raw materials.

I do not hear "hear, hear" now. He continued:

> The fall of wholesale prices has nearly spent its force. Prosperity will return when a readjustment of wholesale and retail prices and production costs has taken place.

And again:

> While the times through which we are passing are admittedly difficult for the nation and disastrous for many necessitous individuals, they are certainly not so difficult as those we have faced before. The present winter, hard as it is for many, is relatively less distressing than those of 1913-14 and 1920-21.

Let me add, when the Conservative party was in power. The admission is made here that under the Tory rule, under a high protective tariff we had greater depression in Canada than exists at the present time. The hon. minister continued:

> Canada as a nation is very much wealthier and better able to withstand adversity than she was in any similar period of former times, when the question of our solvency was gravely debated in London and New York.

That was in 1920 and 1921 when we were under Conservative rule. The money markets of London and New York had no faith in the financial ability of Canada to carry on.

All this great change could not come about within six or seven months. It started after 1922 when, as the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, Canada began to rise from the slough of despondency and, creating new markets as the government was, extending the trade of Canada to foreign countries, increasing manufactures in Canada and finding a market for them at good prices, rose gradually to the position admitted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, one of high credit in the money markets of New York and London. A final quotation from the New Year's greetings of the Minister of Trade and Commerce is as follows:

> To-day our national credit in London and New York and among our own people stands far higher than it did even ten years ago, and we are able to finance our own enterprises in a way which was then impossible.

I appeal to the country to state whether or not it was honest on the part of the Minister of Trade and Commerce during the elections in July to preach the principles which he preached throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, to place entirely upon the shoulders of the Liberal party the blame for being the cause of this depression, and now come before the people with a New Year's greeting, moved, no doubt, by repentance for his political sins, and admit that what he told the people in July last was all humbug. He is now endeavouring to sow a spirit of optimism in the hearts of our people by telling them, "Why, Canada is all right." Yes, Canada is all right, but the Tory party did not make her so.

I was amused on Monday last to listen to the indignation expressed by the Prime Minister at what he called insinuations and innuendos—I think the term he used was "insinuendos"—from this side of the house, because if you read Hansard from one end to the other for the last four years you will find it is replete with innuendos and insinuations by the right hon. gentleman when he was addressing himself to members or supporters of the then government. He is an adept at insinuations. I know no other man in Canada who can do more insinuating and use more innuendos in argument than the present Prime Minister of Canada. I can give several examples of that. For instance, there are the insinuations he made in connection with the tariff board to the effect that they had no independence as a fact-finding body. He made insinuations even in regard to ministers of the crown; when he could not speak of them in a respectful manner he would insinuate that this and that were wrong; but the greatest insinuation I ever heard falling from the lips of any gentleman fell from the lips of the Prime Minister when years ago, seated as a supporter of the Conservative government in this house, he took upon himself to insinuate that one who did afterwards become his leader was a tool or instrument in the hands of Mackenzie and Mann. All through the speeches for the last four years, Hansard is replete with insinuations of this nature. It seems to me to be a case of a thief crying "Stop thief!" in order to cover up his own tracks.

He also referred to the absurdity of the argument advanced by the leader of the opposition when he stated that there was no necessity for the special session to vote relief to the unemployed. The Prime Minister said that a Governor General's warrant could not be issued. In 1926, what do we find? We find that the right hon. gentleman as Minister of Finance, if I mistake not, in the "shadow government" recommended and approved the issue by governor general's warrants of $55,000,000. Why could he not do the same thing in regard to $20,000,000 to relieve the emergency situation in the Dominion of Canada last fall? I feel my time has expired and I do not wish to trespass any longer upon the patience of the house.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues who have spoken, I should like to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address, as well as to some of the younger members who have also spoken in the house for the first time. Not being acquainted with the French language, I was unable to understand what the mover of the address said, and I have not yet had the privilege of reading a translation. I listened, however, to the address of the seconder and also to the speech last night by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver), and I should like to congratulate those young men on the facility with which they were able to express themselves. I make the confession that although this is my tenth session I have never been able to feel completely at home on the floor of the House of Commons.

I was interested particularly in the address of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), who is no longer a young man, since I see in the Parliamentary Records that he has contested a good many elections in his district, but I could not help thinking of the contrast between the views expressed by him and those expressed by former representatives of that old constituency of Brome, the Hon. Sidney Fisher and the Hon. Andrew McMaster. I see also by the Parliamentary Guide that the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi is a physician. I was not able to determine whether he was a homeopathist or not. Some things led me to believe he might be, while others made me think he was not. Proceeding on the theory that a cure is effected by taking a hair of the dog that bit you, I thought he must be a homeopathist, but by the magnitude of the doses he prescribed I could not help thinking otherwise, for his cry is for more and more tariff, on the assumption, apparently, that if much is good more is better.

The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) called the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that there was not in the House of Commons a minister of labour. It had already been brought to our notice that there is also not a minister serving in the capacity only of minister of finance. It seems strange that such a situation should prevail in view of the large numbers of members opposite, and I have frequently had called to my mind a story that, I think, illustrates the situation. The principal of a theological college, when giving his students lectures on pastoral theology, used to talk to them somewhat in this strain. He reminded them with what circumspection they should treat the women of their congregation, treating the old women as mothers and the young women as sisters. He would conclude his remarks in this way: "For you know there are always lots of women in the congregation who think they would make good ministers' wives." I am sure there are plenty of members opposite who think they would make good cabinet ministers. Indeed, I have in mind two or three hon. gentlemen sitting down towards the other end of the chamber who, I think, would look much happier than they have been able to do since they have been in the house if they had been honoured with cabinet positions. The Prime Minister also seemed to resent the imputation that this was a one-man government. I have no doubt be believes he has been consulting his colleagues and that he is not the autocrat that the public think him to be, but while he was making that statement it was very interesting to look across the floor and see the stolid countenance of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and the sickly smile that passed over the face of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman).

The Prime Minister expressed indignation at being asked to fulfil his promises and pleaded for more time. If the Prime Minister had been more modest in his promises we might have been more modest in our demands, and it is because of the lavishness with which he made those promises, in a spirit almost of irresponsibility, that the country is now demanding that his promises be fulfilled. In illustration of the attitude of the Prime Minister during the whole campaign, I want to read an extract from one of his speeches. Although this has already been placed on Hansard, it is well that the attention of the house should be drawn to it again as indicating the temperament—I will put it in that way—of the Prime Minister. Speaking at Vancouver on January the 8th, he said:

> If Mr. Mackenzie King thinks I will not so build up our agricultural and industrial life that its strength will drive our products into the markets of the world, then he is wrong. For that I will do. If he thinks I will not establish new markets for these products, strive with all my heart to retain them, drive our products with all my power into new markets, into old markets, into reluctant markets, he is wrong. For that I will do.

There were other promises made. The hon. Minister of Justice when we met in the short September session, repudiated the statement attributed to him in the Manitoba Free Press, that the Bennett government would cure unemployment in three days, and explained that he did not say that, but what he did say was that in three days the House of Commons could pass legislation which would cure unemployment. Well, even if we accept his revised version, I think we are entitled to ask: Are conditions any better to-day than they were eight months ago? Has the government done anything to fulfil their promise?

Listening to those promises that were made so lavishly by hon. gentlemen opposite in the late campaign, I could not help recalling a very interesting story of an old stage coach driver, who owned a female dog that he valued very highly, and as he travelled along the road he promised one man after another a pup. Finally a passenger remonstrated and asked him how he could expect to carry out his promise. "Oh well," he answered, "it is a pretty mean man who would not promise a fellow a pup." When men go through the country claiming to be miracle-men, when they claim to be able to do something that no reasonable men expect them to do, something that every reasonable man knows they cannot do, they cannot wonder very much if we demand the fulfilment of their promises. The fact is that the country is now demanding the pups, and we have seen no sign of them as yet.

Mr. SPENCE: Give them time to grow.

Mr. BROWN: It is contended in some quarters that the difficulty in the west is purely a matter of psychology. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) yesterday undertook to tell us that things were not as bad as they might be, that they might be worse; but, of course, he admitted that they might be better. I am sure that the people of the western provinces will not thank him for placing the situation in the west before the people of the country in that light. There is no question that things are bad. It is all nonsense to say that we have just turned the corner, and that the present conditions are just a matter of psychology. Nothing of the kind. The farmers realize very keenly that they are up against the greatest depression that has ever struck them. The hon. member for Regina is somewhat like the man of the peculiar religious persuasion that holds that disease is all of the mind, and who asked a boy one day how his father was. "He is very sick," the boy replied. "Oh no," replied the man, "he only thinks he is sick." A week later this man asked the boy again how his father was. "Well," the boy replied, "he thinks he is dead." The undertaker thought so too, for he took him away and buried him. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that some of the farmers will be dead financially before the hon. member for Regina wakes up to the fact that distress does exist in the west.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the chief difficulty lies in the fact of that wide disparity between the prices we receive for the things that we sell and the prices we have to pay for the things that we buy. Already many illustrations of that disparity have been given to the house. We have passed through a period of low prices before. Those of us who have been in the west now for almost half a century know that in the early days prices were low. I can remember when wheat was 40 cents and oats nine and ten cents a bushel. I have driven wheat and oats twenty miles for those prices myself. I drew dressed pork a distance of twenty miles for a price of four cents a pound. Yes, we have seen these low prices before, but our produce at that time had a greater purchasing power than it has to-day. The difficulty lies in the fact that the prices of the goods we produce have gone down enormously while there has been comparatively little decrease in the prices of things that we buy. Let me give another illustration of that disparity. We members who come from the farms feel that we have to get spruced up a little before coming to Ottawa. So I went to get a shave and a haircut, and I found that it cost me about ten bushels of barley to get a shave and a haircut. That is too big a price to pay, even if the trimming is good enough to win the congratulations of the Prime Minister.

The speech from the throne is only one of the many disappointments which the country has had to experience recently. The first disappointment, of course, was the barrenness of the Prime Minister's trip to England, which has already been referred to at sufficient length. Perhaps I should explain what I mean by disappointment. Of course, all patriotic Canadians regret that the Prime Minister was not able to do more in England to bring us out of the depression from which we are suffering. Doubtless many of his most ardent supporters were also disappointed for the reason that they did expect him to do something. One of the most ardent supporters of the Prime Minister said: "Mr. Bennett believes that he is divinely commissioned to lead Canada out of the wilderness, and I believe it too." Naturally a man like that would be disappointed. Some of us had no such illusions. We did not believe that the course which the Prime Minister intended to pursue in England would be productive of results, and so in that sense we were not disappointed. We had simply the satisfaction of the tenth beatitude "Blessed are they who expect little for they shall not be disappointed."

Another great disappointment to the west was the Regina speech of the Prime Minister. He came west, and the stage had been very carefully set for his coming. The meeting had been announced some weeks beforehand, and the whole country was kept on the edge of expectation, hoping that great things were to come from that Regina speech. Well, the Prime Minister came, and spoke. I listened to his speech over the radio, and even over the radio you could sense the feeling of disappointment that passed through that audience. "The mountain laboured and brought forth a mouse." That speech was received with intense disappointment throughout the west. It was then that the people of the prairie provinces realized how completely they had been humbugged, just as the people of England were humbugged—at least they thought they were.

There is, of course, in the speech from the throne a recognition of the importance of the marketing of wheat. I am glad that the government does recognize its importance, for I know that some of the members of the government have refused to recognize the importance in our national economy of the marketing of wheat. In this connection I should like to refer to the statement that was made by the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm), which has been commented upon. When a statement is made and criticized one must always consider the circumstances prevailing at the time it was made. May I say that until the first of February of last year there was very little indication that the wheat markets were in a serious condition. I think I may say that up to that time if there had been any move on the part of the government to interfere with the marketing of wheat it would have been very keenly resented by the farmers.

Mr. CAHAN: Is that February of 1931?

Mr. BROWN: No, 1930, because it was then we began to recognize that wheat was piling up in vast quantities. As I say, up to that time the farmers, who had been led to believe both by the pool and by the regular grain trade that prices were going to be high and continue to be high, would have resented any move on the part of the government to interfere with the marketing of wheat. I think there is no question about that. About the time this house met in session last year conditions were beginning to assume a different aspect, and then it was that the party in opposition began to criticize the government for its negligence in the matter of the wheat trade. Hon. members on this side of the house regret the absence of the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). I hope the government will convey to him our best wishes for a speedy recovery, because while we may differ with the hon. minister we recognize in him a fair fighter. I refer to the hon. gentleman because he paid a visit to my constituency substituting for the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), the present Minister of Railways and Canals. For certain reasons that hon. gentleman was not allowed to speak in my constituency.

An hon. MEMBER: Always suppositions.

Mr. BROWN: However the present Minister of Trade and Commerce came into my constituency and spoke very indignantly about the laxity of the government in dealing with the wheat crop and he recalled to the minds of the electors the action taken on behalf of the farmers by Mr. Arthur Meighen from the years 1918 to 1922. He said that Mr. Meighen had instituted a wheat board and had sold the Canadian wheat, that he had made a permanent board and then the people had turned him out of office. When speaking to my electors I said that only one statement really was true, that the electors had swept Mr. Meighen from office. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is quoted as follows:

> Would it have not been effective if the men who went to England last year to endeavour to find a market for Canadian wheat had behind them the support of a strong, virile government, whose opinions and pronouncements had to be listened to by the other nations of the world?

It is very interesting to note that while the Minister of Trade and Commerce was speaking to the people of the west in that tone the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) was adopting an entirely different tone in the province of Quebec. Speaking at Buckingham Mr. Cahan used these words, as they are quoted in the Ottawa press:

> The real aim of the budget is to open markets for the wheat produced by the western provinces, but wheat is not the only industry in Canada. The man who gives $10 of labour, in manufactures, is doing as much in Canada as the man who produces 10 bushels of wheat in the west. We have made sacrifices. . . .

I want you working men to get this point.

> We have made sacrifices for these western provinces. . . .

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the east has made no sacrifices; they have given nothing to the west for which we have not paid many many times over.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BROWN: No man will be more willing to endorse that statement than the present Prime Minister. Then Mr. Cahan goes on to say, as reported in the Montreal Star of July 12:

> Mr. Dunning always thinks in terms of wheat. He has never had much else to think about. The entire wheat crop of Canada has never yet reached $500,000,000 in total value in any year, yet the gross annual value of the products of the factories of the island of Montreal alone is approximately $575,000,000.
> Mr. Dunning proposes that these Montreal factories shall be crippled and destroyed by the free admission of the products of British factories, in the hope that Great Britain may hereafter show good-will by buying more Canadian wheat.
> Canadians cannot live by wheat alone.

The point I make is that the Secretary of State seemed to see a conflict between the wheat growers on the prairies and the workers in the Montreal factories. I hope by this time he has realized that the interests of the workingman in Montreal are absolutely dependent upon the purchasing power of the farmers of the west and his people can succeed only in the proportion we succeed.

During this period of depression many western farmers have been advised to adopt mixed farming. It is somewhat amusing to come east and listen to the advice given. People who know nothing about farming take the liberty of advocating mixed farming and state emphatically that the west will have to adopt it. May I say Mr. Speaker, that so far as my district is concerned we have always had that type of farming. Our district is a mixed farming district although we grow great quantities of wheat. Our land however is suitable for the mixed variety of agriculture and we have always been engaged in it. Indeed I question if there are as many cattle and pigs being shipped from that district as there were thirty years ago. I remember that I came from the west about forty years ago with a train load of Gordon and Ironsides cattle and those cattle were gathered within a very short radius. We have always been engaged in mixed farming. I wish heartily to endorse the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that there are large areas of the western provinces not suitable for mixed farming. The lack of a good water supply in itself is sufficient to prevent the raising of cattle or hogs to a greater extent than is being done at the present time. Supposing we do engage in mixed farming to a greater extent, where will we get our markets? Supposing we do, from where will the markets come? There is nothing to encourage mixed farming on an extensive scale either in respect of cattle, hogs, eggs, honey or any of the other commodities. True, everybody recognizes the value of diversified farming. We believe it is better where possible not to have all our eggs in one basket. The people in the east fail to recognize however at the present time we are producing large quantities of different farm products. I wish to give these figures:

> In 1930 Manitoba produced 10,000,000 pounds of honey; Saskatchewan and Alberta 2,000,000 pounds. Manitoba produced 8,000,000 pounds of dairy butter and 15,000,000 pounds of creamery butter; Saskatchewan produced 30 million pounds of creamery butter and Alberta, 35 million pounds. Manitoba farmers sold 200 million gallons of milk and 4 million gallons of cream. The three prairie provinces produced a million pounds of cheese. The western Canada stock yards handled nearly 800,000 hogs, 330,000 cattle, 73,000 calves and 184,000 lambs. The Wool Pool handled 3 million pounds of wool.

Mr. GOTT: Was that last year?

Mr. BROWN: 1930.

Mr. GOTT: It would be interesting to have the figures for 1927. Has the hon. member got those handy?

Mr. BROWN: I am sorry, but I must hurry along. With regard to Mr. Beatty's proposal, naturally cheap money will be welcomed by the farmers of western Canada. But there is no need of Mr. Beatty's money to induce the farmers there to go more fully into live stock. Without a cent from Mr. Beatty Manitoba is likely next fall to be overrun with pigs. I know the farmers themselves are undertaking to increase the supply of hogs. This being so, what will become of those who borrow money from Mr. Beatty to go into the raising of hogs? With the greatly increased supply then available the condition will be infinitely worse than it is now.

If Mr. Beatty wants to do anything to help us. I think I can give him some advice. For instance, a reduction of freight rates would help, but of course that would interfere with those sacred dividends of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, they must be guaranteed for all time, no matter whether the farmers are getting their production costs or not. Mr. Beatty might also give some attention to the marketing problem in regard to our live stock products. What is the situation that confronts us? The men whom we sent to England to investigate the possibilities of marketing live stock products there tell us that there is an unlimited market for Canadian bacon, but the difficulty is lack of a continuous supply. Well, why is not that continuous supply available? Just because, whenever there is an extra carload of hogs on the market, down goes the price. If Mr. Beatty can do anything to stabilize the market for pork at something like a reasonable figure, there will be no doubt about ensuring a continuous supply of bacon. The loss in our export trade of course is attributable to other reasons than those advanced by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). He forgot to say anything about the immensely increasing consumption among ourselves. But we can furnish large amounts of pork for export if we can be assured of something like stability in our market. It is true our farmers will have to recognize that from time to time they may have to take a little lower price, but at present we are compelled to shoulder the whole burden. Three weeks ago in Winnipeg there was a large supply of cattle and hogs in the stock yards, and the buyers simply sat in their offices, they would not buy, with the result that the price of hogs went down to 5¼ cents a pound. Swift's buyer came out in our district and said that they ought to be buying at 5 cents. It is true the market has gone back again, so conditions now are not quite so bad as they were at that time.

Then there is talk about lessening the costs of production—I think we have the phrase in the speech from the throne—yet every action taken by the government tends to increase the cost of production. Last September our friends opposite were very fond of telling us that if the tariff duties were raised there would be no increase in the prices of the goods that we buy. Of course it is a little hard for us at present to prove that we have not received the full benefit from the reduction of prices that we are entitled to. That point was urged very strongly upon the government. As I say, at present, it is not particularly easy for us to get the actual results of the tariff amendments made at the special session, but I have one case in point. The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) has been ridiculed because of the socks that he produced in the Estevan election campaign. I am going to produce a pair. Those socks that I am now holding in my hand are pretty good-looking socks. I do not suppose the Prime Minister would wear them, but the constituents of the hon. members for Regina and Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) and of the other members from Saskatchewan would be glad to wear them—if they are able to buy socks at all this coming summer. Those socks used to be sold in Pilot Mound at 10 cents a pair.

An hon. MEMBER: What is wrong with them?

Mr. BROWN: There is nothing wrong with them. When the customs tariff was amended last fall, besides the increase in the ad valorem duty, a duty of $1.35 a dozen was imposed on socks that were then retailing at 10 cents a pair. The local merchant told me that he had been making a nice little profit at that price but as a result of the tariff legislation last September he cannot now buy the socks at all. As I say, there are many poor farmers in Saskatchewan who would be willing to wear these 10 cent socks. Indeed, I should be glad to get some myself. These socks that, as I say, were selling for 10 cents a pair cannot now be handled by the local merchants because of the increase in price due to the tariff legislation last fall. The onus rests upon hon. gentlemen opposite to show me where to-day I can get socks at a similar price.

We are being advised on the one hand to go into the production of live stock and in the speech from the throne it is said that we must reduce the cost of production. I want to remind the house that just at the time we are being urged to go into the production of live stock and our friends opposite are talking about decreasing the costs of production, the Minister of National Revenue has taken a course that simply amounts to a slap in the face. I refer to barbed wire. Barbed wire has been on the free list since the early days of the first Laurier administration. I remember in 1898 buying barbed wire to fence in a half section and I got the benefit of the wiping out of the tariff duty. Imagine the absurdity of telling us on the one hand to go into the production of live stock, and then on the other hand putting up the price of one of our prime essentials for the caring of live stock! If we could get not only barbed wire but woven wire at half the price we are getting it to-day, there would be no question about farmers going into live stock. The time has come when sheep will be a very valuable asset on the farm. But what is the chief handicap in handling sheep? The cost of fencing. In this connection I am going to read an extract from a despatch by the correspondent of the Manitoba Free Press:

> About $250,000 of barbed wire is imported annually. It comes from several countries, including Great Britain, the Netherlands, Belgium, Germany and the United States.

Here is what I want the house to note particularly:

> Since last summer, the price of wire has been falling rapidly. Exact prices are not available, but Hardware and Metal, of Toronto, states that recent declines aggregate 25 cents per 80-rod spools. These declines have made it difficult for Canadian wire manufacturers to compete. Hence, the request for dump duties.
> The government has fixed an arbitrary value, but has not yet announced what it is. The intention is to place the figure sufficiently high to offset recent reductions in price, and to enable Canadian manufacturers to make a profit. If foreign firms attempt to undersell this fixed price they will encounter dump duties of 50 per cent.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to be forced into the position of having to demand fixed prices for our products, for I regard it as not economically sound. But what are we going to do if the Minister of National Revenue insists that every manufacturer in Canada must have a price that shall secure him the home market at a certain profit? I put that question to the house. I should regret to be forced into the position of demanding a fixed price on wheat, but there is a situation that confronts us. This government takes the position that every man engaged in manufacturing must be secured a certain price for his products. What are we going to do?

Now what is necessary in the west? I admit, Mr. Speaker, that any measure that can be proposed at the present time other than direct financial assistance, will not be very effective. It will be difficult to give relief. Nothing but a straight money grant to every individual farmer on the prairies would really give him relief. But we know the difficulty in that regard. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) said that the people are not starving. No; that may be true. But they are simply hanging on and wondering what they are going to do. What is necessary is that means should be taken to restore the confidence and morale of the farmer. If that confidence can be restored then the farmers will go forward with some hope. But if they are going to be met by such impositions as this duty on barbed wire, I do not know what they are going to do. Of course, the price has not been raised, nor is that likely. But the point is, there has not been a reduction; that is what we want to emphasize. And unless steps are taken to restore the confidence of the farmers of the west the situation presents a grave danger to the commercial life of Canada.

Mr. MORAND: Would the hon. gentleman be prepared to have a factory closed and many men put out of employment in order to get wire a little cheaper?

Mr. BROWN: I do not know that the question requires an answer. Surely we have as much right to be guaranteed a price on our products as have the manufacturers of barbed wire.

Mr. MULLINS: Is not barbed wire cheaper on the prairies than it used to be?

Mr. BROWN: Of course, but we are not buying it as cheap as I bought it in 1898. It is not a matter of buying barbed wire cheaper than we used to buy it; it is a question of the Minister of National Revenue preventing us from getting the benefit of the reduction to which we are entitled.

Mr. WILSON: Had we a tariff on barbed wire in 1898?

Mr. BROWN: No.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): As one of the newly-elected members I am diffident about rising at this time to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. There are, however, some matters to which I should like to direct the attention of the government, matters to which I think they ought to give some heed. One of them, which I believe is about to be mentioned for the first time on the floor of this house, is the question of hospital treatment for those ex-soldiers who are not in receipt of a pension from the government. Personally I should like to have seen some mention made in the address of state health insurance, believing that the time has now come in Canada when some form of state health insurance should be considered, if not inaugurated, on behalf of the great masses of people throughout the country who have not the means with which to meet hospital or doctors' accounts which they or their families must incur in connection with such necessary service, and who in many cases would rather suffer than incur debts they are unable to pay.

Regarding the ex-service men I believe I am safe in saying that in British Columbia to-day, owing to her mild climate, far greater numbers of ex-soldiers are domiciled than were enlisted from the province for war purposes. Many of these ex-service men are to-day suffering from various complaints engendered by way of service, and owing to the fact that their disability did not develop until after the close of the war they are not entitled to free treatment at military hospitals. This situation is adding a considerable burden to the cities and municipalities for hospitalization purposes, which burden will no doubt increase as the age of the ex-service man advances. The greatest hardship of all is placed on the ex-service man who frequently finds himself in need of hospital attention the cost of which he is unable to meet.

I would urge upon the government to take steps to provide free hospital treatment for all ex-soldiers who owing to war service have developed some complaint or disability requiring hospital treatment. On account of the lack of free hospital service many of these men have suffered inconvenience and hardship.

In the speech from the throne I note that mention has been made of some change with regard to old age pensions. While agreeing with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that the federal government should assume a greater proportion of the cost of old age pensions, if not the whole of it, I personally should like to see the Dominion government not only assume the whole cost of old age pensions but also reduce the age from seventy years to at least sixty-five. Anyone who is conversant with conditions in the industrial field well knows that under our exacting social and industrial conditions to-day it is well-nigh impossible for the average person to put by a reserve for his old age, and with the labour markets glutted with thousands of young men ready and willing to work if given the opportunity, what chance has the man of even sixty of holding on to his job, let alone procuring one?

I note that the government has introduced a bill amending the Naturalization Act. I should like to have seen, if it were possible, some changes made along such lines as would more clearly designate who are Canadians as distinct from British; and I believe that some changes should be made to enable Canadians to register their children born in Canada as Canadians. It seems to me there is something wrong in this country when Canadians are warned, upon registering the birth of a child born in the country, that "Canadian" is no nationality.

Another matter I wish to speak about has reference to the paragraph of the speech which reads:

> Pursuant to the fixed policy of my government to combat all influences which are inimical to the social and economic welfare of this Dominion, an order in council has been passed prohibiting the importation of certain commodities into Canada from the Union of Soviet Socialist republics.

I wonder if in regard to the fixed policy of the government to condemn all influences which are inimical to the social and economic welfare of the Dominion, British Columbia is too far away to be regarded as part of the Dominion. In that province, particularly in the lower mainland, we have a social and economic problem almost entirely confined within our own boundary and as to which I should be pleased to see the so-called fixed policy of the government put into effect. I refer to the Asiatic question. If ever there were influences inimical to the economic welfare of any part of Canada it is the enormous growth and influence of the orientals in British Columbia. No race can assimilate except by intermarriage, and intermarriage between whites and Asiatics is usually repugnant to both races. The seriousness of this increase of orientals in the lower Fraser valley can be best described by stating that in Richmond, in my constituency, over 40 per cent of the pupils attending the schools are Japanese. In the town of Steveston, where there is a fourteen-room school, ten rooms are used exclusively for Japanese, three rooms are mixed and one room only is all white. Some criticism is due to the government for permitting the immigration of orientals at a time when the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) was taking steps to close the doors against immigrants from other countries. Surely if any people were to be debarred from Canada it should have been those who will not assimilate and who are accustomed to a much lower standard of living. Even Russians and their children could become good citizens of this country. Personally I should like to see the government close the gates against orientals, say for a period of ten years or until such time as we in British Columbia would no longer have any fear of domination by the Asiatic, as we do at the present time.

Pursuing its fixed policy of combating all influences inimical to the social and economic welfare of this Dominion, the government decided to prohibit the importation of certain commodities from the Union of Soviet Socialistic republics. I am at a loss to know why Russia should be singled out, unless it is that at a distance it seems to be a country where government is by the people and for the people. This seemed to be repugnant to Sir Herbert Holt, whose opinion was made known to Canada before the order in council was passed. It may have been merely a coincidence; the government may have acted without knowing of that opinion, but it seems to me that if they really desired to help the coal industry a tax should have been put upon fuel oil. That action would have been more beneficial to Canada than the prohibition of trade with Russia.

I should like to invite the attention of the government to another matter affecting Canada generally and British Columbia in particular, namely the poultry industry. At the present time there is no shortage of eggs in Canada, nor has there been for some considerable time, in fact fresh eggs are cheaper and have been offered in greater volume during the past year than at any time for some years past. So great has been the production of eggs during the last five or six months that at times there was a glut and it was impossible to find a market. The climate of British Columbia is admirably adapted to the production of eggs, more especially during the winter months. The British Columbia egg is the best in Canada, if not in the whole world, and last year the constituency which I have the honour to represent produced the world's record white Leghorn, a hen which laid 357 eggs in 365 days. This hen does honour not only to her owners, Mr. and Mrs. W. Whiting of Port Kells, but to Canada as well. During a period of three weeks 70,000 hens were sacrificed in the Fraser valley because eggs were a glut on the market and were selling for as low as 12 cents per dozen, and as a result a number of the poultry owners were forced to get rid of their stock in an endeavour to meet their accounts; in fact many of them were compelled to go out of business.

Considerable help would be afforded to the dairymen and poultrymen of British Columbia if the domestic freight rates were reduced to the export rate. The difference of some $4.20 per ton would be an average saving to the poultryman in British Columbia of $100 to $500 per year, which in many instances would mean the difference between staying on the ranch and leaving it and thus swelling the number of job-seekers in the cities. The great problem facing Canada to-day is to find a market for her surplus products, and how that can be accomplished under the policy of the present government I have yet to learn.

Before closing I should like to make some criticism as to the inquiry conducted by the hon. Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) into the price of bread. While the minister seems to have secured a lot of data in the way of prices of wheat and so on, apparently no notice has been taken of a most vital point, namely, the high cost of flour in its relation to the price of wheat. A very casual reading of the minister's report would indicate that he has taken great pains to tell us about the price of labour, distribution, cost of ingredients, overhead and so on, but he has given no information as to any inquiry into the question why flour prices should be as high as they are. Judging from the report, one might think that flour was a mere detail in the making of bread, simply one of the minor ingredients such as salt or sugar. The following appears on page 30 of the report:

> In the making of bread, flour costs represent only 36 per cent and that flour is becoming less and less important in the modern loaf.

Page 41 of the report reads:

> Our records show that in 1929, the mill-controlled bakeries purchased in all well over one million barrels: Moreover, this million-barrel market was held by only four milling companies and represented an eighth of the entire consumption of flour in Canada in 1929.

These milling companies are thus provided with an assured outlet for a large portion of their products and consequently should be able to reduce considerably their sales cost. Here is a paragraph I would like to direct to the serious attention of the government. It reads:

> One decided advantage to the mills is that there is no competition for this business, price competition, or any other kind.

This gives to these companies a virtual monopoly of flour, the gravest kind of monopoly, affecting as it does the very life of the masses.

I should like to make a comparison between the prices of wheat and flour in Canada and in Australia. I quote the Australian prices because that country has a fairly high standard of living. The ruling selling price of wheat f.o.b. steamer at principal Australian ports was 61 cents for the month of December, 1930; the price of flour f.o.b. steamer at Australian ports per 2,000 pounds was $27.37, which is equivalent to about 1.4 cents per pound of flour. Canadian prices for the same period were: December wheat, fifty-six cents per bushel; December flour, $4.76 per ninety-pound sack, or 2.4 cents per pound of flour. Not only was Australian wheat quoted for sale at five cents a bushel more, but the price of flour offered at Australian ports was sixty-four cents for a forty-nine pound sack as against $1.19 wholesale price in Canada. It is high time that the government should investigate the price of flour in this country and, if necessary, should break up this combine of millers who, I claim, are exploiting the people of Canada to-day in one of the most essential items of our food, namely, flour. To paraphrase the words of Thomas Hood who many years ago wrote a poem entitled The Song of the Shirt:

> O God! that bread should be so dear,
> And men and wheat so cheap.

On behalf of the lower mainland of British Columbia an investigation was asked of the Minister of Labour into the prices of all wheat products. The price of bread was secondary. One of the objects in view was the giving of some protection to the independent bakeries and to all other purchasers of flour. The situation is such as to warrant continued government action, the more so in view of a statement I noticed in the Vancouver Province of the tenth of March last to the effect that the four milling companies are about to amalgamate into one large concern.

Mr. E. J. YOUNG (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is not in his seat, because recently he made some remarks which were directed to me personally, and I wish he were present so that I might direct my observations to him personally. The other day, speaking from his place in the house, he said that I had been going around the Estevan district with a pair of white stockings in my pocket. I know he obtained the information from his bosom friend, Doctor Anderson, Premier of Saskatchewan, but the information is not, strictly speaking, accurate. I was not carrying stockings, but for the information of the house and in order to set people's minds right, I will tell the house exactly what happened. It will be recalled that at the special session last fall, the government of which the right hon. gentleman is the head enormously increased duties on many commodities, amongst which were socks, and they did this in such a way that the heaviest burden would fall upon the poor man. Before leaving Ottawa I secured three pairs of socks which I took out to the west to illustrate to the people exactly what the government had done. I had a pair of workingmen's cheap cotton socks, the cheapest I could buy, such a sock as the unemployed would wear—and remember, Mr. Speaker, that this special session was called for the relief of unemployment. I have those socks yet.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Produce them.

Mr. YOUNG: I have them in my hand. I showed these socks to the people of the Estevan district and I explained that under Liberal rule the duty on these socks was 30 per cent, but that under the present Prime Minister the duty was increased at one stroke to 165 per cent of the value of the article. I had also a pair of cheap children's socks, such as the poor man would buy for his child. I have them in my hand. I showed these socks to the people and I explained that under Liberal rule the duty on these socks was 30 per cent, but that under the present administration the duty was increased at one stroke to 185 per cent of the value of the socks. I had still another pair of socks; they were not cheap socks, they were beautiful socks.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they?

Mr. YOUNG: They are in my pocket. They are socks such as the Prime Minister himself or his wealthy Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) would wear, that anyone would be glad to wear. I have them in my hand. I showed these socks to the people and I explained to them that the duty on these under Liberal rule was 35 per cent, because the Liberals believed that the rich man should pay more than the poor man, but that under the present administration the duty on these socks had been increased to 51 per cent. At a special session of parliament, called to relieve distress, to relieve unemployment, my right hon. friend increases the duty on the sock of the poor man or the unemployed to 165 and 185 per cent, but on his own sock he is satisfied with 51 per cent. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) a little while ago pointed out that certain socks were off the market because of that duty. A friend of mine, belonging to the wool producers of Saskatchewan, went into their office in Regina the other day and asked for a price on four-point Hudson Bay blankets, which are the best blanket you can get. The dealer said: "I can give you at a reasonable price some four-point Hudson Bay blankets that have been carried over from last year." My friend said that he wanted new blankets. The dealer replied: "There is no new stock; we are not handling them any more; with the present tariff we cannot handle them any more." The man said: "Do you mean to tell me I can no longer buy four-point Hudson Bay blankets?" The dealer replied: "On account of the present duties imposed by the present government it is impossible to sell those blankets any more in this country." Because of that duty the people of Canada are to-day compelled to adopt a lower standard of living by buying inferior blankets.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member not know that most of these Hudson Bay blankets are made in Canada, some in my own town?

Mr. YOUNG: I am not speaking of where they are made.

Mr. McGIBBON: If they are made in Canada, how can there be any duty on them?

Mr. YOUNG: There is the answer to the government's contention. The blankets are made in Canada and the price has gone up

The Prime Minister also said that he would not listen to any such speeches as I made during the short session. That is very much like a statement he made the other day when Mr. R. J. Deachman, representative of the consumers' league, appeared before a committee of the cabinet at the request of the Canadian Council of Agriculture to represent the cause of the farmers of this country when the cabinet was considering increasing tariffs. What did the Prime Minister say to him? "We do not want any arguments from you." That is what the Prime Minister said to our representative before the cabinet. That is what he is saying to us in the west, and that is what he said in his speech on Tuesday—"We do not want any arguments from you." What was the matter with the speeches I made last session? Just let us review for a moment what I said then.

One of the first measures, if not the first measure brought in at that session, was a bill authorizing the government to spend $20,000,000 for the relief of unemployment. As was my duty I arose in my place on that occasion and told the Prime Minister what I thought of his bill. I told him that in my opinion it would not relieve the smallest fraction of unemployment. I tried to explain that the cause of unemployment was that the people had no purchasing power. I tried to explain that before he could spend $20,000,000 or $20 on unemployment, he must first take that money out of the pockets of the people. I tried to explain that if he spent $20,000,000 in one part of the country, creating employment, he would create $20,000,000 worth of unemployment in other parts of the country where he collected that money; for he would by that very act still further reduce their purchasing power. Was I not right?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. YOUNG: Let us see. The minister's own officers told us at that time that there were two hundred thousand unemployed in Canada. To-day there are three hundred thousand. Has that relieved unemployment? Was I not right?

Further than that, the Prime Minister brought down other measures increasing the tariff enormously, to give employment to Canadian labour and encourage Canadian industry, as he said. Again I tried to explain to him that the cause of the trouble was the lack of purchasing power on the part of the people. I tried to explain to him that in no possible way could he legislate through his tariff to bring about higher prices for the commodities that we had to sell abroad. I tried to explain that the purchasing power of the people could not be restored until a parity was restored between the prices of the goods we had to sell and the prices of the goods we had to buy, and that the only way in which the purchasing power of the people of this country could be increased was by bringing down the cost of the commodities we had to buy. I pointed out to him that the measures he was then taking to relieve unemployment would have just the opposite effect, that they would keep prices up, and that as a consequence we would have less purchasing power and more unemployment. Was I not right? What has been the result? Let us see what the Prime Minister himself said the other day in regard to the work of the special session:

> Where would this country have been had it not been for the session last fall which gave employment to upwards of two hundred thousand people? Study if you will for a moment the figures of industry. In eight months new factories cannot be equipped and built, but they can be commenced, and the numbers that have been commenced in this country during those eight months are more than those during any other similar period in recent years.

I want to deal with that statement. The Montreal Star sent out a man to look over the industrial districts of this country, to find out just what had been effected by these tariff increases, and his observations were published in a series of articles in the Montreal Star, a copy of which has been sent to every member of the house. What did he find? He reported that new industries had been established in this country, because of this tariff, with a capital investment of some $14,000,000. Incidentally he included in that $14,000,000 some $6,000,000 invested in a fertilizer plant at Trail, British Columbia, which plant he forgot to tell us had been established four years ago under the Liberal regime. But we will allow him that $6,000,000. Including that, the most he could find was $14,000,000 of new capital invested in industry, all of which he attributed to the increased tariff. We will be generous; we will double his estimate and make it $28,000,000. Let us say that there was new capital invested to the amount of $28,000,000. Now $28,000,000 in four months is at the rate of $84,000,000 a year; and the average investment of new capital in Canadian industry during the last seven years of Liberal government was $227,000,000 a year. The Prime Minister said that no such amount of capital as had been invested in this country in industry since the new tariff came into effect had been invested in any other eight months' period in recent years. I dare aver, Mr. Speaker, that we never had in the history of Canada an eight months' period when there was so little new capital invested as during the last eight months.

This same writer in the Montreal Star, Mr. MacLeod, writing of the benefits of this new policy, tells us that it has given employment to two thousand hands. We know from the government's own figures that last fall there were two hundred thousand unemployed, and to-day there are three hundred thousand. Let us strike the balance: Two thousand men given employment, and one hundred thousand more men thrown out of employment. Was I not right? What does all the benefit of this tariff policy amount to as compared with what it has cost Canada? It is but "A wrecker's handful of coin gleaned from the beach to which he has beguiled an argosy."

The government also told us at the special session that they had assurances from the manufacturers that if the tariff increases proposed were granted, the manufacturers would not increase their prices. I directed a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) at the time, and asked him if any manufacturer had refused to give such an assurance. I did not ask that question just to tease the minister, or to wear out his patience, as the Prime Minister suggested, but because at the time I had information in my possession that certain manufacturers had flatly refused to give any such assurance. Here is an article from the Toronto Mail and Empire, a good Conservative paper. Speaking of the new customs regulation in regard to the valuation of automobiles, in its issue of February 20, 1931, it says:

> General Motors, Durant, Willys-Overland Company, Chrysler and other Canadian manufacturers, it is understood, have been urging the change upon the Dominion government ever since the special session of parliament last year, when it was indicated that the government at that time contemplated increasing motor car duties by some 20 per cent. A promise was then sought that the domestic prices would not be increased, but it is understood, Mr. Bennett and his ministers were told flatly and frankly that to raise the rate of duty would be automatically to increase domestic prices to the consumer and cut down consumption, with consequent increase in unemployment.

That put the minister in a quandary. He wanted to raise the duties on automobiles. He had promised the house and the country that he would first get assurances from the manufacturers that prices would not be increased. When they refused to give any such assurance, the problem that confronted him was: how can I do this thing without it being necessary to extract a promise from the manufacturers? The ingenuity of the customs department came to his rescue. They found a way. Those gentlemen in that feudal castle on the banks of the canal can always find a way. I think the man who designed that castle must have had a rare sense of humour. There it stands on the banks of the canal, on the highway of traffic with its bastions, and battlements, with its towers, its turrets and its portholes with guns at the door and no doubt a dungeon or an oubliette underneath. It reminds one of the robbers' castles on the Rhine that we used to read about as boys, to which all passers by were compelled to draw near and pay toll. Here is bulletin No. 3684, signed by R. W. Breadner:

Order in council P.C. 297, dated the 19th February, 1931, fixes and determines "a rate of discount of 20 per cent which may be applied to the prices of automobiles or other motor vehicles, excepting motorcycles, so published or listed by manufacturers or producers thereof; such published or listed prices, subject to deduction of a discount of 20 per cent, to be deemed and taken to be the fair market value of such goods on importation into Canada under the general tariff, and to be the value for duty thereof on such importation into Canada by others than consumers, provided, however, that such fair market value be not less than the price actually paid by the importer to the exporter for the goods, and that for duty purposes on importation of such goods into Canada where the discount allowed in the home market is less than 20 per cent, no greater discount shall be allowed from such published or listed prices than is allowed on sales of such goods in the home market to the consumers thereof."

What does that mean? Perhaps I can best explain it by giving a concrete case. Take a car that retails in the United States for $1,000, and is not manufactured in Canada. The wholesale price of that car in the United States would be $700. The wholesale price of that car to the importer in Canada would be the same, $700. The duty on that car would be 20 per cent of $700, or $140. The duty-paid value of that car would be $840. Add to that 5 per cent excise tax and one per cent sales tax, which are based on the duty paid value of the car, and which amount to $50.40, and we have on that car a total revenue to the government of $190.40. That brings the price of the car, duty paid at our border, up to $890.40. On top of that the dealer has to pay freight and has to add his commission. Under these new regulations the Department of Customs says the value for duty on that car shall be $800 and not $700. What happens? The value for duty is $800; the rate is 20 per cent. Twenty per cent of $800 is $160. The duty paid value then is $960. I wish the Minister of Customs and National Revenue would listen to my remarks, because I think if he understood what he has done he might be willing to correct his mistake. The duty paid value of that car is $960. Add to that the 5 per cent excise tax, and one per cent sales tax and you have a total revenue to the government on that car of $217.60.

M. LAVERGNE: Why not?

[Mr. Young.]

Mr. YOUNG: There is $217.60. That is the revenue to the government on that car. The Customs department, however, does not stop there. They say to the man, "What did you pay for this car in the United States?" He replies, "$700." They say, "You should not have paid $700 for that car; you should have paid $800 and because you have dared to buy the car in the United States for $700 when you should have paid $800 we will fine you another $100 in the form of a dumping duty, and that is exactly what is done. My hon. friend may laugh, but that is what his department has done and I have proof of it over the signature of his own commissioner of customs.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the effect of it?

Mr. YOUNG: The effect is this: Before this regulation became operative the car of which I am speaking was selling at retail in Canada for $1,187. To-day in order to give the dealer the same commission as he got before, the car would have to sell in Canada for $1,347.

Mr. LAVERGNE: What is the commission the dealer receives?

Mr. YOUNG: You are depriving the dealer of his commission. This regulation was deliberately passed to put both the dealer and the importer of American made cars out of business.

Let us suppose the purpose of this action is accomplished. The dealer is put out of business. In what position then is the citizen of this country who wants to buy that particular car? What will he do? He will have to go over to the United States and buy that car at the retail price of $1,000. He will have to pay a 20 per cent duty on the $1,000 valuation and on top of that the sales tax and the excise tax which brings the price of the car up to $1,272.

Mr. MORAND: Why not buy a Canadian car?

Mr. YOUNG: I will refer to the Canadian car in a moment.

Mr. BROWN: Surely a man ought to have the right to buy the car he wants.

Mr. YOUNG: As I said, the object of this regulation is to stop the importation of these cars into Canada and to have them manufactured in Canada. Let us suppose for a moment, as suggested by my hon. friend from Windsor (Mr. Morand) that importations are stopped and the cars have to be made in Canada. Of cars valued at less than $1,200 we import some 30,000 in a year. The revenue derived by the government through duties, excise and sales tax on these 30,000 cars amounts to about four and a half million dollars a year. Now my hon. friend says, "Buy Canadian cars." Supposing we accept his advice, the first cost to the country is a loss of four and a half million dollars in revenue.

Mr. MORAND: That is high financing; I would suggest that the Minister of National Revenue pay very close attention.

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, it is high financing and the automobile makers know how to "put it over." The first cost to the country is four and a half million dollars which will be lost to the revenue of the country and paid to the manufacturers.

Mr. MORAND: It will increase the purchasing power?

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member who has just spoken ought to be given the floor so that he may talk.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. YOUNG: Four and a half million dollars lost to the revenue because the cars are not brought in. Then the Canadians who buy those made in Canada cars will have to pay an additional price for them. It is estimated that the average increase in price, if the dealers absorb as much of the discount as they can will be about $85 each on the cheaper cars. However I am not going to insist on $85, I will place it at $70, because $70 is the actual increase which has already taken place in connection with one of those cars.

Mr. MORAND: On American cars?

Mr. YOUNG: Yes, on American cars. An increase of $70 each on 30,000 cars amounts to about $2,100,000 to be taken out of the pockets of the people. Taking the contribution from the revenue of this country of about four and one half million dollars and adding to that the additional cost to the consumers of $2,100,000 makes the total of $6,615,000 to be taken from the Canadian people, in order to establish an industry which will manufacture 30,000 cars a year. We know that in connection with the manufacture of automobiles in Canada the average production per annum per man engaged in the industry is about 18 cars. From that we learn that the production of 30,000 cars will give employment to about 1,660 men. That number of men would be employed, and we know from the government returns that the average wage paid to each of these men is about $1,600 a year. We find then that we have established an industry which, when worked out, pays in wages $2,656,000 per year and would cost the people of Canada $6,615,000 in the same period. With those figures we would have a net loss on the industry of $3,959,000 per year. That amount goes to the manufacturers of Canadian automobiles.

Oh, how much has the automobile manufacturing industry cost this country? I well remember when in 1926 we were going to reduce the duty on automobiles representatives of the industry came here with tears in their eyes and we were told that Mr. McLaughlin would have to close his factory if the duties were reduced. Mr. Robb called his bluff and did he close his factories? Yes, for three days.

Mr. MORAND: That difficulty was afterwards overcome.

Mr. YOUNG: Now they come again to the present government and they say, "unless you give us this additional protection we will have to close our factories." The government "fell for it" and gave them what they asked.

I ask hon. members this question: How much are Canadian producers of automobiles interested in Canadian labour and Canadian workmen? How much are they interested in employment in this country? I will tell you. The importer of a certain American automobile adopted the practice of bringing his cars in without tires and equipping them with Canadian tires. The Canadian automobile producers went to the Canadian tire manufacturers, and persuaded them to blacklist that firm and refuse to sell them tires for their cars. That shows how much interest they have in Canadian labour.

Mr. MORAND: Why did they do that?

Mr. YOUNG: That is an instance to show how much they care for Canadian labour. Let us translate the situation I have outlined into bushels of wheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why not socks?

Mr. YOUNG: When the Prime Minister asked the other day why we could not get a better price for our wheat, and I told him "tariffs" he replied in a most irrelevant fashion. The $70 increase in the price of a car translated into bushels of wheat which is selling in the west at 40 cents per bushel amounts to 175 bushels. We know that imports are paid for by exports and that exports are paid for by imports. When we export our wheat we must take goods in exchange. Very well, we export wheat and we want to import a car.

The Minister of National Revenue says, "I will not let you buy that car for the number of bushels of wheat which the Americans are willing to take for it; I insist that you pay an additional 175 bushels for it." Then the hon. gentleman wonders why we cannot get a satisfactory price for wheat. We must take imports in exchange for our wheat. Every obstacle which is placed in the way of goods entering this country represents another millstone around the neck of the western farmer. Every obstacle so placed means to them that they cannot accept the world price for their wheat but must take a lesser price.

My hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull) stated the other day that the people of the west are not starving. No, of course they are not starving; we have too much food. Why should we starve?

Mr. MORAND: You are lucky.

Mr. YOUNG: On the other hand we are short of clothing, of machinery, of furniture, of buildings.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The hon. gentleman is not short of socks?

Mr. YOUNG: We are short of many of the necessities of life. We want to exchange our surplus food products for the surplus products that other people have to sell, but the government says we must not do so. As the hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) explained yesterday in quoting the language of Sir George Paish, the whole trouble of the world to-day is that there is an abundance of foodstuffs in some parts of the world and an abundance of manufactured products in other parts of the world, and governments step in and say, We will not allow you people to make the exchange. That is the whole trouble.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while its intentions may have been good, the government by its every act since it came into office has only aggravated the unemployment situation, it has only aggravated the distress in the western provinces and in all other parts of the country. Never since I have been in the west—and I have lived there all my life—never until this winter have I seen in the stores of the west signs reading: "Butter not wanted." Why is that?

An hon. MEMBER: Too much New Zealand butter.

Mr. YOUNG: No, that is not the cause. In a certain town in my constituency there is a creamery locally owned and operated by the farmers. Last December I had a talk with the operator and he told me: "I supply all the butter that is used in this town. In other years it has taken from 300 to 400 pounds a week to meet the demand, but this year it takes only 50 pounds a week. The people are not using butter." You have reduced the standard of living further and further, until, as was predicted last fall by members on this side of the house, you have ruined the market that you were trying to create.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the hon. Minister of National Revenue to study this matter of automobiles. He laughs and says that it did not amount to anything, but I tell him that what I have stated is correct, and his commissioner of customs will tell him so too if he is only capable of understanding it. I say we should demand an investigation into the whole automobile industry, for that industry has cost this country many, many times what it is worth.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MAURICE BRASSET (Gaspé): My first words will be to extend my regards to the Speaker of this house. At the special session in September last as well as, so far, during this session, it has been my impression that the Speaker has given a fair deal to both sides of the house. So far as I am concerned, and I think I can speak for most of my colleagues on this side, I can say that you, Mr. Speaker, may expect from us the most cordial cooperation. And now, sir, my constituency being composed, in large majority, of French-speaking people, and even though a great proportion of the members of this house are not familiar with the French language, I shall continue my remarks in my mother tongue.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, my first wish is to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. They delivered their speeches with much zest, and it is all to their credit. I state that it was all to their credit because it was a difficult task to vindicate the acts of the present government. I could add, sir, that this government, although it has been in power for eight months only, has to its record the harnessing of the country with one of the most unpopular administrations in existence since confederation. In the course of the last election, through public addresses, the radio and every possible Conservative medium of propaganda, we heard sung the praises and exploits of the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

From one end of the country to the other pledges abound: the ceasing of unemployment, the lowering of the cost of living, work for everybody, high wages, etc., etc. Briefly, it was the golden age returning to earth, and we were told: Elect Mr. Bennett; elect the leader of the Conservative opposition and you will have in this country all that you desire. Everybody will have work, and factories will open their doors again. Well, for eight months the Canadian people have been waiting and what is the result? The people have been waiting eight months without hearing the roar of the guns, without any blasting of foreign markets. The people have waited eight months without seeing the promised millennium; instead what is happening? Let us examine the balance sheet of the Conservative party since they are in power and compare it with that of the Liberal regime. I quote from an extract of L'Avenir du Nord:

Under the Conseratives, the unemployment crisis which they were to relieve immediately on assuming power, is more acute than under the Liberal regime.

Under the Conservative rule that national unity, that harmony between all the provinces brought about by the Liberals, threaten to be inevitably torn asunder.

And if we had many speeches like the one delivered yesterday, in the house, by the member for Regina, I would have to unfortunately admit that the harmony between the various provinces would not last long.

Under the Conservatives, Canada's trade is collapsing, under the Liberals it had reached the highest summit of our history.

Canada lost the fifth rank among the exporting countries, to make way for India. Dominion Bureau of Sstatistics.

Under the Conservatives, the cost of living increases, under the Liberals, it was decreasing.

Under the Conservatives, the taxes increase; under the Liberals they were decreasing.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): They are rapidly climbing.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): Yes, unfortunately they are climbing and rapidly.

Under the Conservatives, expenditures exceed the revenues; under the Liberals we had surpluses.

Under the Conservatives, the national debt is increasing; under the Liberals, it was decreasing.

Under the Conservatives, the revenues of the country are decreasing; under the Liberals, they were on the increase.

These are the Conservative balance-sheets and the balance-sheets of the Liberal administration. The Conservatives proclaim everywhere that the Prime Minister has redeemed his pledges. The people of Canada would be easily pleased if they were satisfied with the deeds of this government.

Mr. Speaker, the unemployment question has been broached, it is very much in evidence, and what I would have to say would not alter the situation. However, in listening to the speakers who preceded me these last days, I thought that the government's endeavours to relieve unemployment did not produce the result which the Conservative themselves expected. The then leader of the opposition, the Prime Minister of to-day, had solemnly pledged his word—that everybody heard, members on the right as well as those on the left—not to try to merely relieve unemployment, but to completely eradicate it. What result has the Prime Minister had since his advent to power. Is there less unemployment? Has unemployment ceased? I shall state that not only it has not ceased, but that it has spread more than ever. The calls for help which reach members from all parts of Canada are a sufficient answer.

It is often queried, sir, how the government would fare should elections take place now. We wonder what would be the verdict of the people if after eight months in power our friends on your right, sir, were to face another general election. The almost unanimous views expressed by the people of Canada, is that were we to have elections today the Conservative party would be swept from power. What the Canadian people expected, so as to relieve unemployment, is not a few million dollars given out as charity. The Canadian people have more pride than that. It is not charity we expected, we had hoped, on the present Prime Minister assuming power, that a constructive policy would give works to the people; and not doles. And this charity of $20,000,000 how was it given? It was given with the disdainful gesture of the wealthy man who drops a few cents to the beggar on the street in order to get rid of him. Poor municipalities were forced to bleed themselves white in order to contribute their share and thus assure a few days of work to the unemployed. What happened in my own riding? The unemployed worked eight, ten, fifteen days, and now they are poorer than ever.

It unfortunately happened, in my county, that many poor parishes and municipalities were forced to borrow in order to meet the requirements of the government and thereby help the latter to relieve the distress existing. These municipalities were already relieving much distress and in no way did they need to be forced by the government to help their poor, which they had begun to do long before the government had their measure of $20,000,000 voted.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Gaspé will allow me, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): You will have your turn later.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Whether the hon. member for Gaspé is agreeable or not, I shall ask him to tell us how the money intended to relieve unemployment was distributed in the province of Quebec and in what way the provincial government—

Mr. St. PERE (Translation): The provincial government is in no way interested.

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): Well, I shall say to the hon. member for Lake St. John that the money to relieve unemployment was well spent in Quebec, perhaps better under the liberal rule of that province than it would have been distributed under the Conservative government at Ottawa.

At the emergency session, in September last, I had personally asked the government and the Prime Minister to take the necessary steps to have the right of way of a projected railway surveyed in the county of Gaspé. This would have given work to the unemployed of Gaspé and the money would not have been spent uselessly to draw gravel over the snow in order to relieve unemployment; the money would have been expended in a practical and efficient way and this undertaking would have had as a result the relief of unemployment during the winter. However, the Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) did not even think it worthwhile to answer my query, and brushed aside my suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, I noticed the other day that when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) commented on the deplorable state of the people of this country, the features of the right hon. Prime Minister took an expression of self complacency. It is said that the Prime Minister is a man with large personal means—and I have no criticism to offer—I fear however that the hon. Prime Minister is unaware of what is going on; because, considering his responsibilities, if he could only realize the distress of the people, we would not see him smile disdainfully whenever the distress of the people is referred to.

In the course of this session, sir, many references will be made to the government's deficit, and the latter will try to place the blame on world conditions, and they will be partly right; they will also tell us that the customs and excise revenues show a decrease of about $50,000,000 since July last and that is the principal cause of the government's deficit.

Then, sir, I can point out that the government is inconsequent since the Prime Minister himself stated, in the course of the special session, that by raising the tariff his aim was precisely to decrease imports and, thereby, restrict the operations of that department. Since it is the government which has restricted the business of the Customs and Excise department, why should they impute this deficit to these branches of the service? It is stultifying itself, moreover that is a poor argument to invoke.

We shall also hear of the Liberal regime and tariff. During the last election, the Conservatives proclaimed everywhere that the Liberal tariff was the cause of unemployment, of economic depression and of all the suffering which existed in our country. But the moment the Conservatives assumed power, their tactics changed, so did their tone. A very few days after the election of July 28, the hon. Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson) stated in Ottawa: "that the economic unrest cannot be attributed to any government, that it was world-wide." At the special session the Prime Minister made almost the same statement and almost in the same words as the Hon. Mr. Robertson. Finally, on November 8 last, Sir George Perley speaking in Ottawa, stated:

> The world has been passing through a period of serious economic and political disturbance. Canada has not escaped its share of the difficulties of readjustment. The testing-time, however, has only served to prove that strength and solidity of the Canadian economic structure. Few countries have been as fortunate.

This is entirely different from what our friends the Conservatives proclaimed during the electoral campaign, when they asserted that Canada was doomed to ruin and that, thanks to the liberal rule, Canada had perhaps become one of the last countries of the world. Circumstances alter cases.

We have had, sir, for nine years a Liberal administration. What has that administration given us? First, it has given us seven consecutive years of surpluses, which has never been done by any Canadian administration since confederation, not even by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government so highly praised by our friends the Conservatives.

During that Liberal administration, taxes decreased year after year, the debts resulting from the war began to decrease and disappear. In a word the people were prosperous. That means, sir, that we had an excellent government.

Last spring, relying upon the results obtained, the right hon. Prime Minister of the day (Mr. Mackenzie King) submitted his administration to the electorate. At the outset of the campaign everybody was certain that the Liberal party would be returned to power. I could name many of my hon. friends now sitting on your right, sir, who at the outset of the campaign stated themselves that they would be defeated. I, myself, quoted extracts from conservative newspapers which asserted the the Liberal government would be returned to power. However, by degree, in the course of the campaign, rumours reached us of a super-man who was covering the country from one end to the other, promising marvels. He made pledges right and left, somewhat like one American millionaire, whose name is on every lip, throws handfuls of dimes. The pledges of the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) were strewn from one end of the country to the other and there seemed, to be never enough. By degree, the people were caught by those beautiful promises. Mr. Bennett stated that with the advent to power of the Conservative party, there would be no more suffering the world over, that there would be bridges, roads and railways every where. The Canadian western wheat growers would sell their products with considerable profit; Ontario and Quebec would see their factories increase and the output would be at its maximum; the Gaspé and Maritime provinces' fishermen, under the magic word of the leader of the opposition, would have miraculous catches, like of old, twenty centuries ago, the apostles at the word of the Master.

Now, all has changed, and brutal reality has established the truth of facts. The people of Canada are discovering that they have been deceived. They abide their time, and it will come. They will then ask the Conservatives —and I quote here an extract from a newspaper which everybody is familiar with:

> They will ask why, after having pledged their word to put an end to unemployment in the very first months of their taking office the government did nothing to relieve efficiently the unemployed; they will ask why the Prime Minister, after having pledged his word to sell the Canadian wheat, enacted measures which closed the British market to us and increased the agricultural crisis in the Canadian west; they will inquire why Confederation exists; they will inquire wherefor the fiasco of all the meetings of this nature since Confederation; they will inquire why the country must face a deficit of more than $100,000,000, when, under the Liberal administration, there was always surpluses, from 1922 to 1930 inclusively; they will ask why they increased the national debt, when the Liberals had decreased it by $300,000,000 since 1924—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Are you quoting from the Soleil?

Mr. BRASSET (Translation): It is a newspaper that tells the truth.

> —they will ask why our export trade shows a deficit on all British markets where, previous to July 28 last, we regularly had a favourable balance.
> They will ask why, after having gained rural ridings by promising to increase the price of butter by cutting out the New Zealand imports, they only succeeded in lowering these prices by 2 cents below the prices of 1929;
> They will ask why, in the midst of the crisis, while thousands of Canadians are unemployed, they disorganized the import trade of automobiles and threw on the street about 10,000 workers.
> They will be made to answer for all their pledges and all their blunders. The people abide their hour and that hour will come.

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, before I take up the subjects I intend to discuss to-night, allow me to extend to you my congratulations upon your appointment. I wish also to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

It is some years since I was last in this chamber and there have been many changes in the personnel, but I see a few of the old faces here and that gives me delight and encouragement.

I have listened to the attacks by hon. gentlemen opposite upon my hon. leader, and I confess that while they were being made I found it very hard to keep my seat. I would not be speaking this evening if it were not for the statements made from the other side of the house that this is a one-man government.

Miss MACPHAIL: Isn't it?

Mr. MULLINS: I represent the constituency of Marquette and I stand here as free a man as any hon. member in this house. Marquette, a purely agricultural constituency, sent me here to represent them, but at the same time I do not forget that I represent Canada as a whole.

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. MULLINS: Marquette, in which reside many intelligent voters, is one of the most picturesque constituencies in western Canada. We are engaged largely in the production of live stock, we believe in diversified farming. I cannot sit here and listen to attacks being made upon my leader, whom I have known as long as, if not longer than, any man in this house. I remember when he first came to Calgary and put out his sign, as a member of the legal profession. I have watched his career and am satisfied that the affairs of Canada are in very good hands irrespective of what the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) may say. I have every confidence in the right hon. gentleman who leads this government.

I was elected in 1925; in 1926 I was defeated by a Liberal-Progressive or a Progressive-Liberal—God knows what.

An hon. MEMBER: He was a good man.

Mr. MULLINS: Yes, but he had a hyphenated name. This time, instead of suffering defeat by a majority of 1,000, I came back with a majority of nearly 2,700.

I agree that conditions in the west are not good. They are not good for the man on the land, but they are all right for the man who has live stock. I stated before on the floor of this house that the sowless, chickenless farmer is not good for the west. You must have diversified farming; you cannot have one crop only, consisting of wheat. I hear wailings from those men south of the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway from Swift Current to the mountains who are settled on land which should never have been taken away from the rancher. We gave way to the men who came in with the prairie schooners thinking they were going to better conditions, but what happened? The hon. member opposite, the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) brought in professors from the United States to find out if grass could be sown in order to bring back the land which had been taken from us. We left that land fertile and rich but they exploited the soil with the usual result. That district should never have been ploughed and certainly should never have been taken away from the rancher.

I have a letter here which I received from one of my constituents enclosing two photographs, which delighted me very much, showing what he is doing in regard to the feeding and raising of cattle. He says:

> Every day as I gain experience I am gaining confidence in you. I think I can see from the little bit of experience I have had through North America that we can produce cattle in this western country cheaper than in any other part of the Dominion and also in the largest part of the United States, and you know the condition of producing cattle in Europe.

An hon. MEMBER: Who signed it?

Mr. MULLINS: Edward Dupont, of Binscarth.

An hon. MEMBER: Put the letter on record.

An hon. MEMBER: Go on.

[Mr. Mullins.]

Mr. MULLINS: I am glad the benches are not empty; I am glad hon. members are here so that I can talk to them.

I watched the career of the government which was in power from 1922 up until the time it was defeated in July, 1930. They were always promising to do certain things. The ex-Minister of Agriculture told us that we were going to get a reduction in freight rates from the $20 rate down. What happened? During the whole term of office they never obtained a reduced freight rate or a reduction in any manner, shape or form.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It went down to $15.

Mr. MULLINS: We were in office not more than sixty days when we had a $15 rate. I was brought from Winnipeg to Ottawa—and I came irrespective of my party leanings—to give evidence before what the former Liberal government called the Petersen commission, the greatest fiasco that ever was perpetrated on the Canadian people. I came here expecting that I would be of some assistance in getting reduced freight rates for the people of western Canada. My hon. friends opposite placed the matter in the hands of a man by the name of Preston. I came all the way from Winnipeg without any remuneration, and I found a man named Symington sitting there as counsel, drawing $20 a day expenses, in addition to a charge of so much per diem. He was the man who broadcast over the radio in western Canada a talk which contained statements which were absolutely untrue but which helped to defeat us. I wondered what was behind the scenery of that Petersen commission, and I commenced to look around. There was in England a large shipping company that was standing behind Petersen, and Petersen was not in the picture. He was not putting on any boats, but he was making a deal with a large shipping company called the Thompson line to supply ships. That was what we were receiving from my hon. friends opposite. Now hon. gentlemen opposite are asking for action, asking why we did not do anything; but what do we find? As I said before, we were not elected more than sixty days before the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) got for western Canada a $15 rate on cattle, and before long we shall have a much lower rate than that—we shall have a $10 rate.

The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the opposition, took the credit for the lifting of the Canadian cattle embargo. I may say for the benefit of the house, and especially the younger members who are not conversant with the matter, that for thirty years I fought the embargo. I was in Dundee when the Huronia arrived on the other side and they took a cow away, stating that she was diseased, a statement which was absolutely unfair to Canada. They tested her lungs, and they placed a stigma against Canadian cattle. Edward Watson, president of the association for the free importation of Canadian cattle into the British isles, said to me. "Mullins, that is unfair to Canada." I said: "Watson, I will fight that issue as long as Providence permits me to remain here." He said: "I will too." We fought together for the removal of the embargo. I crossed over several times on that issue. In 1917 the question came before the war conference as to what they should do for Canada. The question was raised by Sir Walter Long, and the answer came back from the present hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers): "Remove the embargo and the stigma from Canadian cattle." That is what made it possible for Canadian cattle to get into the British isles. The records are available, and no matter what the leader of the opposition may say, the facts cannot be denied because the official returns and documents are available. The answer came back that a resolution had been passed that they would remove the embargo upon the declaration of peace. Having given this promise, having given their word which to a Britisher was as good as his bond, they let the matter drag along, Sir Arthur Griffith-Boscawen, who was then the British Minister of Agriculture, was antagonistic to it. He contested a seat in Dudley and with a Labour candidate against him was defeated by 10,000 votes on the question of admission of Canadian cattle into the British isles. That made him antagonistic, and when Lloyd George asked him to contest Taunton, the Federal Meat Traders of England kept their hands off Taunton to let Sir Arthur Griffith-Boscawen into the House of Commons. He came back as Minister of Agriculture, but he was antagonistic and he would not do anything towards removing that stigma from Canadian cattle.

The matter dragged along from 1917 to 1922. In the fall of 1922, as a private citizen, I felt it my duty to go overseas, and I went. I discussed with Lord Beaverbrook the justification for removing the embargo from Canadian cattle. The matter came before the British House of Commons and a measure was passed lifting the embargo. I ask the right hon. gentleman: who made it possible for the removal of that embargo? Why does he take to Mr. Larkin and himself the credit for the removal? I cannot see what justification they can find for doing that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend give the date at which the embargo was finally removed?

Mr. MULLINS: The embargo was removed on December 15, 1922.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Liberal administration came into office in December, 1921.

Mr. MULLINS: Yes, but they did nothing towards having the embargo removed. While I was in England I did not see that Mr. Larkin had anything to do with it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While my hon. friend was there nothing was done in the way of finally removing it. I admit my hon. friend tried to get it removed, but he did not succeed. All efforts had been in vain until within a year after the Liberal government came into office.

Mr. MULLINS: I did not see any evidence of any work except some that was done by Duncan Marshall who went overseas to receive the first shipment of Canadian cattle and who put a red tape across the gang plank of the first ship which arrived in Glasgow. The steer that he was leading out, the first one that left the ship, took a look at the red tape and nearly put Duncan Marshall into the Clyde. We got into that market, and it was a wonderful market. I do not know what Canada would have done with all the cattle we had out west on feed but for the British market. I can see no reason whatever for hon. gentlemen opposite taking any credit for our getting into the British market or for any reduction in freight rates whatever.

For the benefit of the house I wish to read a telegram, dated March 17, 1923, just after the bill had passed the house, which I received from a gentleman who was coming out to this country:

> Arriving on the ss. Paris the 25th. Address the Mount Royal Hotel, Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: This is no laughing matter, Mr. Speaker. Conditions in western Canada are much too serious to be laughed at. I have never laughed at hon. gentlemen across the floor or heckled them, nor will I do so in the future. I feel my responsibility as a member of parliament from the west too much to treat this matter, which is of vital importance to western Canada, as a jest. The telegram continues:

Intend purchasing one thousand choice feeders immediately. Reply. Put me in touch with the best markets. Immediate purchase and despatch. Confirm wireless to ss. Paris.

That man came out to this country and I helped him to get five hundred steers, which he took over to England and met a wonderful market there. Then we got thousands of cattle going over there at the very time that the trade was dormant. There was nothing doing until the stigma was taken off our cattle and the British market was opened up to us.

While the embargo was on we met with a lot of opposition from Ireland. I am sorry that the former Minister of Labour (Mr. Heenan) is not in his seat, because he is a good Irishman. I say, Mr. Speaker, that Ireland could not stand the competition of the Canadian steer. They had that market to themselves over there.

I object, and did object strenuously in western Canada, to our young steers going out of Canada to the United States. The former Minister of Agriculture should have taken steps to stop our young steers from leaving Canada to be fattened in the United States, and then shipped back to Canada as beef. Imagine thousands of our cattle, in a country such as this, leaving Winnipeg, where the cattle could have been fattened, because there is so much coarse feed in that country, and going to the United States to be fattened, and then the beef being shipped back to the leading hotels in Canada. That was another instance of our raw products being exported. I urge the present Minister of Agriculture and this government to do something to stop our young steers going out to the United States. Let us get them back on the land where feed is cheap. There is no country in the world like Canada for feeding cattle out of doors. No country has such wonderful possibilities as western Canada in that respect. What a chance we have to raise these steers cheap, with thousands of tons of hay in stack outside Winnipeg right now; and yet there is not an animal on feed. Think of it! Your beautiful little farms in Ontario could be utilized in finishing off these cattle, and then they could go forward to England. There is one chance for us out west, and that is to ship our cattle over the Hudson Bay route. The road will be finished pretty soon, and it will be a wonderful route. It is a cool route, and the cattle will stand the trip to the old country better.

The Scotch people want our cattle. We have a market over there for hundreds of thousands of our cattle. They want a one thousand pound steer, three parts finished, so they can finish them off. Ireland sent a representative out to this country to make a survey, and he found that there was nothing doing because the former Minister of Agriculture had abolished the policy of putting out pure-bred sires. It was suicidal to abolish that policy of scattering pure-bred sires over the western plains. It was unfair to the cattle trade of western Canada for the former Minister of Agriculture to abrogate that policy, and that is largely responsible for the condition in which we find ourselves to-day in western Canada. We would not be in such a position to-day were it not for the policies of hon. gentlemen opposite.

I do not wish to take up much of the time of the house, but I know the actual circumstances; I tried in years past to lend a hand to hon. gentlemen opposite, who turned a deaf ear to my plea, and I cannot now remain silent in my seat. I expect to see the present Minister of Agriculture bring down a policy which will stop our young steers going out of Winnipeg, and secure a cheap freight rate to the farms where these cattle can be fed on the coarse feed that we have out west. I expect to see a trade develop that has been ignored in the past while hon. gentlemen opposite were in office.

I wish to say a few words on the subject of marketing. I believe in cooperation, but not the kind of cooperation that was applied by the gentleman who held the portfolio of Minister of Railways, Mr. Crerar, in the late government. He put his nose into my constituency, Mr. Speaker, but he did not get recognized. Wherever he spoke I received the biggest majority I ever had. I could not figure out how the leader of the late government ever took a man like that into his cabinet. Mr. Crerar tried to deal with that little group across the floor to my right. He tried to bargain with them, but he did not get them. I have every confidence in that group over there; I know where they stand. Mr. Crerar tried to bargain with them in Saskatoon and said: If you will come into the Liberal fold, we can get three or four portfolios for you. But he did not get them in at all. The people got tired of his bargaining.

What else did Mr. Crerar do? He was president of the United Grain Growers, and he put in a system of this kind—the farmers had some confidence in him as president of the United Grain Growers, and they thought that he would treat them right. They brought in their cattle, and then Mr. Crerar brought in a man from the United States to sell those cattle, and he did not know a steer from a heifer. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if I talk western language, but I am bringing a message from the west. I do not want to break the rules of the house; I simply want to speak plainly, and I will not break the rules of the house by reading my speeches as do some of my hon. friends on the other side. Every time my hon. friends read their speeches they are breaking the rules of the house as laid down in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

The former Minister of Railways Mr. Crerar, put in a system and said, "Go on, ship in your cattle." The farmers were instructed to ship their cattle into a pool. They were told "Put your cattle in a pool." I saw cattle going to the pool valued at 2½ to 3 cents per pound which on the open market in the stock yard would bring about 4 cents per pound. Then they got a division of about thirty cents per hundredweight. What did they do then? They had a little pen near the weigh-scale in connection with which they built a high pinnacle on which the farmer was to sit so that he would not be in the road and could not hear what was going on. That is the gentleman hon. members opposite were pleased to make Minister of Railways. That is the gentleman who was brought down from the west and given a portfolio in the government Farmers' cattle were purchased at ridiculously low prices. I stood one day watching what was taking place in connection with this system and I must say that my blood ran cold as I saw the death of that industry approaching. I would not be in the house if it were not to defend that industry and to point out what is happening in the west.

At the present time there is another pool out west operated by some men whose names I do not know. I did watch the progress of the other pool, however. I watched Mr. Crerar who was at the head of the United Grain Growers, and after the farmers had been pumped about as dry as possible that movement was dropped. The United Grain Growers took nearly all the farmers had and as a result the farmers took the attitude that there was no money in cattle. No, there was no money in cattle. What further did the ex-Minister of Railways do? He induced them to export their cattle, and for the benefit of hon. gentlemen opposite may I say that I never could understand why the ex-Minister of Agriculture did not stop it. An exporter received one dollar per head for cattle shipped to England. They shipped about 100,000 cattle and half of them would not make corks for castor oil bottles.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Do you wonder that the cattle trade was ruined? I stood on the Glasgow market and I saw those cattle there. Scotchmen are shrewd buyers; they know good cattle when they see them. They would not buy the rubbish and it was left there, the returns went home to the western farmers. They did not know what was the matter with the cattle business; they received scarcely any returns and the result was that they went out of the trade. They dropped the raising of cattle because they said it was not profitable. The ex-minister was responsible for the poor condition of the cattle trade, and that condition was brought about by shipping such poor rubbish to the old country markets. In order to make profits the better type of cattle must be shipped. In the past year some development has taken place in the matter of export trade and it has been due to the proper selection of export cattle. The proper men must be obtained to select the right type of market cattle for the various markets. As I stated before, rubbish must not be shipped; the best cattle should be shipped to the proper market.

There is another matter to which I wish to draw the attention of hon. members in this house. I see the farmers selling their barley for 20 or 25 cents a hundredweight. In the constituency of Marquette the farmers are receiving 10 or 11 cents per bushel for their barley, a ridiculously low figure. Then the farmers ship their cattle to the stockyards at Winnipeg and they have to pay $1.50 a hundredweight for it. Is it possible to have a successful cattle trade under conditions of that sort? The farmer must pay $1.40 a bale for hay for which he should only pay from 35 to 40 cents. A channel has to be opened up and something has to be done for this industry by bringing about lower costs.

I prefer the cattle to exclusive wheat growing any time. It is not nearly so laborious; western farms may be commercialized when the cattle trade is properly handled. The farmers say, "If we all go into that trade what will happen to it?" In reply I say that there is an unlimited market across the water; the foreign countries will take all we have if we produce the right type of cattle. I see sitting on the other side of the house the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He stood shoulder to shoulder with the late Robert Bickerdike who for many years was the desk mate of the hon. member for Labelle.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Bickerdike was a good friend of the live stock industry, although he had the idea that capital punishment should be eliminated. However he was friendly towards the cattle trade. This matter may be treated lightly in the house, Mr. Speaker, but I say it must be taken seriously because conditions out in the west are not good. My work as a member of this house is to try to bring back better conditions on the land and make western Canada more prosperous. Not only do I wish to see the constituency of Marquette prosperous but I want to see the western prairies in better circumstances. We have in the west the richest land which lies out doors; God has given us a heritage of six inches of the richest top soil in the world.

The constituency from which I come is the most picturesque in western Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MULLINS: Next summer it is expected that in the constituency of Marquette a national park will be opened. It will be the most picturesque park in Canada and I may say that it does not take second place to Prince Albert. It is situated on Clear lake. The district I represent is absolutely adapted for the raising and production of live stock and diversified farming. When we get the pure-bred sires out on the land and prevent our steers from going to the United States I think the cattle trade will be in a more profitable condition and our western people will be more prosperous. The farmer with one crop of wheat is in the same position as the man with one crop of cotton; he cannot live by wheat alone. The farmers in Arkansas are in trouble at the present time with their cotton crop because that is the only crop upon which they have to depend.

I wish to see greater success for the live stock industry and I have every confidence in the hon. gentleman who occupies the seat of Prime Minister on this side of the house. If I had not confidence in him I would move over to the other side and give my hon. friends over there a hand. This is not a one-man government; I do not want hon. members to think that for a moment, and it is unfair for hon. members to point their fingers and make that insinuation. Our hon. leader has left us free. He has not coerced me; he has never said to me that I must do this or I must do that. He has left me my freedom, and that is why I have spoken to you in this manner to-night.

I am not inclined to take up any more time because I may have something more to say later on. I am not going to dangle a pair of socks in front of you. Having heard the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) I priced socks in the stores of this city of Ottawa but I did not find any priced as low as ten cents. I do not know where he got his 10 cent socks; probably they are of foreign origin. I cannot understand the hon. member; I want something bigger, something more convincing. Western Canada does not ask for that cheap stuff, certainly not the people in the northwestern part of Manitoba. They are not sending me here to dangle a pair of 10 cent socks before this house.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the old hen?

Mr. MULLINS: The old hen is all right. I am not responsible for the low price of eggs. I heard an hon. member from British Columbia say that the hens out there had laid 340 or 350 eggs a year. It should be borne in mind that we have had an open winter in western Canada, and if the hens are busy it is not my fault. We have had periods of depression before and Canada has come back; she will come back again. While on my last campaign I saw an old gentleman 84 years of age summer-fallowing his land in readiness for next year's crop. That is the spirit that will bring western Canada back to normal. We in the west beyond the great lakes say to the east: Let us be Canadians, let us have the Canadian spirit, and so hasten the economic recovery of the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins) and I have many times discussed the subject that he has been dealing with. I agree with him in many respects especially in his statement that much of southwestern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta should never have been brought under the plough. I think that is probably one of the wisest statements he has made to-night.

Now that we are not so hurried as we were in the special session, I should like the opportunity of congratulating the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) on his selecting as Minister of Agriculture a member from the province of Saskatchewan. I notice that he is not in his place. I have had the pleasure and privilege of knowing the Hon. Robert Weir, as Harry Lauder says, "for a very considerable period." I knew him first of all as a school inspector in my own school section, and he was first class in that capacity. My wish to Bob Weir, as we affectionately call him out there, is that he makes as great a success as Minister of Agriculture as he did as school inspector.

I was surprised at some of the statements made yesterday by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull), in the course of which he mentioned my name. I propose very briefly to deal with those statements. At page 125 of Hansard the hon. gentleman, referring to my leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) is reported as follows:

> Yesterday we heard from the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Bennett) what I might call a confession of repentance by the Hon. Mr. Gardiner, the Liberal leader in the province of Saskatchewan. That statement was delivered at Portage la Prairie, shortly after Mr. Gardiner became premier of the province. But I fear that soon after he must have been disciplined by his leader in Ottawa, because he very speedily abandoned that profession, and in the fall of 1926 we find that, instead of trying to promote unity and harmony in this country, he was trying to build up a bloc, preaching the doctrine of a solid Saskatchewan and a solid Quebec to govern Canada.

Now, as I—

Mr. TURNBULL: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me to make a correction?

Mr. VALLANCE: I thank the hon. gentleman for the compliment. I must ask him to wait a minute.

Mr. TURNBULL: Mr. Speaker, may I speak to a question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, if it is a question of privilege.

Mr. TURNBULL: The reference I made, Mr. Speaker, to the right hon. gentleman who was preaching the doctrine of a solid bloc in Saskatchewan was to the right hon. leader of the opposition in Ottawa (Mr. Mackenzie King), and not to Mr. Gardiner. I know in unrevised Hansard my remarks are in the form in which my hon. friend is now quoting them, but in sending back the proof I made the necessary correction. I think hon. members will agree with me that my reference was to the right hon. leader of the opposition in Ottawa.

An hon. MEMBER: No, you mentioned his name.

Mr. VALLANCE: I do not happen yet to be in possession of the revised Hansard containing the hon. gentleman's corrected statement, so I merely quoted what he stated on the floor of the house, and on that occasion I attempted to ask him a question, but he was not as courteous to me as I have been to him. However, I would point out to him, as I attempted to do at the time, that with Quebec returning 65 members and Saskatchewan 21, it is utterly impossible for those 86 members to control this house. I want also to point out to the hon. gentleman that at all times it has been our policy in Saskatchewan, especially when we elected 17 members in the 1925 general election, to urge that the delegation coming from west of the great lakes, whether you call them Conservatives, Liberals, Independents, Progressives, or by any other name, must always be in a position where they will and can cooperate with any groups from the other provinces. I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that the 17 Liberal members from Saskatchewan did demonstrate that that was possible. True, on many occasions we had, as I pointed out, the cooperation of other groups from western Canada. So that that statement is hardly accurate. However, he says he has corrected it in the revised Hansard.

The hon. gentleman made this further attack on my leader when he addressed the house yesterday. He said:

> Let me say that there is no substantial secessionist movement in western Canada, and the people there, when they read the press, will resent the suggestion from the leader of the Liberal party in this house that the west is secessionist or that the people in the west are.

What he did say was said by my leader later on. Now the hon. gentleman says that there is no secessionist movement in western Canada. He goes a little further. He says:

> The only talk of secession in western Canada arose from a meeting of six gentlemen in the town of Wilkie in the constituency of my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance). And the only person who knows about secession in western Canada is the hon. gentleman who represents that constituency.

Now, I have the honour to represent that constituency and I am going to be quite frank with my hon. friend from Regina. I tell him he does not know the condition that prevails in South Battleford or he would not make such a statement. I tell him right now, not because I am a secessionist but because I know the facts, that there were no six gentlemen in the town of Wilkie who held the meeting where he suggests the secessionist movement originated.

I hold in my hand the official document known as the farmers' charter of liberty, and I want to tell the house that at no time during the twenty-five years that I have been privileged to live in that constituency have I seen the people driven to the extremes that they are on this occasion. When I received this official document it was at a public meeting at which there were some four or five hundred people. The organizer or speaker of the evening was dealing with the charter of liberty. He made certain statements—or read them from the charter—with which I disagreed. I pointed out to him that it was impossible for me to discuss with him intelligently the farmers' charter of liberty as I had not had the privilege of reading it. I asked him if he would be kind enough to give me a copy. He was quite courteous and handed me this copy. I do not propose to read it; I do not think it would do any good. I merely use it as an illustration to direct to the attention of this government, notwithstanding what the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) has said, to the fact that conditions are as bad as most of the preceding speakers have indicated.

This pamphlet is addressed to the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, Prime Minister of Canada. I asked the speaker that evening whether they had yet presented it to the Prime Minister and he told me they had not; it was quite possible that the right hon. gentleman would not receive it for probably another year. However, they make five demands of this government, and I do not think I am amiss when I say that when the right hon. gentleman was in Regina they made the same five demands in the memorandum which was presented to him by the President of the United Farmers of Canada, Saskatchewan section.

We all know the result of the Regina meeting. I was not privileged to attend that meeting, but like my hon. friend from Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) I listened over the radio. I had gathered around me that night a politically mixed group of farmers. We were all there in anticipation. I was one of those federal members who had participated in the by-election in Estevan, and I can well remember the day during that Estevan by-election when every paper in western Canada came out in glaring headlines with the statement that on the 30th of December the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett would address a meeting in Regina at which he would tell the farmers just what this government proposed to do for them. I want you to mark that a by-election was on, and this by-election meant a great deal not only to the provincial government but also to this federal government. It was, I believe, the first by-election in any province since this government had taken office, and they were very much exercised as to what the public would register. I had the privilege of addressing a good many meetings during that campaign, and the evening on which that announcement came out I took the paper to the meeting with me and pointed out to that audience just what the promise was. I pointed out to them, as I pointed out to this house, that all that the western farmers particularly had been offered—I do not know so much about what has been done in eastern Canada—all that this government had offered to the farmers of the west up to date, had been promises.

I notice that my neighbour across the line, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) suggested that this government was guaranteeing the pools. I have never seen any definite statement made just as to the relationship between this federal government and the pools. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not in his seat, because I should like him to tell me or the house or the country just what attitude this government has taken towards the pool. However, I pointed out to those people that this government had offered them up to the present nothing but promises, and I believe it is nothing more than a promise still. Had the right hon. gentleman had anything to give the people of western Canada, considering the by-election was on, I said, now is the time he would give it to you to influence your vote in the by-election. But all he did give was a promise and I watched in anticipation the approach of December 30th. On December 30th he addressed that huge audience in Regina. Thousands flocked to the meeting. They flocked in a spirit of expectation, in a spirit, if you like, to give praise to the right hon. gentleman for the deliverance he was going to bring to that huge audience that night. But I listened and watched the faces of those farmers sitting around; I saw their expressions change as their hope seemed to vanish, and when the right hon. gentleman was through the audience did not rise to give him the praise which they had come to offer for an expected deliverance. Rather they went home to pray, and they are praying to this government still.

We had the privilege in the last federal election of having in Saskatchewan two or three farmers I know who were in the then opposition. One of them, perhaps, did not go as far as Saskatchewan, but we had the member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) and the member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), two particular friends of mine. I do not see either of them in his seat. I remember the member for Dufferin-Simcoe spoke in the city of Moose Jaw, and I remember also the wail he put up there, pleading for the poor farmers and for the live stock industry. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins) has nothing on him. He pointed out to the people that the great industry of agriculture had been ruined by the policies of the government then in power, and showed what the government we now have would do if it could only get hold of the reins of office. I am one of those farmers. I have been watching the policy which this government proposes to adopt for agriculture. Some time ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) decided that he would frame a policy, and he called to the city of Ottawa all the provincial ministers of agriculture. There was some controversy in the west as to why he should call merely for the provincial ministers of agriculture. None of the organized farmers were represented at this conference and they thought—and I believe the feeling was justified—that they should have some representation. The omission was called to the attention of the minister but still they got no representation. The matter got to the knowledge of the United Farmers that the wives of ministers were also going to Ottawa and they drew the minister's attention to the fact. The minister denied it and I do not think the wives ever came. However, this joint meeting formulated what is known, or was known at that time, as the agricultural policy of this government.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Do I understand the hon. gentleman to imply that I invited the ministers of agriculture from the various provinces to meet here for the purpose of formulating an agricultural policy?

Mr. VALLANCE: As I pointed out, I want to be fair to the Minister of Agriculture. All the knowledge I have is what I gained from the press. I hold in my hand a copy of a Canadian press despatch. It says here—

An hon. MEMBER: The Saskatoon Star?

Mr. VALLANCE: No, this is the Ottawa Journal. I quote:

> Major the Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, has called a conference of all the provincial ministers of agriculture in Ottawa November 17 and 18 to formulate a national agriculture policy for Canada.

I do not wish to do the hon. gentleman any injury or accuse him of doing anything that has not been done. If he says it was not done I accept the hon. gentleman's denial. But does he deny it?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I had hoped that I made it very clear that the conference was called entirely for the purposes of administration. I thought I had informed the United Farmers of the west to that effect; I certainly did inform the United Farmers of Ontario.

Mr. VALLANCE: This conference was called for November 17 and 18 and when I read a Canadian Press despatch dated the 19th I thought it covered the business which had been done. This despatch reads:

> A Dominion agricultural policy was to-night proclaimed by Hon. Robert Weir, Dominion Minister of Agriculture. On the occasion of the opening of the Royal Winter Fair, the minister enunciated important policies, adopted after three days' deliberation of the provincial ministers of agriculture and to be known as the national agricultural policy.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. minister must receive the permission of the hon. member to ask a question.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have no objection provided I am allowed time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member consents it will be all right.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) desires the truth and nothing but the truth in connection with our conference. As I said before, the conference was called for the sole purpose of administration, and a policy was not discussed. The announcement I made at the Royal Winter Fair had no connection with it, neither had any report to that effect been issued by myself.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPENCE: Throw the paper away and say something yourself.

Mr. VALLANCE: Who is talking now? Again this government has been misquoted or at least misunderstood.

An hon. MEMBER: Blame it on the press.

Mr. VALLANCE: I want to be fair to the Minister of Agriculture, because he was not in his seat when I started to speak. I have every confidence in his sincerity, because I know he is out in the interests of agriculture. I intend to give him every possible assistance when he does bring down a policy; if I can agree with that policy I will be the first to rise and tell him so. He knows me well enough to know that I will do that. But the farmers of Canada want to know what the agricultural policy of this government is to be. The hon. gentleman denies it, and I accept his denial, but I would point out to the house and to the country that so much of this, shall I call it propaganda, has been appearing in the press about this government and its personnel that one has a right to know whether or not it is true. A number of the members of the government are new men who are not known to the country, and when I read in the press that these gentlemen are doing certain things I have to base my argument upon those statements. I have other clippings but if the minister denies this one I will not go any further. This despatch states the policy under four headings as follows:

1. The introduction of better blood in herds.
2. The scientific use of home-grown products for herd feeding purposes.
3. Careful study of the science of marketing.
4. The prevention of implantation and spread of poultry diseases.

Here is another one containing twelve headings.

An hon. MEMBER: Read it.

Mr. VALLANCE: From November until March it has grown from four to twelve; where will it be by the next election?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: I have the floor.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is right, but the hon. minister is rising to a point of order.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I think the hon. member for South Battleford as well as other hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house know that it has been the custom in the past, as it is at present, that when any new policy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: I know the hon. minister is new to the house and I am willing to give him a lot of latitude, but I want to know his point of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. minister should state his point of order, but should not attempt to make a speech.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): The only statement I wish to make is this, that any policy formulated—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. minister desires to ask a question he should first obtain the permission of the hon. member for South Battleford.

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): I wish to correct a statement.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. minister can do that.

[Mr. Vallance.]

Mr. VALLANCE: I have discussed this matter with my fellow farmers and they say to me: What is the policy? I hope that before this debate is completed the minister will announce to the country his agricultural policy. I do not intend to read this other clipping, as I believe the house will accept my statement. However, it can be found in MacLean's Magazine for March 15.

A perusal of Hansard for the special session shows that during any discussion on agriculture there was continual hedging upon the part of the government. During that session I attempted to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) as to the interest his government had in agriculture. I inquired of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) and he replied that at some other time we would discuss this matter. The farmers are getting tired of "some other time"; they want to know now. During that special session we voted $20,000,000 for the relief of unemployment. No objection was raised to that, but we did want to know how it was to be spent. The tariffs were increased to give more work to the labouring man. It was contended that if the goods heretofore imported into this country were manufactured here that would give more employment. I had no objection provided the desired results could be obtained, but I did doubt the veracity of that statement. And, Mr. Speaker, you can search the revised Hansard of that special session of parliament, and you will find not one statement that they made regarding relief for agriculture. Seventy per cent of the people whom I represent are engaged in that great industry, and when I returned to my constituency, they said to me, "Well, Jack, what did you do for us? We saw you voted $20,000,000 for unemployment. You raised the tariff to help the industries and the manufacturers. What did you do for us?" What did I tell them? The day before the house rose I asked the Prime Minister that very question. I said: When the farmers ask me what we have done for them during the special session, what shall I tell them? He never answered me; he could not answer me, because the government did nothing. I want to know now from the government: What do they propose to do for agriculture at this session of parliament?

Mr. SMITH (Victoria-Carleton): Does the hon. member realize that there are farmers in eastern Canada as well as in western Canada? The remarks of my hon. friend have been directed entirely towards western Canada.

Mr. VALLANCE: I realize fully there are farmers in eastern Canada. I am speaking for the farmers that I represent; I am speaking for the organized farmers of Saskatchewan, and the questions which they have been asking me I am asking this government, because the farmers want to know. I hope that before this debate closes the Minister of Agriculture will rise in the house and announce his policy.

When the Prime Minister was in Regina a memorandum was presented to him from the United Farmers. There has been no action; he has done nothing regarding the request contained in that memorandum. But some time ago I picked up a newspaper in which appeared the following item:

Montreal, Quebec, February 6.—The Gazette to-day published the following despatch from Ottawa.

The Prime Minister spoke in Regina on January 30, so that this is some thirty-seven days later.

The Gazette to-day published the following despatch from Ottawa.

So perhaps my hon. friend will not deny it.

While the previous intention of the federal government was to avoid any further revision of the tariff at the coming session of parliament, in view of the fact that an Imperial economic conference is to be held here next August, it is understood that the pressure of the Canadian manufacturers has been so strong and so persistent for more protective measures at an early date that the Prime Minister has decided to accede to their position.

You can realize, Mr. Speaker, how the farmers' charter of liberty is being peddled in western Canada when they send a memorandum to the head of the government while he is in Regina, but it is ignored and then they pick up this item. The hon. member for Marquette was talking about the red tape and the bull. This is just so much red tape in the eyes of the farmers in the west. At the special session of parliament we gave to those same manufacturers increases in the tariff and now, according to this despatch, unless it is denied, the government's proposal is to give them further protection, because their demands have been so persistent. There is only one thing the farmers have to do and that is to be a little more persistent. If the statistics that are given to me are accurate, just a little less than fifty per cent of the population, including my hon. friend who asked me a question a few minutes ago, are farmers, and they have been making demands. I think, Mr. Speaker, you will agree with me that the other fifty per cent are not all manufacturers. The Prime Minister listens to a percentage of the people, but does he listen to the great populace in the west? I ask: What is the government doing? We do not read in the press that he proposes to do anything of this kind for agriculture.

I read in the press the other day that a certain gentleman representing the Russian government suggested to this government a deal with Russia, involving about $10,000,000 for this country. It was turned down. I suppose the government will give the reasons why this action was taken; but whether we believe in Russia or a system of government education or anything else, Russia is still on the map and Russia to-day, as we all know, is attempting to put over a five-year plan. I am not arguing the question whether we may be in sympathy with it or not. She is going to put it through. Russia must have credits and she has only four commodities—lumber, pulp, coal and wheat—with which she can establish those credits. What we are looking for to-day is markets for our wheat. Russia suggests to this government that we take certain quantities of coal from her. This government says, no. Russia, simply because of the fact that our government refuses to have any dealings with her, will make a deal with some other government, to which she may not be able to sell coal but to which she may be able to sell wheat, and every bushel of Russian wheat that finds a place in any of our export markets makes it just that much harder for Canada to sell a like number of bushels on the markets of the world. If we were, shall I say, digging out of the bowels of our own portion of the earth the kind of coal that Russia produces I could see some logic in the government's argument, but we are importing large quantities of coal, and not all from Wales and Scotland. A large quantity is coming from Pennsylvania. I think it would be to our advantage to import a little more coal from Russia than from Pennsylvania because we might at least be able to place some wheat on a market to which Russia might otherwise sell wheat in order to establish credit. Russia wants machinery. For what reason? To develop that great trade of hers. But simply because this country refuses to buy $10,000,000 worth of coal does not mean that Russia is not going to get the machinery, for she will get it and some other country will get $10,000,000 of Russian money or its equivalent in coal or wheat. I might argue at length regarding the employment that would have been afforded, but time is passing and I wish to take up two or three other matters.

A suggestion was made by the three premiers of the prairie provinces that the federal government peg the price of wheat. There has been some discussion with regard to the matter, and most people agree that this is not sound economics, but as has been pointed out, everything the farmer has to buy is pegged. I do not propose to adduce that argument, but I will state that the price of wheat has been pegged before in Canada and not to the advantage, but to the detriment, of the growers—not in order that they might give the grower more, but that they might keep the grower from getting that to which he was entitled. I think the request now made by the farmers is a very fair one.

I have on the order paper to-day two questions asking for information. I hold in my hand a letter written by a Mr. Whiteside, from Birsay, Saskatchewan. It is rather lengthy, and while I should like to read it all, to do so would take up too much time. During the special session of parliament this gentleman wrote me pointing out that there are certain amounts of money that belong to the farmers of western Canada through the sales agency created by the government in the 1917 and 1918 disposals of their crops. We were under the impression that the wheat for which we got $2.21 the first year and $2.24, I think it was, the second year, was being delivered to the allies at those prices. According to my friend Whiteside, Sir George Foster told him that the wheat was not sold at $2.21 per bushel, but at world prices, and we, the farmers of Saskatchewan, therefore naturally believe and it can be shown by the records, which must be on the government files somewhere, that we were fleeced out of some seventy odd millions of dollars, which money was put into the treasury of Canada. This, of course, may not be true, and it is for that reason that I have a motion on the order paper for the production of papers, that we may know just what the facts are, because I think now is the time to have this matter cleared up one way or the other. Mr. Whiteside says:

> Now I come to the important part of this question and state this statement was put out by our Union government that this wheat was turned over to the British food commisison at $2.21 per bushel, plus handling charges. Desiring to get the facts I wrote the Department of Trade and Commerce at Ottawa, of which Sir George Foster was in charge, and got this amazing statement in reply, that our wheat was sold in the open markets of the world at the prevailing prices from time to time, and after deducting the operating expenses the balance of the money was turned into the funds of the Dominion treasury.

I wrote Mr. Whiteside, asking if he could produce the letter which Sir George Foster wrote to him, but he is not in that happy position, and therefore I am asking for the production of the papers.

Before I sit down, let me say that I have been twenty-five years in South Battleford. I have seen that great country grow up out of the wilderness. For the first two years we were 110 miles away from a railroad, then 72 miles; to-day there are within eleven miles of my own farm seven towns, villages or hamlets—seven shipping points. I have seen highways built, and telegraph and telephone lines, towns and villages and hamlets spring up, and all that goes to make a great civilization. I have seen millions and millions of wealth created in that great country. I have seen trainload after trainload of our produce going out daily. One would naturally expect, seeing that the people of that part of the country have created all that wealth, that they would be in a comfortable position to-day. But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that after twenty-five years in that country during which they have been attempting to build it up, these people, if their farms were sold for the mortgage indebtedness against them, could not pay that mortgage indebtedness. Where has the money gone? Talk about your charters of liberty! That is the condition of western Canada to-day, and whether the hon. member for Regina believes it or not, the Minister of Agriculture knows that that is the position.

Mr. ELIE-O. BERTRAND (Prescott) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, In rising for the first time in the house, where it is said one labours under difficulty in delivering a speech, I crave, sir, both your indulgence and that of hon. members.

Before broaching the various political aspects, may I be permitted to say a few words with reference to the beautiful riding which I represent, as well as to its people. The history of Prescott county extends quite away back in Canadian history, that is to the French régime, and our county has the honour of being the only one in Ontario which has had a seigniory under the former régime. In fact, about 1755, the present township of Longueuil was, at that time, the seigniory of the Baron de Longueuil.

A little later, about 1798, Prescott county had the honour of selling to Philemon Wright the latter giving his name to the county of Wright. The first wheat sown in the vicinity of Ottawa was sold by Josiah P. Cass of l'Orignal, and his descendants are still excellent farmers of my riding and village. In 1801, Prescott was represented in the Parliament of Upper-Canada by Alexander McDonnell, a man of rare ability who, at the age of 24, was elected Speaker of that Parliament. While Aide-de-Camp to General Brock, he was killed, in 1812, by an American bullet, at the battle of Queenston Heights.

Our people, descendants of these two great races of pioneers, of settlers under the French régime and later of settlers under British rule, lived together peacefully and progressed in an extraordinary way. If our people are not wealthy, they are however healthy and laborious. The experience of their history explains why they can discern between our political parties, and it is not astonishing that we registered a great liberal victory at the last general elections.

The county of Prescott is almost essentially a farming community, the greater portion of which is clay and endowed with very rich soil well adapted to grain, cereal and hay. However, we have some high sandy soil, also land which is better suited to dairy industry. Moreover, we have the small town of Hawkesbury, our only industrial centre, which rapidly developed, thanks to the lumber and pulp industries. Unfortunately, in recent times the lumber and pulp trade having dwindled the working population of Hawkesbury is not any more prosperous than our farmers.

Before proceeding to discuss the political questions, I am somewhat grieved, sir, for having to allude to it, but, I think, as a French Canadian of Ontario, I must necessarily refer to the unfortunate speech of the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) which he delivered yesterday. We, from Ontario, are astonished that a Conservative from Saskatchewan endeavours to teach a lesson of unity, accord and harmony to any part of Canada, especially when we read in the newspapers which have helped French culture in the province of Ontario in its most bitter struggles, articles as published by the "Droit", on March 5, 1931:

"The iniquity is consummated—Mr. Anderson, Prime Minister of Saskatchewan deprives the school rights of our people.—French disappears as a language of intercourse.—A new school question.—The conditions of national unity.

The Prime Minister of Saskatchewan has lost no time since his victory at the polls on June 6, 1929. He has outlawed the crucifix in the public schools of his province, and the uniform of the teaching nuns; he has forbidden that religious instruction be given in any other language than English; forced school commissioners to use the English tongue, under pain of imprisonment or fine; dismissed the French Canadian representative from the Provincial Council of Public Instruction; abolished the exchange of teaching diplomas between Quebec and Saskatchewan.

On February 18 last, at the Congress of the Saskatchewan School Trustees Association he proclaimed that the school act would be amended in order to abolish French teaching during the first year of the primary course. Yesterday, that amendment was read a second time and adopted in the Saskatchewan legislature.

Will you contend, sir, that this is done with a view of favouring national harmony and unity throughout our country?

I appeal to the hon. members of this house, of the province of Quebec, and to those who form part of the cabinet—the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau) is at his seat, and I ask him, as I ask the others, whether they approve of this stand and believe it likely to promote union and good understanding in our country.

Mr. DUGUAY (Translation): Mr. Speaker might I ask a question?

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): I have asked the Speaker to show some indulgence because it is the first time I address the house and I would prefer not to be interrupted to-day. In future debates we shall have the opportunity of broaching other questions; I shall then feel more at ease and shall answer hon. members.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Translation): One may put questions only with the consent of the member who is addressing the house.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): At the special session held in September, the Conservative party increased the tariff, gave extensive powers to the Minister of National Revenue and had $20,000,000 voted for the unemployed. However, this did not help the farmers, the tariff did not prevent the falling off in the price of their products and they do not even obtain the pre-war prices—that of 1913—for the products they are forced to sell, while the price of articles they are forced to purchase, such as farm implements and other commodities of life which they do not produce, are much higher.

With your consent, sir, I wish to have placed in Hansard a comparative schedule, based upon the statistics of 1930, with reference to prices of a few products sold by the Canadian farmers and also prices that they are forced to pay for certain farm implements.

In 1913, the Canadian farmer paid for a six-foot mowing machine, $43.50; in 1930, $96.50; a six-foot binding machine, $102 in 1913; in 1930, $225.50; a six-foot hay loader $60, in 1913; in 1930, $122; 15 discs seed drill, $69 in 1913; in 1930, $166.

The farmers must necessarily buy these articles which have increased by more than 200 to 250 per cent.

Here are now some products that the farmer must sell at the market price. Let us first take Ontario cheese which sells even a little dearer than that of the province of Quebec, being so classified owing especially to its place of origin. In 1913, the average price was $12.53 per hundredweight. I regret of not having been able to obtain from the Bureau of Statistics the average price for 1930, however, I was told that in December, 1930, cheese was worth $11.50 per hundredweight. Eggs per dozen, averaged 30 cents in 1913; in 1930, 26 cents. Wheat, per bushel in 1913, averaged $1.30; in 1930, 66 cents. Oats in 1913, 69 cents per bushel; in 1930, 28 cents. Steers per hundredweight, $6.90, in 1913; in 1930, $6; pork per hundredweight, $7.80 in 1913; $5.75 in 1930.

These figures were quoted before the agriculture committee of the Ontario legislature and I emphasize this fact in order that there may be no doubt as to their correctness. These figures show extraordinary decreases on farm returns from 1913 to 1930, on products sold, especially when contrasted with what the farmers have to pay from 200 to 250 per cent more, for farm implements which are absolutely necessary to them.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated during his campaign, appealing to the farming class: "Listen you agriculturist, you believe in free trade, you have been taught to believe in that policy, when has free trade worked in your favour, I declare that I will make protection work for you."

Now, let us ask the question, since protection began in September last: What has protection done to enhance the price of wheat? What has protection done to enhance the price of oats, the price of hay, of butter, eggs and cheese?

I especially wish to draw the attention to cheese, and I think I can show by selecting a commodity which Canada produces, what could be done through protection to assist the Canadian farmer. As to butter, knowing that local production is not yet sufficient to fill the needs of our own consumers, it may well be that for a time the price of this product may be raised. But one must not lose sight that for a great number of Canadian products, we will necessarily have to seek markets abroad. As we export our cheese, I think, there is nothing we can do to improve the situation.

As to the dairy industry, Prescott especially went in for cheese production. We make an excellent type of cheddar, and we are one of the foremost counties of Ontario in the production of cheese classed as No. 1. I will moreover add that our quantity of "specials" is truly encouraging to that industry, in our county. Has protection enhanced the price of western wheat? No, it went down and so did cheese.

With your consent, sir, I would like to place on Hansard a comparative schedule for the years 1929 and 1930. With this schedule you may judge better of our exact situation. I do not intend to weary the house by enumerating all these figures. However, sir, allow me to mention a few prices and establish comparisons.

Price of cheese No. 1, delivered at Montreal during the years 1929 and 1930, for Saturdays of the first week in each month: in January, 1929, coloured cheese, 17½ cents, white, 16¼ cents per pound; in January, 1930, coloured cheese, 18½ cents, white, 18½ cents per pound. Consequently there is an increase in 1930 over 1929 of 1¼ cent or thereabout. In June, 1929, coloured cheese, 17¾ cents per pound, white, the same price; in 1930, coloured cheese, 16⅝ cents, white 16½ cents per pound. Consequently there is a decrease of 1¼ cents.

But let us examine what has happened since the advent of protection: December, 1929, coloured cheese, 18¾ cents, white, 18½ cents per pound. December, 1930, coloured cheese, 11½ cents, white, 11½ cents. It is a product which must necessarily be sold on the markets of the world and cannot be given assistance, except by creating new openings; it is a product which cannot be protected, the price of which cannot be raised by an artificial tariff and must find a sale on foreign markets competing with other countries producing the same article. I think this shows that it is difficult to protect farm products. Consequently, if it is impossible to protect farm products, how can we protect other industries and expect that the purchasing power of the farmer will later absorb the increased prices brought on by a fictitious tariff in numerous instances, and that this may be added to the purchasing power of the farmer when he is ruined? For there are no two ways out, on our Canadian soil, the greatest purchasing power is certainly the one created by the Canadian farmer.

Now, let us see what the farmer gains by all this. The cost of transportation must be deducted from these prices. Consequently, speaking for my own district, we must deduct half a cent from the prices quoted. I shall return to this subject shortly by quoting more striking figures of the actual conditions existing. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi

(Mr. Pickel), stated the other day in his speech that Canadian farming was threatened within these last years. Let me say that if farming has been jeopardized within the last years, conditions have been greatly aggravated within these last months, for if you refer back—according to statistics—to the prices which the farmer obtained for his products during these last years, you will find that he was not so badly off as he is at present.

In 1928, for the months of October, November and December, the average price for cheese was 22 cents per pound. In 1929, for the same months, the average was 19 cents, and in 1930 the average price of cheese for the months of October, November and December was 13½ cents per pound. You can now figure out the reduction and small profit that the Canadian farmer derives from this product.

I was stating a moment ago that transportation charges must be deducted from the amount quoted. The cost of manufacture is 2¼ cents and that of freight ½ cent, making 2¾ cents per pound, and the balance of 10¼ cents per pound goes to the producer. Whosoever has dealt in the industry of cheese, in whatever district it may be, knows that this is a good proportion, a good average of production, and if we can obtain 9½ pounds per cwt. of milk, it is truly a good average. Therefore, 9½ pounds of cheese at 10¾ cents per pound would return $1.02 per cwt. of milk, and this is exactly the conditions existing in the county of Prescott. That is why I stated that our farming population is not prosperous at present. This does not include everything, $1.02 on an average is given according to the test of milk, because milk must pass the test, and as during those months the test varies from 3.6 to 4.2, the milk of the farmer who receives $1.02 must contain 3.9 of fat; milk testing 3.6 receives 4 cents per point less; consequently he receives 90 cents per cwt. of milk, and the farmer who has the good fortune of having milk testing 4.2, receives $1.14 per cwt. of milk. This is entirely below the cost of production in our district and I am positive of this fact as I have had careful investigations made by farmers who keep their books in perfect order.

Everybody propounds—not only in political circles, I wish to be absolutely truthful—that we must take care of agriculture because it is the foremost industry in our country, the one upon which rests the whole of our economic structure. May I add, that it is necessary that the Canadian farmer should find broader or new markets, moreover that the prices of farm implements which he needs should be placed within his reach. I heard this afternoon the following remark by a member of this House: "But, are they going to stop manufacturing barbed-wire in this country? A few hundred Canadian workers would be thrown out of work." I say that this would be called protection for a few hundred workers. But what about the safeguarding of the farming industry which is the foundation of our whole economic structure?

Might I be permitted to emphasize the fact that the Dunning budget at the regular session of 1930, had exactly those two points in view: lower the cost of the raw material for the Canadian consumer, not only for the farmer, by giving a preference to the British Empire, and afterwards endeavour to open up not only the English market but those of the whole Empire to our Canadian products, both farming and manufactured.

I think that it would be interesting for the members of this House to know what is the cost of an acre to a farmer and what returns an acre under culture brings. With your consent, sir, I would like to place this schedule on Hansard.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Translation): According to the rules of the House, the hon. members has not that right. The Minister of Finance only has that privilege, on certain occasions.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): Then, I shall read it. I am pleased, sir, that you put me on the right path which will help me in strictly observing the rules of the House.

Cost of production for an acre of oats:
Rent of land	$8 00
Ploughing	3 85
2 bushels of seed oats at $1	3 00
Because these oats were registered "good oats."
Harrowing, drainage, etc.:
5 hours, men at 25 cents per hr.	$1 25
5 men and horses at 30 cents per hr.	1 50
	$2 75
Sowing:
2 hours, men and horses	$0 60
Rent of machinery	0 50
	$1 10
Gathering of crop:
3 hours, men at 25 cents per hr.	$0 75
1½ horse, 30 cents	45
	$1 20
Moving of crop:
4 hrs., men at 25 cents	$1 00
2 hrs. horses, 30 cents	0 60
	$1 60

Threshing:
79 bushels at 5 cents..	$3 95
	$25 45
Winnowing of fine grains, free:
Good grain: 72½ bushels at 25 cents.	$18 13
Operating deficit per acre..	$7 32

1931 will certainly be the worst year of our history and our farmers are disheartened. They can rely on nothing to get returns; on the contrary everything is done at less than cost of production. Their purchasing power is destroyed; and what will our manufacturers do? I again state, if they have no clients able to purchase their products in our own country, if foreign markets are closed to them owing to the government adopting a trade policy hostile to other countries by erecting a tariff wall which prevents a free exchange of our products. If the government wishes to limit the number of unemployed it must necessarily come to the relief of the farming class. The farmer will remain on the land providing he is able to get reasonable returns. We can keep on the farm those who are already settled there, because they do not wish to lose the fruits of the labours of their whole lives. But we shall not succeed in settling the growing generation on the land under present conditions. The farm must provide for his man and to help him, I submit a few suggestions to the Minister of Agriculture and to the Conservative party, and I hope that they will bring down measures which may help in the solution of these farming problems and be beneficial to the whole country. First—and this we must absolutely have—substantial reductions of the tariff and an increase in British preference. Second, taxes levied on those who can most afford to pay. Third, increase in the income tax. Fourth, a decreasce in the sales or business tax. Fifth, reduced transport rates in the interest of agriculture. Sixth, establishment of cooperative principles for the sale of farming products and the purchase of the necessary farm implements. Seventh, direct financial asistance to help in improving sowing, cattle and the farm. Eighth, farm loans at 3 or 3½ per cent so as to assist the farmers in meeting their obligations in cases of absolute necessity.

I think that I have clearly shown what, for the present, is our farming situation. I would not like to close my remarks, sir, without saying a few words with reference to our labour conditions. We know that in September, the right hon. Prime Minister had $20,000,000 voted to relieve unemployment in Canada. I do not intend to criticize this measure. However, the workers hoped, relying on the pledges made in the electoral campaign, that all and each of them would obtain work. The right hon. Prime Minister had made this pledge here and there throughout the country and his candidate in the riding of Prescott carried on his campaign on this question by proclaiming that the prices of agricultural products were to increase in the district and that everybody would be employed in the small industrial town of Hawkesbury. But such was not the case in my riding. Work did not increase. This town subscribed $10,000 of its money against $5,000 of the federal government's money, and $5,000 of the provincial government's, yet, notwithstanding all this the unemployed had to solicit in order to obtain work. They will later on have to pay up that amount by taxes on their property. I shall even state that the unemployed had to beg for work and could but work each in turn and this during a few days only. While these things were happening, it is extraordinary, a road contract was being executed in the vicinity of Hawkesbury, by steam shovel instead of by hand labour. This contract could have given work to about fifty men during the entire winter; but they were replaced by machinery. In time of crisis, do you not think, sir, that it would be proper in this country where we overproduce, that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Robertson) should take the necessary measures —which would not be more arbitrary than numerous other measures of protection—to put an end to this state of affairs. If protection is worth something to our industrial people, to our manufacturers, surely it is worth something to the unemployed. Would it not be better in time of crisis to exclude this progress or so-called progress of machinery which deprives our workers of what they are entitled to.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Forward this message to the Quebec government.

Mr. BERTRAND (Translation): Before resuming my seat I appeal to the government to take under its care the worker and the farmer of this country and to give less favours to the large interests whose appetites will never deem their profits large enough.

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish for a few moments to speak in the interests of the locality from which I come. We have some industries which are not in a very healthy condition and certainly we will have to find ways and means to stimulate the progress of our towns and villages. Our stores are filled with goods and our farmers who are unable to buy are looking in the windows, their credit having reached its limit. The towns to which I refer depend largely upon the farming industry, and if the government could help in some way we would be delighted. Farming is the basic industry of our district, and therefore when the farmers are prosperous everybody is prosperous. May I remind the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that his photograph was placed in every convenient corner of my constituency and underneath it were placards giving promises to the farmers. At this time I ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to read some of the messages delivered to the farmers by the Prime Minister:

> We pledge ourselves to foster and develop agriculture and the live stock and dairy industries now so sadly neglected.

The Prime Minister is quoted as having made the following statement:

> This group of mercenaries holding office by sham and subterfuge, look upon them as treacherous to you, and self-confessed, deserving of your passionate condemnation.

At Woodstock the Prime Minister is quoted as follows:

> Our dairy business has been lost. We have 140,000 fewer milch cows to-day than in 1925, and there has been a corresponding depletion of our swine.

At Calgary the Prime Minister said:

> In my opinion the basic industry is agriculture. Agriculture has been the basis of this country's prosperity. The success of the wheat grower, of the wheat farmer, is reflected in the power of the people.
> Then comes the problem that is more important, the problem of marketing and of selling wheat. There it seems to me is a fertile field for the endeavour of a government.
> France, Germany and Italy have raised tariffs against Canadian wheat. We will look over the top of the hill and beyond the horizon to make provision for the Canadian agriculturist and secure for him markets. That is a question which will have to be solved. I told my audience at Winnipeg and I tell you here and now that condition I will not permit to continue in this country.

Then at Victoria he is quoted as follows:

> It is true we must have foreign markets and as I said the other evening we will blast a way to those markets on a world-wide basis with many exportable surpluses. We do not have to worry about that.

The Ottawa Journal reported a speech delivered at Woodstock, New Brunswick, as follows:

> It gave him great regret, Mr. Bennett continued, to have seen the deserted farm lands of New Brunswick, Quebec and other provinces. "Well," he stated, "I am going to say right here that I shall regard it as my great responsibility if elected on July 28 to see that the collective weight and power of the Dominion of Canada is placed behind agriculture. I would be lacking in qualifications entitling me to head a government if I failed to do so."

The Ottawa Morning Citizen reported a speech delivered at Ormstown as follows:

> The Conservative leader gave strong expression to his party's policy for assistance to agricultural schools, cheaper transportation, distribution and marketing. It was necessary, he continued, that farmers should receive just compensation for their efforts "and rewards equal to the professions" to keep Canadian boys and girls on the farm.

Hon. gentlemen know how those promises were fulfilled. After making such promises the Prime Minister called a short session and did everything in his power to cripple the farmers. Not understanding their critical condition he destroyed their last vestige of hope by his action at the Imperial conference. The farmers of Canada had hoped that the Prime Minister through his deliberations at the Imperial conference would make arrangements for the sale of their wheat. However in that regard they were badly fooled. When the Prime Minister visited the city of Calgary the papers proclaimed that he had a message which would greatly benefit the farmers of that district. They looked forward to his visit. We listened over our radios to this wonderful message, but in the minds of most of us there was extreme disappointment—it seemed just like a flat tire. In my district we had splendid crops and plenty of help to harvest them. Out storehouses are filled with an abundance of grain. In short, we have everything the soul of man can wish for, and yet there is distress throughout the Dominion. This distress is due to several causes. Undoubtedly the freight rates are too high, and there is no statesmanlike guidance of our national affairs. The heavens truly were kind, but the foolishness of the rulers had made the kindness of the heavens of no avail. We have abundance of food and yet our people are starving; a superfluity of clothing on our shelves and yet our people perishing for lack of it. I must insist that hon. gentlemen opposite do something for the farmers. I have repeated their promises to refresh their memories. I do not care how empirical their methods may be, so long as they get results. We are satisfied that their methods—those they have advocated and applied so far—are entirely wrong. We know that high tariffs are no cure for the present troubles of the body politic. To impose a high tariff is to drive a wedge between the rich and poor—making the rich richer and the poor poorer. It lowers the price of what the farmer has to sell and raises the price of what he has to buy.

The Prime Minister said he would guarantee to the manufacturer interest on his investment, a certain percentage on his turnover, and a sufficient balance to pay fair wages. This in my view was simply a declaration against the farmer and the consumer. If he is going to guarantee the economic safety of one class he should similarly guarantee all other classes in the community. What I have referred to was his minimum guarantee; I do not know how far his maximum might go. This is purely and simply class legislation, and if the farmer imagines for a moment that he can thrive under such a law he is making a sad mistake. In other words, he is simply being placed at the mercy of the manufacturer. About 2,000 years ago Plato said that every political party was destroyed by the excess of its basic principle. Now, the basic principle of the Conservative party is high tariff, and that principle developed to excess will not only destroy the party responsible for it, but also, unhappily, the nation whose affairs are entrusted to its administration.

The Prime Minister spoke of his diagnosis. Now, when a doctor sees a patient he makes a diagnosis of the trouble and then a prognosis in order to form an idea of the approximate duration of the patient's sickness and the correct treatment to apply. The right hon. gentleman declares: We do not say we will cure unemployment, we will end unemployment in three days. I think he was correct in his diagnosis, but his prognosis was undoubtedly too short. I think also that the dose of high protection he has administered to his patient is far too heavy. The country—his patient—is pretty well exhausted, and unless another doctor be substituted I am afraid the treatment will kill the patient. Canada to-day is suffering from too high a tariff. I need not quote figures to prove my contention; they have been given to the house so often that I do not think it necessary to repeat them now.

On various occasions the Prime Minister has said that he does not believe in the dole system. I do not think any of us approve of that system. Unfortunately he is so hard-pressed that apparently he is trying to find a way of escape, and to do so he seems prepared to apply the dole system, a system which has been so ruinous to the morale of the working classes in the old land. True, we cannot allow our indigent people to starve, but surely the Prime Minister is capable of evolving some constructive policy whereby employment may be provided for all those who are willing to work. It is a well known law that if people do something for their country they will love their country, whereas if they become parasites their patriotism languishes. Victor Hugo said that men always hate those they have wronged. And if a man wrongs his country he will hate it. Those who rely on the dole will not love their country; only those who have done something for their country will be ready to die in its defence.

May I quote Victor Hugo again? He says that an infallible barometer of hard times is the expense of collecting taxes. Unhappily that has been only too well borne out recently, for a great many of our people have not been able to pay their taxes. This condition of affairs to a considerable extent is due to the policy of the present government. We feel that the farmers of Canada were badly treated by the legislation enacted last September. To make matters worse, when the Prime Minister went to the Imperial economic conference he made no effort to help them. His attitude puts me in mind of the motorist who saw a man walking home. He stopped and said, "Why, John, are you walking? I will bring my car here in a minute and give you a lift." He came round with his car, drove towards the man smiling, and just as he got close to him flipped the wheel round and ran over the poor fellow. He jumped out of his car, rushed over, picked the man up and told him it was all a pure accident. He added, "Wait until I turn the car round, and I will give you a lift home." But the same thing happened again; just as he got alongside the man he gave the wheel a flip and ran over him the second time. He jumped out of his car, expressed his regret for the misadventure and said, "Stand there until I turn round; I will give give you a lift and then everything will be all right." About this time a friend of the unfortunate man came within earshot and he said to him, "You fool! come out of there; he is going to ride over you a third time." My opinion is that the Prime Minister ran over the farmers at the special session, he ran over them again at the Imperial economic conference, and I believe he is turning his car round to run over them a third time. And unless we can find some rescue on the other side I do not think there is anyone on this side who can pull that man out of the rut. The wheel looks all right, and the man's language is pleasant enough, but it means nothing. The language the Prime Minister used in the old country was splendid; its phraseology was attractive. But when it was analyzed, particularly the last clause or two, it did not take the Englishman long to see what was behind it. In other words, the right hon. gentleman did not suit his actions to his words.

One frequently hears about the depression that prevailed in the last year of the government led by the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). Our friends opposite are constantly telling us about that time of depression. May I point out that when the present leader of the opposition was captain of the ship of state we were sailing along and making progress to the extent of fifty million dollars a year towards the liquidation of our debt. I wish the Conservative government would usher in a few years of that sort of depression. But while my right hon. leader's government was making that headway, what were hon. gentlemen opposite doing? They were doing their best to rock the ship of state. Every time the then captain attempted to ride a wave hon. gentlemen opposite endeavoured to rock the boat. They succeeded in frightening the public and the consequence was that there was a change of captains. But the country will be fortunate if the future brings the sort of depression we had under the previous government.

The Prime Minister has made great statements about opening new channels of commerce. Why open up new avenues of commerce when the government has thrown sandbags into the ones that we have? They are cutting off in every way possible the present avenues to commercial enterprise, and still they are talking about opening up new waterways and so forth. The government are closing up our ocean ports so that our ships will have little to do. I do not know why the ship of state could not have been left under the old captain, when she was sailing peacefully and, as I have said, to the tune of fifty million dollars annually towards the payment of our national debt. The career of this government so far reminds me of the Greek myth of Phoebus. Phoebus was a very proud star, and while the other bodies were going on their celestial way, suddenly with great confusion she would throw forth great balls of fire; and while she disturbed the harmony of the heavens, yet she satisfied her vainglory by making herself conspicuous for a time.

The conspicuous place which the right hon. gentleman has won for himself he has won at the cost of the country.

I think of Canada as a vast factory, and the travellers who are working in its interests at the present time are the Prime Minister and his colleagues. We sent them to the old country to attend the Imperial conference in the hope that they would come to some business arrangement that would be advantageous to the commerce of Canada. But the attitude of the right hon. gentleman over there was not that of a salesman; it was more that of a dictator. If any of us had commercial travellers of that type coming into our offices they would not stay very long. The Prime Minister did not show that amiable spirit which is likely to promote business. He disregarded the warning of the Delphic oracle which every Greek was supposed to learn before starting out in life—"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." It seems to me that anyone going into public life should memorize that saying. It would have been well if the Prime Minister had thought of it when he was in the old land.

I wish now to say something with regard to the granting of relief to the poor. Conservative governments have always had the habit, when giving grants of this sort, of officiously doing the business of the powers beneath them. In our district many people rushed forward in the hope of getting some relief from the grant that was being made by this government. But it was not for them. If you were too poor you could not get it; you had to subscribe a certain amount before you could receive anything. It was for those who were financially in a position to secure it. It seems to be a characteristic of Conservative governments, not only Dominion but provincial as well, to knife back, if I may say so, the municipalities, very much to the cost of the latter.

Let me now discuss for a moment what is at present transpiring in the Argentine. What is the meaning of all this celebration that is taking place there, with the heir to the throne participating? Why could not such a pleasant relationship be manifested in Canada? I regret to say that I am afraid our birthright has been partly disposed of. All these grandstand performances in the Argentine are, it appears to me, an open declaration of the weakness of our Prime Minister, indicating his failure to direct trade and traffic to this country. We cannot see it in any other way, and we must regard it as a great loss to Canada.

There is one thing further to which I wish to make reference. It seems to me that the Conservative party has a tendency to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. I have here a letter from Imperial Oil, Limited, to the Independent Oil and Gas Company, Limited, of Montreal, and I wish to quote from it in order that hon. members may see what is taking place. The letter reads as follows:

Your inquiry of November 3rd, relative to gasoline for 1931 delivery, has been received and is appreciated.

At the present time we are not in a position to quote you for 1931 shipment but may be able to do so towards the end of the year and will communicate with you at that time. Just at the present time we are running somewhat behind schedule on our shipments, and, while we believe we should be able to take care of your requirements, we prefer to hold the matter over until a little later in the year.

In the meantime, again thanking you for your inquiry, we are,

The increased duty was put on in order that the gasoline should be purchased from Canadian companies, such as the Imperial Oil Company, but from this letter it would seem as though those companies are refusing to sell it. Apparently they are trying to put the independent companies out of business. On October 18 a tank car of gasoline cost $821.95 while by November 5 the price of a similar tank car of gasoline had risen to $949.16, an increase of over $120. Hon. gentlemen opposite will probably reply that although this tank car of gasoline cost $128 more the consumer was not obliged to pay any more for his gasoline. That is quite right, because the consumer has been paying a little less, but it gives an opportunity to the larger oil companies to decrease the margin between the wholesale and retail prices in order to eliminate the small independent dealer. The statement has been made that an increase of duty was granted in order that these companies might be assisted financially. This statement would not seem to be borne out by the following analysis dated March 18, 1930, issued by Financial Counsel:

Dealing with an item of $874,000 set aside for depreciation, he said that $174,000 or $700,000 less than amount set aside, would have been sufficient. The larger amount was written off because 9 per cent of the net revenue is payable to the Dominion government for taxes. With respect to such, a nominal write-off would have substantially increased earnings per share as indicated in the figures presented in the foregoing.

That statement would show that the amount set aside for depreciation was placed at $700,000 too much in order to avoid paying the Dominion government. These are the companies for whom the duty was raised in order to allow them to exist.

On motion of Mr. LaVergne the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

[Mr. Blair.]

Friday, March 20, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 10 to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

An hon. MEMBER: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This bill provides for an amendment to one of the sections of the act covering the proof of the non-issue of certificates. At the present time the issue of certificates or licences can be proved merely by the production of an affidavit sworn by the proper officer in Ottawa and the amendment proposes to allow the same procedure to be followed where no licence has been issued. The proper officer will be entitled to swear an affidavit of the non-issuance of the licence and that shall be prima facie evidence that the same was not issued.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TICKET OF LEAVE ACT

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 11 to amend the Ticket of Leave Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Explain.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The object of this bill is to legalize a practice which has grown up during the last fifteen or twenty years. The present act provides that the Minister of Justice shall advise His Excellency the Governor General in respect to all applications under the act, and this work has been carried on by the Solicitor General's branch of the Department of Justice. There has been no statutory authority for this practice and the proposed amendment is for the purpose of legalization and to provide that the Minister of Justice or such other member of the government as may be designated by the Governor in Council may advise His Excellency in respect to all applications under the Ticket of Leave Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PEACE RIVER RAILWAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) a question relating to the matter brought up a few days ago by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). I would like to know if the Crysdale joint report made by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways and the province of British Columbia dealing with the Pacific Great Eastern railway and Peace River railway route has been tabled?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon, gentleman told me this morning that he intended to ask me this question. I have made inquiry and find that the report to which he refers, and probably the one to which the hon. member for Peace River referred, has not been received. This report covers an investigation which was instituted by the province and the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National railways. I understand that nearly $500,000 has been spent in investigating these resources, but a report has not been made to the provincial government nor has it reached my department. I am making inquiry of the Premier of British Columbia and as soon as we receive the report I shall be glad to table it.

DEPORTATION OF UKRAINIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) a question based upon a telegram which I have received advising that over 800 girls are on strike in Toronto and that a Ukrainian girl who had been sentenced to thirty days in gaol for throwing snowballs had been recommended for deportation. I would like to know if the minister has received this recommendation to deport this girl.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Mr. Speaker, the matter to which the hon. member refers has not been drawn to my attention. If he will supply me with the name of the girl in question I shall be pleased to answer the question at the proper time.

UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Labour whether the government has under contemplation any special measures to cope with the immediate seriousness of the unemployment situation.

An hon. MEMBER: No. answer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Are we to assume that there is no answer from the government to that question?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it might be well to advise the house that the government proposes to adopt the practice which the right hon. gentleman himself suggested was the correct one, to decline to answer questions asked as to contemplated action of the government. Upon the occasion to which I refer, the right hon. gentleman in my judgment correctly stated the rule, and to that rule we propose to adhere.

Mr. HEAPS: Am I to assume from the answer given to my question that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) is the Acting Minister of Labour?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) can assume anything he chooses; the Prime Minister is quite within his rights in declining to answer.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

QUESTION RAISED AS TO PROPRIETY OF TAKING PART IN DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question which immediately affects the rights and privileges of this house. Before the adjournment of the house last night the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), who occupies the important position of deputy speaker, moved the adjournment of the debate. I take it that he did so with the intention of proceeding this afternoon to participate in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I rise at this moment because I would not like to interrupt the hon. member during the course of his speech. If that were his intention it is, I think, important that the house should consider carefully just what is involved in the deputy speaker of the house participating in political discussions.

May I say to my hon. friend that the last thought in my mind at the moment is in any way to embarrass or discourage him in the matter of participation in debates. I confess I was somewhat surprised when I saw that he had accepted the position of deputy speaker because I knew not only of his ability as a public speaker but also of his great liking for public speaking and debate. I assumed that whoever accepted the position of deputy speaker would follow the practice which has been followed, I believe continuously in this house, of the deputy speaker not participating in debate. I was surprised therefore that my hon. friend had accepted a position which I felt would limit him in the matter of discussion on the floor of the house.

The question which I raise is wholly apart from any individual or the particular occupant of any position, it relates exclusively to the position of deputy speaker, and as such I invite the attention of both sides of the house to the necessity of a non-partisan consideration of this matter which vitally affects the rights and privileges of every hon. member. The position of speaker is the most important of the positions in the House of Commons, with the possible exception of that of the prime minister, if indeed it is not the first position in the land. The position of deputy speaker, while not equally important, is a very important position, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that with respect to participation in political discussions it should be a rule, if it is not already a rule as well as the custom, that whoever occupies the position of deputy speaker should thereby be precluded from participating in debates in the House of Commons. I submit that the position of deputy speaker, with respect to the practices to be followed, should be identical with that of the position of His Honour, the Speaker. There have been times in the past when the speaker did leave the chair and participate in debate, even in a very partisan way, but that was over a century ago in Great Britain, and such practice has not been followed in this country for a very considerable time. Although there may not be a formal rule covering this matter, I think all hon. members will agree that it has been a custom or tradition that the speaker is not expected to participate in political discussions in the House of Commons and that this has also been the practice. My submission, Mr. Speaker, is that whoever occupies the position of deputy to Your Honour should follow the same rule and the same practice as Your Honour with respect to parliamentary discussions.

May I point out that the position of deputy speaker has been made somewhat different from that of other hon. members of the house in order to give the occupant of that position more in the way of independence during his tenure of office. Like the speaker, his position is a salaried one. The emolument is not as considerable but the salary is voted by the house in order to secure the absolute independence of the occupant of the chair; it is a guarantee of independence. It is quite clear that there is a reason why the deputy speaker receives that special recognition and I submit that one of the grounds on which it is voted by parliament is that whoever occupies the position is expected to give his time and thought to the many important matters which come up under his presidency and that he may not be tempted to take a party point of view of any question which comes before the house for discussion. As hon. members know, the deputy speaker occupies the position of chairman of committees, and the house will agree that about two-thirds of the time of the house is taken up with the work of the committees. He is chairman of the committee of the whole, chairman of the important committee of supply, chairman of the important committee of ways and means, and as chairman of those committees he is in the position of the presiding officer in this house for practically three-quarters of the time that is spent in discussing matters here. Everyone, I think, wishes to have, and I am sure the hon. member himself wishes others to have, a feeling of complete confidence in his impartiality. I submit to my hon. friend that if he were now to participate actively in the present debate and take a party view in regard to many matters that may come up in the course of this discussion, we on this side could hardly be expected to have the confidence in his impartiality that we should like to have, and that we have reason to believe we shall have if he will follow the practice that has been common in the past.

These are some of the reasons. I might add the further one which is of importance in proceedings of the house, namely, the part which practice and tradition play in these matters. It would be unfortunate if we were to depart from a practice that has been, as I say, generally followed since the creation of the position of deputy speaker. I do not say that at no time has there been any participation in debate by the deputy speaker, but I believe I am right when I say that generally speaking, whoever has held the position of deputy speaker has felt that his obligation was to follow, in the exercise of the duties of that position, the same practice that would be followed by his Honour the Speaker.

May I point out to my hon. friend in this very regard that if His Honour the Speaker should not be in the chair at the moment, in all probability, my hon. friend would be the one who would be occupying it and he would then find himself placed at this moment, in view of the representations that I am making to Your Honour, in the position of having to decide a very important point, whether the deputy speaker should or should not participate in political discussions. If he participates, clearly he is hardly in a position to give a ruling on this matter that affects the privileges of the house as a whole.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Why so?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says: "Why so?" Because, no matter how sincere he might be in his view, were he to decide that the deputy speaker should have the right to participate in debate, I am inclined to think that the public generally, to say nothing of hon. members, might entertain the idea that in arriving at the decision, my hon. friend had been influenced by his own personal views concerning the office, and what should be permitted its occupant, rather than that he was giving a decision, unbiased altogether by any personal feelings which he might entertain in the matter. In saying this, I am not reflecting on my hon. friend; I am seeking to state the matter in the way which I believe the public would view it. It is as important that those who occupy high offices of state should, in the mind of the public, be above suspicion, if that is possible, as it is that in their own minds their conduct should be above question.

I feel a little more secure in raising this point at this time owing to the fact that it has been brought up in parliament before, and that it has been very fully and ably discussed by two right hon. gentlemen who have each held over a considerable period of time, the position of prime minister of Canada. I imagine there are few names that by opposing parties will be held in higher honour, regard and respect, certainly in connection with matters pertaining to the rights of the House of Commons and its privileges and the privileges of its members, than those respectively of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. Some years ago both of those gentlemen discussed very frankly on the floor of the house the position of deputy speaker. The question came up in a resolution which Sir Wilfrid Laurier had introduced, in which the position was taken that the deputy speaker should not participate in political discussion outside of the house; that his position as deputy speaker made it such that his attitude as respects participation in by-elections and in political campaigns, while parliament was still in existence, should be precisely that of His Honour the Speaker. I am not going to go into that question; I think it was pretty generally accepted at that time that the view expressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier had been concurred in by Sir Robert Borden, and that it was unnecessary to lay down any rule; but I submit if any such attitude can be rightly taken with respect to participation in political discussion by the deputy speaker outside of the house, there is even stronger reason why a similar rule should apply to participation in debates within the house. I will give to the house in a few words what was said at that time. The debate took place on March 5, 1914. Sir Wilfrid Laurier had introduced the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in the discharge of the duties and responsibilities of the deputy speaker towards this house, he is bound by and subject to the same rules as apply to Mr. Speaker, and that, therefore, he is debarred from taking part in electoral contests.

Your Honour will notice that the assertion is that in the discharge of the duties and responsibilities of the deputy speaker towards this house, he is bound by and subject to the same rules as apply to Mr. Speaker. That is the position laid down. From that it follows that the deputy speaker is debarred from taking part in electoral contests. It equally follows from it according to the resolution that he would be debarred from participating in political discussions in the house. Sir Wilfrid Laurier went at some length into the reasons for this. He outlined the position of the speaker in the old country, the position as it had become in this parliament and passed on, after giving different authorities in support of his contention, to discuss the position of the deputy speaker. I will not do more than read one paragraph of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's remarks at that time in support of what he then said, but it bears immediately upon the point that I have just raised. Referring to the British practice, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I must again refer to the fact that in my consultation of the authorities I have not found any discussion as to the possible breaking of that rule by deputy speaker. I have not found in any of the books which I have consulted that at any moment the chairman of the committees departed from this rule and took part in any political discussion. Whether or not Mr. Speaker, or the deputy speaker or chairman of committees, is allowed to take part in any political discussion in Great Britain, I say again I have not been able to satisfy myself; but from the very fact that the books are silent upon this point, I conclude that the rule has been observed, and I believe I am correct in stating that, on the floor of the house itself, neither the deputy, the deputy speaker. I have not found in the assistant chairman of committees takes any part in the discussion.

The text here is evidently not correct. What is meant is that neither the Speaker nor the deputy speaker nor any presiding assistant chairman of the committee has taken part in the discussion. Sir Wilfrid continues:

If I am wrong in this I would be glad to be corrected; but after what examination I have been able to give to the subject my conclusion is—

And this is the important point—

—that the same rules which apply to Mr. Speaker apply also to the deputy speaker and to the assistant chairman; and, quite apart from any precedents, discussing the question simply as a matter of reason, it seems to me that the conclusion is not only obvious but irresistible, that the deputy speaker should be bound by the same rules which bind Mr. Speaker; that, having to discharge practically the same duties he should be subject to the same regulations and the same exceptions. The deputy speaker presides over the committee of the whole house, over the committee of supply and the committee of ways and means, and I need not tell hon. members that three-quarters of the business coming before this house is discharged in one of these committees. The experience of parliament has forced the conclusion that the Speaker of the house should not be allowed to take part in politics, and that the same rule should bind also the member of the house who has to discharge the important duty of chairman of committees of the whole, of ways and means and of supply—that is to say, the presiding officer in that portion of the time of the house in which the house is occupied in discharging the major part of all its duties. As an abstract principle, therefore, I submit to the house that the deputy speaker is bound by the same rules that apply to Mr. Speaker.

Sir Robert Borden, speaking on the resolution, is reported a little further on as follows—I quote from page 1368 of Hansard of March 5, 1914:

I do not at all minimize the importance of having the deputy speaker of this house placed outside the pale of party politics so far as that can reasonably be carried out.

Sir Robert goes on to state his position in a very concise way. He says a little further on:

The best course, it seems to me, is to surround the deputy speakership, so far as it can be surrounded, with the same tradition of custom and of usage that is applied to the speakership in this country.

Those quotations will be sufficient, Mr. Speaker, to indicate entire agreement on the part of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden in the matter of participation in party discussion in the house by the occupant of the position of deputy speaker.

Sir Robert Borden did say, however, further on:

The only question is whether we had better evolve the status of the deputy speaker in the same way as that of the speaker has been evolved, or whether we had better lay down formal rules. I shall be quite satisfied to have the matter considered at the convenience of the right hon. gentleman.

May I conclude what I have to say by informing the house that the reason I have brought the matter up as I have is that I think it can best be proceeded with in accordance with the suggestion of Sir Robert Borden which was accepted by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not press his resolution. He said he thought that the discussion which had been had of the principle would be all that would be necessary to cause the occupant of the position of deputy speaker to abide by what was evidently the general view of both sides of the house as to his position in matters of political discussion. I would not wish to embarrass either Your Honour or the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) in asking that the chair rule this afternoon on a matter concerning which rules are not already laid down, but I would hope that my hon. friend from Montmagny, the present deputy speaker, would view the matter as one which should be the subject of a conference between His Honour the Speaker, the Prime Minister, and possibly the leader of the Opposition as well, with a view to seeing if an agreement cannot be reached which will cause the practice which is to be followed in the future to be the one which I believe will most accord not only with what has been best in the traditions of this parliament, but best in the traditions of the parliament at Westminster as well.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: No general debate can take place on this occasion. It is usual on the order of the day to allow a statement by an hon. member on a matter affecting him personally, but there can be no general debate unless there is a motion before the house.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if I am in order. I think that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is starting from the position that I am going to make a partisan speech. I gave no intimation at all so far as that is concerned, and I think I should have trusted any member of this house to have been more interested in the well-being of Canada than in any party declaration of principle. If that is not the case on the side of the house which my right hon. friend leads, I can assure him that there is no partisan speech on this side of the house so far as I know. We speak in the interests of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I am speaking for myself. I go further. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition is an old parliamentarian. He knows that the position of deputy speaker does not exist. It does not appear in the rules of the house; it does not appear in any of the comments of either Beauchesne, Bourinot or May. I am only the chairman of the committee of the whole house. There have been many of the committees of the house presided over adequately by members chosen by my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition or his party, and I do not think it has ever been the case that any such hon. member was denied the privilege of speaking as an ordinary member of this house. The presiding member of any committee of this house has the right to speak on any question before the house.

The debate from which my right hon. friend quoted is, I must say, not very apropos because it concerned the deputy speaker taking part in a particular discussion outside of this house. The Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier never pressed his motion, and if my right hon. friend had read a little bit further he would have found that the leader of the opposition at that time, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, gave up the position for which he had been contending and recognized, as was correct, that the deputy speaker was only an ordinary member of this house.

I would go further to satisfy my hon. friends to the left of Mr. Speaker. I have tried by all the means at my disposal to be as fair as I could. I have presumed that when you are in the chair, Mr. Speaker, I am only an ordinary member of this house, and that when I am in the chair I occupy your place for the time being. I have always tried to be as fair as I could, but if it means that the position of deputy speaker, which does not exist, if it means that the chairman of the committee of the whole, who presides over a committee of this house just as hon. members to your left, Mr. Speaker, presided over committees when the right hon. leader of the opposition was prime minister of this country, has not the right to express the views of his riding and say what he sincerely thinks about the welfare and prosperity of this country, if it means that the deputy speaker or chairman of the committee of the whole has to become a slave of the party or is to be so much suspected that his voice has no right to be heard in this parliament, Mr. Speaker, I beg leave, with the permission of the right honourable leader of the house and the right hon. leader of the opposition and with your permission to resign my position. I accepted the position of deputy speaker to promote the business of the house but I do not think it was ever meant that the hon. member for Montmagny should not have the right to express his views concerning those things he thought necessary for the welfare of his country I think that is the action feared by hon. members on the opposite side of the house. I do not think it was ever intended that the hon. member for Montmagny should not be allowed to denounce the campaigns of prejudice which have been raised in the name of one party or another. Mr. Speaker I beg permission to resign immediately the position I have the honour to occupy. I have been appointed by this house to the position of deputy speaker; it is not a government position. The position was given me by this house and if hon. members see fit to ask for my resignation the matter is entirely in their hands. However as long as I have at heart the interests of the constituency of Montmagny I must speak in the interests of that constituency, in the name of the province of Quebec, in the name of my party and of Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rise in regard to what I understood to be a ruling of Your Honour. As I understood it Your Honour took the view that this matter was one of personal privilege. It is a matter which affects the privileges of the house and as such every hon. member is entitled to discuss the question. The matter being of such importance I think the house should have the benefit of the views of the right hon. the Prime Minister on the matter, and that all hon. members of the house should feel perfectly free to speak. As the matter under discussion is one which affects the privileges of the house as a whole it should as a consequence be open for discussion by all hon. members.

Mr. LAVERGNE: May I retire while the discussion ensues?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I suggest that the hon. member remain in the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, stay here.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that the observations of the right hon. leader of the opposition might have been delayed until such time as the speech delivered by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) could be said in any sense to be controversial. As to the right of the hon. member to speak on any subject in this house I think there can be no doubt. That is my view. As to whether or not he should enter into controversial discussions is a matter of his own choice and is a matter that might be left to his own discretion. There is no rule however, which circumscribes or limits his rights as a member because he holds the position of deputy speaker.

A similar point was raised concerning the Speaker of the house, Mr. Lemieux, in the year 1927. The then Speaker of the house in committee of the whole participated in the debate. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who was then leading the opposition said he thought the house should take notice of that innovation, whereupon the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) participated in the debate and intimated that in his judgment the Speaker should not participate in discussions in the house. He went so far as to say he had doubt as to whether or not he should participate in discussions in committee of the whole house. In exceptional cases, however, he thought the Speaker was warranted in taking the action he did. Thereupon the Speaker referred to precedents and quoted them at length. The last case in England in which the Speaker has participated in the debate was in the year 1870 when Mr. Speaker Denison participated in the discussion in the committee of ways and means. There is a very long list of cases in which speakers have participated in discussions in committee, but not of course when the house was sitting. Obviously the Speaker cannot take part in the debate and preside at the same time. Therefore, as a matter of common sense, of reason, as well as by precedent and rule, he is prevented from discussing or debating any question while he is in the chair. As I have said the right of the Speaker to enter into the discussion when the house is in committee has been conceded. One case was a discussion with respect to inland revenue; another was a question concerning a point of order, and public measures at various times have been discussed by the Speaker when the house has been in committee.

Now we come to the position of deputy speaker. In England the position of deputy speaker as we understand it here does not exist. You perhaps will recall, sir, that when the present Speaker of the English House of Commons, Captain Fitzroy, was chairman of committees there was much discussion and a considerable amount of antagonism in connection with some of his rulings and at one time it was thought that when he was proposed for the chair he might be vigorously opposed. However, sounder counsels prevailed and he was elected to the speakership. There being no such office as deputy speaker in the English House of Commons we have to examine the matter as one of principle. If the ruling laid down by my right hon. friend is to be observed the corollary of it must be observed, namely, that if the deputy speaker is not to participate in debate obviously he should not be attacked. That is fair. How but by participation in debate would he be able to answer attacks made upon him? That, Mr. Speaker, seems to be the crux of the whole matter and it will be found that Sir Robert Borden in discussing the matter of a resolution of the then leader of the opposition, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, directed the attention of the house to that particular point. Is it right merely because one of our hon. members has been elected chairman of committees and chairman of the committee of the whole house that he should be deprived of the right to speak to the house?

Mr. POWERS: There is a deputy speaker in our scheme of government.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I say that.

Mr. POWERS: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say there was not.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I said that no such condition prevailed in England.

Mr. POWERS: The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) said that.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I am familiar with the fact that we have provided for a deputy speaker by a rule of the house. I am sorry if my hon. friend misunderstood me; I stated that in Great Britain there is no such official comparable to our deputy speaker. Let us further examine the subject before us as a matter of principle. One of our hon. members is elected deputy speaker and chairman of committees. Has he therefore abrogated his right as a member of the house? He is in the chair only during the time that the Speaker is not in the chair and while he is not said to be the permanent committee chairman he is nevertheless chairman of the committee of the whole, the committee of ways and means and of supply. He exercises a very great power, subject to the general rules of procedure which govern this house. Let us, however, consider what happened the other day when he was attacked in this house. As a member he takes his seat and as one of the deputies of this chamber is he to be silent? May he make reply? Is it right that he should be silent?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By whom was he attacked? Any hon. member including the deputy speaker has the right at any time to raise a question of privilege and to defend himself.

Mr. BENNETT: By the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). Surely hon. members opposite heard what was said.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not recall it.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, an insinuating question was put to the hon. member for Montmagny. Is he to remain silent? Has his acceptance of the position of deputy speaker placed him in a position where he can no longer reply to the attacks which are made upon him? Sir Robert Borden clearly appreciated that point when he put it to the house at that time. I have not read the debate recently, but, as I say, he had a clear appreciation of the point.

You attack a member in his capacity as member. You say he should be silent because he occupies the position of deputy speaker. I think this is the answer. The deputy speaker of this house has no restrictions placed upon him by rule, by tradition or by practice, because deputy speakers have participated in debates in this house. On one occasion, it is true the leader of the house at the time, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, objected, if I remember correctly, to one of his own supporters, entering into a controversial discussion, and thereupon the hon. gentleman discontinued his speech and said what he had to say upon another item.

My conception of the situation would be this. The deputy speaker is subject, as the right hon. leader of the opposition has said, to the restrictions that are imposed upon the Speaker with respect to his impartiality, in his conduct of the business of the house. His own good taste and judgment must determine whether or not he shall enter into controversial discussion. And I think you can always trust the common sense and discretion and soundness of judgment of any hon. member who is chosen as deputy speaker of this house not to contravene that general principle. In other words, so far as it is necessary to explain his own position, he is free to do so. As to participating in any debate in which highly controversial or—shall I say?—highly political differences manifest themselves, his own judgment, his own good sense, must be the determining factors with respect to the extent to which he does so participate. Because the punishment is clear; he forfeits the esteem and regard of the house, and if he becomes a violent partisan his usefulness as deputy speaker will be regarded as ended. If, on the other hand, he discharges the onerous duties which we have asked him to accept according to the traditions of this house—because there is no deputy speaker at Westminster at the moment—then he will merit the commendation and approval of this chamber. That seems to me to be the rule which should govern in a matter of this kind.

In my view it is premature for the right hon. gentleman to raise the question under discussion until something has happened to indicate that the deputy speaker has in any sense contravened the principle which should govern. I still claim for the deputy speaker, as I would claim for any other member of the house, the right to make any response he thinks adequate to any attack that may be made upon him. In other words, you should not make him a judge unless you treat him as such; and if you enter into controversy with him you must afford him an opportunity to answer the observations directed to him.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one denies that.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman will continue to discharge his duties with that high appreciation of what is required of him as he has in the past. I trust he will reconsider the resignation he has presented to the house, because those of us who have followed his course of conduct in the chair will recognize that a rigorous adherence to the rules makes for effectiveness in the conduct of our business. I think it is a salutary lesson to have the rules strictly observed where too often they have been violated. I believe the house will agree with me that a thorough knowledge of the rules on the part of the deputy speaker and his enforcement of them against every member, regardless of whom he may be, is conducive to the well being and seemly conduct of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that the occasion calls for a ruling by the chair. The incident referred to by the right hon. leader of the opposition was not exactly on all fours with the incident of to-day. By universal consent the house on that occasion refrained from dealing with the matter and left it to be considered at the next general revision of the rules. Since that time the rules have been generally revised, but the matter was not dealt with.

In my opinion the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) occupying the position of deputy speaker, is perfectly at liberty to take part in the debates of this house. If the house wishes it otherwise it must take action by amending the rules or by an appropriate resolution.

I did not understand the deputy speaker to-day to tender his resignation, but merely to say that if he was to be so restricted he would tender it.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I fully realize that, under the present circumstances, I must make use of the English language. I beg of my French-Canadian speaking colleagues to kindly allow me to do so because the few remarks I intend to make will be addressed to the English-speaking members.

Mr. Speaker, as the few remarks which I shall offer to the house are mostly for the benefit of my English-speaking compatriots, I deem it my duty to express myself in the English language. In doing so I beg the indulgence of hon. members, and I trust that any mistakes I may make they will attribute to my poor education in English. I think the best way to understand one another is to speak frankly, so that knowing what we think we may come to a quicker and better understanding of our respective points of view.

May I, without transgressing the rules of the house, refer to the remark made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). Let me assure him that he need be under no uncertainty as to where I stand. I speak to-day as a Conservative by conviction, not by education or birth.

Speaking as a Conservative and not as a partisan, I believe the day of Liberalism has passed. Liberalism, as a great French philosopher has said, is the doctrine that thinks good alone is dangerous and that it has to be mixed with a bit of evil to render it acceptable to the people. It is almost twenty-five years since I had the honour to raise my voice in this house, but I have lived long enough to realize that we must choose between materialism, the spirit of to-day, or Conservatism, the spirit of tradition. That is the conclusion I have come to.

My hon. friend from Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) and other hon. members have spoken of attempts to arouse religious and sectional prejudices throughout the country during election campaigns. I am willing to accept this as true of both sides, but surely my hon. friends on your left, Mr. Speaker, must admit that if ever such prejudices have been appealed to in this country they themselves were conspicuously successful in such appeals in the general elections of 1917, 1921, 1925 and 1926. For instance, it was not the Conservative party that raised the war issue. I admit at once that I was one of those who opposed participation by this country in the Great war, but I defy any hon. gentleman opposite to prove that in the last twenty-five years I have ever appealed to prejudice. Hon. members to your left, Mr. Speaker, were in favour of participation in the war. How is it that in the last four campaigns, nay in the last campaign, on the very eve of the campaign, they had the press publish rumours of a new war in which Canada would become entangled—just for the sake of partisanship, or for the sake of getting back into office? Those are facts which my hon. friends cannot deny. Were they in the interests of Canada? Were they in the interests of the prosperity of this country? I leave it to them. My opinion is this, that whether prejudices are aroused on one side or the other, the fact remains that we are all Canadians. There is no use talking of one language or the other as being spoken in different provinces. We are here to stay, both races; both languages are here for good; and that will be the best and happiest moment for Canada when we forget that we are French or Scotch or Irish and become Canadians.

I listened the other day with much interest to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He said he could not become a good Tory, and as a matter of fact, in his opinion, good Tories do not exist. I do not know whether he was right or not. I claim that, being perfectly independent of partisan politics, I have become a good Tory, because I have become a good Canadian.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh oh.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I had hoped that my hon. friends opposite would applaud that sentiment. I know there are good Canadians on the other side of the house; undoubtedly there are, and I will come to that later on. So far as I can be impartial, Mr. Speaker, and stating truth as far as I see it, my hon. friends may rely upon me to indicate the faults or errors on both sides. God knows my hon. friend from Labelle had no more loyal supporter than the hon. member for Montmagny. But can we go on nursing old sores and past wounds without realizing, as I do at least, that protection is necessary for our country? Why should we keep on nursing those old wounds and forgetting the duty of the moment? Since the last election I have followed the leader of this party (Mr. Bennett). The first action of this government was to stop immigration. I can go back over the years when my hon. friend from Labelle, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) and, unfortunately, myself were members of this house, the only ones now left of those days. If you look at Hansard of 1906, when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, you will find that when the Liberal member for Montmagny first began to speak of the danger of immigration, I stated to the house that, in the very words of the then Deputy Minister of Immigration, immigration directed to this country was intended to drown the French-speaking people of Canada. And when I see the leader of this government stopping immigration by order in council I must say, as a Canadian of French descent, and a Conservative by education, I had to support that policy.

To-day in this very parliament we hear our hon. friends on the extreme left bringing before the house doctrines which we cannot accept, talking of secession. My hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) said yesterday that there were more than six hundred present at a secession meeting.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. VALLANCE: What I said, was this, that I merely mentioned the fact by way of illustration to show that not six persons as, the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) had said, were paying attention to secession, but that many hundreds throughout the west had been attending secession meetings trying to glean some information on the subject.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I do not think my hon. friend had need to contradict me. I said six hundred; probably there were more. Let me say this: With respect to that talk about secession, in spite of persecution, in spite of being denied rights, the first protestation against secession was put forward by the French-Canadian habitants of the far west. That is the point I wanted to make in this regard, and no other. My hon. friend from South Battleford and many others have spoken of the sorrows of the farmers out west. We understand this. We believe, as he does, in reducing freight rates; we believe as he does that the farmer in the west is not as well off as he might be. But let the hon. member come to the province of Quebec. In our province the love of the soil, the love of Canadianism is such that we do not complain and kick or talk of secession, but accept our duty as due to Canada. And we are willing to undergo many hardships for the sake of Canada. I would go further. Speaking to relieve the mind of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking as a Conservative but not a partisan—

An hon. MEMBER: How can you be otherwise?

Mr. LAVERGNE: How can I be otherwise? By not being a Liberal, very easily. The leader of the opposition spoke of the attitude taken at the Imperial conference by the leader of the government. He spoke of blasting ways. Why not? The Liberal party has not been blasting since 1897. They attended the conferences with vaseline and glycerine, not nitro-glycerine. Has the right hon. leader of this government taken a position different from that of Sir John A. Macdonald or Sir Wilfrid Laurier? Has he not the right to speak for Canada first when Great Britain has been speaking for Great Britain first since 1897? If I were as much an Englishman as I am a Canadian I would say that Great Britain was perfectly right. This is a question of business and one which has to be discussed from a business point of view. Ireland acquired her liberty simply by talking of herself first, and speaking for myself, I say: Canada first, ourselves first. Of course the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) did not come from Quebec, and I am sorry that the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) is not in his seat. The attitude has been taken that the Prime Minister of this country has been acting in a disloyal manner. That question has been raised before in Quebec, I head it when I was fighting against the hon. members on the other side of the house. Is it disloyal to claim that the interests of Canada are superior to those of Great Britain? If the interests of Great Britain come into conflict with those of Canada, I stand with my native land, and that was the attitude taken by the hon. leader of this government. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) made a speech the other day in this house, and he seems to think alike with the hon. member for Quebec East and Quebec South (Mr. Power). It is considered to be disloyal because this country is trying to make a bargain with the government of Great Britain. We waited since 1897 for what the leader of the opposition calls a generous conciliation, and we did not get a thing. Does the hon. leader of the opposition say that we have no right to maintain our position as the Canadian government? We belong to the commonwealth of British nations and the only way to speak is to speak frankly. Unfortunately, since 1902, that course has not been followed by the Liberal party.

If at any time I felt proud of being a citizen of Canada or felt proud of being a Christian it was when the Prime Minister of this country, speaking not only in the name of the Dominion of Canada, but in the name of civilization said: We shall have nothing to do with Russia. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) says that the case against Russia has not been proven, but I say that it has been proven to the hilt. Here is the nation that murdered its emperor, murdered three young royal princesses in a dark cellar, and put the czarevitch, a young boy, to death. This country has denied civilization, it has denied the teachings of Almighty God, it has denied the sacrament of marriage and it has denied the right of the individual to hold property. I say the case against Russia has been proven. The statement is made that we will lose money, but a man does not live by bread alone.

An hon. MEMBER: You need bread to live.

Mr. LAVERGNE: That may apply to the animals, but the human being possesses a spirit and does not live by bread alone. Above material prosperity there is something far superior, a mental and spiritual prosperity, and when the leader of this government said that he would not trade with Russia he spoke in the name of those who believe in something higher and more spiritual than the utterances of the leader of the opposition. If I am wrong I am willing to take the blame upon my own shoulders because I am speaking in my own name. When the leader of the government stopped all trade with Russia he gave not only to our country but to the world at large the greatest example of the teachings of the Bible. I speak for myself and as a man who believes in Canada and who lives not by bread alone but by support of a light which cannot be extinguished and which was left to us by our forefathers and the missionaries.

In conclusion may I say that this country —and this is where we owe a debt to the present government for its action—has been divided racially by the introduction of foreign elements, of the bolshevist doctrine which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) disguises well, but which we can see piercing through his speeches. Is this working for the good of this country? I believe not, and I say to my hon. friends of the west: If you had had in your western country Canadians of French descent, of French tradition, or, speaking plainly, habitants of Quebec, instead of the foreign element which you brought in, do you think bolshevist speeches along the lines of those of Lenin in Russia would be possible in Canada? The fault is due to the past leaders of the party of which the leader of the opposition is now the head, who for the sake of speculation, brought into this country people of foreign origin. To my hon. friends from the west I say: probably this is your punishment; chickens are coming home to roost.

We must build up this nation on the two great races that Providence has given us as an inheritance. My hon. friends will, I suppose, expect me to speak plainly and I must speak plainly. A moment ago I spoke of appeals to prejudice in Quebec. My hon. friends did not reply because they have not been entirely frank. In regard to appeals to prejudice in Saskatchewan and Alberta, I will not use my own language because it might not have much weight. I will use a language that is more authoritative. I believe all campaigns against the French language in this country are, in the words of Sir John Macdonald: "Absolument sans fondement," or absolutely without foundation. This applies to the Premier of Saskatchewan as well as to anybody else. If the French language is not recognized in this country or in any province, as far as I am concerned, I accept the challenge. If we look back in history we shall find that under every regime in every province except Quebec the minority has been persecuted and its rights curtailed. But let us go forward; let us get to the bottom of the truth in this affair. If Mr. Anderson is allowed to do to-day what he intends to do out west in Saskatchewan, where does the fault lie? It lies on the other side of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAVERGNE: My hon. friends laugh. Will they laugh when I mention 1896? Will they laugh when I say that the Conservative party went down to defeat for the protection of the constitutional rights of minorities in Manitoba, when Mr. Yeo was allied with Joe Martin and Dalton McCarthy? Who went down to defeat then if it was not the Conservative party? Who betrayed the province of Quebec if it was not the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame!

Mr. LAVERGNE: Who says "shame"?

Mr. DUPUIS: I do.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We all do.

Mr. BRADETTE: He was a much bigger man than my hon. friend will ever be.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes, and a bigger man than my hon. friend will be even with all the Liberal press at his back. But is it not true that in 1896 the Conservative party stood for the Remedial bill? I will go further; in 1905 I was a Liberal member in this house, and if Mr. Anderson is allowed to do what he is doing to-day, where did he get the right and the power? The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and I were the only Liberals who stood up for the rights of the minority. Now is the time to say "shame," but shame on you and shame on your party.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is no time to be partisan.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I thought the hon. gentleman was putting a question. If he wants to do so, he is quite welcome. But the hon. member knows what I say is true.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Not at all, I deeply resent that.

Mr. LAVERGNE: The hon. member was not in the house at that time, but I was excommunicated from the Liberal party on account of the stand I took.

An hon. MEMBER: The mask was taken off.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Yes, it is time to take off the mask. You cannot go back to Quebec as you did before. That is why you did not want us to be elected. You did not want us to tell the truth, but now your appeals to prejudice are at an end. Your efforts to set one race against the other are finished, and you are quite well aware of the fact. I was in the house in 1905 and if Mr. Anderson does what he does to-day, it is due to the then hon. member for Quebec East who at that time denounced the hon. member for Labelle. The Liberal party stood on the rock of the constitution on the 21st of February, 1905, but it was down at the bottom of the rock of constitution on the 21st of March, 1905. That is the truth, and my hon. friends know it. Now is the time to laugh, but if my hon. friends laugh, they laugh at themselves.

Hon. members know where I stand. I believe the action of Mr. Anderson in the western province is wrong. I think it is detrimental to the province, detrimental to Canada. We are here in Canada to stay together whether hon. members like it or not. As far as I am concerned, having learned in my infancy the language of the province of Quebec, having learned to love and cherish it, I think Providence has given us a wonderful asset in Quebec. We are here to stay. Why not stop fighting about these questions? If we want this country to remain as it is, if we want confederation to endure, we must admit the necessity, the legality, of the two languages. I read the other day that there was some objection to the proposed bilingual stamp. I take it that every publication of this government should be in the two languages, and I will tell you why. I wish I were an English-speaking Canadian for one moment, but only for one moment, because I am proud of my French blood, proud of my Acadian tradition on my mother's side, proud of the language I speak as my mother tongue, proud of my respect for authority, not believing that Jack is as good as his master, and believing in our sovereign the king as the anointed representative of the Almighty, believing that there is one danger in this country far greater than the one that I denounced before—I have never been backward in denouncing the dangers of imperialism, but speaking to-day as a Canadian of French language and French descent, I say that I believe that the salvation of this country is in the British Empire; and I have paid dear enough to be entitled to say that. I am not a French-Canadian; I am a Canadian, speaking French, but if this country is to live and confederation is to survive, whether we be Scotch, Irish or French Canadians, I think that we will all admit that our only salvation is in the building up of something different from the United States civilization. We have in this country a dual civilization, a dual language. We have the glorious public laws of Great Britain; we have the clarity of the civil law of France; we have also, which is our greatest asset, the great French thought of charity for human misery, charity and love in the name of Christ our Saviour. In the name of that dual civilization that we enjoy in this country I say that if we want our country to survive, we must build it on the spirit of our forefathers, on the doctrine of Cartier and Macdonald, Lafontaine and Baldwin, and build up a nation where there are neither vanquished nor conquerors, but two races enjoying the same rights and privileges.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver South): I should like first of all, Mr. Speaker, to refer to an incident that happened in this house yesterday and again to-day when the Prime Minister was answering certain questions that had been asked by my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). In reply, the Prime Minister stated that the intentions of the government would be manifest by their actions. We all remember that last June the Prime Minister was not quite so reticent in his replies. He was, on the contrary, very profuse and very emphatic in stating what the intentions of the government would be if he were at its head. Are we to assume that now he is in power we are not to have that frankness which he indulged in when he was in opposition?

I should not have taken up the time of the house at this stage to refer to Russia had it not been for certain remarks made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. LaVergne) with respect to our relations with Russia. He said that chickens had a habit of coming home to roost. That is exactly what happened in connection with Russia. The chickens did come home to roost so far as the ruling class in Russia was concerned. I should like in this connection to refer to what Lord Macaulay said with reference to the civil war in Great Britain during the seventeenth century when King Charles lost his head. I think his words are worthy of being quoted at this particular time. He said:

> If it were possible that a people brought up under an intolerant and arbitrary system could subvert that system without acts of cruelty and folly, half the objections to despotic power would be removed. We should, in that case, be compelled to acknowledge that it at least produces no pernicious effects on the intellectual and moral character of a nation. We deplore the outrages which accompany revolutions. But the more violent the outrages, the more assured we feel that a revolution was necessary. The violence of those outrages will always be proportioned to the ferocity and ignorance of the people; and the ferocity and ignorance of the people will be proportioned to the oppression and degradation under which they had been accustomed to live.

Is that not the case in Russia? If the Russian people were ferocious when they rose in rebellion, it was because they had a ferocious ruling class in the first place. The same thing happened in the civil war in Great Britain. It was, as Lord Macaulay says:

> Thus it was in our civil war. The heads of the church and state reaped only that which they had sown.

I would like my hon. friend from Montmagny to take particular notice of that. Macaulay goes on:

> The government had prohibited free discussion; it had done its best to keep the people unacquainted with their duties and their rights. The retribution was just and natural. If our rulers suffered from popular ignorance, it was because they had themselves taken away the key of knowledge. If they were assailed with blind fury, it was because they had exacted an equally blind submission.

If those remarks applied to Great Britain during that particular period, I am sure they applied equally well to Russia in the years prior to 1917. He refers to the enormity of the offence where four or five, six or seven or a dozen people were murdered and says not a word about the millions of workers who were murdered by the Czarist rulers? These were workers, and were not worthy of my right hon. friend's notice. They may kill all the working people they wish but if one of the ruling class is taken it becomes a criminal offence. In the view of the group around me the blood of the manual worker is just as precious as that of the greatest ruler in the land. He referred to the fact that we should have no dealings with Russia. As a matter of fact only a few commodities have been debarred from this country. We have not yet debarred caviare which the wealthy must have at their banquets. That commodity is allowed to enter the country free. At least it is allowed to come in without restrictions. We have not debarred gold. The Russian people can buy anything in this country with gold. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) believes that the morals of the people of Canada would be corrupted if we were allowed to exchange machinery for coal, but if the same commodity is exchanged for gold our morals will not be harmed. What wonderful consistency. What wonderful logic the leading people of this government use.

Let me at this time refer to an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Province quite recently. That is a Conservative paper, at least it gives support to the Conservative candidates. It did all within its power to defeat your humble servant at the last election. I assure you it did it's work very nicely and very subtly. I will quote briefly from this editorial as follows:

Canada has declared an economic war on Russia. That is what the order in council passed at Ottawa on Friday amounts to.

This is not the first time that Canada has made war on Russia without the courtesy of declaring war.

Several reasons are given for the passing of this remarkable order. It is stated that the government is convinced that forced labour is being used in the cutting of timber and the mining of coal. It is held that the standard of living in Russia is far below that in Canada. It is charged that the Soviet government seeks to impose its will on the world, and the statement is made that, since Canada, as a country, is opposed to communism, it must refuse to support it by interchange of trade.

Foreign trade is an entirely selfish thing.

We will all agree with that. Not only is foreign trade selfish but so is domestic trade; all trade as a matter of fact is selfish.

No country goes into it (foreign trade) with any other object than to benefit itself. Canada, as one of the half dozen or so leading trading nations of the world, should know this and should have learned by this time the recognized methods of caring for her own interests—and orders in council of the kind passed at Ottawa are not among them.

That is a quotation from a very respectable Conservative paper, but possibly it came very near the truth as to why these orders in council were passed. I have heard rumours that religious institutions in this country have brought pressure to bear on the government; those rumours may be true or may not be true. If the history of the past is any criterion I would say that it might be true. However that is not the point which is discussed by the Province:

It has been suggested that Russian timber and pulp being produced by forced labour would compete unfairly with Canadian timber and pulp. Very well. Keep them out. There are tariffs for that purpose. It has been suggested that Russian coal would take the market from Nova Scotia coal or from Welsh coal. That is a very good reason for not admitting it. But the coal Russia proposed to ship is anthracite and Canada buys from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 worth of anthracite from the United States every year. What interest have we in protecting the Pennsylvania mine owners? Has the Smoot-Hawley tariff been so kind to us that we must rebuff a possible customer in the interests of Uncle Sam? He hasn't rebuffed Russia. Last year, while Canada's exports to Russia were falling off 50 per cent or so, American exports were growing. In fact, of the thirty-eight principal countries doing business with the United States in 1930, Russia was the only one that increased both its exports and imports.

The government may answer or they may not but is it not a fact that the reason for the embargo on Russian coal is that it may be made possible for the American coal owners to ship their coal in here and the Canadian pulp manufacturers to ship their pulpwood to the United States. We have heard of conditions existing in the coal mines in the United States and if conditions in the mines of Russia are any worse they must be very bad indeed.

I regret that I have had to touch upon that particular subject at the moment because I believe there are other questions of more importance. It is in pursuance of that belief that I now add something to the discussion which has taken place in this house, something which has not been touched upon up to the present time. With a super-abundance of wealth such as the world has never known we find the greatest poverty that this country has experienced, and those two conditions exist side by side. That is the question we have to solve and it is one which has barely been touched upon up to the present time. Before coming to that point however there is another matter of consequence which I would like to mention. I spoke of it to certain of my colleagues in this corner; it is a matter which might occur to every new member of parliament. I refer to the seeming ineffectiveness and unbusinesslike way in which the affairs of this country are handled. They told me that in time, I would become used to this way of doing business. As a matter of fact they realize the ineffectiveness of our parliamentary methods and have become cynical. It seems to me Mr. Speaker, that if what has happened here during this week is any criterion of the expedition with which our economic ills are going to be remedied then the betterment of our conditions is indeed in the dim, distant future. Six hours and a half were taken by a vendetta between the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition. I think we are all agreed that the speech of the leader of the opposition which lasted about four hours and a half was a wonderful effort and I am satisfied that if the speech of the Prime Minister was not quite as effective in achieving its purpose it was because he is a very busy man and he does not have unlimited time at his disposal for preparation. What does it all mean? Can the problems of the country be solved by such means? Here we have two gentlemen endowed with intelligence above the average—at least we would wish to believe so—who in 95 per cent of the things they would be called upon to deal with in their ordinary business relations would not have the slightest difficulty in coming to an understanding; indeed, as a matter of fact an understanding would have been arrived at before they met formally. On the directorate of the great business organizations of this country we find Conservatives and Liberals sitting side by side, and certainly they have no difficulty in the world in so directing the policies of their corporations as to fleece the rest of the community. In the other 5 per cent where there might be any differences of opinion it is safe to presume that those gentlemen of conflicting political views would quickly come to a mutually satisfactory compromise. But when we come to deal with questions of national importance the whole situation is changed, and these same Conservatives and Liberals cannot agree on any single item of business that comes before this house; what those on one side propose the others on general principles must oppose. May I say for the benefit of those whom it may interest that the faith of the people in the efficacy of parliamentary institutions to solve our national problems is on the wane. And surely if the exhibition of futility that we have witnessed since the opening of this session is appreciated by the electorate, they certainly will have need of that faith expressed in our hymn-books:

> Faith that will not shrink,
> Though pressed by every foe;
> That will not tremble on the brink
> Of any earthly woe.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I like to be appreciative; it gives one a pleasant feeling. I have perused very carefully the speech from the throne to see if it conveys anything to call for my appreciation. I tried to find in it some promise of legislation that would improve the standard of living for the poor. I did not find very much, but for the little I did find I express my appreciation to the government. True, there are vague references to old age pensions and to continued aid for technical education, but even this is predicated on the satisfactory condition of the national exchequer. Well, if the treasury is not in a prosperous condition, let me remind the Prime Minister that there is an enormous amount of wealth in this country—not potential wealth, but wealth in commodities, in usable form, which is the only wealth there is, that is if you exclude labour, which as a matter of fact is the foundation of all wealth. In the speech from the throne I find these words and they appeal to me very much because of their terseness, and at first I thought they might mean business:

[Mr. MacInnis.]

> The problems which stand between us and ultimate prosperity—

"Ultimate prosperity" has not been defined, but in case the Prime Minister may forget to define it for us I am going to give him the definition now: Ultimate prosperity, as far as I am concerned, is the highest standard of living for the masses of this country that the national wealth and their own willingness to produce will provide.

> The problems which stand between us and ultimate prosperity are manifold and great. To be effectually met, they must first be understood. Confusion between cause and effect will but delay their solution.

I quite agree with that. But I am fearful there is considerable confusion in this house at the moment between cause and effect. It seems to me that must be the case because I have not heard anyone trying to explain the relation between a superabundance of wealth and extreme poverty. There must be a relation between these two conditions, and unless we find that relation we might as well go home and let somebody else make the attempt.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): We have to discover the missing link.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, we have to discover the missing link. About a year ago my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) raised in this house the question of unemployment. The debate continued for about a week. One of the sad features of that debate, it seems to me, was the failure of the then leader of the government (Mr. Mackenzie King) to appreciate the economic condition of the country. I have not yet been able to understand his lack of appreciation of the gravity of the situation. I am surprised that a man of his political sagacity failed to see what was apparent to the public generally. The then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) was fully alive to the fact, and he made unemployment the major issue in the campaign. Thus for the first time in the history of this Dominion, after the most prosperous period on record, from 1925 to 1929, unemployment—the poverty of the people—became the issue in a federal election campaign. After the change of government the right hon. Prime Minister in fulfilment of the promise he had made, called a special session to end unemployment. Certain measures were enacted at that special session to take care of the immediate situation. That was in September. I wish to point out that the unemployment situation to-day is worse than it was in March, 1930, it is worse than it was in September, 1930, and yet there is not a word in the speech from the throne of what measures the government propose to take to deal with the situation after the appropriation made at the special session shall have been expended.

Mr. COOTE: At the end of this month.

Mr. MacINNIS: That will be very shortly.

Mr. COOTE: The election is over.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, we have a right to know the intentions of the government in this respect, because the people are feeling the pinch of poverty. In this connection may I be permitted to read a despatch that appeared in the Vancouver Province of March 12. It is as follows:

> Calgary.—Forced out of Vancouver when civic authorities cut off relief measures on Monday, scores of single unemployed are making the long trek from the coast city to Calgary, and no less than sixty men dropped off two freight trains on Wednesday evening, according to those who saw the men disembark west of Mewata park.
> Officials of the Salvation Army hostel said on Thursday that the men are visiting the hostel in droves. They stated that the majority of the 1,500 men cut off relief in Vancouver will eventually find their way to Calgary.
> The men are dirty, some of them are verminous, and all of them tell the same story. They were obliged to leave Vancouver when relief was cut off, and decided to stop off at Calgary in the hope of getting food and clothing.
>
> The mayor of Calgary, Andy Davison, said:
> I want to say emphatically right now that no relief will be extended to these men by the city of Calgary under any consideration. We have more than enough to do to look after our own unemployed. Begging on the streets will not be tolerated, and every effort will be made to keep these men moving.
> But men without food cannot keep moving very long; it requires a certain amount of food anyway to enable them to do that.
> There is nothing we can do to prevent them coming to Calgary, but no assistance of any kind will be granted to them by the city.

That is the situation in Calgary at this particular time, and what is the Prime Minister doing about it? He promised less than a year ago that no man in this country would be allowed to go hungry; yet here are men going hungry and in want while there is not a word in the speech from the throne as to what is going to be done with them.

This morning I received through the mail from Vancouver the following figures showing conditions on February 28, 1931. Unemployment at peak registered showed married men, 5,994; single men, 5,399; and women, 155. For various reasons very many more women than are registered are unemployed in Vancouver. But here you have 10,548 unemployed in Vancouver registered; and many more, who have been living on what little they could save since last they were employed, are in very dire circumstances indeed. All the funds for unemployment amount to just enough to keep 2,000 men working until the end of April. I was a member of the Vancouver city council last year and I know the situation is very much worse at the present time than it was then. We are told that in Russia there is forced labour. In this country we have forced idleness. Which is worse? Many of these men would be glad to have the opportunity of being forced to work but they cannot get it. Before we throw stones at other people let us clean up the mess on our own doorstep.

I have further figures showing the trend of conditions and they certainly do not suggest that we may look forward to any improvement in the near future. These figures are taken from the Labour Gazette and are supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. From January 1, 1928, to February 1, 1928, with 6,358 firms reporting, there was increased employment to the extent of 11,993. In 1929, from January 1 to February 1, with 6,391 firms reporting, there was an increase of 12,539. In 1930—and this was the year when we had a serious unemployment condition which the present Prime Minister admits existed and which the present leader of the opposition denies—there was an increase for the same month of 4,234. In the present year, from January 1 to February 1, with 74 more employers reporting, there is a decrease in employment of 8,085.

Does this show that there is any hope in the future of improvement? Is there any hope of a return to prosperity in the very near future? In the meantime what is to be done with these people? I think we are entitled to know, not only when action is to be taken, if it is taken at all, but when it will be contemplated.

If the leader of the government intends to put an end to unemployment I would suggest certain things for his consideration. I am quite sure that the leader of the opposition had nothing to do with bringing it about, and I am equally sure that the leader of the government will have just as little to do with putting an end to it. However, if he wishes to do something to relieve the situation there are certain things he can do. I wish I had time to attempt an explanation of the cause of unemployment, why it is we have distress in view of the enormous wealth we possess. But let me put it briefly in this way. Under our present social system production is carried on for profit. The worker must produce more than he gets in wages, and he can buy back only a certain amount of what he has produced; while the employers, the owners of the machinery, are limited by the amount that they can consume, as all human capacity is limited. There is a surplus over and above that, and that surplus is continually growing; and with areas where new development can take place becoming gradually more restricted, the amount of invested capital at the same time continually increasing, there is bound to be unemployment until that condition is remedied. There is only one way to remedy that condition at the present time, and that is by reducing the hours of work and increasing wages, so that more of the total product may go to the people as consumable goods and less be available for capital investment. That need not cause any particular trouble, inasmuch as what is available now cannot be invested because there is no place in which to put it.

That is the first suggestion I would make to the Prime Minister. The next is this, that he should find new fields of exploitation for capital awaiting investment. That is rather a hard thing for him to do, but he can take it into consideration. Then there is the possibility of the invention of some new utility which will do for the next decade what the automobile has done for the past.

There is one other alternative, and that is a world war. If we study the depressions that have prevailed in the past we shall recall that we had a business depression in 1913, 1914 and 1915. That depression was dissipated by a world war. We had a business depression from 1921 to 1924, and that was dissipated by an enormous amount of money loaned by the United States to Europe, with the understanding that goods would be bought in the United States, following the reconstruction that took place in Europe after the devastations of the war. The change was also brought about by the enormous development of motor transportation and the amount of capital and labour that went into building that particular industry. It was also brought about to some extent by what we are pleased to call the deferred payment plan in purchasing. All these have reached their limit; the unemployment problem situation is becoming more acute and will continue to be so, and no amount of palaver in this house will solve it.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I consider it my duty to take part in this debate because of the many problems to be faced in the riding which I have the honour to represent. Although I have been a member of this house for the last five years it is still a difficult thing for me to rise and express myself as I would like to, and that is why I offer sincere congratulations to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier), the mover of the address in reply. It was a fine address, well delivered, and as a Franco-Ontarian, I certainly enjoyed the delightful Acadian accent of my hon. friend. I would like to repeat a few words which impressed me very much. They are:

> This harmonious working together of different races and different religions is most worthy of commendation.

This sentiment is appreciated greatly by every section of the house. However, the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) does not seem to hold this view. I would like to repeat some of the statements which he made at a Conservative meeting held in Regina. He was present at that convention and he gave warning to the effect that the English in Saskatchewan were losing their rights. He said that the French-Canadians of Saskatchewan had had the audacity to hold French debates in their schools and were distributing as prizes books which came from the province of Quebec. He is quoted as having said:

> Here are the proofs. It is only evident that the struggle to deliver the province of Saskatchewan of Quebec domination is only beginning.

The hon. member congratulated the hon. leader of the opposition upon the recovery of his belief in the principle of unity. He should have said the Conservative party instead of the Liberal party, but apparently he expressed it as he did in order to have the advantage of being able to work side by side with his fellow members from the province of Quebec. I am sure that they will broaden his vision in these matters.

Speaking to a large Conservative convention held in Toronto in 1928, the hon. and genial member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) is reported as having used these words:

> Quebec should be clubbed on the head, for it will never agree with the policy of Conservatism. There should be no more pandering to Quebec. The St. Lawrence waterway should be developed and Canadian wheat should be shipped to the old country from the maritime provinces all the year round—not from Quebec and Montreal in the summer.

Mr. SPENCE: From what paper did the hon. member get that?

Mr. BRADETTE: From the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. SPENCE: I thought he had taken it from a Quebec paper.

Mr. BRADETTE: This shows the care which should be taken in making statements of this kind. The hon. member for Regina was afraid of Quebec domination, but I believe he is mistaken. The hon. gentleman, who is a very prosperous lawyer, a capable speaker and a man of ability, should make a point of visiting the province of Quebec and certain sections of northern Ontario. Such a visit would not prove harmful to him. It would broaden his vision and make him realize that the French Canadian has a natural right to work shoulder to shoulder with his fellow Canadians, for the development and prosperity of our beloved country.

As the Deputy Speaker (Mr. LaVergne) said a few moments ago, we can live and work shoulder to shoulder. We are all Canadians and it ill behooves the hon. member from Regina to take the stand he does.

Canadian politics should be clean, but what a spectacle was offered to the country during the last general election when in Ontario a man who has recently left our shores to fill a high office, said that he was not in the campaign against the Liberals as a party but was taking part in it because he hated one man. When a minister from Ontario spoke in Port Arthur last June he called the attention of the country to the fact that he was in the federal election not because he hated the Liberals, in fact he stated he liked them, but simply because he hated the then Prime Minister. Is that being fair? And some members on the other side have the audacity to raise these questions in this house. It is our duty to answer them as briefly as we can, but we must set this matter right before the people of this country.

Then we had the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) casting an aspersion upon the good name of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). He accused him of disloyalty to Canada on the ground that the present leader of the opposition was a pro-American. He stated that he was not fit to govern this country and that he should be sent to Australia or to New Zealand. It is the duty of every member of this house to put a stop to such practices as occurred during the last general elections.

I made allusion to my genial friend from Toronto. There was not much in what he said, but I suppose when he said it he did not think that at some time there would be French Conservatives in the house—and they all get along together very nicely. We should have unity at all times. The present situation in Saskatchewan is, I believe, merely a matter of ignorance rather than a matter of belief. I believe that after the hon. member for Regina has had the opportunity of being in this house a little longer his vision will be widened and he will think more from a national point of view. I would like to read a very short article which was published in the United States, and in doing so I hope I will not be criticized by hon. members on the other side, because there is quite a moral and a philosophy in that brief statement. This article is right to the point, and reads:

> The theory has long been held in some quarters that two nations sprung from the same stock, and using the same language, were more likely to have sympathies, tastes and viewpoints in common than those that are alien in blood and speech; that they were less likely to come to misunderstanding, quarrels and war. But the new Lord Mayor of London is of a different mind; he thinks that the fact that the English and Americans clearly understand one another is a liability rather than an asset and to a certain extent acts as an obstacle to true friendly relations. A Frenchman or a German might call you all the bloodcurdling names in his vocabulary and leave you unmoved, but let an Englishman greet you with some of his favorite, high-flavoured expletives, and ringside seats at once bring a premium. So, too, every contemptuous innuendo, every rhetorical pinprick that an American or an Englishman employs in a newspaper to belittle or irritate his cousin across the water goes straight to the mark with undiluted venom.

That was the spectacle offered recently at the Imperial conference, when representatives speaking the same language used words which had a repercussion throughout every section of the British Empire.

I wish to commend the seconder of the address (Mr. Porteous). He said that it was with diffidence that he arose to address this body, but he did not need to be because he certainly made a good speech, and a very eloquent one. One gesture that I want to compliment him on is his giving precedence to the mover of the address. If the Speaker were in the chair, I would also compliment him on the knowledge he has acquired of the French language in the short period of six or seven months. This is appreciated by every French-speaking Canadian, in fact every Canadian throughout the length and breadth of the country. It makes people realize that we are all working together for the advancement and prosperity of Canada as a whole.

Only a few days ago I saw a statement issued by the Minister of Labour to the effect that during last winter and through the provision made at the special session 220,000 people had been given employment. After perusing these figures quite carefully I asked myself where the information was obtained. I have on my desk several letters containing dozens if not hundreds of names, complaining of the fact that in my riding very few people can find employment. Of course I quite understand it is impossible to distribute all that money in a way that will satisfy everybody, nevertheless the fact remains that in my riding many people cannot find employment, under the unemployment relief funds while their neighbours are working all the time. There are some who have received under the Dominion government grant the magnificent sum of $2.40 for an eight-hour day, and could work only one day. Just a few minutes ago you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were talking about the spirit of the people. We possess that quality, particularly in northern Ontario. We believe in the wonderful spirit of Canada; and we believe in the spirit of those pioneers who made out of a wilderness one of the finest sections of Ontario, but coupled with the right spirit there must be something solid; the spirit must be translated into proper action. Hon. members I am sure will agree with me on that score. How are you to build up a vigorous people on spirit and promises alone? How are the people going to get, on $2.40 a day, enough bread to enable them to live? It is absolutely beyond my comprehension. We also wonder, in our section of the country, why, under the unemployment relief scheme, we received only $2.40 for an eight-hour day while in southern Ontario—and this statement was made by one of the Ontario cabinet ministers in Hamilton during the last election—they received $2.80? Why the difference between the two sections of Ontario? Everyone knows that not a single soul in this country could live on $2.40 a day and some getting work for only three days a week. It must be remembered that in many cases the men working under the unemployment relief program worked only three days a week. This meant that they were receiving $7.20 for a whole week, or something like $30 per month without board. A driver with a span of horses received the ridiculously small sum of $5.20 a day. During the last election the present government was saying to every section of the country that what the Canadian people wanted was not charity, but work. Is this real work and proper remuneration? Let me give some quotations from papers which are absolutely independent in politics. This is from the Northern Tribune of Kapuskasing:

[Mr. Bradette.]

We have not yet seen in the Ontario press even an attempt on anybody's part to explain discrepancies in pay on northern development payrolls in the Cochrane and Kenora districts.

Why this difference? The Prime Minister is not in the chamber at present; I do not know who is leading the house, so that, if this is a so-called one-man government, I am going to be out of luck so far as getting an answer is concerned. Why should there be a difference of fifty cents a day between southern and northern Ontario in the wages paid to these workers? The only conclusion that one can come to is that political partisanship has been played in some sections of the country. Is it due to the fact that the northern district is represented by a Liberal? I do not want to believe that this is so, but I can draw my own conclusions. That was not playing fair with the money which was voted unanimously during the emergency session last fall. The statement continues:

When relief work started in the north under the emergency federal scheme, with its compulsory eight-hour day, the rates became $2.80 at Kenora and $2.40 here, respectively. Hon. Peter Heenan, ex-minister of labour, has been at pains to point out that $2.80 per day is disgracefully insufficient pay for any settler to draw and try to sustain a family; so according to that, $2.40 per day is even worse. But why any disparity at all?

I know I shall not receive any answer. The following is a quotation from a good Conservative paper, the Porcupine Advance, under date of December 11, 1930:

Men working on the relief work program undertaken by the Ontario government in this north land are being paid at the low rate of two dollars and forty cents per day. They lose any holidays and also days on which the weather may prove unsuitable for work to be carried on. At the best they can hope to make no more than six hundred dollars a year. Hon. Wm. Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests and in charge of northern development, pretends to believe that the rate of pay given the men in question is all right. Hon. Mr. Finlayson himself has an income well over ten thousand dollars a year. On this account he may be able to estimate that another man may be able to live decently and bring up a family on six hundred dollars a year, but in friendly fashion The Advance would point out to Hon. Mr. Finlayson that people in general have little but bitter sneers for men in comfort who endorse wage rates for others below the standard of decent living. The Advance will be much disappointed in Hon. Wm. Finlayson if he does not rouse himself and see that in all lines of work in his department decent rates of pay are establishel. Relief work at the rate of $2.40 per day is an irritation and offence. It means that the man with a family has to spend his strength in the work and then must seek further relief if he would live and maintain his family.

That is the situation which the people in our section of the country have to endure; that is where the bread is coming from, but under the promises made by this government, in certain sections of my part of the country they are finding it impossible to get sufficient bread.

Only a few days ago the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) delivered a speech in Fort William to the effect that the Canadian National had kept practically all their staff working on their lines. He has been more fortunate than I have been. I do not want to criticize the administration of the Canadian National, but I am firmly convinced that while the local administration in our section is playing the game, the central administration is not doing its part in keeping up the work in our section. In the district from Fitzpatrick, Quebec, to Nakina on the Ontario side, a distance of a thousand miles, they have laid off 250 employees. The Minister of Railways and Canals may broadcast throughout Canada that no men have been laid off by the Canadian National, but that statement is not true so far as my riding is concerned, and the railway system in our section of the country has not been maintained to as high a standard as it has been in other sections. During the special session I informed the house that the line between Quebec and Winnipeg is not getting sufficient funds for capital expenditure let alone for improvements. The system should at least be maintained at a uniform standard. In this respect I do not blame the local administration but rather the central one.

I wish to comment briefly on the matter of the tariff. Only a few weeks ago the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman), after a five weeks' trip to British Columbia and the western prairies, came back to Ottawa and had a wonderful message to deliver to the Canadian people. Here is the message as I read it in the Toronto Globe of November 10, 1930:

> Hon. E. B. Ryckman, Minister of National Revenue, has returned from a five weeks' tour to the Pacific coast, and he finds much to be cheerful about. The people of British Columbia won't even admit hard times. True, there were complaints from coal miners and operators, and Alberta farmers asked that wheat be pegged at $1.15, irrespective of low market prices, but in many places the minister was surprised to find that a protective tariff was actually favoured as a panacea for many agrarian ills.

I wish the Minister of National Revenue was in his seat. It is unfortunate that when a humble member of parliament speaks and wishes to address a question to a minister of the crown he rarely finds him in his seat. If the minister had visited my section of northern Ontario and asked the people there if they were satisfied with the increase in the tariff, he would soon have found that they were very much dissatisfied with it. I wonder if the people of British Columbia and the prairie provinces are really satisfied with the high tariff. Judging by the tenor of the speeches that I have heard in this house by members from the west and British Columbia speaking in this debate, I gather that the western provinces are certainly not satisfied with the tariff increases. The speaker who has just preceded me (Mr. MacInnis) has told us that the tariff is no solution of the problem of unemployment in British Columbia. The same thing applies to northern Ontario. Raising the tariff will simply increase the cost of production and increase the cost of living, either directly or indirectly. It will simply block the extension of the Canadian frontier that we are pushing northward in northern Ontario. Settlement in northern Ontario is very different from settlement in the southern section of Canada or along the shores of the St. Lawrence. We have a very different climatic situation to face, and so far as our part of the country is concerned, to increase the tariff is simply to choke the life out of the greatest section of Ontario.

The settlers in northern Ontario are seeking a market for their pulpwood. Pulpwood buyers came to me during the last election and told me that they were withdrawing from the American market. On account of the policy of the Conservative party, our good friends the Americans, who in the past had usually bought four hundred thousand cords of pulpwood in northern Ontario, found it possible to get their supplies from Russia, and they withdrew from our market because the Conservative party had threatened to impose an export tax on pulpwood leaving this country. Here is one of the main planks of the platform of the Conservative party during the last election:

> A policy that will prohibit the free export of pulpwood instead of allowing it to be shipped out to keep American paper mills operating, while Canadian mills are working part time.

That shows how little the Conservative party knows of what is going on in our part of the country. In the riding of Timiskaming there are three large pulp mills, one at Kapuskasing, one at Iroquois Falls, and one at Smooth Rock Falls. They are buying as much pulpwood as they can use from the settlers within a radius of 30 to 60 miles from their mills, and the settler who is too far distant from the mills must necessarily find a market for his surplus pulpwood elsewhere. If he has not a domestic market, it must be an outside market, and the only other market that we ever had for our pulpwood in northern Ontario is the American market. Mr. Finlayson, Minister of Lands and Forests in the Ontario government, and also the hon. member for East Algoma, during the last election urged that there should be an export tax on pulpwood going to the United States. So we had the spectacle last fall of this government calling an emergency session to deal with unemployment by increasing the tariff, which had the effect of increasing the cost of production and the cost of living in our part of the country, and taking away from the settlers the only market they had for their surplus pulpwood.

The settler in northern Ontario is in exactly the same position with regard to his product as an automobile manufacturer. Once an automobile is manufactured, it must be sold. Similarly the settler must find a market for his pulpwood, and unfortunately he is not in as good a position as the farmer of the west who, if he cannot sell his wheat, can at least turn it into flour. Without an export market for that pulpwood our settlers must simply starve.

Again I ask the leader of the government if he is going to drop that plank from the platform of the Conservative party. I repeat, the only market our settlers have for their surplus pulpwood is the United States market, and to carry out this plank of the Conservative party platform would simply be depriving them of their market. I say that to carry out such a policy would not be playing fair with my section of the province or with Canada as a whole. The only part of northern Ontario that might have benefited by the increase in the tariff last session was Sault Ste. Marie, where they have a steel industry. The rest of northern Ontario is paying tribute to the big industrial centres by reason of the tariff increases that were put into effect.

I am not like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). I do not believe in an east and a west; I believe that we are all one solid unit in this country. As was well said by one hon. gentleman, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George tried to create the impression in this country that the west had been getting more than its share from the east. I wish to say to him that the development of such industrial centres as Toronto, Hamilton and Windsor is largely due to the growth and settlement of northern Ontario, and the western provinces, and the best market these centres have for their products is northern Ontario and the provinces just named.

How is a high tariff going to help us in the agricultural sections of northern Ontario? How is it going to help the newsprint industry or the mining industry? The gold mines are the most prosperous mines at the present time, and some of them are working on ore as low grade as seven dollars per ton. The slightest increase in the cost of their machinery of production means that they will have to shut down, and thousands of men will be thrown out of employment. That is true also of the newsprint industry. In my riding three trainloads of newsprint are produced every day. We can produce enough newsprint to supply the requirements of all the newspapers in Canada. Necessarily we must find an outside market. I have listened with amazement to the present Prime Minister urging us time and again not to export, but to consume at home. I repeat, in my own riding we produce enough newsprint to supply all the requirements of all the Canadian newspapers. What would the other Canadian mills do with their production if we supplied the whole requirements of the Canadian market? My point is that we must necessarily find an outside market, and the only market we have is the American market. This government finds it possible to help some sections of the country, while paying no attention to the requirements of the settlers of northern Ontario and to the situation of the newsprint and mining industries.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): How does my hon. friend account for the fact that five out of eight constituencies in northern Ontario supported the policies of this government?

Mr. BRADETTE: They were caught with humbug. They would have voted almost solidly for the Dunning budget, but the issues were camouflaged. The Dunning budget was never mentioned to them by the Conservative party in the last campaign. The campaign the Conservative party waged was a campaign of hatred and personalities. I know what I am talking about, and I say that never would the Conservative party have won those constituencies on the straight issue of a higher tariff. It has never done so in the past because it did not have such a policy at that time. Hon. members opposite say that northern Ontario wants a high tariff. This is a deliberate falsehood. My friend opposite—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: I shall retract the word, but I will say something of a similar nature. My hon. friend wishes to imply that the industries were not receiving protection under the Liberal regime. Is that what you wish to say?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): I would ask the hon. member to go ahead and make his speech.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want you to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): This is not a witness box.

Mr. BRADETTE: I wish it was. Some hon. members would have to answer more directly if it was. They ask about high tariff; I am going to read part of an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal in the issue of January 24, 1930. Listen to it:

> Mr. Bennett protested against the "malicious representations" of the tariff policy of the Conservative party. It was not, the opposition leader stated, a policy of high tariff, but a policy to give fair treatment, equal opportunity in competition with the peoples of the world, for the protection of agriculture, labour, industry and the consumer.

Those are the words of the Prime Minister. Is the right hon. gentleman talking about high tariffs now? He certainly was not talking high tariff at that time. To quote further from the Ottawa Journal:

> There are some in the Conservative party to-day who boast that it stands where "Sir John Macdonald stood in 1878." It is not a boast of wisdom. The problems that confronted Sir John Macdonald in 1878 are not the things that challenge statesmanship in 1930. Sir John Macdonald's fiscal policies encompassed but central and western Canada.

That is what the party of the right hon. gentleman is doing at the present time. They have to-day the same policy they had twenty-five or thirty years ago.

> Sir John Macdonald's fiscal policies encompassed but central and eastern Canada, and did not visualize the mighty changes of the past quarter of a century. It is morally certain, indeed, that if Sir John Macdonald were alive to-day he would not stand rigidly where he implanted himself in 1878. His was a different kind of statesmanship.

Now, my hon. friend was not elected by his high tariff plea in northern Ontario. I am going to explain how you and others in your section were elected.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: You were elected on the building of the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am sorry; I do not wish to break the rules of the house. You were elected—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. member was elected on the construction of the trans-Canada highway. Do you deny that statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BRADETTE: Will the hon. member deny that statement?

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): Did the hon. member support the proposal for a grant towards the building of the trans-Canada highway when he had the opportunity?

Mr. BRADETTE: When was there such a motion asking for the trans-Canada highway?

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): There was one.

Mr. BRADETTE: The hon. gentleman does not know the history of his own part of the province because in 1919 there was money voted from the public treasury for the construction of highways in the province of Ontario. And, listen to this, not a cent of it was spent north of the Severn river in northern Ontario. Is my hon. friend aware of that? Not one cent of that money which was granted in 1919 was spent in my constituency.

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): It was spent when the Liberal government was in power.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, it was under a Tory government in Toronto. I would ask my hon. friend not to get away from that fact. The local legislature had control of the distribution of that money. Of the money granted in 1919 for unemployment relief not a cent was spent in northern Ontario. Why not? During the last session the Prime Minister said that the routing of the trans-Canada highway would be accomplished and the money taken from the federal treasury. Is the hon. member ready to tell me that the route in northern Ontario has been decided upon?

Mr. SIMPSON (Algoma): No.

Mr. BRADETTE: No, because this government and other governments want to wash their hands of their responsibilities. That is why I have placed a motion on the order paper to discuss the routing of the trans-Canada highway. We in northern Ontario contend that the northern route is the best route between the Atlantic and the Pacific. During the last session after reading an article from the Toronto Mail and Empire I put a direct question to the Prime Minister and instead of answering directly he said that I was making reference to the words of a distinguished statesman. We do not know, but we hope that he will live up to these words and become a great statesman. I have never heard an answer from the Prime Minister. I now quote the words of Mr. Ferguson as they are contained in last Saturday's issue of the Toronto Mail and Empire:

As soon as the federal government makes a start for the construction of the trans-Canada highway money for which is included in the $20,000,000 asked for by premier R. B. Bennett for unemployment relief the Ontario government will offer every assistance towards constructing the Ontario section of the highway.

This was the statement made by the Hon. Mr. Ferguson when he was asked what steps would be taken by the province in the matters of route, cost and other phases, of the construction of the national highway. Premier Ferguson further stated:

It is a federal matter and no doubt the question of route will be decided. Ontario will offer every assistance to the Dominion authorities.

The most important question so far as my riding is concerned as affecting the construction of the trans-Canada highway has to do with the routing. The hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Gordon) was in favour of the northerly route; I was in favour of it. Everbody in northern Ontario was in favour of it and we still feel the same way. We must come to some understanding, some compromise and a policy of routing must be pronounced. In northern Ontario we must have an alternate route. You in the southerly section will have a route and we in the northern section of the province have a primary right to that road from North Bay, Cochrane and Winnipeg. This government must realize its responsibility, the responsibility for the routing of the trans-Canada highway. A few weeks ago speaking at Fort William the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) said that during last winter money was spent for the construction of the trans-Canada highway and that the money had been taken from the $20,000,000 voted at the last special session. If that is so may I say that not one single dollar was spent in my constituency on the construction of the trans-Canada highway. In addition to that the Prime Minister of this country speaking at Winnipeg is reported as follows:

Premier predicts all of trans-Canada way will be paved in decade. Two announcements of outstanding importance to Canada from the standpoint of national development, prosperity and integration, both of especial interest to the motorists of this country, were made at the recent annual meeting in Winnipeg, of the Canadian Association of Tourist and Convention Bureaux.

Premier R. B. Bennett, His Worship Mayor Ralph H. Webb, stated in the course of his address, had declared during his conference with the western mayors, that within a decade the trans-Canada highway would be paved from its Atlantic to its Pacific terminus and that federal aid would be provided for the completion and improvement of the "Nation's Main Street" on a "fifty-fifty" basis with the provinces.

Now that the Prime Minister is in his seat I would like him to answer my question, if it is possible to have it answered.

Mr. BENNETT: Go on.

Mr. BRADETTE: Has the routing of the trans-Canada highway in northern Ontario been decided upon?

An hon. MEMBER: The right hon. gentleman has not answered.

Mr. BRADETTE: It shows, Mr. Speaker, that to-day we have no responsible government. We have had the spectacle of members of this government during the last election campaign saying that they were going to build the trans-Canada highway on a fifty-fifty basis, and to-day they are denying their responsibility. The highway was a plank in their platform during the last election. They said that their intention was to build a national highway across Canada so that tourists would not be forced to use the American roads to get past the great lakes. The result would be that instead of leaving money in the United States supplies would be purchased in Canada and this country would benefit. The High Commissioner for Canada in London, the Hon. Howard Ferguson, made the definite statement last fall before he went to the economic conference that the responsibility for the routing of the trans-Canada highway rested entirely upon the federal authorities. Was this statement true? I ask the question of the right hon. Prime Minister and await an answer. His silence shows that no satisfaction is to be hoped for. The section of country that I represent has a right to have its view heard on the floor of the house. We want our problems discussed in a national way. I maintain that this is not a political matter. It should not be, for northern Ontario is willing to accept a reasonable compromise, but we want to know where we stand. Some of the ridings in northern Ontario were won at the last general election on the definite promise of the present government to build a transcontinental highway. To-day we have the spectacle of the government not willing to answer the question that I have put to it, although every section of the country awaits an answer.

On motion of Mr. Casgrain the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Bennett the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

Monday, March 23, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 12, respecting Guaranty Trust Company of Canada.—Mr. Robinson.

Bill No. 13, respecting Grain Insurance and Guarantee Company.—Mr. Kennedy (Winnipeg).

Bill No. 14, respecting The Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Mr. Stirling.

Bill No. 15, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Willis.

GARMENT WORKERS' STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): In view of the fact that there is a strike in Toronto on the part of eight hundred girls on the question of maintaining the principle of collective bargaining. I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) whether the government will not intervene for the purpose of trying to get the employees and employers together?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon), who is responsible in the house for the Labour department, happens at the moment to be absent. When he is in the house, perhaps later in the day, or, if not, to-morrow, he will give a reply. I am not familiar with the matter. No appeal has been made to me in connection with it.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I have two other questions to ask which I will endeavour to combine. One is based on a newspaper clipping contained in the Hamilton Herald of March 21, in connection with a meeting of the unemployed in the city of Guelph. The sentence I wish to refer to reads:

> In the meantime, nothing can be done to relieve the unemployment in Guelph, as the council has no money to spend on the matter and no work to be done for some time.

There is also an article in the Fort Frances Times stating that the provincial government has stopped highway work between Kenora and Fort Frances owing to the fact that the appropriation has been spent. The work stopped in the middle of March and it is not anticipated that it will start again until some time in May. I should like to know what the government intends to do towards relieving the unemployed in those parts of the country?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question can stand. The same answer applies.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. WALBURG-BONNYVILLE BRANCH LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): May I ask a question of the Minister of Railways? What progress is being made in connection with the completion of the loop branch line extension of the Canadian National railways between North Battleford and Edmonton? It is an important branch line, and not only are Edmonton and North Battleford concerned, but other places such as St. Walburg, Red Cross, Loon Lake, Makwa and other points in "The North" on the Beaver river.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Does the hon. gentleman refer to the St. Walburg-Bonnyville line?

Mr. McINTOSH: Yes.

Mr. MANION: I have had many telegrams from bodies out there, claiming that the Canadian National Railways have discontinued the work. The reason for this action is that the earnings of the national railways have been decreased this year, necessitating a lessening of the charges on the railway. But having received so many complaints with regard to the great hardship that will be caused, I have made enquiries of the national railways and I am at present consulting with them in an effort to have at least enough work carried on to relieve unnecessary distress.

PENSION EXAMINER AT SASKATOON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Pensions, arising out of a telegram I have received from the Unity branch of the Canadian Legion. The telegram reads:

Strongly protest any action regarding rumoured dismissal Doctor Cox, pension examiner at Saskatoon.

Is the rumour true?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): That is a matter that comes more especially under the Board of Pension Commissioners. I understand the rumour is not correct.

ACOUSTICS OF CHAMBER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if his advisers have found any way of improving the acoustic properties of this chamber. It seems too bad that probably one-third of the members can hear nothing that is being said. Something should be done at once.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The former administration exhausted every scientific method at the disposal of governments for the purpose of endeavouring to make the necessary improvements, but without effecting the end to be desired. I can only say to the hon. member for Muskoka that what they did not accomplish we may be able to do, but so far such is not the case.

VANCOUVER—SECOND NARROWS BRIDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. E. MUNN (Vancouver North): Has the Minister of Marine received any report of the engineers on the Second Narrows bridge at Vancouver, and if so, what action will be taken? I understand the report was made recently.

Hon. ALFRED DURANLEAU (Minister of Marine): I have already answered a similar question asked by another hon. member.

Mr. MUNN: Several days ago.

Mr. DURANLEAU: Yes. A report has been received, but it is a very long one, and it has not yet been sufficiently considered. I do not know whether it will be advisable or not to table the report.

[Mr. Manion.]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Friday, March 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. PIERRE F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, in listening on Friday last to the remarks of the hon. member for Montmagny (M. LaVergne) one must have been reminded of the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. The hon. member stood in the temple of pretence and proclaimed his merits at large: I thank Thee, O Lord, because I am a good Canadian, because I am a good Tory, because I am a man who lives, not on bread alone, but on the spirit of life that cannot be extinguished. I thank Thee because I am not like the materialistic Liberals who still believe that bread is necessary to the sustenance of life, and who are such bad people as to raise prejudices and to dare to love their country in a different way from that in which I do. Amen! Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not a Tory, as everybody knows. I claim to be a good Liberal and a good Canadian.

The hon. member for Montmagny, in his virtuous indignation, said that he wanted to unmask the Liberals. But in his haste to do so, he pulled off his own mask and exposed himself in his true colours. We know now where he stands. He is a bitter partisan, a Tory, and a bad one at that. If the hon. member sits where he is to-day, it is because he cannot find any other place in party politics elsewhere in this country, and surely we do not want him here; we want him to stay there. The hon. member went far back into history to revive dead issues and accuse us of raising prejudices. I shall not attempt to cover all the ground he travelled over, because I do not think it would be in the interests of the country at the present moment, and certainly it would in no way help to solve the problems of the day. The hon. member for Montmagny, however, ought to know that if prejudices were raised to the highest pitch in this country at any time, it was not by the Liberals of Quebec, but by some other people who are called Tories in various parts of the other provinces of Canada, and particularly in 1911, again in 1917, and at the elections following. It will be a great source of comfort to the house to know that the hon. member for Montmagny can be relied on to indicate the faults and errors of parties on both sides of the house. We feel sure that his hon. leader will appreciate the sense of criticism of his new recruit and will thoroughly enjoy the performance of the Liberal-Nationalist, now the Tory member for Montmagny.

The hon. member for Montmagny also said he felt proud of being a christian and a good citizen of Canada when he read the announcement by the Prime Minister that Canada would have nothing to do with Russia. Most of us in the province of Quebec also felt as proud as he did on that occasion, but I think the hon. member for Montmagny, if he has a little bit of good in the bottom of his heart, could not have felt himself to be such a good christian last Friday when he made such a bitter attack on the memory of our past revered leader, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. It was really sad to hear the hon. member accusing such a noble statesman, one of the greatest and one of the most cherished in our history, and yet the hon. member for Montmagny spoke of his having betrayed his country and his people. Such words, Mr. Speaker, bear in themselves their own condemnation. Suffice it to say, that posterity will judge who best served his country, whether the hon. member for Montmagny or the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. When the hon. member will be no more, his name will have fallen into complete oblivion, while the memory of our revered leader, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, will live on forever, and his name will go down in history as one of the greatest statesmen that Canada has ever produced, indeed as one of the greatest statesmen of the British Empire.

Coming back to the speech from the throne, a reading of it is rather amusing. It conveys the impression that the people of Canada ought all to rise and sing for joy at having at the head of affairs in this country such a wonderful government to direct Canada at this time. Yet, Mr. Speaker, we have been sitting here for over a week listening to speeches in this debate, and as yet we have heard no member of the administration of to-day but the Prime Minister himself, in defence of his own administration. Not one of his ministers dares to stand up. Possibly the Prime Minister might not allow them to do so, and yet the right hon. gentleman is sad at heart when we call this a one-man government. The Prime Minister was the only member of the government who attempted to say anything in answer to the speech of my hon. leader the other day, and in his attempt I think you will admit, Mr. Speaker, that he utterly failed. The speech made by my hon. leader last Monday stands, I think, as one of the most wonderful and serious indictments that ever was laid at the door of any government, and yet to-day that indictment stands unanswered. As one newspaper so well put it, anyone who had any doubts that the speech from the throne was written by the hand of the Prime Minister was grievously mistaken. Anyone who is familiar with the doings of the leader of the government must have known from a reading of the speech that from beginning to end it was the work of the Prime Minister. A more nebulous pack of promises there never was—vague promises, nothing definite in relation to the problems that we have to face to-day.

Some hon. members from the west have asked questions of the hon. leader of the government, and quite properly so. They have asked him where was the agricultural policy of the government of to-day—a policy that is so badly needed to settle the difficulties of the west at the present time. No answer. Then hon. gentlemen on our side of the house have put to the leader of the government some most pertinent questions affecting their ridings. No answer. Apparently the right hon. the Prime Minister is not so much concerned with these matters as with running his own government alone—all the departments of the administration. Instead of immediate relief being afforded or in prospect, the man on the street looks in the speech from the throne in vain for anything constructive. There cannot fail to be anxiety in the face of such a world crisis as that through which we are passing at the present time, when the only thing in prospect in the near future for the people of this country is more taxation to meet the huge deficit which the speech states we have to face to-day, and also to fulfil some of the costly promises which the government has made in order to get into power.

The speech from the throne states that in this period of universal distress our country has not suffered as much as other nations have. We are willing to admit the truth of that statement. But we disagree with the government when the speech from the throne states that our difficulties are not the consequence of the universal crisis, but are antecedent thereto, and that domestic factors have largely determined the degree of economic distress from which this country is suffering to-day. Let us examine those two statements for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to see if we can reconcile them. It is a well-known fact that in an influenza epidemic, for instance, those who suffer most are those who are tired out, worn down, and unable to put up any resistance. Yet we are told in the speech from the throne that Canada of all nations in the world will perhaps get on its feet the quickest. If that is so, the policies of the late administration could not have been so nefarious and injurious as the government has pretended that they were.

I need not repeat here to-day the figures that were placed on Hansard by my hon. leader in his speech last Monday. They show the wonderful progress of Canada under Liberal administration during the nine years my hon. leader was at the head of the government. Everybody knows that up to the middle of July last year, Canada stood fifth in world trade, but to-day it has receded from that position, and since the 28th of July last Canada has had to take a back seat.

When the speech from the throne also comments on the Unemployment Relief Act passed last session, we cannot all agree with what it says, nor can we agree when the speech talks about the marked improvement in the domestic situation that has come about as a result of the changes made in the tariff last September. The government promised that factories would spring up here and there to keep our people employed. We were promised that work would be procurable in abundance throughout the country. During the last electoral campaign in every parish of my constituency my opponent promised that following July 28 the pulp and paper factories would be working six days per week instead of three days. To-day the same pulp and paper factories with few exemptions are closed. To-day I received letters from my people at Beaupre saying that the main industry there, the paper mills of the Ste. Anne Paper Company, Limited, are closed for a period of over a year and a half. The government now in office promised it would give employment to everybody and that the factories would be working full time. To-day we read in the newspapers that even in the good city of Toronto things are not as satisfactory as they should be. In the paper of March 22 we read:

Unemployed angered. Arson attempted when work was not forthcoming.

In this instance certain people went to obtain work and conditions were so bad that apparently they had to take the law in their own hands in order to get it. Mr. Speaker, the conditions I have outlined should not exist in this country especially in view of the bill passed by the government last September.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

A hundred workers are going to Russia.

This is proclaimed in a headline of the Gazette of March 18.

Toronto Star says party of mechanics will leave in May.

Then the Gazette despatch continues:

Toronto, March 18.—"Soviet Russia's world-wide plea for skilled mechanics and expert craftsmen has been answered by 100 Toronto bricklayers, carpenters, technicians and contractors, who have been guaranteed employment in the Soviet Union and will leave Canada early in May. Arrangements for sailing have been made," the Toronto Star says to-day.

The party will be composed of Russians, Canadians, Frenchmen, Finlanders and other nationalities. Wives and children will travel with the heads of the households and many will carry with them their personal belongings.

We were promised that we would have more work after the present government took office but in a great city like Toronto where work is supposed to be procurable in abundance and where factories are working full time the people are forced to leave their own land in order to secure work in Soviet Russia. Will this government countenance such actions when it has placed a ban on Russian goods and has said "We will have nothing more to do with Russia"? I would be pleased if the government would take such action in the matter as would obviate the necessity of our own people leaving Canada to go to Russia. We know that the unemployment situation in Canada is as bad as, if not worse than, it was last July. I think previous speakers have placed figures on Hansard to show that the number of unemployed in Canada has now reached over 300,000. As one who has been looking around in the city of Montreal I say the Unemployment Relief Act of 1930 has not brought the results hon. members opposite expected it would. To my own knowledge Mr. Speaker, in the city of Montreal there are many unemployed and too many asking for help and assistance. Out of the moneys which were voted last September a certain amount was allocated to the city of Montreal, but up to the present time the best help and assistance which the unemployed have been able to secure has been derived from money received as the result of the few snow storms which we have had in that city. Certainly the leader of the government is not able to take credit for those storms. The works in the city have barely begun and employ but a few hundred people. The Canadian National terminal in Montreal is the only public work being proceeded with and God knows the work has been systematically hindered and delayed by the executive council of the city of Montreal which was more anxious to promote its own interests than those of the community. I learn from to-day's issue of the Montreal Gazette that the same city council has visited this city of Ottawa during the week end and has succeeded in obtaining from this government another extension of time and delay. They are trying to have their own views prevail in the matter which means, Mr. Speaker great delay in the relief of the unemployed in the city of Montreal. The operations of the Canadian National Railways have reached a standstill and an attempt has been made to spoil the policy adopted by the late government in the year 1929. If we have read the Montreal newspapers we will have seen that the situation is not satisfactory. For instance on March 13 Le Canada contained the following heading, over an article prepared by one of the reporters who had been around the city of Montreal and had visited the various works being carried on by the city:

The relief of unemployment

Such are the facts ascertained by a reporter of the "Canada" in the course of a visit to each yard

We notice that some of the men who were working were not our own good French Canadians but were foreigners. In the Montreal Gazette of March 6, 1931, under the heading Unemployed Relief System Described as Totally Wrong we have a statement made by Dr. Pedley who is at the head of the Hygiene Faculty of McGill university. In the article Dr. Pedley tells of the conditions in the city of Montreal. I think I shall read his statement as contained in the newspaper to which I have referred; so that you may have his opinion concerning the working of the relief act of 1930. I quote as follows:

Money voted might as well have been thrown into sewer. Director of Montreal Council of Social Agencies charges demoralization follows haphazard policy.

Criticism of Montreal's unemployment relief methods coupled with the declaration that the moneys voted for direct relief by the government might just as well have been thrown in a sewer, marked an address by Dr. F. G. Pedley, director of the Montreal Council of Social Agencies and assistant professor of industrial hygiene at McGill university, on "Unemployment relief in Montreal in 1930-31," before members of the Lions club yesterday at a luncheon meeting in the Mount Royal hotel. Unemployed men in Montreal had been given much food but no constructive help, he maintained. Their stomachs were filled, but neither the city nor the relief agencies had an intelligent plan to "put the men on their feet."

"Our whole system is wrong," Dr. Pedley maintained. "Giving something for nothing is a faulty system, one which undermines the morals of the unemployed, makes them dependent upon others. We should demand some services of those to whom we administer unemployment relief."

He stressed that in some cities—particularly in the west, those to whom relief is given are made to pay for it by working. Winnipeg had its unemployed earning relief by labour in the municipal wood yards. Until Montreal was in a position to make the men work for relief, the system of relief as practised at present in the city was dangerous and devoid of constructive help.

The Dominion government, at a special session, had voted $20,000,000 to the direct and indirect relief of the unemployed, the speaker recalled. Of this sum $4,000,000 was scheduled for direct relief. Montreal's share of that sum was $150,000, granting that both the Quebec government and the city council would give similar amounts. The total in the city for direct relief, therefore, was $450,000, and this sum was already nearly exhausted with the worst part of the winter still to come.

Public Works Fail

"The public works undertaken by the city to relieve the unemployed have given little relief," Dr. Pedley declared. "Our records show that unemployment in the city has hardly been reduced through these works. The number of destitute men, helpless because they are unemployed, has not changed."

"We have been giving relief," he continued, "but we have tried to do the job too well though we are criticized for our parsimonius attitude. We have given Montreal a name as a good place for the hard-up to spend the winter in; next winter we will probably be stormed by destitute people who have heard this despite our great reluctance to give publicity on what relief work we are doing, of what is being done here for the hard-up and unemployed. Our system is entirely wrong."

He added that Montreal's relief system was productive of demoralization in the ranks of the unemployed. Their morale went with the definite assurance that they could keep on benig unemployed for they would always have a bed and three meals a day, and this without work or effort.

"The money being spent by the government on this kind of relief might just as well be thrown in the sewer," Dr. Pedley stated, adding: "The situation is this: No man goes hungry in Montreal. There is an abundance of food, but no intelligent plan to put the men on their feet. There is great laxity in the system.

The system of relief work in the city of Montreal has been in the hands of the executive committee of the city of Montreal, which is friendly to the present government, and this is the result. The money voted by parliament at the special session last September has been spent without bringing about any substantial relief of the unemployment situation in that city. In the rural districts the situation is not much better. As was said by the Hon. Mr. Francoeur, Minister of Public Works in the provincial government, the Dominion government should have consulted the various provincial governments with respect to the distribution of the unemployment relief fund. At many places the works for which money was appropriated are not yet under way, and will not be before the snow is all gone. In other words the rules and regulations framed by the hon. Minister of Labour are such as to render it practically impossible for municipalities to undertake any work for fear of running into debt and thus being obliged to tax the ratepayers to make good any deficiency in the federal appropriation. Under those rules and regulations money from the unemployment relief funds could not be used for repairs to churches or to public buildings belonging to school commissions or fabriques, and as a result many municipalities were unable to avail themselves of that measure of relief for their unemployed.

The late administration, Mr. Speaker, in the last session of the last parliament voted large sums of money for various public works in the province of Quebec, but some of those works have not yet been undertaken. In the city of Montreal, for instance—and the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) referred to it last week—$1,500,000 was appropriated for the purpose of constructing certain wharves in the harbour. That work has not yet been proceeded with. Certain votes for public works in my own riding have not yet been applied and, of course, no work has been done. I refer particularly to proposed public works at Pointe au Pic and Baie Ste. Catherine. If the money so voted had been expended on those various undertakings it would have afforded substantial relief of the unemployment situation in that district where now the people are idle. Is the government playing politics? Is it delaying expenditure of the money because of the fact that the member for the county is sitting on this side of the house? Does the government think that if the money is expended on certain public works at a later date the political effect of such expenditure will be to its advantage?

As has been stated by other members who have preceded me in this debate, farm products to-day are selling at lower prices than ever before. Butter—that played so prominent a part in the campaign of my hon. friends opposite—is selling at lower prices than prevailed last July. The same remark applies to cheese and eggs. Wheat has touched the lowest point for over thirty years and is selling at less than the cost of production. At the special session the Prime Minister promised to find a market for our wheat and to eliminate the competition from Russia and the Argentine. He went to England, and we all know he failed to secure the British market for our wheat. He tried also to find a market for it in China, but there again he failed. He went to France, and as a result of his interviews with the French authorities we were led to suppose that France would take a substantial quantity of our wheat, but from what I have heard recently our exports to France will be in the neighbourhood of what she usually buys from us.

An hon. MEMBER: Less.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, the amount will be less. He tried also to negotiate a treaty with France to supersede that negotiated by the late administration. In this instance also the results do not appear to be very encouraging.

The treaties with Australia and New Zealand were denounced on the floor of this house by our hon. friends opposite and during the general election of last July they told the people that if returned to power they would negotiate new treaties that would be of much greater advantage to Canada. After the Imperial conference we were told the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) had been able to come to a very satisfactory arrangement with the representatives of the Australian and New Zealand governments, but we have heard no more about those proposed treaties, of the wonderful attempts made to negotiate better treaties than those negotiated by the late administration. I dare say that the results will not show any improvement on those obtained by the late government.

During the absence of the Prime Minister in England a plan was launched by the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for a credit organization to help the farmers of the west through their present difficulties by enabling them to adopt mixed farming. I should be ready to commend this plan if it were likely to be productive of good results, but from what I have heard from members from the west during the course of this debate the plan does not seem likely to be of much practical use to the farmers of western Canada. We need at the present time—and this view is shared by hon. members from the west—wider and freer markets, better credit facilities and lower freight rates, and until these are obtained the government will not be in a position to say that it has been able to settle any of the economic problems now bearing so heavily on this country, particularly the prairie provinces.

In the speech from the throne we are told that the government intends to reduce the cost of production to the farmers in an effort to help them in their present difficulties. How can this possibly be brought about when the cost of nearly all the commodities needed by the farmer has been increased by about 300 per cent as a result of the tariff amendments that were put into force at the special session? At that time we were promised that the legislation then enacted would stimulate business and relieve unemployment, if not cure it, without raising prices to the consumer. But the Prime Minister had not reached England when the glass producers in Canada increased their prices to such an extent that he was communicated with and authorized his Minister of National Revenue to withdraw the increased tariff duties on glass. The tariff amendments at the special session were also intended to help the textile and steel industries, but statistics show that the greatest decrease in employment is found in those two industries and also in the pulp and paper industry. As a result of the legislation brought down by the government last September, trade and industry to-day are stagnant. Business during the last six months shows a downward trend. It is useless to think that by closing our markets to imports we shall be able to increase our exports. To-day we have to face a substantial increase in the national debt with a decrease in revenue from customs and excise duties and sales tax. We have a deficit of over $100,000,000. Yet we are told by the government that they intend to make a further revision of the tariff. Nobody after our experience since last September can believe for a moment that such a policy will bring about good results. We cannot but deplore the fixed idea of the government that protection and still higher protection is the only panacea for the evils of the body politic. The sooner the government changes its ideas on the tariff the better it will be for the country. The tariff policy of this administration appears to be an expedient rather than a solution of our economic troubles. In fact for a country such as Canada with its diversified production a high tariff wall is not at all feasible. I think I cannot do better, Mr. Speaker, than to read to this house an opinion that was given by an economist in the review published by La Banque Canadienne Nationale during the month of October, 1930. This opinion was as follows:

> The greatest danger of protectionism is that it lends itself to abuses. Producers are organized while consumers are practically unorganized, so that the claims of the former are always much more strongly put forward than those of the latter. Moreover, the advantage which an excess of protection confers upon a group of producers are far more in evidence than the hardships inflicted on the masses of consumers. Protection calls for protection. When the government intervenes on behalf of an industry others in their turn claim intervention on the score of fairness, and when a state initiates a measure of protection other states are inclined to follow in its footsteps in order to equalize the competition.
> Likewise excess of protectionism includes its own corrective protection by becoming general, loses part of its efficiency. The countries which adopt high protection strive to develop their exportations and restrict their imports. However, when a great number of countries endeavour to sell to other countries the greatest quantity of goods possible and purchase the least possible, it is a foregone conclusion that international trade must slow up so much the more so that in all these countries the excessive customs duties increase the cost of living as also the cost of production and reduces the purchasing power. Hence the necessity of negotiating trade treaties, in order to abate the ills brought about by protectionism. So through force of circumstances, we are brought back to this basic principle, that trade is an exchange.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the view expressed by a person who is not supposed to be a partisan, but who is engaged in finance and who expresses this opinion in a review published broadcast throughout Canada by such an outstanding bank as La Banque Canadienne Nationale.

In the speech from the throne, we are promised a new tariff board. Well, Mr. Speaker, we had a tariff board previously, appointed by the last administration. This tariff board acted in an advisory capacity; it was supposed to collect and as a matter of fact did collect most valuable information, after numerous hearings at which manufacturers, producers and consumers alike were heard freely and at length as to the changes which might be made in the tariff. The government then had the advantage of such intelligent investigation, and knew what it was going to do. Why should this board have been abolished six months ago, when the government of the day apparently finds it necessary to appoint a new one now? Is it to promote some friends of the government? This is hardly being done nowadays, under the new regime. This new board apparently will be composed of members selected by the present administration, and knowing the leader of the government as we do know him I dare say that those who will be appointed to the board will be staunch protectionists. We all know that under this board appointed by the present government there will be only one idea, that of raising the tariff and protecting industries in which there are numerous friends of the present administration. That will be the case if the new board adopts the attitude of the members of the government who received delegations which came to present their views in Ottawa about a month ago, and to which my hon. friend from St. James (Mr. Rinfret) referred the other day. Certainly if that is the case this new board will attain no results, because when the leader of the government was to have received a delegation which appeared a few weeks ago, he did not listen to the members of the delegation at all but went away before they arrived. I am afraid that under the present administration this new board will be not a tariff board but a tariff farce.

We are also given to understand that possibly this board will have statutory powers, which was not the case with the old board. These statutory powers may give this board the right to raise or lower the tariff at its own discretion. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the government really intends granting such power to this board we on this side of the house could not possibly vote for such a measure, because I think it would be a direct departure from the rights and privileges which the members of this parliament must exercise with regard to the supervision of the taxation of the people of this country and the raising of revenues. Those are the exclusive rights and privileges granted to members of parliament by the British North America Act.

Another most amazing statement in the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, is the allusion to the success of the Imperial conference. Those who listened to the enlightened speech of our leader must realize that nothing is so far from the truth. The propositions that were brought up by the Prime Minister of Canada at that conference were, after careful consideration, flatly turned down and dismissed. The other members of the conference said, "We cannot accept that proposition." They nearly sent the Prime Minister home. The conference was practically a fiasco because of the Prime Minister of Canada, and it was only to save his face that the conference was adjourned to meet this summer in Ottawa. After the conference the Prime Minister travelled extensively through Europe. Wherever he went I do not think he brought any credit to this country. He has acted as a stormy petrel, and I believe he did nothing that could be called good advertising and good publicity for this country. Rather I would be inclined to say that he has lowered Canada in the estimation of the other nations of the world. The right hon. gentleman who runs this country is full of schemes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think "running this country" is the proper expression. He had many great schemes during the last election and during the last session of parliament.

[Mr. Casgrain.]

My right hon. leader has pointed out all his promises and all his schemes, and they are in Hansard both for this session and for the short session in September last. To-day, however, we have a new scheme of national development, including old age pensions, technical education and highway development. But, Mr. Speaker, the government is more careful to-day; they say that these matters will be proceeded with after careful consideration, and by progressive stages. I am glad to see that the right hon. gentleman who runs the government is progressing, in a way. We heard all about old age pensions, technical education and national highways during the last session of parliament, but the right hon. gentleman then promised that we would have these things immediately. He wanted to get into power then, but to-day, now that he is in power, he asks for more time.

According to the speech from the throne we are also to have more effective control of finances and over government purchases. With such a leader as the present leader of the government I am a little afraid of all these controls; I fear they may injure the credit of this country and they may even be detrimental to the party headed by the right hon. gentleman. We had such controls before, under the Union government, and God knows what they cost the country. If the government really wants to practise economy and do something useful I think they should cut off some of the departments that perhaps are not necessary to-day, such as the Department of the Interior. If the right hon. gentleman who leads the government is going to do all the work of all the departments he might even do away with some of the ministers who at present are not so over-burdened with work that they are necessary to this house or to the federal government. The hon. gentleman appears to have been very busy since he came into power; he has made many attempts to solve the problems of to-day, but has had little success. Let me show what one of his own friends said about him in 1917. I find in Hansard for that year that the late Sir Sam Hughes, referring to the right hon. gentleman who leads the government to-day, and speaking in connection with another scheme of his, the National Service Commission, said:

> He has brought bad luck to every undertaking, every interest, every man with whom he has been associated. . . . He stands as having been the head of the greatest failure that ever occurred in the public life of the Dominion of Canada.

Yes, the right hon. gentleman indeed has brought bad luck to this country; I think he has brought failure as well, and I believe if he stays in office for any length of time he will bring bad luck and failure to his own party.

Mr. J. L. BOWMAN (Dauphin): May I join with those hon. members who have already spoken in extending to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne my congratulations upon the very able and excellent manner in which their duties have been discharged. May I also commend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and his cabinet for the very earnest and sincere efforts put forth by them towards the solution of those grave problems with which they have been faced since assuming office, and the great measure of success with which these efforts have met. I would also express the appreciation which is felt by the people of Canada.

It is, of course, to be expected that remarks of this nature would be made on this side of the house. But to my mind a much greater tribute to the government of the day has undoubtedly been paid them unconsciously by hon. members opposite. This debate has been in progress for approximately a week. During that time the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) has spoken in a fervent and eloquent address, every word of which denoted the most careful preparation; and he has been followed by many hon. members opposite in addresses in similar vein. But during all those addresses we have not had a single constructive suggestion from the opposite side of the house, saving that which I think was made by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) with respect to currency. This, it seems to me, indicates pretty definitely that in the main what should have been done in the way of good government has been done by the government in power to-day.

May I, as representing a constituency in western Canada much interested in agriculture, say a few words in that regard. Sentiments with respect to agriculture have been expressed by so many hon. members that it is pretty difficult to speak on the subject without more or less repeating what has already been said. But very briefly, the situation in agricultural communities is this: that the farmer is not realizing for his agricultural products returns in proportion to what he is paying for the goods which he purchases. There are one or two matters in that connection to which I might definitely refer. There has been in the west for many years a very strong feeling that the price of machinery to the farmer is too high. That opinion has been prevailing in my own constituency not only since 1929 but for some years previously. They have the idea, and I must say it is an idea shared by myself, that the cost of farm machinery is altogether too high. I have not seen last year's financial statement of the Massey-Harris Company, but I understand that that statement purports to show a loss of approximately two million dollars. If that is true—and I have no reason to doubt the truth of the statement—then something is wrong somewhere. Judging from the experience of the farmers in my own district, I would say it is because of one thing at least. The company were not selling as much machinery as they should, and the only reason they are not selling that machinery is the fact that it is beyond the means of the farmer in western Canada.

Personally, I do not know, I frankly confess, whether the price of farm machinery is too high or not. But there surely is a way for this house to find out the facts, and I would offer this very humble suggestion. We have a standing committee on agriculture empowered, I understand, to bring before it any person or persons to give evidence upon any points respecting which evidence is desired, and I would suggest that the machine companies of Canada be brought before that committee. In that way we should find out what ought to be proper prices, or whether prices are right or not. We shall know definitely just what margin of profit there has been on these articles and whether or not they can be sold at what would appear to be a less prohibitive price.

The hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Casgrain) referred to the Canadian Pacific Railway scheme announced by the president of that railway, Mr. Beatty. I agree with the hon. gentleman that some good may come of this cooperation. But I say this, that the amount of capital is so small that it is entirely inadequate to meet the call even in western Canada or in a very small portion of western Canada to-day. I do think there is one thing that the farmers throughout Canada desire to-day, and that is credit. I think perhaps the west would have been better off in years past if we had had less credit. But the fact remains that we have become accustomed to receiving credit from the banks, and now when it is needed most we find it pretty well cut off in agricultural communities. I say that in no spirit of animosity to the banks at all; I am merely stating the simple fact that in my own constituency, as well as in others in the west, credit to farmers who are deserving of credit has not been given.

The question of interest rates is important. I think the interest rates in the west are too high. They might very well be adjusted. I am not asking credit on behalf of the farmer without any means or without something behind him; all I ask is that the banks extend reasonable credit on a reasonable basis of security.

Much has been said with respect to the price of wheat. Surely no fault can be attributed to this government for the present price of wheat. I note in the reference to wheat by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, that he simply calls the attention of the house to the fact that the price of wheat has gone down since this government assumed office. I note this, however, that there has been no suggestion at any time since this house opened, from any hon. member opposite, as to what could or might have been done by the government to increase the price of wheat. And so in respect also to the matter of butter. Had we not so many millions upon millions of pounds of butter in cold storage brought in from New Zealand, perhaps the price in Canada to-day would be much better than it is.

There have also come from many quarters of the house tales of hardship from western Canada. I would say, in respect to the province of Manitoba where I have lived practically all of my life, that the people of that province are not broke. They may be badly bent, but they are still in the field and they will see this thing through. All that we in Manitoba ask is that the agricultural interests of western Canada be assisted to the greatest possible extent.

I wish to refer to certain remarks made in the house on Friday last by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) when he intimated that the foreign elements of western Canada were undesirable, inclined to bolshevism and the cause of racial division in the west. Surely my hon. friend has been misinformed. Let me say definitely and positively that western Canada is not racially divided. What little talk of secession there has been in the west has been grossly exaggerated; a mountain has been made out of a molehill, and anyone having a knowledge of the situation will agree with the statement of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) that there is no substantial movement for secession in western Canada. Let me further emphasize that the few in number who have been responsible for all the furore are by no means all foreign-born. Speaking for Manitoba, the oldest province in the west, I have yet to hear of a single suggestion of secession from any person in my province. The bare thought of it does not exist and I would remind the house that the population of Manitoba is approximately 675,000. In the next place, if there are in Canada people holding bolshevistic or communistic ideas, they are certainly few in number and are not confined to the west any more than to the east, nor are they people of any particular nationality.

Speaking with particular reference to my constituency, I represent a fairly large riding in the western provinces. I think those on the voters' list number 15,000 to 17,000 people. Approximately one-half of the population of my constituency is composed of people from continental Europe. These people came to Manitoba after the lands close to the railway lines had been picked up and settled by our own Canadian people. The lands were of poorer quality and harder to bring under cultivation. Nevertheless, these people tackled the proposition, and under these handicaps they have made good. They have brought under cultivation and production and made revenue-bearing lands which but for them would be idle to-day. Operating as they do, perhaps, on a smaller scale, being more interested in mixed farming and being more economical in their methods of operation, they are coming through these trying times better in many cases than some of our own people who have operated on a much larger scale. These people are exceedingly anxious to learn the English language. Their children all go to the public schools. Their children are particularly apt and bright, and in many instances they are at the head of their class in both the public and high schools. Many of the young men and women have attended the university and they are to-day occupying positions of honour in professional and business life in all parts of Canada. Owing to their thriftiness and industry they form an integral part of the business life of western Canada. In their homes, as anyone will testify who has visited them, they are most hospitable. They are interested in all things that tend toward the betterment of conditions in the home or in the community. Moreover, practically all these people are naturalized Canadians, and as such, they are entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens of Canada. To sum the matter up, giving my personal opinion, I would say they were industrious, home-loving and loyal Canadian citizens.

I do not ask the house to accept my opinion alone. I should like to refer to a competition which was held in western Canada last year and which I understand will be held again this year amongst continental Europeans in the west, a community progress competition which originated with Doctor Black, Director of Colonization and Immigration on the Canadian National. Let us see what the objects are of this contest. I have in my hand an off-print from Queen's Quarterly, setting forth an article on "continental Europeans in western Canada" by Doctor Walter Murray, President of the University of Saskatchewan. In this pamphlet Doctor Murray states that the basis of judgment of the committees which had the matter in hand was as follows:

The committees were to be judged by their progress in education, in agriculture, in citizenship and in the arts, handicrafts and activities that minister to the home and social life.

Doctor Murray goes on to give a little more definite information as to education, agriculture, citizenship and so forth.

For evidence of citizenship, a considerable variety of activities were considered, such as participation in cooperative enterprises, community organizations, such as agricultural societies, homemakers' clubs, clubs for boys and girls, school fairs, and, above all, activities for the promotion of health in the school, the home and the community.

May I call the attention of hon. members to the personnel of the judging staff. In Manitoba there were Doctor Mackay, principal of Manitoba college, Mrs. David Watt, at one time president of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada and Brother Joseph, principal of Provencher school at St. Boniface. For the province of Saskatchewan, Doctor Murray, president of the university, headed the committee, with Mrs. McNaughton, for years a worker and leader among the farm women, and Doctor Hugh Rose of Dartmouth college, a Manitoba Rhodes scholar who spent fifteen years studying the background of the European races and in Alberta Dr. Wallace, president of Alberta university, Miss Gunn, for years president of the United Farm Women and Dr. Fairfield, superintendent of the Dominion experimental farm at Lethbridge.

I think that hon. members of the house will agree that these judges were leaders in education and in social welfare and community work in western Canada.

What did the judges say with respect to the conditions which they found among these continental Europeans who had settled in Canada? Dr. Black went to Saskatoon during the time the competition was on and there delivered an address to the Canadian club. Subsequently he made a summary of that address, which summary I have in my hand. Dr. Black opens this summary in the following manner:

The community progress competitions among European settlements in the west, which we inaugurated last year, have already demonstrated that among the many thousands of settlers who have come to us from other countries in the past half century, there is found material of the finest type for the building of a splendid Canadian citizenship, with great gifts of industry and integrity.

I omitted to mention in the proper chronological order that in this contest in the three provinces forty communities entered representing about 125,000 persons, 600 schools and nearly 25,000 school children. Thirteen different nationalities of European extraction were represented. What did the judges find as they went about during their judging of the contest?

Everywhere the judges were received with kindness and a courtesy characteristic of Europe at its best. It is difficult to give an accurate picture of one's impressions. Perhaps the most general impression was great surprise and pleasure at the progress made, and the prospect of further advancement. These people have come to Canada to make homes for themselves and their children, not to make fortunes to take back to Europe or to the coast where they may live in idleness. They were industrious and thrifty and have a love for the soil. While they retain an affection for the land of their birth, its customs, language and history, they are anxious to be regarded as Canadians. Some groups resent the use of any other name than Canadian, and all sing "O Canada" and the National Anthem with a fervour and a vigour that put the native-born to shame.

That quotation is from the pamphlet by Dr. Murray, to which I have already referred. Dr. Murray goes on to say:

It may be said that the school buildings, their equipment, sanitary arrangements and grounds are as good as those found in eastern Canada, in some cases better. The efforts put forth for their school by these settlers from continental Europe, and their appreciation of the value of education surpass those of the Canadian or British. In some districts the rate for schools exceeds thirty mills. In one district three families practically assumed responsibility for a new school building and the support of a teacher. The ambitions of the children and of the parents for their children to go to high school, normal school or university, was surprising.

Let me read what Dr. Black has to say in summarizing the results of the competition in each of the three western provinces:

In Alberta our first prize community is a twenty-year old settlement of Ukrainians, with a highly satisfactory record of progress. Most of the farm homes in the district are of a modern type, and the schools are astonishingly well equipped and conducted.

Dr. Black summarizes the situation in Saskatchewan in the following words:

In Saskatchewan the story was one of continual surprises. Our first prize community is a German settlement of more than thirty years' standing peopled by hard working, thrifty settlers, who radiate an air of plenty and prosperity, but who have their own stories of hardships endured.

The findings of the judges in Manitoba were summarized as follows:

In Manitoba we found communities of Ukrainians, Poles, Dutch and German Mennonites, and other nationalities, which not only revealed to us amazing tales of pioneer struggles and hardships, but gave evidence of success won from agricultural conditions which I doubt very much if many Anglo-Saxons would have had the patience and fortitude to stick it out. In the far northern Ukrainian community of Ethelbert—

I might mention that Ethelbert is in my own constituency. Ethelbert won a prize in this contest. I must admit, however, that they took second place to the prize won by Rossburn in the constituency of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Mullins). To continue:

In the far northern Ukrainian community of Ethelbert the judges saw again examples of success won over thirty years of struggle with difficult agricultural conditions, and heard educational records of the large public and high school in that community which were on a level with the best in the province. . . .

Wherever the judges went they heard continually of the sacrifices made by these people from other lands that their children might have full advantage of the educational facilities we provide here for them. No sacrifice seems to have been too great for this purpose.

In all the communities visited our party had evidence in abundance of the industry and genius of the people in these communities, and of their wonderful attainments in handicrafts and music, for everywhere they went they were entertained in the most charming fashion with music of choirs and of gifted soloists; with native dancing, and in all places we saw exhibits of exquisite handicraft.

With respect to the English language and the learning of it, may I quote again from Dr. Black's speech to the Canadian club? He says:

It has also established beyond question, I think, that there is no English language problem in these communities. In every school visited, and the judges made it a point to visit at least four schools in each community, the language was well taught and well spoken in all grades above grade one.

While my own opinion in matters such as this would only be my own opinion, I do submit to this house that the opinion of men and women of the character of the judges who were in charge of this contest is entitled to the respect of hon. members of this house. In this connection may I say finally that as a new member of this house I have endeavoured to render a small measure of justice to those new Canadians in western Canada of whom I think we have no reason to feel ashamed.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, rising as I do after so many members have spoken and after so many moving and eloquent speeches have been delivered to this house, it might readily be suggested that everything has been said, that every phase of our present situation has been laid bare, that every possibility has been explored, and every shade of public opinion as it exists throughout Canada expressed. Yet, Mr. Speaker, as I see it the chief value of this debate must lie in the unique opportunities it affords for bringing together in this house the various conditions and varied shades of opinion as we find them throughout Canada. This debate offers us an opportunity to view Canada as a whole, an opportunity to seek a clearer understanding of our problems and suggest the desired remedies. Mr. Speaker, in view of the inhibition imposed upon me of limiting my speech to forty minutes I may be pardoned if I make no remarks concerning the many able speeches which have been delivered. Many of them have been thought-provoking, most of them have been characterized by sincerity and fluency of expression. Particularly, may I express my gratification concerning the contribution made by our new colleague from Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) and I would refer especially to the fairness and kindliness evinced by him throughout his address. Due to the same inhibition may I be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, if in offering my fragmentary contribution to this great and complex mosaic we call Canada I confine my remarks largely to the discussion of the situation I best understand and a resume of those circumstances in connection with western agriculture with which I am most intimately acquainted. Not so many years ago the mere utterance of the words "western farmer" or "agriculture" by any member of the group with which I am associated was a signal to launch upon his devoted head a barrage of taunts and jeers, sometimes amounting to vituperation. Fortunately, however, that day has passed due no doubt to a number of causes and possibly due in part to a realization on the part of hon. members of this house that a man may be a farmer, that he may belong to a farmer group, that he may represent a rural constituency and still may give full recognition to the essential interdependence of our institutions and our industries, and may still view with sympathetic understanding the various problems which come before us, whether of a local, national or international character. The present depression is probably the most far reaching and intense which we have experienced in this country. However, out of most evils some good comes and out of the depression has come a greater realization on the part of every right thinking member of this house, of every thinking citizen of Canada, of the fact that agriculture and the primary industries are in truth the foundation of this nation and that this foundation cannot be imperiled, cannot be shaken or destroyed without imperiling every phase of our economic structure in every part of Canada.

True it is that we still find individuals, decreasing in number, who brush aside lightly any reference to agricultural depression with the statement, "Oh, those farmers always have something to growl about, those farmers are whiners." Mr. Speaker, that word is a libel upon the most courageous, the most optimistic class of men we have in this Dominion —the western farmers.

Then too, there are two classes of thought which have been expressed in this house, both of which are repugnant to my sense of the situation. One view was that expressed by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) who seemed to be of the opinion that although the situation was not very good it might be worse, that it was rapidly improving and that everyone was looking forward in high hope to the near future and that—this conclusion is my own—nothing therefore need be done. The other view was that offered by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) who in extolling the good qualities of the farmers of Quebec, which he was justified in doing, referred to them as not complaining and not kicking, stating that they were prepared to accept willingly all the hardships imposed upon them. The hon. member stated that the farmers of his province were prepared, as a matter of duty to Canada, to accept the present situation. Mr. Speaker, I do not know which of those two views represents the attitude of the present government. I hope neither does because neither view offers any prospect of an adequate attempt to solve our present economic situation. I am fairly well acquainted with the western farmers and I say that they are not content with the present conditions; it would be a libel upon the intelligence of the western farmer to say he was content. He is not content nor will he be content until his standard of living is equal to that of other people in this country; he will not be content until he receives for himself a fair and just share of that wealth which he has created. I have lived in central Alberta for about forty years, having gone to that district in the spring of 1891. During those forty years I have lived as all farmers have, through good years and bad, through times of depression and times of expansion and in my experience I have learned, I hope, something of that philosophy and something of that sense of proportion which must come to any sane thinking man in that period of time. I think my record in this house will be ample proof of the fact that I am not prone to exaggeration. I can say without exaggeration that I never have seen a time so discouraging or an immediate future so black in relation to our western farmers as it is at the present time. A few days ago I had the privilege of listening to that gentle soul, the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) He forgot however for a moment his sense of fairness and kindness when he spoke of the wheat farmer, as that cowless, sowless, chickenless man upon whose own head might be placed the burden of much of his present distress. I pass for a moment without discussion the tremendous contribution made to this country by the wheat farmer, than whom no class has contributed more to the export trade and upbuilding of this country, as well as the fact that many areas in western Canada are totally unsuited to any kind of farming but that of grain growing, and I ask: Is the mixed farmer any better off? For forty years I have lived in the constituency of Red Deer and the adjacent district, and I may say to this house that that section of central Alberta is considered one of the best diversified farming areas in the western country In Red Deer there was organized the first cooperative live stock shipping association in Alberta and from that point and adjacent points have been shipped through the years many millions of dollars worth of live stock and live stock products. I can say without exaggeration that the condition of the diversified farmer is on a parity with that of the wheat farmer. I do not know of one product of his toil, grain, hogs, beef, poultry, dairy products, live stock, which can be sold now at a price to equal the actual out-of-pocket cost of production.

But it means a little more than that. Not only are conditions bad—and we gain nothing by attempting to delude ourselves by a fort or imbecile optimism—but I have never seen the morale of the men in that section so low as it is to-day. To understand how serious this condition is you must understand the type of men there. During the early nineties we went through some very hard years. At that time the population of central Alberta was composed of a few hundred families living in little log and sod shacks. They faced hardships almost insuperable. They came from eastern Canada and from countries across the sea. They had left behind them the comforts and conveniences of civilization and they had come out to the prairies to push the boundaries of civilization further westward, to open up for Canada and the empire a great new country. They faced the future with unparalleled courage and boundless optimism. They faced with a smile all the troubles of drought, hail, frost, wind and insect pests, all the privations and the loneliness which must be the lot of a pioneer community. As I say, they went through it with a smile because they always saw before them as a sure objective that comparative comfort, that modest competence which was their aim. I will give the house one illustration of the type of people they are, because, as I have said, you must understand the type before you can appreciate what a lack of morale means there and how serious must be the situation to-day.

Amongst my neighbours, a few miles from my own farm, were a young married couple, a soldier settler and his wife, with a family of three young children. That year by dint of tremendous sacrifice and unstinting labour, they had brought under cultivation and seeded in wheat a fairly large area for a small farm. The prospects of a good crop were very promising, and day after day, night after night, the husband and wife would talk about what that crop meant for them. It meant to them all those things that they had been obliged to do without, all those little conveniences for the home and farm which they needed, new clothes for the wife and children, a new suit for the husband, boots and shoes and toys for Christmas. Then like a bolt from the blue came a western hailstorm and in five minutes not a vestige of their crop remained. Gone were all their hopes. But they did not sit down and whine about it. The wife said to the children, "Let us gather up the hail and have ice cream for dinner." The man said, "With all that moisture what a splendid crop we shall have next year." That is the type—the greatest "next year" people in the world; the world's greatest optimists. And, Mr. Speaker, when I hear those men whom I have known for forty years characterized as whiners and growlers, my gorge rises.

Now, what is the situation at the present time? Bad, as I have stated it; for the first time hundreds of men I know are wondering whether it is worth while to put in a crop. They are prepared to gamble with nature, but to-day they say the dice are loaded against them. If they do get a good crop what is the use of selling it at present day prices? Many more are without a dollar with which to carry on. They go to the bank—that institution created by the law of this country to meet such an emergency—and find that their credit is gone and not one dollar is available for them. What are they to do? Sometimes when I have nothing better to do I read the addresses given by some of our bank presidents and leading financiers in which they state in glowing terms the future of this country of illimitable natural resources, and in particular they express their confidence in the inherent soundness of our western agriculture and their belief that it will enjoy a state of prosperity greater than was ever known before. But, sir, actions speak louder than words, and which conveys the true opinion held by those at the head of our banks and financial institutions, the words they address to their shareholders at the annual meetings, or their attitude when a western farmer goes to his local bank for a loan? Our western farmer finds it impossible to obtain a loan. There is a growing feeling to-day throughout western Canada that a financial system which can only function when times are good, when there is business expansion and rising prices, but which fails miserably and abjectly during times of distress, is not an adequate financial system for this country. The people of western Canada appreciate the statements of the bankers that their duty is to protect their depositors—those overworked widows and orphans whom we always hear about at such a time—whose meagre savings are placed in the care of the banker. Anyone who gives the most superficial study to banking knows that only a very small percentage of loans are made from deposits. But, taking the statement of the bankers at its face value, we have come to the conclusion that if their main function is the safety of their depositors, and if to perform that function they must sacrifice the credit, the needs of the nation,—I say we have come to the conclusion that if that is the case we must find some other financial system with which to secure that credit. We may have to have a national system of banking—and that is my own thought—but if the present system will not function we must establish another that will where we have the necessary security. I am more optimistic than most of the bankers themselves as disclosed by their actions. I believe that eventually when things have gotten so bad that every government will be obliged to face the situation, proper policies will be adopted and we shall have a great future for agriculture.

As I have said the present outlook is discouraging. The future is somewhat black. I have been asked many a time, is it the fault of the present government. Well, Mr.

Speaker, to be perfectly frank, I will say, no, in the main it is not. The present government, in my opinion, is not largely responsible for the situation; nor was it fair, months ago, to attribute entire responsibility to the former government. In the main these conditions are due to world conditions, conditions which might have been corrected in days gone by, which might be corrected now, if governments were not so wedded to old concepts of what was good and what is good. But I am not blaming the present government. I do suggest, however, this—and I shall at this moment saddle the government with no greater responsibility than they themselves have assumed, no more, no less. The members of the present government when in opposition stated that they had diagnosed the complaint and had a remedy. All over the country, men—those who supported them and those who opposed them at the last election—are asking that some of those pledges be redeemed. I am not blaming the government at the moment. They have been in power only a few months, and they have had neither the time nor the opportunity to go into the present situation in any large way. But it is fair to say to them: This is the session when we expect that to be done. This is the time of opportunity, and upon the attempt at least made this session they shall be judged. Not only do I wish them well, in that effort, Mr. Speaker, but as it is their bounden duty as a government to provide these remedies it is also my bounden duty as a Canadian, representing agriculture, to do all I can to help them if they are willing to try.

We can go a little further than that, however. As I said, I am not seeking a scapegoat; I am seeking a remedy, and perhaps nothing can be more ironic or can more completely illustrate the futility of many partisan speeches than what is actually happening to-day. For nine years—and I am taking the words of my hon. friends opposite—we had a government in power which sacrificed agriculture, which gave away their markets and which did nothing for that industry. Now we have a government in power pledged to restore those markets and to see that agriculture has a fair deal. Yet during the last two or three months, for the first time in the history of my province Danish bacon is displacing local bacon on the markets of Alberta. That is not altogether the fault of the government; it simply shows how little governments have done or can do, in a general way. But there are some reasons for that. Coming down to the facts, how is it possible for the Danish farmer to buy grain in Alberta, to pay the transportation costs to Denmark, to feed and process his hogs there and to ship the bacon back here and undersell us? Here is one reason. Some little time ago, when hogs were selling at 5½ cents per pound, the average price of bacon was 40 cents per pound, a spread of 7 to 1 as between the hog and the finished article. I am not taking breakfast bacon and the higher grades, but merely the average price. In Denmark at the same time the Danish farmer was receiving 7½ cents and bacon was selling at 22 cents, a spread of only 3 to 1. It is impossible for any class of producer in this country to compete on terms like those, with the processing spread of 7 to 1 on his part between the raw material and the finished article, as against a 3 to 1 spread of his competitors. It cannot be done. I urge upon this government one thing at least that they may do to help; they should establish one or more experimental processing plants to see if it is not possible to diminish that tremendous spread and allow us to compete.

Then I will go a step further. Our only hope as far as bacon is concerned—and that is important because of the prospect of continued low grain prices and because even now a tremendous increase has taken place throughout the prairies in the number of feeder hogs in the pens, and in a few months there will be a tremendous surplus of hogs—our only hope is to get on the foreign and particularly the British markets. What keeps us from doing that? It is not because of the quality; our bacon is as good as can be found anywhere, and is welcomed by the British consumer. The fact is that the British dealer will not take the trouble to build up a demand for Canadian bacon unless he is sure he can fill that demand from week to week and month to month. In former times we only sent a little shipment to England when prices were low locally or in the United States, and that movement was cut off when prices went up again in our local markets. I ask the government—and I am only expressing what was asked by the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta last January—that a conference be called as soon as possible, because the need is urgent and there is no time to delay, between the packers of this country and representative producers, to see if we cannot guarantee a weekly or monthly delivery of some percentage of our hogs to the British market, in order to build up and hold some kind of market there.

We have been asked to give some practical suggestions. These are not very large, but I believe they are practical suggestions which, if applied, might at least assist us during these hard times which are ahead of us. These are small matters, but they are none the less important.

There is something, however, much greater and much more necessary than these. Assume for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that some intelligent inhabitant of Mars or of some other world could be dropped into our midst to-day, someone capable of surveying the situation as it is and of comprehending the condition of affairs, without any previous knowledge of our history or of the systems we apply. What would he find? I think he might be pardoned if he said we were a strange race, a mixture of wisdom and imbecility, of knowledge and utter lack of wisdom, because he would find here a people above the average in intelligence and in the application of mechanical science and ingenuity. He would find a country second to none in native fertility and natural resources. He would find everywhere an accumulation of wealth in usable form side by side with the most abject poverty. We speak of markets, and I understand the need for outside markets as well as any man. I know that upon our foreign trade, our export trade, the western farmer must live, and that without it he must die as far as production is concerned, but there is another market than that. Our friends opposite like to speak of a home market. So do I. Do my hon. friends opposite realize for one moment the potential extent, the potential value of that market? I will give another illustration, because sometimes illustrations will convey a fact which it is difficult to drive home in any other way. A few months ago I was in Calgary, and I saw two things which impressed me tremendously, taken in juxtaposition. The first was that the terminal elevator was full of wheat of excellent quality which could not be sold. The second was that during the same week the Calgary council put the unemployed on one meal a day because they could not purchase food for them.

There is one of our markets at least, a market at our doors separated from us by no adverse tariff walls and by no great distances involving huge transportation costs. We must remember that every hungry adult and every under-nourished child is a potential customer for the goods produced by our farmers. That market is separated from us only by the folly of man, by the inadequacy of a bookkeeping system and a system of distribution and finance which no longer functions as it should. Can anybody say that system does function as it should? Why do we have recurrent cycles of depression? I cannot tell you, but I say I am no pessimist in that matter. Your true pessimist is the man who says that depressions, such as we have had at different times and in varying degrees, are inevitable, like the law of gravity and the rising and setting of the sun. There is your true pessimist. I am an optimist, because I say that those depressions arise from man-made causes, and they are susceptible to human control. I am an optimist because, from the beginning of the world's history, every major problem which threatened the dissolution of civilization as it then existed, has been met and solved. This is a problem which must be met and solved also, but it will not be done if we are content to sit still and wait for times to be better. It will not be solved unless we are prepared, as courageous men—

Miss MACPHAIL: And women.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I thought it was unnecessary to speak of the courage of the women. It will not be done unless we have the courage to go forward with new ideas and bring about new conditions. I have heard people speak of the menace of communism to this country, the menace of the ultra-radical who walks up and down this land scattering his false doctrines throughout the country. No man has ever accused me of having sympathy with those doctrines, Mr. Speaker. I have been accused sometimes of not being sufficiently radical, but I have never been accused of being too radical. I have no sympathy with those doctrines, believing them to be destructive rather than constructive, although I have a great deal of sympathy with the conditions out of which they have arisen. However, they are not the menace to-day; their own violence defeats their ends. The menace to-day is the self-complacent inertia of men who, themselves in comfortable circumstances, fail to realize what is going on in the world around them. If we do reach a state of chaos; if we do find ourselves in the midst of revolution, which God forbid, it would be those self-complacent gentlemen who would be responsible, those who having ears hear not what is going on and what is said around them; those who having minds, supposedly, understand not, and who having eyes close them to the human suffering around them.

I have made two or three small suggestions in my own way; beyond that I have no power to go. But I do suggest, as I suggested before—and it will stand reiteration for the sake of emphasis: We must first understand the situation, and to that end I have spoken in what sounds like a pessimistic strain. I have outlined the truth, as I know it, during these forty years and during late months. We must first recognize the problems and conditions. There is no use being blind to them; there is no use saying all is well when all is not well. And then we must set ourselves to solve those problems. The responsibility must in the nature of things lie on the government in power; it cannot be otherwise. They have accepted the responsibility, and that responsibility they cannot evade, of going forward and doing what they said they would do—study, understand and apply the remedy. And this session is their opportunity. By it they will rise or they will fall. Never, in my opinion, was such a responsibility laid upon a government in late years; never was such an opportunity as that which belongs to this government to-day. I for one will reserve my judgment as to the agricultural policy of the government because the speech from the throne may mean anything or nothing. It may contain, within its vague references, the most beneficial legislation, or it may mean nothing. But for myself and for the constituents whom I represent, I say that we are prepared to give every opportunity, to make every allowance for the difficulties. But we are not prepared to accept any alibis. We are simply asking that the government in power, realizing the situation, and realizing the weight of the obligation which is theirs, shall perform what they undertook to do. If they do so, or if they make an honest attempt to do so, I can only assure them of all the assistance and sympathy which I can give.

Mr. E. R. E. CHEVRIER (Ottawa) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, to the hon. members who have moved and seconded the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, I extend my congratulations for their deserving efforts. Indeed, it needed great courage to say the things they uttered with reference to the present administration, and I trust that their constituents, in the next election, will not be too severe in this regard.

Before I discuss the speech from the throne I desire to say a few words in reference to the situation in which we find ourselves to-day. It is with considerable reluctance and with considerable diffidence that I do so, and my task is rendered easier by the fact that the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), who is Deputy Speaker of this house, is at the moment occupying the Speaker's chair. For that circumstance at least I am not responsible. True, the high office of deputy speaker allows that the deputy speaker may take the chair on occasions such as this. The hon. member for Montmagny on Friday last took it upon himself to deliver to this house a speech which, Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion, it would have been better had it not been delivered at all. The hon. gentleman invoked as a reason for the delivery of that speech the fact that he was speaking in the interests of his constituents. I have read the contents of that speech and have not found anything in it that related directly to the interests of the constituents of Montmagny. The hon. gentleman also said that he wanted to put an end to old sores and wounds, but he spent four-fifths of his time in scratching the old wounds and laying bare the old sores, leaving the scrapings at the door of the Liberal administration. I shall not follow him in that way; I shall not endeavour to show that the hon. member was right or that he was wrong. But there has arisen out of that situation on Friday last a very peculiar one. The hon. gentleman has said that the position of deputy speaker does not exist in this house. I take his words from Hansard of March 20, at page 177:

> It does not appear in the rules of the house; it does not appear in any of the comments of either Beauchesne, Bourinot or May. I am only the chairman of the committee of the whole house.

I think it is most important that we should know whether there is such a position as deputy speaker in this house. I want no better authority than Beauchesne's Parliamentary Procedure. I am not so much concerned with May or Bourinot. I take Beauchesne, and at page 372 of the 1927 edition, under Standing Order 56, I find the following:

> A chairman of committees who shall also be deputy speaker of the house shall be elected at the commencement of every parliament,—

Then section 2:

> The member elected to serve as deputy speaker and chairman of committees shall be required to possess the full and practical knowledge of the language which is not that of Mr. Speaker for the time being.

Then section 3:

> The member so elected as deputy speaker—

And so forth. Then section 4:

> In the absence of the deputy speaker—

And so on. That might be conclusive in itself, but I want to refer to the Rules and Forms of Beauchesne, the 1927 edition. Surely the hon. member for Montmagny, who is deputy speaker, is not without knowledge of the provision of rule 480, which I am about to quote. It reads:

> The deputy speaker—
> Not chairman of committees.
> —receives an annual salary of $4,000, in addition to his sessional indemnity.

Surely the hon. member for Montmagny, who occupies the position of deputy speaker, if he should desire to draw this salary over and above his indemnity, must do so as deputy speaker and not as chairman of committees.

The hon. member for Montmagny, at page 201 of unrevised Hansard of March 20, proceeds:

I trust that any mistakes I may make they will attribute to my poor education.

I have never heard such expressions of modesty from the hon. member for Montmagny in the past. His poor education? A little further down he says:

I speak to-day as a Conservative by conviction, not by education or birth.

Let me discuss these various words together. At page 202 the hon. member says:

I must say, as a Canadian of French descent, and a Conservative by education . . . .

Well, Mr. Speaker, I find myself in a very difficult situation, in that the hon. member for Montmagny is not in his place; the deputy speaker is not in his seat. I have to solve the difficulty as best I can. The hon. gentleman cannot get away with statements of that kind. His poor education; a Conservative by conviction, not by education or birth. The hon. member, I remember well, was at Ottawa university with me, we studied at Ottawa university together. In the biography of the hon. member for Montmagny, in the Parliamentary Guide, I find that he was born in 1880, and was educated at College du Sacre Coeur, Arthabaska, Quebec Seminary, Ottawa university and Laval university; and around 1896 or 1898 he attended Ottawa university. I remember those days, Mr. Speaker, when the distinguished father of the present Deputy Speaker was Mr. Justice LaVergne. The Parliamentary Guide brings us back to the days of 1887 when the Hon. Joseph LaVergne was member for Drummond-Arthabaska in the federal house as a supporter of the Liberal party. He was elected in 1887, again in 1891 and again in 1896. Then my hon. friend's uncle replaced the Hon. Joseph LaVergne in 1900 and was elected in 1904 and re-elected in 1908. I remember those days when the hon. gentleman was a close attendant at the house of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when his distinguished father lived in this city; he had practised law with Sir Wilfrid. No man in the city of Ottawa has been in closer intimacy with Liberal principles than the hon. member for Montmagny. In 1904 the hon. member for Montmagny was elected to that constituency by the efforts of Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself.

Mr. LAVERGNE: If my hon. friend will allow me, if he looks in Hansard of 1906 he will find a copy of a document which I handed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and which I was asked to sign. He will see I refused to run as anything but as an Independent Liberal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: It is a good thing the hon. gentleman is now in his seat.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Not for my hon. friend.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The hon. gentleman was elected in 1904. He may later have become an independent. Then he resigned in 1908. He became a nationalist. That was the privilege of the hon. member. In 1917 he ran as an independent Liberal in Montmagny, and was defeated. In 1921 he ran as a straight Conservative in Quebec county.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I beg your pardon; I ran as a Liberal.

Mr. CHEVRIER: So much the better. The hon. gentleman is showing good taste. In 1925 he ran as a Conservative in Montmagny and was defeated. In 1926 he ran as a Conservative in Montmagny and was defeated. I understand that in 1930 the hon. gentleman ran, not as a Liberal but as an Independent Conservative, and was elected.

The hon. member, as reported just a few words lower down on page 201 of unrevised Hansard, has this to say:

I claim that, being perfectly independent of partisan politics, I have become a good Tory.

If the hon. gentleman has become a Conservative it is either as a result of education or of evolution. It is pretty hard for him to say that to-day he is a Conservative because of the Liberal education he received. If he travelled on the road to Damascus in that way, the road was rather rough. I can only apply to the hon. gentleman, after that wonderful experience of conversion, the words of Sir Wilfrid: "What a salad!" If the hon. gentleman has reached the stage of perfection now that he is a good Tory, nonpartisan, and if that be the result of evolution or education, in whatever way the hon. gentleman means it, I want to leave him with the words uttered by the Prime Minister at Guelph on May 11, 1930. If the hon. member for Montmagny is a convert, those words of the Prime Minister may fittingly apply:

Whenever you have any convert doing something he has not been brought up to do, he will always make a mess of it.

I find in Hansard words that never should have been spoken, words that never should have found their way into Hansard, and more particularly, as coming from a son of the old province of Quebec, words, which, being unparliamentary, should be ruled out. I turn to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Procedure, and it is with the greatest reluctance that I repeat the words as I find them on page 183 of Hansard:

Mr. LaVergne. . . . Who betrayed the province of Quebec if it was not the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Why associate the name of the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier with an expression of betrayal? I cannot read the hon. gentleman's mind, and for many reasons, but why associate those words in that way? The definition of "betrayer" is "traitor." I could ask that those words be removed from Hansard, because according to May and Beauchesne expressions of that character have previously been ruled out of order. But far be it from me to demand that the words be expunged from the record; I want them to remain in Hansard as a sword in its scabbard. I want them to remain there so that they may forever ring in the ears of the hon. member for Montmagny. I want them to remain there so that they may be read by his constituents and by the people of the province of Quebec, English and French, and of every denomination. I want them to remain there so that the people of Canada may be able properly to appreciate the hon. gentleman's worth. I desire to conclude by saying to the hon. gentleman, in the words of Victor Hugo, "L'oeil était dans le tombe et regardait Cain." —The eye was forever there looking at Cain.

Mr. LAVERGNE: If the hon. member wants to discuss the question with me in the province of Quebec, he will be welcome, but I do not think he will do so.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes. I will be glad to consider that in due course. I want to conclude by quoting the words of the Prime Minister which will be found at page 179 of Hansard. They are words that exactly fit the occasion and apply aptly to it. This is what the Prime Minister said:

As to participating in any debate in which highly controversial or—shall I say?—highly political differences manifest themselves, his own judgment, his own good sense, must be the determining factors with respect to the extent to which he does so participate. Because the punishment is clear; he forfeits the esteem and regard of the house, and if he becomes a violent partisan his usefulness as deputy speaker will be regarded as ended. If, on the other hand, he discharges the onerous duties which we have asked him to accept according to the traditions of this house—because there is no deputy speaker at Westminster at the moment—then he will merit the commendation and approval of this chamber. That seems to me to be the rule which should govern in a matter of this kind.

I leave the hon. gentleman; I leave his speech and I leave his fate to hon. members of the house.

I daresay if the Prime Minister were to summon sufficient courage to return to the city of Calgary, he would be unable to use more aptly the words he uttered there last summer. Undoubtedly he would see that there is now a much larger body of white-buttoned men parading the streets. The words he used on that occasion are certainly fitting to-day. He said:

Surely he could not stop his ears with smug complacence and self-esteem to the cry that carries across the nation, the cry of the destitute and hungry, the cry of the fathers and mothers of little children who call to us as Canadians and as christians to heal their pain.

Those words fit the occasion to-day better than at any time in the past. Now more than ever is the opportune time for the right hon. gentleman, after his sterile trip to the Imperial conference, after his failure to "blast" new roads into the markets of the world, to repeat the words he used at Calgary on the 13th of June last. May he find some consolation in them, and may they give the Canadian people some relief. These are the words he then used, and this is the situation he is now facing:

We will look over the top of the wall and beyond the horizon to make provision for the Canadian agriculturist and secure markets for him.

After looking over the top of the wall and looking for markets for the agriculturist! A new Moses in quest of a promised land.

In order perhaps better to describe the present situation I might quote the words of the Prime Minister, speaking at Regina, as reported in the Regina Leader-Post of the 11th of June last. Perhaps we may find some consolation there. He is quoted as saying:

There is a good time coming.

But he adds:

We may not live to see it.

I want no better authority to describe the present situation than that of the editor of the Liberal-Conservative organ in Ottawa, Mr. O'Leary. He contributed, under his name, an article to the Commonweal Review, entitled Canada Faces Her Problems. It appears in the issue of January 21, 1931, and reads:

Canada, like the United States, is beset by political unrest and economic depression. Mr. Hoover may be bowed down by the problem of prohibition, the plight of the northwestern farmers and the insurgency of congress, but it is doubtful whether his position is more onerous than that of Premier Bennett back from the London Imperial economic conference empty-handed, confronted by farmers who want a fixed price for their wheat; by nation-wide unemployment; by the threat of an enormous budget deficit.

Never since the post-war depression, which produced an agrarian uprising in the west and brought a new orientation in party politics, has the Dominion experienced such vicissitudes.

Mr. O'Leary, writing of the Prime Minister's attempt to secure better trade facilities with Great Britain, does not call that humbug, but he says:

Mr. Bennett's course lacked the approval of his warmest supporters.

He adds:

It was therefore a hard blow to Canadian homes when the London conference failed to offer even a ray of promise to the western farmer.

He says further:

The chief effect of the conference, indeed, so far as Canada is concerned, was that Mr. Bennett, who went to England with a high ambition for imperial economic unity based upon tariff, left London with a veiled threat of economic separatism.

Mr. O'Leary continues:

Nor was this the end. Mr. G. Howard Ferguson, premier of Ontario, who was recently appointed Canadian High Commissioner to London, committed the extraordinary indiscretion of making a vigorous attack upon the socialist policies of the Labour government to which he has been accredited. This, not unnaturally, has added to the strained relations between Ottawa and Downing street, and has made cooperation between the two governments difficult, if not impossible. Mr. Philip Snowden, the acid-tongued socialist Chancellor of the Exchequer, has a good memory.

But what is most interesting is the summing up of the present situation by Mr. O'Leary in these words:

So Mr. Bennett has returned to Canada, which has still some 250 million bushels of unsold wheat, and which has an acute unemployment problem, and whose declining revenues threaten an enormous deficit at the close of the fiscal year. The weakness of his position is like that of Mr. Hoover in the United States, who took office on a platform of prosperity.

He goes on:

After four months—

It is now six.

—and millions voted for unemployment relief, the western wheat problem remains unsolved.

That is an appreciation from one of the Conservative party's staunchest supporters.

I should like to quote from another article, written in about the same tone, which appeared in MacLean's Magazine. I am not saying that Mr. O'Leary is the author of this article, but he is a very frequent contributor to MacLean's. We in Ottawa have good reason to remember that, because Mr. O'Leary wrote an article about the civil service some years ago entitled The Pork Barrel. The civil service has always received the considerate attention of the Conservative party. Mr. O'Leary wrote the article to which I have just referred. It was the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) who some years ago made some nasty remarks about the civil service. It was the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) who some weeks ago recommended a general slash in the civil service, and it was a Conservative member of the Ontario provincial house who called civil servants "parasites."

The article to which I am about to refer is entitled Back Stage at Ottawa, by a Politician with a Notebook It reads:

Governments begin to die when they are born,—

Never was truer word said about the present government:

—and some old politicians, looking under the surface, and knowing something of what transpires behind the scenes, agree that Mr. Bennett's ministry, launched with such seeming virility, has ingredients of decay. They admit its good record in some fields. They concede the Prime Minister's resolute will to get things done; they praise his vigour and courage in the special session of parliament; they applaud his provision of work. Yet a lot of them stop there. They stop at the point where they hold that Mr. Bennett's strength is his weakness; that his attitude of domination toward nearly everything and everybody, coupled with his aloofness from his ministers and the rank and file of his party, bodes no good for the future. He is, said one hard-bitten veteran, Woodrow Wilson over again. Yet though reefs and shoals be ahead, no impenetrable gloom encircles Mr. Bennett. Some in his party may furtively complain or express whispered doubt, but the majority are loyal or well-disciplined and are prepared to give him a blank cheque.

An authoritarian, a terrific, dynamic force, brooking no opposition, and with a certain intellectual superiority, he is master of his administration, and it would take a pretty formidable palace revolution to put another in his place. His ministers often disagree with him. Some disagreed with his reply to Britain's Thomas; disagreed with his standing behind the banks to steady the wheat in the west. But Mr. Bennett had his way. And as long as his policies succeed, or promise to succeed, he will go on having his way. As much as a government can be, this is a one-man government.

I take this from the Ottawa Journal of the 11th of March last. Speaking of the anticipated stand of His Majesty's loyal opposition, the editor says:

They will seek to show—and at this Mr. King is a master—that Mr. Bennett is a tyrant, an autocrat, a sort of Mussolini and Marshal Pilsudski rolled into one; a dictator who is running the nation in blinkers, governing it by order in council.

After saying that, the same editorial goes on to say:

When the proper time comes and orators are weary, Mr. Bennett will bring down his policies, put on his whips, bring on his divisions, produce his necessary majorities.

I should like to refer to what the Prime Minister said when he was speaking at Vancouver. He is reported in the Montreal Gazette of June 19, 1930, as follows:

So would I, when the government is mine, continue to blast a way through all our troubles and difficulties.

Much more recently, in Hansard of the 17th of March, at page 60, he said:

I came into power—our government came into being.

When the Liberal administration came into power in 1921, they found that the coffers of state were depleted and the revenues gone, just as they shall find them when they get back at the next opportunity. During the session of 1930 we brought down our budget. We showed reductions in taxation; we showed reductions in the national debt; we showed payments made out of the revenues; in fact, the nation was in a state of uncontradicted prosperity. A few months later the election took place and the present administration took over the reins of office. At once they proceeded to disturb, change and destroy the fundamental policies of the previous administration and to replace them by new principles. The reaction was great and spelled disaster. Now verily the country is in the state of distress which was described by the present members of the government during the last election. Canada under the policies of the previous administration, although facing aggravated special conditions fared better than any other nation. But the sudden changes brought about by the present government absolutely interrupted the avenues of commerce and trade and placed fear, dissatisfaction and lack of confidence into the hearts and souls of the Canadian people. The great fears they entertained before the election were at once realized when the present administration assumed office. Immediately our revenues began to decrease. Unemployment instead of being checked increased; financial distress increased. In connection with unemployment I wish to quote from the Labour Gazette of February, 1931. This article is published by the authority of the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson), who yet has no seat in this house. At page 208 I find the following:

During August and September, very little variation from July conditions was shown,— Bearing out exactly what I have said above.

—the tendency, however, being in a less favourable direction. Unemployment continued to rise steadily—

After the special session called to end unemployment.

—until the close of the year; the contractions being more extensive each month until the last day of December, when the percentage of idleness stood at 17·0, being the peak of unemployment for the year.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, as soon as the doctor took charge of the patient and administered the medicine the condition of the patient became worse. I do not wish to enter into any controversy as to whether or not the historical words of Mr. Thomas, the Secretary of State for the colonies, fitted the occasion about which he spoke, but I am sure they most fittingly suit the present circumstances in Canada in reference to the policies recently enunciated by the present administration.

I must hurry on, but in passing may I say a few words about the legislation contemplated by the hon. the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). I extend to him my congratulations for advocating these necessary changes in respect to copyright. I sincerely trust that after the bill has been fully considered the aims and purposes surrounding the introduction of the bill will be achieved. It is time that the voice of those for whose protection the law is drafted should be given some attention and that the Copyright Act should be an act to protect copyright owners and not one to make easier plagiarism and the unlawful and detrimental exploitation of authors' rights by unscrupulous captains of industry.

I wish to deal with one further point. I have learned that suggestions have been made to the effect that large reductions are to take place in civil service salaries. Some of the changes are to come about by superannuation, some by retirement and some by reorganization. I want to warn the administration that it should not attempt to lower salaries in the civil service; such action would be disastrous. The state has not the right to set such an example for manufacturers or people in industry over whom they have no immediate jurisdiction. If the state begins to reduce salaries of its employees it will be setting a tremendously bad example for the rest of Canada. Not only should the government refuse to reduce salaries but it should stand by every word of the contracts entered into with these people who are employed in the civil service. I understand some employees are to be superannuated. There are two systems of superannuation: Under the new law the government may superannuate an employee at the age of sixty-five; under the old law there is no age limit at which the employee may be retired. Removal from office must be in the public interest, or because the employee concerned is physically or mentally unfit to continue in the position he has occupied. I warn the government that they will not escape liability simply by asking the Civil Service Commission to make a reorganization and by placing upon its shoulders the responsibility of saying who ought to go who ought not to go. We have had just recently a most glaring example of the power of the government to do as it pleases in the matter of dismissal; in that connection I shall say more at a later time. If those who have reached the age of sixty-five are to be retired it is unfortunate that through the indiscretion of the publishers of the Parliamentary Guide we learn that the right hon. the Prime Minister is approaching the age of sixty-five. Who would believe that the hon. Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) will be seventy years of age on April 1 of this year? The Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) will be seventy years old on October 31. The hon. gentleman who so ably represents the Prime Minister in his absence, the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) will be seventy-five on September 12. He is hale and hearty enough and is at present in Buenos Aires. No one would believe that the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) will be sixty-six on August 15. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) will be sixty-six on April 13. So the government would do well to take care when it tampers with the payrolls of its employees. If such action is in the public interest great care should be exercised. The changes may be made through a desire to inaugurate the patronage system after an election. It may be that the changes are to be made to allow promotions to under employees. It would be most unfair if those who are to fill new positions discharged their duties at a remuneration smaller than that of the previous incumbent. If the one who is promoted receives the minimum salary of the person who has been superannuated there would be very little difference financially because someone would have to be appointed to fill the vacancy created by the promotion of other clerks. It would be most unfair to ask the new incumbent to carry on at the minimum salary. I say therefore that in the public interest the matter has to be very carefully considered. When the proper time arrives I will check up the various appointments and changes. The same applies to statutory increases. I think hon. members take it for granted that it is the intention of the government to do away with statutory increases of salaries exceeding $2,500. I say the government has no right to take that action because when these employees took office it was understood, and it is the law, that so long as they filled their positions to the satisfaction of their chiefs or deputies they were entitled to statutory yearly increases. I say the government has not the right to break those contracts. The government has no right to supervise or direct the salaries of people working outside the civil service—we sympathize with them, but they are not employees of the state and parliament has no control over their pay; but the government has no right to deal in this way with salaries within the service. The government should at once give instructions to the Beatty commission to continue and perform the work for which it was appointed. I do not think the right hon. gentleman intends to balance his budget at the expense of the servants of the state. I do not think he intends to set a bad example to the rest of the nation in that regard.

At all times there rests upon the shoulders of the members of this house a great responsibility, charged as they are with the passing of measures most conducive to the material comfort, happiness and prosperity of the Canadian people. But at no time is that responsibility greater than it is at present. We have to-day to do with conditions that are worse than those that obtained before the war. But to face this world-wide depression the nations are not resorting to armed, defensive tactics and operations. In this financial and economic crisis they are seeking means to dispel and forever extinguish those disturbing factors and principles. There are now two great factors or systems being tried and opposed to each other, high and low tariffs. The question is, which of the two, a high or a low wall, will produce greater financial and economic safety to the nation, protect its interior trade and at the same time allow the expansion of its exterior trade. The right hon. Prime Minister and his followers believe that the financial security of Canada resides in building around its borders tariff walls of such height as were never before built. Those ideas and doctrines I respect. I believe our friends on the other side are sincere, but in my view Canada's destiny cannot be marked out in that way. I do not believe that its financial and economic salvation can be assured by the erection of high and inflexible trade barriers, but rather by the putting into effect of such tariffs as will meet circumstances and conditions as they arise, having as their foundation such basic principles as will permit elasticity and flexibility.

Sir, I feel sure that when the time comes again for the Canadian nation to select between the two doctrines, it will unhesitatingly and resolutely turn its eyes to, and again embrace, those principles and doctrines under which it lived in peace, progress, happiness and contentment from 1921 until July last, under the Liberal standard.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, in rising to continue this debate I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address for the splendid speeches which they delivered in this house, reflecting as they did great credit not only upon themselves but also upon the constituencies which they have the honour to represent.

It was a herculean task that confronted the present administration when they took office. Conditions for which they were not responsible had to be faced, and they went about it in a businesslike manner. True to his promise the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) called a special session of parliament, and notwithstanding the criticism of hon. members opposite, that special session relieved a great deal of distress throughout the Dominion of Canada. The $20,000,000 voted on that occasion lifted a great burden off many shoulders and provided food, clothing and fuel which many families throughout the length and breadth of this country otherwise could not have secured. Not only was the money voted; tariff changes were made, and notwithstanding the criticism that has been offered regarding those changes, they also were a great aid in relieving unemployment. They gave heart to the people of this country; they put new life blood into the veins of industry and gave courage to the dairymen of Ontario and of Canada at large. I am speaking particularly of eastern Ontario when I refer to the dairy business. The importation of New Zealand butter had almost driven the dairy business to the wall; the bringing into this country of millions of pounds of butter annually, which could have been and would otherwise have been produced here, was a great reflection on the administration which permitted it. To-day new courage is felt by dairymen all over the country and already the production of butter has been greatly increased.

I might give an instance from the county of Lanark, which I have the honour to represent, with regard to the effect of what was done at the short session in order to relieve existing conditions. In the four towns in Lanark county $150,000 has been spent during the past winter in unemployment relief. That represents the amount granted by this government, supplemented by contributions from municipalities. Hence we had no unemployment in any of the towns or in the country districts throughout Lanark; any man who was willing to work was provided with work, and in that regard conditions were all that could be desired. However, that was not all. An English firm name Hearst, which had worked up a large cloth trade in Canada, having a wholesale house in Montreal and agents travelling all over the country, sent their representatives to Canada to look up a suitable location. They wished to retain their Canadian business, so they purchased the Hawthorne mills in the town of Carleton Place, which had been idle for some six years, and since last fall have spent half a million dollars on that property. To-day that mill is running to full capacity and employing some two hundred men. The other day the president of that company informed me that they could not keep up with their orders and would be obliged to increase the capacity of their plant. At a dinner in the town of Carleton Place not long ago Mr. Hearst, president of the company, said he was manufacturing in Carleton Place as a result of the policy of the Conservative party.

I ask hon. members of the house to compare that policy of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) for the relief of unemployment and the bringing back of prosperity to this country with the policy of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), the policy of "not a five cent piece for a Tory province." Where would we be to-day if that policy had been carried out? I was indeed surprised to hear the right hon. leader of the opposition express the opinion in this house that the tariff changes made during the short session were a sop handed out to certain industries or big interests in this country. The right hon. gentleman is a great student of political economy; he knows as well as any man in this house knows that there is nothing to be gained but everything to be lost by sowing the seeds of distrust among the people of this country who are engaged in different occupations.

I believe a great deal of the distress which existed throughout the country when the present administration took office might have been avoided had there been foresight, vision and proper administration during the last nine years. We have heard hon. gentlemen opposite complain that conditions are not better. I say it took the Liberal administration nine years to demoralize the trade, the industry and the agriculture of this country. Do any sensible men think business can be built up again in a few months. However, I believe the present Prime Minister is administering the proper medicine and that in due course the patient will recover.

Further I want to say that the building up of industry in Canada will be a great boon to our agriculturists. No farmer can dispose of his goods to his fellow farmer; for the consumption of our farm products we must depend wholly on the men and women engaged in the industrial life of this country, and all other countries. If men engaged in industry have good pay and steady employment they will have purchasing power and we will have a ready market for our goods. You could not place upon the statute book a law which would injure any one class of our community without the result being felt by every other class. Our interests are indissolubly linked together and cannot be separated; we must stand or fall together, and the man who sows the seeds of distrust is doing a very unpatriotic thing. What do we care whether or not the man at our right hand or the man at our left hand speaks the same language or kneels at the same altar? What do we care whether he was born in Canada or has made this the land of his adoption, so long as he is a good Canadian citizen ready to develop this country and build upon the foundations so well and solidly laid by the fathers of confederation?

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), speaking in this house the other day, was asked the question across the floor by some hon. member on this side, as to what it cost to produce a bushel of wheat, and after some hesitation he said, 70 to 75 cents, according to differing conditions. I want to give this house a short story of a neighbour of mine who, about twenty years ago, with very little capital, went to Saskatchewan. He has been returning for a number of years, and spending his winters in Ontario, when he has not gone to Florida or California. This winter he was in Ontario. I asked him the same question: What does it cost you to produce a bushel of wheat in Saskatchewan? He told me that at the present time he was cultivating five thousand acres of land, himself and his son; and he said it was costing them 40 cents a bushel to produce wheat in Saskatchewan. And he was not boasting. I asked him what was the secret of his success and he replied, "The secret of my success is living within my means and keeping away from the banks". I am giving you what he told me—a successful farmer from Saskatchewan. I believe he was correct.

We hear a great deal about easy money, and I should be sorry to see any farmer who required it, and who was in distress, who could not get a reasonable loan so long as he had security to give. But I do say that the prosperous farmers, in either eastern or western Canada, are those who have kept away from the banks. There are very few agricultural operations to-day, either in eastern or in western Canada, in connection with which a man can borrow money and pay the interest charged at the banks and make a profit. Therefore personally I must say that I have always kept away from the banks, unless I had a cheque to cash or money to deposit.

There is one thing that confronts Canada to-day and we must not minimise its importance, and that is the menace of Russia. And this government is to be commended upon its prompt action in saying to the people of Canada that, no matter whether it is profitable or unprofitable, we shall have no truck or trade with the soviet government. Russia to-day is producing practically the same things that Canada is producing. The products of their forests and farms, the products of their mines are coming into competition with those of Canada on the markets of the world. And they are produced to-day by serf labour. They are produced by a form of slavery, and until Russian conditions have become normal no self-respecting country should trade or make trade relations with them. Russia to-day, in her present condition, is a menace to the whole civilized world.

The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) the other day in the house held up a pair of socks. That was no new thing; I was quite accustomed to such an exhibition. There was a gentleman carrying a pair during the campaign last summer, and they had the same price on them, 10 cents. We had an investigation made and found that those socks were made in Japan, and the girls who operated the knitting machines were receiving 12 cents a day. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he wants goods manufactured in a foreign country under those conditions to be sent to Canada to compete with our manufactures here. Personally, if I had the doing of it, I would put a wall as high as Haman's gallows against any importations from a foreign country whose standard of living and scale of wages are so far beneath those in the Dominion of Canada.

In a young country like Canada there should be no permanent depression. We have great natural resources and we have a great people. We have sprung from a great stock; we are the children of two great races. We are the descendants of two great empires which for over a thousand years have taken a leading part in the civilizing and peopling of the whole known world. What have we to fear?

Mr. POULIOT: When the French settlers came to Canada, France was not an empire; it was a kingdom.

Mr. THOMPSON (Lanark): I thank the hon. member for the information. It is quite true that conditions in Canada are not just as we should like to have them. But I have no fear for the future of this great country. Canada in her distress has thrown aside the fallacies of the Liberal party and pinned her faith to the principles and policies of the Conservative party. And the Conservative party, under the leadership of the right hon. Prime Minister, will not betray the confidence which the people of Canada have placed in them.

Mr. A. F. TOTZKE (Humboldt): Before making a few remarks on the questions raised by the speech from the throne and the amendment to the address in reply moved by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), I wish to say a few words regarding the speech made the other day by the hon. the deputy speaker (Mr. LaVergne).

May I say at the outset that for a good many years I have lived among French Canadians and I know them well. I have fought for them and with them. Some of my closest friends are of that race. I have a great admiration for them. I have heard many of them express admiration for my hon. friend the deputy speaker, but after the speech of my hon. friend I am afraid that admiration will change to something else. It may be that it will change only to pity—pity such as one feels when he finds that a great mind has broken under the strain. My hon. friend would have this house and country believe that he is working for a united and harmonious Canada, but I wish to say this, Mr. Speaker: Although I am not of French, English, Scottish or Irish descent, when it comes to loyalty to the land of my birth, when it comes to a desire to do whatever lies in my power to help Canada, I will take off my hat to no one, and more especially not to the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne). He says he is a Canadian. Mr. Speaker, if Canada is to depend for her future on Canadianism of this kind, then I say, may the Lord help Canada. I have in my constituency a good many people who are not of the races mentioned by my hon. friend, but they are loyal, law-abiding Canadians. The younger generation, born in this country, are as loyal Canadians as we have. They are studying the history of their country; they are anxiously looking for anything that will increase their loyalty and love for the land of their birth, the land chosen by their fathers. I pray that those young people may not see the speech of the hon. member for Montmagny. The hon. member says in his speech as reported at page 182 of Hansard:

> If you had had in your western country Canadians of French descent, of French tradition, or, speaking plainly, habitants of Quebec, instead of the foreign element which you brought in, do you think bolshevist speeches along the lines of those of Lenin in Russia would be possible in Canada?

In spite of what the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) has said, there has been in western Canada some discussion on the question of secession. I do not want to discuss that at this moment, except to say that the originators of this idea were not of the foreign element my hon. friend describes, but belong to the favoured races, the races that he says are the only ones who can possibly make a united and harmonious Canada.

Mr. LAVERGNE: I think my hon. friend is misquoting me.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am not misquoting; I am not quoting at all just now.

Mr. LAVERGNE: If my hon. friend is not quoting me, I rise to a point of order. He has no right to put into my mouth words that I have never used.

Mr. TOTZKE: I read the quotation from my hon. friend's speech. He said:

> If you had had in your western country Canadians of French descent, of French tradition, or, speaking plainly, habitants of Quebec, instead of the foregn element which you brought in, do you think bolshevist speeches along the lines of Lenin in Russia would be possible in Canada?

If that is not working against the harmony of Canada, I would like to know what is. I do not say there are not people of those races who have joined the movement, but they did not originate it, and they do not dominate it. I deplore as much as anyone can appeals to religious and racial prejudices to gain party advantage. I have at times had to suffer from that myself. I deplore as much as the hon. member the attitude of the Premier of Saskatchewan toward the French language, but this is what my hon. friend says as reported on page 182 of Hansard:

If Mr. Anderson is allowed to do to-day what he intends to do out west in Saskatchewan, where does the fault lie? It lies on the other side of the house.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Hear, hear.

Mr. TOTZKE: My hon friend says "Hear, hear." I am not misquoting him now.

Mr. LAVERGNE: No.

Mr. TOTZKE: Again he says as reported on page 183 of Hansard:

And if Mr. Anderson is allowed to do what he is doing to-day, where did he get the right and the power?

I hope my hon. friend agrees that he is being quoted properly.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Quite correct.

Mr. TOTZKE: Surely the conversion of the hon. member to the Conservative party has been thorough. He denounces the action of the Premier of Saskatchewan and then he proceeds to excuse it. He says that if Mr. Anderson gets the right and power to do these things, it is because years ago the Liberal party did not protect the rights of minorities in Canada. Is that not wonderful logic? The action of the Premier of Saskatchewan is wrong, but he has the right and power to do this thing that he has done because at some time in the past someone else did the same thing.

Mr. LAVERGNE: Will my hon. friend allow me to correct him? I said that in 1905, when the autonomy bills were passed, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and I asked Sir Wilfrid Laurier not to grant that power to the new provinces, but to protect the rights of the minorities, and on the 21st of February he was in favour of that but on the 21st of March he changed.

Mr. TOTZKE: I think I have been very fair to the hon. gentleman. I have quoted his remarks and I am drawing conclusions from them. I leave it to the house and to the people of Canada to say whether my conclusions are right or not. I say again the action of the premier of Saskatchewan is wrong; I say that just as strongly as my hon. friend does, but my hon. friend says that the premier of Saskatchewan has the right and the power to do the thing he has done because sometime, years ago, someone else did the same thing. We cannot have peace, harmony and prosperity in this great country until the hon. member for Montmagny and other men who think as he does come to realize that there are in Canada staunch, loyal and true Canadians who are descended from races other than French, English, Scotch or Irish.

May I for a few minutes discuss some of the questions that are before us at this time? We have heard a good deal in the house lately about conditions in western Canada. The hon. member for Regina has told us that conditions in western Canada are not too good but at the same time they are not too bad. Before I quote from a letter that I received from a constituent of mine, and from another letter that I have on my desk, I should like to point out that the hon. member for Regina is a city member. He represents largely the city of Regina. Whether he is in a position to judge as to conditions in the rural parts of Saskatchewan I doubt very much. I am glad to hear from the hon. gentleman that conditions in Regina have not been too bad this winter. I should like to ask the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. MacMillan) whether conditions have been as good in the city of Saskatoon as they have been in Regina. The hon. member for Saskatoon must tell the house, if he says anything about conditions there, of the hundreds of unemployed men they have had out in the exhibition grounds and have been feeding all winter. He will, I am sure, say that conditions in Saskatoon have been far from good. He will admit, in fact, that conditions there have been very bad. I want to quote from a letter that I received from a constituent of mine since I arrived in Ottawa. I am not going to give this gentleman's name, but he is not one of the races referred to by the hon. member for Montmagny. He is descended from a foreign race, from the same race as my own. Let there be no doubt as to the fact that his English is very good. This is what he says:

You can tell your friend the Prime Minister that if he thinks our hard times are mostly in our own imaginations that I will swap jobs with him in a minute and then he could see what a person has to contend with.

You know the ideal location of my farm and there never was as good a crop threshed on it before as last fall. I worked day and night till I nearly dropped in my tracks and so just by brute force was fortunate enough to get the last bushel threshed before bad weather set in and every bushel I hauled into the elevator just put me that much deeper in debt. By doing all the work myself this spring and straining my credit to the breaking point I should be able to get my crop in this spring but unless conditions change and my crop shows a substantial profit I might as well declare myself bankrupt. That will be a pretty hard pill to swallow after twenty-eight years of hard work and doing my full share in building up this community.

Mr. POULIOT: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. TOTZKE: March 16, 1931. That is not an isolated case in Saskatchewan. This gentleman, whom I know very well, is one of the best farmers in my district, and if anyone had been able to keep on his feet, he is one of the men who would. In my constituency and in Saskatchewan generally there are many people who are in far worse condition than this man.

I want now to quote from a petition handed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he spoke in Regina last December, that meeting of his to which not only the farmers of Saskatchewan but the members of his own party looked forward with great expectation, trusting that he would throw some ray of hope on conditions then existing in Canada. This is the letter referred to by my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) in his address the other evening. It was handed to the Prime Minister at his meeting in Regina last December:

> The conditions of the farmers of the west are nothing short of deplorable, and these conditions, unless rectified, sir, are bound to be reflected first by corresponding distress among urban dwellers of these prairies, and latterly, in the city dwellers of eastern Canada.
> There is an erroneous impression that portions of the province are in a fairly safe and secure position because they have had very few crop failures in past years. This, Sir, is wrong. The truth is that always the farmer has had to pay so much for necessities of production—

Hon. gentlemen opposite will please listen carefully to what follows:

> The truth is that always the farmer has had to pay so much for necessities of production, such as machinery, necessities of life such as clothing, and has been forced to pay such high interest rates that, in the vast majority of cases, even in good crop areas, no reserves were built up and now that a general condition of crop failure, on the one hand, and spoiled crops on the other has occurred, coupled with a general price depression, the small reserves have been swept away and the general condition is one of want.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that those quotations answer very fully the contention made by my hon. friend from Regina that conditions are not as bad as they might be in western Canada. I agree with what my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) said this afternoon, that conditions are the worst they have ever been in western Canada. I wish to repeat also what my hon. friend from Red Deer said about the farmer of western Canada not being pessimistic. He is anything but pessimistic. He is the most optimistic man in the world. Out in the west we have from year to year suffered from various conditions —frost, hail, and drought, and even from that little animal that my hon. friend from Yorkton (Mr. McPhee) mentioned the other day, the gopher. The people of western Canada are optimistic generally. They are the greatest "next year" people that exist on the face of this globe; but they are not optimistic now. Why? Let me quote again from the speech of my hon. friend from Regina. At page 113 of Hansard of March 18 last he says:

> Personally, as representative of the capital city of Saskatchewan, I am listening anxiously for any word from any side of the house that will point a ray of hope and progress to this Dominion.

Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Saskatchewan are not optimistic at the present time? That they are pessimistic? The hon. member for Regina says that he has listened to his leader and he has not been able to find a ray of hope for bettering the conditions that exist. I agree with him. I also have listened to his leader the right hon. the Prime Minister of this country and to the speeches of all hon. gentlemen from that side of the house, and I am still looking for a ray of hope.

Mr. COTNAM: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would point out one.

Mr. TOTZKE: I am going to do so later on. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, what has something to do with the depression that now exists in western Saskatchewan is the fact of their representation in the cabinet at the present time. In the past, Saskatchewan has had representation in the cabinet in the person of the Prime Minister, in the person of the Minister of Agriculture, and in the person of the Hon. Charles Dunning, Minister of Finance in the late government. Saskatchewan is represented in this government to-day by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), whose constituency is just north of mine. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat at the moment because I should like to hear what he has to say in connection with conditions in western Canada, and what he thinks is the solution for our difficulties. We on this side of the house are looking for a ray of hope. We have an idea of what should be done to do away with the depression and alleviate present conditions. The people of Saskatchewan are waiting to hear from the Minister of Agriculture as to what he has to offer to alleviate present conditions.

The hon. member for Red Deer, speaking this afternoon, said that he was very anxious to do whatever he could to help find a solution for the difficulties that exist in Canada at the present time. In spite of the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh with derision, I also would say that I am ready to do whatever I can in any way, irrespective of party advantage, to help find a solution for the present conditions in this country. We on this side of the house believe that when the May day budget of 1930 was introduced into this house, we had found to some extent a solution for our difficulties. We felt that through the granting of preferences to Great Britain on goods coming into this country, we would create a feeling of good will on the part of Great Britian towards the people of Canada. We realized that the main market for our wheat was Great Britain, and we wanted to do whatever we could in return as she was buying our wheat from us. We were certain that what did happen at the Imperial conference as a result of the visit of the Prime Minister, with his colleagues, would happen if we tried to deal with Great Britain in that way. We realized that it was impossible at the present time, and perhaps for a good many years to come, to induce the people of Great Britain to impose taxes on their foodstuffs. We knew that Great Britain had been our best customer and had bought two or three times more from us than we had bought from her, and we thought that it would be a friendly gesture on our part to give certain preferences to her, to enable her to sell more of her manufactured goods in this country. We believed that we could profitably transfer to Great Britain some of the business that we had been giving to the United States. That was the object of the May day budget of last year. We went to the country on that policy, and hon. gentlemen know what the result was; we are sitting over here, and they are sitting over there. They told the people of western Canada, they told the people of my constituency, I know, that if they were returned to power all this depression would be relieved. They said: You will immediately get relief, and get higher prices for your wheat. My hon. friends from Saskatchewan will know that I am not telling an untruth. I do not say that hon. gentlemen opposite made those statements, but men campaigning on behalf of the Conservative party and on behalf of the members from Saskatchewan on the other side of the house made those statements. They said: Immediately the prices of wheat and butter and of eggs will go up, and immediately unemployment will be done away with. What has happened? Our friends opposite have been in power for about eight months. I do not know what their meaning of the word "immediately" was, but out in Saskatchewan and in western Canada generally, by "immediately" we mean at once—pronto. That was the condition, Mr. Speaker. We put before the people our policy, what we thought would revive trade and enable us to sell our wheat to Great Britain to better advantage.

Let us look for a moment at the policies of my hon. friends opposite, so far as we know them. We know them only from what was discussed during the last campaign, what was said by Conservative candidates and by those campaigning on their behalf. Their policy was to put a tariff wall all around Canada, to make that tariff wall so high that it would keep out the manufactured goods of all foreign countries, that we would have to ourselves the home market for all the goods that we could by any chance make in Canada. This, Mr. Speaker, was to relieve unemployment. Now, if we relieved unemployment in that way, if we placed a high tariff wall around Canada and kept out of this country all the goods we could manufacture, and if we gave our farmers of western Canada the home market what would be the result? In this country we have about nine or ten million people. It is estimated that the average consumption of wheat per person is five or six bushels, so that there would be a total consumption of fifty or sixty million bushels. The remainder we must export; we must ship it to the markets of other countries. If we do not do that, what can we do with our surplus production? Under those conditions what would happen to the farmers of western Canada? They would have to stop the production of wheat. My hon. friends opposite take much pleasure in stating that as a result of a high tariff the number of people employed in factories of eastern Canada will be increased and we will have a greater market for our home products, including wheat and other agricultural products. What does it mean to us? With a tariff at its maximum height 200,000 more workmen might be employed. That would mean an increase in consumption of wheat of a million or two bushels. We would still have to look for a market for the remainder of our wheat; we would have to look for a market in the other countries of the world. At the present time the farmers of western Canada must operate on an export basis; there is no possible chance of developing a home market sufficient in extent to take care of the surplus produced in the west. The hon. Minister of Agriculture has suggested that the farmers of western Canada should develop mixed farming. He suggests they should abandon the idea of raising wheat only. There is a considerable amount of that type of farming being carried on in western Canada at the present time. True, mixed farming has not been developed to its greatest extent. In explanation may I say however that in the province of Saskatchewan alone we have about 12,000,000 acres of land under cultivation which are not suitable for mixed farming. There is a lack of pasture and a lack of water for stock, and those two factors alone make it impossible for the western farmers to adopt mixed farming methods. If they did undertake on a large scale that type of farming I wonder where they would dispose of their cattle and hogs when at the present time hogs are selling as low as 5½ cents per pound? How long would the farmers of western Canada be able to exist under those conditions?

At this time may I say a word about the Imperial conference? My right hon. friend the Prime Minister went to that conference, accompanied by his advisers. It is reported that he intended to find the solution for this condition of depression with which we are now faced. He was going to find a market for Canadian wheat, and as has so often been said, he was going to blast his way into the markets of the world. Mr. Speaker, that blasting has turned out to be a fizzle. Instead of reaping a benefit the western farmer as a result of the conference is more depressed to-day than ever before.

Let us suppose that we could secure for our wheat the entire British market. The average imports into the British market for the last three years has been 166,000,000 bushels. Our share of that was 66,000,000 bushels. We export from 200,000,000 to 300,000,000 bushels per year. Where are we to find a market for the remainder of our wheat? Obviously we have to find other markets. We have to establish closer relations with the other markets of the world. What will happen if we follow the policies of our hon. friends opposite and raise a high tariff wall against other countries? We will lose the trade of those countries just as the United States is commencing to lose the markets of those nations against which she has raised high tariff walls.

I wish to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the position I take concerning the tariffs of this country. On many occasions it has been said that all the western members are free traders. In a sense that is correct; at heart we are free traders because our products in western Canada cannot be protected. We sell our products on the markets of the world and anybody can see that a tariff would not be of advantage to us. We do not however expect to get free trade in the near future. Personally I do not expect that in my day we will get free trade in Canada. I have made the statement in eastern Canada that we are not seeking to injure any of the established industries of this country. We believe however that under our present tariff the majority of industries in Canada are receiving too high protection. Under the tariffs as laid down by this government, undoubtedly they are. Under the former administration the industries received too high protection, and during the term of that administration efforts were made towards the reduction of those tariffs. The former administration appointed the tariff board for the purpose of hearing applications concerning the reductions or advances in tariff duties on goods entering this country. That tariff board eliminated the hole-in-the-corner method of allowing industrial experts to make applications secretly. Under the old method they were allowed to approach the Minister of Finance and lay the facts before him in a more or less closed hearing. The consumers of Canada did not have a chance to offer suggestions. Those who were most affected by tariff changes were not given an opportunity to hear the arguments of the claimants, and were not in a position to present arguments against the proposed changes. The present Prime Minister abrogated that tariff board; he wiped it out of existence. Through a series of editorials coming from eastern Canada and Ottawa in particular, the people of western Canada have been told that through the abolition of the tariff board the country has saved about $200,000. To-day the people of western Canada are wondering how much more the abolition of the tariff board will cost them because of the increase of tariffs on goods which of necessity they must buy. We are told by the Prime Minister that he is going to form another tariff board. He has not given details, however, and we are not going to criticize until we learn his plans.

Before I conclude I want to repeat that I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat. During the Easter recess a number of us will be returning to the province of Saskatchewan and we are going to be met by the farmers of western Canada. We will be asked "What is being done to help us; what did the Minister of Agriculture say?" Up to the present time the Minister of Agriculture has said nothing. As stated by the hon. member for South Battleford the Minister of Agriculture has already intimated that he has two or three different policies for the solution of agricultural difficulties. Yet in this house we have heard not a word from the hon. gentleman. Before we leave for western Canada I hope the minister will tell us from his seat in the house and tell the people of western Canada and of Canada as a whole what his policy will be.

Mr. E. F. WILLIS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, as a very junior member of this house. I rise with great diffidence to pay the customary compliments to the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address. I think I should also pay a compliment to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) in that since the special session he has been appointed leader of the Liberal party in the province of Ontario. I trust he may long continue to be leader of the opposition there. May I also express the wish that when he retires his successor will take his seat in this corner of the house bringing with him his binoculars and ear trumpet. I well remember the bright speech of the member for West Elgin when he spoke of certain members of the Conservative party who visited his constituency. I may say that I also had certain visitations from men on the other side of the house during the last election. I had a visit from Thomas Alexander Crerar, then Minister of Railways and Canals, who came to the town of Killarney in my constituency. Then the former Minister of Finance, Charles Avery Dunning, who has been referred to this evening, came to the town of Boissevain. My third visitor was Joseph Thorarinn Thorson, who I understand, used to delight hon. members in this corner of the house; he spoke at the town of Deloraine. I bring these matters to the attention of the house, not because in the town of Killarney, where Mr. Crerar spoke we had the first Conservative majority since 1904; not because where Mr. Dunning spoke we had the largest Conservative majority in the constituency, not because where Mr. Thorson spoke—he used to be my teacher—we had the first Conservative victory since Manitoba was carved out of the Northwest Territories; no, I do not mention their visits because of those facts, but rather for the reason that there came into my constituency three wise men from the west, brilliant boys bearing bulging briefs of meaningless matter, and where are they to-day?

[Mr. Totzke.]

The constituency which I have the honour to represent is situated in the southwestern corner of Manitoba. In that constituency, as in the constituency of Marquette, we have a beautiful forest reserve, 36 by 6 miles, containing a large number of lakes, meadow land, forest, hay land and pasture for cattle. At the southern extremity we have the international boundary, on the west the province of Saskatchewan, on the north the Souris river, and on the east that great dynasty that has been presided over by the member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) for ten years. I like the clerical stories that the hon. member incorporated in his speech last week, but I trust he will not repeat them from the pulpit. In my constituency, as the hon. member indicated, we are engaged in mixed farming; we grow wheat, oats, barley, and we raise cattle, pigs and poultry; but wheat is our major crop. Barley is our next crop in importance, and, after all, this is a great crop in Manitoba. Manitoba exceeds every other province in the production of barley. Ordinarily our farms average 320 acres, but sometimes their acreage is ten times that figure.

I want to speak in particular on the question of barley. This is the production for 1929 and 1930:

1929: Manitoba, 36,518,000 bushels; Saskatchewan, 30,755,000 bushels; Alberta, 12,514,000 bushels.

1930: Manitoba 49,974,000 bushels; Saskatchewan, 40,522,000 bushels; Alberta, 18,999,000 bushels.

Those are the figures given by the Bureau of Statistics. It will be seen that we in Manitoba are largely interested in the production of barley. This year to date we have marketed from western Canada only 14,000,000 bushels of barley. Last year up to the same period we had already marketed 23,500,000 bushels. Deducting the marketed barley from the production figures, we have on hand in western Canada over 95,000,000 bushels of barley. In addition we have a carry over from last year of 23,000,000 bushels. Deducting from that total the amount which has been fed to our cattle, I think the house will agree with me that we have at the present time over 100,000,000 bushels of barley in western Canada with no market. That is worth around 10 cents a bushel to-day.

But I want to point out that at the same time we are bringing in from the United States and from the Argentine corn in very large quantities. With the consent of the house I want to place on record the import figures of corn for the last twelve months. These are the imports for other than purposes of distillation. The figures cover the period from March, 1930, to February, 1931, and they show we have imported for purposes other than distillation more than 10,000,000 bushels of corn. The Bureau of Statistics have estimated for me that of that amount over 8,000,000 bushels were used for feed purposes, mostly in eastern Canada. Corn is admitted free for purposes of feed; for distillation it is subject to a duty of 7½ cents a bushel. That is the condition with which we in western Canada are confronted. We paid out to our great competitors, the Argentine and the United States, more than $6,000,000 last year for corn for feeding purposes. The Toronto price on March 2, as given me by the Bureau of Statistics was as follows: barley, 38 cents a bushel; corn, c.i.f. Port Colborne, 63 cents. This indicates that even in the east there is a spread between corn and barley of 25 cents a bushel.

Now, I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that in practically every case barley is as good as corn for purposes of feed. The federal government through its experimental farms for a considerable period has been carrying on experiments with a view to finding out whether barley cannot be substituted for corn, and with the indulgence of the house I wish to place on record certain results that they have arrived at. I have in my hand pamphlet No. 127, new series, issued by the Department of Agriculture, headed Greater Use of Barley in Live Stock Feeding. These are some of the conclusions contained in the pamphlet. After conducting experiments throughout Canada in regard to feed for beef cattle it says that 66 per cent, or even 75 per cent, of barley may be used, and it may be substituted at any time for corn in any way in which corn is used. For dairy cattle barley should not form more than 25 to 33 per cent of the grain ration. For horses it can be used up to 25 per cent or more. It is used largely now in Africa, the orient, Europe and the United States. For swine feeding it is the equal of corn. Corn is slightly more fattening, but otherwise barley is better. When one considers the difference in price there is no comparison at all. That is why I am urging that our people in eastern Canada particularly who are feeding corn should now feed barley instead, thereby serving their country, assisting western Canada and getting prices as good as they can get now for whatever they are feeding. Let me read to you the conclusions at which this pamphlet arrives:

It is generally recognized as the most useful Canadian grain grown for swine feeding.

It is almost equally useful in the feeding and finishing of beef cattle.

With oats, it forms a good base for dairy cattle grain mixtures where the additional protein required to balance the ration is otherwise supplied, for example, by alfalfa or high protein cereal-legume hay crops.

Barley may be safely and economically fed to work horses as a part of the grain ration. It is best rolled or bruised.

Barley, rolled, cracked or coarsely ground, combines well with oats in fattening of lambs.

I also wish to refer to another pamphlet which has been issued by the Department of Agriculture, and just here I might say that anyone may get these pamphlets by writing the department at Ottawa. I refer now to pamphlet No. 128, new series, which covers the feeding of poultry, and which arrives at the same results. For those who may be experts perhaps it might be well to refer to certain figures given me by the Manitoba Agricultural College covering actual tests in regard to the feeding of hogs. This schedule indicates the first weight of the hog, the last weight, the gain, the number of days on feed, the total feed consumed, the feed per hundred pounds gained and the daily gain, showing exactly the result of the hog feeding with barley instead of corn. Of course in western Canada there is a marked difference between the price of corn and the price of barley. At present in Winnipeg corn sells for 66 cents per bushel, whereas barley may be bought for 15 cents a bushel. The difference in the east, where we wish to sell, may not be so great, but there is a spread of at least 25 cents per bushel.

Mr. REID: Would the hon. member tell us whether he has any statistics regarding the feeding of corn to poultry?

Mr. WILLIS: Yes, I have some statistics which I will give my hon. friend. I am just coming to that subject. The animal husbandry department of the Manitoba Agricultural college states that corn is less than 5 per cent more valuable than barley, and with the difference in prices it is much more economical. Then in regard to poultry I may tell my hon. friend that the results obtained at the Manitoba Agricultural college are these: As a growing ration it is just as good as corn; as a laying ration it is just as satisfactory as corn, but in other respects it is slightly inferior. These are the conclusions at which they have arrived after actual tests: The cost of producing one hundred pounds of chicken with a barley ration is $9.54 as against $9.90 with a corn ration, or a difference of almost a half cent per pound. Those figures are given as of May 1, 1930. On the basis of this year's prices, however, the cost of producing one hundred pounds of chicken would be $7.38 per 100 pounds with the barley ration and $8.02 with the corn ration.

In case there may be those hon. members present who do not think much of the Manitoba Agricultural college, I have a letter here from the professor of animal husbandry at the Ontario Agricultural college in which he says:

> It has been our experience that corn and barley are, in nearly every case, interchangeable when fed in a mixture for cattle, sheep or hog feeding.

Now I may say that there are three considerations in connection with this problem. The first consideration which I bring to your attention is the fact that barley is interchangeable with corn. The second fact is that we are permitting to come into this country free of duty ten million bushels of corn, which is being used as feed and which should be replaced with barley. The third consideration is that we have freight rates in this country which are too high. As an example, it costs 13 cents a bushel more to ship barley to the maritime provinces than to ship barley to Denmark, and it costs 3 cents a bushel more to ship barley to Vancouver than to ship it to Shanghai. Those are the conditions which exist at the present time. There has been a great deal of talk to-night concerning agriculture, and I must say that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), ever since he came into office, has been striving to have these freight rates reduced.

In this connection may I say that I am not one of those who believe the east is always trying to choke the west. I have heard that opinion expressed here, but I do not agree with it. Neither am I one of those who believe the west is just a group of whiners. I was born in that great western country, and the longer I live the more firmly I become convinced of the fact that the east and the west are interdependent and that the sooner they find that out the better it will be for both of them. I say this is an opportunity for us to put that principle into operation. Every man who is feeding corn to live stock in this eastern country has the opportunity to say to himself, "If I were feeding barley I would be helping someone in western Canada make a living." That is the attitude which should be adopted, and it would not be detrimental to the live stock, the swine or the poultry of eastern Canada if that change were made.

It has been said that the last election was a butter and egg election, and we have heard a good deal lately with regard to butter and eggs. So far as I may, I should like to still some of the discussion and get down to the facts. I have secured from the Bureau of Statistics the actual imports of butter into Canada by months, commencing March 1, 1930, and continuing to February 28, 1931. We find that in March, 1930, we imported 8,029,435 pounds of butter, whereas in February of 1931 we imported only 468,851 pounds. I wish to place this statement on record, and I want to show exactly what those imports were. I do not want to pick out a month here and a month there, although of course it is true that at the present time we have in store over 11,000,000 pounds of butter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but I have noticed that he has sent to Hansard various documents intending them to be copied into the record. I should like to quote rule 291, which states:

> It is not permissible for a member to hand in to Hansard any writing or statements which have not been orally addressed to the house in his speech. Although occasionally, by the courtesy of the house, the finance minister has been allowed to do so in making his budget speech wherein important financial statements and abstracts have been referred to.

I wish to call the hon. member's attention to that rule in case, under a misapprehension, he may leave out statements he would otherwise make but which will not appear in Hansard, having been handed in and not read.

Mr. WILLIS: I shall be very glad to read what I wish to appear in Hansard. This table is as follows:

Canada's Imports of Butter

(By months—March 1, 1930, to February 28, 1931)

	Quantity	Value
1930	Lb.	$
March	8,029,435	2,733,265
April	2,698,270	893,182
May	2,952,367	904,749
June	2,855,415	771,859
July	438,559	121,074
August	1,806,472	497,222
September	878,298	246,181
October	2,243,196	593,655
November	124,943	41,820
December	404,902	120,781
1931
January	448,447	134,172
February	468,851	130,864

Those are the imports of butter into this country. In that regard I was very much surprised this afternoon to hear the New Zealand treaty still being discussed. As a matter of fact, I have only three things to say with reference to the New Zealand treaty: First, I believe I am here as a result of the New Zealand treaty; secondly, if the New Zealand treaty was a good thing why was it abrogated? And thirdly, if it was a bad thing, why was it defended for four years? That is all I have to say with reference to the New Zealand treaty.

I come now to the importation of eggs, because that comes in also for discussion. Under the Speaker's ruling I shall not be able to quote you full details on this subject owing to the forty minute limitation. However, I have the figures for the last year and I find that in March, 1930, we imported, in dozens, 1,177,513 valued at $325,238, and in February, 1931, 3,972, valued at $1,361. That in effect, is the result of that treaty.

I wish for a few moments to speak in regard to that famous speech made in Regina. Mark you, I am referring now to the speech made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and not the past prime minister. In a Canadian press despatch which appeared in the Manitoba Free Press under the heading Salient Features, giving a summary of the Prime Minister's speech, I find the following:

Regina, Sask., Dec. 30—Premier Bennett to-night announced the federal government's policy on the wheat situation.

Salient features of his speech were:

1. Creation of a private corporation to lend money to assist farmers in getting into mixed farming.

2. Promise of grain rates on Hudson Bay railway, when placed in operation, fixed on basis of Crow's Nest Pass rates.

3. Assistance for the provincial governments in providing free food, clothing and seed grain for needy farmers.

4. Credit arrangements to prevent forced selling of the 1930 crop.

5. Guarantee of French government to purchase 7,000,000 to 9,500,000 bushels of 1930 crop.

6. Opening of negotiations with Chinese government for sale of Canadian wheat in China.

Strangely enough I find directly under this despatch an item with the following heading:

Bracken says Bennett speech encouraging.

That in itself ought to be good testimony. But in regard to the credit corporation, I know that when I am home I receive at least one letter a day with reference to the matter, inquiring when the corporation is going to open up, because the people in my constituency feel that it will be of great benefit to them and they are looking forward to the time when it will be started.

I have heard here a discussion concerning a gentleman named Mussolini. I have in this house heard the Prime Minister referred to as Benito Mussolini. But after all, was it not Mussolini who was the saviour of his country? In the press, however, I find that Mussolini is not compared to the right hon. the Prime Minister; rather is he compared to the leader of the opposition, as to which of these gentlemen holds the world's record for the longest speech.

We are thankful in our constituency for the things which came from the special session, and it might very well be remarked that, whatever else you are getting from this government, you are getting action. And at a time like this that is what the people want—action. I remember a story which I could repeat in regard to the Mussolini incident. I was at one time a student in the province of Alberta. It will be recalled that in 1920 the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) was there, and in the language of Amos 'n' Andy he was then the "head man"; and I remember that one evening he came to speak to a group of students. I recall one resounding phrase he used on that occasion. He said, "The more I see of democracy the more I believe in a good autocracy". There you have it from the hon. member for West Edmonton himself. I have heard much criticism is regard to the Prime Minister and I would ask hon. members to check me on the facts as I shall state them. It seems to me that the Prime Minister of this country was elected at the largest convention ever held in Canada. I think that is true. It is true also that the Prime Minister has been perhaps the biggest business success of any man who sits in this house. It is true too that he has been the biggest professional success of any man in this house, and also the biggest political success of any man in the house. I say that, because the greatest journal in the empire has said so; it said he was the most outstanding statesman at the last Imperial conference. But the greatest thing the Prime Minister has done has been to break those blocs which formerly we had in the province of Saskatchewan and in the province of Quebec. We have therefore in the government now in power the greatest guarantee that all the interests of this country will be properly looked after. We have adequate representation in this government from every province in the Dominion. When I give the figures I think hon. members will agree with me in the statement I have just made. We have on this side from the province of British Columbia, seven out of fourteen; we have in Alberta four Conservatives, three Liberals and nine United Farmers. And may I say in passing that for my part I am happy at the way the United Farmers of Alberta have taken part in the debate. We have from Saskatchewan seven Conservatives and from Manitoba eleven out of seventeen. From Ontario we have fifty-nine, which is a majority, and from Quebec twenty-four Conservatives. Perhaps I might repeat something a press man said to me just recently. He said, "You have on the right of Mr. Speaker the most brilliant group of Canadians speaking French who have ever sat behind any prime minister in this country". From New Brunswick we have ten Conservatives and one volcanic Liberal, from Nova Scotia ten Conservatives and four Liberals, and from Prince Edward Island three Conservatives; while from the Yukon we have one Conservative. So that on this side of the house we have agriculture represented as never before, and when hon. members on the other side rise and say, in a loud voice, like a radio, that they speak on behalf of agriculture, let them remember that there are as good agriculturists on this side of the house as anywhere in this chamber.

With regard to western conditions, I do not altogether like the way the banks are acting in western Canada; nor do I think that the mortgage companies are taking advantage of the great opportunities which are theirs. In addition to that I am assured that the machine companies in the west will not sell their products until they reduce prices 25 to 50 per cent. We can do without a good many things that are given us. We can do without alemite and springs under the seat, without ball bearings and other things. The machinery we used to get served us for fifteen years and that was long enough. Only in this way will the machine companies be able to sell what they produce.

In the west conditions are not good; there is no use saying they are. This is no time for passive optimism. This is no time for taking the attitude that it is just a matter of psychology. It is useless to say that prosperity is just around the corner. Rather is it a time for clearer thinking and harder working, a time for making greater sacrifices on behalf of one another. If we could but get the spirit of those pioneers who came to the west about the year 1880, many of our problems would be solved, for they made sacrifices then which we shall never have to make in this country again. Prosperity is not just around the corner, but rather does it remain on the hilltop. We in western Canada grow the finest wheat in the world, and we grow it more economically than any living people. We are served in this country by two of the finest railways that ever served ten million people. The world must eat and we must feed it, and by these means we shall succeed. By these means we shall march out of this valley of depression up on to the hilltop and into the sunshine.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): In rising to make a few observations on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I intend to follow my usual course and be brief. In the first place I regret that Mr. Speaker himself is not at present in the chair, because I wish to extend to him my congratulations on his acquisition of the French language since his elevation to the high position which he now occupies. It is gratifying to all Canadians who love their country and have the spirit of the confederation pact that the Speaker of the House, although English is his mother tongue, is able to read the prayers in French. Moreover, I think a man in this bilingual country who can recite the prayers in both French and English, has probably a better chance to have his prayers answered.

I also wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address. It is no small task to move or second the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I had that task once myself and I found it rather hard because the eyes of the newspaper correspondents and of all the members are on one. Those two gentlemen acquitted themselves admirably, especially in view of the fact that they had to defend a government that to my mind, as far as the masses of the Canadian people are concerned, is the worst government that Canada has ever had. I shall qualify that statement later.

May I also refer to the speech of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). How he loves that old cow! He told us the other night how he won his election and the large majority he had. I am going to tell the house how he won his election. He went to the tinsmith and had a miniature cream can made. At every meeting he talked about the old cow and the price of butter fat, and producing this can he said: "If I am elected and if Mr. Bennett becomes Prime Minister, this cream that the old cow puts into the can, instead of being twenty-six cents, will be forty cents a pound for butter fat."

Mr. MULLINS: The statement that the hon. member is making is absolutely incorrect. I do not see how the house can permit a statement of that kind to be made. I said nothing of the kind. It was unnecessary for me to do so.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me the time that the hon. gentleman has taken from my speech. Every time he mentioned the butter fat, the old cow which was outside of the building would let out a bawl of approval. That is how the hon. gentleman obtained his 2,700 of a majority. If the same hon. gentleman went back to that constituency with the same cream can and talked to the same old cow, she would not bawl in approval, she would horn him. I was really surprised to hear the hon. gentleman the other day attacking the Hon. T. A. Crerar and stating how Mr. Crerar farmed the farmers. Mr. Crerar was President of the Grain Growers' Grain Company; he was really the man who formed the company, the greatest company the grain growers ever had in western Canada, a company which was composed of 36,000 shareholders who were farmers, and which returned in dividends thousands of dollars that went into the pockets of the farmers. Is that the man who has farmed the farmers? The hon. member for Marquette, although I have a great deal of respect for him, does not always preach the same thing. Judging by his actions, when he is out in the country he is the best Liberal that I know of, because he preaches Liberal principles. The only help that the hon. member for Marquette ever gave for the farmer was to talk about the old cow and "shoot the bull" when the bull got rough. During the election campaign the hon. member for Marquette also referred to the old hen. He did not look after the spring chicken; it was the old hen he was looking after.

I wish to refer now to the remarks made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel) the other night. He rather accused the western farmers of being lazy. I think the hon. member from Brome-Missisquoi knows as much about farming conditions in western Canada as I know about medicine and that is nothing. But I will invite my hon. friend, after this session is over to visit western Canada, and if he will send me a telegram I will devote some time to him in order to educate him as to conditions out west. Let me also inform my hon. friend that the sun in western Canada sets a good deal later in the evening than it does in the east.. Therefore the day is much longer and the farmer works longer hours than the farmer does in the east.

I should like to congratulate sincerely the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) who preceded me on his presentation to-night. Although I do not agree with all he said, he made a very fine presentation, and I am sure it is no small task for a new member to make his maiden speech in the house.

I wish to make some reference to the speech of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) who spoke this afternoon. May I be pardoned if I refer to Mr. Deputy Speaker, who is at present in the chair? The other day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) took the stand that the deputy speaker should not take part in house debates which are controversial. Whether that is right or wrong is probably a matter for argument, but in listening to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Dauphin today, I could not help thinking that the leader of the opposition was right, for this reason, that almost the whole speech of the hon. member for Dauphin was a denunciation of what Mr. Deputy Speaker had expressed the other day in regard to the foreign-born population of Canada. I agree with what the hon. member for Dauphin said. I am just as much a Canadian as anybody else in Canada, but I say without fear of contradiction that if we allow a man, no matter from what shores he comes, to enter Canada, and if we permit him to become a British subject, he should enjoy all the rights and privileges that any British subject enjoys. These people who come from foreign countries, whether from central Europe or elsewhere, are making in that western country a contribution that many people do not appreciate. They are bringing here their literature, their traditions. They have settled on land which is more or less inferior and they have made a success where many of us would have made a failure. We have allowed them to come to our shores and to become subjects of our country, and it is up to us to accord them every right and privilege which a British subject should be accorded in this country.

Another discovery which the hon. member for Dauphin made was that the price of machinery was too high. I think he is right. He also discovered that the prices of all the commodities that the farmer has to buy are too high. We on this side of the house know that they are, but every move that the government and hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house make is a move that is going to raise the cost of those commodities that we need so badly on the farm. How can my hon. friend from Dauphin complain of the price of machinery and at the same time support policies which inevitably have the effect of increasing the price of machinery? How is he going to expect a reduction in the price of machinery so long as he supports a government which will allow the manufacturers of machinery to hide themselves behind a tariff wall of 25 or 30 per cent? It cannot be done. The manufacturer is a human being, and of course he will take advantage of the tariff, and has always done so.

I come to the speech from the throne. I have read this document through several times, both in French and in English, but up to the present I have not been able to find anything in it which would enable me when I go home at Easter to tell my people that the government is going to do something to alleviate the situation as it exists to-day. There is only one paragraph in the speech from the throne that refers to agriculture to any extent. It reads:

> My ministers have had under anxious consideration the means by which an orderly marketing of the wheat crop of western Canada may be assured, and have already taken such effective action towards that end as the circumstances appear to justify.

When the right hon. the Prime Minister came back from the Imperial conference I read a statement in the press that some arrangement had been made to secure an orderly marketing of the wheat crop of this country, but I have yet to find the details anywhere or to hear any statement which would give us any indication of what that orderly marketing scheme is. I do not know if any other hon. member has heard anything more about it than I have. I say that the Prime Minister right now should tell the people of western Canada and the people of this country generally just what that arrangement is. The agricultural industry is looking for information in that regard, information that is not forthcoming. Why keep the man on the farm, whether it be in eastern or western Canada, in the dark? Why not let him know what is being done, if anything is being done to give him a new lease of life and alleviate his condition? Here is the farmer ready to sow his crop and begin all his spring operations, and he does not know what to do. If the Prime Minister or the Minister of Agriculture has some scheme for alleviating the condition of the farmer, let them tell the farmer in order to give him new courage.

Some people say that the farmers who ask for a pegged price for wheat are on false ground. Can you blame the farmer for asking for that? The government has found some means of protecting the manufacturers by pegging the price of manufactured goods. The farmer knows that all the commodities which he has to purchase for the operation of his farm are protected by a tariff wall, and naturally he says: If the manufacturers are going to dig into the jack-pot, I want to get in too.

We hear a lot of talk about prosperity being just around the corner, but we have not found the corner. Bank presidents and the presidents of great railway companies and financial institutions have all told us in their annual statements for last year that prosperity is just around the corner. The average individual, whether he be a farmer or a workingman, when he reads these financial statements of institutions which are choking agriculture with high interest rates, when he sees the whole page of a newspaper taken up with an annual statement showing that the banks have made a tremendous amount of profit in the past year and have been able to pay the same dividends that they paid in 1929, and in some cases more, and compares their flourishing condition with his own or with that of the farmer who has a large deficit at the end of his year's operations, can hardly be blamed for becoming dissatisfied. Prosperity will be brought back in this country as soon as the industry of agriculture is put on a paying basis, and no sooner. How are you going to bring that about? You can bring it about by reducing the rate of interest which the farmer has to pay for the money he needs; you can help to bring it about by reducing the cost of the goods which the farmer has to buy; you can help to bring it about by reducing the freight rates which press so heavily on the farmers to-day; and that is the only way you can do it. If the present prices of farm products, whether grain or other products, remain as they are, the farmer will have to lower his production costs tremendously, and he cannot do that unless these interest rates are reduced, and unless freight rates are reduced, and unless this madness of tariff wall is eliminated.

I want to deal shortly with the Beatty scheme that was proposed some time ago. Mr. Beatty is president of one of the finest transportation companies that we have in Canada. He is a very influential man, and whatever Mr. Beatty says is taken notice of by almost everybody. I do not know whether Mr. Beatty was chosen by design to deliver that famous speech in Winnipeg, or whether it came about by accident. It seems, however, that Mr. Beatty and the financial interests of this country are prepared to lend $5,000,000 to the farmers in western Canada to enable them to go into mixed farming. May I at this moment remind my hon. friend from Brome-Missisquoi that I left Quebec forty-nine years ago this May, and when I was a boy ten years of age we milked ten cows on my father's farm. Mr. Beatty, I say, and these financial interests are going to lend $5,000,000 to the western farmers to go into mixed farming. Well, we have had several schemes of that kind before. In 1921 we had a steer fattening epidemic. The bankers advised the farmers to buy steers and fatten them, and the farmers could borrow money from the banks to buy steers at high prices. The consequence was that most of the farmers in western Canada went into the steer fattening business. Then what happened? The market went right down, and practically all the farmers who went into that business lost money, but they still had to pay the banks the money they had borrowed and the full interest charges. A couple of years ago some financial people came into western Canada, and said that we ought to go into the sheep raising business. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) was to some extent responsible for that, because he had complained a lot about Australian mutton coming to Canada. What was the consequence? They went over to the United States and bought a great many ewes and sold them to the farmers at $14.50 per head. Many farmers went into the sheep raising business, although they had no facilities for raising sheep, knew nothing about them, and consequently the whole project was a failure. The result is that to-day we are selling spring lamb on the Winnipeg markets for $3. Now Mr. Beatty comes along and wants us to go into another adventure. This time, however, he has taken Sir Herbert Holt's scheme and advocates the raising of hogs. In my constituency about three weeks ago Mr. Burnell, president of the Manitoba wheat pool, made a statement to the effect that a 15 per cent increase in the production of hogs would flood the market. I do not think Mr. Burnell would have made the statement if he had not been accurate in his figures. If the scheme of hog raising were adopted, instead of an increase of 15 per cent there would be an increase of 300 or 400 per cent. If that were the case what could we do with our production? I am reminded of a cartoon I saw in the Manitoba Free Press, and I feel free to mention that journal because it has been mentioned by my friend from Souris (Mr. Willis). The picture shows a farmer standing in a mountain of wheat. Beside him is standing the Prime Minister. The farmer is asking the question, "What am I going to do with my wheat?" to which he receives the reply, "Eat it." I wish my hon. friends to understand that that is merely a cartoon, and that the Prime Minister might not have used those exact words. I think, however, that the farmer will have to eat his hogs. If Mr. Beatty, Sir Herbert Holt or any of our great financiers want to help the farming situation in Canada let them surrender their high profits. Let Mr. Beatty surrender a part of that $39,000,000 net revenue made by his company in the year 1930. Let the banks which have been making fabulous profits from year to year shoulder some of the loss. Let those people surrender until the depression has passed, some of the profits they have been making. I will give a concrete example: Let us suppose that we have a quarter-section of land in western Canada, that upon that land there are buildings valued at $5,000 or $6,000 and on the farm a mortgage of $3,500. That is not a large mortgage because many western farms carry heavier mortgages than that. Hon. members could not sell that land to-day for the mortgage against it. What does that mean? It means that the whole equity of the farmer is wiped off. Is it right and proper that one part of our community should stand the whole loss of the economic depression? I say it is not. If Mr. Beatty, Sir Herbert Holt and other financiers are sincere in their wish to help the agricultural industry, let them take smaller profits. I know the conditions which prevail in the province of Quebec as well as does the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne). I know that farmers in his constituency are as hard up as we are. Conditions in Ontario are not very good either. If the financiers are sincere let them surrender some of their dividends and some of the profits they have made.

I do not suppose that we on this side of the house could influence the Prime Minister in his policy of protection. I am however going to attack him in another way. He has been accused of being a one man government. His followers, the hon. member for Marquette, the hon. member for Souris, and the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) have said that statement is not correct. If it is not so I am going to give these hon. members a scheme by which they might prevent the economic destruction of this country through their high tariff madness. I am going to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Murphy), the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Burns), the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Beaubier), the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. J. H. Stitt), the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. B. M. Stitt), the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman), the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hay) and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) to have a little caucus to-morrow morning. They are familiar with conditions in the west. They know that no farmer can continue on his farm if we are to have a restricted market wherein he must buy his goods and compete with the rest of the world in the sale of his commodities. They know that as well as hon. members on this side of the house know it, and no hon. member knows it better than the hon. member for Marquette.

Mr. MULLINS: The people in Marquette are tired of that kind of song. They gave me a majority of 2,700; that is proof of the fact.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: What must be the state of mind of the electors during times of depression when in a weak moment they send to this house the hon. member for Marquette in place of Mr. Allison Glen, his predecessor? I cannot account for such things. I am going to ask these hon. members to have a meeting to-morrow morning. I have taken part in the discussions of such little groups.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Seven Sisters?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I know nothing about the ladies. I would ask those hon. members to say to the Prime Minister: Here are the conditions of the western farmers; you must stop this madness of erecting tariff walls or you are going to ruin the agricultural industry of the west. If we have not a one man government those hon. gentlemen may have a chance to convince the Prime Minister; he may listen to them rather than to us.

Before taking my seat may I say that if the policies the Prime Minister and his government put into force in September are to continue, if this tariff madness is not to end, the agricultural industry instead of improving will become much worse.

Mr. W. J. LOUCKS (Rosetown): Mr. Speaker, I deem it a great privilege and pleasure at this time to address the house. As I am making my maiden speech I feel that hon. members might well extend some slight indulgence if I transgress in any minor details. At the outset may I be permitted to congratulate both the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Conditions in western Canada have been outlined by many previous speakers and it would seem unnecessary at this time for me to add to their observations. I would however like to endorse the views of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) to the effect that we should consider such steps as would bring relief not only to western Canada but to the whole Dominion. Many splendid recommendations have been made which if acted upon would bring assistance to western Canada.

First, I want to deal with the subject of our trade relations with soviet Russia. Some criticism has been levelled at the government because of its action in placing an embargo on certain imports from Russia. At this time I wish to compliment both the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the cabinet in that connection. Probably one of the best things that ever happened to the western farmer was when the government put on that embargo. I was asked by many people in my constituency, some of them my strongest political opponents, "What is your government going to do now with that $10,000,000 proposition from Russia?" They added, "We will know now whether the Prime Minister and his cabinet are sincere in their sympathy for us farmers. If they are more concerned with the manufacturer, of course they will accept the proposition." May I say that some of my political opponents came to me after the Prime Minister rejected Russia's offer and said, "We are convinced now that both the Prime Minister and his cabinet are thinking of the farmers rather than of the manufacturers; we believe they must be thinking about us farmers in western Canada."

Let me refer now to something that happened in 1929. In that year a trade deputation, not from Russia but from Great Britain, came to Ottawa. Our friends opposite were then in power, and if my memory serves me correctly the Right Hon. J. H. Thomas headed the British party. He proposed to the government of the day that the British government would take the greater portion of our wheat at $1.47 a bushel if the Canadian government would undertake in return to buy a certain tonnage of British coal. I assure the hon. members that as a farmer in western Canada I was very anxious about the outcome of that offer. I expected the government of that day would be considering the welfare of us farmers in western Canada; but to my disappointment the then leader of the government, now the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), implied by the course he then took that "your wheat of course will find its way into the various markets of the world." Had the government at that time accepted Mr. Thomas' suggestion it would have meant to me on my own crop over $4,000.

When I hear our friends on the other side express their belief in the British preference and their deep concern for the poor farmers of western Canada, I cannot help wondering whether they are sincere. I say this advisedly, because at the time Mr. Thomas' offer was rejected Russian coal was being permitted entry into eastern Canada. I may be asked how that affected the farmers in western Canada. Well, the president of our wheat pool went over to Great Britain and he found a decided change in the British attitude towards our wheat, due to the fact that our government of that day had antagonized the people of Great Britain by turning down Mr. Thomas' offer of British coal in exchange for our wheat and allowing Russia to dump coal into eastern Canada. Again I desire to express my commendation of the action of the present government in declining to accept the recent Russian proposal. In effect they said to Russia, "We are more concerned at this time in looking after the interest of the farmers of western Canada". The best market we have for our wheat is Great Britain, and I am glad to think that to-day the government of this country is looking after our interests along those lines. Had the mistake of the late government been repeated, Great Britain would have been still further antagonized.

The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), addressing the house yesterday, stated that there were more important things to be considered than bread. I agree with him. I think at this time we would be well advised to pay a little more attention to the bolshevistic propaganda that is being carried on throughout the Dominion. I am a little surprised when I hear my hon. friends representing labour pleading for the soviet government. A few days before leaving the west for Ottawa I was told that soviet schools or classes are being conducted in 121 of our towns and cities. In those classes our boys and girls are being taught to pay no attention to the future; materialism is stressed, the spiritual is ridiculed. In all sincerity I ask hon. members, what can we expect of the next generation if our boys and girls are taught such pernicious doctrines? Not long ago I had occasion to address a meeting in my constituency. The hall was crowded and I concluded my address in these words: "Ladies and gentlemen, if materialism is all important, then you can endorse the government of soviet Russia or communism; but I think you are not thinking only of the material." Even some of those who opposed me in the last election shook me by the hand and congratulated me. They said: "You are right, Mr. Loucks, after all there is more than the material. After hearing what is going on in western Canada we are beginning to think more about the soviet menace than we did in the past."

In discussing the speech from the throne my hon. friend from South Vancouver (Mr. MacInnis) said he could see no results at all favourable to the farmers so far as orderly marketing was concerned. I wish to assure him and other hon. members that the farmers of western Canada have been helped very substantially by the action taken by the government to ensure orderly marketing. I am convinced by his remarks that he has little conception of what orderly marketing means to the west. But for the steps taken by the government, the farmers of western Canada would have been much worse off to-day. If the government had not persuaded the banks to guarantee the wheat pool we would have had to dump our wheat on the market. If ever there was a time when orderly marketing was essential it is to-day, especially when we have such overproduction. Let me point out some of the results from orderly marketing. The wheat pool never would have come into being had it not been for the fact that some of us farmers were convinced that we had to change our attitude with respect to the marketing of our grain. The operations of the old wheat board demonstrated that there was much to be gained by orderly marketing. I hear much criticism of the wheat pool, but notwithstanding all its mistakes I have no hesitation in stating that the farmers of western Canada will never go back to the old system of marketing their grain through the grain exchange. That system never eliminated market depression in the fall of the year. We farmers in western Canada have our obligations to meet at that season. What happens? Every creditor is after us for money. There is only one thing to do, hurry our wheat off to the market. That depresses the market. We found under the old system that individually we could not do anything to eliminate that depression, but that collectively we could. Now our creditors have to stand back and wait until we have received our initial payment; then we pay off part of our indebtedness and later the balance.

I have sat here and listened very patiently to all that has been said during this debate about the tariff. One would think from the arguments submitted by hon. members opposite, especially by those from the west, that western farmers are going to be put out of business by the tariff. I am safe in saying that in my constituency we export more wheat than any other district in western Canada. I ran against the most rabid free-trader in the whole dominion, Mr. John Evans, who represented the riding for nine years. I am told that free trade was about all he spoke of here in this house; I know that is all he talked about during the campaign, but he nearly lost his deposit. I went out and preached tariff, right from the commencement, and the farmers of my constituency supported me because I had the assurance from the Prime Minister that there were to be no exploitations. I have heard a great deal from the other side with regard to exploitations, but I ask any hon. member to prove to me that there has been exploitation in any one case since this government came into power.

Just a few days before I left I attended a meeting, where I said, "I am here seeking information; before I go to Ottawa I want to know if you can tell me one commodity in which there has been exploitation since the tariff was increased last September," and not a man in that large audience could give me one instance.

I want to say something else, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the tariff on corn. I can see where that will bring about results. We have been told by the opposition that as yet the farmers have received no protection. I feel that this is not quite true; we have obtained protection, in connection with butter at least, since this government came into office. If tariff means anything, Mr. Speaker, it means protection to the farmers. We have received that protection with regard to dairy products, but we want to go further than that. I have pledged myself to support this tariff on corn; before I left home my supporters asked me if I would do my best to have that tariff imposed, and so I came here supporting that proposal.

I think it is only fair that hon. members should ask me a question or two in this regard. The first question I think should be asked is this: "Will you, as western farmers, exploit the eastern farmers if we do put up the tariff against corn?" A question of that kind would be only fair, and my answer would be that we would not do so. Some hon. members may ask, "How can you be sure?" My answer is this: We know there will be no exploitation. We know what happened last fall in connection with the tariff on glass. The government made an example in that case, and I am safe in saying that the same thing would rightly happen to us if we should exploit the farmers of eastern Canada in connection with corn.

There is another question which I think you should ask, and it is this: "Are you western farmers sure you can meet the demand?" I think the statistics which were given to-night should leave no doubt as to that. Surely with millions of bushels of grain in the bins of the west there should be no need to worry about that, so my answer is, yes, we will meet the demand as far as eastern Canada is concerned.

Then I want to come back to the subject brought up by my hon. friend who is interested in the ranchers. I can see an opportunity for great benefit to the farmers of eastern Canada who are feeding cattle as well as to the farmers of the west; I think you can help us out and we can help you out. Some of you eastern farmers can come out to the west; we can provide you with feeder steers and also with barley and oats with which to finish them, and I think in that way you can help out the ranchers. I mention this with no other thought than that perhaps because of climatic conditions it would be good business to cooperate along this line. You could give us a fair price for our feeder steers, as I think you would, and we could give you plenty of coarse grains for finishing, also at a reasonable price.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to something else; I am going to advocate what is practically interprovincial preference instead of empire preference, and I think this question should be considered at this time. In order to make this proposal a success, however, something will have to be done in connection with freight rates. I think the time has come when it is only fair to bring our domestic freight rates in line with the export rates. For years, as I understand it, the domestic freight rates have been about double export rates. As a farmer I received a great surprise when, during the campaign, I made some investigations along this line. I went to the extreme western part of Alberta and found that from Calgary to British Columbia the domestic rate was just a little more than twice the export rate. Under the present system it would pay us, as farmers, to ship our wheat all the way to England and bring it back again in order to sell it in British Columbia. I have every faith in this government; I think they will take action and get the domestic rate down to the export rate, and I will be disappointed if that is not done. I think we are going to show some of the hon. members opposite who have been criticizing us that this government is trying to do something for us in western Canada.

Some reference has been made to our banking system in western Canada. I am not much in sympathy with it, and neither is any other western farmer. I am just an ordinary farmer, and I had no idea that the legal rate of interest was only 7 per cent. Surely the hon. gentlemen who are now in opposition, and who had control of affairs for nine years, must have known that fact, but I did not know it. I am told now that the legal bank interest is 7 per cent, but I have been in western Canada for twenty-six years and I have never been able to borrow money from the banks for less than 8 per cent interest. If I go to the bank to borrow $100, the banker takes my note and hands me only $92 on which to do my financing. I went to the manager of the bank and said, "Are you not violating the Bank Act in this procedure?" He said he was not, and when I asked him why he said that, his reply was, "We do not call it interest at all; we call it discounting your note." In that way they get around the Bank Act. Again I have every confidence in the ability of this government to see that something is done to make the banks stay within the law. I have received many resolutions from different farmer organizations asking that something be done in this regard, and I believe something will be done. I go further; I do not believe the farmers can afford to pay more than 6 per cent interest on loans. We will do a great service to western Canada if we see to it that the interest rate is reduced, and I am here from western Canada pledged to do my part in seeing that cheaper money is provided for the farmers of the west.

To an ordinary farmer parliament is rather a funny place, if I may use those words. For over a week I have listened to this debate; I have heard ridicule heaped on the government by hon. members opposite, but I have not heard anyone suggest a remedy. It seems to me that the opposition have taken the attitude of saying, We can wash our hands of the matter now; the whole responsibility is on the government. If the leader of the opposition were in his place I think I could tell him without fear of contradiction that he would do better in the west at the next election if he just sat back and folded his arms and did not interfere with the program of the government. Some of my neighbours were at the station to see me off and they said, "Well, Bill, you are going to have a long drawn out session down there, I suppose?" My answer was, "No, I do not expect it; I think there will be a sort of coalition government down there this time. I think the opposition has enough vision to cooperate with the government in order to see if something cannot be done to relieve present conditions." All these conditions have not arisen during the last eight months; do not let us fool ourselves. When hon. gentlemen opposite get up here and ridicule the present government, misrepresenting things, and saying that the responsibility for prevailing conditions rests with a government that has been in power eight months, those hon. gentlemen must think that our intelligence in western Canada is not very high. Are those hon. gentlemen going to support us and see that the farmers of the west get the protection they need? Are they going to vote against a policy which is intended to benefit the west? Every gentleman across the way should be nodding his head now in assent. If they are sincere I do not see how they could help agreeing to give the farmers some protection. But I do not see any of them nodding their heads. There must be something wrong with their necks. I would give them a prescription; they had better get a little lubricating oil, if their necks are so stiff that they cannot nod in agreement with a policy which is intended to further the interests of western Canada.

What is the attitude of those hon. gentlemen in regard to freight rates? They were in power for nine years but did nothing to help us out in that regard. Will they accept the invitation now to lend us their support in regard to an export rate which will help to improve conditions both in eastern Canada and in the west? They should be bowing their heads to show that they endorse what I am saying. If they do not endorse that position they will not be back after the next election.

There are many things I should like to mention, but naturally as a new member I am somewhat embarrassed. Imagine an old farmer living away back in the prairies, and the farmers of the district coming after him and saying, "We want to put this matter into your hands; we know that we can trust you; you know the situation in this constituency and we want you to represent us." I know they thought that way or I should not be here. But let me suggest some of the reasons why I am here. One of them is the fact that we have in Canada to-day a prime minister who was not afraid to go from the Atlantic to the Pacific through all our manufacturing concerns and say, "When I protect you there will be no exploitation." I am glad to say that we have such a man at the head of the government; and so long as the present Prime Minister conducts the affairs of the country in that spirit we need not worry very much about conditions in the west. We are behind him. The trouble with us heretofore has been that we were exploited; but we are not going to be exploited from now on. We feel confident now that exploitation will be a thing of the past.

I received a letter from the former member of the constituency, written in very sympathetic terms, before I accepted the nomination. It was written in language to this effect: "Mr. Loucks, I would advise you to have nothing to do with either Liberals or Conservatives. You will be subjected to severe trials. You will be under a whip." I was quite amused. Of course, as a farmer accustomed to using a whip, I pondered what sort of whip this gentleman was referring to, whether it was a cat o' nine tails or what. I am glad to say that so far I have not seen any evidence of any whip of that description.

But when the leader of the opposition got up to speak I must say I began to quiver. When he referred to the way in which the Prime Minister was running the country I said to myself, " May'be Mr. Evans's word has come true." And the only thing that I could see was this, that if there was a whip it must have been used on the Liberal side during the past administration, when Mr. John Evans was here. It seemed to me that that gentleman must have been thinking in terms of the past administration when he warned me that I might be subject to such punishment.

Before I close I wish to assure the government, as a farmer of the west, that they will have my sincere support so long as they do those things which they have undertaken to carry out. So long as they take such steps as will help to alleviate the distress in the west, I can assure them of my support; and I have no doubt that, before the session is over, those things which I have pointed out to-night as being necessary in the interests of the country will cease to have been matters of theory and will have been put into practice.

Mr. HARRY BUTCHER (Last Mountain): I have noticed that three or four of the newer members who have recently spoken have said they have risen with diffidence. To say that I have risen with diffidence would be altogether to underestimate my feelings at the present moment. I must confess that I have not yet overcome the sense of awe I experienced when I first entered this chamber. When I looked upon the faces of men whose names have been household words in Canada for many years, whose speeches I have been reading for many years, men on both sides of the house, men I have come to feel that I knew personally, although I had never met them or spoken to them, I felt it would be almost an impertinence for one like myself, with so little knowledge, with so little ability to express himself, to rise and give utterance to the opinions I hold. Nevertheless I hold certain opinions that are the result of reading, the result of meeting with other men who have become possessed of knowledge in the political world, and I feel it is my duty to give expression to those opinions to-night, because that was one of the purposes for which I was elected in July last.

I should like to say first of all that I frankly and freely admit that the Conservative party in power to-day is not and cannot be held wholly responsible for the unhappy conditions that exist at the present time both in the matter of the lack of market for our farm products and in the matter of unemployment. I must say however that in my opinion, in the matter of a market for farm products, the situation was aggravated somewhat by the legislation passed at the short session of parliament; and I firmly believe, in the matter of unemployment, that time will prove that even in that respect the legislation of the last session has been an aggravation rather than otherwise.

During the election campaign our opponents in the west, and in the east too, were blaming the policies of the Liberal party for the unhappy conditions then existing. We did not believe that we were to blame. On the other hand, we were willing to accept the reasoned opinions of those who were fully conversant with world conditions. I have before me an opinion expressed by Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor, vice-president of the Bank of Montreal, as published in the Financial Times of London, England. He said:

> Canada, except for the wheat situation which is slowly correcting itself, has been less affected than almost any other country by the economic and industrial crisis through which the world at large is at present passing.

About the same time Mr. J. C. Waugh, President of Brydges and Waugh Limited, financial agents of Winnipeg, said:

> I had the pleasure recently of meeting a very prominent English business man. He was on his return from a tour around the world. I was telling him of our grain situation here. He said, "You know, your situation is not peculiar. Australia's wool market, Mexico's silver market, Brazil's coffee market, Cuba's sugar market, the United States' grain and cotton market, and practically the market of every producing country in the world, is each in just as difficult a position as yours here. In England we have been going through these conditions for nine years, and I should say that Canada seems to be the last place to have been affected.

I am led to the conclusion that even our Conservative opponents in the west were not quite sincere when they said that they held us responsible for those unhappy conditions to which I have referred. I notice to-day they are inclined to blame world conditions for this situation. I notice that even the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) at Calgary on January 3rd is reported by a Canadian Press despatch as having made a statement to this effect. He himself did not use the following words; they are the words of the correspondent. I quote:

> Application of temporary measures to correct present economic conditions will not satisfy Premier R. B. Bennett. He is determined to unearth the final causes of the present depression and lay a secure foundation for permanent future prosperity. So he told a large gathering of his fellow-citizens of Calgary assembled Friday at a luncheon arranged jointly by the board of trade, the young men's section of the board of trade and the Kiwanis club.

"I cannot make up my mind," he said, "why this country between the lake and the mountains should experience the depression, why people who have lived here for years should now find themselves without any accumulation of goods, sometimes without the barest necessities of life."

Mr. Bennett said he had no fixed idea as to the answer to the questions which came to his mind, but was determined to find it. With a country with the credit of Canada palliatives could easily be supplied, but it was essential to provide for lasting security. The government was confronted not only with a problem of adjustment, but with the necessity of finding and eradicating the ultimate causes of depression.

From that it seems clear that the Prime Minister himself did not believe that Liberal policies were the cause of the depression that existed; but on the other hand he declared that he was setting out to discover what those causes actually were. Notwithstanding the fact that I cannot find it reasonable to blame the Conservative party, the government of to-day for the conditions that exist, I think I am quite justified in again reminding the Prime Minister and his followers that they were pledged to remedy the situation at once, forthwith. The Prime Minister himself said that if he were returned to power he would end unemployment; he would cause unemployment to be a bogey to be laughed at. He further said that he would force a way into the markets of the world for our wheat. Surely we have a right to believe that the Prime Minister was sincere when he uttered those words, and we have a right to say to him: Redeem your promises; you were returned to power upon the understanding that you would fulfil this promise forthwith after your election.

I am going to add that the present Prime Minister did redeem two promises which he made, and he redeemed them very promptly. The first of those promises was that a special session should be called to deal with these matters; the second was that at that special session provision would be made for unemployment relief. Both of those promises were kept. The special session was called as soon as possible after the people had recorded their verdict. At that special session an amount of $20,000,000 was, as we all know, voted for the relief of unemployment; but this vote of $20,000,000, important as it was, for the relief of unemployment, was but a trifling matter when compared to the vote to the vested interests, to the manufacturing interests of this country, by way of increased tariffs. All this was on a special plea of "Canada first." Within the breast of every man in this chamber to-day there is a "Canada first" heart, a heart that beats first for Canada. I was not born in this land; I was born in old England. I did not come here until I was thirty years of age, but I will yield to no man in my love for this Canada of ours. I have good reason to love it. It is twenty-seven years ago to-day that I passed for the first time a few miles south of Ottawa. I think the Canadian Pacific at that time ran some thirty or forty miles south of this city; at any rate, we did not enter Ottawa. I know this country has been for me and mine a land not only to have been desired before we came here, but in which we have been glad to find our home during the last twenty-seven years. We yield to no one in our love for Canada, but we say that in the matter of how best we may serve the Canada we love, there is a difference of opinion between us. Our friends to your right, Mr. Speaker, think we best serve Canada by having a very high tariff wall that will close out the manufactured goods of other countries. I had thought of a comparison I was going to use, one that had already been used, a tariff like unto the Chinese wall, suggesting not so much height, as mass, impassability. But I think the illustration that was used by another hon. member was a better one. He used the term "as high as Haman's gallows." May I remind the house of one or two facts in connection with that tall structure that has come to be known as Haman's gallows? The idea of building that gallows was conceived by a great man who might justly have been called the Hon. Mr. Haman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BUTCHER: We know he was honourable because he enjoyed the confidence of his king. He built this structure with three objects in view. The first was undoubtedly to benefit his country; the second was to elevate himself, and the third was to eliminate his rival. I need hardly remind hon. members that in his design he was at first more or less successful. He succeeded in erecting the structure and at first it seemed as though all were going well. His progress was forward and upward, but when he reached the summit of his career, the pinnacle of success, he experienced a very sudden drop, with a very abrupt termination. The result was an end to all his schemes and a further result was the elevation once more of his rival to a position of power. I do not think it was very kind of the hon. member on the other side of the house to suggest that the high tariff structure of this country bears a resemblance to the structure known as Haman's gallows. I am not superstitious, but I hope it was not premonition that led the Prime Minister, before he assumed that office, to refer to a possibility of his perishing on behalf of his country.

We have before us to-day some outstanding examples of the fact that a high tariff wall does not always mean prosperity for any country. We have the United States and Australia. The United States has been building her tariff walls higher and higher until they have certainly become prohibitive, yet in the United States to-day there is a greater percentage of unemployment, greater distress and more discontent than we have in Canada. I am quite sure that no person can justly hold the United States as an example of the good of having a high tariff wall. Australia has been emulating the United States in that respect. Australia is certainly not prosperous. I noticed in reading a book which I have here, which has no doubt come into the possession of a great many hon. members, the Journal of the Parliaments of the Empire, that Australia has to provide something like £800,000 to cover the balance of exchange against her in her negotiations with London, England, which does not look as though she is exceedingly prosperous.

But we need not go to the United States for an example; we need not go to Australia. We can find in the history of Canada evidence that a high tariff wall does not necessarily mean prosperity. I have in my hand, the Life and Letters of Sir Wilfrid Laurier by Oscar Douglas Skelton, and at page 242 I find these words:

> In the federal arena the tariff continued an important issue. The government lost no time in carrying out the mandate given it in the elections of 1878. "Tell us what you want," Macdonald told the manufacturers, "and we will give you what you need." For textiles, furniture, boots and shoes, sugar, foodstuffs, and iron and steel products from pig iron to farm implements, wants and needs were held to be not far apart. The budgets of 1879 and succeeding years brought marked tariff increase, accompanied by a general substitution of specific or compound for ad valorem rates. At the same time the long depression which had shadowed the whole continent came to an end. Trade revived in the United States, giving a filling to industry in its northern neighbour. The building of the Canadian Pacific and other roads created a lively demand for men and goods and credit. Soon Canada had passed from soup-kitchens and bankruptcies to rising factory chimneys and feverish speculation. Naturally, the general public gave credit for the improvement to industrial health to the widely advertised patent medicine which had just been taken. They were prepared to give the N.P. a glowing testimonial.

[Mr. Butcher.]

A little further on, at page 351, I find these words:

> In 1887 Canada had experienced twenty years of confederation, and nearly ten of the national policy. What did the stock taking show? Confederation was to bring national unity, to create a common Canadian sentiment which would submerge provincial prejudices, end all hankering for union with the United States, and prepare the Dominion for a relationship of equality with the mother country. Had this unity developed? For the most part it was still a hope unrealized.

At page 358 I find this:

> Whence could escape be found—

This was ten years after the inauguration of the national policy:

> —from national disunion and economic stagnation? Desperate conditions called for drastic remedies. Canada had failed to find salvation in her own resources.

At that time it took ten years, Mr. Speaker, for Canada to discover that the national policy did not provide relief from her economic ills. I venture to say that it will not take ten years this time, it will take less than four years, probably, for Canada to discover that a mistake has been made in adopting this particular policy. I believe furthermore that this policy is going to be detrimental to the interests of the manufacturers themselves. In fact, already I believe we have evidence of this. In the National Revenue Review, of which doubtless every member has a copy, I find that during the eleven months ending February, 1931, the decline in total exports from this country amounted to $302,538,151, and the decline in total imports to $303,969,259. The decline in our income from customs and excise amounted to $74,430,972. What does that mean in terms of unemployment? Think of the number of men that would have to be employed to deal with that amount of exports and imports.

I have also here a copy of the annual report of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company published on December 31 of last year, and my attention has been specially drawn to this one paragraph:

> The reduction in gross earnings is accounted for by lower than average grain movement and a lessened movement of manufactured products and general merchandise due to the lack of purchasing power which was so conspicuous during the year.

I venture to predict, Mr. Speaker, that it will not be very long before the manufacturers themselves realize that a mistake has been made, as they realize that there are two results accruing from the policy of the government at this time: first, the lessening of the purchasing power of the farmers of Canada, and particularly of western Canada; and second, the loss of export business because of our refusal to make reciprocal purchases. We cannot expect other countries to purchase from us unless we purchase from them. I know that some hon. gentlemen opposite will say that already the forward movement has begun. They will refer, no doubt, to this booklet, The Tariff and Business, being a reprint of a number of articles published in the Montreal Star. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to the advantages which this writer says have already accrued to Canada as a result of the government's policy:

Concretely, therefore, may be tabulated as follows the results so far from the tariff increases of last September which The Star has verified:

1. The location in Canada of twenty branch factories of foreign industries involving a capital expenditure of $5,000,000, and employment for more than 2,000 Canadian workers. (The cheapness with which firms from abroad are able to locate here, which is a feature of the foregoing figures which will immediately strike one, is due to the fact that there is no scarcity of idle plants for them to occupy, and that in practically no cases are they being required to erect their own buildings.)

2. Plant extension programs on the part of nine existing Canadian industries entailing the spending of $7,045,000, and the employment, when completed, of 3,500 more workers.

3. The establishment of five new Canadian industries with expenditure plans totalling $1,600,000 and employment for more than 500.

4. The reopening of four Canadian mills which have been closed for years, with employment for 400 hands.

5. Increased operations in a host of industries, which cannot be measured in terms of new employment, but have meant full-time and over-time in place of part-time for thousands of operatives throughout the country.

6. More inquiries within three months than have been received in the country within the past three years from foreign firms interested in locating in Canada.

An hon. gentleman on this side of the house, speaking yesterday or the day before, pointed out that this volume of investment is in fact less in value than the normal investment for the average year in the past nine or ten years. In any event I would like to draw the attention of the house to the closing words of this booklet. On the last page you will read this:

If no country had a tariff—in other words, if Canada lived in an ideal instead of a practical world, protection as a policy would be unnecessary. But it is as important for nations as for individuals to adapt themselves to their actual environment if they are to survive. Thus, when Canada's closest economic neighbour chooses to raise a tariff barrier so high that it cannot be surmounted, then Canada is only courting economic disaster if she continues to furnish a market for the goods of a nation which will not purchase from her in return.

I purpose to take those very words and paraphrase them slightly. Allow me to read the article to you in this way: When England's neighbours and other nations choose to raise a tariff barrier so high that it cannot be surmounted, then England is only courting economic disaster if she continues to furnish a market for the goods of a nation which will not purchase from her in return. I would ask hon. members to note the warning I have just read from this little book. Certainly we will find Great Britain unwilling to purchase from us if we continue to be unwilling to purchase from her. I know that my hon. friends to the right of the Speaker will say, "But we do purpose to purchase from Great Britain." What do they purpose to purchase? Do hon. members purpose to say what Great Britain shall buy from us and also what we will purchase from her? What does Great Britain want to sell to us? She wants to sell cotton goods, woollen goods and goods composed of iron and steel. We say however that we will not buy those articles and we erect a tariff wall so high that goods of that character cannot enter Canada. We have closed the door in the face of British manufacturers. In view of our action can we be surprised Great Britain adopts the language of this gentleman writing in the Montreal Star, Mr. MacLeod, to the effect that if Canada chooses to raise a tariff barrier so high that it cannot be surmounted, then Canada must not be surprised if Great Britain refuses to purchase the goods of a nation which will not purchase from her in return.

At this point may I be permitted to say a few words in reference to the speech from the throne? I come from a farming constituency. I can truly say that 75 per cent of the electors in the constituency of Last Mountain are either farmers or the wives of farmers. In addition to that from sixty to seventy per cent of the farmers are at the present time insolvent. I am in close connection with my constituents because many of them come to me and together we review their affairs. From personal conversations I know their financial and economic conditions; they are practically insolvent. I have been somewhat surprised by the statement of hon. members from the west sitting to the right of the Speaker. The Prime Minister, returning from the west, stated that observations which had been made concerning hardship in the west were exaggerated, or words to that effect. I do not feel disposed to blame the Prime Minister for making that statement. I assume he came in contact with people who are not aware of existing conditions. I was also very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) say that conditions were bad only in spots and that they might be much worse. Probably his statement is due to the fact that he has been sitting in his well appointed office in the city of Regina and has not come in contact with the actual sufferers. I notice further that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), a farmer from a farming constituency, is reported to have given an interview to a newspaper in Saskatoon wherein he stated that he had had no complaints from his constituents. I would like to tell hon. members that the Minister of Agriculture is respected by all the farmers and townsmen throughout the district in which he lives. He is very popular, but I think he may expect a little criticism when he returns to his constituency. Shortly after the interview which he is reported to hace given I was passing through his constituency and happened to be sitting opposite four farmers who were discussing conditions in the west. I heard one of them say, "Well, we will have to give the Hon. Bob"—I suppose they were referring to the Minister of Agriculture,—"a talking to when he returns to the west." As a matter of fact there is tremendous hardship in western Canada. Some hon. members on the opposite side of the house seem to think that we cannot talk about anything else but those hardships. It may be that we are not conversant with the conditions of the farmers in eastern Canada, but we do know of the suffering of those who live in the west.

I would extend an invitation to any hon. gentleman on the other side of the house who may be disposed to visit the west on the understanding that he adopt one of two methods which I am about to suggest. In the first place we might leave Winnipeg, having met at the Fort Garry hotel. From the hotel we would go to the station and board a pullman car. We would choose our companions, and upon reaching Regina would stay at the Hotel Saskatchewan. At Calgary we would stay at the Palliser, and in Edmonton at the Macdonald. Having completed our journey we would return to Winnipeg and stay at the magnificent Canadian Pacific hotel. Having taken such a trip we would be justified in saying that there is no hardship in the west. We would meet a few of the wealthy people and our impression would be that there were no complaints from that part of the country. There is a second way of travelling, however, which might leave a different impression. Instead of travelling by pullman from Winnipeg we might go back to the smoking or second class car and sit with the men who work on the land. We would travel with those men rather than with our wealthy associates and we would not be long in learning that conditions are much different from what we had originally supposed. We could visit the district in which I live and would find farmers who have laboured from twenty to twenty-five years and are to-day bankrupt. One of the hon. members who spoke a few days ago—I have forgotten the constituency from which he came—stated that the men who went west from his constituency were the lazy ones. I think if that hon. member were to visit the constituency of Last Mountain he would find the contrary to be the fact. In that district there are many men who have worked hard for years and years and have nothing to show for their labours.

I would like to say a few words on behalf of these farmers and with that in mind I refer to the following paragraph in the speech from the throne.

> The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing of the wheat crop and of providing more stable markets, as the welfare of all parts of Canada is involved in satisfactory returns being received by the grain growers.

I believe there is nothing more true than the last sentence in that paragraph. Undoubtedly the welfare of all parts of Canada depends upon the satisfactory returns received by the grain growers. In that connection I refer to an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on December 16 last. This article refers particularly to the necessity of finding a market for our grain, and is as follows:

> And it cannot be too emphatically stated that it is not merely the livelihood of the people directly dependent on the land—there are at least half a million of them—that is in peril. Involved almost equally, though not so directly, are the much larger number of people engaged in every conceivable line of endeavour, who live by serving these people on the farms whose future is now in question: Workmen in eastern factories, railway men, commercial travellers, employees of every kind of distributing agency, dealers in every sort of goods in general demand, professional men, school teachers. Investors—not only those who are direct creditors, but nearly everybody who has money invested subject to market risks—are in danger of suffering heavy losses. We are all in the boat that is labouring in the heavy seas.

Nothing more true has been said concerning the situation. But hon. members have the right to ask me: "What do you propose?" I have been rather struck by the fact that hon. gentlemen on the other side have complained more than once that we are not making suggestions. Of course not. Why should we? Our friends opposite have said that they know the remedy and are going to apply it; they know exactly what to do and they are going to do it.

I was very much struck by this sentence in the speech from the throne:

> The present situation has emphasized the necessity of effecting a reduction in the costs of production and marketing.

What are some of the things that enter into the costs of production? The high cost of implements has already been referred to. Then we have the high cost of heavy machinery such as tractors and separators, high rates of interest, and high freight rates. I may be asked what I would propose should be done. Well, I think it would be wise for the government to do what has already been suggested by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman). I think he gave us a splendid address. He expressed the view that it would be wise for the government to investigate implement prices and see whether they should not be reduced. In my opinion these prices should be reduced. I think also that the prices of tractors, separators and threshing machines should be reduced to something approaching parity with the price of wheat. Freight rates have already been referred to; they too might well be reduced. While there is a flexible shield for the protection of the manufacturer against the winds of adversity, and while large corporations, such as the railways, are assured a certain standard of profit, yet the farmer is not protected at all against the cold east winds. I would suggest that the government advise those who are responsible for the prices of farm implements and heavy machinery, the high rates of interest and high freight rates, that unless those prices and rates are reduced they will not continue to receive the protection which they now enjoy.

But, Mr. Speaker, I feel the hour is approaching when hon. gentlemen want to see the house adjourn, and therefore I will bring my remarks to a close, although there are other matters that I should like to have discussed.

On motion of Mr. Cowan (Long Lake) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

GARMENT WORKERS' STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): Yesterday, on the orders of the day I asked two or three questions, and the Prime Minister promised that the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) would give me an answer by to-day. I wonder if he is now in a position to do so.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration): With respect to the question asked yesterday by my hon. friend regarding the strike of eight hundred girls in Toronto, a representative of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union came to Ottawa when the organization was attempting to negotiate with the employers, and after a discussion with the Minister of Labour it was agreed that the matter, being a local dispute, should properly be brought to the attention of the provincial government. This was done, and the Minister of Labour for Ontario did summon representatives of both parties to a conference prior to the strike being called. The Department of Labour at Ottawa has kept constantly in touch with the situation and has kept informed on its progress. A substantial majority of the employees who went on strike have since reached agreements with their employers. These agreements are said to be mutually satisfactory to both parties, and work has been resumed in those plants. The remainder who are still out on strike are endeavouring to reach similar understandings with their employers, and the Department of Labour is continuing its efforts to effect complete reconciliation between the employers and the employees. I have every reason to expect that satisfactory settlements will shortly be made.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration): My hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) also asked a question regarding unemployment said to exist in the city of Guelph. The Department of Labour has had no representations made to it by the municipal authorities. Certain works are being carried on there by the municipality in conjunction with the province, the amount involved being $92,500. If representations are made to the department by the authorities at Guelph with respect to any acute unemployment situation, then, of course, the department will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. HEENAN: There was one other question that I asked. I referred to an article in the Fort Frances Times stating that the provincial government had stopped work on the highway between Kenora and Fort Frances, and that it was not anticipated that work would be resumed until some time in May. I would ask what this government is going to do towards helping the unemployed in that part of the country.

Mr. GORDON: The department has had no representations made to it in respect to that matter. If representations are made they will, of course, be considered by the department.

Mr. HEENAN: Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like, on the orders of the day, as their representative, to bring to the attention of the government now the fact that there are hardships amongst the unemployed in that part of the country. These men want work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

PENSION EXAMINER AT SASKATOON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): I would ask the Minister of Pensions (Mr. MacLaren) if he is now in a position to give us a definite answer with regard to the telegram I read in the house yesterday. Many of us who come from around Saskatoon are receiving a great many telegrams of this nature. The minister stated yesterday that the rumour was not correct. Is he now in a position to say definitely that Dr. Cox will not be dismissed?

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I do not know anything about the rumour, but I do know the facts.

Mr. VALLANCE: Is this only a rumour?

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot speak for the rumours. I presume that rumours do exist, because my hon. friend has had a telegram regarding a rumour. I say that the facts do not justify the rumour. The dismissal is not under consideration.

WINNIPEG VETCRAFT SHOP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): The vetcraft shop in Winnipeg was burned down in June, 1930. The employees of that establishment were given to understand that it would be rebuilt by August of that year. It was pointed out to them that as this was not a political matter but was entirely under the control of the Civil Service Commission, there would be no difficulty. As yet there has been no sign of any step being taken towards the rebuilding of this institution. I would ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) if he is aware of the facts in this case, and if there is to his knowledge anything that is holding up the reconstruction of this institution.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): So far as I am aware, there was no such assurance given, nor do I know that there was any expectation held out as to the reconstruction of that building. There was, however, certain compensation paid to the workers there—two months' pay, I believe, was allowed—in view of their being unexpectedly deprived of employment.

Mr. HOWDEN: Are we to take it, then—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacLAREN: I am willing to answer the question.

Mr. HOWDEN: If the minister is ready to answer the question, as we are receiving letters from these people and wish to reply to them, I would like to know if I am to understand that this building will not be reconstructed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Monday, March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. W. D. COWAN (Long Lake): For eight years or thereabouts, Mr. Speaker, the Liberals of this house from the province of Saskatchewan have been having just one whale of a good time. Not only that, but their followers out in Saskatchewan have also taken up their cry and have elaborated upon it so that they also have been having a whale of a good time. It is the same old story—when the cat is away the mice will play. Those who have been in this house know that there have been no Conservatives here from Saskatchewan for some time, and consequently there was nobody on the Conservative benches to keep our Liberal friends on the straight and narrow path. They wandered and wandered and wandered, and they have not stopped wandering yet. What they have told the people about Saskatchewan is simply amazing, astounding. You cannot wonder at the frame of mind of the people of Canada towards Saskatchewan after what the Liberal members from Saskatchewan have been saying about our province. But, Mr. Speaker, times have changed. The many false and misleading statements which have been made and elaborated upon regarding Saskatchewan, I am sorry to say have caused many in Canada to believe that the people out in Saskatchewan were secessionists, socialists, bolshevists, communists, almost anarchists. If there are any other "ists" I do not know, but if you have any, Mr. Hansard reporter, please stick them in because I mean them all. The people of Canada have received an entirely wrong impression of the people of Saskatchewan because of this propaganda which has been carried on and which has been entirely misleading. We now have in this house some Conservative members from the province of Saskatchewan, and I may have something to say to my hon. friends opposite from that province. I will speak for myself; I am going to address my remarks entirely to the Saskatchewan members on the Liberal side of the house. I am going to concentrate upon them until we get them back into their own trenches, and soon it will not be long until they are back into their own safety dug-outs, to stay there. I hope that in so doing I shall not be considered parochial. In Saskatchewan we are as broad in our conception of Canada as Canadians anywhere else, but after eight years of misleading propaganda as to conditions in our province, we are going to concentrate on the authors of that propaganda until the enemy is licked. I am delighted beyond measure with the change of policies and methods of administration adopted by our present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir).

An hon. MEMBER: What are they?

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The other day one of my hon. friends from Saskatchewan stated that there have been some changes in the policy of that department. At first he said there were four planks in the platform as drafted by the minister; later he said there were twelve planks and at a later time he said he did not know whether or not there was a policy. I can understand that statement, because the hon. member to whom I refer has always been in a confused mental state. Possibly the Minister of Agriculture took office under the impression that there were four planks in the policy under which the previous government had operated and endeavoured to cover them up. Afterwards the minister may have found there were a dozen and with the interests of the farmers at heart he mended those defects. This government has taken action in regard to agricultural difficulties but for years my hon. friends opposite sat behind the late Minister of Agriculture and did not make any move whatever. They did nothing and they did it for years. Where will we be at the next election? In answer may I say that hon. gentlemen opposite will never keep pace with the improvements inaugurated by the present Minister of Agriculture. I would suggest that my hon. friends opposite should have the sand taken from their eyes and the cobwebs removed from the insides of their heads.

Last night my hon. friend from South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) discussed the new agricultural policy. The hon. gentleman attempted to analyze the policy. His analysis did not amount to very much however, because it was quite apparent the hon. gentleman did not understand the policy. Briefly the policy adopted by the Minister of Agriculture is to replace the current practice of the exclusive production of wheat in the province of Saskatchewan by that of mixed farming. Although I come from the province of Saskatchewan I am prepared to admit that the industry of agriculture is as important in the province of Prince Edward Island as anywhere else. However I have the interests of the province of Saskatchewan at heart. We had the spectacle of my hon. friend from South Battleford opposing mixed farming. Mark you, my hon. friend comes from South Battleford—South Battleford, of all places in Canada suited most to mixed farming methods. The area comprising South Battleford and North Battleford constitutes some of the best country under the sun, a country well suited for mixed farming methods. However instead of my hon. friend telling the house of that fact he states that such methods could not be adopted.

Mr. VALLANCE: Might I suggest that the hon. member confine his remarks to his own constituency.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it; take it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have been through the constituency of South Battleford and I knew it long before the hon. gentleman was there. It is a magnificent country and particularly suited for stock raising. To the south lies the Battle River country with fertile hills all about constituting the very best pasture land. There is an abundance of native grass. The valley is perfectly fertile and meadows are on every hand. There is not a part of Canada better suited to stock raising than the constituency from which my hon. friend comes; yet he states to this house that he is opposed to mixed farming in his constituency.

Mr. VALLANCE: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it, take it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. VALLANCE: I will not sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. VALLANCE: I will not sit down. The hon. member for Regina has just made the statement that—

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Excuse me, but I am not from Regina; I am from the constituency of Long Lake.

Mr. VALLANCE: The hon. member for Long Lake has made the statement that I was opposed to mixed farming methods. I ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw that statement. I defy him to read my speech and to place any such interpretation upon it.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): I will not take back any statements. I lived for twenty-six years in the province of Saskatchewan, and the Liberals of that province received the worst jolt in their history a year ago last June. Since then we have heard nothing but groans, wails, and everything of that nature. We have listened to the most extraordinary statements by hon. members opposite. One of them, I forget who it was, made the statement that 70 per cent of the farmers of Saskatchewan were insolvent and bankrupt. That, Mr. Speaker, is an absolute untruth. There is not the slightest trace of truth in it. I will admit that 70 or 80 per cent, probably more, temporarily, are in an embarrassed financial position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Yes, "oh, oh." And hon. members opposite must know that many of the leading business men in Canada may be in similar circumstances on many occasions. Do they become insolvent? No, certainly they do not. I am temporarily embarrassed all the time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

[Mr. W. D. Cowan.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): The statement of my hon. friends opposite will go out to the whole world; I wish it could be expunged from the record. The world should not be misled by such assertions as that. What effect will they have? Even at the present time we have difficulty in getting money from the bankers, but with such statements broadcast throughout the land we can picture a gentleman being introduced to a bank manager and being refused help simply because of that propaganda. I wish to say to hon. members opposite that they should not broadcast that kind of reputation to those who are interested in the development of our country. What are the facts in regard to Saskatchewan? Are we bankrupt? My hon. friend does not know what he is talking about. For the information of the house I shall recite some facts in regard to the province of Saskatchewan and hon. members will have the opportunity of judging whether we are "bust" or not. The information I am about to quote was given to me by responsible officials of the government of Saskatchewan:

Net Taxable Land Assessment

Rural municipalities..	$887,122,979
Villages..	10,690,294
Towns..	15,610,180
Cities..	60,604,753
	$974,028,206

Those figures do not include the value of stock, cattle or anything of that nature. May I repeat that I am quoting these figures merely to show that we are not bankrupt. There is a little over $200,000,000 chargeable against $1,200,000,000. And yet they say the country is bankrupt! I admit that this money is largely tied up, but it is tied up in excess security. I am asked what I mean by that; I will tell you. The Minister of Agriculture was perfectly right when he admonished the banks of Canada and suggested that they had better mend their ways. This is an illustration—and I have a stack of similar cases—here is what I mean by "excess security." The farmer I am referring to has a section and a half of land near Long Lake for which he paid $55 an acre. I may say that land in that district has sold at a higher rate than that. For that section and a half he paid $16,200 cash; he built a house worth $6,000; his stock and implements cost between $5,000 and $6,000. He had a $5,000 mortgage on a half-section. A year ago he went to the local bank and borrowed $1,800, his crop having been a failure. His moral standing in the community was sufficiently good to justify a much larger advance. But before loaning him the money the bank manager said, "Now, you have got to secure us on that $1,800." There was no attempt at repudiation, none whatever. The farmer said, "All right, what do you want?" "We want a second mortgage on your section and a half of land, and you will have to pay the legal costs." "All right." "You own a half-section in the adjoining township; that land cost you $6,400 and you have a clear title to it. We want a first mortgage on that land." "All right." He gave them the first mortgage. But the bank manager was not satisfied. He said, "We want a chattel mortgage upon your stock and implements as security." He said, "All right." There was no attempt at repudiation. That is not the attitude of our farmers, they want to meet their obligations and are ready to give all the security that they think is necessary. So he gave them a chattel mortgage on the whole of his stock and implements. Thus the bank had three mortgages to secure $1,800. Three weeks ago that farmer went to the same bank and said, "Now, I have 670 acres of my land summer-fallowed and I want enough money to buy seed to sow it." The bank manager replied, "You cannot have it." "But I must have the money to get some seed to sow the lands." "No matter what you want, you cannot have any advance. We haven't the money to give you." "What do you mean?" "We mean you cannot have it. "How am I going to get a loan?" "You will have to give us more security." "I cannot." Now the bank had that excess security for an $1,800 loan and they would not advance him enough money to buy seed to save themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Yes, it is a shame. Now if you say that that is finance, I do not, and I do not care who hears me. I say to the bank managers and the bank superintendents, that is not right, and I think the Minister of Agriculture was fully justified in the stand he took towards the banks. We have a stable system of banking. We do not want anything else. There are not enough bolshevists out there to run a peanut stand. But we do want a bank system which will enable us to do business and carry on agriculture in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Hon. members opposite say "Hear, hear." But although they were in power for some eight years they did not do as much in that time as the hon. Minister of Agriculture has done in two months. I have absolute faith in the Dominion. Our various provinces have been developed under different financial systems. I was born in the old province of Ontario. There is no better place on the face of the earth that I know of. I have dragged myself all over this continent, but I would not give Ontario and Saskatchewan for all the rest of North America. Ontario necessarily had to have a slow development. Her pioneers did well if, having built their log house and barn, they brought under cultivation two or three acres a year; but conditions are entirely different in the west, and our bankers have to recognize that fact.

Our bankers should wake up to another aspect of the question. Recently in Toronto Sir William Mulock suggested that we should take the communists in hand. Well, I think he had better start right at home. People down here do not know what is going on out west, they are ignorant of the first thing about it—and I doubt very much whether my hon. friends opposite are any better informed. I should like them to come out with me and go among the people as I have done for the last forty years. In Saskatchewan we have community halls scattered all over the province and a school system that cannot be beaten anywhere. The school buildings are of the very best and they are the centre of our community activities. The people from miles around come to the community halls to discuss economic, social and political questions, they sing songs and have a real good time. During the evening some persons will address the meeting. But what do they say? Why the foundation is there for all this communistic propaganda; that is, the very fact of the failure of our financial system to meet the present depression provides such a foundation. I am going to tell the house what some of the speakers say. Let me see how much hon. members like this. I am going to relate what those men say of some of our bankers. Let me tell you that when it comes down to propaganda the socialists have it all over both Liberals and Tories; they can show us how to go about it. They are clever; they have the ability. We are face to face with this fact and we should consider what steps are necessary in the circumstances. I wish to read this one article, which has been in circulation for almost ten years, and I should like to know if our financial interests know anything about it. I doubt it; they stay in their parlour cars and do not bother much with the people. The article to which I refer is an editorial which appeared in the Bankers' Magazine—and I did not know there was such a publication—under date of August 26, 1924. This editorial was reprinted in the Idaho Leader and then brought into Canada. The assertion is made that the Bankers' Association of the United States and the Bankers' Association of Canada are working together and are really one and the same and then the editorial proceeds:

> Capital must protect itself in every possible manner through combination and legislation. Debts must be collected, bonds and mortgages must be foreclosed as rapidly as possible. When through a process of law, the common people have lost their homes they will be more tractable, and more easily governed through the influence of the strong arm of government, applied by a central power of wealth under the control of leading financiers. A people without homes will not quarrel with leaders. History repeats itself in regular cycles. This truth is well known among our principal men now engaged in forming an imperialism of capital to govern the world. By thus dividing the voters through the political party system we can get them to expend their energies in fighting over questions of no importance to us except as teachers of the common herd. Thus, by discreet action we can secure for ourselves what has been generously planned and successfully accomplished.

Imagine getting up before an audience of four or five hundred people and making a speech of that kind. I say that sort of thing is simply damnable, and we must meet it. We might as well get busy, and the only way we can do anything is by letting the people know the conditions which exist in this country not only in regard to finance but in regard to other matters as well. The only way we can counteract this propaganda is by getting the level-headed, reasonable farmers of our country together to discuss these questions. We must find out for ourselves just what the farmers are doing, what it is they want and why they want it, and then try to bring about conditions which will be more or less satisfactory.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. Hon. members opposite have been saying that we have not done anything for the farmers. They seem to think that as soon as you get goods a little bit cheaper you have done everything the farmers want. At every meeting I attended during the election campaign I made the statement that the income was the thing, that if a man has an income he will get along all right. Well, what is the situation? I have some figures here; they apply to Saskatchewan only, but hon. members from other parts of the country will find that the same thing applies. Out in Saskatchewan we have become absolutely tired of the assertion that the tariff changes made last session must result in increased prices. We knew at the time that statement was false. The government secured a table of prices right in Regina and submitted that table to the legislative assembly, which prorogued before this parliament opened. These are the figures given at that time:

Percentage of Reduction in Prices

Table oilcloth	6½
All-wool grey blankets	11
Ladies' best class hose	28⅓
Ladies' second grade hose	26½
Children's cotton hose	13
Fingering wool	14
Men's balbriggan combinations	6
Men's merino combinations	10
Men's silk combinations	20
Men's wool and cotton socks	7
Men's merino socks	10
Men's khaki drill shirts	15
Men's fancy drill shirts	15
Men's red-back overalls	9
Men's horse-faced leather gloves	12½
Pillow cotton	14
Sheeting	21½
Grey sheeting	15
White cotton	11
Grey cotton	23
Standard prints	15
Sail and tent duck	24
Sateen	8
Flannelette	12½
Denim for overalls	20

There is a list comprising many of the articles needed by farmers throughout this country, and that list was submitted to the legislative assembly of Satskatchewan. Hon. James Gardiner was sitting in opposition. Did he challenge the accuracy of those figures? Did any of the Liberal leaders of Saskatchewan say these figures were not correct? They certainly did not do so, because within a radius of two miles of the parliament buildings in Regina there are from fifty to one hundred wholesale houses supplying all these articles for that section of the country. These gentlemen knew these figures were correct, and they did not dare deny their accuracy. Does that prove that the increased tariff has been a benefit or an injury to the purchasing community? You can take your choice but as far as I am concerned, if that is an injury, pile on the injury.

Mr. BROWN (Lisgar): I hope now that the hon. member has dealt with the hon. member for Lisgar—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COWAN (Long Lake): Again, our friends from Saskatchewan have asked what benefit has come to the farmers from the relief work authorized last year. They understood at the time how that policy would affect the wheat growers; they knew full well there would be no more harvest that year. There is a natural law governing agriculture in Canada; we sow our grain in the spring and reap it in the fall. That special session was held in September of last year. Did hon. members opposite expect the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to tell the farmers of the west to sow a lot of wheat at that time of year? I beg to assure my hon. friend from Lisgar that we do not do things like that in Saskatchewan. The farmers of that province do not raise pumpkins on icebergs. There is a natural law; under that law there is a right time to seed, and that is in the spring of the year. My hon. friends know that the necessities of the prairies had to be taken care of as an emergency measure, and that is what was done. Hon. gentlemen from Saskatchewan know perfectly well what happened. Before the money had been voted by the house the hon. Minister of Highways in Saskatchewan, Mr. Stewart, said to me, "I knew that when the Hon. R. B. Bennett made the statement that the money would be voted this would be done when he came into power; because we know that when the Conservatives make up their mind to do a thing it will be done." The result is that the whole of that drought-stricken area will be considerably improved. There have been nine thousand farmers furnished with work in the province of Saskatchewan—nine thousand farmers with twenty-five thousand horses. They have been engaged building roads. They were not given a dole; they were not given sops. They were given work, and throughout the province camps were provided to house them. Every man was given an opportunity to work until he had earned one hundred dollars, and then he went back home and enabled someone else to come along. And the work was well done. The sum of ten million dollars was spent to good purpose, and then my hon. friends ask: what did they do? Let me say that never in the history of Canada has work been more economically or better done than the work which was thus carried out in the province of Saskatchewan, employment being provided through the use of money furnished in part by this government for the relief of people in the drought-stricken area. But were the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta the only ones who have suffered in this regard? Why, in a large part of the United States the people were stricken by the drought worse than we were. Yet the Americans were not crying and groaning and yelping; they did what they could to ameliorate the conditions that faced them. And that is what we are doing now. The drought that has stricken us is a temporary condition, and I for one absolutely refuse to despair of the province of Saskatchewan because of what has happened in the past two years, and to say to the people there, "You are no good, you cannot produce enough." I am prepared to base my estimate of the productivity of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, not on what has been accomplished during those two years but on the average of production since I first settled there some thirty years ago. I do not hesitate to say that the average for that thirty years will greatly exceed the average of the last two years, and that is the standard by which I shall judge. And what do we find over that longer period? Ask the people of Saskatchewan and you will find thousands of farmers who have been successful in that time. You could find nothing better in Ontario and Quebec. I could take hon. members out there and show them very many farm houses as comfortably furnished as any in the east. Many farm houses have their own electric power plants and many are modernized. They are well built and comfortable. I can assure the house that as a result of thirty years of labour the farmers of the province can show very satisfactory results, and I do not understand how anyone could stand up anywhere and try to make out that Saskatchewan is not capable of agricultural development. We are just as good in this respect to-day as we have ever been. The soil is just as good; all it needs is a drink. It is thirsty, if I may say so. I am pleased to say that within the past few days I have received news that there has been a rainfall. That is the best news I have received in a long time and I hope there will be ample rain there.

Mr. JEAN-FRANCOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I must first congratulate the hon. members for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier) on his excellent speech. When he moved the address he stated that the Canadian people now feel that they have a saviour. What candour! May I be permitted to quote an extract from La Russie des tsars by Maurice Paléologue, who relates an interview which he had with the great Russian metallurgist and financier Poutilow, in 1917:

> Mr. Paleologue.—However, you have no doubt that Russia will end by once more coming to her senses and making good? After a solemn silence, he spoke again with a strange keenness in his eyes:
> Mr. the Ambassador, I shall answer your question by a Persian metaphor. . . . There once happened in the plains of Khorassan, a severe drought, from which the cattle suffered cruelly. A shepherd, seeing his sheep dwindling away, called upon a famous wizard and said to him: "You who are so skilful and powerful, could you not cause my grass lands to become verdant again? Oh! nothing easier, answered the other. This will only cost you two tomans." On the spot, the bargain was closed. The magician immediately begins his incantations. However, neither the following day nor thereafter does there appear the lavish with reassuring words and advices of patience. Nevertheless the drought still continues, the land becomes utterly arid. Again, the shepherd in despair hurries to the wizard and inquires with anguish: Are you quite sure of causing grass to grow over my meadows again? Absolutely so; I have a hundred times accomplished harder tasks. I therefore assure you that your meadows will recover. . . .

However. I cannot promise that this will happen before all your sheep are dead."

I therefore think, sir, that my colleague has mixed up the saviour with the wizard of Khorassan.

Mr. Speaker, I wish also to congratulate my hon. friend from Stormont (Mr. Shaver), on his very able speech on the address. The hon. member stated that a very small quantity of butter had come into Canada on the basis of 32 cents a pound since this government came into power. My hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Willis) quoted figures yesterday to the effect that from August 1, 1930 to February 28, 1931, 6,375,109 pounds of butter had been imported into this country. From October 1 to the last day of February over 3,690,000 pounds were imported into this country. I replied to the hon. member for Stormont that he could not eat that quantity of butter in a single meal. My remark did not appear in Hansard; I desire to withdraw it and say that in all probability the hon. gentleman has not only eaten that quantity of 6,000,000 pounds of butter for dinner, but he swallowed my remarks as a pousse-café.

During the last campaign the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) demonstrated that he is a great psychologist. He knew that his remarks to the butter industry would be received with favour. During the last campaign we heard considerable talk about New Zealand and Australia. However, in 1928, the Tory party was singing another song. The Montreal Gazette of December 3, 1928, quotes the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) as saying in Victoria:

The trouble with Canada and Canada's side of the Australian treaty is that the present government has never showed a friendly spirit toward Australia.

On March 17 the Prime Minister declared that the relations between New Zealand were at the present time so strained that it would be difficult to understand their being worse. I am sorry he is not in his seat as I would have been pleased to ask him if that condition is good or bad. I would like to know what progress has been made with regard to the present treaty betwen Canada and Australia, as drafted by this government.

At the special session my hon. friend, the member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon), seconded the address in a very able manner. I have known the hon. gentleman for some years and although we take different views in politics we have always been good friends. On that occasion he said that the reason for the success during the last elections was the return of the Conservative party to the traditional policy of Macdonald and Cartier, a policy of common sense, of stability in the order of things, of harmony and mutual respect of the two great races which on the soil of America were given the mission of maintaining civilization and liberty. He continued:

And look what has happened within a few hours. Quebec now holds in its hands the balance of power.

For the present, I give it to the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan). The hon. member for Dorchester continued:

Whether it casts its weight on one side or the other or whether it holds aloof, the fate of the nation depends on its attitude. It is my province which gives to the hon. Prime Minister power and the means of governing. Had she turned a deaf ear to his voice, things would have remained as they were.

On September 9, the Prime Minister replied to those words with the following:

It is a great satisfaction to all of us who are Canadians to have associated with us in government those from the old province of Quebec who have, for so many years, really believed in the principles of the Conservative party.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I hear an hon. member banging his desk. If he is from the province of Quebec will he assume the responsibility for what his government has or has not done up to the present day?

It is stated in the Montreal Gazette of March 20 that the Hon. J. A. Macdonald is going to Havana in connection with the exporting of maritime potatoes to Cuba. Nothing is mentioned of Quebec. I would direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to the need of the potato growers of the province of Quebec. He should endeavour to remove the charge of $3 which has to be paid for the inspection of carload lots of potatoes and vegetables.

I congratulate the Tory members upon their meritorious efforts to defend a bad cause. If the government is playing a game, it is playing it with too many dummies on the front benches. It has been said that this is a one man government. That statement must be true because up to the present the Prime Minister is the only member of the cabinet who has taken part in this debate. Some members of the Conservative party complain at times that we Liberals are very impolite in referring to them as Tories. I congratulate the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) for having had the courage to say:

> I became a good Tory because I became a good Canadian.

He was born on February 21, 1880, and was elected on July 28, 1930. For fifty years and six months was he not a good Canadian? According to his view, has he been a good Canadian for six months only? That is why he has always been treated by all as a spoilt child. Instead of becoming a Tory he should have followed the advice of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and continued to keep his speech in his pocket. If my hon. friends on the other side of the house are ashamed of being referred to as Tories, there is a remedy; they have only to change their policy and then their consciences would be quieted.

The Montreal Gazette of November 29, 1927, contains an excerpt from a speech delivered in Toronto by the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). This speech was delivered after the Winnipeg convention when he was full of enthusiasm and was able to speak in all candour and with frankness. He is quoted as saying:

> I believe the Conservative party has been too honest in the past. Our party in the past has been too honest in strictly defining its position and policy on controversial and sectional questions.

I trust the hon. minister will change his views during Lent in that respect.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) stated that the Conservative party should be given credit for the removal of the cattle embargo. This embargo was removed in 1922, one year after the Liberal administration had come into office. I need not say anything more with reference to this matter, which would appear to be an anachronism.

In referring to farm implements, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) said:

> We shall know definitely just what margin or profit there has been on these articles and whether or not they can be sold at what would appear to be a less prohibitive price.

During the last campaign it was stated in many constituencies in the province of Quebec that the farmers should not complain about the price of farm implements as they were purchased only once in a lifetime and the higher price paid would be more than offset by the price received for butter. It was said also that the labouring man should not complain of having to pay more for butter because he would have more work at higher wages once the Conservatives were put into power. Instead of that we are faced with unemployment.

The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks), speaking yesterday, said:

> I wish to assure the government, as a farmer of the west, that they will have my sincere support so long as they do those things which they have undertaken to carry out.

Nothing has been done yet and we will be watching the hon. member to see if he keeps his word.

In commenting upon labour and unemployment the Montreal Gazette of February 28, 1930, said:

> It is impossible to quarrel with the general position taken by the Prime Minister in replying to the delegation from the western provinces which interviewed the government on Wednesday with the object of securing federal aid for the unemployed, Mr. King was right—

The Gazette says that, not during the election campaign, but six months before the election.

> —in stating that no duty rests upon the Dominion as regards the cost of local undertakings designed for the relief of unemployment. So far as the general question of unemployment is concerned, the responsibilities of the Dominion are quite distinct from those of the provinces and municipalities, and they are, as the Prime Minister reminded the delegation, sufficiently onerous.

During the last election Canada was pictured by the Tories as a land of desolation, although every town visited by the present Prime Minister was a land of promise. The Tories are responsible for conditions in this country being worse now than they ever were. Votes were passed by this parliament under the late administration for work in my constituency, and that money has never been spent.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That is what they did all over.

Mr. POULIOT: They have done that in nearly every parish along the St. Lawrence river in my constituency. The late government, in order to relieve the unemployment situation, was generous enough to vote sufficient sums of money to provide work for the unemployed in my constituency. What happened in connection with Riviere du Loup station is something that I must denounce in this house. I have already given to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Railways a complete explanation of this case.

The facts are these. The money was voted and tenders were called for. Then what happened? The Tory candidate was interested, I suppose, in the tenders that were sent in and the first thing he asked the Minister of Railways was not to take action at once on the tenders that had been submitted to the Canadian National Railway Company. The minister is present in the house and he cannot deny that. Moreover, no action was taken for one month and a half after the tenders wer received.

Mr. MANION: Would the hon. member kindly quote the gentleman's statement asking me not to take action? I do not remember anything about it.

Mr. POULIOT: The fact is that no action was taken for a month and a half, and then when I ask for information from the Minister of Railways, he says that it is not in the interest of the country to tell anything about the Canadian National railway.

Mr. MANION: I think my hon. friend had better quote my words instead of putting into my mouth words that I did not use.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend knows that I like him, and that is why I chastise him. The tenders were due to be received on August 26. They were received on that date, but no action was taken until October 7. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is a very active man and a good minister so far as the administration of his department is concerned; so these tenders must have been held up with his approval; they could not have been held up by the angels.

Mr. MANION: May I inform my hon. friend that the department does not deal with the tenders at all? They go to the management of the railway company. We do not deal with them.

Mr. POULIOT: Then the minister must have corresponded with the railway company in order that it should take no action in the matter in the meantime. In the advertisements for the tenders it was mentioned that the station was to be completed by the end of February, and this delay that took place prevented the building of the station for the reason that the contractors had figured their costs, and therefore the amount of their tenders, on a station to be built in the summer time, and not during the winter, which makes a great difference in the costs. My hon. friend cannot contradict that, because I am giving the facts. I say that for a month and a half the tenders were held up and no action was taken on them. According to my information, the Conservative candidate in my county was interested with one of the tenderers in getting the contract. That is my first statement.

Afterwards, when the minister was on his way to Fort Churchill, the acting minister took the responsibility of refusing to sanction the construction of that station, although enough money had been voted for the purpose. That was done upon the same day that the Minister of Labour was giving away $1,500,000 for works additional to what had been authorized by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways, to the amount of $21,000,000. That man was here in Ottawa on that very same day—the thing was checked—when this government was giving away millions of dollars and was asking the two railway companies to build works not voted by parliament, and amounting to millions of dollars.

Mr. MANION: May I say for the information of my hon. friend that Mr. Dube, the mayor of Riviere du Loup, worked just as hard to get that station built, and has done so ever since, as the hon. gentleman himself. Mr. Dube has been fighting continuously to get that station.

Mr. POULIOT: That is very good, and it helps my argument. My hon. friend says that he tried to get the station. That is true in a sense. He wanted the station to be built, provided that he could have his share in the tender secured by a friend of his, by a partner.

Mr. MANION: He made no conditions to me at all.

Mr. DUPRE: Perhaps I might say—

Mr. POULIOT: I am very glad to see the Solicitor General addresssing the house. I hope that we shall hear from him in this debate.

Mr. DUPRE: My hon. friend appears to be misinformed. His friend, Dr. Dube, the mayor of Riviere du Loup, complained to the Minister of Railways and to myself because that station had not been built, and contrary to what my hon. friend says, he wanted the contract to be awarded to any tenderer so long as it was awarded.

Mr. POULIOT: I take the word of my hon. friend, but that is all humbug.

Mr. DUPRE: Is that the only reply my hon. friend has to what I said?

Mr. POULIOT: Give me a chance, please to conclude my remarks. You will have a chance to speak when I sit down.

Mr. DUPRE: With my hon. friend's permission—

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman cannot interrupt me like this.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has the floor, and he can be interrupted only with his consent. Apart from that, he has the right to continue his speech.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not going to treat anyone gently when my county is discriminated against. The man who did that is at present in South America, the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). I am very glad to learn from the Evening Journal that the hon. member is learning how to box the compass. I will tell you, however, what a friend of mine, an American democrat, wired me from Buenos Aires. "You have a wonderful representative here," he said, "and I am very proud of him. He would be a wonderful emblem for our party in the United States."

I see by the press of December 9, 1930, that the representatives of twenty-eight nations have established twelve causes of unemployment. A few days later, on December 12, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, the former leader of the Conservative party, explained the unemployment situation, and said that we should look into the root causes of unemployment. Then a few days later, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said that he wanted to find the final causes of unemployment. In 1913 Mr. Arthur Meighen was called by the present Prime Minister the "gramaphone of Mackenzie and Mann." I notice that to-day the Prime Minister is but the echo of that Mackenzie and Mann gramaphone. Speaking in the city of Quebec of the Imperial conference, my hon. friend the Solicitor General said that Great Britain is properly considered to be one of the nations of the world which keeps her head solidly on her shoulders. That would seem to be a good reason why the Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking of the proposals of the Prime Minister of Canada, said, "We cannot do it." My hon. friend the Solicitor General spoke about Sir Wilfrid Laurier. He said that Sir Wilfrid Laurier established the British preference as a follower of Sir George Foster. I suggest that the hon. gentleman must have been reading the Toronto Daily Star which states that Sir George Foster is the daddy of them all. It may be that Mr. Arthur Meighen was acting as the daddy of all Conservatives when he made his speech regarding the soviet policy of this government recorded in the papers of February 9, before it was defined by the government.

But what about Saskatchewan? We have been told that charity begins at home. I listened to the able speech by my hon. friend, the brilliant sophomore from Regina (Mr. Turnbull). At one time the hon. gentleman was in favour of unity, and I am pleased to learn that the Conservative party is returning to the principle of unity and harmony. However he did not speak of that when he moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne last session, but he spoke as follows on Wednesday of last week:—

> They (the Liberals) never ran an election in western Canada, at least within the last twenty years, without the most bitter appeals to sectionalism. Elections in western Canada have been fought by my hon. friends opposite on the basis of telling our foreign-born citizens that if the Conservatives should be elected to office in the federal or in the provincial field their churches will be burned down.

That is exactly what happened to St. Joseph's and St. Jean Baptiste Churches in Ottawa. I do not blame the Conservative party for it, but who could say that it was not the Ku Klux Klan which did it.

My hon. friends opposite speak about unity. At a meeting where my hon. friend for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Laurin) was present there was a gentleman named Charles Edward Guerin who spoke as follows:

> Do you still believe that talk about prosperity that he (Mr. Cardin) gave you in 1925 and 1926? he inquired. "Ask your wife; ask your neighbour if they are going to believe those good Liberals again—those good Liberals who allowed their hands to be tied by the west. Are they going to believe our naive premier, Mr. King, who makes treaties and doesn't know where they are liable to lead us?"

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the expression is used "those good Liberals who allowed their hands to be tied by the west." The last government was also blamed for having given several portfolios to the west. Another gentleman whom I personally respect is the hon. the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé). He is a big gun. I will translate to you what he said at St. Eustache in June last, and quote from Le Devoir. This report is dated June 2, 1930:

> The budget was prepared by four western ministers, all four born in England, Messrs. Dunning, Crerar, Stewart and Motherwell. We know those western people are ready to admit into this country all English products provided that they can sell their wheat to England.

Mr. Dunning was born in England, but he could not be blamed for that. Mr. Crerar however was born in Ontario and Mr. Stewart also was born in Ontario. Mr. Motherwell was born at Perth, Lanark county, Ontario. If the hon. the Postmaster General takes part in this debate he ought to apologize to his colleagues in this house for his mistake, whether it is a deliberate mistake or not. Undoubtedly hon. members on the other side of the house read the western papers and if they had read the Edmonton Bulletin of July 30, they would have learned that my hon. friend from East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) is a great friend of the Ku Klux Klan. That body celebrated his victory by the burning of flaming crosses on the side of a hill near Edmonton. They were there with their nightshirts, and may I say that I was very much surprised that the member for Long Lake who spoke this afternoon did not wear his official nightshirt. Probably when applied to a member of this house we should call it a robe, because there must be some dignity attached to the wearing of it. The hon. member for East Edmonton is one of the Ku Klux Klan delegates to whom I wish to refer. There is another gentleman who is very friendly with that body, the one who has been preaching unity. There is the Regina sophomore, who attended the dinner with the nightshirt from Long Lake where a speaker protested against the issue of bilingual stamps. I have referred to two Ku Klux Klan members. Mr. Speaker, I wish to use parliamentary language.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not say that the hon. member for Long Lake is a whited sepulchre. I will not make that statement. In fact he is not, because a whited sepulchre cannot speak.

I wish to dedicate a few remarks to the French members who support the government. I make these remarks to the Tory French members, as they were termed by my hon. friend from Montmagny. I dedicate these remarks to those men who are the backbone of the present government. In that connection I present a financial statement prepared by Messrs. Dawson and Rosborough, chartered accountants, Regina. This statement is dated January 9, 1929, and is directed to the officers and delegates of the Invisible Empire, knights of the Ku Klux Klan, in "klonvokation" assembled. The text is as follows:

I have prepared and attach a statement of the receipts and payments of the imperial office, knights of the Ku Klux Klan since last klonvokation on October 26th, 1927. Our imperial treasurer, Dr. W. D. Cowan, is not in good health—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: That explains his speech.

Mr. POULIOT: The text continues:

—and could not prepare a treasurer's statement, so I have made this statement to take the place of both the financial statement of the secretary and treasurer.

The kloncilium appointed a chartered accountant of Regina to audit the books, he being a member of the klan, but he made other arrangements whereby he will be away until about the end of March and not wishing to place our records in the hands of a non-klansman—

We on this side are non-klansmen, but surely there are some klansmen among my hon. friends opposite. They are cheered by my hon. friend without distinction.

Mr. COTNAM: You have some over there.

Mr. POULIOT: Name them.

Mr. COTNAM: Look them up.

Mr. POULIOT: Name them and challenge your seal. Let me continue this citation:

I have undertaken the preparation of this statement myself and trust same meets with your approval.

Here are some of the entries:

Kloctoken received..	$33,437 42
Dues received..	6,604 41
Overpayments and loans.. ..	873 36
Supplies sold..	1,753 35

Mr. McINTOSH: Put it all on Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: All right. The next entry shows a small sum received from books sold. This is accounted for by the fact that most of them are distributed free of cost.

K.K.K. books sold..	$ 30 00
Receipts from Maloney..	549 90

That apostate is more honest than I thought—he gives the amount of the collection. The entries I have given represent some receipts; now I come to some of the expenditures:

Imperial wizard's expenses.. .	$1,284 50
Imperial kligrappy, salary.. .	2,170 00

The member for Long Lake is the Imperial Kligrappy.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that?

Mr. POULIOT: It is something with long hair. He has travelling expenses when he goes to the various meetings:

Travelling expenses..	$87 57

Then they have payments to imperial office assistants, and there is nearly $300 for kloncilium and klonvokation expenses, and also payments for office furnishings and janitor service. Why have a janitor? The Kligrappy could have performed that service.

Advance re J. J. Maloney meeting libel case and one issue Freedman..	$912 26
Sundry rents for halls for meetings..	631 95

A man named Elliott received $698.15. He has been appointed by the Bennett government a commissioner to investigate charges of political partisanship against federal employees. What chance would a French Canadian have at his hands? The Klu Klux Klan men have a publication called the Klansman. The issue for July, 1930, published at Regina, Saskatchewan, has on the front page among the table of contents:

How Shall I Vote?

Turning to the article I find it contains the following sentence:

At the command of Quebec Mr. King withdrew his pledge from Alberta, sold body and soul to Quebec.

I wonder if the Kligrappy approved of such propaganda or signed the cheque himself. This is a sample of what is being done by the Tory party.

My hon. friend from Montmagny said: Who betrayed the province of Quebec if it was not the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier? I answer him that Laurier's policy was to unite the Canadians of all creeds and all racial origins. The doctrine of the Tory party is divide ut impera —divide to reign.

An hon. MEMBER: Don't believe it.

Mr. POULIOT: You don't believe it, but you are willing to swell the cry against French-Canadians, whereas your duty as their representative should be to kick the Kligrappy out of this house. The Tories are working to destroy the great work of Laurier. But his influence is still such that twelve years after his death the present Prime Minister has to hide himself behind his name in order to try to justify his stand at the Imperial conference last fall. Laurier has been vindicated by those who were so unfair to him during his lifetime. That is the law of compensation. The same thing is occurring to-day. I may instance the abolition of the tariff advisory board. My hon. friends opposite were against it because it was wanted by the Liberals, and they disbanded it, but now they have to acknowledge the necessity of establishing another tariff commission simply because the old tariff advisory board did such good work and was absolutely necessary in the scheme of things. We on this side do not wait until the leader of the opposition dies to support his policy. We support him while he is alive because his policy is sound. It is a great pity that those who have eyes to see do not see.

Mr. GOTT: Here is one who does see.

Mr. POULIOT: I put this question to my hon. friend opposite: how did you escape from Jack Miner's bird sanctuary?

Mr. GOTT: That is just as sensible as your remarks during the last forty minutes.

Mr. POULIOT: That is the greatest compliment that I could possibly receive. Who has betrayed the province of Quebec? Who has betrayed Canada? The betrayers are those who sit on the other side and their supporters, the Ku Klux klansmen in the ranks of their party. My hon. friends opposite are now doing tardy justice to Laurier. We support his successor as leader of the Liberal party while he is alive because his policy is sound. I am confident that some of my friends to your right, Mr. Speaker, will live long enough to admit that after Laurier the greatest Canadian prime minister is the present leader of the opposition, Mr. Mackenzie King.

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as representative of a Quebec riding, I should express myself in French. However, desirous as I am that my remarks be understood by the English-speaking members, I shall take the liberty of speaking English, although I am not quite familiar with that language.

I have just been saying in French that as a member from the province of Quebec I should prefer to speak in my mother tongue, especially as my knowledge of the English language is very limited; but as I wish the English-speaking members to understand what I am about to say I hope they will take into consideration my inadequate knowledge of their tongue.

Hon. members opposite have criticized the policy of the government, especially the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the short address he made. His principal argument was that this is a "one man government." We have also been told about the new blasting methods, and they have been compared, unfavourably, with the conciliatory approach of the right hon. gentleman when he was in office. We have heard about secession talk in the west. There has also been criticism of the Russian embargo, and of course the policy of protection has been assailed. I am not exaggerating when I say that at least 75 per cent of hon. members on the other side who criticize protection are just as sound protectionists as we on this side. But it is a well known fact that the Liberal party for the last twenty-five years has been in the habit of upholding protection when in office and denouncing it in favour of free trade when in opposition. So no one is surprised at what we have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite.

I intend to consider in the few remarks I wish to make, Mr. Speaker, some of the matters which have been brought up by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I wish in a few words to follow the very brief argument of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). The remark has been made that this is a one-man government. Surely the leader of the opposition has paid a great tribute to the Prime Minister in making that remark, because if he alone is responsible for everything this government has done during the short period it has been in office, he is still a better man than we Conservatives thought he was, and we thought quite a lot of him. But the leader of the opposition is much worried about it, and I should like to relieve him of some of his troubles in that regard. I should like to suggest to the right hon. gentleman that the people of Canada are not going to bother their heads very much about finding out whether this is a one-man government or a party government, so long as the government administers the affairs of Canada in the best interests of all the citizens of our country. I should like to suggest to the right hon. gentleman also that this is a matter which primarily concerns the Conservative party, so he need not worry about it so much. He might better devote his efforts to his own party; he might try to conciliate the views of the free trade wing of his party from the west with those of the protectionist wing of the east.

Then we have heard about blasting methods, so let us compare them with the conciliatory methods of hon. gentlemen opposite. For the last nine years this country has been given a mixture composed of a large percentage of conciliatory approaches; a little bit of "down on your knees"; and quite a large proportion of "do not provoke the Yankees." The leader of the opposition mixed up that medicine and gave a little dose of it to Miss Canada about every month during the nine years he was in power. What was the result? After nine years of this medicine most of our factories were closed, because Canada had become the dumping ground of the world. At the beginning of that nine-year period agriculturists in Canada were exporters of their goods, but at the end of that period they had become importers of agricultural products, to the extent of importing 50,000,000 pounds of butter during the last year the late government was in office. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, why not try some of those blasting methods referred to by the right hon. leader of the opposition and see what the result will be?

The right hon. leader of the Liberal party seems to speak of these methods as if they were new discoveries but, Mr. Speaker, they are very old. I would like to remind the right hon. leader of the opposition of a certain passage in the Bible, which I hope he has not forgotten. Some two thousand years ago our Saviour went to the temple in Jerusalem and found within it dishonest merchants. What did He do? Did He try these conciliatory methods? Did He go to those gentlemen, pat them on the shoulders and say, "My dear sirs, will you please go outside and carry on your commerce?" No, Mr. Speaker, He did not do that. He took a whip that happened to be around and whipped them out of the temple, and while He was doing so he said, "My house is a house of prayer, and you have converted it into a cave of iniquity." This seems to me, Mr. Speaker, pretty much the same idea as that behind the blasting methods referred to by hon. members opposite. The right hon. leader of the opposition does not need to worry; if this government gives the people of this country the prosperity to which they are entitled—and which this government will give them—they will not bother whether blasting methods are used or whether conciliatory methods are adopted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come to the embargo on Russian goods. The right hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) criticized that embargo, and judging from what they said this embargo never would have been put on if the late government had been returned to power. The hon. member for South Battleford said Canada had lost millions of dollars by turning down this offer. I shall not endeavour to answer that part of his sepech, because the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) reminded us that bread and meat are not the only things in this world. The hon. member for Montmagny said the Prime Minister spoke in the name of civilization, but I shall go even further; I say the Prime Minister spoke not only in the name of civilization but in the name of Christianity. As soon as the people of Canada learned of the decision of the government, from Liberals and Conservatives from one end of Canada to the other congratulations and messages of approval reached the government. Strange to say, however, we did not hear anything from the Liberal members representing Quebec constituencies. Public opinion in Quebec was so unanimous that the legislature of that province passed a vote approving of the embargo placed against Russian goods by this government, but still hon. members from Quebec sitting on the opposition benches have not even mentioned it. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) has spoken during this debate; he is quite prominent in the ranks of his party, but he closed his lips on that question and spoke not a word about it. The hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Brasset) and the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) both spoke, but neither mentioned this subject.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think the hon. member is not quite fair. I said a word about it the other day during the course of my remarks.

Mr. GOBEIL: If I am wrong I apologize. But I thought I was correct in stating that the hon. member did not mention it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I did mention it.

Mr. GOBEIL: I cannot remember that the hon. member approved of it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I did.

Mr. GOBEIL: I may be wrong there too, but that is my recollection. Now, the electors of the province of Quebec would like to know from the Liberal members of that province whether or not they approve of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King). May I suggest to them that they might just as well speak now because they will have to sooner or later. Here is another instance where the leader of the opposition might direct his efforts to the adjustment of difficulties within his family; if he does he will perhaps get better results than he is likely to from criticism of the so-called one man government.

Let me also mention another omission on the part of Liberal members from the province of Quebec who have already spoken. I refer to the question of immigration. From several provinces in late years complaints have come that immigration should be restricted if not altogether stopped, and in Quebec the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) and his newspaper Le Devoir have always been champions of that cause and have always claimed that the policy of the late government was disastrous to Canada. The late government would not listen to these complaints, and one of its ministers, the Hon. Mr. Crerar, always advocated a policy of wide-open doors when he was one of the members of that government. Only a few weeks after this present government came into power immigration was stopped or practically so. Yet what do we find here from Quebec Liberal members? Not a word; silence. None of the Liberal members from that province have even mentioned the matter. I am not so much surprised at that on the part of Liberal members; but I am sorry to say that I was very much surprised that the hon. member for Labelle did not give any credit to the present government for their gesture in this matter. Considering his opinion in the past I was expecting that he would make it a point of honour to approve the government on this question. However, I desire to place myself on record as being perfectly in accord with that measure. And here again Liberal members from Quebec are expected by the citizens of that province to state what opinion they profess on this question, and I hope they will do so.

An hon. MEMBER: We will tell you.

Mr. GOBEIL: Some hon. gentlemen have had a chance before now to state their opinion but they have not done so.

I now come to the Imperial conference. I admit at once that I do not know anything about the matter, and realizing that I am not an authority on the question of the Imperial conference I am not going to discuss it. But I should like to say this much regarding the subject. Permit me to remind the leader of the opposition that when he criticizes the present Prime Minister he criticizes not only the Prime Minister of Canada but, as well, every other government in the sister dominions.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Oh, no.

Mr. GOBEIL: Because every one of them has emphatically endorsed the policy of the Prime Minister of Canada. Is it not strange —and the people of Quebec will remember this—that before the last election the present Prime Minister was represented as an imperialist of the worst kind? He was said to be even worse than a former prime minister, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen—and this is saying much so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned. We were even told that we were going to have a war if the present Prime Minister and his party were returned to power. But what do we see to-day? The same right hon. gentleman is criticized by the leader of the opposition as a traitor to the empire. No wonder hon. members from Quebec who sit on your left, Mr. Speaker, are not so anxious to speak about the embargo; they are not anxious to discuss the Conservative policy with regard to immigration, any more than they care to refer to the stand taken by the present Prime Minister of Canada at the Imperial conference. But they can rest assured that, in this regard also, they will have sooner or later to face the electors of the province of Quebec, and we shall force them to explain their position and to say whether they are for or against these different matters.

Now may I be allowed to say a few words in regard to the unemployment relief legislation. I am not aware of the experience of different members of this house, but I have here, Mr. Speaker, several letters from mayors and secretary-treasurers of different municipalities in my constituency. Every one of these letters complains that the experience has been that too great delays have occurred in the payment of moneys after the work has been done. Permit me to quote a few paragraphs from one of these letters, which will fairly well illustrate the situation. This letter was written to me by a parish priest in my county. I quote a few paragraphs:

In December last, we spent $4,000 out of the $9,000 which had been granted to us. Then we tried to obtain the 70 per cent due by the governments. Our lists were returned. We increased the salaries. Our lists were again forwarded, but no news has been forthcoming for a month.

Will you be kind enough to call at the office of the unemployment committee, Ottawa, and inform me whether the lists for Whitton are there, and when the order will be sent to Quebec to pay.

He states further—and this will greatly interest hon. members on the other side:

Owing to the stand taken by the Dominion government of procrastinating, municipalities are uneasy. They are unwilling to borrow at their own risk, or to carry on the work. Our people are idle for the last two months, to say the least. They are outspoken in their condemnation of Bennett and his confounded law. They put it all in the same bag.

What do the hon. gentlemen think of that? The letter continues:

You will observe that disposition of theirs, when you return in the course of the summer. I trust I am doing you a good turn by warning you. It is well understood that our municipality will not resume work until they have their cheque in hand.

The letter continues:

If you conferred with the people who voted for you in July last, you would be astonished at their present state of mind. On the other hand, opponents are making capital out of this. I had occasion to read a few days ago a letter from Mr. Lacroix, member for Beauce, addressed to Mayor Filion, of Spalding, in which he stated that the grants toward the relief of unemployment would not be paid before spring, after the work is done. And he questioned strongly the good faith of this legislation.

I am sorry the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) is not present. The letter continues:

I bring these facts to your notice in no offensive mood, but to put you on your guard and allow you to satisfy those who complain, and they are very numerous in your riding.

Some people contend that Quebec is purposely setting up obstacles, with a view to showing the inefficiency of this legislation and better pave the way for the forthcoming elections. It is up to you to protect yourself. I cannot conceive why French Canadian ministers, like Messrs. Sauvé and Duranleau do not improve the opportunity of throwing light on the causes of this delay, which spreads discontent everywhere.

In connection with the letter written by the hon. member for Beauce to the Mayor of Spalding, stating that the unemployment grants would not be paid before spring, I made inquiry of the Department of Labour and what did I find? That municipality started work early in December and has been corresponding for the last three months with the government of Quebec and yet the Department of Labour has received no correspondence from the province in regard to this particular work. A certain sum of money was allotted last summer by the commission, to this municipality but the agreement between the government and the municipality has not yet been signed. An officer in the department told me no later than yesterday that if that agreement was not signed before the end of this month the municipality would not be entitled to any money. The hon. member advised the mayor that he had no faith in this law and that the money would not be paid before next spring after the work had been completed. Did he come to Ottawa and make an effort to find out if those statements were correct or if the accounts had been filed? In the face of the statements contained in this letter I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the Quebec government has an organized system to antagonize the citizens of Quebec against the present government in order that advantage may be gained in the coming campaign in that province. I say it is a disgrace that to gain political advantage the provincial government should take advantage of the hardship and poverty of its citizens.

The hon. members of this house have an illustration of Liberal mentality in the province of Quebec. They are willing to do anything to gain political advantage for their party. That is the reason why during the last fifteen years we have had a party which in this house favoured participation in the war to the fullest extent, but which on the hustings in Quebec carried on campaigns of prejudice and indulged in racial appeals.

Before taking my seat, may I say a few words in regard to the policy of this government on tariff matters? Hon. members on the other side do not like to admit that the changes made in the tariff have benefited Canada, especially with reference to dairy products. They will not admit that the eight cent duty on New Zealand butter has helped the Canadian farmer. It is quite true that to-day the price of Canadian butter is not eight cents more than it was last August, but let us compare the situation of the butter producers as it is to-day with what it was previous to the special session last fall. The present price per pound of butter on the Montreal market is 31 to 32 cents; the New York price is 29 cents, and the London price is from 23 to 25 cents. New Zealand butter is quoted on the London market at around these prices. Canadian prices are higher than the New York prices by three cents, and are six cents over the London prices. What was the condition in August last? The Canadian price was 28 cents per pound, the American price was 33 cents per pound and the London price 29 cents per pound. Therefore, since that time the New York price has dropped from three to four cents, the London price from four to five cents, while the Canadian price is to-day three cents higher than it was last August. The Canadian farmer is receiving the full benefit of the eight cent duty put upon New Zealand butter.

These are the figures and anything said by hon. members on the other side will not change them. I am elated to hear members of the opposition speak in the way they do. The more they try to make the citizens of Canada believe that the financial position of this country is not in good condition, the better it will be for us at the next elections.

Who in this house is not a protectionist? We know that the Conservatives are, every one of them, but who among those on your left, Mr. Speaker, are not protectionists? We all know that every member on the Liberal side of the house from Quebec, Ontario and the maritime provinces is a protectionist: The hon. gentlemen in the far corner are also protectionists. When they ask for a minimum price for their wheat, what is that but protection? When they ask for reduced freight rates to bring coal to the central provinces, is not that protection? When the members from the maritime provinces ask for reduced freight rates on their products, is not that protection? Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are all protectionists.

I listened very attentively yesterday to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) and I wish to say to him that I sincerely sympathize with the present condition of the western farmer. I say to all hon. gentlemen in the far corner of the house that there is no reason why we cannot agree because we all want protection from whatever part of Canada we come. The hon. member for Red Deer yesterday mentioned the case of a certain farmer in the west who was in a very critical condition, and said that there was at least something that that farmer should get, and that was employment from his own country. That is exactly what we say, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, there is no reason in the world why gentlemen from the west, from the central provinces, and from the maritime provinces, cannot agree to pass legislation that will assure to Canadian citizens the full home market. Then our farmers will find a market for their goods, and labour in our country will have the opportunity to manufacture the goods that Canadian citizens consume.

Mr. MICHAEL LUCHKOVICH (Vegreville): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to emulate the humour and the wit of the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), but at the present moment I am not in the mood for any humorous subject at all. My main purpose in rising to participate in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne emanates from an earnest and sincere desire to bring to the attention of the government the anomalous situation in which agriculture now finds itself, and to point out the peculiar idiosyncrasy of that human element in society which has so perversely precipitated agriculture to the bottom rung of the ladder so far as prosperity, profit and a decent standard of living are concerned.

At the outset, therefore, I wish to point out to the cabinet members sitting on the government benches that you cannot degrade agriculture and at the same time have prosperity in the other industries. Nor can you have prosperity in the other industries unless the same condition obtains also in agriculture. For if the tiller of the soil, who has been the mainstay of civilization ever since the dawn of ages, and who, like Atlas, has been bearing the burdens of the world through countless centuries, were now to lay down on his job, there is no doubt at all in my mind as to what the result would be. All the other industries would stop, and mankind would go back to primitive conditions.

Many thousands of years ago, when farming as an industry was still unknown, when man led a more or less precarious and predatory sort of existence, wandering from place to place in a murderous quest for food, civilization in our sense of the word was unknown; and why? The reason is obvious. Because in those days there were no settled agricultural communities; and where there are no settled agricultural communities there is no progress, no opportunity for development of a philosophy of life. But when man finally learned how to care for herds and flocks, and to plant seeds, communities began to spring up in which some of the workers supplied food for all, and other workers applied themselves to the different handicrafts, trades and arts, giving rise to a division of labour based on agriculture from which have developed all the numerous activities that make up our present-day modern civilization. This condition could not have been possible had agriculture not supplied the nucleus from which has sprung the progress, culture and civilization which have been left to us as a heritage of the thousands of struggling, but now extinct, generations.

I think it is universally recognized—I am sure it is recognized by all members on both sides of the house— that agriculture in Canada is our basic and most important industry. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Gobeil), who has just spoken, said that he would like to have cooperation between the members on this side and the members opposite. I would like to have that cooperation, especially with regard to freight rates, and especially with regard to agricultural credits and interest rates, as well as other things that I would mention were my time not so limited. Agriculture is our most important industry. In Canada, at least, it constitutes our basic industry; and yet, Mr. Speaker, how vast is the difference in comparative compensation so far as agriculture and the other industries are concerned.

Take the case of agriculture and manufacturing. A general survey of our national wealth, published by authority of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, reveals the following facts for the year 1928:

Farm values (land, buildings, implements, machinery and live stock)	$6,251,081,000
Agricultural products in the possession of farmers and traders	1,801,440,000
	$8,052,521,000
Manufactures (machinery and tools, and estimate for lands and buildings)	$1,356,306,000
Manufactures (materials on hand and stocks in process)	795,775,000
	$2,152,081,000

Although farm values surpass manufactures by about six billions of dollars, the following figures will show the great disparity which exists between the value of production in agriculture and the manufacturing industries:

Manufactures	$3,769,847,364
Agriculture	1,905,311,580

Hon. members will see from these figures that there is a great discrepancy between agriculture and manufacturing. It is not my purpose to exaggerate or to depict a situation which does not exist, but when one realizes that since confederation agricultural distress has never been as great as it is at the present time; and the prices of the implements of agricultural production and the necessities of life were never before so high, while the prices of farm products have sunk to levels far below costs of production, with consequent lack of purchasing power; that farmers have found it impossible to meet their obligations and in many cases to secure the bare necessities of life, and that constant pressure and demands by creditors have promoted the bankruptcy of farmers in the west —when hon. members take cognizance to these facts I am sure they will come to the same conclusion that I came to. It is therefore not difficult to understand that such conditions could easily relegate the industry of agriculture to the level of serfdom and peasantry of bygone days. One can readily anticipate the reaction of the government to a picture of this nature and the inferences contained therein. Undoubtedly hon. members opposite will condemn my remarks as being far-fetched or not in accordance with the facts. I am sure however that my colleagues in this corner of the house, or for that matter all conscientious western members, will substantiate my statement and will agree that I have correctly described the conditions which exist in their respective parts of the country. If, however, the government believes my remarks to be true its proper course would be to give agriculture more substantial relief than it is getting at the present time.

In this respect I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) for the stand he has taken with respect to credits. He has given a lead to his colleagues in the cabinet which should not go unheeded by the government. I believe the hon. gentleman is a brilliant and sincere man who has a great future. The following paragraphs from a magazine article indicates the minister's attitude, in regard to credits:

In the meantime Hon. Robert Weir, federal Minister of Agriculture, has been engaging with the banks in a debate over credits to farmers who have still substantial equities in their farms, own stock and implements and buildings, but who have because of low prices run out of ready cash for winter supplies and spring operations. The strength of Mr. Weir's position is that he was recently out west and while there was given authenticated cases of refusal by banks to loan money even where the security was of a high type. The banks have answered him by challenging him to produce the evidence of what he alleged, but that does not embarrass Mr. Weir, because he has the goods in his office here.

He is taking his time in answering the banks, because he has been invited to speak in Montreal to the Canadian Club, next Monday on the western situation, and to the business men of that city he will quote verse and chapter to prove his assertions.

Mr. Weir's object is not that of developing sectional feeling or of castigating the banks, but of taking away a weapon which he feels may otherwise become a powerful one in the hands of professional western agitators, who are making hay while the sun of prosperity is in temporary eclipse. The federal minister is determined to see that the western farmer who is reasonably entitled to help gets it, and has warned that if the banks will not provide such assistance, someone else will.

By a coincidence, the magazine in which I read the statement of the Minister of Agriculture contains also two excerpts, similar but widely divergent in point of time. I read the following:

The idea that the "farm problem" is something new or peculiar to modern times occasionally gets a jolt when we are permitted a glimpse into the forgotten past. Recently on the site of an ancient city a clay cuneiform tablet was unearthed which recorded the fact that 3,500 years ago one Arilludupti, a Mesopotamian farmer, was forced to pledge his entire farm as security for the loan of three and a half pounds of lead. Whether lead was high in price or farm credit low this farmer was undoubtedly facing a problem, as farmers have faced, and solved, since man first tilled the soil or tamed wild beasts for his own use. The farm problem is part of the struggle of the race, first for existence, then for comfort and now for the multitude of things which go to make up our complex civilization.

I shall now read an excerpt describing an incident which took place in my own district, and which attracted so much attention that even a Chicago paper saw fit to publish an account of it. I quote:

Grain Grower's Dilemma
(Chicago Drovers Journal)

Something less than a generation ago sheep and lambs were so low in price that not infrequently western shippers found themselves indebted to the commission firms that handled their consignment. A Winnipeg, Manitoba, message tells of the similar predicament of an Alberta wheat farmer.

The story concerns a farmer in the Vegreville district of northern Alberta, who was required to make immediate delivery of certain grain which had been assigned to the bank as security for a past-due note. Obedient to the banker's instructions, the farmer forthwith hauled the first load to the elevator, but it was pronounced of low grade and rejected on account of its moisture condition.

The farmer was in a quandary both as to what he should do about his rejected grain and his past-due note, when suddenly an inspiration struck him. He had assigned the grain to the bank. The bank has demanded settlement of his note and, since the elevator had refused to accept the grain for storage, the logical thing to do was to deliver it to the bank.

Accordingly he drove over to the bank, backed up to the rear door, and before police arrived he had succeeded in shoveling the bulk of the grain in on the bank floor. He still has the past-due note and is $25 poorer, this being the penalty exacted for illegal tender.

There is a sequel, however, even to this. Having reloaded the grain, Mr. Farmer was still at a loss as to how he should dispose of it. This problem he solved by dumping it by the roadside as he proceeded back to his farm. Thus the episode would have closed, but for the fact that a neighbour's horse spied the wheat, ate it, swelled up and died. Now the hero of the story faces a suit for damages.

In this instance, Mr. Speaker, both man and horse suffered from the same malady. In the case of the man the malady was due to inflation and deflation of currency, whereas in the case of the horse it was due merely to inflation of the horse's stomach. The difference, however, lies in the fact that while the horse died immediately after inflation of the stomach set in, the man is still eking out a miserable existence under conditions that were brought about by inflation and deflation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to indicate further the farcical situation into which our farming industry has been forced to recede, I read the following article, from Commerce of the Nation, issue of February, 1931. The article is headed Partners in a Great Enterprise, and the text is as follows:

"Agriculture has been the pioneer and developing partner. Without it there would have been no western Canada and no eastern Canada. Agriculture is one of the real foundations of our national prosperity and development."

Senator W. A. Buchanan, at the 1929 convention of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, on "Canada's Economic Partnership."

Agriculture has been a vital factor in the dominion's progress. It has made possible the dominant position of Canada—wherein her foreign trade per head is higher than any other country in the world. Wheat and wheat flour are her greatest single commodity of export trade, constituting more than one-third of her total exports for 1928.

The Bank of Toronto has played its part in the development of agriculture. Its resources of capital and experience, always at the disposal of legitimate enterprises have been available to farmers and farming interests for three-quarters of a century. Loans and credits and friendly cooperation have been given to the Canadian farmer. To-day, in a firmly entrenched financial position—

I emphasize these words:

To-day, in a firmly entrenched financial position, and with an enviable record of service behind it, the Bank of Toronto is of increasing importance to agriculture and to all other ventures of integrity and vision.

No one will quarrel with Senator Buchanan's conclusions with respect to agriculture, or with the statement made relative to agriculture as a vital factor in the Dominion's progress; but when the Bank of Toronto refers to its "firmly entrenched financial position" and its "ever increasing importance to agriculture" in face of the aforementioned contraction of credits and the farmer's lack of purchasing power, its high-falutin magnanimity as expressed in this advertisement appears ludicrous enough to make a horse laugh.

The advertisement, Mr. Speaker, nevertheless is not without some merit—it at least has evoked, wittingly or unwittingly, the admission of the existence of firmly entrenched vested interests in Canada ever ready to play the part of godfather to agriculture. And here is where the rub comes in; it is doing nothing of the kind, for the actual relationship that exists is rather that of stepfather and stepson.

Three thousand five hundred years have passed since the Mesopotamian incident, and yet how similar are conditions to-day. One does not wonder at the terrible hardships of thirty-five centuries ago, but in this supposedly enlightened age of industrial development it is hard to understand why agriculture still languishes in its chronic and seemingly eternal poor man relationship, waiting for the crumbs that fall from the master's table. Indeed with wheat at 35 cents a bushel the farmer is not even getting the crumbs.

One of Canada's chief troubles is a lack of balance between country and city—between agriculture and the other industries. In our present condition we are like a pyramid balanced on its apex, in mortal fear of our industrial structure toppling over and collapsing—which on final analysis is just about what might happen at any time. To prevent such a condition the structure must be overhauled and altered to bring it into proper balance with all the other prerequisites that go to make up soundness, efficiency and stability. Our industrial system must be very badly out of gear when the prices available for agricultural produce fall to unprecedentedly low levels, while the prices of other goods and services remain at pre-war boom levels. I agree therefore with the contention of Business Trend:

That the reduced prices which the farmer has been obliged to accept for his products, while paying relatively high prices for his manufactured requirements, form a situation that demands correction before business in general can return to its former state of prosperity.

Why is it that the farmers of Canada during times of depression must accept heavier losses than the manufacturers? Why is it that manufacturing is being aided through numerous tariff increases and other bonuses, while agriculture is left to shift for itself without being given any corresponding relief? If the farmer asks for a bonus on wheat he is immediately confronted with the argument that a fixed price for wheat is conceded by grain expert, economist, business man and banker alike to be outside the pale of practical politics. But how about the $20,000,000 which we voted last September for unemployment relief in our cities and towns? How about our bonuses to railways, coal mines, the steel and iron industry? What is right for one should also be right for the other. But possibly in this regard, while the government consider it just in the case of the aforementioned industries, they do not give the same degree of recognition to agriculture.

A noted western economist says:

If agriculture is the greatest of Canadian industries—and it is generally acknowledged to be—then all natural conditions should be taken advantage of and all artificial handicaps that may in any way hinder its development should, as far as possible, be removed. By so doing not only would agriculture itself tend to become more permanent and prosperous but as a direct result every other industry in Canada would benefit.

I have great faith in Canadian agriculture. It is a great industry. It can be made still greater; and if the people of Canada generally, farmers as well as business men, easterners as well as westerners, could be made to see the complete picture, could be given a vision that would show them all the varied and interlocking parts of this greatest of all Canadian industries; they would then understand the supreme necessity of cooperating in an endeavour to remove as far as possible, all handicaps in order that it may be placed on a permanent and prosperous basis, that Canada as a whole will be made to prosper as never before.

Other industries there are in Canada most certainly, but none reach the same standing or affect so many people as agriculture; and yet so little is being done to foster this basic industry. It is true that the government, even at the risk of their political lives, are trying to improve conditions by a rigid application of the policy of protection. But the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) surely cannot seriously contend that a high tariff wall will aid an industry dependent almost wholly upon a foreign market for the sale of its produce. It appears to me that the only person who can benefit thereby is the individual who owns a factory or lives on the stock dividends of a manufacturing enterprise; generally speaking it has very little consideration for the western prairie farmer. When one considers that only sixteen per cent of the national revenue is paid by the income tax levied on those privileged classes for whom protection has been primarily intended, and that most of our other taxes are raised by our excise and customs duties, which bear most heavily on those poor classes who are least able to pay, one cannot but feel that protection is an obnoxious form of legalized domestic piracy that allows the individual to rob the state by forbidding importation in order to prevent reasonable competition, and by creating monopolies in which rich men, who care more for coins than for human souls have absolute control.

My advocacy of agriculture as the basic industry of Canada, and my condemnation of protection as the weapon of the vested industries, will no doubt invite a charge of sectionalism; but my reply to those who may harbour such contradictory thoughts is to ask whether they honestly believe that farming is sectional. If my geography is correct, it is the most all-embracing industry in Canada. Show me a single province where agriculture is not a major calling; as for the prairie provinces, the other industries are so insignificant that they may be regarded as an almost negligible quantity. Agriculture is not sectional, Mr. Speaker; it is the most significant national problem which confronts us in Canada to-day, and as such should be given primary consideration in our deliberations during the present session.

In his pre-election speeches the Prime Minister promised to blast a way into the markets of the world and to foster agriculture in Canada. The unfortunate thing about dynamiting a channel to the foreign markets for our wheat, however, is the utter impossibility and futility of Canadian dictation with regard to the price our customers pay and also with regard to the fiscal policy that should be maintained in their respective countries. I do not believe our market in England can be retained by any hypothetical British political upheaval and consequent fiscal change; for it is hardly likely that any overseas government, whether it be Liberal, Conservative or Labour, will ever dare put a tax on food products. Even if the British Isles were gravitating in that direction the Canadian farmer, in his present deplorable state, cannot afford to wait another hundred years for improved trade conditions depending upon a supposedly salutary political and fiscal uniformity in the British countries on both sides of the Atlantic ocean.

I think we can safely discount appeals to sentiment in matters of business. Kith and kin mean nothing in business relationships. As proof thereof, Mr. Speaker, witness the manner in which the British dealers and traders have passed up Canada in favour of the Argentine and Russia. It is all a matter of dollars and cents, the buying where goods are cheapest and the selling where it is most advantageous to do so. In my opinion that is the paramount reason why Russia, the Argentine and other countries have beaten us in the markets of the world. Therefore I say that the only way for the government to blast its way to the markets of the world is by beating our competitors at their own game, and in order to do this we must first successfully solve four problems. The first problem we must solve in Canada is how to produce more cheaply, how to bring about lower production costs. The next problem is how to produce better products, a better quality of exports. The third problem is how to market more economically, bring about better and cheaper marketing facilities, and the fourth is the provision of cheaper credit.

So far as the British market is concerned these fundamental questions apply just as they apply to any other country. For generations we have been accustomed to believe that the mother country should buy from us simply because she was the mother country. In recent years, however, the relationship has been more that of a stepmother. What Great Britain says to us is virtually this: "You are now grown up and it is time to look out for yourself. If you want to sell us anything you will have to do it on the same terms as any other country. You cannot expect to get something for nothing. If you want us to purchase more grain from you you must purchase more goods from us. We want reciprocal trade with you, but that trade must be of mutual benefit to both of us."

If reciprocal trade is the only common ground on which we can trade with Great Britain, Mr. Speaker, the government of the day should forthwith begin to pull down the barriers and handicaps that stand in the way of that trade, so that both countries will give each other what nature intended them to give and exchange their products freely for commodities they need but cannot manufacture or produce economically or in sufficient quantities at home. The proper way to foster agriculture is not by imposing new burdens but rather by lessening those burdens which already exist. What does it avail the Canadian farmer to have the tariff on his machinery raised from 6 per cent to 25 per cent? Undoubtedly the price of a binder is not lowered thereby, and as for the written promises about which this house has heard so much, with regard to the maintenance of existing prices, the western farmers has as much chance of a square deal in that regard as a race horse has of maintaining its usual pace with a dead weight attached to its neck.

If agriculture is to be fostered in Canada it will not be done by tariff increases, which tend to stabilize the prices of manufactured goods at their present high level without a corresponding increase in the levels of prices of agricultural products. While it is true that the grain growing industry cannot be protected by any kind of tariff legislation, it does not follow that the other industries should be given a hand-out which ultimately will have to be paid out of the pockets of the Canadian farmers. Prosperity in Canada can never return unless agricultural purchasing power is restored in proportion to agriculture's importance as an industry. I know this is a big bill for any government to fulfil, but it is nothing more than the economic justice which farmers have always claimed as the inherent right of agriculture. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the men who constitute our ultimate consumers and primary producers, the men who pay greatest proportion of our taxes, our freight rates and our interest, the men whose investment represents the largest part of our tangible wealth, but the earning power of which has remained much lower than that of every other industrial investment and development, have the right to demand through this house the same treatment for agriculture that is being given every other industry.

Let me repeat, Mr. Speaker, that in order to foster agriculture the handicaps which lie in the way first must be removed. One of these handicaps is our taxation system, of which as usual the farmer is made the goat. He pays a larger proportion of our taxes than any other class in Canada and gets hit coming and going in the process. Being an ultimate consumer he has no come-back. Although when he buys a pair of shoes the tax is included he cannot pass on that tax by adding it to the price of the wheat he sells in the markets of the world. Therefore I sincerely hope, in view of these facts, that the government will refrain from making a bad situation worse by increasing the tariff, which will only tend to add to the already over-onerous burden the farmer has to bear.

I should like to say a great deal about freight rates also, but my time is very limited; I understand I have only five minutes left. I am very sorry that the speech from the throne gave no assurance of a decrease in freight rates to meet the depression now existing in agriculture. The farmer not only pays more taxes, more freight rates and more interest than any other class in Canada, but as between east and west the western farmer pays from 2 per cent to 3 per cent more interest than is paid by the eastern business man. Here again the government has a chance to foster agriculture by appropriate legislation which would not discriminate against the farmer. He has been discriminated against through excessive interest charges and his industry is in danger of going on the rocks by reason of an almost total withdrawal of credit.

I do not know what the Minister of Agriculture meant when he suggested that if the banks did not supply the farmer with credit someone else would do so, but I do know that the farmers of Alberta recognize the inadequacy of the existing credit system in meeting the present economic stringency. They believe that adequate distribution of credit is absolutely essential to the carrying on of the agricultural industry, and they recommend the complete nationalization of our credit system. They recommend further:

> That as an immediate measure the federal government take steps to organize a federal reserve bank of issue and discount which bank shall be entirely under government control and shall provide credit at a reasonable rate of interest for all necessary productive and commercial enterprises.
> We are convinced that the above proposal is imperative in order to get away from the present intolerable position in which the credit requirements of the public in general are sacrificed to the professed necessity of the charter banks to protect to the utmost their savings deposits.

This is a resolution which was passed at the farmers' convention in Calgary this January. Now, goods cannot be produced and distributed without the aid of credit; there is no doubt about that. If the banks of Canada, to which this very vital economic factor has been extended as a matter of privilege, refuse to continue giving credit they will wake up some morning to find Canada destitute of goods and the people of Canada rising in their wrath and taking the matter out of their hands and placing it where it belongs, namely, in the hands of the nation, the people of Canada.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I shall deliver my first speech in the house, in French. I first owe it to the riding that I represent and which is composed of a mixed population, the very large majority, of which, however, speak the French language. Moreover, I owe it to the province of Quebec, three-fourths of whose inhabitants are of French origin, and lastly I owe it to my country, one-third of whose people are of French descent. Furthermore, I am only following in the footsteps of my predecessors speaking the same tongue and belonging to the same race when I assert in this house the privileges and rights we possess. My aim is at the same time that the French language be better respected by our English-speaking fellow-citizens and to induce them to learn and speak French. For some time past the harmony which exists among the various races in our country has been debated as well as that existing between the various provinces, the Dominion and provincial governments. Hardly were the speeches of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) and the member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) delivered, than we read in the local papers that this harmony is not so general as it was contended in the house, and that even, certain of these gentlemen were responsible for the existence of dissensions among us. I took the trouble to cut out from the Ottawa newspapers clippings with reference to certain remarks made by some citizens who are not particularly fond of our language and race. In the Droit of March 18, 1931 we read under the heading:

The Orangemen of Ontario score French teaching in public schools.

At a meeting on Tuesday, the Grand Black Chapter of Ontario East, of the Royal Black Knights of Ireland, at to-day's session protested against the teaching of French in public schools in Russell county and northern Ontario, and decided to petition the Ontario government to have this discontinued.

The chapter also objected to any proposals for the establishment of Roman Catholic institutional schools for boys, the upkeep of which is to be a charge on the funds of the public for education.

This clipping is published in another newspaper The Evening Journal of the same date, March 18, 1931. A few days later, March 20, we again witness our good friends begin anew in North Bay: La Presse of March 20, publishes the following news: "The Orangemen demand the repeal of the separate school privileges."

North Bay, Ont., 20 (P.C.).—The delegates to the meeting of the Grand Lodge of western Ontario, Orangemen, adopted yesterday, at their closing session, a resolution requesting the repeal of all the amendments to the Separate School Act since 1863, which grant additional privileges to the separate schools of the province, and also requesting that all possible efforts be made to oppose other amendments having in view the granting of special privileges.

The French-Canadians, especially those in the district of Montreal, according to newspapers, thought fit to also protest against the action taken by the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan who had the crucifix or all religious emblems removed from the schools, and forbade priests and nuns teaching in the province, to wear their religious garb. The St. John the Baptist Society of Montreal adopted a resolution protesting against such action on the part of the Prime Minister of that province. I did not think it—it is true I lack experience—that hon. members of this house took part in such movements. I even was unaware that the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull), during the elections of July, 1930, had also personally taken part in the struggle against the French language and the Quebec province. I was in error. In the Regina Star, of May 29 last, certain remarks of Mr. Turnbull were published, they were not very flattering for his colleagues of Quebec. May I quote the Droit of March 20, 1931. This newspaper publishes and comments on the following article taken from the Regina Star of March 29 last:

Mr. Turnbull stated that the French influence of Quebec was thrown in the scale against the Conservatives because of the measures taken by the provincial government to free the schools of influences which are inconsistent with the public school system, and in support of this proof, Mr. Turnbull in a dramatic flourish, waves above his head a copy of the Patriote de l'Ouest published in Prince Albert. This newspaper, he states, advertises that an examination in French will be held in the schools of all French-speaking districts of the province. Prizes will be offered for the best papers following the examination, with the idea of propagating our beautiful language.

This newspaper, he continues, publishes a list of donations of these prizes, and many of them are residents of the province of Quebec.

This list covers more than a column. These are the proofs. It is evident that the struggle to free Saskatchewan from the domination of Quebec has only started.

And this is the same gentleman who, here, in the house, stated that harmony seemed to reign and if prejudices had been roused, that was attributable to French-Canadians in Quebec. You are aware, as the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) stated that man does not live by bread only. May I be permitted to use a rather vulgar expression, the member for Regina is not content of living on bread, but he preys on the French and the Canadians. If by carrying on this fight against the use of the language of one-third of the people of Canada these gentlemen were increasing their influence in this country; if these tactics had a bearing on their business transactions or helped to develop their mind or intellect, I would understand their stand. To my mind they are absolutely losing their time. It has often been stated both in English and French, that the French-Canadians or the Canadians of French extraction were here to stay. As we must live together, why not live in peace. So far as I am concerned, I pledge myself not to rouse the prejudices against the English language or against those of my fellow citizens who have a different turn of mind, and, do not speak the same language. I further pledge myself that I shall do my utmost to always maintain the most friendly relations, so that we may cooperate together in the progress of our country.

Mr. Speaker, my predecessor, Dr. Fontaine, who died some time previous to the elections, and who sat in the house from 1917 to 1930, is deserving of a special mention in my first speech. When, for the first time I entered this chamber, I could not help thinking of our great historical names—Conservatives as well as Liberals—which have shone by their ability, eloquence and good will in this house. I also thought of those whose knowledge was not so extensive and whose attainments were less, but who gave proof of much good will and thereby contributed largely to make our country greater and more beautiful. I believe that my predecessor was one of these men. He had lived all his life in the midst of the working classes, he knew them well and was devoted to their interests. He was a medical man by profession. In our district he was designated as the doctor of the poor.

In 1922, when the Liberal party returned to power, there existed in this country an economic situation, in many respects, comparable to the one existing to-day. The government of that day had not, I think, an absolute majority, but it got down to work and carried on the affairs of Canada in keeping with the revenues or the taxes which the people were able to pay. Each year it accumulated surpluses and by degrees reduced the debt which was crushing our country. Those nine years of Liberal administration were without gainsay years of prosperity. I may be told that this did not entirely rest with the then government. There is probably some truth in this, the same as we cannot hold the governments entirely responsible for the depression which exists to-day. We saw, during those years, surpluses accumulate, the debt diminish, taxes decrease and the balance of trade favoured us. This favourable trade balance had increased during at least the last five or six years which preceded 1930. In 1930, owing to the crash on the exchange, the lack of a market for our wheat, over production, unreasonable expenditures and war debts, an economic and world-wide depression began to be felt. At the outset of 1930, the people began to be uneasy. It was necessary to find means to meet this crisis which was threatening. In 1930, after a short session, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) decided to appeal to the country. Up to then, everything seemed normal in Canada. The political campaign started. The Conservatives, during that campaign, instead of discussing the administration of the previous nine years, chose certain subjects with which they were perhaps more familiar or at least subjects they preferred discussing because they deemed them more likely to capture votes. They spoke particularly—especially in the last weeks—of unemployment, of the economic depression, and a little on the Imperial conference.

So intent were they on discussing unemployment that even those who had jobs felt somewhat uneasy. One must not lose sight that, even to-day, notwithstanding the large number of unemployed, there are still people who have work. At the time, I cut out of a magazine a caricature which oddly illustrates the effects of this campaign of hard times. Unemployment and despondency were the subjects of discussion, it was even said that the country was practically going into bankruptcy and that it would surely get there if the Liberal party were maintained in power. I cut out, as I said, a cartoon which aptly illustrates the effects of this campaign on the morale of our working classes. This caricature represents a worker appearing before the owner of an establishment to ask for leave of absence. The owner whose industry probably was doing well, inquired on what grounds he applied for such leave; the worker answering: Yes, sir! I'd like to get off to attend an unemployment demonstration. This worker had a job, only he wished to get off so as to be posted on the meaning of unemployment about which there was so much talk.

Owing to this kind of campaign the Conservative party increased their political capital, but lowered the morale and energy of the people; they destroyed instead of rebuilding.

Since the advent to power of the Conservatives our French-Canadian ministers seldom have spoken in the house, yet they are heard every day at banquets. The aim of all their speeches is: to endeavour to raise the morale of the people, of those who are in need, the unemployed. They endeavour to soothe the ills which they themselves, in part, have created, previous to July 28, 1930. And they are anxious that we, on this side of the house, should help to carry out their work. We are ready to cooperate with those in power, however we shall not hide the truth when speaking in the house or in public:

There really exists unemployment—there is no denying it. I reside in an industrial town, and every day I notice that there is unemployment. The number of unemployed was even fixed at 1,500 in September, with a prospective increase to 2,500 by January. After January, the number was by all means to decrease owing to the $20,000,000 which had been voted. Lately, by curiosity, I inquired at the city hall and in other quarters, and I came to the conclusion that the number of unemployed had not decreased in our town, notwithstanding the money expended on public works.

No one opposed the vote of $20,000,000; however, we took exception when the Dominion government forced the province of Quebec to expend—without being consulted or having a word to say in the matter—an amount of over $4,000,000, and when the government forced the city of Hull, whose power of borrowing is exhausted, to spend an amount of nearly $250,000. There would have been no criticism had the work been undertaken at an early date, so as to give work to the unemployed in December and January, when the crisis was at its height! But no, this work was put off till these last weeks.

I am aware that the Dominion government put up an amount of $100,000 for the construction of a bridge between Hull and Point Gatineau. There was quite a controversy between the hon. Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson)—who has no seat in this chamber—and a number of gentlemen in my riding. A controversy not between the minister and the representative of the riding—personally, I have never heard about it—neither with those who held some authority, but with ordinary citizens. There was an attempt to blame the Quebec government for the delay in carrying out the work. I am sorry that I have not here the famous letter which the Minister of Labour wrote to a person in my riding, in which he says:

> I am not responsible if the work does not begin in November, we granted $10,000; it is the province of Quebec which is now at a standstill.

The construction of that bridge could not be carried out before the Minister of Public Works, at Ottawa, approved of the plans, and this was delayed for two months. The work only began a few weeks ago, after the plans were approved.

It is said that the unemployment situation has improved, thanks to the grant of $20,000,000. I think so. Everybody will admit that it helped. However, our Conservative friends, especially the Prime Minister, had promised us during the elections, that it would not be charity, but work which he meant to give to all who wanted to work. In my own town, there must have been $50,000 distributed to the poor in charity and public assistance. That was never heard of before. From this $20,000,000, probably there was direct assistance given out. The pledges given before the elections were certainly not fulfilled. In Hull, the number of those maintained through public charity more than doubled this year. When, in 1921 and 1922, there existed an economic crisis, we did not witness the army of unemployed who now wait each morning at the city hall, so as to obtain a few hours of work. And when they succeed in getting a job which lasts fifteen days or three weeks, out of six months, it is most they can expect from the municipal, provincial and Dominion grants. From the Labour Gazette of January we glean that work was supplied to 196,000 persons, but no mention is made that these 196,000 persons worked but 15 to 18 days, from September or October. Those who can subsist on the earnings of 18 days work in six months time cannot live very comfortably. When we are told that the $20.000,000 was a good cure, I must strongly protest. In my own riding it did not give the relief expected and necessary.

Mr. LAFLECHE (Translation): Mr. King stated that there did not exist any crisis previous to the election.

Mr. POULIOT (Translation): The worst crisis was the one which brought about the return of the hon. member.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): I cannot recall having read that the leader of the Liberal party had contended that there was no crisis. We even contend that it was a world-wide crisis. Moreover, intelligent people know this to be a fact. One had but to inquire and read so as to verify that this crisis existed throughout the world, but was specially felt among the nations with a high tariff. It was in Australia, in the United States and Germany that the people suffered the most from the economic crisis and, to-day, it is still in Australia that the people suffer the most from the effects of the crisis. If we refer to the newspapers of these last days, we find that in January, in the United States, where high protection existed even before the Conservatives raised our tariff in September, there were six million unemployed. We never contended that there was no crisis, however, we maintained that the Canadian government was not to be held entirely responsible for that crisis. During his campaign, for a time at least, the present Prime Minister, contended that this crisis was caused by the Liberal administration; he even stated in one of his speeches:

> Nine years of wasted effort, before the great betrayal. Can you permit these men to govern you any longer? There should be no unemployment in Canada with a proper fiscal policy.

Some time later, after the election of July 28, it was necessary for the government to take steps to relieve unemployment. The Minister of Labour called a meeting of all the representatives of the various provinces so as to gather information on the unemployment situation in their respective provinces. In his speech at the opening of the conference, the minister rather changes his views and admits, the elections being over, that the unemployment situation was not due to the bad administration or fiscal policy of the Liberal government. The following is his statement:

> "I do not for a moment suggest that the present unemployment is due to any governmental activity or lack of governmental activity. Unemployment is not purely a Canadian problem. It is world-wide."

He therefore tells us after the elections, that it was a world-wide problem. They were in power, it behooved them to relieve unemployment. Did they do so? Not at all. They have but one remedy which they wish to apply in all circumstances. Did they apply it? Did they decrease unemployment? Did they fulfil their pledges? Any serious-minded man must ask himself whether those who were to perform miraculous cures succeeded, and whether their eight months of administration gave beneficial results to the people.

Did the raising of the tariff in September produce the results expected? I frankly admit that I mingle quite a little with the people. In my riding the working people outnumber the others; the professional class is limited; those in trade are not very numerous, because we deal largely with the capital; there are also manufacturers. Since the raising of the tariff in September I have heard but one manufacturer say that it had had good results. I highly respect Mr. Drury who is the president of the largest industrial company of my city. Some time ago Mr. Drury was present at a banquet of the chamber of commerce in Hull and I had the privilege and pleasure of being seated next to him. I was unaware that politics would be broached at that meeting. However, the last part of his speech was very touching. He also tried to raise the morale of the people of Hull. In closing his remarks he said: "We already feel the beneficial results of the raising of the tariff." The following day, quite upset, and to seek information, I consulted many of the unemployed of the city and not one had found work since the raising of the tariff; they were still among those who needed direct assistance. The upward revision of the tariff has been of benefit to Mr. Drury, I have no doubt. He is a financier, a business man, a manufacturer. I know that he profits by it and I am happy that some of our fellow citizens can reap some advantage from high duties; however, I think that the Conservative government, at the present moment, should also consider the citizens of cities who do not benefit or, if so, very little, from high tariff.

The government would be doing useful work by teaching the people how to make use of business-like methods in their affairs, just as the King government carried on during nine years, that is, spend less than its revenue and economize in order that, when Conservative governments turn up, there may be some savings to face poverty and unemployment which will always be present. Has high tariff increased business? I do not think so. It increases it in the case of some industries which profit by it, but it is not less true that other industries suffer by it. Of late the discount on imported cars was increased. That was to help our manufacturers. All American automobile companies were to establish themselves in Canada. None have come yet that I know. Some seem to forget, notwithstanding the protests of automobile importers, that this legislation or higher tariff is detrimental to a number of our people. Some seem to forget that the automobile importers had invested a capital of $30,000,000, that there were 10,000 employees in that industry and that by increasing the tariff their sales would decrease. Many of these automobile importers will have to discontinue business and thereby increase the number of unemployed. We have all received the statement of the Canadian Automobile Importers Association, where much information can be found. The above figures are taken from that statement. In certain circles it was not thought that the automobile importers would have to discontinue their operations. They were in error. In the Droit of March 18, I note the following passage:

W. H. MacIntyre, general manager of the Ottawa Car Garage and the Ottawa Car Manufacturing, stated this morning to the Droit that his company would discontinue the sale of Marmon and Nash automobiles as well as the Federal trucks. He explained that the sales branch yields no profit owing to the recent tariff restrictions on automobiles of American make sold by the Ottawa Car Garage. Mr. MacIntyre did not wish to further specify.

The rumour spread that the large establishments of the Ottawa Car Garage and the Ottawa Car Manufacturing Company would soon close their doors. Mr. MacIntyre gave out that it was false and that only the Sales Branch of the Ottawa Car Garage, would be discontinued. The garage itself, and the automobile repair shops would carry on. About fifteen men are affected by this decision.

Should this business close, necessarily employees will be thrown out of work, and they will have to wait, in order to get a job, that the American companies establish factories in this country. They must suffer in the meantime. This proves that the tariff, while it helps on the one hand may be on the other detrimental.

I also found out that the mills of the Ste. Anne Paper Co., at Beaupré, will close their doors at the end of the month for an indefinite time. The superintendent of the mills says that this decision will result in increasing from 300 to 400 the number of unemployed. It is thought that these mills will remain closed for a year.

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Is that the wish of the hon. member?

Mr. CASGRAIN (Translation): The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) stated during his election campaign that the workingmen would have work every day.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): It is the outcome of Taschereau's policy.

Mr. FOURNIER (Translation): I have but one suggestion to make before I close my remarks, and it is not a personal one. I came to the conclusion, after the election of July 28 last, that I had certain responsibilities to discharge which I had not previously to that date, and I have endeavoured in the meantime to obtain information. I am one of those new members who have much good will but little knowledge of politics, however, I hope to acquire some before my mandate ends, and I shall fulfil my duties to the best of my ability. I think that, during the period of prosperity that we have enjoyed of late, it would have been wise to teach economy to the people under the influence of manufacturers, industrial firms, speculators, advertisements, by campaigns known as "high pressure salesmanship" and by other means, conditions were so upset that the people, the workers who had plenty of work did not restrict themselves to their budget but spent extravagantly. I think it behooves men in public life to teach the people to develop in family life the spirit of thrift and to teach them to live according to their means. If family life is on a solid foundation in a country or city, you may rest assured that the city itself will have a wise and economic administration. And to carry this a step further the well administered city will help toward improving the administration of the province and so on until we reach the government of the country. However, I do not think that it behooves only men in public life and the government to carry on this education. It behooves the business man to do a little of this education among his employees. I am perhaps wrong, but by what I gather from the newspapers, heads of industries, manufacturers and business men seem to have one aim in view, that of producing and selling so as to draw dividends at the end of their financial year—and dividends as large as possible. They endeavour to increase their turn-over, forgetting the human element which enters in their various industries and especially having in mind—in a selfish manner, their capital, which is to bring them large returns.

I do not know whether Henry Ford is persona grata with the members of this house, however, he sometimes says things which are full of common sense. Some time ago, I cut out the following passage from one of his articles:

The foundation of prosperity is the family. Each family is, or should be, its own business manager. The material affairs of a family are as much a business as the affairs of an industrial corporation.

He added that many families understand this but that the number is not sufficiently large.

And, further on, another passage of this article strongly drew my attention:

The people can be no more extravagant than business reduces them to be; they can go no farther into debt than business permits them to go; they can gamble only when business—or something that passes under that name—provides the opportunity.

That is to say that it places on business men the responsibility of not giving the people the necessary education in prevision of years of depression. I think that this situation will always exist in the world; periods of depression will follow periods of prosperity, and if the people are well prepared by educational campaigns, we shall have accomplished a great step towards the general welfare of our country.

I do not wish to further delay the house. I have a few words to add in support of the remarks of my colleague from Ottawa (Mr. Chevrier) with reference to the civil servants. During the Liberal government regime, all seemed quiet in this circle of society. The civil employees carried on, assured that their salaries would be paid, and that at the end of the year they would be given their statutory increase. They lived in peace of mind which, of late, seems to have been disturbed. The present government, I do not know whether it is in a spirit of economy or whether with a view of replacing the staffs of some departments—allow certain information to leak out to the effect that three hundred temporary employees in some departments only, will soon be thanked for their services. I do not know whether the government will do so. I openly state that this will in no way help in the good administration of the various departments and in no manner will it help to relieve unemployment existing in our district.

There is also talk of retiring those who have reached the age of 65. It is sometimes among these persons that the most efficient employees are to be found, owing to their long experience. I think that one should move slowly in this connection. I am told—I have no personal knowledge in this matter—that already a deputy minister who had reached the age of 65, has been retired, and, by the irony of fate, he was replaced, it seems, by a person who has reached 70 years. I question whether it is for the better administration of that department.

The suppression of the statutory increase for all those who receive more than $2,500, is talked about. I shall point out that the more the salary of an employee is high, the greater his obligations to society, both as regards to his family and himself. I do not think that the time is ripe to economise—in salary increases and especially to retire persons who can still render great services to the country owing to their knowledge and experience. As long as I have a seat in the house, I shall closely scrutinize whether the dismissals are really justified.

I might, moreover, discuss the threats of dismissals made to postmasters and some employees of my riding, but I think that later on I shall have the opportunity of debating these questions.

In closing my remarks—as my leader so soundly stated last week—I believe that in a government, there is not only the material side, the practical side of affairs to consider, but there is also the brains, the intelligence and things which pertain to the mind. Our aim is to have a country as great and beautiful as any country in the world, composed of two great races which will one day love one another if they learn the two official languages of the country, and all my efforts will be directed in that direction.

Mr. C. N. DORION (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it is the custom of parliament to congratulate His Honour, the Speaker of the House. I also wish to fufil this agreeable duty, and thank the house for having elected you. You have proved, in a most striking way, that you were endowed with the required qualities: intelligence, moderation and impartiality. However, what has struck me more, is your knowledge of the two official languages and the use you make of both in presiding over our debates. This feature reveals a breadth of view and a deep rooted sentiment of true Canadianism.

The hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne), your deputy, knows too well the esteem in which I hold him, it is therefore unnecessary for me to remind him of it. For over fifteen years, in our district, we have fought the same battles, pursued the same ideal with the firm desire to shake off the yoke of prejudices and to restore in our midst the sound principles of order, progress and peace.

It is also a custom, sir, to thank the artisans of one's victory. I shall do it with so much the more pleasure and pride, knowing that I had the help, during the campaign, of very brilliant political leaders and such outstanding speakers as the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King).

I had to battle as you are aware, against Mr. Lavigueur, then and still mayor of the city of Quebec, moreover member for Quebec-Montmorency in the late parliament. This gentleman held therefore two mandates. That was a sufficient reason for the right hon.

leader of the opposition to denounce, here in Ottawa, one week before the vote, the double mandate, and appealed to the electorate of the capital of the Dominion to vote against Mayor Plant. Evidently the then Prime Minister, now the leader of the opposition, had before him the example of my predecessor, and he had derived from it precious lessons for his party. As close to 5,000 unemployed in the city of Quebec awaited the return of their mayor, my constituents deemed it their duty not to reelect him, complying, at the same time, with the wishes and the voice of the right hon. leader of the opposition. My sincerest thanks.

The hon. Prime Minister of Quebec contributed his share, not only by his speeches but also by the presence of his lean figure. Among the 25 parishes which are comprised in the Quebec-Montmorency riding, about 10 are included in Montmorency which is represented in the provincial legislature by Mr. Taschereau. It is especially there that he concentrated his energies, it is there that he constructed his legendary bridge which must some day link the northern coast of the river with the Isle of Orleans and over which project my predecessor was successful in building at least four elections.

Of course they were pledges, and nothing more. Nothing more was needed. The two parishes that this election bridge was to link gave me a very substantial majority.

It was also in that part of my riding that the Prime Minister of Quebec announced the Indian war, reorganized the riding, and denounced the present Prime Minister of Canada, as one of the fiercest opponents of our race, our language and traditions.

The following are a few examples of this eloquence profusely used by this politician who, in certain quarters, is looked upon as a great statesman. In the Soleil of Quebec, July 18, 1930, we read:

> On the 28 inst. the Liberal party will be in power and you would have, you from Quebec county, Mr. C. N. Dorion to represent you? No, think of our race. We have too many fine traditions, too many ideals to safeguard that we should place our trust in Mr. Bennett, the right hand of Mr. Anderson who abolished the crucifix in schools and told the good nuns: "You cannot teach in your religious garb."

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): It is a fact.

Mr. DORION (Translation): There is no truth in the statement as made by the Prime Minister of Quebec.

Mr. FERLAND (Translation): Does the hon. member approve or not of the acts of Anderson?

Mr. DORION (Translation): I shall say to the member for Joliette that he will have my answer in due time and place.

Here is what was said at Ste. Anne de Beaupré by Mr. Taschereau who, on this occasion, was accompanied by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain), as published in the Gazette of Montreal, of July 21, 1930:

> "The first thing Mr. Anderson did was to attempt to take the crucifixes out of the French schools of that western province," said Mr. Taschereau. "When Mr. Bennett went to Saskatchewan, who stood by his side on the platform? It was the same Premier Anderson. Are we to place our French Canadian rights, our traditions and future welfare in such hands?
> "You French Canadians standing before me, you mothers and fathers, do you realize the responsibilities upon your shoulders? It rests with you how your children should be brought up. You are responsible for their education and spiritual welfare. You must see that they in turn become worthy members of our race. Think well before you decide which government you endorse."

This text needs no comment, for the greater shame of the one who uttered it.

The success which I obtained in that part of my riding is a worthy answer to this high-bidding for votes and these paltry appeals to prejudices, a method in honour in the Liberal party of the province of Quebec for the last thirty years and of which Mr. Taschereau was one of the first to start.

Mr. RINFRET (Translation): I do not wish to be discourteous towards the hon. member, however, may I be permitted to point out to him that if it be wrong to say these things, it is still worse to do them as it was done by Mr. Anderson from Saskatchewan.

Mr. DORION (Translation): What we find wrong, sir, is to ascribe to the right hon. Prime Minister of this country intentions attributable to another political man in Canada.

The hon. Senator Beland also paid us a gracious visit in the course of the campaign. It was at St-Gregoire de Montmorency, a village of 6,000 inhabitants grouped around a cotton mill. The hon. senator made a splendid speech and also spoke, like all the others, of war and conscription, lauded the benefits of the Dunning budget, without however mentioning the clauses referring to textiles. A few days later, a number of the people of this village learned that the brilliant speaker was in the county of Beauce and had declared himself against all customs duties on textile imports. Such skill could not pass unnoticed.

A splendid Conservative majority was gained in that Liberal fortress. I cannot but help thanking the hon. senator.

As to the Hon. Lucien Cannon, who also paid us a visit, I shall refer you, sir, to the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) who is better informed than anybody with reference to the precious help Mr. Cannon was to him and to all of us in the district of Quebec, by his charges and appeals to prejudices, conscription and war.

However, sir, the all important factor of our great victory in Quebec, was the strong personality of the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada. Through his truly Canadian political stand, his extensive knowledge, his economic science, the consistency of his statements both in the east and west, the Prime Minister won the hearts and esteem of my fellow-citizens. It will not be long before he wins their deep gratitude.

Still another factor of our victory was the entry, into the federal arena, of two men who had already played a considerable part in the provincial legislature: the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) and the hon. Minister of Marine (Mr. Duranleau.)

The first, the acknowledged and admired champion of the Conservative doctrines in our province, inspired confidence among a great number of our compatriots. His knowledge and the experience which he acquired in the course of his long political career, the friendship which he has always manifested towards the true champions of his party, the esteem which he has always enjoyed among his own people inspire us whith great confidence.

The wide legal experience of the hon. Minister of Marine, his memorable struggle in the provincial field, were also a precious encouragement for the exponents of the party. I may add, how pleased we were, we hailing from the district of Quebec, of the right hon. Prime Minister's choice in inviting one of our own people, whose ability is known to us, the hon. Solicitor General, to accompany him to the Imperial conference.

I hope, sir, to have the opportunity, in the course of future debates to explain the needs of my province, of my district and riding; but I wish to state now that my constituents, themselves, do not only live on bread. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) for whom I have a deep admiration, although I do not always share his views, knows this quite well, for he came one day, about 1908, in my riding during an election which still lingers in our memory.

[Mr. Dorion.]

My constituents have equally confided in me the mandate of expressing their views, sentiments and opinions on the various questions of a national and economic order which were raised in the course of the last election. These views, sentiments and opinions are also those of 23 other ridings in Quebec, uniting with the 112 ridings of the other provinces of confederation which brought to the leader of the Conservative party the support which he needed for the triumph of his economic and political doctrines. Without us, without the province of Quebec, the country, as in the last nine years, would have probably been at the mercy of a coalition government without guidance or fixed principles. Thanks to the stand of our province, thanks to the breaches made in the solid bloc, the government will not only reign but govern. More than ever are we in need of a government that is in a position to govern.

I do not intend, sir, to return to what has been said, in the house, with reference to the economic crisis. May I, however, be permitted to add a few comments of a universal, national and provincial aspect.

The first cause of this world-wide crisis is to be found in the overproduction of raw material and products of the soil. The financial crisis was an immediate sequel of this over-production. This financial crisis was intensified by the artificial maintenance of prices. It is to these two crises: the crisis of overproduction and that of finance, that we must attribute, to-day, this industrial and trade depression which is felt the world over.

I spoke, a few moments ago, of over-production. This is especially evident in food products, such as wheat, sugar, coffee, etc. The same phenomenon happened for certain raw materials used in basic industries: coal, cotton, wool, leather, etc. While production was increasing, as a natural sequel, according to economists, we had inadequate consumption. The Great war brought on an era of intense production in all branches. Part of mankind was unceasingly consuming while the other part was unceasingly producing. When peace was concluded, production continued to increase and certain consuming countries became producers. Conditions were completely upset in the world. A great wave of economic nationalism took place, each country endeavoured to develop its own industries in order to become self-sustaining. In certain parts of the world, to counteract this overproduction the policy of price pegging was inaugurated. It was an artificial policy which could not succeed. And, by the way, sir, I congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister for not having accepted the idea of pegging the price of wheat in Canada. Not only this policy would have as a consequence greatly burdened the national budget, but it would have had the same result as the pegging of prices for coffee, sugar and rubber. For if this policy stimulated production during a certain period, it led to the decrease of consumption through the stagnation of capital and credit. Under-consumption is the sequel of overproduction. While the countries of Europe were carrying on war, the markets of the far east were closed to them, Japan organized its industries. If we add to this the unrest in India, the revolution in China and in many countries of Asia, the political disturbance in South America, it is so many markets closed to producing countries.

The destruction of factories in Belgium and northern France has put those countries under the necessity of rebuilding their entire equipment from top to bottom and according to the most up-to-date plans. This reorganization enabled them to compete successfully, on certain markets, with those countries when old-fashioned industrial methods were still in use. But what further entangled matters was the Russian upheaval and the well-known five-year plan.

While the people of Russia go barefoot, enormous quantities of footwear are being exported to England; while the Russian workers are rationed, shiploads of wheat sail from the Black sea bound for England and other countries where it is sold at prices so low that no capitalist nation can compete against them.

I do homage, Mr. Speaker, to the great Canadian statesman, the Prime Minister of our country, who was the first to teach to the world by his own example, that no Christian nation should have any business relations with countries where the people are veritable outcasts among the states, due to the misdeeds of their political leaders.

I repeat that the Russian unheaval, the civil strife in China, the Hindu boycott, the insurrection in Asia, the disturbance in Latin America, have put the world's trade in a very bad way.

This crisis was felt in our own country, but its effect was much more serious than necessary due to the blind policy followed for nine years by the Liberal administration. From 1921 to 1930 was a time of wilful blindness, of reckless optimism, of misunderstanding complete and absolute. Canada was thrown wide open to the products of all kinds of foreign countries: the balance of trade was always against us; we must remember these things also if we wish to grasp the reason for the economic crisis which is upon us.

Mr. Tardieu, former prime minister of the French Republic, had this to say of the world crisis:

> Although, quite evidently, we may not control the doings of outside markets we are most assuredly masters, and responsible masters, of what goes on in our own markets. That is our business; as President Roosevelt used to say, our game may be right, or it may be wrong; but there is no doubt of our right to play.

With the optimism which was their weakness, the Liberals did not ask themselves whether they played the game properly; they simply did not play at all.

We were no longer masters in our own house, our home markets did not belong to us. If we had remained under this anti-Canadian regime, if our people had not thrown off the yoke, where would we find ourselves to-day, with foreign competition growing stronger in every way, and with our own markets wiped out? It is strange, to say the least, that a young country like ours, which despite its share in the world war had suffered a great deal less than France, for instance, should have been so severely affected by the economic depression following the war. As the right hon. prime minister of Canada has pointed out, nothing shows more clearly the total lack of foresight on the part of our former government.

The Liberal government instead of anticipating the crisis, instead of adhering to a sound policy of protection for its own people, thought that Canada should become a dumping-ground for all the nations of Europe and should gladly admit thousands upon thousands of immigrants to her shores. From 1921 to 1926, we spent $13,000,000 for the purpose of settling strangers in our midst. During the same period thousands of Canadians were leaving home, migrating to more hospitable countries. Was this merely favoritism towards our transportation companies, or did our opponents imagine that a country can be built out of all sorts of materials, like a mosaic? With the importation of foreign products came the importation of foreign labour. And our Liberal friends expect us to cure in a short six months the evils resulting from nine years of misrule! I take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of congratulating the government on the vigour of its immigration policy; I beg them to believe that this gesture will be memorable in the annals of our country's growth.

During all this time, in the province of Quebec, our opponents, under the spell of the same radiant blindness, were selling our national resources to the foreigner, sacrificing agriculture to industry and business, legalizing the unlawful acquisition of vast stretches of land under cultivation, for the benefit of foreign capitalists; they encouraged the overproduction of paper, established town sites where agricultural centres were already in existence, drained our countryside of its workers who were shepherded into artificial towns which to-day are on the verge of bankruptcy. After ten years of such a policy, we realize to-day that their frog-town that Mr. Taschereau tried to swell beyond the ox's size, is blowing up, that the paper mills are closing down one after the other, thus throwing hundreds of workers on the streets.

Is it any wonder that thousands of unemployed are to-day walking the streets of our cities, with nothing to fall back upon, hopeless—farming folk of yesteryear, fascinated by these artificial cities?

It was in our province also, whose business policy was praised by the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin) that the excessive intervention of the state in private undertakings hampered and even—in certain cases—prevented the necessary accumulation of private capital and its investment in private enterprise. We must make radical changes in our province if we wish to feel the beneficial effect of the economic recovery that the present government is bringing about through the wise and effective measures it has adopted since coming into power. Despite these obstacles of a local nature, which our friends of the opposition must answer for, I can say definitely that the efforts of our present government have already borne fruit; there is abroad to-day, amongst private individuals and in the business world, a finer spirit of generous confidence.

As I recalled a few moments ago, another act that brought joy to the hearts of our people, was the closing of our Canadian markets against all imports from Russia. Just when Ottawa was adopting an order in council to this effect the provincial government of Quebec was putting a similar measure through the legislature.

Why is it that our friends of the Liberal party did not give expression to any such desire when a Liberal government was in power at Ottawa? Did they take this way of showing their faith in the firmness, the disinterestedness of the right hon. Prime Minister of this country? Have they begun to realize that the country is far better off in the hands of men who can act freely, heedless of the narrowing exigencies of cliques, and beyond the need of continual bartering with radical elements? There you have a fine certificate of impotence addressed to the former government.

In acting thus, Mr. Speaker, the government of our country has given proof of all its affection, all its esteem, all its consideration for the workers of Canada. He has condemned the conscription of labour without remuneration, the brutalizing system enforced on the Russian proletariat, under guise of safeguarding their liberty. It is also an act of the highest social and moral importance, since it condemns anarchy and all forms of disorder, the overturning of values and of institutions.

The hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) and his colleagues of Quebec were worried, during the last campaign, at the thought that the present Prime Minister might go to represent Canada at the Imperial conference. The voters laughed at his misgivings; and the attitude taken by our Canadian delegation has thrown new lustre on our own dear country. Like Mackenzie Bowell in 1894, the Canadian Prime Minister asked for preferential reciprocity without striving to hide the fact that he was guided first and foremost by the interests of Canada. It is plain that the precedence claimed for the interests of his own country by the leader of each delegation does not exclude his devotion to those of the empire, but our Prime Miniser was applying in the sphere of economics the principle successfully upheld by Sir Robert Borden, thanks to which Canada was finally recognized at the League of Nations as an independent and self-governing member of the empire

This attitude was particularly pleasing to the province of Quebec. Tied to her soil with all the fibre of her soul, guardian of her language, her laws and her tradition, enamoured of her past filled with trials and moral conquests, she wishes her mother country to stand by itself and to include no other land than Canada: her duties, as her rights, cease at the border line of Canadian territory. There you have Quebec's idea of patriotism; that is our understanding of national sentiment. This Canadian sentiment must beware of two dangers, both from the outside: Americanism and colonialism. Americanism which signifies for us, on the one hand, a young people, weak, made up of two distinct races, each with its own temperament, its own ethnical character; on the other, a giant people, rich, powerful, intoxicated with their own strength, their wealth, their power, and sending out beyond their own borders their ideas, their tastes and their morals. The process has been described as the moral, mental and economic annexation of the first by the second, of the weak by the strong: the wolf swallowing the lamb. We may dispense with a definition of colonialism. The right hon. leader of the opposition gave a good example of it in this house last May when he interrupted the present Prime Minister who was expounding his doctrine of Canada First, with the query: "But what about the British Empire?"

As to those obstacles of a purely Canadian character which are apt to irritate the national sentiment of my fellow French Canadians may I quote the following from an article written by the director of Le Devoir on August 27th, 1910:

> In other words the French Canadian will love and uphold the bond of Empire and British institutions as long as will be recognized their right to freely discuss all problems involving the national future of Canada; if they are not forced to assume, first the glory of Great Britain, burdens and responsibilities which the constitution and simple justice do not impose upon them; and especially if they find throughout the length and breadth of Canada a political and social system which allows of their cultural organization, permits them to foster their mother-tongue and to bring up their children in the love of their traditions both religious and national.

What we strive for is the preservation of the federative spirit and the mutual respect of the two great races who inhabit this country. An eminent citizen of France, Count Saint-Aulaire, once said:

> Speaking politically, if an admixture of British genius and French genius were possible, it would shield us from error; just as an alliance between the British fleet and the French army would save us from aggression.

We of the Conservative party, have already proven the possibility of this blending process; it was eminent statesmen imbued with these principles who, in Ontario, generously reorganized our compatriots' right to be educated and taught in the language and in the religion of their forefathers. I long for the dawn of the same intelligent spirit in Saskatchewan for the disapprovance of the mean and narrow-minded persecution of all we hold dear. At a time like the present when, more than ever, we should unite, should understand one another, why waste our energies in quarrelling among ourselves? That sort of thing is unknown in the experience of Quebec province, because that province has always respected in its entirety the agreement signed with the other provinces in 1867.

One of my remote ancestors, Antoine-Aimé Dorion, fought with all his might against the compact, before its adoption. He foresaw the struggles we have had to wage since 1867. He abided by the decision of the majority, however, willy-nilly, once it was reached; and even took his seat in this house. Several thought as he did in opposition to Sir Georges-Etienne Cartier; but once the covenant had been signed on behalf of the province that was the end of all dissension among us—there was no further distinction between victor and vanquished.

On behalf of my constituency, on behalf of my province, for the greater welfare of my country, I claim the same measure of justice for my compatriots throughout this continent. Under the intelligent and energetic leadership of the Prime Minister of this country I believe in the future, I trust that the day will come when Canada will know the full enjoyment of peace, harmony and progress at home; of moral, political and economic independence abroad, within the fold of the great British Empire. Let us have faith. Let us face the present with courage. Let us believe in the future. Let those of us who are of French descent, draw that courage from the history of those who, three hundred years ago, discovered this vast country and colonized it; and you, fellow-citizens of English origin, may find this courage in the patriotism of those royalists who suffered so deeply to remain loyal to their king. Let us unite; let us work together to build up a great country.

Mr. OSCAR L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, like the two hon. gentlemen who preceded me I shall speak in my mother tongue since this is the first time I have addressed the house this session. Naturally, French is much easier for me than English; but if my speech is not in English it is not through any reason of indolence, it is rather because I wish to affirm our right to express ourselves in our own language within the walls of the House of Commons of Canada. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this right will always exist in our country no matter what Mr. Anderson of Saskatchewan, and the Regina Star, may say. I am convinced that the good common sense of the Canadian people will overcome these appeals to fanaticism, these hollow, dishonest notions sown here and there throughout the country with the sole purpose of gaining power or, once successful, of keeping it.

My first thought, Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in the house this year must be for the good people who do me the honour of electing me to represent them here. So I shall take advantage of this debate on the speech from the throne to place before the government the extremely critical and painful plight of the people in the northern part of my riding.

I am happy, Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. LaVergne), to see you present here to-night; I am glad to see my good friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) here, too. I know that the same distressful situation exists in the northern part of your own counties. I ask my two excellent colleagues to help me make the government understand how real is the need of the inhabitants of our constituencies; but especially to help me in my efforts to have this situation remedied. My colleagues know it, if the government does not, there is real hardship in that part of the province of Quebec.

In the parish of St. Camille, for instance, which is the upper parish of the county of Bellechasse, and touches the Maine boundary, I could mention fifty cases of the blackest poverty, people who haven't enough to eat, who are in need of clothing and of all the necessaries of life. I feel sure things are not better in the two neighbouring counties.

Why? Because there is no work in the woods. The people of these parts derive their livelihood almost entirely from working in the woods; they are lumberjacks rather than farmers. Up to now farming has been a side-line with them. They were mainly employed in the woods and tended their farms only when they had nothing else to do.

This year the border is practically closed. The people I am speaking of cannot take jobs in the Maine woods like they used to do. In Quebec province itself lumbering operations have been very much curtailed and wages have been cut enormously. Those who succeed in getting work in the lumber-camps receive in the way of pay barely enough to live.

Only last Sunday I saw at least a hundred of these lumberjacks, easily recognizable by their peculiar manner of dress and their sun-tanned features, going in a body to the soup kitchen in St. Pie Street, Quebec, where the Salvation Army serves free meals. These poor men come back from the woods without a cent in their pockets and to be fed must appeal to public charity. They spend the day around the railway stations or walking the streets; they have just enough money to pay their fare back home. Such is the plight of the lumber workers in the part of the province of Quebec that I have the honour to represent with my two excellent neighbours.

As I said a moment ago, the inhabitants of these parts worked almost exclusively in the lumber camps. On their land they did only what work was absolutely necessary to obtain their letters-patent; once they had got them they seldom troubled to cultivate them further. These farms are not sufficiently developed to feed those who cultivate them; that is why these men had to find some additional means of earning a living. They had to get work in the woods. To employ a picturesque phrase I heard some time back, these folk, instead of getting a living out of their farms, are bound to feed the farmer. In the summer season they spend on their farms what money they have earned in the lumber camps during the winter.

How could we solve this problem? What remedy should we apply to the situation I have just described? I have no hesitation in indicating just what that remedy is. Besides, the idea is not mine. More than once it has been put forward by others and I have no scruples, as was the case with the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he was leading the opposition last year. On one occasion after he had been more than usually violent in his denunciation of the government's laws, he was asked: "If you were in our place what would you do?", and his answer was: "Wait until I am at the head of the government; I'll tell you then what I intend to do." His reply was somewhat on a par with that made a while ago by my hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion): "I'll answer when the proper time comes"; all of which is not very conducive to practical progress in the House of Commons. I have no hesitation in suggesting a remedy to this sorry state of affairs among the people of my riding. In my humble opinion these backwoodsmen or backwoods settlers should be given the means to clear their lands in such a way that the lands woud furnish a living to whoever worked them.

Some time ago I had the honour, in company with several local members, of going with His Lordship, Bishop Plante, before the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, premier of the province, to explain this situation to him and suggest that clearing bounties or ploughing bounties be given to these settlers so as to permit of their getting a decent return from their agricultural labours. Unfortunately the prime minister of the province, like the prime minister here, also holds the portfolio of finance; and when we put forward the above suggestion we were answered not by the Prime Minister, but by the Minister of Finance, that the scheme would prove too costly. I have been shown estimates which indicate that such aid to the settlers would cost some three million dollars. Like the governments of all the other provinces, that of Quebec feels the shock of bad times, although Quebec can still show a surplus which is not true of our sister provinces. Hence my appeal to our federal authorities, which I hope my very good neighbours will support. I know they will not refuse my request. I ask the government of Canada to cooperate with the government of Quebec in granting clearing bounties or ploughing bounties to the settlers in the northern regions of these counties so they may be enabled to become real farmers and get their living from the land, and no longer find it necessary to work in the lumber camps during the winter.

I hope this plan will be put into operation along with several other plans made practical through the cooperation of the provincial governments. There is no more objection to these clearing or ploughing bounties than there was to old age pensions, unemployment relief, agricultural credits, technical education, roadway improvements, and the other numerous schemes brought to fruition through the cooperation of Ottawa and the provinces. During the recess, since last September, I discussed the matter with the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart). He was most courteous and tried to point out that the unemployment relief act did not allow of any portion of the $20,000,000 voted last September being spent for the furtherance of any such plan as I suggested. There was no need of telling me that because at the September session the government never gave a single thought to agriculture, not a thought. They were looking after the manufacturing classes. The farming community was entirely forgotten; that is why we must bring up the question of these terrible hardships to-day. Or rather they did think of agriculture, but in an indirect way. They saw to it that the farmer had to pay a higher price for every manufactured product he must buy. The cost of living was increased; but there was no increase in the price of what the farmer has to sell.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will allow me to correct certain errors committed by my hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion). He spoke of appeals to prejudice and especially of the notorious issue of conscription which he accused the Liberals of bringing up in every election camaign. As ill luck would have it, our Conservative friends were the ones to bring up the question of conscription during the last campaign, in my riding at least. Their main argument was that the Liberal government had become conscriptionist when it admitted to its ranks the Hon. Mr. Crerar, a partisan of conscription and a member of the former Union government. We were also told about the Hon. Mr. Fielding who became Minister of Finance in the Liberal administration after 1921, and who, it seems, was also in favour of conscription. And the Liberal party was violently upbraided for having admitted to the cabinet conscriptionists like the Hon. Mr. Fielding and the Hon. Mr. Crerar.

The member for Quebec-Montmorency spoke on immigration. Our hon. friend is new to the house; knowing how well-disposed he is I feel sure that his mistake was purely involuntary, and that he will be pleased to have matters set right. We who have been in the house longer than he, know that what he claims to be the Conservative policy in matters of immigration is an entirely new departure for the Conservative party. We who have been here for some years remember that in this house the conservative party was always clamoring for more and more immigration; and that the chief fault found with the Liberal administration by the then leader of the opposition, Prime Minister to-day (Mr. Bennett), and those behind him, when they sat on this side of the chamber, Mr. Speaker, was that we were not bringing in enough immigrants, that our immigration policy was far in the rear of the aggressive Conservative program, when they were in power; that the Liberal government was not sufficiently active in settling the country and increasing the population of Canada.

I recall that when the right hon. Prime Minister was leader of the opposition he launched a particularly vicious attack against the Hon. Mr. Forke, Minister of Immigration. Why? Because the Hon. Mr. Forke, according to him, was remiss in his duty of bringing settlers into this country.

I intend to quote proof of what I say. Evidently I cannot quote all that our friends said on the subject of immigration, when they sat on the opposition benches. But I shall quote the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, as also his chief organizer, General McRae, to show that the Conservative party, the Conservative leader, the Conservative chief of organization, and our good friend, since gone to his reward, Dr. Edwards, former member for Frontenac-Addington, were endlessly blaming the Liberal government because its immigration policy was not sufficiently aggressive. And when the hon. gentleman from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) claims that this change in attitude was brought about by the Conservative party, once again he is beside the mark. As a matter of fact it was the Liberal party which first began to tell the house that we should begin to cut down on immigration. Without mentioning your humble servant, it was Liberal members, like the hon. gentleman from Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Casgrain) and others who warned the government when unemployment began to threaten. It was Liberal members who advised the government to slow down and claimed that if they wished to settle the country they should use the surplus population of the older parts of Canada for the colonizing of the newer regions. If we were to help the settlers we should first take care of our own people before giving this help to foreigners.

Mr. DORION: Will my hon. friend from Bellechasse allow me a question?

Mr. BOULANGER: With pleasure.

Mr. DORION: Who passed the order in council putting a stop to immigration?

Mr. BOULANGER: We have here another one of those political mysteries so frequent in the Conservative party. It is like the mysterious policy of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) who the other day had to admit that what the press has been saying about his policy was not founded on fact; but who could not state just what his policy was. Things were just the same as regards this order in council: nobody ever saw it. People heard of it; but nobody ever saw it, nothing concerning it was ever laid on the table of the house. If there has been a slowing up in the flow of immigrants I don't believe the government or the Conservative party should get the credit; to my mind it is rather a consequence of hard times.

Nevertheless, despite our present depression, in spite of our unemployment crisis and the rigours of the season, we have admitted a monthly average of 5,000 immigrants during the past five months. That means that in the last five months 25,000 immigrants came to Canada, in spite of hard times, unemployment and severe winter weather. Which proves that the famous order in council that my hon. friend speaks of has at least not put an immediate stop to immigration.

Coming back to the quotation I mentioned a moment ago, I shall give you first of all the immigration figures under a Conservative government and under the Liberal administion. I shall make use of the argument that our friends were forever mouthing when they were in opposition. Their hands full of blue books they would exclaim: "Here is the number of immigrants who came to Canada when we were in power. Compare these figures with the absurdly small number of immigrants admitted to the country since the Liberal government has been managing the affairs of the country."

Here are, first of all, the figures for the period between 1912 and 1921. The Conservative party came into power in September, 1911; they left office in December, 1921. In 1912, 254,237 immigrants entered Canada; in 1913, 402,432; in 1914, 384,878; in 1915, 144,789; in 1916—the war was on—48,537; in 1917, 75,374; in 1918, 79,074; in 1919, 57,702; in 1920, 117,336; in 1921—and I ask the house to notice that in 1920 and 1921, when our soldiers were being demobilized and we had to find employment for our returned men, the Conservative party admitted 117,336 immigrants in 1920, and 148,477 in 1921.

Now let us glance at the record of the Liberal government: 1922, 89,999; 1923, 72,887; 1924, 148,560; 1925, 113,362; 1926, 96,064; 1927, 143,991; 1928, 151,597; 1929, 167,722; 1930, 163,288. Those are the figures the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) was alluding to when he said: "What are you doing? Compare your results with the brilliant results we obtained when we were in power."

My first quotation is from a speech delivered by the leader of the opposition on April 12, 1927, which will be found in the debates of 1927, volume II, page 2326. On the motion that the house resolve itself into committee of supply, the member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) drew the attention of the government to the fact that there were 2,000 miners out of work at Drumheller. This is what Mr. Bennett had to say:

> I am not going to deal with the question of unemployment. I deprecate greatly the observations that were made in this house this morning by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), because if this country is ever going to make progress we have to get people into it, and the more people we get, the more work there is going to be. It is all nonsense to talk of a close preserve for occupations in this country, and everybody knows it; the idea is absurd. Instead of encouraging that sort of thing, we must frown it down. We are masters of our . . . .

That was in 1927.

In January, 1928, speaking in the debate on the speech from the throne the right hon. gentleman who at the time was leading the opposition and is to-day Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett), used the following words in discussing immigration—page 21, vol. I, of the debates of 1928:

Now, sir, I pass rapidly to the next domestic matter that I think of great importance, and that is immigration. It is true that immigration is by all odds the most important question that can engage the attention of this house or of this parliament. I find that in every part of the Dominion there is a state of unrest in the public mind—suspicion with respect to the manner in which the department is being conducted, suspicion of its administrative power, belief that political considerations have influence in connection with getting permits for the admission of settlers. You will find these things in every newspaper you take up, in the dispatches from its correspondents and in the editorials, and they are discussed in synods and other church meetings. It is high time that something be done to put the power of parliament unitedly behind an effort to bring people over and settle them in this country. We cannot continue as we are and maintain our present position very long. It is essentially important that we should induce more settlers to come to this country. I have pointed out this before, and I . . . .

A little further on, page 22, after quoting the figures I mentioned a while back, he went on to say:

I have already read that part of the speech from the throne delivered in 1927 dealing with this question, and I gave the census figures for 1916 to 1921 and for 1921 to 1926; those figures have been placed on record, and they indicate that although we have sent a few settlers west, many of them have left the country; they entered at the front door and left by the back, and we have not even maintained our natural increase. Further than that, in no one year since 1921 have we brought into Canada half as many people as were brought here in 1913. Those are the facts and the figures.

The year 1913 was the banner year of the Conservative administration. In that year at least 400,000 immigrants entered Canada. The Conservatives never mentioned immigration without bringing in this record year of 1913, and holding it forth to us as a goal, as an accomplishment that we indolent Liberals should strive for.

Mr. DORION: Would the hon. member from Bellechasse, who seems to be well acquainted with statistics, be good enough to tell me how many immigrants came to our country from 1896 to 1911 when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in power?

Mr. BOULANGER: I shall take some other opportunity of instructing my hon. friend whose thirst for knowledge I am glad to note.

Mr. DORION: There were two million.

Mr. BOULANGER: The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) continued:

Now, Sir, this question transcends party; it is larger than the lives of parties because it strikes at the very life of this Dominion. We must have settlers. We have in Canada facilities to take care of an additional population of from 15,000,000 to 17,000,000 people; we have 10,000,000 acres of untouched land within 20 miles of the railways; we have the Peace River area and other portions of the country which are lying idle while the government is expressing pious hopes as to what will happen. I say the time has come when action must be taken.

During the same session the right hon. gentleman who was then leading the opposition and is to-day the Prime Minister of Canada, discussing the report of the committee on agriculture and colonization, which committee, hon. gentleman will recall had made a very lengthy and very exhaustive inquiry into the problem of immigration, the right hon. gentleman, I say, used the following language on June 7, 1928—page 3924 of Hansard:

I regret to have to differ with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways as to relying entirely upon unorganized and individual effort as we used to do twenty-five years ago.

My hon. friend from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion) will please note: this is what was going on 25 years ago.

But conditions have profoundly changed in the meantime. They have so profoundly changed that, as mentioned this afternoon, there is a very great demand for settlers made upon Britain and upon various countries of northern Europe from which we draw population, with the result that we are not able to secure all we wish from those countries. Australia and New Zealand are in the same plight. But, on the other hand; we can get our fair share if we make conditions here such as are found in other communities, and therefore it is necessary to give that assistance to immigrants which otherwise we would not be compelled to give.

In the course of the same debate, the same day, on page 3925, the right hon. leader of the opposition made a very virulent attack against the then Minister of Immigration, Mr. Forke. He spoke in these words:

Now I regret to say this—you will say it is very unkind of me to say it. But the fact is that we have not at this time, in charge of this department, a gentleman who by natural aptitude or training is calculated to properly develop policies in connection with the Immigration department. I have as profound a respect as any man in this house for my hon. friend the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). But in England they have long since, in their parliament, made it a rule under conditions such as these to fearlessly express their opinions with respect to ministers of the crown who direct policies. And in this instance I regret to say that it is so painfully apparent to anyone, whoever he may be, whether Liberal or Conservative, whether he sits to the right or to the left of the Speaker, that the hon. gentleman, the member for Brandon, a man of integrity and character, is unfitted temperamentally or by training to discharge the varied and onerous duties of Minister of Immigration and Colonization in this country. That is one of the real difficulties. You could not have made the Canadian Pacific irrigation projects flourish unless you had had at the head of them a man such as the late Lord Shaughnessy or men of that type. And so, in relation to our immigration policy, you cannot have that policy succeed if you put in charge of it one who is disqualified—not qualified at least—either by training or by temperament, to discharge the very onerous duties that appertain to that position. So we say in this amendment that we should have a responsible minister in charge, although in Australia they did try a commission. And there are those in this country who believe that a commission responsible indirectly to the government might be able to succeed. In Canada there is less evidence of the likelihood of a commission succeeding. We say there should be a strong minister, a minister with the training, with the aptitude, with the temperament, with the desire and the determination and vigour to make such a department succeed—with these two great branches working side by side, the one, in cooperation with the provinces and other organizations, seeking new settlers, the other providing work for these settlers when they come here to keep them in this country. For I deny that this country is, by reason of its natural resources, unfitted for occupation, unfitted to give employment to men who come within its borders.

Now let us come to the organizer-in-chief of the Conservative party, General McRae, who also had in 1928 a splendid scheme for increasing the population of Canada, for bringing hundreds of thousands of immigrants within our borders at government expense. A few quotations from this plan will show whether the Conservative party was favourable or unfavourable to immigration. No later than two years ago, on March 9, 1928, page 1162 of the Debates, General McRae, member for North Vancouver, had this to say:

Mr. Speaker, I feel impelled to take up the time of the house this afternoon because so little of a constructive nature has been put forward by the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Forke) in the last year in respect to the serious question of population in this country that the country at large, and possibly a few members of this house, may reasonably conclude that there is no way of solving this great problem.

There is no big construction program in the country to-day. Something must be attempted if we are to take care of any considerable immigration. . . .

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I propose that the government inaugurate on a large scale a program which will bring about the settlement of our more or less scrub and lightly timbered land which we have in such abundance in our prairie provinces,—land with wonderful, almost inexhaustible soil, and easily reached by branch railways. In provinces like Manitoba, large areas which could be easily drained might also be included. A most conservative estimate of land of this character easily available in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and possibly a section of northern Alberta, would be ten million acres, capable of supporting sixty-five thousand families or, roughly, a quarter of a million farm population. This of course does not include the Peace River country. There, there is a minimum of at least thirty million acres available, even more fertile and more easily cleared, which when developed would be capable of supporting 175,000 families, or nearly three-quarters of a million farm population—more than the entire population of the province of Alberta at the present time.

And here is General McRae's summing up which will be found on pages 1163-4.

Summing up my proposal, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that it contemplates the ultimate settlement of fifty million acres of land by some 250,000 to 300,000 farmers. These, with their families and the urban population which would be required, and the consequent developments which will follow, will add two million new people to the prairie provinces. I propose that we start out to double the present population of the west. Do this, and the rest of Canada will grow and prosper. . . .

. . . . As to the cost of clearing, I have made careful inquiries. It is no longer practical to clear land in the old-fashioned way. The grub hoe must give way to the heavy steam-breaking plough.

Mr. McRae did things in a big way. . .

—which walks through ordinary brush and scrub like so much stubble. The operation, while necessarily under government direction, would be more or less a cooperative clearing scheme. Using modern methods, confining the clearing to the easiest half of each homestead, avoiding any heavily timbered areas, and pro-rating the expense over the district, I estimate the cost on the whole would not exceed at most $12.50 an acre; that is, one thousand dollars must be expended for clearing on each homestead. In addition, the expenditure required for the modest farm buildings—probably a log house and barn—would approximate five hundred dollars, making the total of $1,500 per homestead.

Naturally it wasn't enough that we should get them to come here and pay their way over and that we should grant them free lands; we still had to build a house and barn for them at the expense of the State. A little further Mr. McRae goes on:

Well and energetically administered, it should be possible to complete the program I am suggesting in ten years. On this basis, I estimate that the government would be called upon to finance about $30,000,000 a year for ten years, or a total of $300,000,000. Not very much of this money would be repaid in the interval; nothing at all for the first five years.

I should say so!

The country could well afford to borrow for such a development, issuing special land bonds or debentures for such time as would make it possible for repayments from the settlers to take care of the same.

At page 1165:

Worked out on a unit basis, this plan can soon be built up to locate 25,000 or 35,000 families a year. It should be borne in mind, however, that once a good immigration movement gets under way it grows up like a snowball. People will come along on their own and make their own arrangements. In a big movement probably not over 50 per cent of the immigrants would have to be provided for under the project I am suggesting. The others, attracted by the development and consequent prosperity, would locate themselves throughout the Dominion. If we handle 200,000 people a year under this government colonization program a total immigration may be anticipated of easily twice that number, or equal to the maximum immigration the country has enjoyed.

I suggest to the government that in cooperation with the Imperial government and the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia the Peace River country should be developed as a great Imperial settlement. Alberta and British Columbia together could furnish 30,000,000 acres of land for homesteads; the Dominion government could finance the cost of clearing the land and erecting the necessary buildings on the basis I have already suggested, while as their part Great Britain could finance the temporary requirements of the settlers as they do now in part. It would also be a reasonable pro- . . . .

That would suffice, Mr. Speaker, to show what attitude the Conservative party adopted in immigration matters when they sat on the opposition benches. When election time came around our Conservative friends, never slow in appropriating other people's ideas, saw that this question of immigration could be used as a lure in the province of Quebec. Hence the Conservatice party, at least in Quebec province, took over this immigration policy as its own and used it throughout the campaign, though it was exactly opposite to the attitude followed by that party in the house right up to the time of the last election.

May I point out that, at our last session, when the Hon. Mr. Forke was appointed to the Senate, the Liberal party practically abolished the Department of Immigration—that is to say the government did not appoint a successor—and it was the Conservative administration, after the elections of July, 1930, that reestablished the Immigration Department by naming a minister to preside over it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if it is wrong to bring immigrants into our country at public expense, it is far worse to swell the numbers of civil servants who live at the expense of the taxpayers of this country. But when we came here at the opening of the session we were quite surprised to find that the House of Commons barber shop had been put in charge of a master-barber from England. We were equally surprised to find the House of Commons restaurant presided over by another gentleman from England; as is also the supposedly protective staff of the House of Commons, several of whose members were not born in this country. I also ask the House to note that during recess since last September the patrolling of the Parliament buildings, the conducting of visiting tourists, etc., were given over to seven or eight members of the House of Commons protective staff, and out of this number only two or three were Canadian born, all the others being of foreign extraction. While I am on this question of importing public employees, I wish to draw the attention of the House and of my good friend from Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Dorion), to the fact that when his friends were in power in 1917, 1918, 1919 and 1920, they brought in auditors to organize the Income Tax Branch. I have not the figures for the present year; but last year there were seventeen non-Canadian auditors in the Income Tax Branch as against fifteen Canadians. Naturally the non-Canadians, who had been here first, had the choicest positions and were drawing the best salaries. The same thing took place when the radio branch and the aviation branch were organized. Apparently we had no Canadians sufficiently competent to take over these services of radio and aviation. Once more people were brought over from the other side and the directors, the high officials, the inspectors, in a word all those who are at the head of the radio service, were not born in Canada. At the head office in Ottawa there are eleven Canadians and eleven non-Canadians; and what is true of Ottawa is truer still of the branch offices in other Canadian cities.

Mr. B. M. STITT (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The hon. gentlemen made splendid speeches—speeches that are a credit to themselves and to the people who returned them to this house as their representatives.

I represent the constituency of Nelson, one of the largest in the Dominion. It is slightly over 600 miles long with an average width of 400 miles and contains an area of a little over 200,000 square miles. This constituency might well be termed a kingdom—but I am not its king; I am its representative. It is divided into two parts. The southern portion is purely agricultural and is known as the Swan river valley. This district might very appropriately be termed the agricultural paradise of western Canada. Practically all the people there are engaged in mixed farming.

Already this session I have heard a good deal about the condition of agriculture in western Canada. I am not in a position to speak regarding the prairie provinces generally; I must confine myself to the Swan river valley. A good deal of what hon. members in the southeast corner have said in regard to the condition of the western farmers is true, although those in the Swan river valley are not feeling the depression to the same extent as those in the sections in southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta known as the dry belt. The farmers in the Swan river valley are not short of food; their granaries are full of grain, their cellars are full of potatoes and other vegetables, and they have plenty of live stock. But they do complain that the prices they receive for their products are too low, while they have to pay relatively too high a price for the commodities which they buy. I quite agree that they have good reason to complain. For instance, farm machinery has not come down in proportion to the reduction in the prices obtained for farm products. As a matter of fact the price of farm machinery is about the same as it was ten years ago, although I might say there is a considerable reduction this year, in spite of the fact that hon. gentlemen have been telling us ever since the special session that the increased tariff would raise the price of everything the farmers of western Canada might buy.

That has not been the case. I have here the price lists of the Cockshutt Plow Company for 1930 and 1931, and they show several very substantial reductions in the prices of farm machinery this year. For the benefit particularly of hon. members opposite, and lest the people of the west forget, I repeat that during the period the Liberal government was in power, that is to say from 1922 to 1930, the prices of agricultural implements showed a steady increase. I have before me revised Hansard for May 14, 1930, and I am referring to the speech on the budget delivered by the hon. member for London (Mr. White). In that speech he went into detail with regard to the prices of farm machinery from 1922 to 1930, and although I have read this volume of Hansard through from cover to cover I have not discovered anything in the way of an attempt on the part of any member of the Liberal party to contradict the statements the hon. member for London made, so they must have been correct. The figures he gave were as follows:

6-ft. binder	219 00	225 50	6 50
8-ft. binder with bundle carrier and T truck	251 00	263 50	12 50
6-ft. mower	95 50	96 50	1 00
Hay loader, with steel windrow and fore-carriage	112 00	122 00	10 00
Field cultivators, 7½-ft., three-horse	99 50	113 50	14 00
Single disc drills, eastern, 13-disc, 2-horse hitch	142 00	154 00	12 00
Single disc drills, western 20-marker combination, 4-pulley hitch	206 00	232 00	26 00
Disc harrows, in throw, 12-discs, 16-inch, 3-horse	45 50	48 50	3 00

That increase continues all down the line, in spite of what our Liberal friends said they were doing for the western farmer while they were in power. We all know that the greater part of the cost of production in agriculture is the cost of machinery, and this was what the Liberal party did. I might also remind the house that the Liberal government reduced the duty on these articles, but in spite of that there was a steady increase in the prices. I do not hear any shouting or handclapping across the way; what is the matter? I challenge contradiction of these figures.

Now I am going just a little further for the benefit of my hon. friends opposite. As I said before, I have here the price lists for 1930 and 1931 of the Cockshutt Plough Company. In spite of all that was said at the special session and all that has been said since this session opened it will be seen that very substantial reductions have been made this year. I am going to quote some figures which may interest my hon. friends:

	Reduction
No. 3 power lift gang plough, wood eveners	$25
Angle disc plough	25
All sizes No. 1 and 2 tractor ploughs	25
All sizes Nos. 2 and 3 furrow disc ploughs	30
4-5-6 furrow disc ploughs	35
No. 8-36 run drills	50
No. 6 disc harrows, 7-ft. and 8-ft	5
No. 8 disc harrows, 12-ft.	10
No. 8 disc harrows, 16-ft.	12
No. 8 disc harrows, 24 ft.	15

	Reduction
No. 9 disc harrows, 12-ft. and 18-ft..	8
No. 9 disc harrows, 16-ft..	10
No. 9 disc harrows, 24-ft..	15
125-bushel grain wagon tanks.. .. .	20

This is what is happening, instead of what was predicted by hon. gentlemen opposite, as a result of the increased tariff policy of this government. They said we were going to ruin the western farmer, but just what answer can they give to these figures?

I quite agree with some of the hon. members opposite that something must be done for agriculture in western Canada. At the moment I do not know what this government is prepared to do. I know the Prime Minister has made some promises; I know he is a man who always keeps his promises, and I am sure he will keep his promise in this case. I quite agree with some of the members sitting in the corner opposite that the banks are not playing fair with western farmers. Considering the amount of money the banks have made during the last ten or fifteen years of so-called prosperity I think they might be expected to cut their interest rates in the west, at least until such time as the situation clears up. We all know that some of the banks in Canada are paying a 12 per cent dividend; others are paying a 10 per cent dividend, while I know of no case where a bank is paying less than this amount. In addition they are all building skyscrapers in order to camouflage an amount of profits just about equal to their dividend, in order to prevent the public from knowing how much they are making.

I also agree that freight rates should be reduced. I do not know the intention of the government with regard to the recapitalization of the Canadian National Railways, but I sincerely hope that just as soon as the situation will permit that capitalization will be written down to where it belongs, because I am of opinion that just as long as the capitalization remains where it is, all the railways in Canada will have the benefit of high freight rates. If the capitalization of the Canadian National Railways were written down there would be such a vast improvement shown during the first year that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which boasts about how much it has done for Canada, would be shown up in such fashion that its rates would be reduced, and the western farmer would get the benefit.

As I said before, I do not know just what this government intends to do for the western farmer, but I do say that the farmer is entitled to some consideration and help, because his is the basis industry of western Canada. Agriculture is entitled to assistance just as much as the iron and steel industry is entitled to it, or any other industry in Canada which is being given support by way of increased tariffs. The western farmer has just as much right to expect the same treatment, and for this reason, that, as the hon. member for South Battleford (Mr. Vallance) said, about 50 per cent of the people of Canada are engaged in agriculture. Without agriculture in western Canada the country would be nowhere; without agriculture in western Canada the eastern manufacturing industry would be nowhere. I think, Mr. Speaker, it may be necessary for this government to put through some legislation to aid the western farmer. It may require to go to extremes. It may be necessary for that legislation to be more or less revolutionary. It may be necessary to put through legislation that will be painful to this government. But I say it has got to be done if we are going to recover the position we have lost in the world of trade and commerce.

In regard to northern Manitoba, as I said, my constituency is divided into two parts. From the Pas north we have an area of approximately 178,000 square miles. As the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) so aptly put it, this area might be classed as a "cowless, sowless, chickless, but by no means sockless north." And while I am on socks, for the benefit of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Young) I might suggest that, in spite of the fact that in the north country we pay 5 to 15 per cent more for such articles than is paid in any other part of Canada, we are paying very much less for socks to-day than we did seven or eight months ago. And I do not confine my remarks to socks alone. For everything we eat and wear we are paying very much less than we did eight months ago. As a matter of fact, it is generally conceded that the cost of living is back to pre-war levels. I am sorry I cannot say that for Ottawa. I only wish that the farmers of the west were getting for their produce the prices that they are getting around Ottawa. As an illustration: The other day my wife purchased a chicken from a butcher shop down here for $2; I can buy that chicken in Swan River in my constituency for 75 cents. I say that to show that it is possible the farmers in eastern Canada do not realize how serious the situation is in the west, because they are getting twice as much for their goods.

We have in northern Manitoba industries which comprise, chiefly, mining, forestry, fishing and furs. We brought into production last November one of the largest mines in the Dominion known as the Flin Flon, owned by the Hudson Bay Mining & Smelting Company. This mine, since going into operation in November, has shipped 247 cars of blistered copper and zinc. They are producing at the present time approximately $30,000 a day. They are putting through their smelters on an average of 3,000 tons of ore a day with an average of about $10. These are all new dollars being turned out in Manitoba. In addition to that we have the Sherritt-Gordon mine which came into production only the other day. That mine is producing an average of about 500 tons a day with an average value of about $14. We have many more mines, not as large as these, but of commercial size and having commercial ore, mines which would be operating to-day if conditions were what they were a few years ago. But as is well known, the price of these metals is down to zero and many of these smaller mines cannot operate. As soon as they get cheaper power I am satisfied that a great many of them will be opened up.

In addition to mining we have forestry. We have one of the largest saw mills in the west in the town of the Pas, producing in the neighbourhood of 3,000,000 feet per week. We have within ten miles on either side of the Hudson Bay railway, up to mile 300, some 7,000,000 cords of spruce pulpwood waiting for some industry to come and cut it down to be manufactured into paper. On Nelson and Churchill rivers we have more than 3,000,000 horse-power waiting for development. And in spite of all that has been said about that north country being a muskeg area, we have large belts of first class agricultural land. This has been proven, and I give my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) credit for having put in some small experimental stations along the line, from which wonderful results have come. As a matter of fact, I used to take Mr. Guild of the experimental farm from Brandon up to visit these plots in the fall, and he told me the results were so amaging that he was almost afraid to send them in to Ottawa for fear they would not believe the results shown.

That Hudson Bay railway, from the Pas to Fort Churchill, 500 miles long, is about completed and we expect it will be ready for operation in the fall. It has a maximum grade of less than 1 per cent. A large sized locomotive can easily haul 100 cars of wheat from the Pas to Churchill. There is very little intermediate traffic. Most of the traffic will be through traffic, which will be very cheap and will mean a lot to the western farmer. Might I in passing, for the benefit of some hon. members who may not be familiar with the situation, just give some comparative costs in the matter of freight to show what the Hudson Bay railway means to the farmers of western Canada. These rates are comparative as between Montreal and Churchill on grain and flour. Take Swan River and Yorkton as centres, Yorkton as the central point in Saskatchewan and Swan River in Manitoba:

Grain and Flour Rates to Churchill and Montreal

From	to Montreal	to Churchill	Savings in rates to tidewater
	(Rates in cents per 100 lbs.)
Swan River	19 — 12 = 31 cents	19	12 cents
Yorkton	19 — 12 = 31 cents	19	12 cents or 7·2 cents per bushel of wheat.

These rates are not theoretical; they are not imaginary. These rates are in effect on the Hudson Bay railway to-day.

In regard to live stock, the hon. member for Marquette, touching on this question, pointed out what he thought the Hudson Bay railway would do. Let me give some figures to show the saving on live stock:

Live Stock Rates to Churchill and Montreal

From	to Montreal	to Churchill	Savings in rates to tidewater
	(Rates per car of 20,000 lbs.)
Winnipeg stock yards	$170	$116	$ 54 00
Swan River	202	94	108 00
Yorkton	202	96	106 00
Saskatoon	225	102	123 00
Moose Jaw	221	108	113 00
Edmonton	229	126	103 00
Calgary	229	132	97 00
			$704 00
	Average reduction per car		100 57
	or 50¼ cents. per 100 lbs.

In addition to that, I would point out that the farmers of western Canada will receive a considerable benefit by way of a reduction in shrinkage. Cattle on long train hauls shrink as much as 10 and 15 per cent. They do not shrink after they get on the boat because they can be fed again, and they are not bumped around as much as they are on the train. I bring these matters to the attention of the house to illustrate what the Hudson Bay railway means to the farmers of western Canada.

Would it not be much better for the farmers of western Canada if that road were completed and in operation to-day? I lay at the door of the late Liberal administration the blame for its not being in operation. During the 1921 elections the Liberals were accusing the Conservative government of not having completed this railway and of having closed down the construction in 1918. That is quite true because in that year they needed money to conduct the great war, and in 1919 they needed money to bring the boys back home. That is why construction was closed down during those years. What happened? I intend to quote some figures which will be very illuminating. The Liberals agree that this road means a lot to the western farmer, but what did they do? They made a political football of the Hudson Bay railway for a period of five years after they came into power. The money expended upon that line was expended for maintenance only. I know this because I was chief forester of northern Manitoba and was travelling continuously up and down this railway by gas car. I knew just what was going on, but to illustrate further I will give some figures. In 1922-23 they expended $40,118, mostly for administration. That would hardly keep twenty sectionmen on the 332 miles of track which had been completed when the Liberal government took office. In 1923-24 they expended $322,279. During the next year they expended $294,158, and in the next year $173,334.

During the elections the Hon. Mr. Dunning, who took over the portfolio of Railways and Canals, pledged himself as well as his party to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. As a Conservative, I am fair enough to say that Mr. Dunning deserves more credit for the completion of this railway than does any other man in the Dominion of Canada. The first year after the Hon. Mr. Dunning took office, $2,808,549 was expended; the next year, $2,674,224; the next year, $3,389,084; the next year, 1929-30, $5,357,692, and in 1930-31, $1,550,787. The road is completed with the exception of repairing a few low spots and heaves, which will occur in a country like this during the winter months. I repeat that the Liberal party made a political football of this road for five years in spite of the fact that they knew it meant a saving to the western farmer of some seven cents per bushel in the shipment of his wheat. If the farmer had those extra seven cents he would be much better off than he is to-day.

There is no question but that Fort Churchill is one of the finest ports in North America. It is a landlocked harbour, the entrance being through two high granite cliffs. The harbour consists of a basin about eight miles long and about two miles wide. Dredging operations have been carried on for the last two or three years and, in all fairness to the late government, I must state that the work carried on at Fort Churchill has been of the highest order. Competent engineers were in charge and no complaint can be made as to the quality of the work which has been done there. Last fall I had the pleasure of travelling to Fort Churchill in the company of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion). It was his first visit to that country, in which he spent two days. I do not know that I ever saw a man cover as much territory as he did within that time or ask as many questions. He came away very enthusiastic about all he saw and I am quite satisfied that Fort Churchill is in as good hands as it was when the Hon. Mr. Dunning had charge. I am satisfied that the hon. minister is going to see this thing through. In passing I might state that probably no other constituency in Canada will suffer as much through the completion of this port as will the constituency represented by the hon. minister; many cargoes of grain will be diverted from Port Arthur and Fort William.

There is no question about the feasibility of this route. I could talk for hours upon what has happened in the Hudson bay from the time of its discovery by Henry Hudson in 1611. Hundreds of craft of all description have been taken into the bay by the Hudson's Bay Company. Scores of craft have been taken in by the Department of Railways and Canals, some under their own steam and others by means of tow, with very few casualties. I have spoken to shipmasters who have told me that they would rather take a ship into Fort Churchill than into Montreal. That is what they think of the perils of navigating Hudson strait and Hudson bay. I have received opinions from about fifty sea captains and they agree that the average season of navigation will be from seventeen weeks to four and one-half months. If it is desired I could give their names and their experience in northern waters.

The Hudson Bay railway and the port of Fort Churchill should be completed and should be given a fair trial. That is all the people of western Canada are asking for. The Minister of Railways and Canals has stated on several occasions that trial shipments will be made from this port during the present year. About eight hundred feet of docks have been completed with a depth of 30 feet of water at low tide and the elevator will be completed about September. The hon. minister has convinced me and most of the people in western Canada that this port is going to be given a fair chance. We have received the benefit of the Crowsnest rate, for which credit must be given to the present Prime Minister. I do not mean to say that those rates would not have come into effect had the right hon. gentleman not been elected, but he has brought them into force, and he has announced that fact all over Canada. The people of western Canada are worrying over the possibility of the usefulness of this route being strangled by the imposition of excessive marine insurance rates. I am glad the hon. minister is in his seat tonight and I hope that if Lloyd's and the other insurance companies are not prepared to give the same rates as apply to Montreal, this government will be prepared to take care of the difference. That is the only way in which this route can be given a fair trial; it must not be strangled by excessive marine insurance rates.

I trust the hon. minister will see to it that the vessels used in these trial shipments are seaworthy. I sincerely hope that no old hulks, no old tramp steamers that are not fit to go to sea, are sent in there for the purpose of bringing discredit on the route. I know there are people equal to that, and who would do it if they were allowed; but I have every confidence in the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) and in the government doing their best to give the route a fair chance, and that is all that the people of western Canada are asking.

Before closing, may I make a few observations from the viewpoint of a new member sitting in this house, and especially this session? I think everybody in the house will agree that the situation in Canada to-day is serious. I believe that every member of the house has a very real interest in the welfare of this country. I believe that we are all sincerely willing to do all that we can to help meet the conditions that confront us, and if possible find remedies to cure the present situation and bring Canada back to where we believe it ought to be. May I with all respect suggest to hon. members on both sides of the house, because one side is as bad as the other, that for this session especially, when we are facing such a serious situation, we refrain as far as possible from sniping across the floor and from mud-slinging and obstructional methods; that as far as possible we get together and magnify the things on which we can agree and minimize the things on which we disagree; that we diagnose the case as a doctor would a patient's, suggest remedies, try to get the necessary legislation through this house, and then see to it that that legislation is applied for the benefit of Canada as a whole. I am making that plea as a new member. Some hon. gentlemen may think that I am giving them a curtain lecture. That is not my intention at all. I am simply giving the conclusions at which I have arrived after my observations during the short time I have been in the house. I believe that the electors expect us all to do everything that we can at this session of all sessions. I am also satisfied that the electors in my constituency, and in every other, will not measure a member's service in this house by the measure of obstruction that he is able to place in the way of this government putting its policies into effect, but rather will he be judged by the service he gives and the cooperation he extends to the government in bringing into effect policies which it sincerely believes will be for the betterment of the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): I trust that the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Stitt) will pardon me if I do not follow him very closely, but candidly I did not catch his remarks very well over here as there was a good deal of whispering and murmuring going on. I would like to congratulate him upon having made a very excellent address. It was his first speech in this house. I managed to grasp over here one or two of the points he made, and I can assure him that any criticism I may make of his remarks will be offered in the kindliest spirit.

In opening his remarks the hon. member spoke of the cost of machinery, and as far as I could gather pointed out that the price of machinery had not risen. I do not live in the country and I have very little occasion, now at all events, to be brought in contact with the price of machinery, but I have heard that the price of repairs for machinery has advanced substantially since the new government came into office. I suggest to hon. members opposite and to the country at large not to be downhearted if the price of machinery has not yet risen, but rather to cheer up because after some time the price will almost certainly rise.

The hon. gentleman also asked what the Liberal party had done for the western farmer. There are not many people in Canada, Mr. Speaker, who do not know what the Liberal party has done for the western farmer. It has given him the Crowsnest rates, and fixed them permanently on the statute books of this country. It has built for him the Hudson Bay railway. It has lowered the tariff in several successive sessions. It has given the western farmer almost everything that he asked for in the new grain act. Finally, but most important, it furnished him with ample and remunerative markets, which, unfortunately, the western farmer has not got to-day. So I think that the former Liberal administration can speak very well for itself with regard to what it has done for the western farmer.

I also gathered from my hon. friend's remarks that he thought the Conservative party had about as much to do with the building of the Hudson Bay railway as the Liberal government. That is a story that we must not rehash to-night, because we all know all about it. We know that in the campaign of 1925 the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, who was then leading the Conservative party, said that not one five-cent piece would he spent on the road until the debts of Canada were paid. If nothing had been done towards building the railway until the debts of Canada had been paid, the road would not have been built for a very long time. I think also that the right hon. leader of the present government (Mr. Bennett) said in this house that he would not spend five cents on the Hudson Bay railway until the whole question had been thoroughly reviewed. That also would have taken a considerable amount of time. So I am bound to feel, Mr. Speaker, that to the Liberal party belongs the credit for the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I shall not attempt to follow the hon. gentleman in his remarks any further.

There have been some very excellent speeches during this debate, beginning with those of the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address, whom I heartily congratulate upon the able manner in which they acquitted themselves in their difficult task; including also a long list of very able speeches, many of them by new members. As they have covered and recovered the ground thoroughly and, as an hon. member once said in this house, picked the bones pretty bare, I shall not attempt to go over much that has been discussed; but as we were elected to this house after, for the most part, a strenuous and heated campaign in which very often our energies were tried to the utmost; in appealing to the electors on advancing our beliefs and arguments, and obtaining from the majority an endorsation of our policies, I think it is incumbent upon us, and only reasonable that we should endeavour to present on the floor of this house their viewpoint and our own. I would like, therefore, to touch briefly on conditions as they were in Canada at the time of the last election and as they are in this country at the present time.

During the last election campaign one of the great issues was that of unemployment. Lesser issues there were, to be sure, but the storm centred about the subjects of unemployment and national depression. There are not many people in Canada who are not familiar with the causes of unemployment. We are told it is due to world-wide overproduction and under-consumption. I think we are all fairly well agreed that in Canada unemployment and national depression are due to the fact that we have lost our markets. Without markets we cannot sell, and if we do not sell we receive no returns. If we have no returns we have no funds, and without funds we cannot buy. Seven times the amount of grain needed in this country for the use of our people, vast quantities of pulp and paper and pulpwood, millions of feet of lumber, millions of pounds of fish, nickel, asbestos, beef, bacon, butter, cheese, all these national products, millions of dollars' worth of manufactured products, enough to supply the people of this country many times over, are produced in Canada every year. Yet the proceeds from the sale of this great bulk of products are required to keep the Canadian people from year to year and to fatten a few millionaires. Now we have lost our markets, we have no money, we have many unemployed, throughout the land there is no small measure of distress.

The last Liberal administration is blamed by hon. members opposite for this state of affairs. Well, we know all about that, Mr. Speaker. We know that the last Liberal government is not to blame for the present state of affairs in Canada. True they were responsible for the New Zealand treaty, but as a mater of actual fact the New Zealand treaty never did us any harm. From the time it was ratified and came into force the price of cream and butter fat increased from month to month and from year to year as compared with previous years. Finally when we were shut out of the American markets, and when we lost our markets in the United States naturally we had a glut of these products in Canada. On the other hand our sales to these countries, which at the time the agreement first became effective amounted to a million or two million dollars, rapidly increased until just before the close of the Liberal administration they amounted to about $12,000,000 on the one hand and $19,000,000 on the other. That is a substantial return for Canadian trade, making abundant work for Canadian workmen.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal government has a record of accomplishment in this country which the present government might do well to emulate. During the time the late government was in power Canada emerged from a state of deepest depression and enjoyed a period of the greatest expansion and prosperity ever known in the history of this or any other country for the same period of time. In all such crises as the present, governments are held responsible. Whether a government is responsible or not it must if possible find a remedy. Obviously in this case the remedy is markets. Markets we need and markets we must have, and the only visible market on a large scale is in England. The last government endeavoured to recover the lost English market by offering British trade substantial advantages as set forth in the Dunning budget, and submitted those proposals to the country. On the advice of our friends opposite, however, the country would have none of that. It preferred the method that the then leader of the opposition offered, that of blasting a way into the British and other markets, and it gave hon. gentlemen opposite the mandate to blast. In turning down the Dunning budget, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian electors not only curtly snubbed the last government in a very unwarranted manner but slammed the door in the face of all friendly approach on the part of British trade and this action was made doubly offensive by the action of the present government in boosting the Canadian tariffs to a height of utter exclusion and then offering the British trade a scant three per cent on top of that in exchange for a preference on our wheat.

On August 7 the present government came into power. The electors were told that there would be an immediate improvement. One statement was made in Winnipeg to the effect that after three days there would be a change. So far as I have been able to learn, in my constituency up to the present there has been no improvement. In spite of the high tariff, stable commodities in my district are selling at a price which does not allow the producer any profit, and they are not worthy of production. Eggs which sold formerly in the Winnipeg market for from 50 cents to 75 cents a dozen, and in the winter sometimes as high as $1 per dozen, have been selling this winter at from 25 cents to 30 cents. First class dairy butter can be bought for 20 cents per pound. The unfortunate part of it, however, is that there are hundreds of people in Winnipeg to-day who cannot afford butter and a considerable number who have not a steady supply of bread. Potatoes can be bought on the Winnipeg market to-day for 15 cents a bushel, and sometimes as low as 10 cents a bushel. Many gardeners are offering to give them away. My hon. friends opposite have said that the low price of butter in Canada is due to the fact that we imported billions of pounds of Australian butter.

An hon. MEMBER: It is, too.

Mr. HOWDEN: Hon. members say that our cold storage plants were so full of New Zealand butter that we could not receive a reasonable price for our own commodity. However, we have not imported millions of bushels of Australian potatoes, yet our potatoes are going to waste and thousands of bushels will be thrown out. I refer to domestic potatoes grown in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. GOBEIL: We imported American potatoes last spring.

Mr. HOWDEN: We did not need to go to the United States for potatoes. My hon. friend could have secured all the potatoes he wished at Winnipeg.

Mr. GOBEIL: We all know that.

Mr. HOWDEN: At the special session last September the government passed its $20,000,000 relief bill to cure the evil of which I have just been speaking. In enacting this legislation they made it a condition that the cities and municipalities should contribute amounts equal to the grants from the fund. I believe that the major part of this vast sum has gone into the pockets of well-to-do contractors and their regularly paid staffs. Instead of the work in connection with the various undertakings being done by large numbers of men, machinery was utilized with only a few men in control. At the present time two bridges are being built in Winnipeg, to cost approximately $1,100,000. The new structures are being erected beside the old bridges. I have been crossing the old bridges all winter and I have noticed that not more than one hundred men have been steadily employed. About a hundred men have been engaged in excavating, building forms and pouring cement, and not more than another fifty have been busy fabricating steel and driving teams and trucks. At a dollar an hour for a ten hour day—and certainly not half of those men will be getting anything like such a wage—at the end of five months, when the substructure will be up, these men will have received about $180,000; by the time the spans are laid the wages will amount to approximately $250,000. Remember, sir, these works were undertaken for the purpose of relieving unemployment, of putting bread into the mouths of hungry men and women. That is a comparatively small proportion —$250,000 out of $1,100,000—to go to the actual relief of unemployment.

Meanwhile the Prime Minister has spent several weeks at the Imperial conference endeavouring to blast a way into the British market. Unfortunately his dynamite must have been all wet, at all events the fuse misfired. But we must have export markets, and even then it will take a long time for us to catch up It may be said that Canada ought to be able to live from within her four walls, that every Canadian farmer ought to be able to find the necessities of life from his own farmstead. But Canada never has been able to live within her own four walls, and for many years our farmers have not been able to live off their land. Incidentally it would be a pretty dull life and void of most of the attractions and advantages of the city. But even at that it were better to live in the country than starve in the city—and there are a lot of people starving in the cities. Possibly in this way might be found some relief from the present state of affairs. Men have taken their living from the soil since the earliest times of which we have record. To-day mankind does precisely that same thing, but so varied and refined have become their tastes that it requires the products of many soils and a chain of manufacturing plants to satisfy their appetites. It will be a long time before any considerable number of Canadians will or can return to win a first-hand living from the soil. Meanwhile we must live; that is to say, we must have markets, and the only feasible way is to re-establish our foreign trade. This we can never do so long as we have a high tariff wall, and it seems to me it is up to the government to take down that wall.

Now, Mr. Speaker, like a good many members I was struck by the remarks of the hon. deputy speaker (Mr. LaVergne) a few days ago. I am bound to say that I felt he meant well; I appreciated the fine vein running through his speech, and I am sure he did not intend to give the offence which was so readily taken by hon. members on this side of the house; but I do feel that his references to the revered Sir Wilfrid Laurier were most unfortunate. That gallant, chivalrous French Canadian, that princely, magnanimous statesman, of whom the Canadian people have always been proud, of whom the Canadian people will always be proud, little deserved to be attacked in this house, and I cannot but deplore the words uttered by the hon. deputy speaker.

I will not dwell further on that part of his speech. I would deal for a moment with his references to the soviet republic. I am not so sure that Canada has done the wise thing in severing trade relations with the soviet republic. I am not a communist, but Russia to-day is functioning very well. Before very long that vast country will be independent of the world—independent in time of peace, independent in time of war. I have every reason to believe that before many decades pass, probably before many years, the nations of the world will be very ready to make friends with soviet Russia and enter into trade agreements with her. It is true that the downtrodden and untutored Russian people finally broke their bonds and entered on a rampage of pillage and murder; it is true that they repudiated their church and slew their ruler; but in all this they had precedents, and as a matter of fact it was not the first time such an event has been recorded in the history of the world. Imperial Caesar was slain by an assassin at the head of rebellious Rome, three times England rose in revolt—twice she forced her reigning monarch from the throne and once she beheaded him; at the time of the French revolution so fierce was the tempest of the people's anger that they not only guillotined their ruler, but every individual of aristocratic bearing or refinement was made the object of their enmity and the victim of their hate. So, sir, I say that the Russian soviet of to-day has not transgressed the laws of society any worse than the Romans, the English, and the French did in the past, and I believe the time will come when we shall be glad enough again to extend the hand of friendship to Soviet Russia and reestablish our trade connections with her.

In closing there is but a word I should like to say. Like the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne) I also deplore the recourse which has been had by the press and by various individuals throughout this country to racial and creed prejudice. I think, sir, that if we could banish the trouble makers, the firebrands and the bigots, the Canadian people would get along very well. If I am not mistaken, in the province of Quebec both races have been good friends for a long time; there have been no differences there. We have not fared so well in Manitoba; beginning with the first Riel rebellion we have had racial trouble.

Mr. SPENCE: Why bring that up?

Mr. HOWDEN: I am not going to hurt any feelings; I still have a few minutes to speak, if the hon. member will leave me alone. In 1885 trouble again broke out, and again in 1896 we had a showing of this prejudice, with the final display taking place in connection with the school legislation. To-day, however, we are good friends. I live in the French city of St. Boniface, and there is no ill feeling in that city or in the province of Manitoba as between the French and English elements. We are living together there in friendship and as brothers. We have our schools and they have their schools; we are satisfied and contented, and, as I said before, if we could just hang or drown the firebrands and trouble makers we would soon have in this country no racial prejudices or creed differences.

On motion of Mr. Ralston the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 25, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

CIVIL SERVICE

RIGHTS OF EX-SERVICE MEN UNDER REGULATIONS TO BE OBSERVED

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. The right hon. gentleman is aware that since the signing of the armistice all parties in parliament have granted ex-service men preference in civil service appointments. Will the same preference be extended in regard to the retention of positions as has been extended in regard to employment? I ask this question in contemplation of the rumoured dismissals from the civil service.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): So far as I am aware the rights of ex-service men as defined by the civil service regulations will be observed.

[Mr. Howden.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. WALBURG-BONNYVILLE BRANCH LINE

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) whether he has anything further to communicate to the house in reference to the St. Walburg-Bonnyville branch of the Canadian National Railways. I understand the railway company is going to continue the building of the bridge. I wish to know whether there is any money for grading or work of that character.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I have had a number of telegrams and inquiries about this question. I stated some days ago that the government was taking the matter up with the railway authorities to see if they could not continue the work in view of the reported distress in that district. I am glad to state that the railway company has with the consent of the government from a financial standpoint—because that is necessary—agreed to carry on sufficient work on the St. Walburg-Bonnyville line to avoid unnecessary distress. Work is being done which under different circumstances would not be done.

MAFEKING CUT OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): May I ask the Minister of Railways if anything is being done by the government or the railway board to implement the promises made by supporters of the present government concerning the construction of the Mafeking cut off.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): I think the hon. gentleman will have plenty of opportunities to discuss that point upon a later occasion. So far as I know this is not the place to bring up a question of that character.

RAILWAY STATION AT LIMOILOU, QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. POWER (Quebec South): In the absence of my colleague the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) I wish to read a resolution passed by the council of the city of Quebec and to ask a question based thereon of the Minister of Railways and Canals. The resolution reads as follows:

(Translation):

At a meeting of the city council, held on Friday, March 20, 1931, at the City Hall, it was resolved:

That this Council kindly request Sir Henry Thornton, President, and the members of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways of Canada, to consider the great importance there is of making provision, without delay, for the rebuilding of the shops of said railways, at Limoilou, which were destroyed by fire and which deprived a great number of workmen of Quebec of their livelihood, most of them being heads of families. The rebuilding of said shops will, in the present unemployment crisis, be of great assistance to these people who will largely benefit by this important industry and who have lost in this disaster a precious source of revenue.

I wish to ask the minister if steps have been taken to make representations to the Canadian National Railways so that the wishes expressed in this resolution of the city council of Quebec may be carried out without further delay?

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, I answered a question somewhat similar to this a few days ago, and at that time I stated I would draw the attention of the Canadian National Railways to the matter. The building of the shops at Limoilou is in the hands of the management of the railway. Already I have drawn it to their attention and will again do so.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask my right hon. friend in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs whether there has been any correspondence between the government at Ottawa and the government at Washington respecting the St. Lawrence waterway since the last session of parliament, and if so whether that correspondence could be tabled before the Easter recess.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I think the last communication was laid on the table of the house during the short session of parliament. There has been no correspondence since.

ROYAL GRAIN COMMISSION

EXPECTED ARRIVAL IN CANADA OF SIR JOSIAH STAMP

On the orders of the day.

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod): I understand that a cable advice was received in Ottawa to-day to the effect that Sir Josiah Stamp will sail next week from London and that upon arrival in Canada he will act as chairman of the Royal Grain Commission. Will the Prime Minister confirm this report and indicate to the house the scope of the proposed commission?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Sir Josiah Stamp will sail for Canada next week. I had intended to make a statement to the house at an early date, but I will do so before the house rises next Wednesday.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is this part of the Canada first policy?

Mr. McINTOSH: It is going to be stamped all right.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED STATEMENT OF MAJOR GENERAL MCNAUGHTON, CHIEF OF STAFF

On the orders of the day.

Mr. ROSS W. GRAY (West Lambton): I wish to call the attention of the Minister of National Defence to an article which appears in this morning's Ottawa Citizen concerning a military banquet which was held last evening. Major General McNaughton, chief of staff, is reported to have stated that it is the intention of the government to make serious cuts in the militia system and that information respecting the matter is to be tabled in the house at an early date. I wish to ask the Minister of National Defence if that statement was authorized and if not whether this official will be reprimanded. If it was authorized may we take it that henceforth government policies will be announced at banquets of this nature rather than from the floor of the house?

Hon. D. M. SUTHERLAND (Minister of National Defence): I would ask the hon. member to give notice of his question.

Mr. GRAY: Do you take my question as notice, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister has asked that notice of the question be given and be put on the order paper.

WINNIPEG VETCRAFT SHOP

On the orders of the day.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I have received a letter from the province of Manitoba inquiring whether or not the vetcraft work shop which was destroyed in June, 1930, will be reconstructed. A question somewhat similar to this was asked yesterday, but I would like to know whether there is any further information in regard to the matter.

Hon. MURRAY MacLAREN (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The question was answered yesterday.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. minister has no further information?

Mr. MacLAREN: No, I answered the question yesterday.

DOMINION CENSUS

METHOD OF DEALING WITH APPLICATIONS FOR EMPLOYMENT AS ENUMERATORS

On the orders of the day.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (North Battleford): We are receiving daily numbers of requests from persons desirous of obtaining employment as census enumerators. May I ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan) if it is the intention of the government to appoint census enumerators through the instrumentality of the Civil Service Commission or by the patronage committees of the various constituencies? May I inquire further if steps are being taken to preserve the preference in favour of returned soldiers as heretofore?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): That does not call for an answer.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, as acting Minister of Trade and Commerce may I say that so far as I understand the census commissioners are being appointed in exactly the same way they were appointed at the time the last census was taken.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CAMERON R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): In view of the fact that no Minister of Labour is sitting in this house may I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when we may have a full, correct and exact report of the expenditure of the moneys voted in September under the Unemployment Relief Act and also concerning unemployment throughout Canada?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the report was laid on the table a few minutes ago.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Shelburne-Yarmouth): In view of the fact that my address begins near the time of the opening of the sitting I had hoped that the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett), who has just left the chamber, would have seen fit to listen to at least a part of what I have to say. Hon. members who have addressed the house have not often been favoured during the past few days with the presence of the Prime Minister. We know that he is a very busy man and that great responsibilities rest upon his shoulders, but he must realize that this debate deals with the state of the nation. This is a debate in which the house may advise His Excellency the Administrator whether conditions throughout the country are as set out in the speech from the throne, and express itself in regard to the measures which his advisors propose to take in order to remedy those conditions. But it does seem to me that it is a matter of some importance—whether the members of the government think so or not—that they should hear members from all sides of the house—I am not speaking of this side alone—with regard to the situation in every part of the Dominion to-day. I say it, and advisedly, that I do not think that at any session of parliament I have had the honour to attend have there been better speeches from all sides of the house than in the course of this debate, and I feel strongly that these representations are well worthy the attention of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in person.

After a careful perusal of the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker, I feel that His Excellency is none too well informed in regard to national conditions. There is a passing reference in the address to conditions in the west, and my friends from the prairie provinces are given an assurance that the orderly marketing of wheat has been arranged for. That does not mean a great deal; it may mean that those who have received advances on their wheat will not be pressed to repay those advances. It does not mean anything so far as the solving of the fundamental problem of selling our wheat crop is concerned. But my hon. friends from the west ought to feel lucky that there is even a reference to the west in the speech from the throne; there is no reference to the primary producers in the east, none whatever. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister was down in the maritimes last July, and on that occasion he took hold of the situation with his characteristic vigour and upon public platforms there he said what would be done to solve the situation as he saw it. The east is still waiting for the national fuel policy which was promised in July, 1930. Conditions in the mining districts this winter probably have been as bad as or worse than ever before, taking the reports sent out by the relief committee in Sydney. But not only has the promised national fuel policy not been put into effect; it is not even forecast in the speech from the throne.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The west is also waiting for that policy.

Mr. RALSTON: My friend from Bow River (Mr. Garland) says that the west is also very materially interested in the so-called national fuel policy which was supposed to be promulgated immediately after the general elections. Down in the mining districts of the east, particularly, the promise of "work, not doles," has not been fulfilled, and unemployment is not ended. The action promised at that time—and it is on record in Hansard—has not yet been taken, and, as I said, not a single reference is contained in the speech from the throne with regard to the primary producers down east. The fishermen of Nova Scotia and the maritimes generally find themselves in the same position. They have been working strenuously in order so to organize themselves as to be in a position to place the industry on a firm basis, an industry which means their livelihood and which is well worth cultivating in the Dominion. My right hon. friend the Prime Minister in his election speeches poured out his soul in sympathy with the fishermen and bemoaned the fact that the United States tariff made it so difficult for them to market their product in the United States. Notwithstanding that expression of sympathy the government about five or six weeks ago gave the fishermen of Nova Scotia a deliberate stab in the back by imposing a dumping duty of 5½ cents a pound on ten tons of rope which was being brought into Yarmouth. The first time the fishermen ever had the opportunity to buy the necessary implements of production in a cooperative way they found themselves throttled by this action of the government. Strenuous protests were made, two or three weeks were lost, and the time had almost come for the lobster fishermen to put out their traps before they were given any satisfaction, and even then there was apparently no direct response to their communications, but they learned from the local customs officer that the shipment would be released without the duty being paid. Evidently my friend the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) retreated from the position he took last September when he said he would see that the cost of the Canadian article was to govern the price of imported rope. I pointed out at the time, and I repeat now, that those men have to compete in the markets of the world in selling their fish, and therefore they are entitled to get their implements of production at the most favourable prices. That has been and will continue to be the policy of the Liberal party.

I do not propose to-day, and time does not permit me, to go into other matters to which I should like to refer with regard to conditions in the maritime provinces. Full opportunity will present itself later, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the house will deal with those questions when the time comes. For the remainder of my time, in view of the fact that it has been laid down by different gentlemen, and in particularly Mr. E. W. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that it is axiomatic that prosperity cannot come to Canada in any marked degree until the western wheat situation is solved, I propose to deal with the remarks which were made last week by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister about the Imperial conference to which he went for the purpose of selling Canada's wheat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, we always understood that he did. A gentleman by the name of Professor Swanson, who accompanied him, stated that the whole question of Canada's trade revolved around the marketing of the Dominion's wheat, and the best market we could get was to be found in the British isles. If my right hon. friend was over there—

Mr. MacDOUGALL: If my hon. friend will permit me?

Mr. RALSTON: I have only forty minutes.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: Was the Imperial conference called to deal with the question of marketing Canadian wheat?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. RALSTON: I did assume that when my right hon. friend and his colleagues went to the Imperial economic conference their primary object was to endeavour to make arrangements for the sale of Canada's wheat.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: That is not what you said.

Mr. RALSTON: I am assuming that to be true and I think people generally considered that to be the important part of his mission. Let us see what my right hon. friend did in that respect. What did he say in his speech to the house last week? I was amused, Mr. Speaker, as I think were other members, and somewhat gratified by the fact that the right hon. gentleman attempted to justify his action at the Imperial economic conference last September by quoting as a precedent what Sir Wilfrid Laurier did at the conference of 1902. Let me assure my right hon. friend that if he always follows the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at Imperial conferences he will not go very far astray.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: If you followed it you would not go very far astray yourself.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend the would-be minister of fisheries will kindly permit me to continue. We have to bear in mind in connection with a statement of this kind the circumstances under which the conference met. My right hon. friend quoted from the proceedings of the 1902 conference. At that conference Sir Wilfrid Laurier proposed that Canadian agricultural products should be given preference in the British market. What was the situation at that time? Great Britain then had as a part of her general policy a duty on foodstuffs, and the proposal by Sir Wilfrid Laurier was that foodstuffs imported from Canada should be exempted from that duty. That was just exactly the opposite of the position in 1930, when my right hon. friend proposed Great Britain should change her whole fiscal system in order that it might be possible to give Canadian grain a preference in the British market. I say I do not think anything could illustrate that better than the statement made by Right Hon. W. S. Fielding in a speech made in this house after his return from the Imperial conference of 1902. He says:

> It was one thing to propose, as our opponents did in 1897, that the British government should tax the food of their people for our benefit, in order to grant an exemption on Canadian goods from taxation. It was too much to expect that the British taxpayer, in the then state of public opinion, would be willing to adopt the policy of preference. It was a very different thing, however, to propose to the British government not that they should tax the food of their people for the sake of the colonies, but that they should take off the taxation by granting a preference in favour of colonial products.

That illustrates much more succinctly than any words of mine the difference in the true situation, and it quite robs my friend of the opportunity of applauding the sentiments expressed by Mr. Richard Jebb who, he told us, stated that the offer of 1930 was exactly the same as the offer of 1902. I do not care whether my right hon. friend takes the statement of Mr. Jebb or the statements of hon. gentlemen on this side of the house; I leave the facts to the house. Mr. Jebb's statement is absolutely incorrect. Sir Wilfrid Laurier's proposal was entirely different from that made by my right hon. friend.

But what do we find Sir Wilfrid Laurier saying at a time when fiscal conditions in Great Britain were much the same as they were in 1930? See if my right hon. friend will follow him there. Here is the statement of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1907, after the duty on foodstuffs had been taken off and the general policy in Great Britain had become free trade on foodstuffs. This is what he says—it sounds like Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I would refer my right hon. friend to this passage if he were here, but I hope he may read it as a passage perhaps expressing sentiments he might think it worth while emulating in connection with the Imperial conference:

> The matter of mutual preference is altogether in the hands of the British people and if they think on the whole their interests are better served by adhering to their present system, it is a matter for the British electorate. I think the best way of serving the whole is by allowing every part to serve and recognize its own immediate interest.

That is Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1907, to whom I refer my right hon. friend when he is looking for precedents in connection with imperial conferences. The truth is, Mr. Speaker, that you will search in vain the records of Imperial conferences from the very beginning to find any precedent for the action which the Prime Minister and his colleagues took at the last Imperial conference. What did they do?

Mr. MacDOUGALL: They acted as Canadians.

Mr. RALSTON: His one remedy, and the one remedy of my hon. friends on the other side is protection. High tariff is the one medicine which they keep in their medicine chest, and that is the remedy always prescribed in large doses by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister as a cure-all. The Prime Minister expressed himself in regard to this policy in this way, and I have no doubt these statements will be applauded by my hon. friend who has just said the Prime Minister and his colleagues acted as Canadians:

> If Mr. Mackenzie King thinks that on behalf of Canada I will not beg of any country to buy our goods; then he is right; for I will not. If he thinks I will not go, hat in hand, among the nations—so that I may not provoke them—and ask humbly if they will please exchange their goods for ours, then he is right; I will not. But if he thinks I will not so build up our agricultural and industrial life that its strength will drive our products into the competitive markets of the world, then he is wrong. For that I will do.
> If he thinks I will not establish new markets for these products, strive with all my heart to retain them, drive our produce with all my power into new markets, into old markets, into reluctant markets, then he is wrong. For that I will do.

That is the mark of the pathfinder, to blaze the trail; through all barriers on the road to national development to blaze a way.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought my hon. friends would cheer those statements. Now let us see how my right hon. friend goes about carrying out that policy in connection with this Imperial conference. He enunciates that as his policy, not to ask people to buy goods but to make them buy, to blaze a way over hill and dale, and to force Canadian goods into other markets. He is going to ask nobody to oblige him in any way whatever. He starts for the Imperial conference, to do business with a country which, in the fiscal year 1929, bought $290,000,000 worth of products from us, and from which we bought products to the value of $190,000,000.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: Under what government?

Mr. RALSTON: He goes to do business with a country which in the year ending September, 1930 had bought something like $94,000,000 worth of products from us more than we bought from them. He starts out with this policy, to drive products into their market—what is his method? He first puts up the tariff against Great Britain 25 per cent or 30 per cent, and then starts out with his axe, or stick of dynamite; if he is blasting he will take dynamite, and if he is blazing he will take the axe. He starts for Great Britain in order to inaugurate his policy, and his offer, shorn of any unnecessary verbiage, is that Great Britain should undertake to buy Canada's wheat, but that there should be no corresponding undertaking from Canada to buy British goods.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: Oh, yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I will deal with that in a moment, if my hon. friend will just permit me to continue. Then the right hon. Prime Minister quoted the attitude of the different dominions, and I understood him to say that the dominions were all behind him.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: Let us examine the facts and see if that is so. As I said a moment ago, during the year 1929 Canada had a favourable balance of trade with Great Britain amounting to practically $100,000,000. During the year ending September, 1930, the year ending just as my right hon. friend went over to Great Britain, Canada had had a favourable trade balance with Great Britain of $94,000,000. We sold to Great Britain goods to the value of $264,000,000 and bought goods to the value of $170,000,000. What was the situation in connection with Australia? Australia had an adverse balance; Australia had bought more goods from Great Britain than Great Britain had bought from her. South Africa had an adverse balance; South Africa had bought more goods from Great Britain than Great Britain had bought from her. The Irish Free State was in the same position and it would not have been unnatural perhaps if the prime ministers of these countries had been a bit insistent about their position in view of the fact that they were giving such a large proportion of their trade to Great Britain compared with what they were getting. But compare the attitude of my right hon. friend with the attitude of the gentlemen whom he says backed him up. His attitude was one of insistence; their attitude was one of conciliation. Here are some of the phrases which appear in my right hon. friend's presentation: "take without delay the steps necessary," "no room for compromise," "no possibility of avoiding the issue," "time for plain speaking," "the day is now at hand," "decide once and for all," "delay is hazardous," "the time for action has come," "other projects have been carefully canvassed and while we would avoid anything which might savour of premature condemnation we are constrained to state that none of them can be accepted by Canada as alternatives at all likely to achieve the purpose," "universal acceptance," "deliberations must be governed by the time factor," "if this change in our economic relationship is to be made it must be made without delay."

That is what my right hon. friend the Prime Minister said, and he came back to Canada and told us that the gentlemen representing New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and the Irish Free State backed him up. Just let us have a look at the position taken by Australia, for instance. In his address the other day my hon. friend quoted something from what the Prime Minister of Australia said. I refer to page 63 of Hansard, where my right hon. friend quoted Mr. Scullin as having said:

I have outlined in broad principle what Australia is prepared to do.

He did not quote to us however what Mr. Scullin had said Australia was prepared to do. Let us listen to it, and see if it sounds like the attitude taken by my right hon. friend when he was putting his proposition.

Here is what the Prime Minister of Australia was prepared to do, as appears on page 41 of the report of the conference:

I have spoken about the value of the Australian market and of the preferences we extend to British trade because the very fact that we already do so much makes it more difficult for Australia to find further methods of help compared with another country that had done less. Australia, is, however, willing as a part of a definite policy of Imperial economic cooperation, to examine every method of assistance. We will willingly consult with the representatives of your manufacturers to see if it is possible, without sacrificing any important Australian interests, to afford a greater degree of preference to certain goods and we will also sympathetically consider any representations which your manufacturers may desire to make in regard to the administration of our preferential system.

Compare that attitude with the attitude of my right hon. friend who puts the tariff wall up so high that British goods cannot get over it, and then wants to give a preference by adding another 10 per cent to that tariff against foreign goods. Mr. Scullin was ready to give a greater preference, and then he went on to say:

. . . .I must definitely declare that tariff preference is, in our opinion, much the most satisfactory form of help.

In making this statement, I must not be considered as attempting any form of dictation. It is for the government and parliament to decide what methods, if any, shall be adopted. We will cooperate in any practical plan which may be jointly approved. I should, however, be wanting in frankness if I did not make our position clear.

Does that sound like supporting the Prime Minister of Canada? Does that sound as if it were backing him up? Did our Prime Minister propose a greater preference? I say that the Prime Minister of Australia was here proposing directly the reverse of the proposition which the Prime Minister of Canada had made.

What about Mr. Forbes? My right hon. friend read an extract from his remarks, declaring that Mr. Forbes was behind him. Let us see to what extent Mr. Forbes supported my right hon. friend. In the extract which the right hon. gentleman read, and which appears at page 63 of Hansard, this is what Mr. Forbes said:

As a second step, I feel that a tariff preference in this country in favour of empire products (including foodstuffs), accompanied—

Note this.

—by increased preference in favour of British goods in the overseas empire—

And so forth. Does that sound like backing up the Prime Minister of Canada, who says in effect: "I will not permit any change in the policy I propose. We have examined all alternatives and this is the only one we can accept"? Mr. Forbes proposed a greater preference to British goods. The Prime Minister of Canada does intimate in one place that there may be a greater preference, but he proposes it by raising a higher wall against foreign goods and not by lowering the wall between Canada and British goods. He does it by putting up this mock preference a little higher.

My right hon. friend says, in his speech, "So you have New Zealand behind Canada." Well, these are two of the gentlemen who are said to have supported the Prime Minister of Canada in respect to that proposition. Let me read one extract more, which I regard as illuminating. It shows the position of the Prime Minister of New Zealand. I wish my right hon. friend the Prime Minister were here, so that I might ask him whether or not New Zealand was in the same position as these other countries in having an adverse balance of trade against her. I do not know, and I was not able to find out from a study of the Imperial conference report. But, as reported at page 229 of the report, these are the words with which Mr. Forbes left the conference:

We accept the position,—

That is, the position which Great Britain took, of not being able to put a duty on foodstuffs.

We accept the position, and we wish to make it clear that our regrets on this account will make no manner of difference in our attitude or in our policy towards this country. We shall return to New Zealand with the fullest determination to continue our system of preference to British goods, and to increase it where possible, and we shall leave no stone unturned to maintain and strengthen the already existing sentiment in favour of buying in the British market. On our part we leave it to the good will of the people of the United Kingdom to purchase our products wherever possible. We value that good-will very highly indeed—we reciprocate it most heartily—and we will continue to do what lies in our power to strengthen it.

With what statement did the Prime Minister of Canada leave Great Britain? This is what he said:

But if her proposal is to be thus contemptuously rejected Canadians can only accept the rejection and act accordingly by embracing other means at hand of further strengthening her economic position in the world.

I put these two statements side by side. The Prime Minister suggests that Mr. Forbes backed him up. That is the way he backed him up, and that is the attitude he took on that occasion.

Now for South Africa. They had an adverse balance of trade, and the representative of that dominion said that:

South Africa would welcome the extension of trade relations in the commonwealth by agreements providing for reciprocal tariff benefits, ... and we hope that it will be possible at this conference to devise means by which we shall be able to sell more of our produce to her—

That is, Great Britain.

—and also to be in a position to take more of her products.

That is the attitude of the Prime Minister of South Africa. Mr. McGilligan referred to the adverse balance against the Irish Free State and he expressed the hope that the exchange would rapidly extend in scope and value. Sir Richard Squires, the Prime Minister of Newfoundland, referred to the fact that his country was in a somewhat different position on account of her international trade, mentioning Greece and other countries.

My right hon. friend quotes these prime ministers as backing him up. Australia, South Africa and the Irish Free State all had adverse balances of trade against them whereas Canada had a favourable balance of trade. That is the first point to be noted. In the second place, Australia and New Zealand definitely suggested greater preferences, and South Africa suggested it in general terms. Not one of them approved of the Prime Minister's offer, with which I shall deal in a moment, and which is the really important thing, because it showed the practical application of his general suggestion. They spoke of reciprocal preferences, but not one agreed with the offer of the Prime Minister. Every one of them was flexible and accommodating, whereas my right hon. friend, on the other hand, was unbending and dogmatic. That was the difference in the presentation of their respective cases by the various prime ministers.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: You don't know what you are talking about.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. RALSTON: I am perfectly willing to be asked questions but I must object to such an interruption. I wish to point out more particularly that my right hon. friend, although he talked considerably about what was done at the Imperial conference, did not vouchsafe to the house the slightest explanation of the offer which he made and of the action which was going to exemplify how his general theory would be applied in practice. We must therefore take it that his offer was as has been frequently stated. This is the effect of it: Before leaving Canada he puts up the tariff against Great Britain, and then goes to Great Britain and says, "If you will put a duty on wheat against Russia, the Argentine and everywhere else except the Dominion, we will raise our general tariff by 10 per cent; but we will not put that 10 per cent on the portion of the wall between us and you, which is already so high as to be prohibitive and unscalable by you with your goods."

Mr. MacDOUGALL: May I ask my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: If my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: I want to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MacDOUGALL: Why? Have I not the right—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston) has indicated that he does not wish to pause in his speech to listen to questions. The hon. member will kindly allow him to continue.

Mr. RALSTON: I must slightly correct that statement, Mr. Speaker. I indicated that in view of the nature of the interruption I did not propose to take up time answering questions.

Now, that is the offer which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister made to Great Britain. I do not yet know, and I do not know whether this country knows, whether there was to be a 10 per cent duty imposed by Britain on wheat. He later explained his offer by saying that this 10 per cent was not 10 per cent on the value of the goods, not 10 per cent ad valorem, but was only a 10 per cent increase in the rate of duty. In other words, if the rate were 30 per cent it would not be increased to 40 per cent but to 33 per cent. How that would apply to Great Britain I do not know. Great Britain has no duty on wheat. Whether she would start with a duty of 10 per cent and add a tenth to that, or whether she would start with a duty of 3 per cent, I do not know. The Prime Minister has not told us, but it looks to me as if what my right hon. friend was asking from Great Britain might have been that she should impose a duty of 10 per cent on her foodstuffs in return for a preference of 3 per cent given by us. My right hon. friend has not vouchsafed any explanation so that we do not know what his view is.

We have read this offer and we have wondered just who really was the author. Three ministers accompanied the Prime Minister to Great Britain. I know the judicial mind of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) and I know that he would be able to sift a proposition and decide whether or not it contained convincing argument and logic. In examining this offer I find it hard to bring myself to believe that the hon. Minister of Justice was consulted with regard to that particular offer. I know the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) but I do not believe that his commercial sense is such that he would consider an offer of this kind as being good business. I can hardly picture him sitting around the council board with the right hon. the Prime Minister, listening to the reading of this memorandum and giving it his approval as a proposal which would appeal to an already good customer. I know my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Dupre), who seems to be the only member of the cabinet present at the conference who is in the house at this moment. I know his grace and affability and the inborn politeness of his race, and I can hardly conceive of his making any such blunt and dogmatic proposal as this one. As for the Prime Minister, he is an adornment to the profession of the advocate and he knows what presentation will carry his hearers with him, and I sometimes doubt whether even he was the author and initiator of this proposal. I wonder sometimes whether the gentleman who is now the minister designate to the United States may not have been trying out his hand on state documents and practising for the work of ministerial notes and ambassadorial messages. If this was the case, brilliant though he is said to be, one could wish he had experimented on something less important and not so fraught with serious consequences to Canada. In any case, the Premier salesman for Canada is the one who is responsible for this offer. We do not make a personal complaint against him, but we do complain that in his official capacity he has not observed what would appear to be the ordinary principles of salesmanship, that is, first, the creating of an atmosphere of good will and confidence, and secondly, having the other party feel that he is getting a square deal.

Judged by these standards the question is whether my hon. friend has been successful. What has he done? First, through his insistence, his dogmatism and his attitude of excluding any form of bargain but his own, he has created an atmosphere of irritation and annoyance. Secondly, he asked and almost demanded that Great Britain change completely her fiscal policy; that country was to make a complete right about face in the taxation of her food. Thirdly, he proposes to pay for this with what a great many people believe to be an absolutely worthless gesture. I do not think he can blame the people of Great Britain if they looked a little askance at the proposal which he made. However, he seemed to be annoyed with some of the gentlemen over there. The right hon. gentleman prides himself on using plain and blunt language, but when those gentlemen copied his mannerism he complained. I read a moment ago the rather curt rejoinder which he made, that Canada would make economic arrangements somewhere else if her offer was to be thus contemptuously rejected. I wonder where he and his government propose to make these other economic arrangements.

An hon. MEMBER: Washington.

Mr. RALSTON: No, not Washington. The right hon. Prime Minister stated the other evening that it was other intra-empire arrangements. I wonder how much wheat we will be able to sell to New Zealand or to Australia or South Africa. In 1929 we sold to the other dominions something like $54,000,000 worth of goods, while during the same period we sold to Great Britain $290,000,000 worth, and of this 54 millions only $15,000,000 represented agricultural products. How does my right hon. friend propose to carry out the threat which he made when he left Great Britain, about these other arrangements?

My right hon. friend also remarked that his attitude had been approved by all the newspapers in Great Britain with the exception of one. My time will not permit me to read the extracts which I have from different journals in Great Britain, but the following appeared in the New Statesman on November 1, 1930:

> Mr. Bennett may have hoped but can hardly have believed that we should fall for his preposterous offer.

That does not seem to approve very warmly the proposal made by my right hon. friend. On October 25, 1930, the same paper stated:

> The fact is that a Canada dominated by manufacturers who are determined to keep the home market to themselves cannot offer anything to British manufacturers which is comparable in importance to a protected position in the British market for Canada's wheat.

The Nation and Atheneum of October 18, 1930, contained an article strongly criticizing his offer, which my time will not permit me to read. The following is a paragraph from the Spectator of October 25, 1930:

> There is no doubt that protectionists are less in love with Mr. Bennett's proposal than they were at first sight. His first ambiguous language encouraged the belief that he was making a more generous offer than it now turns out to be. He was supposed to be offering a 10 per cent preference but it now turns out to be a three per cent preference.

The Round Table of December, 1930, contains the following:

> Two months previously he (Mr. Bennett) had sharply raised the tariff duties on Great Britain's chief lines of exports to Canada, notably on textiles and now he was demanding a wholesale change in the British fiscal system without making any suggestion of a compensating diminution of the British preferential rates in the Canadian tariff, the present higher level of which can scarcely fail to cause a curtailment of British exports to Canada.

I commend these extracts to the attention of the house in view of what my right hon. friend has said as to the attitude taken by the British journals. I might mention also the very critical attitude taken by the Manchester Guardian and by the Herald.

Mr. MANION: Has the hon. gentleman any extracts from daily papers other than the Manchester Guardian?

Mr. RALSTON: I have here only the extracts which I have quoted. I mentioned the Manchester Guardian and the Herald which both referred to the matter in a way which did not indicate a great deal of approval of the Prime Minister's proposal.

An hon. MEMBER: Why does not the hon. member quote the others?

Mr. RALSTON: That is the situation which exists in Great Britain. My right hon. friend seems to think that the atmosphere today is better than ever before. If it is better than before, and if relations are not strained, it is not because of but in spite of what has been done by this government and by my right hon. friend. It is because of the proverbial self-restraint of our friends overseas. They are the ones to whom credit should be given, and all the more when we remember not alone the attitude taken by my right hon. friend but also the attitude taken by the gentleman who has lately been appointed High Commissioner to Great Britain, who took upon himself to state what he proposes to do in Great Britain. I will quote very briefly from his remarks before leaving Canada, as follows:

> Now, I am not going over there to sell wheat. I am going to London with the hope that I may be able to do something to remould or revive the contemporary spirit of the British people. My observations over there are brief and perhaps unreliable. In the old country patriotic fervour, British persistence, British traditions, have to a large extent broken down.

He speaks of unemployment, and continues:

> I can assure you I never would have thought of leaving the happy hunting-grounds which I have enjoyed here for some time, if I did not think there was a real need for somebody to revive the old spirit of pride and self-respect for their country.

He then followed that up by a statement which appeared in the British newspapers to the effect that he deprecated very much the idea of the slogan, "Buy British goods made in England by British labour." Remember, Mr. Speaker, that this complaint is made by a gentleman appointed by a government which got into power on the slogan "Canda first", and the essence of whose policy is, they say, the welfare of the home producer. This is the audacious criticism made by our representative in the land of a customer who already buys nearly twice as much from us as we do from her, and this gentleman is appointed by a government whose Minister of Trade and Commerce has spent a good deal of time and considerable of the country's money in sending out letters and getting Canadian consumers to subscribe to an illuminated creed pledging themselves to buy Canadian made goods.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I believe it will be readily admitted that the condition of agriculture in Canada is the most acute problem with which the house must grapple, and the success or failure of the government will be largely determined by their attitude towards this problem and the measure of success attending their efforts to solve it. Much gratuitous advice is being given to the western farmers, very largely by men who know least about the agricultural industry. The most common admonition in this regard is to get into mixed farming. With eggs selling on the prairies at ten cents a dozen in the middle of February, and at seven cents a dozen to-day, it is quite obvious that an increase in the production of mixed farm products will not help to solve our problem. In this connection it may be pointed out that the much calumniated western farmers, in addition to raising an enormous grain crop, produce more mixed farm products such as cattle, hogs, butter, eggs and dressed poultry per capita than do the farmers of eastern Canada.

I have in my possession some figures which have been handed to me by the Bureau of Statistics and which prove that statement. For purposes of comparison I have grouped Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces together as the eastern provinces, and Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta together as the western provinces. These figures show the average number or quantity on the farms of Canada in June, 1930, for cattle and hogs, and in 1929 for butter and eggs:

	Eastern farms Per farm June, 1930	Western farms Per farm June, 1930
Cattle.	10.65	13.62
Hogs.	4.44	5.85

The quantities of butter and eggs produced are for the year 1929, the last year for which figures are available. The table continues:

	1929	1929
Butter..	345 lbs.	355 lbs.

Eggs are shown by weight rather than by the dozen.

Eggs..	291 lbs.	345 lbs.

Even these figures do not do justice to the prairie agriculturist, because there are in western Canada large areas that, owing to the shortage of water and other drawbacks that are not common in eastern Canada, are totally unsuited to mixed farming. Therefore, if we take those areas in western Canada where mixed farming is possible, the relative difference in the figures for production will be much greater than is indicated by the figures I have given. In this connection may I quote from a Regina paper of January 28 last. The article is headed:

> Professor Howes advises thought before rushing into mixed farming.
> Counselling farmers against stampeding into mixed farming on the broadcastings of advice from all parts of the country, Professor E. A. Howes, dean of the college of agriculture, Edmonton, Wednesday morning spoke to the delegates of the twenty-second annual convention of the Saskatchewan Dairy Association. The dean drew attention to sweeping arguments in favour of diversified farming which became prevalent with the drop in wheat. He recalled that the same shout had gone up in favour of grain, in other years. Stating that westerners had been guilty of illogical practices in the past, he said they should try to avoid making the same mistakes again.

I do not suggest that these difficulties are peculiar to Canada. We are facing a world problem and all that can be expected of Canada is that she shall take her share of responsibility and do her part in solving her share of the problem. I have under my hand nearly 100 resolutions of various kinds passed by farm bodies, boards of trade and various public bodies in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, making recommendations to the government for the solution or the partial solution of the farm problem. Many of these advices are in direct conflict with others. Many I consider unsound and uneconomic, and if applied they would have disastrous results. Others again I consider practicable, but owing to the fact that public opinion is not ready for them I would not expect this government or any other government to apply them at the present time. Not only, however, do I consider others practicable, but I believe public opinion is ready for them and I propose to make to the government some concrete suggestions based on the latter class. These I will summarize under seven heads as follows:

1. Necessary adjustments in the monetary system to enable it better to serve the purpose for which it was created.

2. Elimination of (a) advertising, (b) salesmanship, and (c) collection costs in connection with the selling price of farm implements.

3. Reduction in domestic grain rates to the level of export freight rates.

4. Elimination of immigration activities on the part of our railway companies and the amount thus saved to be passed on to the farmers in reduced freight rates.

5. Enforcement of the 7 per cent clause in the Bank Act.

6. Governmental action towards amortization of existing farm mortgages in western Canada and reduction in interest rates.

7. That every possible effort be made to secure a preference for our wheat in the British market at the coming Imperial conference and that we offer in exchange a substantial reduction in the duty on British manufactured goods.

With respect to number one, the time allotted to me, namely forty minutes, will not suffice to give a full expression of my opinion with regard to the monetary system, and a brief reference will have to do. Mr. C. E. Neil, President of the Royal Bank of Canada, in an address delivered some time ago. to the shareholders of that bank, said that if the central banks of the outstanding countries of the world were to adopt a common policy, they could at will stabilize, raise or lower commodity prices. That is not a new doctrine. It has frequently been expounded from these benches; it has often been enunciated by professors of political economy, but seldom before has it been put forward by an orthodox banker and a banker of the standing of Mr. C. E. Neil. This means in effect that the banks really have in the hollow of their hands the power to create conditions of prosperity or depression.

May I be permitted to quote another distinguished financier? This is an article in MacLean's magazine of January 15 last, by Mr. T. B. Macaulay, President of the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada. Referring to the drop in the commodity price level, Mr. Macaulay says:

> It has been the chief cause of the severity of this depression.

Then he goes on to say:

> There is a fairly general agreement among economists that this drop in the average price of commodities has been caused by a lessening of the purchasing power of the dollar, which in turn depends on the amount of dollar currency and currency credits outstanding.

Then further on, he states:

> It is admitted that in the United States the purchasing power of the dollar depends entirely on the amount of currency and currency credits which the federal reserve authorities may permit to be outstanding.

No statement could be clearer than that last one. This statement comes not from a political economist, not from a member of the group to which I belong, but from an outstanding banker, one of the most outstanding in Canada. His opinion should be convincing proof of the contentions put forward from these benches many many times in the past. In the address to which I referred, Mr. Neil placed the responsibility for the present depression largely on the Federal Reserve Bank of the United States because that bank in the fall of 1929 drastically deflated and curtailed credits. I think therefore it will be admitted generally that the price of commodities is very largely determined by the amount of money in circulation. Generally speaking I believe the statement will hardly be challenged that if you double the amount of money in circulation the price of commodities will double. That is a general statement. If the amount of money in circulation is reduced by one-half the commodity prices will drop to one-half their former amount. It is patent then that any sudden contraction in currency or credit will have a disastrous effect on business. Agriculture always suffers more than any other industry because of its unorganized condition. During a period of depression manufacturers are able to reduce their output by laying off their employees and perhaps by getting together and stabilizing prices. Our farmers are in competition and therefore they are not able to do that. The extent to which the industry of agriculture suffers in comparison with the manufacturing industry is clearly set forth in a bulletin issued by the Bank of Nova Scotia for the month of March. On page 2 of this bulletin there is a very interesting chart with a line indicating the relative drop in the price of various commodities. Taking the figure 100 as a basis of high prices in September of 1929 the chart shows that manufactured goods have dropped to only 85 while farm products have dropped to 54. The comment is as follows:

> From September, 1929 to date the index of farm products has declined by 46 per cent, while that of manufactured goods is only 15 per cent lower.

Without at the moment considering any fundamental changes in the monetary system may I suggest that there should be one or more experts who would have power to supervise and in a measure control the whole banking system. These men should have the power to check any drastic action or anything in the way of inflation or deflation, except when those conditions exist only in very moderate degree. In this connection may I refer to a distinguished economist, Sir George Paish. In the spring of the year 1929 he predicted that we were facing the greatest financial crash in history. At that time his statement was not taken seriously by business men or economists and certainly not by the great majority of the financial class. The position of many of these financiers reminds me of a great many people who drive motor cars. We find thousands of men and women driving high powered motor cars who are quite capable drivers so long as nothing goes wrong with the motor. They are able to start and stop their machine, to apply the brakes properly and may be classed as reasonably good drivers. However they have no conception whatever of the mechanical operation of the cars under their control. They know nothing at all about the principle of internal combustion engines or how the power is applied from the motor to the car itself. When anything goes wrong they are absolutely helpless and must employ the services of a mechanic. It seems to me that a great many of our outstanding financiers are in the same position. As long as things run smoothly they can operate the machine very satisfactorily, and are able to make money by the operation. When something goes wrong, however, they do not know what is the trouble and it requires a man of the stamp of Sir George Paish to point it out. In all seriousness I would recommend to the government the employment of such a man to advise and assist us in dealing with existing conditions.

Very great hardships are imposed upon business people and farmers in periods of deflation by the change in the value of debts. Those who borrowed money in 1918, 1919 and 1920 actually secured a 50 cent dollar and were obliged to pay back in the deflation period following that at the rate of 100 cents on the dollar. Their debts were actually doubled. This applies to public as well as to private debts. As a matter of fact it is in these inflation periods that most of our borrowing is done because that is the only time money is plentiful, when banks are handing it out quite freely and mortgage and other financial institutions have an abundance of cash. Most of our debts, public and private, are created in those inflation periods, and it is because of that fact we are suffering at the present time.

Let me give the house a simple illustration of how, in my opinion, this system works. We will take the case of a baker whose responsibility it is to supply the community with bread. He bakes 1,000 loaves of bread daily, sufficient for the needs of the community. In order to secure financial support or something of that nature he makes an arrangement with a banking corporation and agrees to give the bank a monopoly of the issue of bread tickets and at the same time binds himself to sell the bread over the counter only in exchange for bread tickets. In the regular course of events 1,000 people present themselves at the bank and ask for 1,000 tickets. The tickets are purchased and those people are in a position to go to the bake shop and secure bread. As long as matters run smoothly the system works very well, and there is no disturbance whatever. One day, however, these 1,000 people present themselves at the bank; the banker shrugs his shoulders and states, "Why, bread tickets are scarce; I have instructions from head office to curtail their issue." The people in the community have the money in their pockets to buy 1,000 loaves of bread; the consuming capacity of the community equals the 1,000 loaves of bread. Yet that community must suffer privation because of what?—because of the scarcity of cardboard. That is about all it amounts to. I know I will be told that the analogy is not correct; I will be told the trouble to-day is that we have not sufficient money. I want to draw a distinction between real money and the circulating medium. In this case the cardboard is the circulating medium; the real money of the farmer is the wheat, cattle, hogs, butter and eggs which he produces. The real money of the workingman is the labour of his hands. The only function of a circulating medium is to provide means by which people can exchange their commodities for what they need. When the monetary system fails to do that I say it has failed—as ours has at the present time—in its primary function. May I quote from an article in MacLean's magazine of January 15 last from the pen of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). This is a thoughtful diagnosis of the present situation and does credit to the minister who wrote it. In part it says:

> One is forced to admit that there is no overproduction, but on the other hand there is under-consumption and what is worse, maldistribution.

In summing up his argument in this regard the minister says:

> That, to my mind, is the chief problem calling for immediate consideration by all who would preserve our present-day civilization.

Those are strong words, and they must be taken seriously, particularly coming from a minister of the crown. I do not think they are a bit too strong. The minister says that we must solve this problem of mal-distribution if present-day civilization is to be preserved. In my opinion—and I think I can get a good deal of support for it—the faulty credit system is the biggest single factor in what the minister calls mal-distribution.

With regard to number two, Russia, our greatest competitor in the wheat market to-day, is purchasing her implements at cost, plus f.o.b. factory. There are no advertising costs, no collection costs, no salesmanship costs in connection with the price at which Russia is securing her farm implements. Those implements are going to Russian farms at prices far below those at which our farmers are able to secure them. I believe by the elimination of the factors mentioned these implements could be sold to our farmers at from 35 to 40 per cent less than the prices we have to pay for them to-day. I know those figures may seem extreme, it may be hard to credit them, but they are based on figures which have been quoted to me by responsible officials of at least two of our great agricultural implement manufacturers. The losses by bad debts, for instance, are immense, and under the accounting system of the companies those losses are charged up to collection costs. Of course, if we eliminated those factors it would mean that the farmer would have to pay cash for his implements. Well, he has been buying too much on time in the past, and I believe if the price is reduced he will be able to pay cash. Under the new tariff policy inaugurated last September the government is undertaking, to some degree at least, to set prices, and in so far as they have succeeded in doing so—and I must confess I have not been able to prove any instances where they have not succeeded—it proves that governments can set prices. I would suggest to the government that they undertake an examination of this question and use the legislative club, if necessary, to bring about a reform in that regard. A few days ago the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Bowman) made what I considered a very valuable suggestion to the house. He said that the question of the price of farm implements should be referred to the committee on agriculture. I commend and support that suggestion, and would suggest also that this particular angle of the elimination of the factors I have mentioned be taken up by the committee and that it make definite recommendations thereon. If we are to be able to meet the competition of Russia in the great markets of the world we must remove every possible handicap from the grain-growing industry, and while this is only one of the handicaps, yet to my mind it is a very important one indeed.

With regard to number three, the difference between the export and domestic freight rates on grain, the farmers in British Columbia and in the eastern provinces are obliged to pay about double the export freight rates on our coarse grains, and this has been a big factor in eliminating almost the only market we have for those grains to-day. Instead of quoting my own figures, perhaps I could not do better than give the house a few extracts from an address delivered by Dean Shaw of the Saskatchewan college of agriculture. It was published in the Western Producer of January 22nd last. He said:

> Just how do these rates operate? For instance, a car of grain may be shipped from Saskatoon to Liverpool on a rate of 62 cents per cwt. or to Copenhagen for a few cents more.
> However, if a Canadian farmer living in the eastern townships of Quebec, say Sherbrooke, wants to secure a similar car of grain from Saskatoon he must pay 57½ cents per cwt. from Saskatoon to Montreal and 13 cents per cwt. from Montreal to Sherbrooke, or a total rate of 70½ cents per cwt.
>
> If he lives in Truro, Nova Scotia, it will cost him 74 cents per cwt. If he lives in central Ontario, say at Guelph, it will cost him a rate of 65½ cents per cwt. Now let us ship this car of grain westward, via Vancouver and the Panama canal, to Liverpool. To do this will cost about 57 cents per cwt. but if a farmer in British Columbia, located at Langley, some thirty miles or so from Vancouver, wants to purchase a similar car of grain and ship it from Saskatoon, it will cost him just 50½ cents per cwt. although the part of the export rate from Saskatoon to Vancouver is just 24 cents per cwt.
>
> Take another instance. If I wish to purchase a carload of grain at Melfort, Sask., and ship it to Assiniboia, Sask., a distance of about 300 miles, it will cost 24½ cents per cwt. The same car of grain could go to Fort William for 22 cents per cwt. from Melfort, or from Assiniboia to Fort William for 22 cents per cwt., although in either of the latter cases the distance is three times as far.

He goes on to say:

> A direct result is that eastern Canadian farmers are unable to use western Canadian grain. Instead, they use large quantities of corn imported from the United States and the Argentine. It is not used because it is better, but largely because it is cheaper.

Now, in regard to number four, figures quoted a few years ago before the special railway committee were to the effect that the Canadian National Railways were spending annually upwards of $800,000 a year on immigration. It is reasonable to suppose that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would be spending a like amount. In my opinion the immigration activities of these two companies are not only unwarranted and unnecessary from a national standpoint, they are actually harmful to the agricultural industry, because by uneconomically putting more people on the land and increasing production they have lowered the standard of living of our farmers.

With regard to number five, bank interest, let me say that the farmers of the west are being charged from 9 to 10 per cent on past due bank loans. A 7 per cent maximum rate is provided by the Bank Act, but it is being evaded by technicalities. Governmental action in this regard is long overdue, and I appeal to the government to see to it that the original intention of parliament in this regard is carried out.

Now, with respect to number six, the question of farm mortgages. In my opinion the greatest single problem facing the farmers of western Canada to-day is the mortgage indebtedness against their lands. Undisputed possession of a piece of land is fundamental to everything else in the agricultural industry. Recently in the Saskatchewan legislature a figure of $215,000,000 was quoted as the value of the mortgages applying against Saskatchewan farms, and $32,000,000 as the Saskatchewan farmers' annual interest bill on all indebtedness—mortgages, bank loans, implement notes, and so on. The interest on farm mortgages is 8 per cent and in some cases 9 per cent. Recently I read a statement by, I think, Sir John Aird in which he referred to interest on bank loans in the west as being at 7 per cent.

I understand that in some parts of the province of Manitoba money is being loaned to the farmers on mortgages at 7 per cent, but in twenty-five years of residence in the province of Saskatchewan I have never known of a single instance where a farmer secured money from a mortgage company at less than 8 per cent, and in some cases I might point out that they are paying 9 per cent. Bank interest, notwithstanding the Bank Act, is from 8 per cent to 10 per cent. Implement notes, for the most part, bear an interest rate of 9 per cent. No industry can stand a tax of this kind, and I would suggest legislative action to put a limit of 7 per cent on all interest indebtedness. I am not at all concerned with the fear sometimes expressed that the imposition of any restriction of that kind on the banks or mortgage companies will create hardship to the farmers by limiting the amount of money available. Let me say that if a farmer has to pay more than 7 per cent for money he is better off not to get the money at all. We have had too much false development in western Canada, too much money put out indiscriminately to develop the country which, instead of doing good, has worked a hardship on the community and has reacted unfavourably.

Mr. ARTHURS: Just for information would the hon. gentleman tell me approximately what he considers the amount of mortgages given for the purchase of land originally?

Mr. CAMPBELL: That would be very difficult to tell, because a great many of these mortgages never have been paid off. A man buys land under a sale agreement; later on when the amount owing is reduced, he will be asked to get a mortgage company to pay it off, so that question would be very difficult to answer.

I have many resolutions under my hand suggesting that the government take over the farm mortgages. That is one of the things for which I do not believe public opinion in Canada is prepared, so I do not expect the government to go into that business and take over all these mortgages. I know at the present time, in the present state of public opinion, it cannot be done, but I do believe there are middle courses which might be pursued. I would suggest to the government that they examine the French system. Some years ago the French government forced all the mortgage companies to amalgamate and they created one company that was given a monopoly of mortgage loans in France. I know we are all afraid of monopolies; I am just as much afraid of them as anybody, but if a monopoly can reduce costs and if those reduced costs are passed on to the common people, I say a monopoly of that kind is what we want, and I am not afraid of it. I suggest that if such a policy should be pursued, the practice followed in France should be adopted here and the interest rate set by the government. I understand that the French government, through some official body, controls this mortgage company very much in the same way our railway commission controls the operations of our railway companies. I do suggest to the government that something along this line be taken into consideration.

Mr. GEARY: Is any reason given by the banks for demanding such a high rate of interest?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I notice Sir John Aird, in his statement which appeared in the press a few days ago, gives as one reason for the high interest rates the enormous losses which the banks took in western Canada. My reply is that if they are using poor judgment in lending money to men on land that should not be lent, then they have no right to penalize the whole industry. Let them use better judgment and be more careful about the loans they make.

Mr. ARTHURS: The banks do not lend money on land.

Mr. CAMPBELL: As a matter of fact the banks have a great deal of money in land, it is loaned directly in the first place, and then it is secured by a mortgage later on. The banks are in the land game to-day almost as much as the mortgage companies are in it. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) suggests that the excessive interest rates increase the risks, and that is quite true. It is my opinion that unless something is done farmers as a class will disappear in western Canada, and a landless tenantry will take the place of the sturdy, self-reliant yeoman farmers who have brought that country to its present state of development. This is too terrible to contemplate, and something should be done before it is too late.

With regard to my seventh point, recognizing the fact that Great Britain is almost the only market for our wheat, the future of the grain growing industry in Canada is dependent upon our ability to make some arrangement with the mother country with regard to this commodity. I do not believe this can be brought about in any other way than by offering Great Britain substantial reductions in the duty on British manufactured goods entering this country, in exchange for a preference or something of that kind in the British market. If the government makes such an offer to Great Britain at the Imperial conference, and that offer is rejected, then no blame can be attached to the government. That, at least, is one way the government can square itself with public opinion, and I earnestly appeal to the government to make some such offer before it is too late.

Before I conclude I wish to extend my congratulations to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) for the moral courage he displayed in making a public criticism of the banks, while almost, as one of the newspapers expressed it, in the shadow of St. James street. In this connection I should like to quote part of an editorial which appeared in the Western Producer for February 26:

> Hon. Robert Weir, Minister of Agriculture, has been making Canadian history by openly, and right in Montreal, criticizing the Canadian banks. Criticizing the Canadian banks is not an outlawed sport, but the number of cabinet ministers who have been known to indulge in it could be counted on the fingers of one hand of an armless man.

I think that is quite correct and not an exaggeration. Certainly I do not recollect a single instance in recent political history of a federal minister of the crown coming out and making a public criticism of these sacrosanct institutions. When I first read that statement in the newspapers I thought the minister had been misquoted, and I looked for his denial. When that did not come I looked for his resignation from the cabinet, but when that did not come I concluded that a new era had dawned. I have been sitting in this house for ten sessions, and never before have I seen members on the government benches get up one after the other and openly criticize the banks. They are not doing it because they are any different from the men who sat on the government benches for the last nine years, but simply because the Minister of Agriculture broke the ice for them.

Apart altogether from the merits of the arguments brought forward by the minister; apart altogether from whether or not the points he brought up were correct, I say it is an unhealthy condition of affairs when public men, business men and farmers speak only with bated breath of these institutions. During the last year I have had many cases placed in my hands to be taken up with the debt adjustment bureau of the province of Saskatchewan, not only by farmers but by business men as well. I have found that these men had no compunction or hesitation in placing in my hands cases having to do with mortgage companies or with machine companies, but when it came to banks it was a different thing altogether. In scores of instances I have been given the facts in connection with cases where it seemed to me the rankest kind of injustice had been practised on these men by banks, but in only two or three instances would they permit me to take up the matter with the debt adjustment bureau. In the back of their minds they had the fear that to do so would mean that they would be black-balled in securing credit in the future. I say that is not a healthy condition. It applies to business men just as much as it does to farmers, but the banks are not private institutions. They are semi-public institutions; they secure valuable privileges from parliament, and I say it is not a healthy condition when farmers, business men and public men are afraid to criticize them. They should be subject to criticism just as much as our government, just as much as any other public body; and apart altogether from the question as to whether they are dealing fairly with the people or not, I say that there is a vital principle at stake. Therefore, I congratulate not only the Minister of Agriculture on his moral courage but the government on having in its ranks a minister who has the courage to take that stand.

Mr. J. C. MOORE (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): This house, Mr. Speaker, has always accorded courtesy and indulgence to new members when for the first time they venture to present their views on current public questions, and that indulgence I would ask for myself.

No one regrets the distress of the agriculturists of the western provinces more than I, representing as I do a farming community. When the price of wheat is low, so are prices of all cereals and of many other farm products. Farmers in eastern Canada are not immune from unfavourable conditions now unhappily prevalent in the west, and speaking for my constituents may I say that most desirous are we that a brighter day will soon dawn, that measures of remedy and relief will be found possible by legislation. I may add that to this end vituperation, wailing and threatening should give place to concrete practical suggestions for amelioration. To destroy eastern industries by the medium of a low tariff will not add one penny to the price of wheat; to bankrupt the railways of Canada by lowering rates below the cost of service would be to court disaster and destroy the national credit. The one remaining bank having its head office and its operations exclusively in the west has been compelled to submit to absorption because credits extended could not be repaid by its customers.

Speaking of bank rates, I do not think it required the advice or the criticism of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) to convince me that bank rates are too high for farmers—7, 8 or 9 per cent. I do not think any bank is justified in charging more than 6 per cent to any agriculturist. That, I believe, is the legal rate of interest in the province of Quebec. Money may be loaned without expectation of return. Such is not the business of banks. Financial relief may be extended by parliament through the agency of the government to tide over a period of distress, in conviction of recompense in the long run; to which means, it seems to me, hon. members from western provinces should address themselves.

History constantly repeats itself. Like all other parts of Canada, and as in all countries, the west has had bitter days before. It has had low prices for grain, poor crops and widespread penury. Out of these the west has emerged before, and out of these the west will emerge again. I would not say to a starving man, "Have patience; live horse, and you will get grass." That is not the way of this government. It manifests its sympathy by action. What can be done consistently with the general interest will, I am confident, be done; and in the doing, private enterprise, private means and private patriotism are already rendering aid.

I would point out to hon. members from the west that agriculture is an important industry in the central and maritime provinces. But while we export many farm and dairy products our best market is at our door. Probably not less than 80 to 85 per cent of the farm commodities produced between Fort William and Halifax are consumed within Canada. The farmers' home market is their best market, and whatever contributes to the enlargement of the home market contributes to the prosperity of the farmer.

While at home I consulted one farmer as to the price of milk on the Canadian border. He is an agriculturist who is sending his milk into New York state. We hear from hon. gentlemen opposite that protection does not get the agriculturist anywhere. As hon. members know, the United States is a highly protected country; it has always been from its infancy. There is no richer country in the world than the United States; there is no country in the world where all the people enjoy the luxuries they do in the United States. This man is still sending his milk there. He is paying 76 cents duty on his milk per hundred, and in the month of February was receiving $1.46½ clear, while the farmers who are keeping their milk at home and manufacturing it in the creameries are receiving $1 and less. Still hon. gentlemen opposite will tell us that protection does not get a country anywhere. For years along the border in the county of Chateauguay-Huntingdon they have been sending milk to the United States, and for the last ten or twelve years they have been getting very often from 75 cents to $1 more for their milk than they were getting in Canada. Why? Because they have a market and population. And can we have a population without industry? If we are ever to have a home market for our farmers we must have protection. If the tariff to-day were entirely swept away and free trade substituted, is there any hon. gentleman opposite who can truthfully say that he would find a market for our wheat? They know better. Still we hear from opposite benches a great deal about free trade and low tariff.

Industries are essential to the creation of a home market, and in the rural parts of Quebec and, I believe, of all eastern provinces, there are no more ardent supporters of a fiscal policy as a means of promoting industry than the agricultural classes. My colleague, the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Pickel), in his admirable speech, dealt fully with the injuries suffered by the farmers under the policy of the late government, more particularly in respect to the gratuitous extension to New Zealand of the Australian treaty, with the result that butter was becoming a lost art in Canada. I will not allude further to this particular industry other than to say that as with butter so with every product of the farm. The agriculturists of the counties which I have the honour to represent demand a fiscal policy which will reserve to them their home markets, allowing domestic competition to ensure the regulation of prices.

The farmers of the west will in time to come possess a large home market created by the establishment of manufacturing industries in that portion of the country. The history of the United States shows a time when political power in that country was centered in the south; Virginia supplied her presidents. Then came a time when the eastern states, by reason of the increased population caused by the growth of industry, became most powerful. Then the great west was thrown open, a large agricultural population sprang up, which, as is now the case in many parts of our own northwest, clamoured for a low tariff. However, with increasing population and improved transportation facilities there came about the establishment of factories and mills, until at the present day not only the centre of population but also the centre of industry has moved west in the United States, and in no part of that country is the policy of fiscal protection more strongly advocated. In our Canadian northwest there will be a repetition of the experience of the United States. Important manufacturing industries already have been established there; others will follow, and nothing is more certain than that the day will come when the home markets of the prairie farmers will provide a profitable outlet for the products of mixed farming.

During this debate as well as during the last elections we had from the mouth of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) a multitude of figures illustrative of the expansion of trade during his regime. He has attempted to show increases in bank deposits, in the circulation of currency, in railway traffic, and has given other instances of growing prosperity. I do not dispute these figures or facts, but it is pertinent to ask: Why did not the government of the right hon. gentleman continue this prosperity? What caused it to alter its course and suddenly turn a deaf ear and display a marble heart to the people of Canada? If his government made prosperity, why did it not continue that prosperity? That is a fair question. No government can attribute to itself credit for good times without incurring responsibility for bad times. That times were bad during the later months of the Liberal rule nobody can deny. A great deal has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite about times being bad since the Bennett government came into power, but not one is ready to admit —in playing politics you can hardly expect them to do so—that the bad times started long before the Mackenzie King administration went out of power.

A few figures will prove this statement. In the five months ended August 31, 1930, the Dominion revenue was $26,380,000 less than for the corresponding period in the preceding year, while expenditures were $7,519,000 greater. During that brief period practically all the large surplus of 1929-30 had disappeared and the public revenue rapidly was running into the deficit with which the present government is faced. Foreign commerce, upon which the right hon. leader of the opposition laid so much stress, during the five months ended August 31, 1930, amounted to $788,241,000, being $267,835,000 less than the same period in 1929, a decrease of 25 per cent. No one can contradict these easily remembered facts. Why did the Liberal government permit of a shrinkage amounting to one-quarter of Canada's foreign trade if, as it has so often boasted, it had the policy and the power to extend that commerce? The only answer is that the boastings of hon. gentlemen opposite are nothing but pure bunk.

I question no man's patriotism, but I am bound to say that the revelation of it made by some is peculiar. There are—

> Those steady patriots of the world alone,
> The friends of every country but their own.

World-wide patriotism in matters material may suit hon. gentlemen opposite but it does not appeal to me. I have been amazed to hear apologies made in this house for the Russian soviet and its ways, and have been astounded at the fact that for a few shekels men in this house and in this country are willing to place in the hands of the bolshevists weapons which may destroy the industrial life of Canada, disrupt our social system and degrade our standard of living. Give me instead men of whom it can be said:

> Such is the patriot's boast, where'er we roam,
> His first, best country ever is at home.

The proclaimed policy of the Conservative party is "Canada first." To the well-being, the happiness, the prosperity of Canadian people, our efforts are devoted and our measures directed. The pledges of the Prime Minister made during the last elections were accepted by the majority of the people and already they have been very largely fulfilled. They are to be further implemented during this present session and I have implicit confidence that ere long every one of them will be redeemed to the great gain and contentment of the people of Canada.

I was rather disappointed in the speech of the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth (Mr. Ralston). I expected to hear a speech of much higher calibre, as he is one for whom I think the majority of hon. members have a good deal of admiration. He seemed to have deserted the high plane upon which he usually conducts his discussions of public matters and to have resorted to camouflage. It is not my purpose to discuss at any length the last Imperial conference, but the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition upon this subject reminded me of an interesting and amusing book recently published, entitled "If It Had Happened Otherwise," being the speculations of a number of authors as to the consequences to mankind if certain titanic struggles had had a different termination. We all admit, I suppose, that if the conclusions of the Imperial conference had been otherwise, the consequences would have been different; but no one, I venture to say, will for a moment impute to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald or Mr. Philip Snowden partisan motives when they rejected the scheme of preferential tariffs, or assume that the views of those gentlemen were influenced by the fact that the Prime Minister and not the leader of the opposition represented Canada at the conference.

The reaction upon the minds of the people of Canada to the attitude of the Prime Minister at the conference was, as it could not well fail to be, most favourable. For what was the Prime Minister's proposal, in plain, understandable language? It was that the prime ministers of the British commonwealth of nations should sit down and earnestly endeavour to devise a means of promoting mutual trade to the advantage and strengthening of the British Empire. That proposal is to receive further consideration in this city at an early date. It has not been rejected; a decision upon it has merely been postponed. Whether a favourable conclusion will come out of the adjourned conference is in the lap of the gods, but of this I am certain, that the people of Canada desire a policy of preferential trade within the empire and applaud the clear, firm, understandable attitude taken by the Prime Minister in London. He at least spoke the voice of Canada, while beside him stood the representatives of every dominion within the empire, manifesting their support.

We have heard a great deal from hon. gentleman opposite who seek to make it a reproach against the Prime Minister that he holds two cabinet positions, even though this arrangement is only temporary. The present government has been repeatedly dubbed a "one man" government. I am sorry that those members to whom I should like to address this part of my speech are not in their places this afternoon. But I will say that people in glass houses should not throw stones. The members to whom I refer, who are not in their seats this afternoon, have repeatedly twitted the Prime Minister on this being a one-man government and on his holding several portfolios at the same time. What is the situation in Quebec, where the Hon. Mr. Taschereau runs the province? I come from that province and I happen to know something about it. The Hon. Mr. Taschereau is, as everybody knows premier, provincial treasurer and attorney general. If the Prime Minister of Canada is an autocrat —and my hon. friends have dubbed him that—what will they call the Hon. Mr. Taschereau? In comparison with the Hon. Mr. Taschereau, the Prime Minister of Canada is as mild and docile as Mary's little pet lamb.

Mr. ST-PERE: You refused to elect one of your own nationality in Quebec. That is why Mr. Taschereau had to take the position of treasurer.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): I see we have some of my hon. friends over there. I thought they were all moderates this afternoon. From what I notice to-day in an Ottawa paper in connection with election contestation proceedings in Sorel, one of the Liberal voters testified on oath that he had received $50 for his vote.

Mr. JACOBS: It was a Conservative who took the money. If he had been a Liberal he would not have taken it.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): Is that a joke? A Liberal would have taken it. This is perhaps a little out of the ordinary, but I should like to illustrate the matter.

Mr. ST-PERE: It is a poor illustration so far.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): It seems as though these hon. gentlemen are getting bitter. As an illustration, it will probably be recalled that last September we had a provincial election in Huntingdon county. There was some talk of a saw-off by the Liberal party. I think they had it arranged between Huntingdon and Two Mountains. Being the federal member, I had a good deal to do with this. This is usual in such a case as the hon. member for Richelieu (Mr. Cardin), who is sitting on the other side, knows.

Mr. CARDIN: I am not ashamed of my name.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): No one is ashamed of his name. During my election campaign my hon. friend came into my riding and spoke at Ste. Martine, where he spent a good part of the afternoon, and for the first time in the history of Ste. Martine we broke even.

Mr. CARDIN: The result might have been worse otherwise.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): I am sorry I have to say this now, because it is to other members not in the chamber to-day that I should have liked to say it. Mr. Taschereau chose a provincial treasurer for himself.

Mr. ST-PERE: A good Scotchman.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): Yes, a good fellow. I told him that on the platform. He was sent into the county of Huntingdon as a bribe to the electorate of that county, but fortunately in my constituency there are a number of people of ordinary intelligence and they did not consider taking the provincial treasurer without giving him a little opposition. I might also say that an acclamation was promised by Mr. Taschereau, otherwise I do not think Mr. Scott would have been interested.

Mr. BROWN: That would be the reason Mr. Taschereau is still provincial treasurer.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): One of the reasons, the same as might apply to our own minister. We had one of the hottest contests we ever had, and this little article which I saw in an Ottawa newspaper about a Liberal having received $50 for his vote and making an affidavit to that effect, is interesting to me because they were spending thousands of dollars in the constituency, and $50 was a very ordinary amount to be paid for a vote. A certain class in the country were left somewhat better off than they were before the election. I think they were getting wise; they accepted money and voted the way they felt. However, Mr. Fisher was elected and we won also the county of Two Mountains. I think therefore we were wise not to saw off. The constituency of Two Mountains was won by the son of our illustrious Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé). The young gentleman is twenty-two years of age and already has shown that the ability of the father has been transmitted to the son.

The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) in his remarks ridiculed the tariff of the present government. I am amazed that some people do not like to hear the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier mentioned. At one time I was one of his admirers and on two occasions voted for him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Before the hon. gentleman had his eyes opened.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): Yes, probably before I had my eyes opened. I voted once or twice for Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and I will tell you the reason I changed. The chief reason is that the Conservative party has always been consistent in its platform.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And with its promises.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): The Liberal party had one platform when it was in opposition and another when it was in power.

Mr. ST-PERE: Why did the hon. gentleman vote for Sir Wilfrid Laurier?

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): I am not ashamed of my vote.

Mr. ST-PERE: We hope the hon. member will do it again. It would seem to be an instance of the conversion of a sinner.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): I had the pleasure of listening to Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1911 when he was speaking about the reciprocity pact, as he called it. I remember very clearly some of the remarks of the silver-tongued orator, on that occasion; I recall some of his statements particularly well because they were typical of the Liberal platform at that time. He said:

> These Conservatives are telling you that if this reciprocity pact, as they call it goes through, this country will be ruined. They told you when we were in opposition that if we got into power the country would be ruined. Has it been ruined since we came into power? The prosperity of the Dominion of Canada has never been so great since confederation as it has been since we assumed power.

True, they had had a prosperous period. Sir Wilfrid Laurier told, but half the truth, however; he omitted to state that the prosperity had developed through the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald. He did not say that he had opposed that policy when in opposition. Some hon. members will no doubt recall that Mr. Fielding entered the Laurier cabinet as a free trader. Am I right?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): After touring the country and realizing the value of industries in this country Mr. Fielding brought down what was known as the Laurier-Fielding tariff, which in many respects was higher than any tariff proposed by the Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOORE (Chateauguay): I am sorry some of my hon. friends on the other side have not remained in the chamber, because some of the things I am about to state will not reach the ears for which they were intended. However, may I say that we have listened to a tangled story of unrelated figures and theories—a hopeless picture has been painted. These theories revolve in circles and arrive nowhere. My hon. friends opposite advise free imports to build up a strong national constitution. They forget that from her infancy the richest nation in the world has imposed the highest duties against imports. The lines of the present government, Mr. Speaker, have not fallen on pleasant places. It has inherited from its predecessor a legacy of extravagance, of indecision in matters of high importance, of a weak and vacillating fiscal policy, of a people begging bread, crying for employment, fed with platitudes and shadows from the tomb. It has come into office in a period of world-wide depression, of stagnant trade, of unprofitable commodity prices. Its task is difficult but its courage and capacity are great. By that capacity and courage, Canada, I am satisfied, will win through to a new era of progress, prosperity and contentment.

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Toronto West Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the lone and sometimes lonely voice of Liberalism in this house from the great city of Toronto, may I at this time be permitted to participate in this interesting and very informative debate. At the outset however I would like to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to the high and honourable position you now occupy. I feel certain that I voice the sentiments of every hon. member of the house when I say that you have discharged and are discharging the duties and responsibilities of your office with diligence, dignity and distinction.

At this time may I also be privileged to extend my personal, sincere and hearty congratulations to my leader the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the inspiring and masterly address he delivered at the beginning of this debate. I believe, I express the unanimous opinion of all those hon. members who surround and support him and also the opinions of a great many hon. members who sit opposite—although they would not admit it—when I say that the speech of my right hon. leader will go down in history as one of the finest and most powerful presentations of a current political situation ever made in this house. I am sure it will prove a source of information and inspiration to all of his followers in time to come.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I also as a new member of this house and a young man express my amazement at and profound admiration for the capacity and energy of the right hon. gentleman who now leads the government. Who said this was a young man's age? The activity and capacity displayed by the right hon. gentleman clearly refutes that theory; or it may indicate that although not young in years he is still youthful in spirit. I believe it is the wish of every member of this house—certainly it is the wish of those of us on this side, although we do not entirely agree with the right hon. gentleman's policy nor with some of his activities—that he may long continue to enjoy good health and to possess as much vigour and vitality as he has already displayed in his conduct of public affairs.

But, Mr. Speaker, allow me with all respect to suggest to the right hon. gentleman that action without thought is useless; that political action without political thought is often very harmful. He and his colleagues seem to be imbued with the idea—seem to labour under the impression—that action is progress, and progress success, and in their eagerness to act they fail to pause and ponder the significance of their action and the effect of their legislation. A striking illustration of this has been furnished to us by the now famous fiasco of the duty on glass, or as one newspaper termed it, the "tragedy of effort." Another illustration has been furnished within the last two or three weeks. The government placed an embargo on furs from Russia, ostensibly to protect the Canadian fur industry. But lo and behold we find the same fur industry, every branch of it, sending a delegation to Ottawa to protest against the embargo. That is another example of political action without political thought.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had intended to present to the house some choice morsels in the way of promises and pledges made by the right hon. gentleman who by virtue of those promises and because of those pledges now occupies the position of Prime Minister, but time will not permit me to go into details. May I summarize his pledges and promises by saying that the right hon. gentleman promised to end unemployment—to provide work for all those who want work—to build highways, waterways, railways, canals and bridges—to bring prosperity to this country as a whole, to enable Canadian workmen to keep themselves and their families in comfort. And these promises were to be carried into effect to the last syllable or the right hon. gentleman would perish in the attempt. Well, I do not think he himself or any of his followers will contend that he has ended unemployment or redeemed any of those promises even to the first syllable. But what does the right hon. gentleman claim that he and his government have succeeded in accomplishing since assuming office? Their claims are contained in the remarks made by him on the 17th March, as reported in Hansard of that date at page 59. He said:

> Let me ask my right hon. friend and this house this question: Where would this country have been had it not been for the session last fall which gave employment to upwards of two hundred thousand people? Study if you will for a moment the figures of industry. In eight months new factories cannot be equipped and built, but they can be commenced, and the numbers that have been commenced in this country during those eight months are more than those during any other similar period in recent years. New factories? How many men in the counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite are now finding full time employment against the short days and poor rations preceding the 28th of July? How many of them? What about cotton mills? What about woollen mills?

Later on I find these remarks:

> There had to be a session of parliament, as there was, and it gave employment to upwards of two hundred thousand people. So that, with the industrial life of this country stimulated, with improved conditions with respect to employment, with the added employment of hundreds of thousands in the way of unemployment relief, I say that conditions in Canada, bad as they are, are not comparable to what they would have been had we not taken the action that we did.

These are fine words and imposing figures, but may I be permitted for a moment to analyze the statement and scrutinize the figures. In the latest official information furnished the press on March 11 we find that 228,351 individuals have been given employment and 3,975,355 man-days have been afforded to them from the commencement of operations under the Unemployment Relief Act up to February 28, 1931. The figures for Quebec are incomplete. Even these figures appear imposing, but let me analyze them a little closer. I find the government has been in office over seven months, it is over six months since the special session, and I believe fully four months since the unemployment relief branch of the Department of Labour began to function. During that time about 230,000 individuals were given employment, according to the statistics I have quoted, 230,000 individuals obtained 4,000,000 man-days' work. I have added 25,000 man-days' work to complete figures from Quebec. In other words, each man during four months worked seventeen days or at the rate of four days work a month. Analyzing these figures in another way, I find that in the four months that the legislation has been in actual operation we had 100 working days, or 4,000,000 man-days' work. The result is that 40,000 men were given full time work during the four months. At what cost? I want to refer the house to the Senate debates of March 18. But before I quote from those debates may I say this, Mr. Speaker. The answer of the right hon. Prime Minister to a question put to him a few days ago by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) that as regards the appointment of a member of this house as Minister of Labour the intention of the government would be manifested by its action, I think may be regarded as a diplomatic answer or the answer of a statesman. I submit, however, that the country is entitled to have a Minister of Labour in this house. At a time when many of our problems are concerned with unemployment, and revolve around labour and industry, this house is entitled to receive information direct, instead of through an acting minister. For instance, the questions in regard to the garment workers' strike in Toronto were answered by the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon). The Minister of Labour said that $69,000,000 worth of employment opportunities had been placed within reach of the people of Canada, and that does not take into account the employment opportunities furnished by the two transportation systems, which bring this amount to about $80,000,000. To summarize the situation, sir, under the initiative of this government, with the aid that all the provincial and municipal governments had provided some $80,000,000, furnished about 40,000 men with four months' work, or 230,000 men with work at the rate of four days per month during that period. Surely the right hon. gentleman and his government will not claim that they have ended unemployment. They have not even reduced it. Unemployment is just as acute now as it ever has been, and in fact it is worse. In the city of Toronto two weeks ago last Sunday we had 5,500 men shovelling snow, and those men were obtained within an hour or two. This will show that the unemployment situation in Toronto has not been ended. Unemployment never will be cured until we properly diagnose some of our social and economic ills and apply proper remedies, even though the application of those remedies may require the readjustment of the relationship between capital and labour, between employer and employee and between the production and distribution of wealth.

Let us further examine the statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister. How many men in the counties represented by hon. gentlemen opposite are now finding full time employment as compared with short time employment preceding July 28th? What about the cotton and woollen mills? I want to refer the house to an official document containing the facts and figures, and in answer to the hon. member who preceded me I might say that this is not a mass of unrelated figures and theories. This document contains actual figures which will be admitted by every hon. member of the house; it is published by the Department of Trade and Commerce, under the authority of Hon. H. H. Stevens, M.P., Minister of Trade and Commerce, and it has to do with the February employment situation.

I should like to refer the house to page 5 of this document, which contains a table showing the index numbers of employment by economic areas, the average being based on the calendar year 1926, as 100. We find that on August 1, 1930, the index number of employment throughout Canada was 118.8, while on February 1, 1931, it was 100.7, showing a decrease of 18.1. I should have informed the house that these figures are prepared from data and information secured by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics from 7,431 firms whose payrolls aggregate 904,315 persons, so if the index number for February 1, 1931, which was 100.7, represented a payroll of 904,315 persons it is a matter of mathematical calculation to ascertain that the index figure of 118.8 for August 1, 1930, represented a payroll of 999,570. According to those figures there were 95,255 less men employed in the various industries of Canada on February 1, 1931, than were employed on August 1, 1930.

Hon. members opposite may say that this represents the seasonal drop. I would refer them to the chart on page 1 of this document, which shows seasonal drops for a number of years. This proves conclusively that the seasonal drop for 1931 was the greatest and most pronounced since 1924. This table No. 1 gives the index number of employment so far as Ontario is concerned. We find the same situation in the province of Ontario if we examine it separately. On August 1, 1930, the index number of employment was 115.7, while on February 1, 1931, it was 101.7, showing a decrease of 14. On February 1, 1930, the index number of employment was 117.1, while on February 1, 1931, it was 101.7 showing a decrease of 15.4.

Now I should like to refer the house to another very interesting table contained on page 8 of this document, showing the index numbers of employment by industries, and I intend to refer particularly to two industries contained in that table, textile products and iron and steel industries. Before going into these figures I might make the general observation that hon. members opposite and their followers in their usual reckless manner, have blamed the Liberal administration and Liberal tariff policy for the ruin of the textile industries.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FACTOR: I hear some hon. members saying, "Hear, hear." I do not know whether that exclamation applies to my remarks that their criticism is reckless in manner or whether they mean that the industry has been ruined. That statement is not correct, and in order to show the facts I intend to quote some figures from the report of the textile industry of Canada for 1928, which has been recently issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. We find that for 1928 Canada's production of textiles was valued at over $100,000,000 more than the production was valued at in 1922. This happened under Liberal administration and with Liberal tariffs.

Referring to the index number of employment by industries we find that in textile products the index number of employment for February 1, 1930, was 103.5, while the index number for February 1, 1931, was 99.7, showing a decrease of 3.8. Now I come to the iron and steel products, another of the industries which the right hon. Prime Minister fondles and protects. The index number of employment on February 1, 1930, was 115.5 and on February 1, 1931, it was 93, showing a decrease of 22.5. This table contains statistics concerning 63 industries, of which 56 show a decrease in employment on February 1, 1931, as compared with February 1, 1930. There are only seven industries which show increases and among them are such industries as construction, building of highways and so on, which received artificial stimulation.

Now I should like to refer hon. members to page 6 of this document, which gives us some information with regard to Toronto. I almost said Tory Toronto, but this designation does not apply now. We find that on August 1, 1930, the index number of employment was 115.4, while on February 1, 1931, it was 107.1, showing a decrease of 8.3 in Toronto. On the last page of this document we find the index numbers of employment by cities and principal industries, and in the case of Toronto in, say, the textile industry the index number on February 1, 1930, is given as 108.1 as compared with 97.5 on February 1, 1931. In iron and steel, February 1, 1930, the number is 110.3 as compared with 88.2 on February 1, 1931, a drop of 22.1; while in only one industry is a slight inerease shown from Toronto, namely, in the retail trade. This shows at February 1, 1930, an index number of 122.3, and at February 1, 1931, an index number of 123.7.

I think that the statements of the right hon. Prime Minister as to industry being revived and stimulated are not correct. As a matter of fact industry has not revived under the policies inaugurated by the right hon. gentleman, and the revival of industry will never materialize if he maintains those policies, as I hope to show in a moment. What was the situation when the late administration went to the country? The world was in the midst of unprecedented, unparalleled economic depression; inflated stock markets crashed, the flood of unemployment was becoming more widespread; the world was almost distracted trying to meet its economic and social difficulties. That was the situation. It was a situation known to hon. members opposite; and whatever unemployment, whatever suffering existed in this country was due to world conditions and not to the policies of the former administration. Our hon. friends opposite and their followers played politics, a cheap brand of politics. They blamed the former administration for world conditions; they took advantage of a psychological situation; they took advantage of the suffering of the people and handed them a plethora of promises upon which they came into power. But apart altogether from these world conditions we in this country had a national problem of our own as a wheat-producing country, a problem exclusively our own, and that was the finding of profitable markets for our surplus wheat. I wish to refer for a moment to the report of the debates, revised edition of Hansard, of the last special session. Even the right hon. gentleman realized that situation. He knew what the problem was and knew the solution. As quoted at page 29 of revised Hansard we find that the Prime Minister had said:

> Recognizing that the marketing of our natural products is a foremost factor in our national welfare I pledge our organization and machinery, in cooperation with private and financial agencies, to permanently establish effective marketing organizations in the countries with which we trade. With these drastic adjustments and improvements to which you are entitled, and with the full employment of our great transportation system, you will have broader markets, and will have them for all time. You have known suffering and have been patient. Let us end it. Take heart.

Well, the people took heart and put the right hon. gentleman into power. And what do we find? I believe that apart altogether from world conditions this trouble of unsold surplus wheat for which we are unable to find a profitable market has been the source and chief cause of our economic depression, because it immediately effected a tremendous reduction in the purchasing power of the nation, with the inevitable consequences of distress, privation and unrest in the prairie provinces. But Ontario and the other provinces were bound to suffer almost equally, because we must remember that the western provinces consume annually about $200,000,000 worth of manufactured products, and with this purchasing power cut off, the manufacturers in Ontario and in the other provinces were bound to suffer, with the inevitable result of economic depression, accompanied by unemployment and suffering on the part of the people. That was the situation when the right hon. gentleman came into power. We on this side of the house, recognizing the seriousness of the situation, and being very anxious that he should go to the London conference in order to bring back some relief to rescue the farmers from their suffering, and industry from its depression, cooperated in every manner possible at the last special session. We allowed all the legislation to be passed without proper discussion; allowed an upward revision of the tariff to be enacted without proper analysis; even allowed the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) to become a law unto himself and without consulting parliament to effect changes in the tariff of the country by the subterfuge of the dumping duty. We allowed all this because we realized the seriousness of the situation and wished to cooperate with the government with a view of affording the country some relief. We were also hopeful that the right hon. gentleman would return from the London conference, bringing that relief to our suffering people.

Well, the economic conference took place, and the results are known to this country and to the world. I have not the time to read some of the comments on this conference but I do wish to say in all genuine sincerity that I have spoken with a great many Conservative friends in Toronto—and I have some Conservative friends in Toronto—as to the policies of the right hon. gentleman, and find that even his warmest supporter will not approve of his policies; because a Toronto Tory may be protectionist to the extent of protection against the republic to the south of us but he is not protectionist against the British Empire, against Great Britain. He will not approve of any barriers being set up against the motherland.

As a new member I listened with a good deal of attention to the explanation offered by the right hon. Prime Minister as to why he came back empty-handed from the London conference. I must admit I was astounded, being a new member, when he compared himself to Sir Wilfrid Laurier as to the conference of 1902. The former Minister of National Revenue gave a full explanation of the difference. But I went to my room and carefully read his speech, and I want to say that the very quotation cited by the right hon. gentleman disproved that claim and that contention. There is no similarity, there is no comparison between the methods of approach, nor is there any similarity or comparison so far as the proposals are concerned. The method of approach of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902, as I read them, implied no demand, no threat. Sir Wilfrid Laurier did not attempt to tell the motherland how to run its business; he did not attempt to dictate the domestic fiscal policy of the mother land. I repeat, that there is no comparison, no similarity even in the proposals. What Sir Wilfrid Laurier said was, "If you remove the tax on Canadian foods we will increase the British preference." The right hon. gentleman decreased the British preference. He put up the barriers higher against Britain and then said, "You tax foreign foods and in return we shall offer"—what? Not easier access to our markets for British products but to make access to Canadian markets more difficult for other countries; that is what he does. Surely there is no comparison; and with all due deference and respect to the right hon. Prime Minister, I think it would have been a finer and more statesmanlike thing for him to have got up in the house and admitted that he was unsuccessful in the conference, instead of beclouding the issue by comparing himself to Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Although there may not be full agreement upon the part of all hon. members, I desire to offer a suggestion for the betterment of our national progress. Commercial, industrial and even agricultural progress is impossible with our present small population. Our national progress would be accelerated, our national problems largely solved and our future more reasonably assured if we had a larger population. I do not advocate an immigration policy under the present conditions of unemployment, but when we consider that we have nine million people spread over such a large area it does not require much consideration to come to the conclusion that this country can support more than that number of people and that it requires more than nine million people to support it. Now is the time for the hon. Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) in consultation with the heads of our two transportation systems, in consultation with the leaders of labour, finance, industry and commerce, to evolve some sane, sensible and orderly policy of immigration for the near future under which honest, healthy and hard-working people will be permited to come to this country and contribute to its national life and culture. I protest against these unreasonable and inhuman deportations and refusals to readmit people to this county. I attach no blame to the minister; on the contrary I think he and his officials are discharging their duties impartially, efficiently and as humanely as the laws of the land permit, but I do protest strongly against the silly and stupid laws governing immigration and deportation. The sooner these laws are removed from our statute books the better it will be for our national life and progress.

I appeal to hon. members on both sides of the house, irrespective of party and representing as they do all the people, to remove from our body politic that cancerous growth of religious bigotry and racial passion. We may differ in politics, we may differ in solving our economic and social problems, but we should stand united for the good of our country. English and French, Catholic and Protestant, Jew and gentile, rich and poor, labourer and capitalist, old citizen and new citizen, let us all stand united to make this Canada of ours a better and healthier place in which to live, so to build our civilization and our culture that we may be rightfully filled with pride. Let us get rid of this anti-foreign complex, this attitude and frame of mind which considers only the native-born as a good citizen and looks upon the new citizen as being a foreigner. Let us get rid of that provincialism which considers it Canadian to ostracize and despise the new citizen. If we do that, in spite of the trying times, in spite of the tremendous problems which we have to solve, in spite of the policies of the present government, I for one will have unflinching faith and implicit confidence in the future of this country because our people have that inexhaustible strength and vitality with which to solve our difficult problems.

On motion of Mr. Sauvé the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rhodes the house adjourned at 5.50 p.m.

Thursday, March 26, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister) moved:

That when this house adjourns on Wednesday, the 1st of April, it stand adjourned until Monday, the 13th of April, 1931.

Perhaps before the motion is passed, Mr. Speaker, I might explain why the adjournment is for a longer period than we would wish. Our new Governor General sails to-morrow from Liverpool and is expected to land in Halifax a week from Saturday; it is essential that he should be met by the members of the administration when he lands; he is expected to arrive here on the succeeding Tuesday. Under those circumstances, if the house were to meet on Wednesday or Thursday, the attendance probably would be very limited, and therefore it is thought desirable that we should adjourn until the succeeding Monday. I make the motion having regard to all these factors. I state them to the house in order that hon. members may realize that we would willingly make the adjournment shorter if we could, but under the circumstances we see no way by which it can be done.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise not to oppose the motion of my right hon. friend, but because I think it is an opportune time to draw attention to the late date at which parliament was summoned for this session. As hon. members know it was well on into March—

Mr. BENNETT: March 12th.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the 12th of March, and with the Easter vacation following so soon thereafter, it means that we will be well on into the year before we make much headway with the business of the session. Having regard to the fiscal year, I do not think parliament was ever before summoned so late. I remember that when the recent Liberal administration came into office in 1921, it was the month of March when parliament was called together, though not as late as the 12th of March. The government of that day, however, was formed at the end of December; the present government came into being in the early part of August. It should have been possible for the administration to have arranged for the meeting of parliament in the month of January, or at the latest in the month of February.

Speaking on this subject, I would suggest to whatever government may be in office at any time the wisdom of bringing members together in the month of January, and arranging in due course for an Easter recess of a reasonable length. There is much to be said for an Easter recess of at least ten days or a fortnight, especially where parliament has been sitting for two or three months prior to that time; the ministry needs an opportunity of the kind in order to keep abreast of departmental and sessional duties, and to hon. members as well a short interval in which to give quiet thought to matters under discussion is all to the good. Excepting as to the lateness of the summoning of parliament, I have not any criticism to offer with respect to the adjournment now suggested in view more particularly of the circumstances which the Prime Minister has mentioned.

Might I say to my right hon. friend, however, that he will probably be asking for interim supply before the adjournment. We shall endeavour to accommodate him, but I hope he will also at the same time accommodate the house to some extent. There are on the order paper, many notices for the production of papers. I would ask that when the rules are being suspended to permit of interim supply being passed, the government also ask for suspension to permit of these motions being passed upon by the house, in order that the papers may, if possible, be brought down before the Easter adjournment. It would be of assistance to us to have the material called for in the notices of motion to look over during the recess.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we on this side of the house are deeply appreciative of the spirit in which the right hon. gentleman has indicated his intention with respect to this motion. I desire only to point out that when the Liberal administration was formed after the general election in 1896 a short session was held, supply was voted, a few statutes were passed, and the house did not meet until the 25th of March, 1897, and although a new tariff measure and a substantial body of legislation were enacted parliament as a matter of fact was prorogued on the 29th of June. That was the first real session of the administration of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. So far as this government is concerned, I can only point out that I have been in Canada really about four months since the government came into being, those being the months of January, February and March, and the month between the forming of the administration and my departure for the Imperial conference. We have endeavoured so far as it was possible to expedite public business, and I think that my right hon. friend will agree that that is so.

So far as parliament meeting on the 12th of March is concerned, the unexpected appointment of Lord Willingdon as Viceroy of India, complicated the situation. We were hopeful that his successor might arrive before parliament met, but when it became apparent that he could not sail until March 27 we called parliament for the earliest possible date. I think the house should know that I took steps to ascertain the probable intention of the British administration in connection with Lord Willingdon proceeding to India, and had the unexpected not happened action would have been taken to prevent the difficulties which have since arisen causing delay in the calling of parliament.

I am conscious of the fairness of the request of the right hon. gentleman with respect to the passing of motions for the production of papers, but I can advise him in advance that we are working at those papers now as though the resolutions had in fact been passed, and it was hoped that during the recess as many of them as possible would be completed so that they could be laid upon the table immediately the house resumed its sittings. Unless it becomes absolutely essential—and I think if the house meets on the 13th or 14th of April it will not be—interim supply will not be required before we adjourn on Wednesday next; but it will be necessary to pass supplementary estimates for the year ending the 31st of March, 1931, many of them, I think, being matters over which we have no control, some of them being matters raised in the Auditor General's report, and others being matters connected with the railways. It was my purpose on the morrow to discuss with my right hon. friend opposite the most convenient time for us to submit those estimates for the consideration of the house. They arise in almost all the departments—small balances in connection with over-expenditure and governor generals' warrants in connection with the care of disabled soldiers during the winter. That question I would propose to submit to him to-morrow when the last detail has been furnished. As I say, I think we can avoid interim supply until such time as the house reassembles.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It might be well if my right hon. friend were to table the supplementary estimates to-morrow. After seeing the estimates we could then discuss the question as to the appropriate time and the length of time necessary for their consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I was hoping to do.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this house will to-morrow resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

He said: I make this motion in order to enable the supplementary estimates to be laid upon the table of the house to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. SAMUEL GOBEIL (Compton) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16 to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GOBEIL (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the purport of this bill is to increase the fine exacted against those who adulterate dairy products.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

FEDERAL GRANTS TO BE CONDITIONAL UPON PREVAILING OR REASONABLE WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): In view of the fact that the grants made to the provinces and municipalities with respect to the relief of unemployment were conditional on payment of the prevailing rate of wages, or a fair and reasonable rate of wages, I should like to ask the government whether they will give me the assurance that if cases are brought to their attention in which the prevailing rate of wages has not been paid, they will take steps to remedy the matter.

Hon. W. A. GORDON (Minister of Immigration and Colonization): Whenever a complaint is received from a dependable source that the prevailing rate of wages is not being paid, the federal grant will be withheld until inquiry is made, and if it is found that a fair wage is not being paid, the grant will be withheld until that is done.

ICE IN NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. C. S. McLURE (Queens): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) to the ice conditions now prevailing in Northumberland strait, which have caused serious trouble with reference to shipments of freight to and from Prince Edward Island. At the present time over 1,100 cars of freight are held up because of these ice conditions. I should like to know what action the Department of Railways has taken to relieve this condition.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Minister of Railways and Canals): The hon. member who has just spoken, and other hon. members from Prince Edward Island, have brought this matter to my attention for the past two or three days, and I have been taking it up with the officials of the Canadian National Railways, who handle the ferry business between the island and the mainland. Up to this morning it was the opinion of those whose views were authoritative in regard to the matter that nothing could be done. It was considered a question of the elements, and it was thought that only a favourable wind could sweep the ice out. This morning, however, the hon. member who has just spoken showed me a telegram from some organization, I believe it was the Potato Dealer's Association of Prince Edward Island, asking the Department of Marine to supply an icebreaker on the condition that the association would provide a steamer to handle the potatoes. We have taken up this matter with the Department of Marine, and the minister has agreed to have the icebreaker which is now in Nova Scotia, sent to Prince Edward Island at the beginning of the week, as was requested in the telegram. We will be only too glad to do anything possible in this and every other way to relieve such conditions.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

DISCUSSION OF ECONOMIC CONDITIONS AND REMEDIES FOR UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. I. A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I understand a conference is to be held during the recess between representatives of the federal and provincial governments. Will this conference be restricted to the discussion of constitutional questions arising from the recent Imperial conference or will there be opportunity to discuss present economic conditions throughout Canada, and further remedies for unemployment?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The conference is called for the purpose of considering constitutional matters which arose out of the Imperial conference. Doubtless representations of various kinds will be made by the premiers of the provinces, but no matter other than the one mentioned will be officially considered.

REFERENCE TO CONFERENCE OF QUESTION OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I would like to point out to my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that at the last regular session of this house a resolution was adopted asking the government to refer to the next Dominion-interprovincial conference the question of unemployment insurance.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I may add that this is not a Dominion-interprovincial conference in the ordinary sense of the word; it is a special conference called to consider a single subject, and only that subject will be considered.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. F. HEPBURN (West Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) arising out of a speech delivered in the Ontario legislature a few days ago by Mr. Challies, Conservative member for Dundas. He made a very important pronouncement with regard to the St. Lawrence deep waterways scheme, which reads in part as follows:

> "Upon such a scheme I understand the government of this province is willing to cooperate enthusiastically with the federal government in furthering the deep waterway project," he stated. "The consummation of the scheme at the earliest possible date is the unanimous desire of this assembly."

Bearing in mind that one of the promises made by the Prime Minister during the campaign was that he would take up this matter—

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this sort of thing must stop.

Mr. HEPBURN: The right hon. gentleman promised to take up the question of the St. Lawrence deep waterways—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: You can howl all afternoon if you wish; I intend to ask this question. The Prime Minister promised to take up the question of the St. Lawrence waterways and he said the scheme would be completed without delay.

Mr. BENNETT: I am compelled to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This house must not fall into the practice of having speeches made on the asking of questions. That has been made perfectly clear in the past, and I now ask for a ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) seems to be extending his question a little beyond the usual limits. I would ask him to come to the point and put his question.

Mr. HEPBURN: Having regard to the statement, we promised to take up the St. Lawrence waterways question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: The question is this—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member is prepared to ask his question—

Mr. HEPBURN: The question—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member is prepared to ask his question forthwith I shall have to ask him to put it on the order paper.

Mr. HEPBURN: I ask the indulgence of the house to complete the question. I shall be brief. Is this promise more humbug—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. HEPBURN: I wish to put another question. This is a question which is quite in order. In the Mail and Empire the other day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to abide by the rules of the house.

Mr. HEPBURN: Mr. C. O. Smith, Canadian representative—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: —special representative of the Southam papers in the United States, wrote an article which has a direct bearing upon this house.

[Mr. Hepburn.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: Here is the article—

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member—

Mr. HEPBURN: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member might sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has not yet addressed the house in the present debate, and the proper means of putting before the house what he now wishes to say will be afforded him when he then speaks. The hon. member is not asking a question. He is perfectly aware that ministers do by courtesy answer questions at this time, but the house is not in a mood to listen to a long dissertation or speech, and it is against the rules to make one. The hon. member in his present very responsible position should understand that.

Mr. HEPBURN: On a point of order. Those of us on this side of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: Those of us on this side of the house—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEPBURN: The Prime Minister is never in the house—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to comply with the rules of the house; otherwise I shall be obliged to take other measures. I deprecate the noise which is being made. I have given my ruling and I think the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Hepburn) will comply with it.

Mr. HEPBURN: I rise to a point of order. Those of us on this side contributing to the debate would like to have the Prime Minister in his seat, but he is never here. How can we ask questions?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COTNAM: When did you get here? You came only yesterday.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. ARTHUR SAUVE (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, every Canadian who knows well the history of his country, who is attached to its traditions and its institutions, who has a comprehensive knowledge of the problems resulting from its vast territory, the abundance and variety of its resources, hardly developed, with a small population disseminated in groups at wide intervals from one ocean to the other, composed of many elements so different in race, education, sentiments, interests and aspirations; a true Canadian, I say, who pauses to consider the responsibility of this parliament, in view of the objective of confederation, what the union of our provinces represents now and what it may be to-morrow on account of the eventualities which will expand more and more in its midst by the influence of evolutions which happen in every part of the empire and even in the whole world; a good Canadian, I realize it, must feel an inexpressible emotion when, for the first time, he addresses this house.

That is why you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, in conveying to you my sincere congratulations upon the distinction and justice which characterize you in the fulfilment of your high functions of first commoner, to solicit the indulgence and attention which I surely need on account of the emotion that takes hold of me when I think that after having sat for twenty years in the legislative assembly of the old and cherished French province of my country, I have now to speak in this house composed of the most authorized representatives of all the provinces of Canada who, for the most part, like their predecessors at your right, as at your left, Mr. Speaker, command attention by reason of their ability, knowledge, eloquence and courtesy.

The presence in this house of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), the distinction of her demeanor and the attention I have given in the past to her speeches in which the art of saying things and the subtility of the argument mingle so well together, are not to embolden me but, on the other hand, would induce me to excuse her for what she said recently on the opposition of my native province to women's franchise, and to accept this new right all the more, if I had completely succeeded in changing my idea of the christian family and of the essential importance of the educational part played by the wife and the mother in the Canadian home, in order to safeguard us from the dangers of a foreign immigration of ideas and individuals, enemy of our most sacred institutions and of our young generations.

Accustomed to speak in one of our official languages, I will ask you, Mr. Speaker, to excuse the imperfection of my pronunciation and to excuse me also for speaking English somewhat in French.

In accepting the mandate which was urgently offered me by the great majority of the constituency which I am proud to represent here, I have desired and I am determined to give, with my entire loyalty, a sincere contribution to the work that the legislators have to do specially in this alarming crisis the causes of which are many. I have never been, and I am not of those who are trying to make believe that all the misfortunes of the country must be attributed to the political adversary. I hate narrow-mindedness and fanaticism of all sorts. I am rather of those who are glad to see in every party composing this house, men disposed to face our national problems with broad-mindedness, and who, in the effort to solve them, are able to discuss questions with a view to the benefit of the country, rather than the advantage of any political party.

Indeed, I have sat too long in the opposition of His Majesty to ignore the importance of its role, and the respect it commands. I have too often in the name of my party, claimed government power not to endeavour to be worthy of it even in times of heavy responsibilities and, like my esteemed colleagues, not to give the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) who honoured me with his confidence, all my loyalty and modest cooperation in the task he has assumed with such energy and in the work which he places at the service of his country, to which he contributes the strength of his character, the extraordinary power of his talents and the time which many others would prefer to spend in sunny places of rest.

In the extraordinary efforts undertaken by the right hon. leader of the new government to solve our national problems, efforts which amaze by the fact that they surpass the ordinary limits of human possibility, there is something more notable than physical endurance, far superior to character and temperament, greater than talent, finer than tenacity to the work; it is patriotism.

We know to what the public man is exposed who devotes himself entirely to the service of his country. The effects of the stress of public life are illustrated by the recent illness of my hon. friend, the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), whose recovery has brought joy to his fellow-citizens.

The fact that a good Acadian my hon. friend from Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier) so eloquently proposed the address, that the hon. Senator Bourque was the seconder of the address in the Senate, that a French-Canadian from the west seconded the address last session and that my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon) proposed it in this house should make my compatriots think—they who had been taught that the Conservative party by its reason of being, could be nothing else but the hated enemy of the French-speaking Canadians.

The statement, made recently by the new Conservative Prime Minister of Ontario recognized the fact that the province of Quebec reacted and will always react more strongly than the other provinces against the political and social penetration of Americanism, and he could have added with the Chief Justice of Ontario, Sir William Mulock, against the penetration of revolutionary ideas of Communist agents, induces us to consider as unfortunate exceptions those who still want to look upon the French Canadians as strangers in the country founded and opened by them to civilization. I sincerely thank the Prime Minister of Ontario and Sir William Mulock and others for their words of justice and bonne entente.

Another pleasing fact to note. May I be allowed to express the special delight that my compatriots have in sharing with their English-speaking fellow-citizens, the honour and the joy afforded them by His Majesty the King in appointing such a worthy representative of his crown in the person of the Earl of Bessborough, whose worthy companion will represent here a successful conquest for Great Britain and the benefits that bind the French Canadians to the British crown.

It is said that when the chain of hills that crosses the west of England approaches the sea, it presents a wonderful sight, resembling the cliffs of Normandy and the shores of Brittany, recalling that the descendants of Great Britain and of France were formerly united by the same blood and that they are physically divided only by a shallow sheet of water.

Will not the presence of the Earl and Countess of Bessborough on Canadian soil, under the most brilliant rays of our Canadian sun, give us a vision, an inspiration that will stimulate patriotic fervour and promote kindly feelings one for another.

Now Mr. Speaker, will you allow me with the consent of the house, to conclude my remarks in my mother tongue.

[Mr. Sauvé.]

(Translation): May I be allowed after the effort that I have just made, to express myself in my maternal tongue. I do not wish to be any more disagreeable to this house, and especially to my opponents, than I have been in the other language. However, they will probably permit me to emphasize my remarks by pointing out to the house some of the arguments which have been expounded by those on your left, sir, and although accustomed to opponents of the same stamp, I was not the less astonished at the views expressed.

Mr. DUPRE (Translation): Hear, hear.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Our hon friends —that has often been stated in this country —are fated to be an opposition party. The Liberals, it is said, are at their best when in opposition.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): You did your share in Quebec.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): That is why you consent to do yours in the opposition. The country will decide, I hope, that my hon. friend has not weighty arguments enough to say that it is him who will decide of the fate of Canada's future.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): You will not even be saved (sauvé).

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Puns are cheap substitutes for arguments, and I admit my hon. friend's superiority on this score. Our friends on the left, sir, rebuke the government for not having brought down, since its recent advent to power, all the measures which could relieve the crisis that they themselves denied a few months ago. I do them no wrong in saying—

An hon. MEMBER (Translation): Oh, no! We never denied it.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): Hon. gentlemen seemingly look upon me as if I were born yesterday, if I had never read the newspapers, or listened to the speeches of my hon. friends on the other side. In fact, what have we heard from our opponents' side? A kind of debate on the budget which seemed to have been prepared to fan certain prejudices instead of offering useful suggestions, timely recommendations and expressing in conjunction with the address, the guiding principles which should guide the parties in a session where national problems are set up and must be discussed in a special manner, and in the best of spirit. They have prepared speeches on the budget

—this does not happen in our Quebec legislature—before even hearing the budget speech by the Minister of Finance, and knowing the whole fiscal policy that the government intends to introduce for the welfare of the country. They have impeached in every way, all possible tone and with the oddest manner, this government already mischievous though still in its infancy and which, nevertheless, the very day following its advent, called an emergency session to relieve those who were suffering, to alleviate as much as possible under the circumstances, unemployment and the sufferings of the people, to protect the Canadian farmer against dumping which was ruining him; to negotiate treaties with a view of better protecting farm products, the Canadian producer on the whole, and to safeguard also our manufacturers by stopping a disastrous competition or by prohibting certain ruinous imports which were favoured by the Dunning tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS (Translation): Oh, oh.

Mr. SAUVE (Translation): I do not mind such protests coming from the other side of the house. Immediately following the emergency session, the leader of the government crossed over to England and France with the idea of finding some relief for the western farmer and negotiate exchanges in order to secure a market more advantageous for his wheat. Since then he has afforded protection both to the east and west of Canada by favouring the national industries, especially those of coal and pulp against the dangerous competition of Russia. This is, sir, what the government has done within the last few months. I ask why should the hon. members on your left, sir, be so harsh towards this government and demand from them results only to be expected from an administration long in power.

At the Imperial conference, the Prime Minister made a proposal which was of interest to the empire, although he considered Canada's interests first—that is probably what offended our opponents—a proposal which was supported, strange to say, by all the representatives of the dominions. To hear the opposition, one would think that the Prime Minister sold his country and proved a traitor in making such a proposal. Evidently this proposal could not immediately be accepted by the British government, especially by that of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. It needed to be deeply studied. And there lies the reason for calling another conference this year. It is our hope, and we must all hope that the delegates of the Imperial government will represent at this conference the wish and interests of the people of England. Why, in the course of this session, should the parties not seek to come to an understanding in order to protect Canada and prepare the country to reap the greatest benefit possible from this conference? Should not the country's interests, especially in these days of depression, pass before party interests? Each party would have to its credit the proposals which it would have had adopted by the house for the welfare of Canada.

Our opponents go so far as to criticize the government's policy with reference to Russia, and the right hon. leader of the opposition will allow me to express, with all due respect, the astonishment I felt, when, the other day, I saw him give vent to his feelings and allow his friends to do so, with reference to the decision taken by the Prime Minister and the government in connection with Russia. The government does not intend to deprive Canada of markets necessary for the sale of her products. If we want to utilize the resources of the country, we must—and we have often stated it—we must have markets abroad. One must be blind not to see that the world no longer turns towards militarism for purposes of conquest, but is intent on increasing production and economic expansion. With the mass producing machinery that science furnishes the world, each country endeavours to secure the world's markets, but first to protect its own. One must not lose sight that we are going through an era of reconstruction and that the government's policy must help in bringing about the equilibrium needed after the great war which upset the world. At the same time this country adopted a high standard of living based on scientific principles, and rendered more exacting by the example of our wealthy neighbours. Thus it was that, while economic conditions were becoming harder, our producers had to put up with the competition on the home markets, of countries having hundreds of millions of men, of simple habits, and able owing to favourable climatic conditions, of producing on terms which defied all competition on our part. One must bear in mind, sir, that our local truck farming industry has been disorganized through the extension of motor car transportation.

As to Russia, hon. members of both sides of the house know that it is passing through a revolution, and it is carrying on in our country a dangerous propaganda, we were so warned by the most respected authorities in this country, not only as regards the economic viewpoint but especially the false theories which it seeks to spread among the humble workers and the younger generation. That is an important point to consider when we discuss the new policy of the government with reference to Russia.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauve) on his membership in the House of Commons of Canada and on his speech this afternoon. I thank him most sincerely for his kind references to myself, and I can assure him that so far as personal considerations are concerned I reciprocate his sentiments to the fullest extent.

As to the remarks which my hon. friend has made in the English language, I am bound to say that I think I would agree with practically everything he said, with the possible exception of his reference to the question of woman sufferage in my province. Unlike him, I am in favour of the women having the full right to vote. As to his remarks in the other official language in this country, my answer will come in the course of my own address.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have not been able to attend all the sittings of the house since the opening of the session, but I assure you, sir, that I have read very carefully the debates which have taken place. I was somewhat surprised to find in the speech of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) that he spoke again of the conditions throughout the country being due to the stagnation in industry which took place during the Liberal administration. This sounds pretty much like the pre-election speeches of my right hon. friend. I have noticed that since the election last July, hon. gentlemen opposite have been rather eager to invoke the world-wide depression as a most welcome alibi; and I could fill the pages of Hansard with quotations in support of that statement. But to-day, in the heat of debate, the Prime Minister comes back to the stagnation of industry during the Liberal administration. I must say that my good friend the Postmaster General, who has been very mild this afternoon, has also referred to that famous stagnation in speeches at political dinners. To the government speaking in the heat of debates I will oppose the government speaking in its sober mood through the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens). I will oppose to Philip drunk Philip sober—of course speaking in a strictly figurative sense. In a book which has just been published by the Department of Trade and Commerce under the title of Canada 1931, bearing the imprimatur of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, there is a foreword signed by him and then I find the following; I do not want to waste my time in quotations, and therefore I shall read only one sentence:

The volume of production at the peak of prosperity, reached in the early part of 1929, was greater in most lines than in any similar period in the history of the Dominion. From the low levels reached during the post-war deflation culminating in 1921, productive enterprise steadily acquired momentum, the impressive results effected during the nine-year period being especially evident in the first six months of 1929.

On the next page is the following:

The rapid, long-term growth of the last decade is more significant than the current reversal, generally regarded as of a temporary nature.

Later the causes of the world-wide financial depression are given. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the policies of the King government are not mentioned. But of course, this is far different from what we heard during the election campaign. Then my hon. friends opposite were busy turning a national misfortune into a sideshow of enraged partisans.

An hon. MEMBER: War with India.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend may keep his peace. I did not refer to any war with India; I am warring with him just now. All the difficulties mentioned in the official publication that I have just quoted were capitalized to secure votes for my hon. friends opposite. The Tory flag was carried through all the country and hoisted to catch every passing breeze. The government is the by-product of financial depression. My hon. friends opposite are its offspring. Of course, they all made pledges; they were all going to end unemployment or perish in the attempt. They all prophesied that prosperity would come back. There they are, a row of phophets—indeed rows of prophets, major and minor. To-day they are only too anxious to forget all about it; instead of perishing in the attempt, they are asking for an extension of their promissory notes to the electors. Over in England a young aristocrat lost in the labour ranks, Sir Oswald Mosley, has become impatient with conditions there, and he is attempting to form a new party. He has issued a manifesto to the people in which he proposes the creation of an emergency cabinet of not more than five members, invested with plenary power to carry through any emergency measure. Let me say to our cousins on the other side of the ocean that here in Canada we have done far better than what Sir Oswald Mosley proposes; we have virtually what is a one-man super-cabinet vested with all the power that a docile majority can give him. But this super-cabinet has not been able to solve our problems; instead those problems have been intensified. The only remedy which the specialist has applied to the body politic is a dose of high protection, and the remedy has had the effect of spreading the disease. Now we are threatened with an additional dose of that medicine. The apostles of high protection are availing themselves of their opportunity. Those additional fetters on trade would not have a ghost of a chance were it not for the argument that high protection will give to the working classes more work and increased wages. Patriotism and charity have been made the excuse for ficsal loot. The assertion that the cost of living would not be increased as the result of additional tariff duties is, to use a word dear to my right hon. friend, a deception. The people are not such fools as to believe that the cost of living will not be affected adversely by taxes on their trade. A British statesman who was an advocate of protection, but an honest advocate, the late Lord Balfour, once said that protection would not mean anything if it did not increase prices; and the late Lord Melchett, a high priest of protection, said it would be of no use if it did not have that effect.

As examples of what we may expect from high protection let me mention two countries with which Canadians are familiar, the United States and Australia. The tariff duties in those two countries have been raised so high that even this government would hesitate to go to such an extreme, and unemployment is rampant in each, even more so than it is in Canada. Some time ago the governing body of the international labour office appointed experts to study the question of unemployment. In the monthly summary of the League of Nations Journal for January I read that one of the causes given by those experts is this:

> (g) The disturbances in international commerce caused not only by the development of new industrial areas but also by artificial barriers put in the way of international trade and by the difficulties said to be associated with the problem of political debts.

The leading economists of the world share the same view, but our school of protectionists, our crusaders or musketeers, are scoffing at these principles of economic law. Our new diplomat, Mr. Ferguson, said in one of his numerous lectures to the British public that these are shibboleths and old theories, as if economic laws could be subject to a sort of old age limit. How can a policy of blind and selfish economic isolation be beneficial to a country like Canada? We have a territory as large as Europe, or larger, with a small population of 10,000,000 people. We have unlimited resources and opportunities; our people are ambitious to succeed. They are believers in the gospel of work, and are filled with courage, initiative and enterprise. How can a country like this enrich itself by erecting a wall around itself and refusing to trade with the rest of the world? The best way for Canada to end unemployment, and I think in this even my hon. friends opposite will agree, is to sell its surplus, and surely this cannot be done by a policy of economic isolation. One of the members of the government the other day took credit to the government because our imports from some other countries have been reduced, but he did not speak about the reduction of our exports. If to reduce imports we also reduce exports we are not increasing employment; we are decreasing it. The only possible result, occasionally, may be to transfer capital from one industry, which makes a commercial profit, to another industry where the profit comes from the taxpayer. The unemployment index of the government is the best evidence of the error of my right hon. friend's policy.

Many of those who believed in the changes effected at the short session of parliament are now doubtful and suspicious about the results. I hold in my hand the Financial Times, which is the mouthpiece of the high financial interests of Montreal, for Friday, November 14. I do not want to read it, because I have no time for that, but it states that the policy of the government has brought about a great deal of suspicion and doubt in the business interests of Canada, especially in regard to the stability of tariff which is threatened by the arbitrary powers which the government have taken upon themselves to change the tariff at will. All this is perfectly true, and those who were applauding in September last will be among those who will come and ask for the repeal of that arbitrary legislation. So far as we are concerned on this side of the house, we will do anything to get the power of taxation restored to parliament, where it should be.

Now I want to come to the subject which is really my reason for having addressed the house this afternoon. I refer to the Imperial economic conference.

Mr. HANSON: That seems to be a sore spot.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend thought it was, and he is not altogether wrong all the time. Before speaking on the economic conference, however, I should like to say a word with regard to the Imperial conference proper, though of course I will reserve most of my comments for another occasion, when the report is submitted to the house for discussion. I have a word for my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, whose absence I regret this afternoon. I came here with the intention of talking to him, and I am sorry he is not in his seat. May I say to my right hon. friend, who I hope at least will pay me the compliment of reading my remarks in Hansard, that I am pleased at his conversion. During the election campaign my good friend the Postmaster General—and this may surprise hon. members—was rather a supporter of mine on this question of the Imperial conference. At every meeting he said that as far as constitutional issues were concerned, and as far as the work of the Imperial conference was concerned, he was in agreement with Mr. Lapointe, and I am proud of his support. Apparently, however, our ranks are getting larger, because even the right hon. gentleman now is approving of the report on dominion legislation which was the work of the conference at which I had the honour of representing Canada. Last year my right hon. friend was rather of a different opinion, but apparently he does not think any longer that those departures will lead to the cutting of the painter, the letting go of the mooring and the drifting away from the little islands of the North sea, as he said so eloquently last year. My right hon. friend has realized that the best way of maintaining the association of the British nations is for every nation to be free, to be autonomous, and equal in status.

What about the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), whose vacant seat I am also looking at now? Last year my hon. friend, speaking on the changes which were recommended with regard to the Shipping Act and maritime laws, said with that moderation which he sometimes uses when qualifying the views of those who do not agree with him, that they were puerile, childish and infantile. Yet this report has been approved by the conference and by the government. Has the Secretary of State changed; have his views become childish, puerile and infantile?

Then there is my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) for whom I also have a word. I am sorry he is also absent. I read in the report of the conference everywhere the words "British Commonwealth of Nations" as the apellation of our association. My hon. friend has subscribed to that, yet at the annual dinner of the Canadian Bar Association last fall he went out of his way to protest against this name of the British Commonwealth of Nations. He said the old name of the British Empire was good enough for him. That view of the Minister of Justice was also expressed the other day in London by our diplomat, Mr. Ferguson, who always has been a colonial of the inferiority complex school, but I sincerely hope that over there he also will see the error of his ways and will see the light as the Minister of Justice has seen it.

As to the Imperial economic conference, I wish to associate myself with everything that has been said by my right hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King). Indeed, I am going further than he went; I sincerely believe and am convinced that the proposals of the Prime Minister and the manner in which he submitted them have created a situation which is fraught with serious dangers. The British commonwealth of nations is an association of nations freely united under the crown. The empire is maintained because it is united and is based on allowing the freest and fullest opportunity of self-development to every part in the best way suited to its needs. Liberty in unity is the principle which has been received. Liberty in the fullest sense is the guarantee of unity, liberty for each dominion, for each part to shape its fiscal, military, defensive, economic or any other policy according to its ideas and its needs, and according to its wishes.

The British commonwealth is an idea; it is a soul. To base it on a mercenary foundation is to court disaster. The tie of sentiment is thin but it is strong. It may seem weak, it may be invisible to those who cannot see anything outside a ledger. But this tie has proved equal to the test to which it has always been put in periods of trouble and difficulty. I would not have it replaced by peddling agreements in which the interests of one dominion or another of the British Empire might be sacrificed for the purpose of making profits for other sections of the commonwealth. To force protection upon Britain, as the Prime Minister of Canada tried to do, was not only basing the empire on an economic fallacy, but it was interfering in the most direct way with the domestic policy of the United Kingdom.

None of the British nations has the right to instruct another on the policies which it should adopt or follow. This is a rule which no other Canadian statesman has ever broken. Well we all know that for the last twenty-five years some people in the old country have been trying to prevail on the representatives of the dominions to interfere in order to have a certain trade policy endorsed by the people of England. But up to now there have been Dominion representatives who have refused to play that part. For the first time, owing to the conduct of the Prime Minister of Canada, the dominions have become pawns in the political game of the old country. And speaking in this Canadian parliament as a Canadian public man I say that Canadian liberalism and, I believe, the sentiment of the majority of the people of Canada are opposed to the policy which has been suggested by the Prime Minister of this country. I will say further to the public men of Britain, and more particularly to those whom it has been my privilege to meet on different occasions, that if they come to Canada, whether at the coming conference or otherwise, and try to interfere and to dictate to this country some policy which has been a bone of contention, a point at issue between political parties in Canada, as the Prime Minister has done in England, not only shall we resent it, but their very interference will be the best means of defeating the purpose which they have in view.

If the present fiscal system of England is the one best calculated to make her greater, to make her prosperous, to make her a leader in world trade, it is in the interests of all other parts of the empire that that system should be kept and maintained; and with all due deference to my right hon. friend, I say that the people of Britain, the public men of Britain, are the best judges of that. They are, I should think, better judges on that point than my right hon. friend.

To make the dominions suffer disadvantages for the sake of Britain, or to make Britain suffer disadvantages for the sake of the dominions, is not the way to cement the empire. The introduction of that spirit would be certainly destructive of the ties which bind us. I have here the words of Mr. Asquith uttered in the British parliament on a policy similar to this:

> To my mind, it is impossible to imagine a proposal seriously meant which would more certainly tend to engender friction, to foment quarrel, and in the long run to kindle disloyalty.

And he added:

> It is introducing, as between the component members of this great partnership, the British Empire, a new and perpetual source of heartburning, rivalry, jealousy and discord.

Was not Mr. Asquith right? Can the empire be built on dollars and cents? Mr. Speaker, dollars and cents very frequently are the cause of family quarrels; brothers divide among themselves on questions of dollars and cents. Is it desirable that this should be the tie that binds us? In an imperial economic group, as suggested by the Prime Minister, momentous problems would arise. If food is taxed in Britain, as requested by our Canadian representative, is there not a danger that in times of depression and crisis the labouring classes would, with Mr. Lloyd George, think that their first duty was to get the protectionist mice away from the bread of the people? What would result? I know the Prime Minister is sincere. But I am telling him in all sincerity, as my firm conviction, that had anyone wished to introduce an element of discord and friction no better method could be devised than an imperial customs tariff. Indeed, bad temper has already been exhibited; heated words have been exchanged. And my right hon. friend has almost raised a diplomatic incident on the use of an adjective by a good common sense minister over there, Mr. Thomas.

Mr. Speaker, there is danger ahead, and I think my right hon. friend will see it. We have granted a preference here in Canada. I am afraid I shall not be able to dwell upon it because the time at my disposal will not permit it. But may I say that conditions are altogether different. To grant a preference we did not make any change in the tariff structure of Canada; while what my right hon. friend is asking England to do is to abandon one principle and substitute another for it.

England is trading with the world. She has to buy from her customers. International trade is her life blood. Why, at this very moment eminent figures are touring South America for the purpose of developing trade relations with countries which in the natural order of things are competitors of Canada. And can we complain? When the figures are compared it will be seen that England is buying from us considerably more than she is selling to us.

I am opposed to this policy because I do not believe in economic imperialism any more than I believe in any other kind of imperialism. I am opposed to an imperial economic unit as I am opposed to an imperial diplomatic unit, naval unit, or military unit as is the dream of so many imperialists and which I believe would be the natural consequence of an economic unit. If our trade is an imperial trade its protection on the high seas will be the concern of every nation of the empire, as well as of the mother country. If the people of England are taxed on their food because the wheat from other countries is excluded from the British market; if they have to rely only on Canada and Australia for their food supply, they will have the right to ask us to protect that trade on the high seas. I believe in freedom, I believe in economy; let our associations be absolutely free in trade matters as well as in other matters and not such a compact as suggested by my right hon. friend. In speaking at the dinner of the Empire Parliamentary Association the Prime Minister borrowed a phrase from the Three Musketeers. He suggested that there should be adopted by the empire the motto: All for one and one for all. How can he reconcile that with his pretended policy of: Canada first? As a very shrewd Englishman replied at that dinner, each for all and all for each is very fine as an imperial device, but how can the Prime Minister of Canada reconcile it with the phrase: Ourselves first and the others afterwards? Free will and cooperation is the only way to keep the empire together; coercion will not do it.

My right hon. friend has endeavoured to shield himself behind the noble figure of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The memorandum by Canadian ministers, presented at the Colonial conference of 1902, and which appears on page 37 of the proceedings, in part reads as follows:

> From the beginning of the proceedings the Canadian ministers have claimed that in consideration of the substantial preference given by Canada for some years to the products of the mother country, Canadian food products should be exempted in the United Kingdom from the duties recently imposed.

At the conference of 1907, after a new government in Great Britain had repealed those duties, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said that it was for England to decide as to that policy, he had no suggestions to make. I am sorry I have not the time in which to read full extracts from his speech, but I would refer hon. members to page 441 of the proceedings of the conference held in 1907 and they will see that the stand taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier was the very reverse of that of my right hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is ahead of his time.

Why should my hon. friends endeavour to bring Sir Wilfrid Laurier to their defence? It is not the first time that they have tried to cast upon the shoulders of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the burden of their protectionist policy.

I came to this house in 1904, twenty-seven years ago, as a young man with all the enthusiasm of my age. I was then a Liberal as I am to-day; I could not be anything else by temperament, by aptitude or by conviction. My greatest incentive was an unbounded admiration for that illustrious leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I followed him to the last hours of his life and his memory is still the light which guides me in the solution of the difficult problems with which I have to deal.

An hon. MEMBER: Time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will finish that speech somewhere, some time.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, I think you will appreciate the difficulty faced by one so inexperienced in speaking in having to follow an oration such as that to which we have just listened. It happens that the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is one of the hon. members in this house who has almost always held my admiration. I wish he were always the splendid liberal he is to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: What about yourself?

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not speaking as a member of the Liberal party but as a liberal in the broad meaning of the word. Constitutionally the ex-Minister of Justice has always been a liberal; economically, not always. In opposition he is always a liberal and it is refreshing to hear the liberal speeches made in opposition. Good speeches are always welcome in this house; they are so rare.

In order to avoid having to repeat it, I say now: Between the parties in government there is no vital difference, but between the party in power at the moment and the party in opposition there is a great difference. That difference will disappear when at some future time they change places. However, in justice to both parties, I must say that there is a great difference in manner. I trust that the present government is not a fair sample of Conservatives in power. It has been very amusing to me to note the added touch of arrogance of practically every member of the government and particularly of the leader, (Mr. Bennett). They can go too far and they should remember that governments come and governments go but always the people and the people's representatives in the house remain. Courtesy and decent treatment should at all times be accorded. The reply of the Prime Minister the other day to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was certainly not worthy of the genial and kindly nature of the Prime Minister in opposition.

The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has himself pointed out the danger—and there is a real one—of making speeches while in opposition, which may later condemn one. As has been so well demonstrated by his quotations from the speeches of the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan), the ex-Minister of Justive, when again he sits on the government benches, needs to remember the speech that he so eloquently made to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I can prophesy I shall.

Mr. MANION: He will need to have a long memory.

Miss MACPHAIL: I am not so sure of that. I want to express to the Postmaster General (Mr. Sauvé) my appreciation of his courageous attempt to speak in the English language. In a few years he will be making in English speeches of such eloquence and beauty that he will put to shame those of us to whom English is the native language. I am always moved to admiration by the skill and rapidity with which French-speaking members who, when they first enter the house, speak almost no English, learn to express themselves fully in that language. What the Postmaster General was saying, I am afraid I do not quite know. Apparently his remarks had some reference to me. I am sorry that I did not please him, as apparently I did not, but in what particular I am not clear.

Forty minutes soon pass and I must proceed with what few remarks I wish to make. We are living in a day of high pressure salesmanship, of which we saw a very fine sample last summer when the Conservative party was out to sell to the farmer of Canada a gold brick, the gold brick of protection for agriculture, and the sale was made. The farmer bit. The farmer in Canada, like ourselves in the House of Commons, had heard the Conservative party during the depression of 1920 to 1924 tell again and again and again, eloquently and well, how they could cure the depression if they were only in power. They had the remedy; they knew how to cure the disease. So the farmer, feeling that another depression was upon him thought: Well, these fellows say they know how to cure it; let us see if they will. So he bought the gold brick of protection for agriculture and since then he has been wondering why, just as many another one has wondered when the well-dressed salesman left. The remedy proposed is such a simple one; it was and is: Keep out all goods that might enter our country to come into competition with our goods, but sell our surplus goods upon the world's markets. It is an exceedingly simple remedy: Refuse to buy, but sell.

I suppose many hon. members read the Canadian Forum. I am sorry that recently the editor Richard de Brisay died. His was one of the clear voices for sanity in Canada and in losing him Canada suffered a great loss. I could have given many another quotation from also Canadian publications. I am quoting the policy of the government that was to save us, according to the words of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Shortly after the election he raised the buying of Canadian goods by Canadians to the plane of patriotism, and almost every newspaper or magazine in Canada carried advertisements, because advertisements they were, something like this:

> Every time we buy an imported article—
>
> Says the Minister of Trade and Commerce.
>
> —when we might just as easily have found a Canadian article to serve our purpose equally well, we are helping to do some fellow-Canadian out of a job, and making the job of some foreign workman just that much more secure. Conversely, every time we purposely give the preference to a Canadian article, we are helping to create employment for Canadian workers, and doing our bit towards making Canada as a whole more prosperous.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Miss MACPHAIL: The applause is not as loud as it once was. Even our women's institutes and other organizations of all sorts were urged by at least the provincial government of Ontario to stage a campaign: Buy Canadian-made goods. De Brisay in commenting on this said that the minister might have finished the quotation I have just given by saying:

> Conversely, every time we give the preference to a Canadian article we are helping to do some foreign fellow out of a job. But it is these foreigners who buy our surplus commodities to the tune of $1,300,000,000 a year. If we do not buy their goods they will not or cannot buy ours, so that on the Bennett-Stevens plan we shall find in the long run we are doing one Canadian out of a job every time we make one for another.

As a matter of fact, the thing is so obviously fallacious that it passes my understanding that men of culture, education and brains should really believe it. At one time I thought those who led in advocating this policy did not believe it. Now I am convinced they do. I am not really sure whether this is a compliment or not. But at least the Prime Minister is obviously sincere. Immediately after the election we had a short session which was supposed to create employment or to relieve unemployment. But while it did that to a certain extent, that is, while people who had to get something to eat, were fed, it was a session devoted almost wholly to the raising of the tariff. Therefore, as regards the first part of the doctrine, the shutting out of goods so that they would not come into competition with our goods, the government moved into action rapidly, and because I want to be fair, although sometimes on this subject it is hard for me to be, I must admit the government has moved into action rapidly. The point that is most pleasing about the government is that they do act. We may not agree with the action, but at least there is action and to me that is a relief. So we started in the short session to shut out goods. During the campaign we had gone quite a long way towards offending Australia and New Zealand, or if we did not offend them, it is because they are certainly not supersensitive. Then during the short session we had a protectionist policy carried still further whereby we shut out to a greater extent than before the goods of the United States and Great Britain. Following that has come the Imperial conference which has not added to the good-will in Great Britain towards Canada. We are now shutting out Danish bacon, due supposedly to some foot-and-mouth disease, but really so that it will not come into competition with Canadian bacon. We also have an embargo on certain Russian exports so that along the line of stopping goods from entering Canada the government, from its point of view, has done very well. But when the question is one of finding markets in which to sell our surplus goods, the progress has not been so great.

An hon. MEMBER: There has been none.

Miss MACPHAIL: There has been a lot less than none. All of us get this little bulletin from the Department of National Revenue. By it we see that the total trade of Canada in the first eleven months of the fiscal year 1931 fell over 26 per cent as compared with the total trade of this country for the previous year.

We have not found markets for Canadian products. When the Prime Minister went to the Imperial conference, if one is to believe press reports, which one of course does not always need to do, he went among other things to secure a market for Canadian wheat. I rather think he did go with that in mind since he took with him many experts on wheat marketing. He came back, all of us must admit, with regret and reluctance, without having obtained his objective. What the Manchester Guardian has to say with relation to the Prime Minister's action at the Imperial conference expresses so well what I had in mind that I am going to quote it. The Manchester Guardian—I am quoting from a reprint in the Farmers Sun of January 15, 1931—says:

There was no basis for any gain in Mr. Bennett's famous offer at the Imperial conference, and to have treated it as such might have done more harm to good-will within the empire than any brusque remarks by Mr. Snowden or Mr. Thomas could ever do.

It goes on to say:

When Mr. Bennett complains of the treatment his offer received at the hands of the government, and when Lord Hailsham attempts, as he did in the House of Lords, to make party capital out of Mr. Bennett's grievance, they seem to forget that Canada offered Great Britain nothing worth five minutes' consideration, and asked in return that England should reverse her whole fiscal system, increase the price of her food, and damage her foreign trade.

The article goes on to say some claimed that if Great Britain had followed the negotiations further, something really would have developed. To quote again:

But Mr. Bennett began the negotiations by declaring that he would not consider any proposal to lower Canadian tariffs on manufactured articles for the benefit of British industry. That being the one way in which Canada could have offered some substantial return for the tax he desired Great Britain to impose on herself, what but failure and irritation could have come from any pretence on the part of the British government to accept Mr. Bennett's proposals as a basis for negotiation?

I think that every thinking person in Canada, regardless of politics, feels that in interfering or seeming to interfere with the fiscal policy of Great Britain, much as I believe in the autonomy of the dominions, the Prime Minister went too far. We all know how deeply we would resent any interference on the part of Great Britain with our fiscal policy, if she should tell us what it should or should not be. I believe that in this rapidly shrinking world nothing short of international economic cooperation is of any real use. It may be that while this epidemic of economic nationalism is sweeping the world there might be a short period in which some sort of agreement could be worked out among the component parts of the British commonwealth; but if that is to be, it must be done by a large tolerance, by a real determination to sacrifice immediate gain to attain the larger end in view. It cannot be done by dictating what Great Britain is to do.

May I pause here to thank from the bottom of my heart the Prime Minister for appointing the Hon. Howard Ferguson as minister plenipotentiary to the court of St.

James. It is rather hard on the court of St. James, but it is a great relief to the province of Ontario. When I read in the papers day after day Mr. Ferguson's speeches and saw his pictures and accounts of his career, and how proud that Canada should be that he had gone to London, and so on, and so on, I said to myself: Has sincerity and honesty wholly departed from our province? I at least am thankful that he has gone, but I am sorry to see that a man of his particular political type—not stripe—should be appointed minister plenipotentiary representing Canada in Great Britain.

Though I believe I said something about this in my speech last year on the budget, I feel that for my own sake I must say it again. We in Canada and the people of the world generally are rapidly bringing about an economic chaos that is going to land us in disaster. We have had experts set to work to see what could be done. I need not go into all the details. You all know that the World Economic conference was held in 1927. The findings of that conference can be summarized by saying that tariffs had already gone too high and a move must be made in the opposite direction if we were to save ourselves from difficulty. We know that Great Britain moved at the tenth assembly of the league to have a tariff truce, and that following upon her action some few countries, eighteen in all, I think, met in conference about a year ago and did agree to call a tariff truce for one year. We know that a thousand experts told Mr. Hoover in no uncertain terms, previous to his signing the Hawley-Smoot tariff, what they believed its results would be. Noted economists everywhere have pointed out the same thing. May I quote Gilbert Murray, from the Contemporary Review, speaking on protection:

> Protection not only diminishes trade when we all want trade increased. It makes the fatal error of transforming the competition between economic groups into a strife between nations.

He goes on:

> In pure politics the nations have given up their absolute sovereignty and independence. We have agreed not to go to war; not to act as judges in our own cause; to bring our disputes before some mediatory or arbitral body. But in economics we are still in the state of international anarchy which led to the great war. Any nation has the unchallenged right to do injury to a neighbour's trade. It may prohibit, it may refuse necessary exports, it may play tricks with its commercial treaties so as to kill this trade and help that. It is all a "matter of domestic jurisdiction." The foreigner has no right to protest.

He adds:

> As I look toward the future of our civilization I see ahead only two causes that may bring it finally to ruin; one is another European war between great powers; the other is a general resort to protection. And in essence these are not two causes, but one.

Yet we go on in this mad race, tobogganing towards the day of disaster. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen think that. I cannot think that the government believes it, because I think that the government is composed of as sincere-minded Canadian citizens as those who sit on this side of the house, and if they really thought that, I believe they would stop following the policy into which they have launched, and which evidently they intend to carry on. There is just this to be said about their policy. Since we are in a very severe depression and have in power now the party that knew how to cure it, it is to be hoped that they do carry their remedy as far as they may, just in order that we may all see that it is not the right one. I am hopeful that that will be done because we have always heard what good results protection will have. I must confess after listening to the present Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion), that rapid-fire orator, I sometimes wondered, was he right? Now we shall see. It seems to me, however, that we are facing absolutely new conditions, and that the depressions which are becoming more numerous and more prolonged are not caused by one party or the other; the causes lie very much deeper. I think all of us will admit that we are in a new industrial age. We have had almost a complete mechanization of industry; machinery has ceased to be labour-saving and has become labour-displacing. We have not any social control over the mechanism, and so capital goes on earning for itself larger profits, more people are forced out on the streets, and so on. I have not time to develop the evils resulting from the private control of public credit. We have insufficient currency to meet our new conditions. I think everybody knows that, and we might just as well admit it. May I quote DeBrisay again:

> For the new industrial revolution has brought us to the point where there is no longer enough money and credit in the world to enable us to consume the products of our machine-equipped labour.

The other day the hon. member for South Vancouver (Mr. MacInnis) described the condition so well, that while I cannot quote him I want to refer to his remarks. In effect he said that the workers in industry because of unemployment and insufficient wages have not enough money to consume the goods they want to consume, and the capitalists have not the capacity to consume the goods which they have the money to buy. Because of lack of money to buy on the one hand and lack of capacity to consume on the other a surplus of goods piles up until the manufacturer can no longer find a market for his output and closes his doors, and this means more and more unemployment.

It seems quite evident that new methods will have to be found, for the old methods are no longer any good. One whom, I suppose, we would call a Conservative, the Right Hon. Winston Spencer Churchill, said that quite clearly in one of his Oxford lectures. I am quoting now from Toronto Saturday Night of January 31, 1931. He said:

> The root problem of modern world economics is the strange disparity between the consuming and producing power. Have all our triumphs of research and organization bequeathed us only a new punishment,—the curse of plenty?

I think the "curse of plenty" is a particularly fine phrase. Churchill suggested that Britishers should create what he would call a "sub-parliament," or at least a committee of experts who should investigate all ways—even radical ways—of solving the problem; they should deal with the problem scientifically, not thinking "did we believe this in the past, or did we not," but in a non-partisan way looking for remedies for the present situation. It seems to me that is a suggestion which this government might very well consider.

Now, in the little time I have left I want to devote myself fully to agricultural conditions. Agriculture in Canada is in a bad way; there is no doubt about that. Not only does the farmer get little for what he sells, and pay a great deal more for what he buys, but this year, 1931, he has no surplus accumulated to carry him through the depression as he did when the depression of 1920-24 struck him, because that one followed the period of high prices after the war. The farmers then had a very substantial surplus, which, it is true, they had to use in the four years of the depression, but they had it at their command; this year they have not any surplus, as every member of this house knows. In my constituency during the last nine or ten months I have been asked for more loans—I am sorry I did not have the money to advance—than in all the other years that I have sat in this house. People are hunting for money everywhere because they have no surplus at all.

[Miss Macphail.]

Some people say the way to better conditions is to bring the prices of the commodities the farmer has to buy down to the price level of the product of his toil. Well, that would be something, and I should be most happy to see it done. But with a government in power that has pegged the prices of the things that the farmer has to buy at the high level, it is unlikely. The government prides itself on not having raised prices—good heavens! did they expect to this year?—but having kept prices where they were they thereby increased the profits of the manufacturer. But even if prices did fall, the debts the farmer has contracted, his taxation, all his overhead, were contracted at the higher price level, and so he simply has not the money to meet his obligations. I think the government might very well take into serious consideration the suggestion made by the member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) to bring about the immediate depreciation of the Canadian dollar. Unless that is done there is no chance in the world of agriculture being able to meet its obligations.

Now, we were to have agriculture protected, but out of the mouths of experts it can be shown that agriculture to-day is on a world-price basis, so how can it be protected? It cannot be, though 100 per cent protection were put on by this government. Let me quote from an article by Mr. J. H. Grisdale, Deputy Minister of Agriculture, in the Economic Annalist for February, 1931, entitled Farming as a Business Requires Economic Analysis. He says:

> World competition is what we have to meet to-day and the class rather than the individual is the important factor to consider.

Mr. McOuat, general agricultural agent of the eastern lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway, says pretty much the same in other words. Let me quote him:

> It is not what hogs or cattle are worth in Toronto, or wheat in Winnepeg, but, rather what bacon is worth in London or wheat in Liverpool that counts.

When the hogs, cattle and poultry on the prairies that are now being fed with cheap grain come down on the eastern markets of Ontario the farmer here will find his products hit the worst prices he has seen in many years. Bad as is the condition now, it is nothing to what it is going to be. The whole market in the east will be demoralized when the western farmers, through necessity or the coaxing of the government, goes in for mixed farming. Before the government too widely advocates mixed farming for the west, let me say that when mixed farming is started in the west in those sections where it can be carried on it will ruin the mixed farmer in the east. The same thing will happen to Ontario and Quebec in regard to mixed farming as happened in regard to wheat when the west became the wheat producers and the east ceased to be.

I read with a great deal of interest and some sadness Canada's new agricultural policy as set forth in MacLean's magazine of March 15th. The article is centred by a very speaking likeness of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). May I say that it shows the intelligence and good sense of the hon. gentleman that he looks exceedingly sad. So would I if that was the agricultural policy I was putting forward for the solution of the problems of the industry. I would have all hon. members read the article. Don't eat your dinner until you get a copy of MacLean's magazine for March 15th. All but one point in the new policy advocates more production; produce more efficiently. Of course, I agree it is best to produce efficiently. But more production? If one increases one's efficiency to the point where there is increased production, in all probability under present conditions the result will be lower prices. However, the one new feature is a national marketing board which may mean something or nothing.

There is one other thing which I am very glad is being considered by the government. It has been summarized by the writer, Mr. Richard Churchill, in the words, "an increased effort to eliminate parasites." If that means the cut-throat as well as the cut-worm, it is all right; if it means they will take off the backs of the farmers the bloated, protected manufacturing industry, the greedy banks, the railways with their high rates of interest, the taxation weight, and so on; if those are the parasites, then I quite agree. On the other hand, if it simply means there will be fewer bugs, it might be as well to let the bugs have the wheat as not to be able to do anything with it.

I will not have time to develop, but I should like to outline, an agricultural policy which I respectfully submit to the Minister of Agriculture. All farm or agricultural colleges and experimental farms should to-day teach cooperative marketing of farm products as aggressively as in the past they taught, and are still teaching, greater production. As the central idea of their programs they should have cooperative marketing of farm products, and the government should lend its full moral support to any efforts made along the lines of cooperation. Those of us who are working in cooperative endeavour for farmers know that when we seek a manager for a cooperative enterprise we cannot get a trained man. There is not a government from the Atlantic to the Pacific that has a school where people can be trained in the management of cooperative enterprises or in cooperative accounting, yet governments are looking for something to do. Do that. That is something which will mean more than growing two blades of grass where one grew before, when you can sell neither.

Then let the government start experimenting in processing farm products, in order to bring the cost of processing down to something like a reasonable figure so that when we come to put our processed agricultural products on the markets of the world we shall be able to meet the competition of other countries. I believe the present Minister of Agriculture does want to help agriculture, but his task in this government is difficult, and I think he knows it. And next thing the farmers of Canada will process their own products, and the sooner the better. The government should give them full moral support, and should lend them the sums of money required on long term loans at low rates of interest. Unless we do these things how are we going to compete with Denmark, where farmers process their own products cooperatively, or with Russia, where it is done by the state? We hear a lot about Russia. If the government of our country had the same initiative and enterprise in putting our products in the markets of the world that Russia is showing at the moment, it might not be a bad thing. It is cut-throat competition, of course, when Russia does it but not when our manufacturers do it. They have been doing it for quite some time, selling farm implements more cheaply in other countries than they are sold at home.

In addition, farmers should begin at once to buy their supplies through their own locally controlled cooperative units. These should have one central buying agency, and whatever help and support the government can give should be given. We know the farmers of Denmark and Holland buy their fertilizer more cheaply than any other farmers in the world, because they buy it cooperatively. The same thing can be done in Canada, in relation to everything the farmer buys.

I also believe in lower costs of production, and I would get those lower costs not only by greater efficiency in production but by very considerably lowering tariffs as well. In addition, I think an agricultural program which does not make mention of the modernizing of our financial system is not all it might be. I think there should be special recognition of the requirements of agriculture. Mr. Beatty evolved a scheme whereby he would have $5,000,000 available for western Canada. That is like making a five cent payment on a hundred acre farm. What about the money the banks have spent on head offices during the last twelve months—financial cathedrals which are manuments to greed? If they had put that money in circulation for the benefit of agriculture in Canada they would be doing much better work for Canada.

Then again, if we are going to have an agricultural policy worthy of the name we must have a strong farm group of free men and women in the House of Commons who can speak, work and vote for the interest of agriculture. I also think we should immediately forsake the gold basis and should secure markets, both the home markets and the foreign markets which will take some of our surplus if we in return take some of theirs.

One thing we very greatly need in Canada is a vital rural educational system, education that is alive and in close relationship with the lives of people. I notice that under the agricultural policy of this government experimental farms are to be used as educational centres. I hope it may be that sort of education which will stimulate courageous thought, and not just that education which moulds the minds of the people into the old channels. I do feel that this is the very time for a forward push along the lines of cooperation and mutual endeavour; when conditions are very bad is the time to move forward. It was when the national life of Denmark was at its very lowest that the great Grundtwig came forward with his new philosophy and educational ideas, and from then on the farmers of Denmark made themselves what they are to-day, the wonder of the world, controlling their own products until they reach the markets of the world. We can do the same.

Mr. THOMAS HAY (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the address in reply to the speech from the throne let me, like preceding speakers, first of all congratulate the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous). The speech from the throne was delivered under unusual circumstances, at a time when this country and the world generally is passing through a period of depression. We on this side of the house believe the government have policies which, if put into effect, will bring about prosperity in this country. Hon. members opposite grumble and complain, and say the government of the day is responsible for the condition in which Canada now finds itself. Though we have been in office only for the short period of something like eight months, still the members of the opposition seem to feel that we are responsible for the conditions which prevail in Canada at the present time.

I should like to read from the amendment proposed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, in which he says that—> —His Majesty's government have not only failed to afford a remedy for employment and agricultural distress, as pledged by the Prime Minister and his colleagues, but have served further to prejudice the deplorable position of the agricultural interests, thereby causing additional unemployment and substantially reducing the national revenue.

That is the charge made by the leader of the opposition. Taking all things into consideration, I do not think he is justified in moving an amendment of this kind, because I am satisfied, as I believe he himself must know, that the present government cannot be held responsible for the conditions now prevailing in Canada. On the contrary, I feel that the government that went out of office on July 28 last had more to do with the depression than the present government, and during the course of my remarks I will try to prove that assertion.

Some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side have referred to the declining wheat prices, and there again they have endeavoured to blame this government. If those hon. gentlemen had given a few minutes' consideration to the subject and had looked up the facts they would not have made a wholly baseless assertion of that kind. I wish to direct the attention of the house, of the country and of hon. members opposite to this fact: The price of wheat quoted by the Winnipeg papers on July 28 last, that is, the cash price, was $1.78 a bushel. That was on the 28th of July. On the 1st of August last, or about the time the late government went out of office, cash wheat was quoted by the Winnipeg papers at 90 cents a bushel, or a drop in prices during the last year the late government was in power of 88 cents a bushel. In view of this fact it is unfair for the opposition to seek to create the impression throughout the country that this government is responsible for the decline in wheat prices.

I wish to be fair, and therefore I say that I do not believe the government that went out of office in July last was responsible for the drop in wheat prices. I do not think they did anything to bring about that drop. Nor do I believe that the government now in power is responsible for it. So far as I can see, neither government has done anything that would bring about this fall in the price of wheat. We must be fair in discussion.

With respect to wheat prices, some people blame the western wheat pools for the decline that has taken place during the last year or so. I am of the opinion that the wheat pools had something to do with the drop in prices. I am satisfied that the policies they have been following have been instrumental in bringing about a drop in wheat prices in Canada, and I am not alone in this opinion. Let me refer to an article which appeared in Toronto Saturday Night of February 28. This article was written by the Hon. Frank Oliver, a gentleman who at one time was Minister of the Interior under the Laurier administration, a gentleman who has given considerable thought to conditions in this country, and whose opinion, it seems to me, must have some weight with the people of this country. The article to which I am referring reads:

> The pool was in full operation in the marketing of crop from 1924 to 1930. Its advent had introduced a new principle into the marketing of Canadian wheat. Instead of a sales policy that followed the fluctuations of the market, with the object of clearing the crop of one year into consumption before the succeeding crop came on the market, the pool's avowed policy was to maintain or stabilize or increase prices by withholding supply. As it was the largest handling organization in the world, others followed its example.

Further on we read:

> A declared policy of withholding Canadian wheat during the shortage of 1929 alarmed the consuming countries and turned their attention to other sources.

The article concludes:

> Canada's most distressing problem is that of selling her surplus of this crop year, together with her accumulations of the two previous years. Had she sold, as she could have done in July, 1929, and the following month, the crop of 1929 and 1930, at a handsome profit, the problem of to-day would not exist.

That is the opinion of the Hon. Frank Oliver. He says that the pool is entirely responsible, so far as Canada is concerned, for the present depression through which we are passing. He is of the opinion that had the pools sold at the right time Canada would not have the present problem on her hands.

During the last session of parliament certain changes were made in the tariff. The manufacturing industries of the country have been given an increase in tariff protection. The Prime Minister and the government had at the time promises from the different manufacturing industries to the effect that they would not take advantage of the increase in tariffs to increase their prices to the consumer. Now that was all very well so far as it went. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that if I understand the mentality of the farmers of western Canada correctly they will not be satisfied with a promise that the prices of machinery will not be increased. I am satisfied that the farmers of the west are looking for a large reduction in the prices of farm machinery, and I am also satisfied that unless they receive this reduction the manufacturing interests of Canada will not long retain the protection which has been accorded them. I am sure, however, that the policy of the government will have a good effect in lowering the prices of farm machinery to the farmers of Canada.

I wish to refer for a few moments to the tariff. The last two speakers devoted considerable time to a discussion of the tariff, and I do not think it would be out of place for me to spend a few minutes considering the subject. When it came to making changes in the tariff, the Liberal party has always failed to make such changes as would meet the needs of the times. That has been the history of the Liberal party since its inception; all through the years it has failed to make such changes in the tariff as would be of benefit to the people of Canada. A tariff policy is nothing new to this country; it is the same old policy under which Canada has lived and thrived ever since its infancy.

The tariff policy of this government is to give a measure of protection to the manufacturing industries of the country in order that they may to a large extent retain possession of their home markets. Some people feel that the policy of protection is on trial at the present time and that within two or three years there will be settled once and for all the age old dispute between the disciples of high and low tariff. In making changes in the tariff the Liberal government has always failed to meet the needs of the times, and on occasions disaster has occurred because of their refusal to make a change. I would like to give one or two instances which illustrate this theory. In 1873, when the Liberal government came into power, conditions prevailed in Canada similar to those prevailing at the present time. The manufacturing industries were languishing, people were out of employment, farmers were unable to sell the products of their farms, and the country was passing through a period of depression perhaps worse than that existing to-day. The manufacturers appealed to the government and asked for an increase in the tariff which would safeguard the young and growing industries. The government steadfastly refused to take action, and the condition of the country was very serious. I would like to read an extract from The Story of Canada, by Hopkins, which shows what occurred during that period, how it occurred, and why it occurred. This deals with the period when the Liberal party was in office and when a low tariff, such as some of our Liberal friends advocate, was in operation. It reads:

Between 1873 and 1878 their goods poured over the frontier and beat down prices below what the small Canadian firms, with their limited production and market and capital, could hope to touch. Then, after the local industry had collapsed, prices were again raised and the American firm held its captured market in apparently secure shape. All over the country this was happening and even the farmer began to suffer from the inrush of American wheat and other foodstuffs. From every side came demands for a change of policy, but Mr. Mackenzie and Sir Richard Cartwright, his Finance minister, were firm in their view that while a tariff might, and must in this case, be imposed for revenue and at uniform rates . . . .

Let me quote another paragraph from the same history:

Meanwhile, matters went from bad to worse in a commercial and financial sense. Whatever the value of the American market it was absolutely closed to Canadian productions in most of the important lines while American manufacturers and producers had a full sweep of the Dominion. American wheat, rye, barley, Indian corn, wheat-flour, oatmeal, coal salt, wool, pig-iron, iron and steel rails, bricks and flax had free entry into Canada, while similar Canadian products entering the United States were charged high duties.

That is what occurred between the years 1873 and 1878 under a low tariff policy.

The trend of the times is towards protection; France, Italy, Germany, the United States and our own country are moving in that direction. In Great Britain, the home of free trade, the sentiment is changing, as it is in other countries. If we are to exist economically as a nation under present day conditions it is necessary to have a tariff which will protect our industries. Other nations are putting up tariffs to protect their own home industries. The ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) seem to feel that no good can result from a tariff, but I would like to direct their attention to an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune, being an extract from the London Daily Times, as follows:

British Tariff Policy Gains Much Support
London Times Says Opinion Grows Steadily in Favour of System

London, March 17—Though the Labour press, doubtless with Premier MacDonald's authority, denies the possibility that a revenue tariff of ten per cent will be the feature of the forthcoming budget, The Times to-day says that the number of influential converts to this policy is steadily growing in Britain.

It cites particularly Sir Josiah Stamp, economist and industrialist of world reputation, and Mr. J. M. Keynes, both of whom hitherto have opposed any general tariff system, but who now suggest that there should be two kinds of duties—one on goods generally, and one, much lower, on foodstuffs.

The article continues:

There is scarcely any feature in our financial, industrial and commercial situation that does not clamour for a policy of tariffs to raise revenue and restore confidence.

This article would seem to show that the sentiment of the peoples of the world is changing to a more favourable view of a system of tariffs. I cannot understand the mentality of some people who say that it would be wise to reduce our tariffs. They must know that if that were done we would have a similar condition to that existing in 1878, and Canada would become the dumping ground of the world.

I said before that the Liberal government when making changes in the tariff had always failed to meet the needs of the times. Let me refer to another change in the tariff made by a Liberal government. Many years ago I well remember hearing Sir Wilfrid Laurier speak in the town of Selkirk on the question of protection and free trade. I can recall his exact words; I remember his saying that the policy of the Conservative party was creating sugar kings and cotton lords in this country. Well, the change in tariff policy to which I now refer was made after Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896. I am sorry the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) is not in his seat, because I should like to have called his attention to the statement I am about to make. After he came into power Sir Wilfrid Laurier placed on the free list several articles, amongst which were coal oil, binder twine and barbed wire. The other day the hon. member for Lisgar was grumbling because an additional tariff had been placed on barbed wire coming from other countries to compete with barbed wire made in Canada. Ever since these articles were placed on the free list by Sir Wilfrid Laurier we have not been able to buy them as cheaply as we had done before. So again I say that when the Liberals attempted to make changes, the results brought about were not in the public interest.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HAY: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was showing that whenever the Liberal party had made changes in the tariff policy of the country, disastrous results had followed. I had given one or two examples to show that depression had always followed changes in the tariff policy by the Liberals. I cannot quite understand the mentality of the Liberal party. They do not seem to be able to get it into their heads that it is possible for a high tariff to mean lower prices to the consumer. Hon. gentlemen opposite smile at that, but those of us who have lived in this country quite a number of years know that when we had a protective tariff on agricultural machinery amounting to about 33 per cent, we were buying our machinery for just about half the present prices. Of course, there are none so blind as those who will not see.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that good results are already in evidence following the tariff increase last September. Only the other evening an hon. member on this side of the house mentioned that a mill which had been lying idle for something like six years was now operating at full capacity and employing some two hundred men as a direct result of the tariff increase which was made last September.

I would like to give another instance of disastrous consequences when the Liberal party made a change in the tariff policy. I refer to the trade agreement made between Australia and Canada in 1926. You will remember, sir, that the Conservative party of that day opposed the agreement, pointing out to the then Liberal government how injuriously it would affect the dairying industry of Canada. But our representations, of course, went unheeded, and the Liberal government put through that agreement. Subsequently its provisions were extended to New Zealand. Speaking on the agreement, the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), as will be seen at page 860 of Hansard of 1926, characterized the speeches of the Conservative members against the trade agreement as mere propaganda. He said that they were trying to make the people believe that if the treaty passed, an avalanche of butter would descend on Canada. Well, Mr. Speaker, that avalanche of butter did descend on the Canadian people, and it put a good many of our farmers practically out of business. Not only that, but the avalanche of butter which descended upon us almost put the late Minister of Agriculture out of business politically, and certainly it smothered a number of hon. members who supported the treaty in 1926.

In opening my remarks I said that the speech from the throne this year was read under rather unusual conditions, read at a time when depression existed not only in Canada but throughout the world. The duty of governments of the day, not only in Canada but all over the world, is to find solutions for the problems which are facing the world generally. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the depression was created by over-production in all lines of commodities. It was impossible to sell our commodities in the markets of the world, consequently the depression through which we are now passing followed. It is the duty of government, I say, to find a cure for the prevailing world-wide depression. We know the cause; what is the cure? Doctors of economy are prescribing various remedies for the cure of our present ills. Some tell us that the acreage that is being sown to grain of different kinds in this country must be reduced. Others tell us that we must decrease the cost of production, and still others that we must go into diversified farming. All this advice is very good in itself, but whether it will bring about the results hoped for, we cannot say.

With respect to reducing the acreage, I myself cannot understand how that can be done to any great extent by the farmers of Canada. In former years, when they were farming only from two to three hundred acres, they were able merely to make a living at the good prices that prevailed. How, then, would it be possible for them to make a living at present prices if they reduced their acreage? I say that that would be a dangerous experiment; and I do not think it would be wise to go to extremes in attempting to carry it out.

I am a firm believer in diversified farming. I believe that diversified farming has been the salvation of the province of Manitoba, where it is very largely engaged in, with the result, I believe, that conditions are better in that province to-day than in any of the other western provinces.

With respect to lowering the cost of production, it is to a certain extent beyond the power of the individual farmer to accept and act on that advice. The only chance we have of cutting down the cost of production—I am satisfied that we shall be able to do it through the policies of the present government—is by getting cheaper machinery, lower freight rates, and cheaper money—although I am not a very great believer in the latter, but it might help to some extent. These, Mr. Speaker, are some of the remedies prescribed by doctors of economy in this country. Whether they will effect the cure that is predicted of them, we cannot say. I do, however, wish to reaffirm my belief in the protective policy of this government, because I believe that it will bring about prosperity.

Now, what is needed at the present time is a cure for our economic ills. Of course, no one can be expected to formulate a cure offhand. I believe that a considerable measure of relief would be afforded by the formation of a world credit association whose function it would be to arrange credits for the nations needing them.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that in Manitoba generally, and particularly in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, our people of various nationalities are working together in harmony in an endeavour to bring about a prosperous and united country, and I firmly believe that only in this way can we hope to see Canada fulfil her glorious destiny.

Mr. J. L. ILSLEY (Hants-Kings): When, Mr. Speaker, about a week ago I decided to participate in this debate I hoped that I might be able to contribute some original thoughts, but so many very excellent speeches have been made in the interval that I am afraid my hopes are not destined to be realized.

I wish to congratulate the hon. gentlemen who moved and seconded the address on the very creditable manner in which they acquitted themselves. I agree with the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) that it is a very trying ordeal for a young member to address the house for the first time, and I am very much pleased indeed that my fellow member from the maritime provinces, the hon. gentleman from Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier) and the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Porteous) were so successful in their maiden efforts.

This afternon we listened to a very remarkable speech by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The hon. gentleman's speeches are always worth listening to, but it did seem to me that to-day he spoke with a fire and an intense earnestness more marked than usual, and I am confident that his words carried conviction to every member present. I desire also to congratulate the lady member of the house (Miss Macphail) upon her very excellent speech. She stated that the former hon. Minister of Justice is a better Liberal in opposition than in power, but my recollection of his speeches in this house during the last few years does not bear out her statement.

His speech this afternoon, was, I think, along the same lines that he always followed when on the government benches.

I shall confine my remarks to a few sentences in the speech from the throne. It is there stated:

> Although in the interval world conditions have changed but little for the better, this tariff legislation—

That is the tariff legislation passed in the special session.

> —has resulted in a marked improvement in the domestic situation through the strengthening of established industries, and in addition many others, formerly exporters to Canada, have now become producers in Canada.

The articles which I have read in the press led me to believe that there had been considerable stimulation of industry as a result of the tariff legislation last September. It would be strange if that were not the case. The very object and purpose of protective tariffs is to stimulate certain industries. But I was surprised to hear from some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate that employment even in the highly protected industries is not as general as it was before the additional protection was given. And certainly if the effect on those specially favoured industries has not been beneficial, it can be definitely and positively said that the effect upon the other industries which are paying for the stimulation of the highly protected industries has been distinctly prejudicial. It is too soon to say from actual experience whether the tariff increases of September last as to be a success or not in any part of Canada. It must be remembered that after the tariff increases of 1879 there was a condition of considerable industrial activity for a few years, but it was succeeded by a reaction, so much so that in the early nineties a wing of the Conservative party advocated "lopping off the mouldering branches of protection." We may find this to be the case also with regard to the tariff legislation of last September.

Speaking as a member from the maritime provinces, I say unequivocally that I am opposed to those tariff increases. I contend that they constitute an aggravation of the condition brought about in the maritime provinces by the policy of protection, a policy which has resulted in their gradual impoverishment. I believe that if it is persisted in our future down there is dark indeed. The farmers and fruit-growers—of whom there are thousands in my constituency—are complaining bitterly about the result of the tariff legislation enacted during the special session. Before I left for Ottawa an importer of spraying machinery was obliged on one shipment to pay about $2,000 additional in duties. Importers of apple-graders and fertilizers also have been obliged to pay greatly increased duties. We must never forget that if we are building up one industry by tariff increases, we are doing so only at the expense of the rest of the country. This is being done, just as surely, though not as visibly or equitably, as if the favoured industries were being bonused out of the treasury. It may be that the increased tariff will benefit one section of the Dominion, what we are accustomed to speak of as the central or industrial section. This may be, but if this is a "central-Canada first" policy it certainly is not a "Canada first" policy. The effect of this policy is disruptive and disintegrating rather than national or unifying.

The next reference in the speech from the throne is to the operation of the Unemployment Relief Act, 1930, which is said to have proved equally beneficial. We on this side of the house at the special session did not disapprove of the principle of that measure, nor do we disapprove of it now. I want to point out, however, that certain definite pledges were given, which are embodied in the act and in the regulations, to the effect that the expenditure of this money was not to be on a political patronage basis. Speaking as a member from the maritime provinces I can definitely and positively say that in the part of Nova Scotia with which I am familiar the expenditure of these moneys has been on a political patronage basis. I may add that I made it my business to inquire into the expenditure of this money in my constituency, and I found that at all times from 75 per cent to 95 per cent of the men employed upon the works were members of the Conservative party, or those whom the foreman hoped to make members of the Conservative party by the distribution of these unemployment relief moneys. That is true in the maritime provinces, at least in the province of Nova Scotia. That was not only a breach, but an open and flagrant breach of the pledges made in September.

I wish to pass on hurriedly to the next reference in the speech from the throne, which is to the Imperial conference which was held in London last fall. The speech says that several constitutional questions arising out of the resolutions of the Imperial conference of 1926 were fully discussed and in principle approved. That matter was dealt with by the former Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) very ably this afternoon, but let me say that to those of us who during the last four years have always contended that the constitutional principles laid down at the Imperial conference of 1926 and carried out by the recommendations of the subconference of 1929 were right; to those of us who contended that these were the correct principles, that statement in the speech from the throne comes as a source of gratification, and affords us very much satisfaction. I remember, Mr. Speaker, the speeches that were made only last spring, particularly by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Cahan). The present Prime Minister indulged in a lot of loose talk about cutting the painter, about casting adrift from the motherland. Certainly I never would have supported that formula of 1926 if I had thought it was designed to disrupt the empire. It was because I believed—and I think we all believed—that that was the only basis upon which the British Empire could be kept together, a basis of the fullest possible autonomy to the constituent parts, that I supported it. Now the hon. gentlemen who ridiculed and opposed that position have come to our way of thinking.

I remember what the Secretary of State said about the merchant shipping legislation. The proposal with regard to merchant shipping is that hereafter each of the dominions is to have full power to make its own laws in respect to its own shipping, instead of shipping being governed, as at present, by one act passed by the Imperial parliament. We said that uniformity could be attained just the same; we said there could be agreements between the different dominions and there could be concurrent legislation, and let me say that the principles laid down in respect of merchant shipping, the recommendations of the subconference on merchant shipping of 1929, have been approved in toto by the conference of 1930. In fact, a long draft agreement between the various dominions and the mother country is to be found in the report of the Imperial conference. The front benchers of the Conservative party have swallowed themselves completely on this constitutional matter, and let me say I believe it is the best thing they have done since they took office.

There is another side to the Imperial conference, and that is the economic side. The speech of the former Prime Minister, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King), was very comprehensive. It covered this matter of the Imperial economic conference in all its phases and probably anything I could say would not add very much to the matter. One thing I do wish to say, however, is that this matter of obtaining favourable treatment in the British market, whether it be by a tariff preference or by some other sort of preference, is not a matter of interest only to the wheat growers of Canada, as some speakers seem to assume. It is a matter of interest to the whole of Canada. There has not been a more live issue in my own constituency during the last ten years than the matter of a preference in the British market. I have gone through two elections in which a great deal was said about a preference in that market for our particular product, apples, and let me say that the people of my constituency watched anxiously day by day to see how the Prime Minister conducted himself. They watched to see how he made out as a bargainer—because I am not one of those who have any objection to bargaining. I do not like bungling bargaining, unsuccessful bargaining or short-sighted bargaining, but the people in my constituency watched to see what the Prime Minister of Canada would accomplish at that Imperial conference. As we all know, he accomplished nothing; in fact he accomplished less than nothing.

The other day it was very interesting to hear the present Prime Minister seek to compare his conduct and his proposals with those of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902. As has been shown here by other speakers during this debate, there is no comparison between the two at all. In the first place, Sir Wilfrid Laurier lowered the Canadian duties, by the Imperial preference of 1897, before he treated with the British government, whereas this Prime Minister raised the Canadian duties. In the second place Sir Wilfrid Laurier asked only for the remission, as against Canada, of existing duties or duties which, at the will of the British government, might be thereafter imposed. This Prime Minister asked for, and in fact demanded, the imposition of new duties. In the third place Sir Wilfrid Laurier indicated very clearly that he was prepared to make further concessions in the way of lowering Canadian duties as against Great Britain, while this Prime Minister made it very clear that he would not lower the duties; indeed that he would keep up the prohibitive duties and, if they failed to be prohibitive, he would make them so as against Great Britain. So there is no comparison between the proposals of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1902 and those of the present Prime Minister in 1930. It would be a wonderful thing for the present Prime Minister if he could avail himself of the great prestige of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but there is no parallel between the two proposals.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

To speak very briefly, my people have four objections to the manner in which that Imperial conference was handled by the Prime Minister of Canada. The first is that he raised the Canadian tariff to a prohibitive level before sailing for Great Britain. One of the duties works out to about 96 per cent. Mr. Snowden, in the British House of Commons, pointed out that his constituency, which is a woollen milling constituency, was particularly affected. He said that the duties as against 30-ounce woollen cloth had been raised from 7½ pence to over 2 shillings. Then he said, "How can Mr. Bennett ask for any concessions after he has prepared the way for the Imperial conference by raising duties to these prohibitive levels?"

The second objection my people have to the conduct of Mr. Bennett is that he made proposals to the British government which no British government could accept. The third objection is that he put those proposals in an offensive form; that is, in the form of an ultimatum. The fourth objection is that he closed his stay in England with what was really a wrangle with Mr. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Dominions, and with the British government itself. I do not think I need add anything further to show how badly the matter of the Imperial conference was handled by the Prime Minister.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a few other references in the speech from the throne that are of interest to the people of the maritime provinces—and certain omissions. One very notable omission from the speech from the throne is the absence of any reference to a national fuel policy. In the maritime provinces, and particularly in the province of Nova Scotia, during the election no cries were louder than those for a national fuel policy. In the coal mining constituencies—and several of the counties are coal mining counties—the Prime Minister and his speakers promised the people that if they were returned to power they would put into effect what they called a national fuel policy. That national fuel policy was never clearly defined; I do not think it was ever defined at all. But the people of the coal mining constituencies accepted it at its face value and they believed that if the Conservative party were returned to power they would do something to secure the Canadian market for Canadian coal producers. But the government, from the time they came into power until the present moment, have been running away from that promise they made. This is not overstating the case in any way. We take up the speech from the throne, which the people of Nova Scotia expect to contain some reference to a national fuel policy, and we find not a word, not a syllable, not a hint that the Prime Minister or his government knew that there was such a thing expected by the coal producing section of Canada. I do not know what the present Prime Minister meant when he promised a national fuel policy, but I do know this, that he meant something that would be brought about by political action. He meant something which a government or a parliament could do. Yet, when representatives from the chamber of commerce came here a few weeks ago inquiring of him what was going to be done in reference to a national fuel policy, we find him thus reported:

> Working out of a national fuel policy was an easier matter on paper than in actual practice, said the Prime Minister. His own view was the fuel problem would probably be solved by chemists and scientists.

Has it come to that? Is that the outcome of this proposed policy upon which seats were won by the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia? Has it come to this, that this national fuel policy is now to be evolved by chemists and scientists? The coal producers of Nova Scotia see these high duties being imposed on manufactured goods, duties ranging from 50 to 100 per cent, shutting out importations of goods from the United States and Great Britain; and they are told that the ground upon which these duties are imposed is that no jobs should go to workmen abroad if they can possibly go to Canadian workmen. That is to say, if by the imposition of a duty men can be given work in this country, which work would otherwise go to labourers abroad, then such duty shall be imposed. That is the ground upon which these duties are being imposed by this government on manuafctured goods—prohibitive duties, tremendously high duties. The people see these duties going into effect, and at the same time they see these highly protected factories, which are great coal users, buying from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five million dollars' worth of coal annually from the United States. This coal is coming in at a very low rate of duty, and the people naturally say to themselves, "What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Why make fish of one and flesh of another? Why should the national policy stop at Montreal? Why should it not extend easterly to Sydney"? That is the way the coal miners of Nova Scotia look at the question, and it is hard to blame them for seeing it in that light. To date, however, the government have no proposals except that the problem will be solved by chemists and scientists.

Of course, it may be said that the embargo against Russian coal is something. But surely no hon. member of this house thinks that it really amounts to anything. It shuts out 300,000 tons of Russian coal annually, while 18,000,000 tons a year of American coal are coming in. It shuts out two or three million dollars' worth of coal from Russia while admitting something like one hundred million dollars' worth from another source. And as a matter of fact the Prime Minister does not intend the Russian embargo as any solution or even the beginning of a solution of the national fuel policy, because he states exultantly that 1,000,000 tons of anthracite is coming in from Wales, indicating that this is part of his imperial trade policy. This embargo against Russia, it appears was designed to encourage the importation of Welsh anthracite. He has apparently forgotten the 13,000 miners of Nova Scotia who are still waiting for him to say something about the national fuel policy.

Mr. ERNST: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I know what the hon. gentleman is going to ask.

Mr. ERNST: Would the hon. member expect any prospective increase in the tariff to be announced publicly in the speech from the throne, or would he expect it when the budget is brought down?

Mr. ILSLEY: The question of a national fuel policy was not put forward primarily as a fiscal measure at all. It certainly should be foreshadowed in the speech from the throne; that is exactly the place wherein the people of Nova Scotia expect to find it mentioned. This is not a minor matter in the province of Nova Scotia or in Alberta. Recently the legislature of Nova Scotia passed a very sweeping resolution asking the government what its proposals were in reference to a national fuel policy.

Mr. VENIOT: So did the legislature of New Brunswick.

Mr. ILSLEY: The legislature of New Brunswick as well, the hon. member says. And delegations have come to Ottawa with reference to the subject. If, therefore, the matter had not been entirely absent from the Prime Minister's mind, it would have found a place in the speech from the throne. I should like to know where the members from the coal mining constituencies have been. Ever since I have been in the house the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) has advocated a prohibitive duty on foreign coal; the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) has advocated a duty of $1.50; and the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) has advocated as high a duty as practicable, although he did not think a very high duty practicable. Where have these hon. members been to have allowed this omission? And where is the minister from Nova Scotia? What was he doing when the speech from the throne was prepared, leaving out any reference to a national fuel policy?

Mr. ERNST: Does the hon. member expect the tariff to be mentioned in the speech from the throne?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have already answered that question. Now there is another matter I wish to discuss. I refer to old age pensions. If the cry of a national fuel policy was the loudest in the province of Nova Scotia in the recent election, the promise of old age pensions was, I should say, the most effective. I know that lists were made of all the old people who would be eligible for pensions. These people were canvassed by Conservative campaigners and were promised that very shortly after there was a change of government, if change of government there should be, old age pensions would be paid to them by the Dominion government in full. I have here what the Prime Minister said in Nova Scotia in July last:

> I say to you, if the Conservative party is returned to power we will provide for the payment of old age pensions from the federal exchequer, so that the provinces will not be called upon to contribute a cent, and so that the provinces who now find the burden too great will be able to benefit with all the provinces of the Dominon. The constitutional point has been raised by the Premier. If it is constitutional to pay 50 per cent, would it not be constitutional to pay 100 per cent? We will pass a law to pay 100 per cent and it will be legal.

And the present Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) stated that if this were not done at the first regular session of parliament he would go out of public life forever. He is credited with having gone further—perhaps he will contradict me if I am wrong. I know that he said what I have just repeated, but in regard to what I am going to cite I am not sure. However, he is credited with having said that if it were not done within three months after a change of government he would go out of public life.

Mr. RHODES: My hon. friend knows it is not competent for me to interrupt him in the course of his speech. I did not hear the first portion of his remarks with respect to myself, but I shall consult Hansard tomorrow to see what he has said. I certainly said nothing about three months. I cannot say anything as to the first part of my hon. friend's remarks.

An hon. MEMBER: You were a little more careful than some of the others.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is quite all right if the hon. minister says he did not say that. I am very careful about the statements I make. He did make the first statement in my own town of Kentville.

It is intimated in the speech from the throne that legislation in connection with old age pensions is to come by progressive stages and as the state of the treasury will permit. Lately the Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson), who is not in this house, has been making speeches and sending telegrams intimating that old age pensions will not be paid in full by the Dominion government, and that the Dominion government will not take over during the present year the administration of the act, but that there is nothing to prevent them from paying a larger proportion than is paid at the present time. This is different from the promises made during the campaign. These pensions are a very important matter to the people of the maritime provinces. If because of the state of the national exchequer or for any other reason this government fails to put into effect in toto its promises to pay in full old age pensions to the people of the maritime provinces, it will be considered as a rascally piece of business. It may be that they do intend to carry out their promises, but there are some very disquieting signs and rumours in that connection. I desire to bring this matter as forcibly as I can to the attention of the house and the government, because it was on the basis of these promises that they were enabled to win during the recent elections certain constituencies in the maritime provinces.

Apparently my own views as to the recent embargo placed against trade with Russia are not those of many on this side of the house. They may not be the views of my constituents but I think, in justice to myself, that I should express them. It seems to me that this government has acted too hastily in its method of dealing with Russia. There is a very good prospect of the five-year plan succeeding in Russia. If the wheat industry of this country is to have a guaranteed future there should be a conference between the wheat-producers of the world with the idea of placing the wheat production upon the markets of the world in a rational, orderly and if possible non-competing manner, and it seems to me that the action taken by this government will not conduce to that end. I read in the press, I think to-day, that Mr. Ferguson, representative of Canada in Great Britain, is attending the International Institute of Agriculture, which begins its sittings at Rome to-day. I understand that representatives of the soviet government will attend these meetings and that Canada is to adopt a policy of "watchful waiting." In all probability at some time in the future we shall have to confer with the representatives of Russia and it would appear that this order in council, very offensive in its terms and laying down the principle that we shall not trade with a country whose economic system or social conventions are disapproved of, was a hasty and ill-advised step on the part of this government. It was of no consequence at all as a protective measure for our coal industry because, as I said before, why shut out 300,000 tons to let in 18,000,000 tons? There may be some reasons for the passing of this order in council, but I think they should be made public. I know that many people disagree with its provisions and I think it is the duty of this government to give an explanation to the country before parliament prorogues.

I would like to comment briefly upon the general economic situation. During the closing months of the year 1930 many prominent men of the world gave their opinions as to the causes of the present depression. Mussolini made speeches in which he blamed to a considerable degree the policies of the United States. Mr. Hoover made an Armistice day speech in which he attempted to diagnose carefully the causes of depression. Mr. Thomas W. Lamont made a speech before an association of economists in which he stated that the causes of depression were excessive production as compared to consumption of many commodities, the attempt in certain parts of the world to hold up prices artificially, the fall in the price of silver, the maldistribution of gold, political unrest in certain countries, and the spirit of rampant speculation which has been so evident in recent years, particularly in North America. In a speech which he made at Calgary, the Prime Minister of Canada blamed the economic depression upon his political opponents, and so fas as I can learn he is the only prominent statesman in the world, the only statesman in the world—

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER: Amended.

Mr. ILSLEY: —who did that. The people of Canada will not take seriously this attempt of the right hon. gentleman to fasten the causes of this depression upon his political opponents. Indeed, the government itself by its spokesmen is now attempting to attach the blame to world conditions. The people are not taking seriously attempts to play politics with the business depression, and that, sir, is one of the brightest signs appearing upon the political horizon.

Mr. J. H. MYERS (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few remarks on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I feel it my duty and I take great pleasure in following the time-honoured custom of congratulating the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address. I can more readily congratulate the mover, or perhaps I may be permitted to say that I can more readily sympathize with him, by reason of the fact that at one time in my own career I found myself in a similar position.

It was very pleasant indeed to listen to the mingling of the French and English tongues and to see the honours being divided between the two great nationalities. It gives me much pleasure to see the fine contingent which we have on this side of the house from the old, historic province of Quebec. It also gives me a great deal of pleasure, and I am sure it must afford the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) much satisfaction, to know that he draws his supporters from every province of the Dominion. That is as it should be. We want no division between races and no division from the standpoint of religion.

That is all I had intended to say in this regard had it not been for the fact that in perusing Hansard the other day I came across some remarks that fell from the lips of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Veniot), and to those remarks I feel it my bounden duty to take exception. I find on page 132 of Hansard he is reported as saying that during the last campaign a circular of some kind, seeking to discredit the Liberal party in the eyes of a certain religious sect in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and to divide the people from the standpoint of religion, was distributed throughout those two provinces. There is not another man in Prince Edward Island from one end of it to the other who knows that province and the people of that province better than I do, and I deny emphatically that such a circular as that was distributed during the last campaign throughout the province of Prince Edward Island, by either the Liberal or the Conservative party. We do not want such a circular as that distributed throughout Prince Edward Island, nor will we tolerate for one moment the mean, low spirit that would lie behind such an action.

During the course of this debate a great deal has been said with reference to the period of depression through which Canada is passing at the present time. In that regard we may say that misery likes company, and there is a certain consolation in the fact that we are not the only country that is experiencing depression at this time. Every other country in the world is passing through the same trying experience as we are in the Dominion of Canada. If we had in Canada at the present time an unusual period of depression and the whole world outside were prosperous, I would say that the fault lay with Canada; that there was something wrong with the government of Canada, something wrong with the people of Canada or with the country itself. But such is not the case. We are no worse off in Canada than the people in any other section of the world; in fact, I think we are not so badly off; and I have sufficient faith in the future of this Dominion with our vast natural resources, our great transportation systems and our mighty water-powers to turn the wheels of industry, to believe that Canada will be one of the first countries to recover and that she will recover very quickly from the present period of depression.

So far no one has been able to tell us exactly the cause of this period of depression, and I do not suppose an untrained farmer like myself would be expected to come to Ottawa and be able to explain what appears to be such a great mystery to others. I am, however, bold enough to venture the assertion that two things have contributed to the great period of depression through which we are now passing. Everybody knows that prior to about a year ago the whole world had gone stock crazy. Everybody who had ten cents in his pocket was buying stocks. It did not matter whether he was a millionaire or a boot-black, he was buying stocks. Hon. members all know what happened, the crash that came in that regard and how the purchasing power of the people was wiped out in a few hours. Another factor—and it is something very few people care to talk about; they all like to slip around it—is the fact that we are living at a pretty fast pace. The automobile, the radio and the picture show all take their toll and somebody must pay the piper. If the depression through which we are now passing does nothing other than to teach us a lesson in good, sound, sensible economy, we shall not have passed through this period in vain.

During the course of the debate a great deal has been said with reference to agriculture. That is as it should be. Agriculture needs to have something said about it. It is the biggest and the best industry that we have in Canada to-day, and I believe it will always remain so. Three or four weeks ago I picked up one of our Canadian magazines, and in turning it over I noticed an article headed "What is wrong with farming?" I read the whole article through very carefully. Various reasons were ascribed, and various remedies suggested. After going carefully through the whole of that article I came back to the headline "What is wrong with farming?" and right then and there I made up my mind there was not a single thing wrong with farming. Farming is just as good to-day as ever it was, and the farm is just the same as ever it was. The same rain falls on it and the same sun shines on it. With the aid of the modern machinery that we have and with all the knowledge we have gained in recent years, from our agricultural colleges and experimental farms, we are better able than ever we were before to select, grade and treat the seed that is put into the soil in the spring of the year. With the machinery that we have at our command and the knowledge we have of plant diseases, we are better able to look after our crop during the growing season. The same thing applies in the autumn; we are in a better position than ever we were before from the standpoint of machinery and equipment to harvest our crop expeditiously and safely. That is all we ever did; that is all we ever expected. But when we begin to put our crop on the market, when we attempt to turn the result of our season's labour into cash—there's the rub. But that is not the fault of farming. Nothing is wrong with farming itself, but something is wrong with business. The purchasing power of the public seems for some reason to be diminished. I am not able to prescribe a remedy for all these things, but surely there must be a remedy somewhere.

A great deal has been said about farming in western Canada. As I listen to the members of this house it would seem to me that farming in Canada can be divided into two parts, east and west. I always had an idea in the back of my head that the people of Canada themselves can be divided into just two classes. Some think that there are lots more—English, Irish, Scotch, French and so on. But when the whole thing is summed up, there are only two classes of people in Canada to-day—those who will work, and those who won't.

I have never been in western Canada, I am sorry to say. I have been in the western United States, but I have never seen our own great Canadian west, though if my pass holds out long enough I am going to see it some day. I have, however, read a great deal about the magnificient wheat fields of western Canada. I suppose that in the last twenty-five years billions and billions of dollars must have gone into western Canada in payment for the wheat that came out, and the western representatives here will pardon me if I say that I think some of that money should have stuck. The hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) said the other day that a great deal of it had stuck, that western Canada to-day is well equipped, with magnificent farms, fine homes, and a good stock of machinery. That goes to show that they have not spent all their money, that some of it has gone into property. Perhaps in western Canada the farmers have been doing what we have been doing in eastern Canada, going at a bit too fast a pace.

So far as wheat farming in western Canada is concerned, it is not so very different from potato-growing in Prince Edward Island. Any man, no matter who or where he is, who is engaged in what I term single-line agriculture, will always have his years of depression; he will have his good years and his off years. We notice that in Prince Edward Island. Until a few years ago in Prince Edward Island we were entirely a community of mixed farmers, but four or five years ago the potato craze hit our country. It is a wonderful business when properly handled, but when that craze hit the province a few of our farmers, foolishly, I think, abandoned mixed farming, disposed of their live stock, and went into potato growing exclusively. The same thing happens to them as occasionnally happens to the western wheat farmers. They have their off years, and, strange to say, some of them have their off year when the rest of us are doing all right. In the season of 1928, which was about the meanest potato year I ever saw in my life, with potatoes selling as low as 12 cents a bushel, while the potato grower did badly, the rest of us were getting along very nicely indeed. Hogs, cattle, poultry, hay, grain and everything else that we handled that year brought good prices. We were all right, but the specialist who was engaged in potato growing surely met his Waterloo that year. In Prince Edward Island there is no excuse for a man going into potato growing exclusively, because it is a wonderful country for mixed agriculture. There is, I take it, however, an excuse for the western farmer engaging in the growing of wheat exclusively. I have talked with many of the western farmers during my stay in this house, and they tell me that out in the west there are large sections that are admirably adapted to wheat farming but are not so admirably adapted to mixed farming or live stock raising. That is their own problem; I am not here to offer any advice to them in that regard.

The hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) this afternoon made one remark in which I heartily concur, namely that mixed farming will not be a cure-all for present conditions in western Canada. I quite agree. She also spoke of cooperative societies and cooperative marketing, and I believe that even the wheat pool came in for criticism as well as praise. We have all these cooperative organizations in their perfection in eastern Canada. We sell our eggs, our hogs and our cattle through shipping associations. We have in Prince Edward Island also the potato growers association, one of the finest marketing organizations in the whole Dominion of Canada. In a year when potatoes bring a good price the association is praised by all, but when potatoes are down to 12 cents a bushel—well, it is about the damnedest thing on earth. All these organizations are good and useful in their place if they are properly handled, but you can make all the rules and regulations you like; governments, provincial and federal, can pass all the enabling legislation they like, to help them, and still the fact remains that no parliament on earth ever yet was able to repeal or annul the age-old law of supply and demand. That law has reigned supreme all down through the ages, and it always will.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned if I say a word about potatoes, for wheat has been discussed by nearly every hon. gentleman who has preceded me. I regard the United States tariff against Canadian potatoes as very, very high indeed; 75 cents per hundredweight seems to me to be an unreasonable tariff. Our government has seen fit, and rightly so—both parties are as one in this because the Dunning budget provided for the same thing—to impose a similar tariff against United States potatoes. But I think I can speak for the potato growers of Prince Edward Island and eastern Canada in saying that whenever the United States see fit to lower their tariff we shall be quite willing to meet them with a corresponding reduction in ours.

There is, however, one feature with respect to potatoes which I do not regard as quite fair. In Prince Edward Island and in eastern Canada we have what is known as compulsory grading of potatoes. The main grades of table stock are Canada No. 1 and Canada fancy. Every single potato in the bag must be perfect; if a potato is bruised, cut, scratched, or has any other blemish it must be taken out or the inspector will not pass the bag; every carload of potatoes shipped from Prince Edward Island must carry a certificate signed by a government inspector. We have imposed that regulation on ourselves in order to raise the standard of our product on the markets of the world. We are happy under these conditions and we live up to the letter of the law. If anybody finds that we do not, all he need do is complain about it; our numbers are on the cars, and the complaint comes right back to the individual farmer. I have been informed when the early shipping season begins our competitors across the line are allowed to ship their potatoes into this country without following the strict grading regulations that we have imposed upon ourselves. We do not wish to shut out their potatoes, but we contend that when potatoes cross the line from the United States into Canada they should be subject to the same grading regulations as our own potatoes.

A great deal has been said about the price of farm machinery. In my opinion the price is entirely too high, and undoubtedly something must be done. I was pleased the other night when the hon. gentleman whose constituency embraces all that part and parcel of land lying southwest of the north pole told us that the price of farm machinery and ploughs had been reduced in his riding. That was a very encouraging piece of news, and I only hope it was land ploughs and not snow ploughs that the hon. gentleman had in mind. I am sorry to say that as yet we have noticed very little, if any, reduction in the price of farm machinery in eastern Canada. I have no hesitation in saying that my advice to the farmer is to buy just as little farm machinery as he can get by with. Some hon. gentlemen may say that that is bad for business. I know it is; no one knows it better than myself, because when we cease to buy, implement dealers cease to sell, and when they cease to sell that is reflected back through the manufacturer to those who work in the factories. But, Mr. Speaker, I assert that self-preservation is still the first law of nature, and the farmer who allows himself to be over-burdened with debt, whether through the purchase of farm machinery, automobiles or anything else, is neither any good to himself nor to the community in which he lives.

As I have said, something must be done about the price of farm machinery. But do not misunderstand me. I have no quarrel with the manufacturer. He is doing the best he knows how, perhaps he is worrying over the situation just as much as we are. But I do say there is too wide a spread between the price of the commodities of the farm that we have to sell and the price of the machinery that we have to buy. Prosperity will not return to Canada until it first returns to those who are engaged in Canada's greatest industry. I am not here to offer the manufacturer any advice. I am not a manufacturer, nor am I a business man; I am a plain, ordinary farmer. Yet at times I think my own thoughts, and it often occurs to me that after all the trouble does not arise in the factory. I wonder how far I would be from the truth if I were to make this statement—that the sale and distribution of farm machinery, and for that matter a great many other commodities, costs more than the manufacturing. Step into any railway train you like, or into any hotel, and what do you see? You are tripping over commercial travellers and machine agents; they are chasing one another up and down the line, they are worrying the life out of the storekeepers for orders, and they are living at the best hotels. Who pays the piper? In my estimation it is the man who buys the goods. The hon. member for Southeast Grey said she believed in cooperative marketing. I will go a little further; I would apply the cooperative system to the manufacturers themselves. Surely they will have to find out some cheaper way to get the products of their factories into the hands of those who need them.

I think that is about all I can say, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the economic condition of Canada, but there is something else I should like to speak about.

An hon. MEMBER: Hurry up.

Mr. MYERS: Yes, I am sorry to note the time has gone by so rapidly. During this debate we have heard a lot about promises. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) spoke for four and a half hours—a long time for a man to speak—and I believe he devoted fully half of his time to the subject of promises—the promises that the right hon. Prime Minister had made to the people of Canada during the last campaign. The leader of the opposition seemed to be worried about it, but I cannot yet make out what was worrying him, whether he was worrying that the Prime Minister would not fulfil those promises, or whether he was worrying for fear he would fulfil them, or whether he was worrying because the right hon. gentleman had made them at all. He went so far as to say that the Prime Minister had not even lived up to the promise of perishing. Well, I can tell the right hon. leader of the opposition that there is this difference between him and the Prime Minister, that if the Prime Minister perish at all—which God forbid—he will perish in an honest manly effort to do something for the Canadian people; while the leader of the opposition on the other hand has already perished, politically at least, in attempting to persuade the Canadian people that there was nothing to be done.

I have only a few moments more at my disposal, Mr. Speaker; I wish I had half an hour. This is not the first time the Tories have made promises; the present Prime Minister is not the first Tory who has made promises. Ever since the days of confederation; ever since we entered the union in 1873, we had been promised continuous communication with the mainland. Various attempts were made by all governments to carry out these promises, but so far as the trade and commerce of Prince Edward Island was concerned they all ended in failure. They tried icebreakers to ply between our island and the mainland for years, but you can easily see what a little bit of a steamer that was stuck in the ice for a month at a time could do in the way of keeping transportation open. Then in 1911 a Tory by the name of Robert Borden came down to Prince Edward Island. He spoke in the market hall in Charlottetown and made a walloping big promise. He said, "If you make me Prime Minister of Canada I will link up your railroad on Prince Edward Island with the railways throughout Canada." That sounded big, but what happened? He did not fulfil that promise in three months; he did not fulfil it in eight months or in a year, but when three years had rolled away that promise was implemented one hundred per cent.

There are other things in Prince Edward Island of which we are in need. Some sections of our province are still a long way from the railroad. We have in Rustico a village inhabited by sturdy Acadian people. It is one of the finest fishing centres on the Atlantic coast, but they are ten miles from a railroad. They catch cod, mackerel and lobsters as fine as you will get anywhere, and if they were in a position to place these products of their toil in refrigerator cars immediately on coming to shore so they could be shipped to the cities of central Canada, it would be a great thing not only for central Canada but for the people of our province as well. Likewise, on the south side of the island, the settlement from which I come is eighteen miles from a railroad. That does not sound very far to those of you who come from western Canada, but I can assure you that in the handling of such a heavy commodity as potatoes it is a terrible handicap indeed. Again, we are suffering for want of better roads. The Prime Minister came down there before the last election and made us the promise that if he were returned to power he would help us improve our highways, and we are depending upon him to implement that promise.

There is just one other thing about which I wish to speak, and I am glad the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) is in his seat. The gateway to Prince Edward Island is Tormentine, New Brunswick, and next summer we are putting on a new ferry which will be very different from the old one. At the present time when automobiles are brought across they must be loaded on flat cars and taken abroad the ferry in that way. The new ferry has an automobile deck; the piers have been widened, and next summer you will be able to drive in your automobiles right aboard the boat, and forty minutes later you will be on Prince Edward Island. However, in getting there you have to cross a number of railway tracks in Tormentine, with all the switching back and forth which is going on there all the time. My colleague and I have a resolution on our desks from the board of trade of Charlottetown asking for a subway so that this level crossing may be eliminated. I took up the matter with the Minister of Railways, who said he had not enough money at the present time to carry on this work. I very much commend the economy that is being practised by the government; it is the only thing to do at the present time, and it is very wise. I support the Minister of Railways in that, but I want to tell him that when finances get better, as they are bound to do, and when conditions are improved, we who represent Prince Edward Island will camp on his doorstep until we get that subway.

I believe my time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion just let me say that I have faith in the present Prime Minister and those who are associated with him; I believe that if they are given time they will implement every one of the promises they have made to the Canadian electors, and they will not perish in the attempt but will win the undying gratitude and admiration of the Canadian people.

Mr. WILFRID GIROUARD (Drummond-Arthabaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, there was, the day following the elections, great rejoicing among those who had given their support to the Tory party. Did not the pleasant prospects hinted at, and which were to become alluring realities with the advent of a new government, justify in some respect these manifestations of joy! Indeed, were not all these unemployed to find within three days a permanent job? The workman was to be remunerated, thanks to tariff concessions granted to high financial circles and that active and devoted agency of the Tory party, the Executive Committee of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association; the farm products were to be considerably increased in value, the sale of wheat was a foregone conclusion. In brief, when all the nations of the world had to face an economic crisis which deeply affected them, when everywhere in other countries depression and discontent were rampant, add to this, in many countries, revolutions and civil wars, the Conservative party gave their pledge, as soon as elected, to make of Canada the only country in the world where prosperity would reign and where contentment and satisfaction would link themselves to an everlasting and permanent felicity. There was reason to rejoice, and I thought myself, that the speech from the throne, represented a program so alluring that it would be in some way a hymn of joy.

I feel quite certain that every member in the house has read Chanteclerc, by Rosland: Chanteclerc was that rooster which was master in his own poultry-yard, he suffered, however, from a delusion; he believed that it was through his crowing that the sun rose and spread its light over the world. One morning, the sun rose without his intervention and we know how great was his grief and sorrow. The right hon. Prime Minister suffers from the same delusion. He believed —or tried to make believe—that by raising his voice the sun would rise over our country, that it would suffice for him to make pledges for them to become immediately realities, that he had but to speak and that, like the shadows of night disperse with the first rays of the sun, so the crises would give way to days of prosperity. Those who rejoice have witnessed the deception and the speech from the throne instead of being a hymn of joy, is a sad acknowledgment of incompetence.

Those who drafted the speech, accomplished a toilsome and hard task; their efforts were spread over a period of many days; by making a complete recapitulation of their election pledges, they discovered that there was one which they forgot to mention to the electorate, they hastened to remedy this sin of omission; and this is why, at the very outset of the speech, they find nothing better to offer to the people than patience and fortitude. Indeed, the opening sentences of the speech from the throne is as follows:

> I welcome you to your duties at a time when the nations of the world are passing through a period of great economic depression. Canada has not escaped it. But the Canadian people have met the trials of the moment with patience and fortitude, and are facing the future with the courage and faith which must triumph over every difficulty.

This patience and fortitude to face the future, where will the Canadian people find it? Does it behoove the government to speak of patience and fortitude, they who during the election period, and since, did all in their power to lower one and destroy the other. All admit, to-day, that the Tories' campaign, on the one hand, aimed at exaggerating the depression, alarming the people and creating a state of general pessimism, while, on the other, by pledges of immediately reestablishing business and bringing back normal conditions, they sought to create the impression that salvation rested with the advent to power of the Tory government. They succeeded, not in capturing the confidence of the people, but of surprising their good faith, and I am sure I am using a very mild expression when stating that the present government was elected under false colours. Moreover, they begin to perceive the danger of their tactics and to realize that the exaggerated pessimism which they spread, served but to paralyse business more and intensify the havoc of depression. They realized that since assuming power our commerce has dwindled in a most alarming way, that the country's debt has increased, that the value of farm products has further decreased, that the discontent of a deceived people has brought on a strong reaction against their policy.

That is why they now endeavour to steer public opinion in another direction. After having tried to throw the responsibility for the depression on the King government, the present administration wish to create the impression that the country is really passing through a crisis, but that it is less felt than among the other nations, and that our country, being young and sturdy, will easily overcome this drawback. They would have shown more frankness had they made these statements previous to the elections, since the economic conditions in Canada are actually worse than they were then. Were we to believe the Prime Minister, it would appear that he went to the root of the evil, to the cause of this depression, and he alone could remove them; therefore, if instead of improving the economic situation is the same or worse, it follows that the government, either have not performed their duty or must admit their incompetence. In both cases, the people will benefit little. I was speaking, a moment ago, of the change of opinion which took place as regards the government, immediately after they assumed power. The country certainly witnessed one of the most rapid feats of wheeling which can be performed by persons who wish to be considered as efficiency experts. First, it is the Minister of Labour who states, a few days after the elections that our situation was not the work of any government but the result of a world-wide crisis. The government's mouthpiece in the province of Quebec, the Gazette of Montreal, in its edition of September 10, stated:

Canada has passed ten or twelve months of commercial readjustment comparable to that which took place in the early post-war periods but not upon as broad a scale. The situation would not have been nearly as bad except for the non-movement of the grain harvested last year. When the grain is not sold for export, the country temporarily at least, must get along as best it can without this new wealth, and at the time of general depression both domestic and foreign, the deprivation is a very serious one. September, "say the Gazette," has shown improvement in the general situation of the country.

The right hon. Prime Minister, on his return from England, speaking to the newspaper reporters, at St. John, made the following statement:

I am delighted to find myself again here. This has always been my feeling on each return from my trips abroad. We are all back, and are very grateful for the warm welcome, unceasing kindness and hospitality of the English people. Canadians have no need to leave their country to recognize this fact, however it inspires you to find the proof everywhere that your brothers of overseas see with open admiration the triumphant progress of Canada. They already grant her the place which it is destined to occupy in the Empire and the world.

I wish to specially draw your attention to the words "triumphant progress of Canada." The Prime Minister adds:

Our difficulties are less, for they are those which a young country is up against. In a sense they can be looked upon as an incident in the work of her development.

What he pictured before the electorate, as utter misery and commercial and agricultural ruin has become a mere incident. An incident, the difficult period which we find intensified by the failures which have attended the carrying out of his policy! An incident, the continuous drop, and, the more surprising at this period of the year, in the prices of farm products! I think it would not be wise for him to hold this language before the farmers of the riding I represent.

Mr. Beatty, also expressed his views on the same subject to meet those held at present by his friend, the Prime Minister. The loquacity of the President of the Canadian Pacific Railway is extraordinary since the last general election.

On march 3 last, speaking in Toronto, the newspapers report the following:

According to Mr. Beatty, the west understands that the crisis is not the result of the market conditions of one country alone, and that it will not be solved by the measures, notwithstanding that they are judicious and timely, of one government alone. People over there are well aware that this crisis is the result of numerous causes which extend to all markets of the world.

Mr. Beatty would have been the object of more sympathy and shown certainly a greater spirit of independence had he delivered this speech previous to the elections. All these opinions show up well the government's confusion, its powerlessness to remedy immediately the situation, a very humiliating acknowledgment of the failure of its pledges and a feverish search of evasion and means to explain the poor success of the policy which it put forth and which resulted only in intensifying the economic crisis, and especially that of agriculture.

Further on, in the speech from the throne, we find:

It will be your privilege to consider certain measures designed by my ministers to ameliorate existing conditions.

And still a little further...

The problems which stand between us and ultimate prosperity are manifold and great. To be effectually met, they must first be understood.

The operation of the unemployment Relief Act 1930 has proved equally beneficial.

Then he adds that the measures taken cannot stem immediately unemployment. What an admission of powerlessness, and what must it have cost the government to confess that they were seeking a remedy. Still, I remember certain speeches where Canada was compared to a patient that alone the Tories could,—not merely help,—but cure in twenty-four hours; they boasted of having in their possession the needed remedy; and yet, after eight months in power, the speech from the throne informs us that they are still searching. If they had the remedy, they did not apply it, since the patient is worse, and, therefore, they may be taxed with criminal negligence. If they had not, they deceived the electorate. I leave to the hon. members on the right the choice between the one and the other alternative.

May I be permitted, sir, on the question of unemployment, to recall one of the sentences which the right hon. Prime Minister delighted in uttering to his audiences:

Some one must be held responsible for the unemployment, and this does not rest on individuals but on the Government. There should not be unemployment in a country like ours, and there would be none if the Government did their duty.

Those words, to-day, are his own condemnation. If the King government did not do their duty toward the unemployed, what must we think of a government under which unemployment is more acute? I prefer a government whose opponents charge unjustly of not fulfilling its duty and under which there is a limited number of unemployed than a government which boasts of carrying out its duty and under which, however, business is threatened, agriculture is suffering and the number of unemployed is continuously increasing.

The speech from the throne mentions the appointment of a tariff board. You do not ignore, sir, that the King government had for the last five years, established such a board which had proved its usefulness; however, one of the first acts of the Prime Minister was to have an order in council passed abolishing this commission. The era of government by orders in council was beginning. The board appointed five years ago had been created by an act of parliament and I have strong doubts whether a simple order in council can thus cancel an act passed by this parliament. In any case, it would have been more in agreement with our constitution and parliamentary usages to introduce a bill to that effect in the house, however, the government lacked the necessary courage. They would have had to answer embarrassing questions and admit that their only excuse for taking such a step was that the officials of the existing board, composed of men who had become experts in tariff matters, would be more qualified to protect the true interests of consumers, and put a stop to the extravagant requests of those who held large interests, those officials composed of his own appointees. Are you aware, sir, what certain newspapers stated when the order in council abolishing the board was passed. The following is from Le Forum of Sherbrooke:

One of the first official acts of the Bennett administration was to abolish the Tariff Commission. This action has saved the country $200,000 per year.

The announcement of this measure of economy has been on the whole applauded.

Now that the Prime Minister has decided to appoint another board, I am rather anxious to know what will be the comments of Le Forum. I feel sure that there will be none, it is a foregone conclusion with this newspaper being so blind that it is ready to worship to-day what it burned yesterday.

At the September session, the government increased the tariff and they intend to carry out other tariff changes. It is unfortunate that their intimacy with high financial circles prevent them from realizing the dangers of a policy which can only lead to isolate our country from the other trading nations of the world.

The tariff wall with which the government would like to surround Canada, is in the nature of economic nonsence. Can one truly imagine that other nations will purchase our products if we prevent them from selling on our markets? Has it ever occurred to the government, that other nations, in retaliation, may adopt Canada's insane policy, and prevent, by a high tariff, the imports of our products on their markets?

It is unfortunate that the government cannot understand that the farming class, especially, needs openings for the sale of its products. As a result of the tariff regulations enacted by this government against the other nations, the export of our products will be curtailed, curtailment has already begun.

China has amended its tariff, the Panama Republic, Argentine and Egypt have increased the duties levied on a number of products which we sell to them. Belgium has warned us which should suffice. And the warning is of such importance that I deem it my duty to read an extract of it to the house. L'Echo de la Bourse de Bruxelles, of January 10, 1931, expressed itself as follows on the right hon. Prime Minister's policy:

Just previous to his departure for the Imperial Conference in London, Mr. Bennett brought down in the Canadian House a bill dealing with the tariff. The tariff changes which were immediately put into force, were adopted by the Canadian Parliament.

It is of some interest to Belgium whose exchanges with Canada have favourably developed in the course of these last years, to examine the situation and to bring out somewhat the point.

The first truth which appears in consulting statistics with reference to commerce, is that the balance of trade is greatly in favour of Canada.

We learn, moreover, that Belgium is, with the exception of Great Britain, its best European customer in the purchasing of wheat, oats and barley, and ranks second or third of all Canada's clients in the purchasing of these products; that it absorbs almost the total Canadian output of zinc ore and the greater portion of that of asbestos.

The balance of trade between the two countries, already greatly against Belgium, will certainly again be accentuated by this last measure.

Belgium can therefore not remain indifferent to Mr. Bennett's projected legislation of a distinctly protective character, and making for a complete revision of the Canadian customs tariff. It surely would be hardly conceivable, that she should continue to be one of the best customers of a country which deliberately closes its doors to her products.

To counteract the Russian dumping, the Government took the necessary protective measures which the situation demanded. Without there being any need of having recourse to such methods in the case of Canada, Belgium could very well abstain, in the future from making her purchases in that country. Canada is not the only country which produces wheat, oats, barley, asbestos and zinc ore. There is no reason why Belgium should not supply herself with these articles on markets which are more friendly to her productions,

I sincerely trust, sir, that the government will take note of these warnings which are the outcome of her policy in commercial countries. We have no need of going overseas to find out the result of a high tariff on the export trade of a country; we have but to examine what takes place in the U.S. What has been, in the United States, the results of a high tariff on their export trade. There were, in the course of last year, conferences where experts of all nations met so as to study this point. A report was tabled in the Chamber of Deputies, at Paris; it reads as follows:

The tariff program of the United States had the effect of reducing their exports by 25 per cent owing to the measures of retaliation adopted by other countries, states one report in the budget of the Department of Foreign Affairs, presented to the "Chambre des députés," this day.

Even here, in Canada, since the last tariff changes, the decrease in our trade figures out in hundreds of millions of dollars. Instead of catering to a small group whose selfish views will always prevent them from finding the tariff sufficiently high, the government should busy itself somewhat in promoting the interest of the farming class.

Immediately after the September session, the Prime Minister hurried over to London, where he represented our country. This House remembers his threats? The session had to prorogue at the time indicated by himself, otherwise he would not attend the Imperial Conference.

All his speeches were crammed with the marvels he would accomplish. He would find in England a market for the sale of our wheat and would settle once for all, and to Canada's profit, the question of our trade exchanges within the empire. A campaign started in the press requesting the Liberals to allow the Prime Minister to leave.

The Gazette, of Montreal, in its edition of Sept. 11, 1930, urged the Opposition to allow the Prime Minister to leave in time for the London Conference.

Mr. DORION (Translation): Thanks for your leave.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): I am pleased to see that the hon. member is closely following my remarks. He certainly will appreciate the extract which I shall read from the Gazette, a newspaper which he must evidently read every day.

I beg of my hon. friend for Quebec-Montmorency to listen. This is what the Gazette stated:

Upon the progress made with the work of the special session of parliament depends the fate of the Imperial conference, since it is obvious that if Canada cannot be represented by its Prime Minister the results of the conference must be partial and inconclusive.

If the Prime Minister had not left, we would still hear cries of indignation and malediction hurled at the Liberals. Imagine, Canada would have lost, through our fault, the sole opportunity of relieving the economic crisis!

What statements would not the Prime Minister have made on deeds that he would have been able to accomplish, on the advantage that he would have obtained and on the benefits of all kinds that he would have bestowed on the Canadian people. That opportunity was not given to him, and the Prime Minister went to London. He was to blast open the English market. After he had delivered his speech in which he wanted to force the British government to tax food to the detriment of her citizens, there was, indeed, a blast, but it gave us no markets. It simply had as a result to lower Canada's prestige. Her representative never recovered from the inevitable fall which his proposals had lead him into. Canadians who could have reasonably expected results more satisfactory, owing to the hopes which the Prime Minister himself had inspired, were the more so disappointed.

As early as November 12, 1930, the Gazette speaking of the Imperial conference stated:

> The Imperial conference is concluding its deliberations. Its members have succeeded in doing nothing in particular and doing it well. . . . . Out of all the fine phrases that had been used at the conference, phareses expressive of the most exalted sentiments, there have come very few practical results. But the interest of Canadian people centres in the questions of empire trade development, no progress seems to have been made.

On the other hand, La Patrie of Montreal, of November 14, 1930, speaking of this conference, made the following statement:

> The Imperial conference, to-day, will end its deliberations, without having realized the hopes which it had given birth to.
>
> At present England and the Dominions have to solve a problem so urgent that they have set aside all the others. It is an economic problem, and they have in no way profited by the work of the conference.
> And, for our country especially the result of the conference is extremely disappointing. It was given out that this question would be taken up again in six months time, but the question is of such importance that it cannot be put off.

The Devoir of October 16, tells us of an incident in connection with the Imperial Conference which might be looked upon as amusing were it not for the disastrous consequences to our country.

Speaking of the Prime Minister of Canada and his quarrels with Mr. Thomas, it says:

> Over there as here, Mr. Bennett is abrupt, authoritative and assertive. He puts conditions, wants everything to more as rapidly as he wishes, hastens solutions, and urges answers. Given the opportunity, he does not hesitate to lecture Great Britain's ministers. It is the London correspondent of the Citizen, of Ottawa, who cables to his newspaper, that on the event of a banquet given to the delegates by the Empire Marketing Board, last week—a banquet when the menu contained only products of the various parts of the Empire—Mr. Bennett rose and addressing himself to Mr. Thomas, chairman of the meeting, said: What good is all this publicity, all this advertisement, if you allow the foreigner to invade your market? To emphasize his point, Mr. Bennett pointed out that Russian wheat, because it sold dirt cheap, displaced Canadian wheat on the British market. Mr. Thomas accepted the uncalled for remark without flinching. He might very well have reminded Mr. Bennett, that this Russian wheat, is sown and reaped by farm implements made in Canada, and that Mr Bennett should not mention the fact, since Canada also profits by trading with Russia. Must it be said that, what is good for Canada, is bad for London? Mr. Thomas was welcoming Mr. Bennett, and the host could not possibly be rude to his guest even if the latter's manners were at fault. Mr. Thomas kept to strict etiquette.
> A few hours ago, Mr. Thomas made his reply, answering Mr. Bennett in a round about way. It was on Tuesday evening, in London, at another banquet. where the delegates met important business men of the United Kingdom. Mr. Thomas was present in his capacity of Secretary of State for the colonies. There were speeches—eleven all told—and in the course of these speeches Mr. Thomas, incidentally made the remark: "if the Imperial Conference is to be a success, it will not be simply by passing resolutions, not even by listening to the eleven speeches which unfortunately they must be burdened with this evening." Mr. Thomas even went further. "There is nothing so dangerous, in times of depression, than to make use of drugs which have the flavour of charlatanism . . . And measures dictated by panic will not help us."

The Prime Minister has returned from London, and if he wishes to be sincere, he will admit with everybody, that he is responsible for the failure of the conference.

May I, sir, draw your attention to a point which must have astonished you. The sale of western wheat is certainly one of the most important problems to solve, yet, is the Prime Minister aware, and are those who accompanied him overseas aware, that there are in Ontario and Quebec a number of counties where cheese is made on a large scale? They know that the British market is practically the only opening where our farmers can export their cheese; how is it that the Canadian representatives failed to fulfil their duties and pledges towards the farming classes by not seeking to assure themselves of the British market, and not saying a word on what could be done to maintain this market for Canadian cheese.

Mr. LAVERGNE (Translation): The English people do not want to tax food stuff, when—

Mr. DORION (Translation): They can accept our cheese as in the past.

Mr. GIROUARD (Translation): For the last ten years, England has been our best customer as regards to our cheese exports. Each year Quebec exported for thousands and thousands of dollars of this produce. This year the Prime Minister crossed over to England. By his attitude, he made a fiasco of the Imperial conference, and within the last year, the last six months and especially the last three months, our Canadian cheese exports to London have dwindled considerably. In my riding, our opponents gave their pledge to the farmers that should Mr. Bennett be elected, immediately the price of cheese would increase greatly. The cry was: "Put the Conservatives in power. You will see that Mr. Bennett will travel to London, and once there, he will find purchasers to activate your sales." What has taken place, sir, proves but too well that the pledges given to the farmers of my riding will have the same fate as those given to Canadians in general.

The government tell us that the Imperial conference of London will meet again, this year, in Ottawa. I believe I represent the views of my constituents in telling the Prime Minister that he holds to a policy which has already been found inacceptable; he will again receive a humiliating rebuff for himself and the country.

The Prime Minister's visit to England has already borne its fruits, but to the detriment of Canada. The leader of the Liberal party stated last week that his government had succeeded in lifting the embargo on Canadian cattle which had been put by the British government and that the farming class had considerably profited by it. The present Prime Minister returned from England and the only result of the conference was the enacting, by the British government, of new regulations which will be very detrimental to Canadian trade. The Gazette of Montreal of March 4, 1931, gives us the following information:

> Exporters of cattle have to face a problem: the new British regulations are of a nature to hurt our trade. The establishing, by the British Department of Agriculture, of new regulations in connection with the shipments of Canadian cattle to England has created a problem for the Canadian exporters. The effect will be of raising the transport rates and completely wiping out the small margin of actual profit.

I wonder what will the Minister of Agriculture do in the face of these new regulations. I have but one word to add: I wish to draw the attention of the house to the last part of the speech from the throne. The government know so well that they cannot find grace with the Canadian people, that they end that speech by an invocation to Providence. They greatly need to implore Divine mercy. I sincerely trust that they will obtain it, however, I am convinced that they will not escape the increasing indignation of the ratepayers of this country.

Mr. GEORGE P. LAURIN (Jacques-Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I feel deeply moved in rising in the House for the first time, as member for the riding of Jacques-Cartier. I also take this opportunity to express again my sincerest gratitude to my kind constituents.

In the past, we had the privilege of being represented, at Ottawa, by truly worthy public men, whose speeches and acts have been reechoed in the annals of this country. Distinguished men like Messrs Girouard, Monk and Décary, advocated in our riding the traditional policy of Cartier and MacDonald, the policy of common sense, fair play, toleration and mutual respect of the two great races which, on the soil of America, received as a mission the safeguarding of our rights and liberties.

Still a young man, therefore better fitted to learn by obeying in order to later lead, than to lead now, I shall make it a duty to try as much as possible to follow, at least at a distance, in their glorious footsteps, and to accomplish this, my only wish, at present, is to continue to be fair towards all those I come in contact with, moderate in my appreciations, loyal in my allegiance and especially to never lose heart. Before throwing oneself into the struggle, it behooves one to foresee and be cautious, but once in it, there remains but to show a courage that grows apace with difficulties until victory is attained.

It is, in my humble opinion, a discretion more estimable than all prosperities. Moreover, when one has the advantage of serving under a leader, whose authority is a pass-word, whose energy is unsurpassable and whose heart is open to all as the Right Hon. Richard B. Bennett is; when one has the great privilege of being favoured by ministers of the crown, senators for whom, each day, we feel a more ardent admiration, it is evident that one would be very wrong not to cradle the sweet illusion that one will unavoidably be useful to his fellow-citizens and foster the greatness of the common fatherland.

The province of Quebec is essentially conservative in character; the last Dominion election resulted in reviving this glorious tradition, and the future will show that the majority of the counties of Quebec will return to the Conservative fold as of old. The Conservative standard will long wave over the Dominion parliament and over the provincial legislatures at present Conservative; it is not too early to forecast that the same standard will soon wave over the legislature of Quebec.

As a member, I shall always bear in mind that I mingled with the common people, and witnessed their joys and sufferings; I shall not cease to love them sincerely, taking a real pleasure in helping and protecting them, while not forgetting above all that worth is acquired by self-denial and fulfilling one's duty.

The time of election pledges is passed. We must keep our word and act. Our leader has fulfilled up to date almost all his pledges: emergency session for the unemployed, partial tariff revision, an essentially Canadian policy, "Canada First." He brought back joy in the farmer's home as well as that of the workman; his economic and national policy, the aim of our long cherished hopes, at last triumphs to the benefit of all Canadians.

The special session resulted in relieving the crisis of unemployment in my riding of Jacques-Cartier. Let it suffice to say that from the $20,000,000 voted at the special session, it was possible to carry out work in the city of Verdun for an amount of $166,000; in the city of Lachine for $75,000; in the city of St. Laurent of $18,000, in St. Anne de Bellevue, for $4,000 and finally in Dorval $2,000.

I had given a pledge, Sir, at the last election to do my utmost, if I were elected member for Jacques-Cartier and if the Conservative party came to power, to induce the government to contribute one-third of the cost of two tunnels under the Lachine canal at Montreal. I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) who contended that the Liberal government had for ever so long pledged themselves to contribute to the constructions of these tunnels. Indeed, sir, the Liberal government had been making this promise since 1921, on the eve of each general election, and never had they fulfilled their pledge.

I am pleased to say that the construction of these tunnels will begin under the Conservative regime, and I wish to publicly thank, in the house, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) and the members of his cabinet, for having acceded to my request as well as to that of my distinguished colleague the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Sullivan) who co-operated with me in trying to convince our people that we were sincere.

I shall go further, the hon. member for St. James stated that the subsidies for the work which is at present being carried out through the agency of the Canadian National Railway, was voted by the Liberal government. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for St. James, he will, however, allow me to add that, since the Liberal government had the subsidies voted for this work, the people of Montreal had not profited by them under the Liberal regime. The expropriations of buildings only were carried out, but the work itself which interested the workmen of Montreal have begun only since the Conservatives are in power.

[Mr. Laurin.]

In the course of the last general elections, I came openly out as a protectionist. on many occasions, as I had always done previous to being chosen as Conservative candidate. At the last session, I gave my support to the partial tariff revision, and I hope that I shall have the opportunity of contributing by my vote in giving the necessary protection to our industries, our manufactures, our working and farming classes.

Without enlarging on the subject, I shall state that there was a noticeable improvement in my riding. The Dominion Textile Company which had almost closed its doors, previous to the general elections, now employ a considerable number of people of both sexes. The Dominion Bridge, whose shops I lately visted, is satisfied with the last tariff revision and, like elsewhere, a large number of people are employed.

I shall take the opportunity, sir, to thank the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) for the assistance he extended to the workers of the Canada Car & Foundry Company by suggesting to Sir Henry Thornton that he should help as much as possible that foundry. Thanks to the assistance given, the Canada Car & Foundry Company opened its doors again and more than 800 men are employed there at present.

I also, sir, stated that I was in favour of old age pensions. In the course of numerous meetings which I held in my riding, before considerable crowds, I spoke again and again on this very interesting subject. I cannot state that my victory is due exclusively to my stand on that question because the problems which were submitted to the people were numerous and important; however, I feel certain that it brought in a large number of the votes which I received. The people gave me their support, their encouragement and help to carry on the campaign which I was waging in that sense. That is why it is difficult for me not to revert to this subject and to tell the house with all sincerity what are my views in this respect.

Most of the members of the house know the outlines and general principles of the measure enacted in 1927. A committee had closely studied it during a few weeks. It had called in witnesses, heard their evidence and elaborated a very extensive and pertinent report.

It was after this study that the bill took the definite form as we have it to-day. The general tenor is known: it provides for the payment of a sum of $240 per year to people over 70 years old. This pension is payable by quarterly instalments to British subjects who have been residents in this country for 20 years and whose income does not exceed $365 per year.

Of this amount, the Dominion government, who was in no way obliged to do so, pay, at present, half. The province where the pensioner resides must pay the other half. It is left to the province or rather provinces, to decide finally if this system of pensions to old people will apply within their borders. They must, indeed, adopt a measure similar to the Dominion one, agree to pay half the pensions, defray the costs of administration, submit for consideration and approval to the Dominion government the legislation that they have passed. Should they not care to take any action, nothing further will be forthcoming.

Two governments must, in a word, meet half way. The Dominion government has gone half way; it is up to the provinces to do the other half.

1. The Finance Minister holds in his hands, ready to pass it over, half of the pension;

2. The provincial treasuries have had to supply the other half and the amount of the pension is complete.

Since four years that the Dominion act has been inscribed in the statutes, five provinces, on different dates and for various motives, decided to take advantage of it. They passed concurrent legislation, created a special organization, consented to pay half of the pension, and to-day, their old people receive quarterly, a cheque for $60.

I must here point out, sir, that the Dominion government had no obligation in the matter. The British North America Act gave exclusively to the provinces jurisdiction in this matter. This comes under the heading of provincial rights. An interpretation of our great constitutional charter given in the course of the debates, in 1927, by the law clerks of the Justice department seems to me to establish this point. These legal advisers even stated that the Dominion act would be void if it included the payment of the whole pension and was exclusively federal.

Notwithstanding this difficulty, the Dominion wished to go ahead, do its share and show proof of its generosity.

While the bill was under consideration, very interesting points were raised. Certain members stated that the province whence they come, could not take advantage of the act and would never benefit by it, and this for a very simple reason, because it required from these provinces the expenditure of too large an amount. Their financial resources, they stated, were too limited to burden themselves with such a load. Among these provinces, we noted the three maritime provinces, whose yearly financial statements often show deficits and whose budgets are not very large, in a word whose revenues are limited.

This objection was certainly a serious one, since after four years, we still find four provinces that have not thought fit to take advantage of the act.

This objection brought on another which is not less important. The taxes paid by provinces not subject to this act, would serve to the payment of pensions to old age in other provinces. So that taxes paid in Quebec and the three maritime provinces are used, to an extent, to pay old age pensions in the other provinces, they help the old people in other provinces.

Might I point out, sir, that this situation is radically wrong, that the objection was well taken. Some day, we must certainly pass remedial legislation; because in equity, it seems to me, I am on solid ground.

I shall not strongly dwell on this difficult point. The party to which I have the privilege of belonging is closely studying this question and it will have, I think, in the very near future, the honour of remedying this injustice and establishing a more equitable regime, by having the Dominion government assume a larger and more important share of the pensions. This will be on its part a most generous act as we must admit, but which will come in due time.

It is expedient to help the old people who worked through life for the welfare of the country.

The riding I represent in this parliament, is both urban and rural. One meets in cities, numerous heads of families who have devoted the whole of their life to obscure tasks, nevertheless indispensable and necessary to the economic organism of this country. Often, they have had numerous offsprings to rear; often they have spent the whole of their wages on clothes, food, and lodging for those children and given them the necessary education. Sometimes they earned low wages and they were absolutely unable, notwithstanding all possible thrift, to set aside savings. Sometimes also, they had succeeded in depositing small amounts in the bank, but lean years came, they were out of work and had to withdraw these savings.

I shall not enumerate all the chances there are of being destitute at 70 years old, because one would have to mention sickness, infirmities, accidents and all kinds of unfortunate events which happen in families and of which men's lives are ever strewn. Let it suffice to state, and everybody will agree, that in most, in the majority of cases, the workers showed good will, ambition was not lacking nor energy, but hazard and luck were against them.

However, during that time, they toiled for the general welfare of society, they were useful to the country.

I pointed out just now the fact that cities perhaps have more of such cases than the rural districts. The Canadian farmers have mostly all good farms or "un beau bien" as they call it. When old and useless, when they can no more carry on the work on the farm, they continue to live with their children, are cared for and peacefully end their life in humble comfort. Old people in cities are less fortunate. With old age indigence is also felt, often absolute poverty. Temporary jobs, too many hardships, shortage of bread in the home, unfortunately this is what too often takes place.

It is on behalf of these cast-aways that I wished to raise my voice, to-day and draw the attention of the house. I know that my constituents approve heartily of all I have said. My sympathy towards the poor old people is the same as their's, it took root in the midst of scenes of misery and sufferings.

I am not, however, the only one, in the house, to share these sentiments. Many of my colleagues have the same feelings. And I trust that by pulling all together, we shall be able to prepare for all old people in Canada a better and more peaceful future.

Almost the entire press of Canada, Sir, the morning following the great victory of the Conservative party, praised the achievements and long career of the statesman that the country had placed at the helm of her affairs. The conservative newspapers expressed their deep gratitude to the great leader whose program "Canada First" had opened up to our party in the old Quebec province an outlet to our national aspirations and given to our cause new life: they praised the benefactor and victor of this marvellous opening which he made throughout the country.

I state, in concluding my remarks, that I see in our party a greater assurance of a national, individual and collective life.

The weakness of governments, swayed by the fear of being considered unprogressive or that rousing the clamours of an adverse press, which, however, does not fear to frighten our wives and daughters by threats of war, existing but in their fertile imaginations, the fear of public opinion still holds, within bounds those whose ideas are the most opposed to our regime, but who, however, have felt the wrath of a nation which they deceived so often.

It is a consolation to think and observe that our honest electorate know how to choose those who truly serve them, which they treat with contempt and reject with horror those who servilely flatter to better enslave them.

The struggle to please a responsible majority, capable of carrying on the work of the Canadian parliament, ended in an imposing manner on July, 28 last.

In a period of great economic crises, and of dangerous political insecurity, the liberal party proved powlerless. Unable to act itself, depending on occasional friendship shirking its responsibilities, it was swept away at the last elections.

Since the voting took place, the Conservative party raised to power, endeavoured to present all financial crises or at least to circubscribe it, and thereby avoid the danger which threatened those who suffered from the economic crises and unemployment. It submitted, at an emergency session, practical measures to meet first a considerable financial depression and to serve in raising the morale of our industrial and farming classes.

Its word of command "Canada First" has always had as necessary complement—not to put off till to-morrow, act—what the King government could not accomplish, the Bennett government took up on its own hook determined to bring it to a successful issue.

The people of our cities and country side will give credit to the party which, in a difficult period did its duty and did not shirk its responsibilities.

The Canadian people in all situations, showed that they can have willpower and the determination to impose a Canadian party capable of being equal to the task and to better serve their interests. They wish to live in peace and security, they want order, they are intent on reconstruction.

Mr. Speaker, this will end my first speech in the house, the first of my political career. However, I trust that I shall continue here, as I always have done in public, to support the Conservative party in all the just proposals which it will put forth, in all the measures which are of interest to my fellow-citizens and compatriots.

When in years to come, conscious of having fulfilled my duty as a straight Conservative, and as a citizen as well, my children will be studying the astonishing phase of our political history which we are to-day, going through, they will tell their comtemporaries: "Our fathers were there." This is the only reward I expect from this amending and reconstructing of our national policy.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in conformity with custom and also in sincerity I wish to congratulate the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) upon their eloquence.

In the few minutes at my disposal before eleven o'clock, I should like to tell the house something of conditions in western Canada and to make some observations thereon. In that great country those engaged in the farming industry are rapidly returning to primitive living conditions, travelling for miles to grist mills to have their own wheat ground into flour, mending their old clothing, repairing their own machinery, and in many cases burning their field crops because they are of no value in the market. How can a western farmer pay with 400 bushels of wheat a debt which when contracted represented about 100 bushels? The purchasing power of the people has gone because the prices of the things they require has not come down in proportion to the fall in the prices of their products. Statistics show that while manufactured goods have fallen 9 per cent in value, the price of farm products has fallen 50 to 60 per cent. Many farmers of the west are facing utter ruin unless they revert to serfdom or standards of life which we dread to contemplate. I believe members coming from the west have a mission to perform. They must convince the government and the house of the justice of their claim for more assistance for the producers.

These are some of the present inconsistencies. The textile manufacturer receives on clothing coming from Great Britain a protection of 35 per cent, plus a special protection of twenty-five cents per pound. Clothing from foreign countries must on entering Canada pay a tax of 40 per cent, plus a special duty of thirty-five cents per pound. On the other hand, the man who raises the sheep, who spends long days out on the lonely hills herding his flocks, receives little or no assistance, and I hope the plight of the sheep men will engage the attention of the government. In the iron and steel industry subsidies and bonuses have been given at various times. At the special session, for instance, the duty on many agricultural implements was raised from 7 per cent to 25 per cent. On the other hand, the man on the farm who uses those implements must take his chance on the markets of the world to sell his products. Under the provisions of the Bank Act the banks are given privileges that assure them a profitable return upon their money as far as government assistance can assure such profit. We have the railway commission, which acts as a judicial body in respect to questions arising between the railway companies and individuals. The commission does not expect the railways to do business at less than cost, and at different times many millions of dollars have been advanced to save the railway companies from bankruptcy.

Secondary industries generally are receiving more and more shelter from outside competition, which gives them an opportunity to do business at a profit. In fact, the farmer is about the only one who has to take his chance on the markets of the world, and to-day he is selling his products at less than half the cost of production.

Early in the season the western premiers came to Ottawa and requested that the federal government fix a price of 70 cents per bushel for No. 1 northern, Fort William basis. This unfortunately was not granted. If it could have been granted it would have done much to mitigate the sufferings and hardships caused by the acute and uneven fall in prices, and would have brought hope and comfort to many of those who are now in despair. The transportation companies would have benefited; the manufacturer, the wholesaler, and the country merchant would have participated in the improvement. I would like just here to make mention of the unfortunate plight in which the country merchant finds himself to-day. Out of the goodness of his heart he has granted credit, and now, unable to collect his accounts, he is being hard pressed by his wholesalers for payment. While in Canada many other industries have received assistance, we find that outside of Canada not only have industries been helped, but particularly has the primary producer received assistance. Australia protects her butter makers and her wheat producers. France has an import duty of 86 cents a bushel against Canadian wheat, Italy a duty of 90 cents, Germany $1.62. Many other countries of Europe have, by milling quotas and by import duties, assisted their agriculturists to a great extent.

I have here a pamphlet issued by the Co-operative Wheat Producers of Saskatchewan. It points out that Italy, Germany, France, Bulgaria, Spain, Greece, Switzerland, Norway, Poland, Finland, Belgium and a great many other countries of Europe have made arrangements whereby the producers of wheat are given a price very much higher than on the world market. I do not say that this is sound business. Perhaps we will agree that in the case of Canada it would not be; but why should one industry fail to receive any assistance from the government while other industries get much? I agree that unwarranted cartels, unreasonably high tariffs, unwise artificial barriers, props and stays are damming the legitimate and normal flow of international trade and commerce, and consequently hampering sound progress and delaying our return to prosperous times.

I have one suggestion to make and one matter to bring to the attention of this government which I hope will be of a constructive nature. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent there are many thousands of acres of irrigated land. Discouraged by the prospect of low prices of ordinary farm products, these men are greatly interested in the production of sugar beets. With a little assistance, this industry could be established as a permanent agricultural structure. Canada has always imported more than 90 per cent of its sugar requirements at a cost of from $40,000,000 to $50,000,000 annually. Canada consumes nine hundred million pounds of sugar annually, and only seventy-five million pounds has ever been produced from raw material grown in Canada. There is one plant at Raymond, representing a cost of $1,000,000, and there is room for two more plants, one at Brooks, and one near the Vauxhall irrigation district. These plants would be built and operated if assistance could be given. They would support thousands of people. They would make work for the miners of coal and limestone. They would provide traffic for the railway companies and work for the railway employees. Man power would be required in the field and in the factories. The by-products would help to feed the dairy herds, and the secondary industries would be encouraged. British and Canadian capitalists have spent over $50,000,000 on irrigation schemes in Canada. Under present conditions, with prices of farm produce as they are, these projects must fail. The Alberta government is interested to a great extent in at least one of these projects. If the sugar beet industry could be encouraged, it would save the situation.

There is another particular reason why this is urgent at the present time, and that is because the price has fallen from $7 to $5.50 per ton, placing the growers in an unfortunate position. I believe that the present Prime Minister is interested in this industry, because at page 453 of Hansard of the session of last September he said that he had met the beet sugar growers, who had asked for a slight upward grading of the tariff to ensure stability of their enterprise. He said:

> If I had had time, I have no hesitation in saying to this committee that I should have endeavoured to meet that wish. But time did not permit dealing with that very complex schedule.

The southern Alberta beet industry is just in its initial stage, and deserves consideration in view of its potential greatness. In view of the over-production of wheat and the pending over-production of other products, I believe that joy would come to many homes in the west if this assistance could be granted.

I have a resolution here from the Scandia local of the United Farmers of Alberta, which reads:

> Resolved that in the interest of the sugar beet industry, this local goes on record as in favour of protection in the form of a subsidy for the benefit of the farmers and everybody concerned.
> S. J. Bengtson.

This government has operated demonstration farms in different parts of Canada, and has shown that sugar beets can be grown successfully in this country and that the beets are high in sugar content. Here is a resolution passed by a large meeting attended by several hundreds of farmers in the irrigated district of Brooks, Alberta:

> Whereas the Dominion government has successfully demonstrated through their stations located at Brooks the growing of sugar beets, we hereby request that the federal government take immediate action to relieve the greatly depressed condition of the producers on irrigated land in southern Alberta caused by the general economic situation at present, and aid the said producers by doing everything possible to further the sugar beet industry in Alberta, by either subvention or tariff, and further, the said industry would help to solve the unemployment by creating labour for about ten thousand people for each such factory as at present operating in Alberta.

I have also a resolution passed by the .egislature of Alberta, where the government is neither Liberal nor Conservative. This resolution was passed by a majority of 41 to 6:

> That pending a general substantial revision downward of all tariffs this assembly recommends to the Dominion government that the agricultural industry of western Canada be placed on a parity with other industries of Canada either by stabilization of prices or by careful examination of the incidence of the tariff schedule in order to assure that the economic interest of the farmers be adequately and justly safeguarded.

There are those who are now urging less government aid to business, but corporations in Canada have obtained franchises, charters, tariff concessions, and special privileges. The time to stop this practice, to execute a right about face of policy, is not at the moment when those engaged in the great basic industry of the country are pressing their claim for similar support.

Canada is passing through a period of economic gloom, dark clouds hover on the horizon, but we still have the products of our great natural resources to supply our own market and the markets of the world. Our people have not lost their initiative, and we are not bankrupt in salesmanship. Canadians will carry on with courage and fortitude, striving to realize their highest ideals, striving to make Canada a better place in which to live, and to maintain peace, unity and harmony. With the poet we may say for Canada:

When from the winter of thy dark night
Thine angels of sunlight call,
Oh! waken me to my highest, my best,
Or waken me not at all.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 27, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1930-31

A message from the Deputy of the Administrator, transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1931, was presented by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house and referred to the committee of supply.

A message from the Deputy of the Administrator, transmitting further supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1931, was presented by Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Mr. BENNETT moved that the estimates be referred to the committee of supply.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): On the motion of my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett), I believe it has been customary in the past to have estimates which relate to the Canadian National Railways referred to a special committee of the house which deals with the national railway estimates. Has my hon. friend considered that point?

Mr. BENNETT: It has not been the practice in the past to refer all supplementary estimates in that way. This is an estimate to take care of situations which have arisen during the past year and with respect to which the provision made by parliament was not found ample. The railway company asked that this provision be supplemented by the sums mentioned, as will be observed in the estimates themselves. I did not look it up myself, but my information is that with respect to the supplementary estimates it has not been customary to refer them to the select committee, because frequently the committee has not been set up by the time the estimate is required to be passed in order to make it available during the current year. Perhaps my right hon. friend will observe that there is a provision making this estimate available until the end of May, although practically all sums have been expended already or the liabilities have been incurred for which the money is required. Particularly is that so with regard to the largest item, which arises from the shortage of traffic as compared with last year, and the resulting increase in the deficit.

Mr. DUFF: These items can be discussed when the committee meets.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton): But surely my hon. friend is not asking for supply by way of supplementary estimates to go beyond March 31.

Mr. BENNETT: No, only with respect to the railways. My hon. friend will observe these words in the estimates:

Further amount required, in addition to the sum of $51,600,000 already appropriated, due to increase in the amount of deficit arising from operations in the year 1930, $11,410,400.85.

There are these further words also:

Notwithstanding the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, this appropriation shall not lapse before May 31, 1931.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But that is not a supplementary.

Mr. BENNETT: That has been done before, and the reason is that the obligations have been created. The bills are not all in and will not be in by Tuesday next, and therefore it is desired to have until May 31 to audit the accounts and make the payments. When the bill comes before the house, if the house thinks such a provision—which is purely a matter of bookkeeping to facilitate the operations of the company—should not be there, it can be dealt with later. The estimate does not bind the house.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Will these estimates be distributed?

Mr. BENNETT: They are in the distribution office now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my right hon. friend that the estimates now being presented always will be taken as relating to the fiscal year ending March 31. For that reason it is desirable in every way that if moneys are to apply to the next fiscal year or to another year they should be voted from estimates presented to the house as relating to that fiscal year. I hope my right hon. friend will consider that point between now and Monday next.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not desire to trespass upon the time of the house but I think perhaps my right hon. friend did not follow what I was saying a moment ago. The amounts covered by these estimates have been spent, or the deficits have arisen, but all the bills have not come in as yet. The accounts must be audited before payment is made, and unless some provisions of this sort were made, after Tuesday next they would have accounts which they could not pay but which had been incurred during the year that is past. I assure my right hon. friend that the matter will be discussed again in the select committee as usual, and my information from the railway company is very explicit that this does not cover a single dollar chargeable to any year except 1930. I think I might add that the year of the railway is the calendar year, and not our fiscal year.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I just want to remark that this is unusual, owing to the fact that the railway accounting, while not presented with the general accounting of the government, carried the same restriction, if my memory serves me right. You are asking for thirty days longer for the railway than is allowed in the government.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this house will at the next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

WORLD WHEAT CONFERENCE

PREFERENTIAL TARIFF AGREEMENT AMONG EUROPEAN NATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Acadia): I wish to direct to the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) a question predicated upon a telegram received from Rome this morning, as follows:

European delegates outlined plans for boycott of overseas wheat as means of protecting their own agricultural industries. Despatch continues: "Overseas delegates from Canada, etc., listened grimly to the exposition of the plan." Preferential wheat tariff agreement among European nations discussed to shut out importations and provide for consumption of European crop at home.

Has the Prime Minister received any message along these lines, and if so will the government take proper action as soon as possible?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): No intimation of any such action has been received by the government, but those of us who have followed the discussions that were antecedent to the congress at Rome of the European wheat-growing countries are familiar with just what the telegram indicates, and the fact that they have re-asserted the position at Rome does not in any sense indicate that it is acceptable to others than themselves any more than to us when it was originally put forward.

INTERNATIONAL BANK

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT TO FINANCE TRADE WITH NEW MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): A despatch from London this morning states:

Montagu Norman, governor of the Bank of England, who is now on his way to the United States, is going to New York in connection with a proposal for establishment of an international bank to finance trade with new markets, primarily with Soviet Russia.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada has been requested to participate in this arrangement.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The answer is in the negative.

MERGER OF PAPER COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I wish to direct the attention of the government to what I consider a great national question. In the Globe of yesterday it is reported that a merger of plants is contemplated by the paper companies of Canada involving $690,000,000. The article goes on to give the names of the companies, with their assets. What I am most concerned about is this sentence:

> It was considered probable that many operating economies would result from a fusion, principally by closing high cost mills and concentrating operations at the low cost plants.

I would point out to the government that many towns have been established and many families throughout Canada are living at high cost plants, and I am wondering whether the government would undertake, through the Combines Investigation Act or some other machinery, to see that the public is protected.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): The question of the construction of paper mills has been a provincial matter, except with respect to mills in the province of Manitoba. The hon. gentleman knows that it was under his regime that the situation to which reference is made came about, and I know of no power at the moment that lodges in the federal authority which would prevent a mill being shut down. This is a matter over which apparently the provincial governments would have control, being a question of civil rights. The government have no knowledge beyond what appears in the press, and have no reason to know whether it may or may not be an accurate statement of the situation. The Combines Investigation Act clearly would have no application to it.

CATTLE BREEDING CENTRES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir). I understand that the federal government is willing to pay freight on approved breeding cattle between the ages of eight months and five years from eastern provinces to the west. These cattle are to be inspected, tested and certified. Does this apply also to the stock within western provinces, or inter-provincially in the west, and if not, why not?

Hon. ROBERT WEIR (Minister of Agriculture): It applies to stock to be used for the establishment of breeding centres and is applicable not only from the east to the west but inter-provincially in the prairie provinces, and also from British Columbia to the prairie provinces.

Mr. DONNELLY: The minister says the rate applies inter-provincially. Does it apply within the provinces as well?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Yes, within the prairie provinces.

Mr. DONNELLY: Within each province?

Mr. WEIR (Melfort): Each province.

WINNIPEG VETCRAFT SHOP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): Yesterday I asked the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. MacLaren) a question, and I find no record of the matter in Hansard. The question was: Is it the intention of the government to reconstruct the vetcraft workshop burned in Winnipeg last June? The minister's answer was, no. I would ask to have that record made in Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall see that the omission is repaired. My recollection of the minister's answer was, that he had answered the question day before yesterday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION ON MONDAY OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Leader of the Opposition): So that we may know the order of business for Monday—I may not have an opportunity of asking my right hon. friend at the close of the day—is it the desire of the government to proceed with a consideration of the supplementary estimates as the first order on Monday, or will they come on later in the day?

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): I thank the right hon. gentleman for bringing up the question. I was going to confer with him this afternoon and ask which would be more acceptable.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they were taken up at eight o'clock that would be the more acceptable time.

Mr. BENNETT: I am entirely in the right hon. gentleman's hands. I thought that if the Senate sat we would consider the estimates in the afternoon and have them disposed of. If it would not be trespassing too far on the right hon. gentleman's indulgence we could take up the estimates first and that would enable us, possibly, to have the Senate dispose of them that afternoon, providing we got through with them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not had an opportunity of looking over the estimates carefully. I imagine they are not controversial to any extent, but we might desire to get information on some of the items before agreeing to their being passed. With this understanding it would be acceptable that they should be the first order of business.

Mr. BENNETT: If it is acceptable to the right hon. gentleman and his friends and to my hon. friend from Acadia (Mr. Gardiner), we will proceed with the supplementary estimates immediately on the orders of the day being called. But if that inconveniences my hon. friends we will go on in the evening, because it is a matter of consent and we are in their hands.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The estimates are being distributed now. This is Friday and a number of hon. members may not have an opportunity of seeing them until Monday. We might have it understood that we shall proceed with the estimates the first thing on Monday afternoon. So long as it is known that the desired information will be forthcoming, and hon. members are able to obtain the estimates at once, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: I thank my right hon. friend. His cooperation is very much appreciated, because we shall be able to get the matter disposed of promptly.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. DORION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. N. DORION (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. "Le Soleil" of Quebec, in its issue of Wednesday, March 25, in its account of the debates of this house, ascribes to me statements which are absolutely false. In its headlines of the debates account, we find the following words:

> The member for Quebec county, Mr. Dorion will not tell the house whether he approves or not of Anderson, the Conservative leader of Saskatchewan, in his attack against the French Canadians.

I state, sir, that this is false, like other statements which this newspaper is in the habit of publishing. The hon. member for Joliette asked me the following question:

> Does the hon. member approve or not of the acts of Anderson?

[Mr. Bennett.]

I answered:

> I shall say to the hon. member for Joliette that he will have my answer in due time and place.

At page 301 of Hansard will be found what I said in this respect; it was in answer to the hon. member for Joliette.

> I long for the dawn of the same intelligent spirit in Saskatchewan, for the disapproval of the mean and narrow-minded persecution of all we hold dear.

I again say that the statement of this newspaper is absolutely false, it is moreover a habit of the Soleil and its reporter.

Mr. BOUCHARD (Kamouraska) (Translation): What are the things which are dear to you?

Mr. DORION (Translation): I think it is unnecessary to give further explanations to the hon. member for Kamouraska. He is sufficiently intelligent to understand the sense of my words.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Max D. Cormier for an address to His Excellency the Administrator in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Mackenzie King.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, in making a humble contribution to the debate on the address in reply, I re-echo the sentiments of those who have spoken before me and extend my personal congratulations to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address in reply. May I also re-echo the sentiments expressed yesterday by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) in regard to the wonderful fluency and felicity of diction demonstrated by those who are privileged to use both the official languages of this house. In taking part for the first time in a major debate in this august assembly, may I crave the indulgence of this house in that I am not permitted to address it in my own native tongue.

Your Honour has received already congratulations from some of the hon. members representing the eastern portions of Canada; may I be permitted to speak for those of us who come from British Columbia, and in a very special and personal way extend to Your Honour our most sincere congratulations and our high appreciation of the distinction you have carried to the honourable office you now occupy.

If the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) had been present in the house—I regret very much to observe his absence—I would have identified myself with the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) in extending the congratulations of those of us on this side upon his elevation to membership in the Imperial Privy Council, this being, in my opinion, the highest honour which can be shown to any British subject. I think the hope can be expressed, even from the opposition benches, that this is only the precursor of further honours which will be extended to the right hon. gentleman from the highest source in the British Empire.

I think I may be permitted to speak for every hon. member in this house in regretting that the former Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Malcolm) and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens) are both absent from this house through illness. One of these hon. gentlemen is a valued personal friend of mine while the other is a much respected political foe. I think it is the unanimous wish of this assembly that both these hon. gentlemen may be restored to the full vigour of perfect health and that they may be able to resume their duties for Canada with the same industry, activity and energy which have always characterized their activities in the service of the nation.

Before dealing with the national issues, which are involved in the consideration of the address in reply, perhaps this house will pardon me if I voice very briefly the sentiments of British Columbia in regard to two or three questions which are possibly more provincial than national. I invite the generous and sympathetic consideration of this house to a transportation question which vitally affects greater Vancouver. A bill will be presented to this house later on in the session, the passage of which will affect 300,000 people. On September 19, 1930, the Second Narrows bridge was destroyed by a ship in tow. This bridge involves an investment of $2,000,000 made by the municipalities surrounding greater Vancouver. This transportation facility is vital and essential to our community and to our municipal and corporate life. At this time I invite the generous and sympathetic consideration of the house to this measure when it is presented.

In discussing the matter of the fisheries of British Columbia, perhaps I may have the attention of the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes). I take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. minister upon the wonderful impression he made during his visit to my province. He was neither too big nor too distant to refuse to meet any delegation, and I trust that he will carry out his promise that after this present session of parliament he will make a somewhat prolonged stay in our province and thus become familiar with one of the most important natural resources there is on the Pacific coast. I would sound one note of warning to the hon. minister; we believe in the conservation of our fisheries, but we believe also with equal sincerity in the preservation of the white fishing population, amounting to 20,000. I protest against the introduction of any processes of super-mechanization into our fishing industry which would imperil the existence and livelihood of some of the finest men we have in the country, men who contribute to the life of the province and to the life and food supply of this Dominion of Canada.

I desire to say a word to the hon. Minister of Mines (Mr. Gordon) in regard to a suggestion which I believe has come already to his attention; I refer to the opinion held by economists in regard to the world's gold supply. I have been led to believe—the hon. minister will correct me if I am wrong—that at the present time Canada is second in gold production. South Africa, which is first in this production, faces a gradual exhaustion of her supply, and in this connection I would like to quote the words of the president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, who recently said:

> Within the next decade the gold production of Canada might reach $100,000,000, so greater research work should be carried on and every support given prospecting for minerals in new fields.

Mr. S. H. Logan, in speaking in the capital on a recent occasion is reported as saying:

> "A possible shortage of gold might be averted by international action in subsidizing prospectors. Such action" he declared "would be of great benefit to Canada where gold mining was developing into one of the country's leading industries."

I would make a suggestion to the hon. minister, one with which I believe Your Honour is already acquainted, that during this coming session this administration assists in the transporting of let us say, fifty prospectors into that district in the northeastern portion of British Columbia and the southeastern portion of the Yukon. This territory, with which Your Honour is acquainted, is 100 miles wide by 250 miles long and most glowing reports have been received in regard to the possibilities of gold discovery and production. An investment by this government of the small sum of $35,000 would finance a monthly service of two aeroplanes, with a base at White Horse in Your Honour's constituency. This would permit of fifty or sixty prospectors entering the territory immediately, whereas ordinarily it would take them from four to six weeks. It would assist unemployment in that district and might lead to the discovery of further gold producing areas which would be a great asset for the Dominion.

My fourth point is not only of interest to the province of British Columbia but is in every way a national question. I refer to the completion of an outlet from the Peace River district to the Pacific coast. In this connection I desire to repeat a pledge given by the right hon. the Prime Minister, speaking in the name of the Conservative party, in his famous Winnipeg speech. I refer to pledge No. 5, which is as follows:

> We pledge ourselves to the improvement of the whole scheme of Canadian transportation, northward by the completion of the Hudson Bay route, and the construction of such branches as may be necessary to render it readily available to any part of Canada.

The following are the words I am going to emphasize this afternoon:

> . . . . to the Pacific slope by a Peace River outlet and east and west by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways and we pledge ourselves to aid existing traffic channels and to increase port facilities on the great lakes, Hudson bay and the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and to the establishment of a national highway system.

Subsequently to that pledge written by the Prime Minister in his own hand on that occasion, he said, speaking at Renfrew on the 16th day of July, 1930:

> These pledges I have made and by these I stand or fall.

Speaking in the house on September 9, 1930, at the special session, he said:

> It must be remembered that promises with respect to policies are matters of profound importance to the Canadian people and the policies we promised to put into effect we propose to put into effect immediately.

I commend to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Manion) that word "immediately." It sounds to me somewhat different from the easy, amiable and progressive steps mentioned in the speech from the throne. Again, as reported on page 39 of Hansard of the special session, the Prime Minister said:

> I shall content myself with saying to the right hon. leader of the opposition that we will keep the promises we made.

Again as reported on page 40, he said:

> They were the proposals which were before the people, about which the people had information and which, with the return of this party to power, they expect us to consider. We will endeavour to carry out the proposals submitted to the electors.

[Mr. I. A. Mackenzie.]

Again in regard to the most vital point of all, the Peace River outlet, the Prime Minister, speaking at North Vancouver on June 18, 1930, said:

> After I am Prime Minister on July 28 I will see that my promises are carried out or the government will go out of power trying to do so.

Speaking on behalf of the far western province of British Columbia—and I am not speaking in a partisan spirit—I say we deeply and emphatically regret the absence from the speech from the throne of any reference to the contemplated policy of the administration in regard to this outlet. I should like to advise the administration that the construction of this outlet is of tremendous and vital importance, not only to British Columbia, but to the whole of the Dominion of Canada. By embarking upon such a scheme they would be doing something towards solving the great problem of unemployment we have at the present time in British Columbia, and at the same time they would be building up a veritable and valuable empire in that wonderful Peace River country.

I pass on to the national questions that are involved in the speech from the throne. First of all I come to the question of unemployment. We have been debating the issue in the house for the last three weeks and so far no mention has been made by the administration of what their policies are to be for the current year in regard to meeting national necessities in connection with unemployment. I do not think the house should permit this debate to be concluded until the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir) explains his policy in regard to remedying agricultural conditions throughout Canada and until the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Gordon) explains the intentions of the administration in regard to meeting a worse situation than confronted us last September at the special session. I wish to register an emphatic protest against the continued absence from the house of the Prime Minister. I well recall during last September, when we were discussing the urgency of the Prime Minister proceeding to the Imperial conference, the right hon. gentleman arose in his place and told the house that he considered his duty to Canada was to remain inside the House of Commons rather than go to the Imperial conference in England.

Mr. BELL (St. Antoine): Not those words.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The statement will be found in Hansard of the special session. I submit to the Minister of Railways and Canals that the unemployment situation is much worse in Canada than it was last September. I can quote him figures to prove that such is the case in my own province and other provinces, and if it were necessary for the Prime Minister to be in the house during the special session of parliament, surely it is necessary for him to be here at the present time, because members of all parties are endeavouring to do the best they can to remedy the tremendous national economic condition now confronting us.

An hon. MEMBER: He is better employed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is an insult to parliament. No member can be better employed than in occupying the seat with which the people who have sent him here have honoured him. It is useful now to recall the pledges that were made. I am sorry the Prime Minister is not present, but I suppose the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie), the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Rhodes) and the Minister of Railways and Canals will assume responsibility for every word uttered by the Prime Minister during the campaign. They must do that or deny his leadership. What were those pledges? Speaking in his own city of Calgary on the 12th June, the Prime Minister said:

> This is a new country and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

These words are either true or they are untrue. If they were untrue then, the Prime Minister was guilty of what he accused me of the other day when, on this resolution, he used the word "deception" in regard to myself. If they were true then, they are true now, and I wish to repeat them for the benefit of the judicial mind of the Minister of Justice:

> This is a new country and there is no excuse for unemployment in Canada if a government does its duty.

Speaking again in Edmonton on the 13th day of June, the Prime Minister said:

> I say again that I will call parliament together at the earliest possible moment to provide at once the remedy—employment for all who can and will work.

Employment for all who can and will work! What is the condition of Canada to-day? I shall come to that in a moment or two. Then he went back to my beautiful province of British Columbia, and speaking in Victoria on June 17, he said:

> Is there any excuse for Canada to have hard times—if the government is discharging its duty as it should?

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Then the hon. member is going back on his own leader. The statement I have quoted was true or it was untrue. This is a declaration made by the leader of the Conservative party, the Prime Minister of Canada. If it were true in June, 1930, it is equally true in March, 1931. Again, in Vancouver, the Prime Minister speaking on the 18th June, 1930, is reported in the Vancouver Sun as follows:

> He would undertake for instance completion of a highway across Canada from Cape Breton to Vancouver.

Where, oh where, is the Canadian national highway of which we have heard so much?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I trust, Mr. Speaker, you will not put against my valuable time these valueless interruptions.

The Prime Minister said at Moncton, New Brunswick, as reported in the Canadian Press of July 10, 1930:

> The Conservative party is going to find work for all who are willing to work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I wish hon. members would go to their own constituencies and applaud that sentiment to-day. I wish they would greet it with applause in the presence of the thousands of starving people in the city of Vancouver, for instance. They dare not do it. The Prime Minister continued:

> Mr. King promises to give consideration to the problem of unemployment. I promise to end unemployment.

I ask the Minister of Railways and Canals, (Mr. Manion) one of the most brilliant debaters on the other side of the house, does he subscribe to that sentiment of his leader? What did his leader mean by saying that he was going to end unemployment?

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Immediately. At page 63 of Hansard of the special session last September the right hon. the Prime Minister said:

> I find that at present in the province of Alberta there are 5,155 unemployed; during the winter it is contemplated that that number will reach 6,650.

I would ask my hon. friends from Alberta if there are not more than six thousand unemployed in that province to-day. I know there are.

An hon. MEMBER: How do you know?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Because I have seen the official figures. The Prime Minister went on:

> In British Columbia at the present time the unemployed number 7,692, and it is expected that during the winter that number will increase to 14,700.

At the present time, Mr. Speaker, according to a recent statement made by the Minister of Labour of the province of British Columbia, there are over twenty thousand unemployed in my province. That shows the success of the policies of the right hon. gentleman. The Prime Minister then goes on to give the total figures:

> It will be observed that the present number is something over 117,000, and it is believed that that number will approximate 177,000 during the winter. If the measures which we submit to this house are productive of the good which we anticipate, we hope that that number will steadily decrease, rather than increase, and that the maximum anticipated number of 177,000 will not be reached. . . . The figure of 200,000 would seem to me to be almost incredible in this country at this time.

But, Mr. Speaker, the fact is that if you make a careful examination of the unemployment situation throughout Canada to-day, you will find that there are over 300,000 unemployed throughout the Dominion. So I am forced to this conclusion, that the government has failed absolutely and completely not only to end unemployment, but even to remedy it, as promised by the Prime Minister during the election campaign; and secondly, that the policies which the government adopted in the special session for that purpose have been proven a gigantic and grotesque failure.

I wish now to approach a phase of the situation which possibly may not disturb so seriously the tender susceptibilities of hon. gentlemen opposite. I wish to review the present situation in the light of world conditions, because despite the accusations unfairly and unwarrantably made against the late administration by the right hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues, blaming the late government for the conditions of depression which we have had during the last twelve months, I for one believe that the present situation has been mainly, if not practically entirely, caused by world-wide conditions. But, sir, the situation in the Dominion of Canada has been intensified and accentuated by the hopeless tariff policies initiated by this government last September, which have put ramparts of ruin around the Dominion and exhausted the consuming and purchasing power of the ordinary Canadian worker. I desire now to place upon Hansard, without comment, the causes of the world-wide depression, as I have culled them from some of the leading economists of the world:

1. Stock gambling and deflation of unwarranted stock values, and withdrawal of credit improperly extended;
2. Shortage of purchasing power due to defective distribution of credit;
3. Under consumption due to lack of confidence or loss of purchasing power;
4. Overproduction in natural resources products, manufactured commodities, buildings and industrial equipment;
5. Tariff walls prohibitory to trade;
6. Modern efficiency in business and industry increasing production and distribution per man;
7. Failure of the established foundation of credit, due to
   (a) Return to the gold standard
   (b) Shortage of gold
   (c) Mal-distribution of gold
   (d) Failure to accept silver as a support for gold in foundationing credit and currency.
8. National debts;
9. Inevitable decline of confidence as a reaction from the previous undue optimism;
10. Rise and aggressiveness of Russia.

I should like to summarize those ten causes under three heads. The real cause of the depression to-day—this is not my own opinion, but one I have gathered from the various authorities which I have consulted—has been, first, the appalling national obligations now extant; secondly, the impossibility of distributing the limited supply of gold to meet the credit demands that the liquidation period has developed; and thirdly, the rise of Russia as a force and power in international affairs and world trade.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the change of government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): World conditions will operate whether you have a Liberal or Conservative government in power, but I say that the policies of the present government have accentuated the conditions of depression throughout the Dominion.

I desire to commend a quotation that was given in this debate by the hon member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). He quoted the following from Viscount D'Abernon's Economic Crisis, Its Causes and its Cure:

> If you desire a return to good market conditions in cotton or wheat or any other commodity—higher freights and more trade activity, you will achieve this with greater certainty and greater speed by dealing with the gold and currency problem than by any other means. A fearless scientific diagnosis is the first step.

I want to suggest to the house a very important consideration at the present time. We are aware that the gold delegation of the financial committee of the League of Nations has presented an authoritative report dealing with world gold stocks. The Bank of International Settlements has already been established in a very limited way, but it is hoped that it will develop into a real international bank through which, by international cooperation, world credit and world currency may find a real international foundation. Hon. gentlemen may be aware that the international chambers of commerce of the world are meeting in Washington on the 6th day of May next to consider the question of the international monetary system. I think that some time during the present session this parliament might very well be advised to make representations perhaps to the imperial parliament with a view to calling a conference of the parliaments of the empire or a world conference to discuss the international monetary system.

That brings me back, Mr. Speaker, from the world situation to the Domiinon of Canada. Many concrete suggestions have been made during the course of this debate. Some hon. gentlemen have suggested that we change the gold standard. Others have urged a remonetization of silver, and others that we should depreciate our currency. Some hon. members have made attacks upon our Canadian banks in the course of this debate. I am not concerned with the equity or inequity of these attacks, but I do believe that our Canadian banking system is tremendously involved in the present causes of depression in the Domiinon of Canada. I am going to make a suggestion to this house at this time. I am not going so far as to advocate the depreciation of our currency, the abandonment of the gold standard, or the re-monetization of silver at the present time, but I do say that when we complain about our banks in Canada it should be remembered that during the present crisis, whereas in the great republic to the south of us some $900,000,000 of depositors money has been jeopardized, in Canada not a single bank has endangered a single cent of its depositors' money; so I think we have reason to be proud of our banking system. But let us remember this, that the depositor of to-day may be the borrower of to-morrow. I believe that the Prime Minister, who is also the Minister of Finance, should immediately confer with financial authorities throughout Canada and with the Canadian banks, because it is absolutely unfair and unjust if through the action of Canadian banks men in all the industries of Canada are to be squeezed out of existence during the next twelve or eighteen months. I therefore suggest to the government—I am not advocating it in any dogmatic way—the advisability of contemplating the practicability of a qualified moratorium on capital accounts for a limited period. That, of course, would have nothing to do with interest, and there would have to be safeguards established with regard to depositors' investments; new loans must not be endangered; and the moratorium would not apply to enterprises where there was not a reasonable prospect of recovering the security. I should like to suggest that in a most friendly spirit to the hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) who is at the present time acting leader of the government. Now, sir, I suggest, instead of the spurious protection afforded by the policy of tariff tinkering to specialized and favorite industries that this would be a real policy of protection to legitimate industries throughout the Dominion of Canada. We heard the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) say that conditions were not so bad in the province of Saskatchewan. I have before me, Mr. Speaker, the votes and proceedings of the legislature of Saskatchewan dated March 2, 1931. This document contains an amendment moved by a member of the Saskatchewan administration, which reads as follows:

That in the opinion of this assembly—

And I would ask hon. members to remember that this resolution is moved in the face of the wonderful prosperity of the province of Saskatchewan at the present time brought about through the efforts of a Tory government.

That in the opinion of this assembly the government should call a further creditor and debtor conference with the object of evolving some practical scheme for the rearrangement or readjustment of indebtedness and that the government of Saskatchewan request the government of Canada to establish without delay a commission (similar to the Duncan commission in the Maritime provinces) such commission, when established, to investigate as speedily as possible economic conditions in western Canada with particular reference to:

(a) Cost of production of western farm products.

(b) Cost to western consumers of goods purchased by them.

(c) Freight rates in western Canada both incoming and outgoing and generally within the western provinces.

(d) Interest rates.

(e) Debt adjustment and amortization of debts and readjustment and amortization of loans on farm lands.

(f) Home and export marketing of western products.

(g) Relation of the tariff to the economic welfare of the west.

(h) All other matters having to do with the welfare of the primary products or affecting western economic conditions.

(i) In the event of the government of Canada failing to implement this resolution the government of the province of Saskatchewan be instructed to approach the governments of British Columbia, Alberta and Manitoba, with a view to the appointment of such commission by the western provinces.

So, Mr. Speaker, seven months after this marvellous increase in the tariff made last September by hon. gentlemen opposite and the wonderful panacea for our troubles advocated principally by my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Turnbull) we have the Tory government of Saskatchewan, with his own political bedmate as premier of the province, asking this administration for a royal commission to investigate what, if you please?—an adjustment of the tariff to suit the economic welfare of the west.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): During the debate I heard the voice of the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) who tried to tell this house that if the one and a half million dozen eggs which were imported this year in excess of last year were allowed still to enter Canada that tremendously high price of eight or nine cents per dozen the farmers are to-day receiving for eggs in Canada would have been cut in two. I wonder if the hon. gentleman knows the extent of egg production in Canada per annum? I wonder if he knows that the egg production and consumption in Canada are practically equivalent, about three hundred million dozen per year. So hon. members will see that the one and one-half million dozen eggs to which my hon. friend referred so eloquently and affectionately mean one and one-half day's consumption by the people of Canada. I leave it to members of this house to contemplate the absurdity of my hon. friend's suggestion.

I wish to say a word or two in regard to the Russian situation which has been mentioned so frequently during the debate. Frankly I may say to the administration that possibly I appreciate very fully the motives which underly the adoption of this policy. On the other hand, sir, in view of statements we have heard during the debate I think it is the most fatuous policy ever adopted by a supposedly sane and sensible administration. Now, Mr. Speaker, what do we find to-day in the United States? I have before me a very recent report in regard to Russia and the United States. I read as follows:

For the next twenty-five years Russia will be a great competitor . . . .

And the house probably knows that the plan in Russia is not necessarily a five year plan but a twenty-five year plan. The present five year plan is only one unit of the whole scheme. To return to the quotation:

For the next twenty-five years Russia will be a great competitor, there is no doubt about that. But can we afford in times of such appalling unemployment and depression to forego during the next twenty-five years this tremendous trade opportunity? Sir Henry Deterding said one of the great causes of the depression was the fact that we had removed from the markets of the world 150,000,000 customers.

Remember that last year the United States did a business with Russia totalling over $145,000,000; that United States exports to Russia were over 6½ times her imports from the United States; that there were over forty-four of the largest American companies doing business with Russia on a long-term credit plan; that Russians now owe their forty-four large concerns over $170,000,000; that the United States government does not recognize Russia but her business men are investing their capital and doing business there—that Colonel Cooper who is helping to build the largest hydro-electric plant in the world on the Dnieper river, said at the Senate commission the other day that in five years Russia will buy from the United States a billion dollars worth of goods annually.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to hon. members opposite that despite the possibly commendable motives which have influenced the action of the government, this policy is going to be detrimental to the interests of Canada because we will be forced to face more ruthless competition in the markets of the world for our surplus products. Now, Mr. Speaker before I conclude—

Mr. ROBINSON: What does Mr. Taschereau think about it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am glad to hear that the administration is prepared to take a lesson or two from the Prime Minister of Quebec. We had during this debate a most marvellous spectacle. First there was the contribution made by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne); then we had the contribution made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull). In my mind's eye I could see a new form of unity springing up in the Dominion of Canada. Here we have in the centre that great stalwart, the right hon. the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Bennett). On his right is his political henchman Premier Anderson of Saskatchewan. On his left sits his own appointee to the deputy Speakership of this house, the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne). "Unity in diversity" as Lord Milner said many years ago! I can imagine the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) introducing this trio to the Dominion of Canada, and the song they sing would be:

> Behold how good a thing it is
> And how becoming well
> Together such as brethren are
> In unity to dwell.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And to make the picture complete, for the sake of unity in Canada, we would have the hon. member for Long Lake (Mr. Cowan) taking up the collection.

My time is about gone, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members from Quebec have already deprecated the attacks on the memory of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, but perhaps I, coming from the far west, may add a meed of praise to that great memory. Surely we have sufficient contention amongst the living here to keep us from stirring up the ashes of our great dead throughout the Dominion of Canada. Laurier to-day is of the immortals, and his example and inspiration will always be something to guide us as a beacon light throughout future years, under the splendid leadership of my right hon. leader the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Mackenzie King).

I wish to conclude my contribution to this debate with a statement of that great Englishman, Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin:

> Canadians, the future is with you. Do not be in too much of a hurry. Your country is for the virile men. Let it be filled with the best. What does one hundred or two hundred years matter before your country is full? Keep the stock that you have and the men and women you have, and see that your future generations are in no way inferior to them. Time is on your side. Maintain your values and your standards, and may your prayers be that of the Greek sailor which has been preserved by Seneca:
> 'Oh God, you may save me if you will, you may sink me if you will, but whatever happens I will always keep my rudder true.'

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) on the very excellent effort he has just made in delivering his maiden speech in a major debate in this house.

Parliament meets this year, Mr. Speaker, under circumstances differing perhaps from those under which the representatives of the Canadian people have ever met before. It is true that we have had depressions in the past from which we have temporarily emerged, but it is doubtful if we have ever been involved in such world wide depression with so much unemployment in the midst of so much plenty in every industrial country in the world, and in which our whole social and capitalistic system has been challenged so strongly. Every thoughtful person admits the gravity of the situation and yet, Mr. Speaker, it is most discouraging to find, that while we meet here to grapple with and if possible solve the problems which confront us and give a lead to the people who are worrying and struggling to carry on, so much of our time is wasted in political, party warfare, wrangling over tariff issues and trying to decide how the last election was won, instead of endeavoring to make a proper diagnosis of our real problems and then dealing with them in a scentific and business like manner. I do not believe the people of Canada are at all interested in holding post-mortems over the results of the last election but they are interested in getting relief measures dealt with at this session of Parliament.

We have been attaching too much importance to the question of tariffs. These periodical depressions have taken place at times when tariffs were not such an important factor as they are to-day. It is my opinion that a proper diagnosis will show that our major problems arise from sources other than the tariff. The same unemployment conditions exist in free trade England as exist in protected countries. Different countries have different fiscal policies, but they are all suffering in the same way. Most countries have the same monetary and financial system, based on the gold standard, so it would seem to me that a greater study of this question by this house would bring about more useful results than spending so much time in connection with tariffs, especially when we consider the time that has been spent on this question in this house and throughout the country for the last fifty years, and the meagre results that have been obtained. Lord D'Abernon, a well known English financier and diplomat gives two causes for the present world depression. The first cause he gives is a crisis in currency, and the second is a crisis in indebtedness. He attributes our currency trouble to the gold standard, and when we find two countries in the world to-day controlling approximately 60 per cent of the gold, one is inclined to believe there is a great deal in his contention.

With the consent of the house I wish to read a short extract from an address delivered by Lord D'Abernon before the Liverpool chamber of commerce. He had this to say, in part:

> We are in the midst of a severe crisis which affects industry, commerce and finance. It cannot be said that this crisis is more severe than others which have been experienced before and surmounted, but it is differentiated from them by certain marked features. It affects practically the whole industrial world, unemployment in the United States of America and Germany being, so far as we can ascertain, equal in amount to this country, if not greater.

Another peculiarity of the crisis is that, so far from being produced by scarcity or bad harvest or political disturbances, it occurs during a period of full production, both agricultural and industrial; it does not proceed from any dearth or insufficiency, nor has it been caused by political disturbance or labour unrest. On the one side we have a plentiful harvest; on the other, a development of industry producing goods in larger volume than ever before. So much is this the case that the superficial complaint is of over-production.

Now, I am inclined to be skeptical about over-production when applied to staple trades and the larger requirements of mankind. The more plenteous the bounty of Providence, the more effective the ability to produce, the better for mankind if mankind is intelligent enough to deal with the situation, and to handle the goods efficiently. That appears self-evident. When on the one side you have a vast volume of production, and on the other side you have millions of men insufficiently supplied with the requirements of life, such as food and clothing, the obvious conclusion is that failure proceeds from inadequate facilities of circulation and exchange rather than from excessive ability to produce.

Another peculiarity of the crisis is the complete failure of politicians in this or any other country to suggest an adequate remedy. What is the reason for this strange failure? In my judgment, false diagnosis of the real causes of the present distress. It has been treated solely as a trade crisis, when it should be considered rather as a crisis of currency in the first place, and a crisis of indebtedness in the second, the one complicating the other; both aggravated by defective lubrication through the money factor and through impediments to trade.

He gives as the second cause of the present depression the indebtedness of the world, and he has this to say in that connection:

I turn now to the subject of indebtedness, which is another of the causes of the present crisis. Everyone recognizes that the world is heavily in debt—individual to individual, country to country. What they do not recognize is that a fall in the price of commodities, or, in other terms, a rise in the price of gold, unduly increases the burden of debtors.

I think this is quite true. We are living to-day under a debt-increasing system, a system which is gradually becoming so top-heavy that in time it will break down of its own weight. It is true also, as Lord D'Abernon says, that a fall in the price of commodities or in other words a rise in the price of gold unduly increases the burden of indebtedness. One of the chief problems with which our farmers are confronted is this very problem of the fluctuating value of the dollar. Debts are contracted largely during periods of inflation, and indeed I might say that is the only time credit is plentiful and easily obtained. Take as an illustration a farmer who contracts a loan in good faith when wheat is at $1.25 a bushel and then attempts to repay that loan with wheat at 35 cents. His debt has been increased over threefold and he simply cannot pay. This policy of the banks I have never been quite able to understand, unless it is done deliberately to embarrass the farmer; and frankly I do not want to believe that such is the case. I believe I am stating the fact when I say that during periods of inflation, when only limited credit should be given, credit is almost forced upon us, while in periods of deflation, when the element of risk is at the minimum, credit cannot be obtained. We find that situation in Canada at the present time. Certainly every farm commodity is deflated to the limit and there should be no risk in loaning money on present values; yet farmers to-day are unable to obtain any credit.

I think I am safe in saying that there is a general feeling that Great Britain will never be able to liquidate her huge war debt, which was contracted when all commodity prices were at the peak; and I am equally confident that the farmers of the west, under the present system, will never be able to liquidate their indebtedness contracted when wheat was at $1 and $2. Unless there is a definite understanding of this question, and a solution found, there can be no real prosperity. France has endeavoured to grapple with this question by inflating her currency and depreciating the franc to one-fifth of its original value, and France has not been considered an outcast nation for so doing.

There has never been a time in our history when industry and science have made such rapid strides as they are doing to-day. But there is a growing feeling that our credit and monetary systems are lagging behind. In support of that statement I wish to read an extract from Business Week of New York.

Business in general has given a good account of itself since the war. It has been remarkably successful in establishing a high standard of living in this country by energetic effort in making and distributing things cheaply and widely; and it has done the best it could through private initiative to soften the shock of depression for labour and the investor.

In the course of time we shall understand that this depression had its origin and will have its end in other, more fundamental factors than the management of individual industrial and commercial enterprises.

And here are the important words:

Of these, our monetary and credit system and our governmental machinery are the most important. Both are a century or more behind business in their development. Management can do only so much and no more to offset their deficiencies, and the stable progress of business is limited by them.

In my opinion there is nothing that will require so much boldness and courage to tackle as this huge question, and I believe there is no man in Canada who has such a wide grasp and thorough understanding and knowledge of the financial question as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett). I believe he is also endowed with the courage and boldness to tackle it if he can only see his way clear to do so. I remember he gave a very excellent address in this house—I think it was in the session of 1927—dealing with the financial question, and no one following his speech at that time could help admitting that he had a thorough grasp of the subject. At that time, I believe, he recommended that a 4 per cent security should be developed and our banks and insurance companies be compelled to subscribe thereto. By so doing Canada would save over $15,000,000 a year in her finances. I might point out in that respect that if our financing were done internally in that manner it might cause our dollar to take a different course and not be supported by making foreign loans as at the present time.

I am inclined to agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), who spoke a few days ago, recommending the deflation of the dollar. I believe our dollar should follow the course of our trade. If our exports are not sufficient to balance imports, then our dollar should fluctuate with it. This would be the greatest means of bringing trade back to balance, because after all when the dollar is depreciated it becomes a source of protection, and it will eventually right itself.

In regard to the Russian situation, which has been under consideration in the house to some extent, I am not sure that the government acted wisely in stopping all trade with that country, unless they have some intimation or understanding that other countries are going to follow suit. Why should Canada sit back in a holier than thou attitude and refuse to trade with Russia when all other countries in the world appear to be vying with one another to get that trade? As reported in the press this morning, it would appear that even the bankers of Great Britain are now endeavouring to arrange financial credit with that great country. It is true that Great Britain so far has not refused to take Russian wheat. Whether the Russian experiment will succeed or not, no one can tell. It is true that we have been pooh poohing her efforts for the past ten years, but in spite of everything Russia has succeeded to such an extent that the capitalist world is worried to-day more than they care to admit. It may be that some threat of this kind is needed to arouse our leaders to action, for when we find approximately fifteen million people unemployed in the world to-day, facing starvation or living on charity, men denied the right to work, surrounded with the greatest wealth the world has ever known, one pauses to question whether our system cannot be improved. Surrounded by plenty as we are, while in the midst of such poverty, we are like a man in a rowboat adrift on the ocean, with water, water everywhere but not a drop to drink. Why should we be afraid of this Russian experiment? If our own system is meting out justice to the people to-day then we should have nothing to worry about.

Senator Borah, chairman of the Senate foreign relations committee in the United States, speaking on the question of recognizing Russia, has this to say:

> Are we afraid that the capitalistic system will break down if it comes in contact with communism? In such a struggle we have the experience of 3,000 years on our side, plus the most dominant desire of the human heart, the will to possess property.
>
> Have we lost faith and confidence in our institutions? Is our religion so feeble that it dare not come in contact with men who say in their hearts, "There is no God?"
>
> I have no fear. During the French revolution, religion was disowned and property was confiscated, but the French people came back The Russian people likewise will come back. . .
>
> The Russian people realize that the present rulers have done more for them in ten years than the old regime did in 200. But I do not think of Lenin, Trotsky and Stalin. I think of the 150,000,000 people who, in their own way and under adverse circumstances, are working out their own salvation.
>
> The leaders are here only for to-day; the people are here for all time. The people will determine the destiny of Russia.
> Our difficulties do not spring from these communistic teachings. Our difficulties arise from the unsolved problems of capitalism. The modernization of industries has left millions of men and women where they must adjust their lives to new conditions, to start life over. They are asking capitalism how to do it. Capitalism has not answered.

Mr. Speaker, I endorse the statements made in this house in regard to economic conditions faced by the western farmer. The sooner we frankly face these facts, the sooner we will be in a position to find a solution for them. According to Mr. Legge, the ex-chairman of the farm stabilization board in the United States, wheat prices last fall were the lowest in 337 years. It is a well-known fact that the drop in the price of all farm products has been out of all proportion to that of other commodities.

The people of western Canada are a hopeful people; they are generally over-optimistic and that optimism has carried them through many of their difficulties in the past. The men and women who have pioneered those western plains, who have withstood the difficulties of frost, hail and drought, who by their tenacity and courage have made civilization possible in western Canada, are not people to be easily discouraged, but I have never seen the morale of those people so low as it is at the present time. With grain prices so far below the cost of production, with such a disparity between the price of everything the farmer has to buy and what he has to sell, with no hope in sight for improved prices, with debts contracted at higher levels, with high interest rates of from eight to ten per cent and the banks refusing to loan money, men after years of toil see their life work slipping from them. The west has always been a great "next year's" country; it has always been optimistic but to-day the farmer is facing the coming season in a state of mind which is more or less bewildered. Everyone is telling the farmer that he should go into mixed farming, but to-day he is the most badly mixed man in the world. His experience in mixed farming has not always been a happy one.

I well remember the season 1919-20 when, because of deflation, a serious slump in the price of wheat occurred. The same advice was given and people pointed to the live stock grower as the man who was making money. In the fall of that year, owing to drought conditions, a serious shortage of feed occurred. The prices of cattle were high, in fact they were inflated, but the banks came forward and voluntarily advised the farmer to hold his live stock and they would be quite willing to advance money with which to purchase feed in order to carry that stock through the winter. Everyone is familiar with what happened. The following spring prices dropped and the farmer was unable to realize an amount for his stock equal to the sum paid for feed alone. This is another example of the policies adopted by the banks, to which I referred a few moments ago. The farmers of western Canada have not forgotten that experience because the ones that did not go broke because of the slump in wheat prices, certainly were broke when the slump occurred in the price of cattle. I think it will be found that many debts were contracted during that period which still remain unpaid.

In spite of past experiences I for one believe that the western farmer will have to develop a more balanced production. There is no reason why all branches of agriculture should not be fully developed in Canada, but there will have to be some encouragement given in the way of better credits and lower interest rates. The farmer cannot continue to pay eight and ten per cent interest and hope to succeed. The proposition advocated by Mr. Beatty, the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway, sounds fine but not being familiar with its details I am not prepared to-day to criticize or commend it. I hope it will prove to be a success for anything which will assist agriculture will receive my support. Where we have a banking system with branches in every little hamlet and the different managers understanding local conditions and knowing every farmer in their district, where we have a farm loan board and provincial credit organizations, it does seem strange to me that we should have to duplicate all this by setting up another financial organization to supply credit.

Mr. Beatty could help the farmers of western Canada in other ways. There is the matter of a reduction in freight rates, and I refer especially to the domestic rates. This matter has been referred to by other speakers, but I would point out the difference between the domestic and export rates. Take two carloads of grain en route from Calgary to Vancouver, both in the same train and drawn by the same engine. Because one is billed for export it has to pay only 20 cents per 100 pounds, while the other, being billed for domestic use, is forced to pay a rate of 41½ cents. This is not a new question because it has been before this house for the last eight or nine years, but as yet no satisfactory answer has been obtained. I think this matter should be dealt with immediately. The other day we heard a very excellent speech by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis), in which he referred to a possible market for barley. British Columbia is a great dairying and poultry raising country and we in western Canada have considerable feed which would be suitable for both purposes. That feed has to travel to British Columbia under the domestic rate, which makes it impossible for us to do business with the British Columbia farmer.

There is another question to which Mr. Beatty might give his attention, that of a revaluation of company land. A very bitter feeling has developed in certain sections of the west where what are known as C.P.R. settlements are located. Certain settlers, having become in arrears, have been dispossessed of their property. The company will then revalue that land and offer it to a new settler at a very much reduced rate rather than give the man who has spent years on the land developing it and helping to develop the country, a chance to make good at the lower price. Very often the new settler is a man who has come from Europe without any experience in this country and yet he is given the advantage of this reduced price of the land instead of the man who is here, acclimatized and with experience on his side, being given a chance to make a fresh start.

I am going to offer a few suggestions which I think are reasonable and will help to improve the agricultural situation. I know some of these suggestions have already been made, but it will do no harm to repeat them.

1. That the government establish an experimental processing plant to determine the spread between the live hog and the finished article.

There is no question in my mind that, as I have stated before, we have to adopt a more balanced production, and one of the greatest developments we could make in Canada would be that of our bacon industry. Yet we find that the spread is such in Canada as compared with what it is in Denmark, our chief competitor, that the farmer feels the dice are loaded against him, and there is very little use of his making any effort along this line. In regard to the government establishing this experimental processing plant, we have a precedent in the fact that a federal government some years ago established an experimental dairy plant at Finch, Ontario. Anyone who is familiar with that knows that plant did excellent work for the dairy industry. I understand that the plant carried itself and eventually was sold at a profit. The government could do no more popular thing to-day than establish an experimental processing plant to determine the spread between the live hog and the finished article in order to encourage the farmers to go into the production of bacon.

2. That a conference of the packers and representative producers be called to see if a steady supply of bacon cannot be sent to the British market.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), in the very able speech he made the other day, went fully into this question, and as my time is limited, I shall not dilate on it. There is something radically wrong in Canada, which is first of all an agricultural country, when we consider the fact that last year we had to import agricultural products as follows:

Commodity	Quantity
Pork	22,000,000 lbs.
Beef	5,241,937 lbs.
Mutton and lamb	4,979,227 lbs.
Canned meats, poultry and game	7,029,956 lbs.
Butter	42,000,000 lbs.
Eggs	2,853,277 doz.

Now we find Denmark, which has to import a great deal of her feed, is paying freight on that feed, feeding the hogs and shipping the bacon to Canada, selling it in some cases as far west as the prairies.

3. Lowering of freight rates, especially domestic.

4. A system of intermediate credits for live stock with lower interest rates.

5. Lowering of all interest rates by putting a penalty clause in the Bank Act to enforce the present legal rate of 7 per cent.

6. Encouragement of cooperative agencies.

In the present age the whole tendency is for the development of tremendous mergers and combines. Seldom does a week go by that one does not read of some gigantic merger or combine. We know the chain store is displacing the individual, and the large combine is displacing the small company in order to meet the keen competition with which we are faced in the world to-day. The only way the farmer can meet that competition is by organizing in a cooperative way, because he cannot combine in the ordinary way that industrial concerns do. I believe it should be the duty of the government to bend every effort to assist the development of our cooperative organizations.

7. The establishment of a federal bank of rediscount and issue.

I believe this would be a step that would go a long way towards helping to improve our present banking system.

Conditions are such to-day with agriculture that it is going to require the wholehearted cooperation of every interest in Canada to reestablish it on a solid foundation. I offer these suggestions for the betterment of agricultural conditions in Canada, in the hope that, as the government has done its best to help industry by increasing the tariff, by voting $20,000,000 to assist the unemployed, surely in view of the promises of the Prime Minister to aid agriculture, these not unreasonable requests may be granted. It is recognized that conditions are serious, especially in view of our wheat situation.

It is true that there has been talk of secession in western Canada, but that movement has not received any widespread support. As one man put the matter to me when it was under discussion—and I think this expressed the view of a great many people—we do not want to see secession, but there is a feeling in western Canada that the people of the east do not recognize the serious condition with which the west is confronted. He said: "I do not want to see secession, but I feel that unless we do something to attract the attention of the people of the east, we will get no relief."

The people of western Canada are just as loyal, just as patriotic, and love Canada just as much as anyone in the east. The men and women of the west are playing their part and playing it nobly in helping to develop this vast country. They are not asking for any special favours; all they ask is a fair chance, an equal opportunity to make good. Speaking for the province from which I come, I know of no other people in Canada who are giving so much earnest thought and study to the vital problems that confront them, and who are endeavouring to such an extent to develop an intelligent citizenship for the purpose of making Canada a better place in which to live.

Nature has left a physical barrier between east and west, but broadminded people realize that this vast country with its unlimited resources cannot be developed in any lopsided manner, and that agriculture and industry must march together hand in hand; and personally, I deprecate in the house any speeches that tend to create class, racial or religious prejudice, or divisions between east and west. I think these beautiful lines written by Wilson MacDonald express the view of every true Canadian:

The East hath her genius and culture; the West hath her vigour and brawn;

And one hath the splendour of noonday, and one hath the glory of dawn.

So, God give Thy smile to the Westland, wherever a true heart abides;

And God give Thy smile to the Eastland, and blot out the line that divides.

Mr. W. A. BEYNON (Moose Jaw): In rising to make my first contribution to the debates of this house, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it affords me a great deal of pleasure to join with the speakers who have preceded me in extending to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address my most hearty congratulations. This might seem to be more or less of a form, but I want to assure these hon. gentlemen that it is much more than that; for I really feel that they are entitled to the very heartiest congratulations on the able manner in which they discharged their duties on that occasion.

Many other speakers have contributed to this debate to whom I should like to extend my congratulations, but so numerous are the addresses worthy of mention that I feel I would be taking up too much of the time of the house were I to mention each one. I would like, however, to join with my friend and colleague the member for Regina (Mr. Turnbull) in extending my congratulations to the member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) on his elevation to the very important position of the presidency of the farmers' party of Alberta. I wish him every success in that position, and perhaps the best I can wish him is that he may fill it with the same devotion to principle and the same farsightedness that characterized his illustrious predecessor.

I desire also to make special reference to two addresses made from the other side of the house, one by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), and the other by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell). Of those two addresses I would say that one was most eloquent and the other a masterpiece of debate. To a new member they were not only very impressive but also very inspiring, setting an example that all of us as new members might well strive to follow.

Coming to the address in reply to the speech from the throne, there are some phases of the proceedings of this house which are more or less puzzling, if not bewildering, to the new member; and if they so impress the new member I think it is not unfair to say that perhaps they have the same effect upon the man in the street. I had occasion early this week to visit the home of a friend in this city, a resident of Ottawa. He told me that he had read all the speeches that had been delivered in the house this session, and added, "I am very glad indeed to see someone from the west, for I would like to know what the real condition in the west is." After all the speeches that have been delivered in the house this session with respect to conditions in western Canada, it may seem a reflection on them that a citizen of Ottawa who had read them should have to ask someone from the west what the actual conditions in western Canada really were. But I think, Mr. Speaker, that it is not quite so bad as it seems on the face of it. It might appear from this gentleman's remarks that hon. members who spoke on that subject either did not tell the true story or else did not know what the facts were. However, I think the discrepancies are more fancied than real. My impression is that there is a tendency in this house, perhaps due entirely to our peculiar form of government, to accentuate rather than to minimize differences. The diversity of the opinions expressed with regard to western Canada is due, I believe, to two causes. In the first place, western Canada comprises a very large area; conditions in one district may not be nearly as bad as they are in others, and naturally one is inclined to gain his impression of conditions generally by looking at conditions in his own particular district.

There is another factor bearing on this apparent diversity, and that is that different people have entirely different ways of expressing the same thoughts and emotions; they use different terms. For instance, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) who spoke a little while ago, being of the Scotch race, if he were asked to describe a certain condition, might say: It was not so good. Perhaps some of the Irish members on this side of the house, speaking of the same condition, would say: It was very bad. O they might say: It was horrible. They are all describing the same condition, and they all mean the same thing, but they use very different language in giving expression to their thoughts. I think in the final analysis there is really not as much difference as there appears to be between the opinion of the hon. member for Regina and that of the hon. member for Red Deer as to actual conditions in western Canada, although the opinions they expressed in the debate seemed to differ very decidedly. It is well, I think, in estimating the conditions in western Canada to remember this.

A good deal has been said about conditions in western Canada that I think did not need to be said. We are all prepared, however, to admit this, that the condition in that part of the country is critical. I think we are prepared to go even a little further and say it is urgent, that it has ceased to be merely a condition and has become a problem, a national problem so urgent that it behooves this government to bring to its immediate solution the best thought and the best means at its command. Having admitted that much, why do we need to debate at great length the shades of differences of opinion as to the actual condition in western Canada? Having gone that far, that is all that the government needs to know, and upon that knowledge it can take the action that is necessary with respect to western Canada.

There are some other things in the proceedings of this house which to a new member appear rather bewildering. On occasions it appears to new members that the older members are inconsistent in the statements they make in the house. I say, "it appears" advisedly, because I do not wish to do injustice to any hon. member. In this connection I wish to refer to certain statements that were made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his masterly speech on the address a few days ago. He criticized the Prime Minister very severely for his action in calling a special session of parliament. He contended that it was not necessary to call that session, that the money required for unemployment relief could have and should have been obtained by means of a governor general's warrant. At page 28 of Hansard of this session the right hon. leader of the opposition, speaking of the right hon. the Prime Minister said:

> Having the opportunity and the power he started at once to use that method in the special session. As all know, the special session of parliament was called for the purpose, nominally, of relieving unemployment. We were no sooner assembled than we discovered that the relief of the unemployed was a mere subterfuge, that the session in reality was to revise tariff schedules upward and to amend the Customs Tariff Act so as to give powers to the governor in council to do what council pleased with respect to many matters affecting the tariff.

Then in addition to that we read the following:

> Throughout the campaign it was never thought that at the special session there would be changes of any extent in the tariff.

Those are the reasons, according to the leader of the opposition, why the Prime Minister was wrong in calling the special session. Turning to page 24 of Hansard of the special session, I find the following:

> Speaking at Regina on June 10, the present Prime Minister said, as reported in the Regina Leader-Post, June 11, 1930:
> If the party I belong to on the 28th day of July is given authority to conduct the affairs of this country, at the first session of our parliament, the government of which I am the head will pass laws that will give Canadians an equal opportunity with their competitors outside of Canada, or we go out of power.

Then again on page 25, I find the following:

> At the first session of parliament the Conservative chieftain stated he would see to it that Canadians would be afforded fair competition, or perish in the attempt. Canadians must have their home markets first and afte markets abroad.

Then continuing on the same page I find the following:

I propose, if elected to power, to call a session of parliament immediately after July 28 to deal with the unemployment problem, to authorize national undertakings which will give work to our workmen.

Then, listen to this:

Side by side, I propose to have enacted such measures as will give Canadians fair competition and equal opportunity with the nations of the world.

In view of the very definite statements made by the present Prime Minister during the election campaign as to what he would do if elected to power, it strikes me as peculiar indeed that the present leader of the opposition should have said that throughout the campaign it was not thought that there would be changes of any extent in the tariff. I believe the leader of the opposition was sincere when he made that statement. The undertakings made by the present Prime Minister before the electorate were read into Hansard by the leader of the opposition during the special session. Judging from the record of the Liberal party it is not difficult to understand the point of view that may have been taken by some that the election promises of the great Conservative party would not be implemented were they returned to office, because the failure of the Liberal party to carry out its election promises would lead the people to believe that the same thing would happen with respect to the promises made by the leader of the Conservative party.

The leader of the opposition said we would be perfectly justified in taking this money by issue of a governor general's warrant. If we refer again to page 142 of Hansard of the last session we find the leader of the opposition taking the most serious objection to the actions of the Prime Minister in this respect. He said:

The one exception that I have to take, and it relates to the bill in the form in which it appears, is as to the manner in which the government is asking this house to vote the moneys necessary for the purposes described. Why should there be at a special session any change in the procedure which is adopted at ordinary sessions of parliament in voting supplies that are necessary to carry out the various undertakings and obligations of the government? As hon. members well know, the usual practice, whereby parliament secures its control over expenditures, is for the house to be moved into committee of supply, for the Minister of Finance to bring down his desired appropriations in the form of estimates, for estimates to be fully discussed in committee of supply, and for appropriations to be made in that way for specific purposes as set forth in the supply bill.

[Mr. Beynon.]

The objection is that the Prime Minister did not proceed according to the views of the right hon. leader of the opposition. Yet at the special session the leader of the opposition stated that if the Prime Minister had merely obtained a governor general's warrant, and given no information to parliament the procedure would have been quite all right. At page 151 the leader of the opposition is reported as follows:

In all deference, Mr. Chairman, if we are to be asked to vote $20,000,000, surely we are entitled to ask any question whatever that relates to how that $20,000,000 is to be spent. It is impossible for the house to be asked to vote a vast sum of money of that amount and to be restricted in its discussion of how the money is to be spent.

In view of those statements by the leader of the opposition surely the Prime Minister would have been unwise to proceed by governor general's warrant and to have relied on the opposition giving that unquestionable support which at this late date they say they would have given. I believe the leader of the opposition was honest in his statement to this house that he did not expect any amendments to the tariff at the short session of parliament. And there were other members of the house who did not think the Prime Minister intended to carry out the promises he made during the election campaign. The speech from the throne delivered at the opening of the short session forecast certain amendments to the customs tariff. During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne a number of speeches were made by members to the left of the official opposition and also by members of the official opposition. In a great many of those speeches I remember the phrase, "You cannot expect to improve the conditions very much by tinkering with the tariff." That phrase "tinkering with the tariff" was used in practically all the addresses up until the time the legislation was introduced. However when the legislation was brought down the phrase was conspicuous by its absence. The fact was brought home with staggering suddenness to the members of the house that at last we had a leader of government in Canada who meant "protection" when he said "protection", a leader who when he stated he would place on the statute books of this country certain legislation, had the courage to do so, a leader who believed his actions were in the best interest of Canada and, was prepared to stake his political fortune on carrying out the promises he had made to the people. When the legislation was brought down the official opposition gasped for breath. After they had recovered sufficiently they raised a hue and cry against the Prime Minister. This man who but a few hours before had been characterized as a mere tinkerer, as one who was not prepared to carry out the promises he had made to the people, became all of a sudden a brutal, driving, slashing, cutting, blazing, blasting, arrogant autocrat. That all happened over night, as it were.

The opposition have characterized the present administration as a one man government. They have stated that the leader of this government is an autocrat. In connection with that all I have to say is that the Prime Minister must be big enough and strong enough to gather round his council table the very best brains in Canada. He must sit in council with these men and yet be their unquestioned leader. Any man with less force of character or less power is not the proper man to be Prime Minister of this country.

I wish also to refer to the fact that during the last campaign this country was flooded from one end to the other with cartoons depicting the present leader of the government as in bathing and the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) stealing his clothes. I thought the inference was very clear, but the Liberal party seemed to have some fear that the public might be mistaken in the inference to be drawn. Chuckling with glee they told all and sundry that the Minister of Finance had stolen the Conservative policy of protection, and that is the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite now denounce so roundly. They vie with each other in the extravagance of their denunciation of it, and urge that it has accentuated the unemployment situation, has been the means of rendering ineffective the Imperial conference, has threatened our relations with the mother country, has threatened to disrupt the empire, and is bringing Canada to blue ruin and destruction. Yet the official opposition was prepared to commit larceny in order to obtain that policy. Another charge made against the Prime Minister was that, thus bereft of his raiment through the theft committed by the Liberal party, he shamelessly stole the slogan of that party, "Canada first." We are told that the Conservative party had no right to that slogan, that it never belonged to them. It would have been a pity if such a good slogan had been left unused; the Liberal party could not use it, because it did not fit their policy.

These, Mr. Speaker, are things of the past. For a great many years there has been much speculation throughout Canada as to the effect of protection upon Canadian trade and the prosperity of the country. That question has been argued pro and con for some generations. At last it has been placed beyond the realm of speculation; to-day, for the first time in history, it is an accomplished fact. We have now a prime minister and a cabinet who are going to give this policy a trial. It is not now a question of arguing, speculating and prophesying what this policy will do; they are going to see what it will do. By its fruits ye shall know it. We have in power now a party which is prepared to stand or fall on the results of that policy.

I do want to point out, however, that the advocates of protection are subjected to a much more severe test than are the advocates of low tariff. You will remember that during the regime of the Liberal party, whenever they lowered the tariff and the price went up all they had to say was, "Well, we have done all we could; we wash our hands of the matter. If the price went up we cannot help it; we put down the tariff." If they put up the tariff on some commodity which we import and the price of that commodity went up they said, "We must have revenue. This is a tariff for revenue only. Pay up and do not split the low tariff vote." On the other hand, when the advocates of protection put up the tariff and internal competition forces the price down, then we are told, as we were told yesterday, that we have pegged the price at a high level, and if it did come down it did not come down as far as it would have come if the tariff had not been there. By that reasoning they can always produce an argument that no one can answer, because no one knows where the price would have gone if the tariff had not been there. That is the burden which is placed upon the advocates of a protective tariff.

The hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Stewart) painted a very gloomy picture, not only of the present but of the future as well. He told us that there was not a vestige of hope, that this country has heading for blue ruin as long as the present administration continued to support its present policies. I am inclined to think that perhaps the hon. member does not intend to stand for reelection at the end of this parliament. However, he has a colleague who I believe does intend to stand for reelection. I refer to the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret), who did not want to agree to the propositions suggested by the hon. member for West Edmonton. He did not want to go on record as having said that the country would be ruined unless the policy of this government was changed, so we find that he is willing to take in advance from this government an-credit which might come to it, no matter what the cost. At page 107 of Hansard he said:

> I suppose after two or three years have passed, in the ordinary trend of events and the normal evolution of business conditions throughout the world this country, notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friends are in power, will again reach the point it had attained two or three years ago, and then my hon. friends will say: We have done it; give us credit for it; we have cured the evil, not at once, but it cured itself without our aid. Give us credit for it. We have at last redeemed our election promises.

So you see that already the hon. gentleman realizes that the policies which have been inaugurated by this government will bring Canada within two or three years back to what they themselves claim was a condition of prosperity. But when that happens, they are going to attempt to deprive this government of any credit for what it may have done.

In the very able speech delivered yesterday by the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), he criticized the attitude of the Prime Minister while at the Imperial conference, and enlarged upon the statement that the empire is held together by sentiment rather than by dollars and cents. The hon. member stated that our trade with the empire is governed by sentiment, but I wonder if it ever occurred to him to consider whether, when the people from the mother country went to the Argentine, they did so because they had a greater sentiment for the people of that country than they had for Canada, or whether they did so because of dollars and cents. When the late administration gave away the dairy market of this country to Australia and New Zealand was it done as a matter of sentiment, or did the people of Australia ship their goods here for dollars and cents while we were selling our manufactured products to them for the same consideration? After all, you cannot make an English miller weep very much by telling him sentimental tales, but if you go over there and talk dollars and cents probably you will be able to make a bargain with him.

We were also told that the statement made by the Prime Minister at the Regina meeting was the most unwelcome statement that had ever been presented to the western people. We were told that the stage had been all set for a great ado and that the thing fell very flat. I will admit that the stage was set, but it was not set by the government or the supporters of the government. The stage was set by the Liberal press of Saskatchewan in an attempt to develop an expectation that no one but a wand-waver could satisfy. For days and weeks the people of Saskatchewan and western Canada were worked up to a pitch of high expectation, but what happened when the Prime Minister did come? I hold in my hand an article dealing with that meeting, appearing in a paper which I do not think can be said to be a supporter of the Prime Minister. The newspaper is the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which is on very friendly terms with the Regina Leader. The writer sets out the various propositions brought forward by the Prime Minister at that meeting, and this is the comment which is made:

> This is an impressive array of proposals in which few citizens of the west will wish to pick holes. This paper finds itself in substantial agreement with the program as stated and is ready to give credit to Mr. Bennett for having faced the emergency boldly, sifted the numerous proposals put before him and stated his conclusions without hedging. Much will depend on the manner in which his policy is translated into action but, as it stands on paper, the policy is sound and calculated to give the farmers at least temporary relief.

Not a bad recommendation from a paper so bitterly opposed to the present administration.

I referred a little while ago to the addresses given by the hon. member for Red Deer and the hon. member for Mackenzie. We expected—at least I expected when I came into the house—to hear constructive criticism from that corner and from the sources whence those speeches came. I was not disappointed. These men came forward temperately, mildly, constructively, kindly, with suggestions to the government at to what might be done for the relief of conditions in Canada. I think perhaps the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Gardiner) is sufficiently human not to be averse to being the one who should lead the country out of the difficulty in which it now is. But I will give him credit for this: I cannot refer to his love of party, because he has none; but I think his love of country is much stronger than his aversion to political parties, and I believe he is prepared, though not one of the government, in a position to lead the country out of its difficulties, to give all the assistance he can to the administration in finding a solution for the problems of the country. I believe that also characterises his followers in the main, and I was very much impressed with the addresses they gave.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer) was, I think, perhaps carried away by the sound of a certain phrase he used. I fancy it was sound rather than sense that appealed to him when he said that the reference to agriculture in the speech from the throne was nothing more than a hollow mockery. I do not believe he really thought that. The hon. member for Red Deer was much more cautious and, in my opinion, much better advised when he said that the speech from the throne might mean everything or might mean nothing so far as agriculture was concerned. That, I believe, is true of any speech from the throne; for after all, all that it is expected to do is to foreshadow the legislation, and the government may carry out seriously and earnestly the things that are foreshadowed or it may try to evade them altogether. In that sense any speech from the throne might mean everything or nothing.

I was quite interested in what the hon. member for Red Deer said about the attitude towards the farmer group in this house some years ago. He attributed the changed attitude largely, I think, to the change in the attitude towards agriculture. A good deal of it is due to that; a good deal is due to the fact that people are realizing, at other times than during elections, that agriculture is the basic industry of this country. I know that for as long as I can remember it was considered the basic industry of this country at least once in four years, while for the rest of the time it was not. Perhaps the hon. member for Red Deer is correct when he says that people have begun to realize between elections that agriculture is in fact the basic industry of the country. I have made on other occasions a statement which I am prepared to repeat here, namely, that the people who carry on the basic industry of this country should have a standard of living at least as high as that of any other class in Canada. It is a very nice thing to go around to the farmer once in four years and tell him he is the salt of the earth, that he is the horny-handed son of toil, and is carrying on the basic industry of the country. But if that means anything it means that he has the right to have a standard of living which will serve as the basis for the rest of the community.

I believe, however, the changed attitude towards hon. gentlemen who sit to the left of the official opposition is due to another factor, and I know my hon. friends will take this kindly. I think their own attitude to government, that is, the functions of government, and the difficulties of government as well as its possibilities, has changed considerably in the last ten years. I think they will admit this. A good many of the ideals they hold have changed—perhaps not the ideals, but the hope of the attainment of those ideals. They know the limitations that are placed upon governments and how far we are apt to fall below our ideals, let us strive how we may. That, perhaps, has partly to do with the changed attitude towards hon. members in that corner. But I believe there is something else. No one could listen to those two addresses to which I have referred without being convinced that these hon. gentlemen had developed in that ten years into parliamentarians of such ability that any parliament, I care not whether in Canada or in the old land, must pay attention to their representations.

There are a good many other things I had thought of dealing with. The hon. member for Red Deer remarked that sometimes it roused his ire when people spoke about the kicking farmer. I was raised on a farm in western Canada myself. The hon. member spoke of having gone there forty years ago. I did so before that. I know what pioneering in western Canada is and I know the character of the men who conquered the prairies. I do not find fault with what the hon. member says because I have the same feeling when I hear people, who know nothing about the hardships that must be endured, and the courage and fortitude necessary to accomplish what has been done in the west, saying to-day that these farmers are always kicking. If you analyze conditions you will find after all that when there is inflation of prices the product of the farmer is the last to go up—nobody's fault, it is true—whereas when prices come down the farmer's prices are the first to fall. When kicking starts naturally the farmers are the first to start kicking, because they are the first ones to be hit. That is all the difference.

I cannot add in this debate anything to what hon. members have said about the question of interest and so forth. I think it was the hon. member for Battle River who spoke about certain practices of the past. The banks would tell a man that if he would come and pay his account, later on, after the first of the year, they would extend him credit; and that was a very trying and unfair attitude to the farmer. I am sorry to say I believe the hon. member is correct in that. Too many cases of that kind have come under my notice for it to be a mere matter of accident or mistake on the hon. member's part. I do think, however, that the head offices of the banks are unaware of that practice; I do not believe they are parties to it. But there is a responsibility upon them. If they say to their local managers, "You must get in the money that is outstanding," and then fail to enquire into the methods by which they get it in, they must be charged with that responsibility. I hope, therefore, that they will take notice of the fact that this matter is receiving public attention, and I trust the local managers of the banks will be instructed to deal fairly, honestly and uprightly with the farmers, because that is not fair dealing.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join the speakers who have preceded me in paying a sincere compliment to the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is a privilege enjoyed by young members coming into this house for the first time to move and second the address, and I think the house will agree with me that both hon. members performed their duty with credit to themselves as well as to their constituents. However, they were placed in a very embarrassing position because they were put up to defend the record of this government from the time it took office last summer until the present day. They must have known down in the bottom of their hearts, as do other hon. gentlemen opposite that no defence could be made of the record of this government.

They were put up also to defend, if I may use that word, the speech from the throne which was placed by the government in the mouth of His Excellency the Administrator. It was a difficult task for anyone to stretch his imagination sufficiently to defend the speech from the throne. I was rather surprised that the hon. member for North Grey was chosen to second the address, not because of any lack of ability, but because he demonstrated the fact that being a farmer he was put up as a smoke-screen. An effort was made to show the farmers of this country that at least one farmer from the province of Ontario was ready to defend the government in regard to its attitude toward a great basic industry. If the hon. member for North Grey, as a farmer representing a farming constituency in the province of Ontario, can find any grain of comfort in the record of the government up to date as it pertains to the farming industry, or if he can find any grain of comfort in the speech from the throne, then he stands in a class of his own. I doubt very much whether the farmers in his constituency will endorse the defence he attempted to make of the record of the government and the speech from the throne.

I have the honour to represent what is largely a rural riding in the province of Ontario, and in passing I might say that South Perth is a farming constituency which stands second to none in the Dominion. It has a record extending over many years, not only for the fertility of its soil but for the aggressiveness of its farmers. They have stood at the head of the list, not only in mixed farming but in the hog, dairying and cattle industries. All during my business life I have been in close touch with the farmers in my constituency, not only my Liberal friends but my Conservative and Progressive friends as well, and I have never found so much criticism of any government, so much discontent, so much downright bitterness at the result, as are to-day manifested by the farmers of South Perth irrespective of politics. I think the same would apply to every rural riding in the province of Ontario.

The reasons for this are plain; in order to discover them we do not need to go further back than the elections of last summer. The then leader of the opposition, now the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) started out by making promises. He taught a lesson to those who were canvassing with him, and they started to make promises backed up by their chief. They said: This man, the Hon. R. B. Bennett, is a miracle man, he can turn day into night or night into day. He was portrayed as possessing the best business mind in the Dominion of Canada, a man who had accumulated a very vast fortune, and who deemed it to be his duty, if his party were returned and he became Prime Minister, to right immediately all the evils and all the wrongs suffered by the Canadian people. The farmers of Ontario, some in my riding and some in adjoining ridings, took these promises in good faith, but they have now awakened to the fact, as stated by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) in her admirable speech, that these promises were gold bricks. They were promises which no human being or party could keep. Our hon. friends would not listen to any talk of a world-wide depression; they went so far as to say that there was no world-wide depression but that the present economic conditions in Canada were due to the administration of the government which had held power from 1921 to 1930. The farmers listened, unfortunately for themselves, to these promises.

I should like to give the house an illustration of what took place during the elections in my riding, and I feel quite sure that the same procedure was followed in other ridings. A canvasser would come along with a Conservative candidate and say to the man who owned a farm: You have a nice farm there; don't sell it until after the elections in September, because if the Conservative party is put into power the value of your farm will go up fifty per cent. Not only that, but they were told that if Mr. Bennett, the wizard, the superman, got into power, they would be able to sell their wheat at $1.25 per bushel. They were told that the price of hogs would go up to war-time levels and that although they were getting only 32 cents per pound for their butter, when Mr. Bennett got into power the price would be 60 cents per pound.

Mr. DUFF: They were told in Nova Scotia it would go to 70 cents.

Mr. SANDERSON: So far, the record of this government is a record of broken promises. They kept only one, that they would call an emergency session to relieve unemployment. Nothing was said in the rural parts of Ontario as to the possibility of their increasing the tariff at the special session. They kept that quiet, but the farmers have awakened to the fact that the increase in the tariff has not been for their benefit. It will not do them any good at all, and had the majority of the farmers of Ontario known that at the emergency session, in addition to the relief that was attempted for unemployment, there would be increases in the tariff on about 150 or 200 items, running all the way from 30 per cent to 150, 200 and even 300 per cent, I doubt if they would have voted for a Conservative candidate. So I say that the record of the government to date is one of broken promises. As usual—and this has been mentioned by several speakers on this side of the house, but I think it will bear repetition—they have trotted out their old panacea of tariff. That is the only medicine they can prescribe when there is a depression or when business is bad. It is the old, old story. It puts me in mind of the old days when the medicine fakir used to sell his medicine on the public market. He had a "cure-all" for everything from chilblains to tuberculosis. It was all in the one bottle, which he sold for a dollar, and around the bottle he wrapped a printed guarantee. He said: "We will guarantee this to cure all ills; it is a medicine that will cure everything." Finally, when he had got the dollar from the customer, he would say: "If it does not cure you, you can keep the guarantee." That is about the situation the country is in as regards the present government's high tariff policy as a cure-all for the problems that at present confront us.

Let me repeat that the tariff changes in September were not for the benefit of the farmer, the labouring man, the mechanic or the ordinary wage earner. The only people who have benefited are the manufacturers, behind whom the government is prepared to stand at all times to the detriment of the masses of the people. It is true that at the special session of parliament $20,000,000 was voted for the relief of unemployment, but our Conservative friends said during the campaign that they were going to cure unemployment, to end unemployment. In fact some of the speakers said that in three days after the Conservatives came into power they would end unemployment. I know they say they were misquoted, but hundreds of people who perhaps did not read that in the newspaper, but heard it over the radio are prepared to assert that the statement was made that in three days after the Conservatives came into power they would end unemployment. What do we find? They have not ended unemployment. I want to be fair to the government; they may have relieved to a certain extent, temporarily at least, unemployment in some parts of the country. But as members in opposition pointed out in September, the government were putting into the hands of provincial governments a political weapon; they were practically giving the provincial government a blank cheque, and during the campaign the question of relief was made primarily a federal matter. Promises were made by Conservative speakers, led by the present Prime Minister, that the federal parliament would deal with the relief of unemployment. I am not going into the question whether the relief of unemployment should be a federal or a provincial matter, but I say that in the campaign they made it a federal issue. We on this side of the house pointed out during the special session that there was no check, no audit on the $20,000,000 appropriated for unemployment relief; that the federal share was checked out of the public treasury, a like amount from the provincial treasury, and a similar amount from the municipalities; that the federal authority had no control over the money after it left the federal treasury. That has been proven. As I said a moment ago, they placed in the hands of the provincial governments something in the way of a political weapon that could be and was in fact used. So far as the people of Ontario are concerned, during the eight or nine provincial by-elections that have been held since last September, the fact that the provincial government controlled that money was used, if not directly, then indirectly, to buy votes. If time permitted I could quote chapter and verse for my statement, and it may be that before the close of the session I shall have an opportunity of doing so. But, as I have said, the record of the government is one of broken promises, promises that could not be kept, promises that will never be kept. The only promise they did keep was that a special session of parliament would be summoned.

As regards the question of the Imperial conference, if the Prime Miinster and the government did not want the Imperial conference to succeed as far as the Dominion of Canada was concerned, certainly when they increased the tariff on British importations they did the one thing that made success impossible. They were defeated in their cause before they ever went to London. I could never understand, and I doubt if the majority of the Canadian people understand, the attitude of the present government in increasing the tariff against the mother country. A few years ago the members of the Conservative party used to wrap the union jack around themselves and parade their loyalty on all occasions. They used to insinuate from time to time that they were really the loyal political party in this country. But in September last they adopted an attitude that, to my mind, is the worst thing they could have done in regard to preserving friendly relations between Canada and the mother country. The Prime Minister, some of his ministers and a large delegation went over to London, but nothing was achieved. There is no use in the Prime Minister or any of his ministers or supporters saying that the right hon. gentleman's visit to London was a success. It was an absolute failure and the majority of the Canadian people know it was a failure and lay the blame directly on the heads of the Prime Minister and his government.

Several speakers have spoken of the manner of approach of the Prime Minister at the conference. In his speech in this house the other day the Prime Minister rather took pride in the fact that he had spoken for only seventeen minutes at the conference. I will quote his own words, at page 65 of Hansard of this session:

> I can only say that the presentation of the case from the Canadian standpoint before the second plenary conference took exactly seventeen minutes by the clock, and there was at least one Canadian there who, although not a member of the delegation, listened and thought it was as clear and as concise a presentation as it was possible to make.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada will be glad to know that there was at least one Canadian who endorsed the Prime Minister's statement on that occasion. I would point out to the Prime Minister, however, that a gentleman with his vocabulary and with his temperamental nature can sometimes do more harm in a seventeen minutes' speech than it will take seventeen years to repair; and I imagine the people of Canada, when they read that the Prime Minister presented his case in seventeen minutes, will say: Thank God he did not speak an hour.

The method of approach of the Prime Minister at the conference was one that could not possibly succeed. It is impossible to sit down at a business conference, and that was a business conference, one of the most important meetings which the Imperial conference has ever held, and work a bluff. You may attempt it, but usually your bluff is called. The Prime Minister's bluff was called, to the detriment of this country. The Prime Minister played politics when he was at the conference in England; at least, his actions had all the earmarks of playing politics. By gestures and by speeches he endeavoured to convey to the people of England that if they would only change their government and put in a Conservative administration, it might be better for themselves and for the Dominion of Canada. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister had no mandate from the people of this country to talk politics in England at all, and by playing politics, instead of helping his cause, he injured it. So on the whole, Mr. Speaker, the conference was a failure.

I should like to quote to the house what the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) gave as his opinion of the conference when he landed in Canada. He was interviewed by a reporter for the Toronto Daily Star on board ship before he landed. The interview is dated November 21, 1930, and is headed, Conference a Flop. It reads:

> The Imperial conference was a "flop" to the extent that the economic branch which he characterized as "perhaps the most important branch" failed to come to a definite conclusion, Hon. Hugh Guthrie, Minister of Justice, and the first of Canada's delegation to return to her shores, confessed to The Star in the course of an interview before landing.

I will read to you the reasons which the Minister of Justice is reported to have given in this interview for the failure of the conference:

> The failure was due to lack of sufficient definite information about the trade of Great Britain and the dominions, coupled with two complications, the necessity of the Imperial parliament sitting, and the arrival of the Indian princes for the round-table conference now on.

Those are the excuses which the Minister of Justice gave for the conference being a flop. The interview continues:

The Star called Mr. Guthrie's attention to a report in the Manchester Guardian of Nov. 5, of a speech which he made at a luncheon tendered in London by the National Citizens' Union, in which he is quoted as saying: "I don't believe that the conference is going to achieve anything in the nature of concrete proposals at the present time." Asked whether this was a fair report, the Minister of Justice said that it was. "The economic branch came to no conclusion for the reasons I have already stated," he said.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, and I think it will appear to members of this house and the country at large, that these excuses which the Minister of Justice gave for the conference being a flop were really no excuses at all. Surely the Canadian delegation had advisers enough and secretaries and assistant secretaries enough to get all the information they wanted over there. I took the trouble to obtain some information as to the numerical strength of the staff they took over, and I find in the report of the Imperial conference that in addition to the Prime Minister and members of his government there were a staff comprising twenty-two persons. Surely they could get enough information together for the delegation to get down to facts. So I say that is no excuse at all; it is not even the semblance of an excuse, and the Minister of Justice is right in saying that the conference was a flop. The Minister of Justice is also reported to have said in this interview that there would soon be a British election and he hoped when it came off that Mr. Snowden and Mr. Thomas would be snowed under and the Conservatives take power.

This word "flop" is not an unusual word, but I looked up the dictionary to get the exact definition. I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not in his seat at the moment, because "flop" is a word which I think he has thought over very often, and probably dreamed about, and so it naturally came to his mind in speaking of the failure of the Imperial conference, in this interview which he gave on board ship. I find three definitions of "flop" in Webster's dictionary: first, "to throw oneself heavily or clumsily;" second, "to strike about with something broad and flat, as a fish with its tail, or a bird with its wings; to rise and fall." The Minister of Justice might have had in his mind the flop that he got with something broad and flat at the Conservative convention of 1927. The third meaning given is: "to change suddenly," and it gives as an example of the use of the word in that sense, the phrase, "He flopped to the other party." Those are the dictionary definitions, not mine. So I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Justice was quite justified in using the word "flop."

I should also like to read to the house what the genial Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) said about his leader when he came back from England, but my time is limited.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SANDERSON: When the house rose at six o'clock I had just finished a few remarks with regard to statements made concerning the Imperial conference by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Guthrie) on his return to Canada. I mentioned that when the house resumed at eight o'clock I might make some further remarks about what the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Manion) had said concerning the actions of his chief at the conference. I would like to quote, Mr. Speaker, from the Toronto Globe of December 3, 1930. At a banquet on the evening of December 2, held in the city of Toronto, the Minister of Railways and Canals was the chief speaker, and naturally he touched on the conference. He spoke about the attitude taken at the conference by his chief the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister's great success at the Imperial conference. I quote from the report in the Toronto Globe of December 3, 1930:

The Conservative party, he said, "certainly is sitting on top of the world, such as the world is to-day."

Mr. YOUNG: A very uncomfortable seat.

Mr. SANDERSON: My answer to the Minister of Railways and Canals is that most people think the world is upside down at the moment, and if the Conservative party is sitting on top of the world—

Mr. MANION: Where must the Liberal party be sitting?

Mr. SANDERSON: The Liberal party will come back to the top of the world when it turns round the other way. Let me tell the minister that when conditions right themselves he and his colleagues in the Conservative party will find themselves at the bottom of the world, in the bottomless pit, and the Minister of Railways and Canals will be with them.

Mr. MANION: As you people are at the present time.

Mr. SANDERSON: But he was not quite satisfied with that statement. The report in the Globe continues:

So much was Hon. R. B. Bennett the outstanding man at the Imperial conference, said Dr. Manion, "that I am told there are many people in the British Isles who would like to see Mr. Bennett one of their great leaders."

Mr. SANDERSON: I venture the opinion, Mr. Speaker, that there is no such good fortune in store for Canada and Canadians. There are a great many people in the Dominion of Canada who would welcome a change if it could be brought about. They would be pleased to see the gentleman who now occupies the position of Prime Minister of this country go to England as one of the leaders of that country. The report in the Globe continues:

In view of numerous press queries as to how federal ministers felt about Premier Bennett's London Snowden speech, "when Mr. Bennett speaks,' he said, "he speaks for the whole government of the Dominion of Canada." In other words the present Dominion government has one mind, not twenty minds, as was so often demonstrated in the Mackenzie King government.

We have it from the lips of the Minister of Railways and Canals that there is but one mind in the cabinet as it is now constituted. The contention from this side of the house and the opinion of most people of this country is that we have at the present time a one man government.

Mr. MANION: So much the bigger man.

Mr. SANDERSON: I can quite understand the genial Minister of Railways and Canals interjecting those remarks. Hon. members knows that the minister has been termed a convert to the Conservative party. His chief has said that a convert never could be trusted, that he was always liable to make a mess of things. However no doubt the Minister of Railways and Canals wishes to redeem himself in the eyes of his chief and therefore is doing everything in his power to achieve that end; nobody can blame him for that. However it is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that we have a one-man government and I have no doubt that the Minister of Railways and Canals will be the chief "yes, yes" man as long as he is in the government. The reason is that he does not wish in any way to ruffle his chief. He knows if he did so he would not remain in the government very long. The report in the Globe contains the further statement:

The Liberal press, he said, trying to make out the Imperial conference and Canada's part in it as a failure. "What, may I ask the Liberal press," said Doctor Manion, "would Mr. King have done had he represented the Dominion at the conference?" What could Mr. King have done, he added, in the face of the attitude of Mr. Snowden? What could Mr. King have brought back from the conference that Mr. Bennett failed to gain?

My answer to that statement is that if the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King had gone to the conference as Prime Minister, backed by the Dunning budget, which has been scrapped by this government, we would have to-day in Canada a different story to tell as far as trade and commerce are concerned. The attitude of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King at Imperial conferences is one of which the people of this country are proud. They are sorry that in the turn of the political wheel he did not have an opportunity to attend the conference.

Mr. MANION: They showed how anxious they were to send him there by keeping him at home.

Mr. SANDERSON: If the Minister of Railways and Canals has any questions to ask I would be pleased if he would observe the courtesies of the house and rise when asking them.

Mr. MANION: I did not ask a question.

Mr. VENIOT: Hon. members hope the Minister of Railways and Canals will make a speech at a later time in this debate.

Mr. SANDERSON: Considering the limited time at my disposal, I hope, sir, that these interruptions will not be deducted from my forty minutes. However we can always depend on the Minister of Railways and Canals to come to the rescue of the Tory party. There was a time in his political history when he was a Liberal but now he is a Tory of the Tories.

Mr. MANION: Since I have become older I have gained in knowledge.

Mr. SANDERSON: The hon. gentleman has not gained in knowledge from experience, and sometimes I think he is very, very sorry he burned his bridges behind him.

I have given the opinion of another minister of the crown concerning the alleged success of the Prime Minister at the Imperial conference. I have not time to quote further from the speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals. May I just say, however, that he was in a very jovial mood on the night he made that speech, and during the course of his remarks he said, as he had said so often during the campaign, that the conditions in Canada to-day and the depression in our trade and commerce could all be laid at the door of the Mackenzie King government.

Other opinions, however, have been expressed in regard to Canada's part in the Imperial conference, and in that connection I want to quote to the house a letter which appeared in the Toronto Star of December 6, 1930. This article is credited to a gentleman named E. H. Durnin. I do not know him; I am uninformed as to his political views, but apparently he has kept in touch with the proceedings of the Imperial conference and the politics of the day in the Dominion of Canada. In a letter addressed to the editor of the Toronto Star Mr. Durnin has this to say:

> Sir, what a hum about this humbug! What a blazing blast from the bellows! Mr. Bennett blasted his way into the party leadership. He blasted his way to the premiership. He blasted his way through the special session of parliament. He did his darndest to blast his way through the Imperial conference. Now he has blasted this blasted Thomas. He is trying to blast Ramsay MacDonald, Thomas, et al from office. What a blast this blasting blaster has blasted!
> Well might this brilliant, able, vain and pompous man cry: "My kingdom for a sense of humour!" The late Elbert Hubbard had a maxim, "Don't take yourself too damned seriously."
> Mr. Thomas' neglect to come back at Mr. Bennett leaves this august gentleman in a prolonged poise of pained and painful perpendicularity, a position of vindicated and isolated splendour. The devil of it is to get down again from a place like that.

That is the opinion of at least one Canadian voter, apparently a gentleman who is versed in the politics of the country.

Now I should like to point to some of the remarks made by the Prime Minister himself since he came back from the conference. The house will remember, as the country remembers well, that during the election of last summer the leader of the Conservative party, and all the members of that party, laid the blame for the depression solely at the door of the King administration. They would not listen to anything about world depression, although we were in the midst of a world depression. I want to say, however, that there was not a country in the world which came through the depression in better shape than Canada, and this was largely due to the wise, honest and able administration of the King government over a period of nine years.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has been speaking for forty minutes.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of repeating some of the things that have been said during this debate from this corner of the house and from across the way as well, I intend to speak to-night on conditions in western Canada, having special reference to that part of western Canada with which I am most familiar, northern Alberta and the Peace river country.

Conditions are serious, and very serious, for a very large percentage of the farmers in the Peace river and northern Alberta districts, though I believe they are no worse than they are in most sections of the three prairie provinces. It has been said by a great many that the adverse conditions have been brought about by a wrong policy as far as the western people are concerned, but I think there is a very special reason why western Canada has produced wheat in preference to everything else. The reason is that the country is suited for it, and year in and year out it pays better than any other kind of farming. The farmers of western Canada, like those of eastern Canada, can be depended upon to change to any other kind of farming when it can be demonstrated that the other kind of farming will pay them better, and the best interests of western Canada and of Canada as a whole depend on the western farmers carrying on the business which pays them best.

I should like to quote a few figures for the year 1927, which is the last year for which complete statistics regarding total production are given in the Canada Year Book of 1930. The total net production of the three prairie provinces was $978,608,283. This includes the production in agriculture, forestry, fisheries, trapping, mining, electric power, construction, custom and repair, and manufactures. Out of that total, agriculture contributed $761,206,000, or about 70 per cent of the total. The gross value of field crops was $703,028,300, and of this amount wheat made up about $400,000,000, or roughly 60 per cent. It is easy to see the importance of the wheat crop as fas as western Canada is concerned, but it should not be forgotten that it is also very important as far as eastern Canada is concerned. In this connection I should like to quote the words of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) when he was sitting on this side of the house some years ago. I refer to the session of 1926, and I am reading from page 1926 of the second volume of Hansard for that year:

> When you remember how difficult this country's economic condition is, when you remember that we have two and a half billion dollars of a debt, and are obliged to raise close on to four hundred million dollars a year, the real problem is where and how we can most readily create new wealth. New wealth is more readily created in the west than in any other part of the dominion; I do not think there can be any doubt about that. And it is not from any sectional point of view that I make that observation. Every Canadian must be proud of the fact that a population of less than two million produced, in the year 1925, wealth to the value of $900,000,000. There is no doubt that the purchasing power of eastern Canada has been increased many fold as the result of that money having been made available in Canada at this time.

The price of wheat is the basic condition governing the economic life of the farmer. Of course, wheat is chiefly an export product. The other products of mixed farming, such as beef, other meats, dairy products and so on, are chiefly sold in the home market, but in a general way the prices of these other products follow the price of wheat. If wheat goes up they go up, and if wheat goes down they go down. Cheap wheat means cheap dairy products, though of course the fluctuations may be more violent and more sudden in one commodity than in another. In a general way, however, they follow each other. Wheat is the chief source of revenue of the western farmer and will continue to be such until something can be produced more cheaply which will bring in as much or more revenue.

The criticism that is levelled at western farmers to-day is in a great many cases of the cheapest and poorest kind. It is always easy to come along to someone who happens to be in difficulty, regardless of whether it happens to be a manufacturer, a farmer or somebody else, and say, "If you had done something different some time ago this would not have happened." I am convinced to-day that no other policy which the western farmers could have followed would have left them in any better condition than they are at present.

A good deal of the criticism advanced against the western farmer to-day is based on a one year view, but farming is a permanent occupation; it is a lifetime work. The basic success or failure of any policy with regard to farming in any part of Canada, or the conduct of any farmer, must be judged not on any one year, however good or bad that year may have been, but on a series of years, from slump to slump or around the business cycle. I have tried mixed farming, and I would be a lot better off to-day if I had refused to have anything to do with it and had grown only wheat. I merely wish to say that we cannot find any way out of our responsibility, and the government cannot find any way out of its responsibility, by arguing that the farmers were following a wrong policy through laziness or ignorance, and that they would have been well off if they had followed some other line.

[Mr. D. M. Kennedy.]

What would be the effect on Ontario and Quebec if the west swung rapidly into mixed farming? Beef and other meats, as well as a lot of our dairy products, are sold in the home market, and I think the chief worry of our dairymen now is that apparently they will have a large export surplus in a few years, and our protection against New Zealand or any other part of the world will not make any difference with regard to the price of butter, whatever may have been its value in the meantime. I have yet to learn that conditions in the mixed farming areas of the west, or of the east for that matter, are very much better than the conditions which prevail generally in the wheat farming areas. Of course the business of trying to find fault and to place the blame on someone else is as old as human nature itself. The Book of Job is the oldest book in the Bible, they tell us, and I suppose the Bible is the oldest book we have. A few of Job's friends came to comfort him when he was very ill. They sat down for about seven days studying his illness and his troubles, and no doubt thinking of the sins he must have committed to have come into such desperate circumstances. Some of the farmers' critics and advisers remind me of Eliphaz the Temanite when he said to Job:

> Think now, what guiltless man has ever perished?
> When have the just ever been swept away?
> Men as I see it, reap the evil that they plough;
> The trouble that they sow.

And a good many other people who have no better solution for the economic ills of Canada try to take that position with regard to the farmers of the west. I am not saying anything about the east; I am speaking for the part of the country I know. It may be the same in the east for all I know.

We have had our share of mixed farming experiments in Alberta. We had the Duncan Marshall cow bill and the experiment was not a great success. In the year 1919 or 1920 the Alberta government and the banks in western Canada made strenuous efforts to get the wheat farmers of northern Alberta to go into the cattle business, and a great many men who were encouraged to secure loans and bought cattle in 1919 and 1920 were forced to sell their cattle a few years later at a price not much more than 25 per cent of their original cost. Let me emphasize, therefore, that the mixed farming game is not all sunshine, any more than the wheat business. The Fordney-McCumber tariff, a few dry seasons, and a shortage of feed put the cattle business in 1922 just in about the same difficult position as the wheat business is in to-day.

Fixing the blame may be very interesting, but we ought for a little while to try to ascertain what methods might be applied to ease the situation. Many farmers who have been following the wheat business in the west are not in difficult straits to-day. Many of them are well off and can stand one or two seasons such as we had in 1930. There are not very many such farmers—not a very high percentage, but still some. Another percentage, not very high, would be fairly well off had they not indulged in speculation; the two-dollar-wheat idea hurt many western farmers. On the other hand, I do not know of a single farmer who made any profit in farming operations in the west in 1930. There may be some, but I do not know of any.

Western Canada has been advertised by governments and government departments and officials as a place where anyone who was willing to work could settle and within a reasonable time build up a farm home where he and his family would be comfortable. A great many people took us at our word and came, and there is a tremendously large percentage of farmers in the west who have been struggling along for the last ten, fifteen or twenty years, some of them saving a little each year, building up an increased equity in their farms and farm property year by year. But they have never reached the stage where they have been completely out of debt, and now they are faced with a situation which threatens ruin. Because of the shrinkage in their credit, due to falling prices, with the consequent wiping out of practically the whole equity in their farms, they find that notwithstanding the thrift of years they are likely to be wiped out unless something is done for them. Now I submit that this is one class of settler which no government or party, no parliament, can afford to see quit. There are, of course, farmers who will not make good no matter what is done for them, and with these I suppose we need not greatly concern ourselves. But as regards those farmers of a reasonably thrifty type, who have been using their credit to the limit in the hope of building up for themselves real homes—farmers who have been compelled by financial circumstances and the needs of their business to use their credit—for every such farmer whom we allow to go out of business, or have his farm property, the land already under cultivation, go down for lack of proper attention in 1931, this government and parliament will have failed in their duty and will deserve the condemnation of the Canadian people. Unless provision is made to take care of this type of farmer in 1931, western agriculture will suffer very seriously. These farmers have been heavily hit by the slump in prices. The facts, of course, could not be otherwise when one considers that this year's crop is selling so enormously below cost of production.

A number of people, and some members of this house, have asked, what is the cost of producing a bushel of wheat? Of course, the cost varies according to the season. It is affected by weather and various other influences. However, some figures are available, figures which are fairly authoritative, taking into consideration the facts that have been studied and the years that have come under review. Anyone who wishes to consult the evidence given before the committee on agricultural conditions a few years ago will find some illuminating facts reported. Back in 1924, Professor H. C. Grant, of the Manitoba Agricultural college, gave evidence before the special committee on agricultural conditions. He made a special study of cost of production in Manitoba in 1923. He found the cost in Portage district to be $1.41 per bushel; in Deloraine $1.08 per bushel; and in Waskada 92 cents per bushel. These were costs on summer-fallow land.

Some figures were given recently in the Farm and Ranch Review of Calgary, by Mr. C. W. Peterson, in an editorial entitled "The Agricultural Crisis and its Antidote." He gives cost of production figures for 1912, 1913, 1919 and 1920, and an estimate for later years. From a section headed Some Useful Figures, I quote:

> I have analyzed the very carefully kept accounts of a large western farm operated by myself and a few others for many years and quote below figures for a pre-war and a post-war period of two years each. They throw some useful light on the subject of comparative agricultural operating costs. These figures illustrate farming as an industrial proposition. They embrace depreciation, overhead, management, and all the items of a business statement. The average, smaller farmer would ignore many of these items and show a smaller operating cost per acre.

	Pre-war		Post-war
	1912	1913	1919	1920
Bushels per acre	17.57	31.50	12.91	20.50
Average price per bushel received	0.62	0.71	1.81	2.03
Total operating cost	$12,587 00	$17,506 73	$43,686 53	$54,340 43
Net profit for year	2,944 27	13,154 68	5,881 36	22,835 79
Cost per acre	9 16	14 44	21 84	30 90
Cost per bushel	0 52	0 47	1 68	1 50

Farm Operating Costs

This little statement contains a lot of useful information. It shows, for instance, that wheat below the dollar mark holds no terror whatever for the farmer operating on a comparable cost basis. It also clearly shows that pre-war prices and post-war operating costs will inevitably lead to swift destruction. It should be mentioned, however, that the 1919-20 operating basis cannot fairly be used in estimating present costs. Our accounts indicate a reduction of approximately 20 per cent by 1925 and a further 10 per cent by 1929. This would give us a cost of somewhere around a dollar a bushel on a twenty-bushel-an-acre crop. The small farmer would "cut corners" on this, by eliminating the larger overhead of the big farm, and, in a rough and ready way, perhaps cut it to from 50 to 70 cents actual cost.

The farm price of wheat at this writing ranges around 45 cents per bushel.

The cutting of corners and the eliminating of overhead by the small farmer would mean the conscripting of the labour of his family, for labour on the land.

The price received at Calgary, Edmonton and other points in the west for this wheat costing 50 cents to one dollar per bushel was around 45 cents. It must be remembered that the average wheat this year in western Canada will not be No. 1 northern but something around No. 3 tough, which brings about 15 cents per bushel less. Since that time wheat at Edmonton and Calgary has dropped to about 35 cents per bushel, with No. 3 tough bringing about 25 cents. That gives a true picture of the farming industry in western Canada, and I ask this house: what would have happened if the same conditions prevailed in connection with any other line of business? What would this government do if the railways were in similar condition? What would it do if the manufacturers were faced with such a crisis? I submit that whatever it would do for those industries ought to be done for the great basic industry of agriculture. In the propaganda sent out by our Conservative friends during the last elections we find the following:

We pledge ourselves to provide such a compensating adjustment as will assure the benefit of the above policies to every part of Canada.

I have in my hand a statement with reference to a car of wheat shipped from Fairview. The freight rate to Vancouver is 26½ cents per 100 pounds. This was a pool shipment and the car contained around 1,700 bushels of wheat. The initial payment by the pool was 32 cents for grade No. 4 tough. It was No. 2 northern at the time of cutting, but bad weather degraded it. The railway people took $262.73 for freight. The farmer received $209.70, a smaller amount than that received by the railway people. The other charges amounted to $66.50. The cost of threshing was $170 and the hauling charges amounted to $85, so that the wheat returned to the farmer a smaller amount than what it had cost him to thresh and haul. Taking it altogether, that gives a very true picture of what is happening to-day in western Canada.

The statement of Mr. Peterson, of the Farm and Ranch Review, is based on an average crop of 20 bushels per acre, but the average western crop is nearer to 17 bushels and instead of being No. 1 northern it comes closer to No. 3, which brings five cents per bushel less. The average crop for the last ten years was 17·2 bushels and the average price $1.04.

There is not much use in blaming the farmer for these conditions, nor is there much use in blaming either the present government or the government which went out of office a short time ago; it is a world condition. The farmers could not be expected to have foreseen this situation and to have adjusted their business accordingly. Who did see it? Very few, or if any did they were very quiet about it or did not have the courage to speak. I remember reading about two years ago an article by Sir George Paish, in which he predicted that owing to the increase in tariffs all over the world accompanied by the existing credit situation an economic crisis would occur inside of two years. The western farmer does not read the statements of Sir George Paish or those of other British economists; they work too long hours. What were our bankers saying in 1928 and 1929 as to the future of Canada? That was the time when something should have been done to readjust business to meet the coming crash, and if anyone should have had knowledge, it was the bankers. At the annual general meeting of the Bank of Montreal, held in Montreal on December 3, 1928, the president, Sir Charles Gordon said:

Our government needs to offer no apology in inviting agricultural immigrants to come to this country, as no other country in the world can hold out greater opportunities than our western provinces.

On December 2, 1929, the same gentleman said:

For the first time in five years, grain crops were a partial failure in the prairie provinces. The yield of wheat—270,000,000 bushels, being one-half of that of 1928, and that of other cereals correspondingly smaller.

Discouragement has not, however, dominated farmers of the northwest.

He stated further:

Fundamental conditions are sound, and there is no reason for apprehension as to the ultimate future of Canada.

At the annual meeting of the Bank of Montreal, held December 3, 1928, Sir Frederick Williams-Taylor said:

Canada as a whole has enjoyed more prosperity than ever before. At the commencement of 1928, a succession of good harvests had already placed the country on a prosperous footing and the position has been further improved this year by good average yields of staple crops in all the older provinces, while the prairie provinces have far surpassed their previous records.

In western Canada the year has been remarkable, not only for the record grain crops in the prairie provinces, but also for a reduction in harvesting costs per bushel, due chiefly to good weather and partly to the growing effectiveness of agricultural machinery.

These developments show the Canadian farmer to-day as a man of affairs, who is rapidly bringing his methods up to the standard of highly developed urban industries.

Sir Herbert Holt, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, speaking at Montreal on January 10, 1929, said:

The most pressing internal problem of the country is the need for more population. If the present good times are to continue, there is need for more farmers on the soil and more men in the mines and factories in order that we shall consume a larger proportion of our products.

Without a substantial increase in immigration we cannot hope to maintain that balance in expansion which is essential to sound prosperity. I believe, however, that at the moment it is no exaggeration to summarize the general situation by saying that there is no other part of the world more prosperous than Canada.

Mr. C. E. Neill, the general manager, speaking at the same meeting, said:

To our farmers, the large crops of the past four years, and particularly the record crop of 1928, have brought substantial prosperity.

Speaking to the Royal bank meeting on January 9, 1930, Sir Herbert Holt said:

Neither the prospects in foreign trade nor the situation in Canadian industry, trade and agriculture warrant pessimism concerning the outlook for the coming year. It is true that the small crop, the stagnation in the lumber industry, the unsatisfactory price of newsprint, and the decline in security prices have somewhat dampened enthusiasm, but I look forward to 1930 as being a year of normal activity in business unless unforeseen developments in the world wheat situation react in a manner to cause further substantial injury to Canadian interests.

Many farmers in the west incurred substantial losses as a result of destruction wrought by the drought.

In the face of two unfavourable years the volume of western business has been maintained at a surprising satisfactory level.

I have other extracts along this line which I would like to quote, but time will not permit. Let me, however, read the following statement by Sir John Aird in his address to the Canadian Bank of Commerce at its annual meeting held on November 30, 1928:

This review of the progress of Canada brings to our minds again the importance of the question of immigration, and both the Dominion and provincial governments seem to have given the subject renewed attention during the past year. If but a tithe of the expansion which looms ahead of this country takes place, we shall be able to find employment for and offer a career to many thousands of new settlers of all kinds, and it will be a pity if too narrow a view be allowed to prevail.

The addresses of all the bank presidents and general managers during 1928 and 1929 were along the same line. They predicted abundant prosperity. They did admit some set-backs, but claimed that these would not be such as would interfere with the normal progress and development of the Dominion.

I submit that the suggestion that the farmers should have seen this disaster coming is ridiculous. Then take the matter of the initial payments of the pool, decided at a meeting at which the Dominion and provincial governments as well as the banks of Canada were represented. The initial payment was set at 60 cents per bushel, and I am told that at that meeting not a single individual suggested that there was any chance of wheat going down to such a price that they would have to reduce that initial payment. Where were our economic experts? They did not know anything about it, or if they did, they did not say anything. The only thing to do now is to ascertain what action we can take in view of all the circumstances. I do not know that much is to be gained by censuring anybody, but I wish to suggest what we might do in view of the circumstances.

I realize that the times are difficult for everybody, the farmers, the railways and the government. I am sure the budget statement will be a long way from pleasing to the government, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. I do not know whether the opposition will derive any comfort out of it or not, but in any case we are bound to have a tremendously reduced revenue as compared with that of a year ago. I am not going to deal with any of the long-term policies that have sometimes been suggested in this corner of the house. I am concerned with what ought to be done with 1931. The spring is opening up and seeding in the prairie provinces will commence within two weeks. What kind of seeding is it going to be? The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir), when he was in the west, suggested, I believe, that the right thing to do was to seed all the land that was in good condition for a crop and to summer-fallow the rest. It takes money to summer-fallow; it takes money to farm properly in western Canada, and unless credit is forthcoming to the western farmers for 1931 to enable them to take reasonable care of the land they have already under cultivation, with regard to both seeding in the spring and summer-fallowing in order to have it ready for the succeeding year, the tendency will be to seed all the land that can be seeded and take a chance. On account of the shrinkage in the farmer's equity in his land owing to the slump in farm prices, many farmers have exhausted their credits. They have not been able to reduce the credits they secured in 1930. If additional credits are not made available the crop will be scratched in, and what will happen? There is no comparison between closing down a factory and closing down a farm. When you close down a factory the overhead, such as fixed charges and so on, goes on; the machinery may accumulate a little rust, but no great damage is done to the property. But you cannot close down a farm for a year without doing damage that it will take years of effort and expense to wipe out. Farming must be carried on in a reasonable way year after year without any rest or intermission, otherwise the farmer's resources will be depleted. We cannot have a rapid recovery, we cannot hope for what the speech from the throne says is likely to come, a new era of prosperity, unless agriculture rests solidly on first-class cultivation of the land that is now under the plough throughout the whole of the Dominion. I would ask that the government study the matter, ascertain what credits are required, and get behind the banks if need be, in order that those credits may be granted.

The farmers of Alberta, through the provincial premiers, asked for a 70-cent wheat. Some time afterwards the government got behind the banks in connection with their advances to the wheat pool. I believe that was some help to orderly marketing, but in view of the prices that have since prevailed, and general world conditions, I do not think there is much chance of that costing the government much. I believe the cost will be very reasonable, very small, and the suggestion of the western farmers that they be bonused to the extent necessary to guarantee them 70 cents on a basis of No. 1 northern at the head of the lakes, was a reasonable demand. It was not a demand for pegged prices; it was a demand for a bonus of the difference between what the wheat would sell for and 70 cents a bushel, which would be much less than the cost of production, because a 70-cent cost to the farmer is much greater than what the farmer will get on the basis of 70 cents No. 1 northern at Fort William. The whole cost might be $20,000,000. Is that ruinous for the Dominion of Canada?

What would be the compensating advantages as far as agriculture is concerned? I contend that the farmer is entitled to just as much financial advantage as the manufacturers secure out of protection. With a government whose policy is protection, the only thing I can ask in regard to agriculture is this: What compensating advantage is the government going to give to agriculture? I think Mr. Fielding must be taken as an authority on the question of what protection is worth to the manufacturer. He put a statement on Hansard away back in 1921 and so far as I know it has never been challenged. As reported at page 3151 of Hansard of May 10, 1921, Mr. Fielding said:

> If you turn to the Liberal policy—and I wish only to briefly refer to it—of 1897 you will find that in order to value the measure of tariff reform that was then given, you need to look at it from three viewpoints. In the first place there was the advantage that came to the people from the direct reduction of duties. It can be established positively, I believe, that if you take into account simply the difference between the duties that were paid during the period of the Liberal administration and the duties that would have been paid had the Conservative tariff remained in force, the money that went directly into the pockets of the Canadian people on that account alone was from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000. But it must be remembered—and economists, I think, will agree—that the saving you make in a case like that is not to be measured only by the amount that you did not pay into the customs; you have to take into account also the check that was put upon the rise of prices at home, and that for every dollar saved to the people in that direct way probably two dollars were saved in the difference between the prices prevailing and those which would otherwise have been charged by the home manufacturers.

We collect annually more than $100,000,000 in customs revenue, and if Mr. Fielding's statement is not so far out that it should be entirely discredited, the manufacturers are getting every year out of the policy of protection far more than ever the farmers asked for. I do not believe we can follow a policy of bonusing agriculture every year, because this would result in too great an increase in the production of wheat under present conditions. But this is a different year from every other year. Mr. Legge, chairman of the United States farm board, states that we have struck the low point of 335 years, and if we cannot do anything this year by way of financially assisting western farmers even by direct bonuses, there is no reason for thinking we have a policy that is really effective. If, however, the government will not adopt a policy of that kind they ought in the interests of the whole country as well as of the farmers, to provide ample credit for the reasonable operation of farm land now under the plough, for every farmer who could make good under normal conditions throughout the western provinces, and, for that matter, throughout the whole of Canada. They should do this by a system of bonus on the basis of 70 cent wheat, or by any other method they like to adopt for 1931, just to ensure that we have established credits and a sufficient amount of money to take care of the resources we have created during the last few years. We have to take the attitude of an intelligent optimism, I would say. We cannot take the attitude of despair; it would be fatal.

The wheat crisis throughout the world is due to over-production. How did it arise? If I understand the situation correctly, it came about partly through the phenomenally good crops throughout the world, and partly through phenomenally good harvest weather which facilitated the saving of the crops after they were grown. The same conditions may not occur again for half a century. The price that is prevailing to-day will most certainly tend to cut down any excess production. I think there is reasonable ground for saying that the price of wheat cannot stay where it is any more than it could stay at the $1.50 a bushel level.

It is stated in the speech from the throne that the government is looking forward to an era of prosperity. I would plead, therefore, with the government for the sake of the whole Dominion of Canada, the prosperity of which depends upon reasonable prosperity for the western farmer and the production of crops in reasonable volume, to see that agriculture is supported in this year of tremendous difficulty. For any action it may take along that line the government will be amply repaid by a betterment of conditions not only for the western farmer but for the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I hope that the hon. gentleman who has just preceded me (Mr. Kennedy), as well as other hon. gentlemen on both sides of the house, including the mover (Mr. Cormier) and the seconder (Mr. Porteous) of the address, will not consider me discourteous if I do not follow in detail the remarks which they have made. There is one matter to which I should like to refer, and it has to do with the remarks made by two hon. gentlemen from western Canada on the opposite side of the house. I refer to the comments of the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Willis) with regard to a tariff on corn, and the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Loucks), who, at page 234 of Hansard of this session, said:

> I have pledged myself to support this tariff on corn; before I left home my supporters asked me if I would do my best to have that tariff imposed, and so I came here supporting that proposal.

That is all very well, Mr. Speaker, so far as it goes, but if these two hon. gentlemen really desire a tariff on corn entering this country from the Argentine and elsewhere, how is it that we do not see on the order paper any notice standing in their names of a resolution to that effect? It is not sufficient for them to get up in the house and say that they are in favour of a tariff on corn; they must have the support of their colleagues from other parts of Canada. I wondered, as these hon. gentlemen were speaking, just what would be the attitude of my hon. friend from Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), who was so vocal last year with regard to tariffs on agricultural products, but who this session up to the present has said nothing at all, not only with respect to a tariff on corn, but with regard to any of his pet hobbies of last year. I wonder also why we have not heard from my good friend from Haldimand (Mr. Senn) who represents an agricultural constituency, or from the hon. member for Durham (Mr. Bowen). Why are these gentlemen not saying what they think with regard to this proposed tariff on corn?

Mr. ROWE: I have no objections.

Mr. McKENZIE (Assiniboia): We will see if the hon. member supports the proposal when hon. gentlemen from the west bring in their resolution, as no doubt they will.

Mr. ROWE: Certainly I will.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to make a brief reference also to the speech delivered by my namesake from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) this afternoon. For an hon. member to receive the attention he did from both sides of the house on the occasion of his first extended address in this chamber is indeed notable. His speech was worthy of all the attention it received.

Ever since I have been in this city, for some two weeks now, the one topic of discussion in this chamber, in the corridors, in the offices of members, on the street and everywhere else, is the seriousness of the economic condition of the country. It was regrettable that the Prime Minister (Mr Bennett) was not in his place to hear the address of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre. We are here to offer what we consider practical suggestions for the solution of the economic problems confronting this country. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre referred to several problems and offered practical suggestions, but the Prime Minister was not in his place to hear them. One hon. gentleman opposite said that he was better employed. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think the people of Canada will wonder just how the Prime Minister could be better employed than sitting in this chamber listening to the discussions and to the proposals for the solution of the problems which face us. And it is not the Prime Minister alone who is absent from his seat; if you look across the floor at almost any time you will see in their places only one or two cabinet ministers out of seventeen or eighteen to listen to the suggestions that are made with regard to economic conditions in Canada, which we all believe to be so acute.

The depression was so evident in the constituency which I have the honour to represent that I decided before I came down here to go through the riding, meet as many people as possible, and ascertain from them their ideas in regard to economic conditions. Wherever I went among the farmers, among the business and professional men in our towns and villages—everywhere the people were asking this question: Why is it that in spite of the numerous promises that were made before the last election by Conservative speakers throughout the whole country, the prices of all farm products are a great deal lower to-day than they were at that time? In July of last year wheat on the Winnipeg market was worth between 95 cents and $1; to-day I believe the latest papers from the west quote 55 cents for No. 1 northern at Fort William—a drop of 40 cents a bushel. Butter, which was the subject of discussion to such an extent in all the constituencies of Canada, has fallen to the lowest price we have known for many years. Coarse grains have fallen to such an extent that in some parts of western Canada they are being burned for fuel, and no attempt is being made to sell them. Raw hides, raw furs—the prices of all these commodities have been materially reduced from what they were last summer when our friends pretended to be so greatly concerned about the welfare of the farmers of Canada. I shall not, however, dwell upon those significant facts.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

There is a general feeling throughout my constituency that this government made a mistake last September when it increased the duties on practically everything the farmers have to buy. Let me tell the house some of the expressions which I heard in that connection. One was that the people of Canada expect the opposition at this session to make clear to the people of the country, and if possible to the government, the fallacy of high protection. Another view I heard expressed on more than one occasion was that this is not the time to pass legislation which can be of benefit to but a very small proportion of our people and a disadvantage to a much greater number. I was quite interested the other day to hear the hon. members for Stormont (Mr. Shaver) and Lanark (Mr. Thompson) tell of conditions in their constituencies. Their statements prove conclusively what I am now saying. Certain people are benefiting very materially from the legislation passed at the last session, but even though 15 or 20 per cent of the people do benefit from it, that legislation works to the detriment of the remaining 80 or 85 per cent. Our farmers in western Canada are not asking favours from any government; all they want is a fair chance to trade on an equal basis with Great Britain as outlined in the Dunning budget. No doubt this government is blamed for more than it should be blamed, but I have heard the complaint that the main trouble at present with the government of Canada is its inability to view economic questions from the standpoint of the common people.

During the election campaign of last year the trump card of our Conservative friends, in the cities especially, was the question of unemployment. I have in my hand a clipping from the Montreal Star of May 28, 1930—and Montreal Star is not by any means a Liberal paper or a supporter of the Liberal party. The quotation is as follows:

> Employment in May favourable. Highest on record with only one exception.
> The Dominion Bureau of Statistics tabulated reports from 7,208 firms who reported a decidedly upward movement in employment on May 1; the payrolls of these employers were increased by 31,470 persons to 976,224 on the date under review. . . .

Then the article goes on to say this figure is the highest on record in any year since records have been kept, with the exception of May 1, 1929. Employment conditions were favourable in this country on May 1, 1930. We read that on June 1 there was an increase in the number of people employed. On July 1, there was a further increase in the number of people employed. On August 1, probably for reasons best known to some of our friends opposite who come from the provinces where there are Conservative governments and where there was very little if any road work carried on through the month of July, employment reported from 7,357 firms showed payrolls accounting for 1,042,710 persons as compared with 1,043,681 on July 1—a decrease of about 971 persons. In September 7,334 firms reporting to the Bureau of Statistics showed a decrease on September 1 of 18,800 persons. In October there is a further decrease from 7,384 firms reporting of about 2,900 persons. In November from 7,406 firms reporting there is a decrease of about 28,000 persons. On December 1, from 7,514 firms there is a decrease of about 31,000 persons.

The monthly bulletin of the Bureau of Statistics gives the following on January 1, 1931:

> January 1 showed a pronounced curtailment which, however, involved a rather smaller number of workers than that indicated on the same dates of 1930 and 1929. In spite of the smaller falling off which was partly due to the stabilizing effect of unemployment relief work, employment was at a lower level than on the same date in the two preceding years.

From 7,431 firms reporting in the month of February 1931 there was a decrease of 8,765 in the number of persons employed.

In spite of the fact that our hon. friends opposite made so much of the question of unemployment during the election campaign, we find that on May 1, as reported in the Montreal Star, the employment situation was favourable. The number of people employed increased from month to month until August, and from then on there has been a decrease each month.

On December 30 last, the Prime Minister made a speech in the city of Regina. As one hon. member said this afternoon he had a message for the people of western Canada in regard to the wheat situation and economic conditions generally. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there has never been a greater diappointment not only to the friends of the Prime Minister but to the people of western Canada as a whole. We were hopeful that he would have a message which would help to relieve the situation. Although I heard his address over the radio I bought a paper the following morning and read it through. For fear there would be something left out in the paper I bought, the Regina Leader-Post, I obtained a copy of the Prime Minister's paper, the Regina Daily Star. I noticed that the report of his speech was very much the same in both papers, but I should like to direct attention to one very significant statement he made. After outlining the promises that he had made, he said:

> Remember too that we inherited these conditions as a legacy of nine years of Liberal administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friends say, "hear, hear." When we left this chamber about ten months ago, after the dissolution of the last parliament, we were all proud to go back to our constituencies and tell our people that although there was a world-wide depression, Canada was in a more prosperous condition than practically any other country in the world. We were able to say that although there was unemployment, that condition was not nearly as serious in Canada as it was in other countries, especially the countries which had adopted a high tariff policy.

In connection with this legacy I should like to quote some figures from the speech of my right hon. leader, delivered in this chamber on March 16, as found at page 16 of Hansard, where he said that for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, the aggregate trade of Canada was $1,502,000,000. That increased from year to year until in 1929 it reached its highest point at $2,655,000,000. No doubt owing to the world depression, in 1930 it dropped to $2,393,000,000. Our total exports for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1922, amounted to $754,000,000, while in 1930 they were $1,145,000,000. Canada had a greater aggregate trade per capita than any other country in the world. That was the proud position Canada was in. Not only that, but one would conclude from the statement of the Prime Minister that the financial condition of the country was in very bad shape when he took charge of affairs. In 1924 the national debt was reduced by $35,993,594. There was a decrease in the national debt every year for the next seven years, and in 1930 the decrease amounted to $47,740,746, giving an aggregate for the seven years of over $276,000,000. That is the legacy hon. gentlemen opposite croak about, and about which they have been talking so much during this session.

With regard to these tariff increases there has been a great deal said. We wonder just what the inevitable result of such a condition of affairs is likely to be, and I cannot express my view better than by reading an editorial which I clipped from the Toronto Star of October 18, 1930. It is headed "Inevitable Results" and continues:

Henry Ford tells the English people on his present visit that "within two years not a single piece or part of Ford products will be brought into England from the United States."

Further on the editorial continues:

The trade policy of the United States, persevered in, raises up barriers the world over to the manufactured products of the United States. For years Canada has gained industrially from this condition of things, for branch factories were started here to produce goods for export and meet with the more favourable acceptance abroad that Canadian goods received. But now that the Ottawa trade policy is to be the Washington trade policy—all sell and no buy—how long will Canadian products enjoy that more favourable acceptance abroad which has been the secret of much of our industrial progress in recent years? Not for very long.

Then the editorial continues:

The strange notion that a country can sell abroad and do all her buying at home—the strange notion that a country can live within itself and prosper more greatly the more she does it—these strange delusions are abroad in the world and, possibly, nothing but disastrous experiment and experience will dispel the mental fog.

That expresses just about what we all feel with regard to the inevitable result of such a policy.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer briefly, and that is the campaign which has been carried on, no doubt at public expense, by the Department of Trade and Commerce with regard to buying made in Canada products. The advertisement I hold in my hand was clipped from the Canadian National Railways Magazine, and is headed, "To give Canadians work, buy Canadian products." Then the advertisement proceeds:

To-day the opportunity is yours to render your country a service of inestimable value. And you can do it absolutely without cost to yourself in time or money. Exercise a little intelligent discrimination in your daily buying, and the thing is done.

That seems very simple to those who read advertisements, but after this advertising had been going on for some time we noticed a change. I just want to emphasize one other fact at this point. This advertising matter was carried in the daily papers and magazines, but the papers printed in my constituency, by men who are taxpayers and who will have to pay their share of the cost of the advertising, received no benefit whatever from this advertising campaign. I think our weekly newspaper men in smaller centres are entitled to a little consideration as well as the men printing our magazines and newspapers in the cities.

There is a very nice sentiment expressed in that advertisement, if you do not examine it too closely. We see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce, or somebody in his department, started out in a very fine, wide circle. One was going to sell to the other; they were going to do each other's washing, so to speak. They were all going to sell to each other and everything was going to work out fine, but as we watched these advertisements from week to week we noticed that the great circle on which they started out became smaller and smaller. Evidently they found that they would meet themselves somewhere near the centre before very long, and they came to a sudden stop.

A few days ago a constituent of mine sent me a little clipping which shows just to what extent those who hold up both hands in favour of this propaganda with regard to buying made in Canada goods practise it themselves. This clipping is a reprint from the Montreal Chronicle, and speaks for itself:

Damage in Dominion Textile Plant Estimated $350,000

Fire breaking out January 19 in the spinning department of the Dominion Textile Company's plant, St. Ann's branch, Notre Dame street east, caused damage estimated at about $350,000. The plant is covered by insurance placed in provincially registered American mutuals, of which the chief agent is A. O. Dawson, president of Canadian Cottons Company, Montreal.

Surprise is felt in some quarters that a corporation representing an industry which has been so conspicuous in seeking greater tariff protection should not have seen fit to patronize the regular home markets for fire insurance. As it happens, local insurance circles find more cause to chuckle than to complain in this particular case, but the fact is not overlooked that many prominent proponents of "buy at home" movements are striking offenders in the matter of their fire insurance.

To me this is a serious matter. We know that the Dominion Textile Company received benefit from the tariff legislation passed at the September session. That benefit was given to them to the detriment of the consuming public. We notice too that Mr. A. O. Dawson, president of Canadian Cottons Limited, is chief agent for Quebec for these American mutual companies. I have no doubt that both these firms would hold up their hands and acclaim this as the proper thing. They would approve of this advertising matter which was got out by the Department of Trade and Commerce. Yet here is what they do in actual practice: they place their own insurance, not on the principle of Canada first, but with American mutual companies. I have been in the insurance business myself long enough to know that there are quite a number of Canadian companies with head offices in Montreal. Why did not these people practise what they preached? Why did they not put into practice their made in Canada policy and insure with Canadian companies?

I am sorry the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ryckman) is not in his seat. I wonder if he could not find some way of putting a dumping duty against these companies. He is very ingenious when it comes to imposing dumping duties against everything American. And what about the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Weir)? I regret that he also is absent. Why did he not see fit to bring this matter up when the question came before the cabinet council, as it did a short time ago, when they gave the Minister of National Revenue power to put a dumping duty against barbed wire? Why did he not raise his voice, if he wants the people of the west to follow out the policy he has been advocating, of diversified farming? Our people out there cannot go into stock raising unless they get wire for their fencing, and that is the only kind of fencing we can afford to buy. It looked as though they were going to get barbed wire cheaper this year than formerly. Why, therefore, if the Minister of Agriculture was present at cabinet council, did he not object to that dumping duty being imposed against barbed wire which the farmers might otherwise buy? I should like to have him, before the debate is over, express his opinion with regard to these dumping duties and explain why he sat idly by and allowed the cabinet council to give this power to the Minister of National Revenue. That minister knows nothing about western conditions, although when he came home from his visit last fall he said something to the effect that he had found nothing but the greatest optimism with regard to the policies which the Conservative party were putting into effect. I should have been glad to have him visit some parts of southern Saskatchewan and see what optimism there was there.

As a good many other hon. members have pointed out, farming conditions in the west are deplorable; things are in a desperate state. Our farmers are at their wits' end to know just what to do this spring. They do not know whether to sow a crop or not, and they are waiting for some pronouncement from the Minister of Agriculture as to just what he intends to do to solve the problems that face them. They are looking to him for some leadership. Not only that; when we go home, as we shall be doing in a short time, we shall probably be confronted with some of the unemployed in our constituencies who will want to know what the policy of the Labour department is. As has been mentioned before, we have no Labour minister in this house; but whoever is responsible for the Labour department should announce what is going to be done for these unemployed men in our constituencies. These men are wondering what they are going to do this coming summer, and there is another winter ahead of them.

We wonder, Mr. Speaker, why it is that the government we have in Canada, who are adopting the high tariff policy, cannot see what has happened in other countries that have followed that same downward course. I remember hearing the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, when he was leader of the Conservative party in this house, say to the government of that day, "Why does not Canada follow the example of Australia and increase the tariff so as to give employment to her people?" Well, Australia increased its tariff and Canada was the only country that did not follow suit. And Australia had a greater problem of unemployment on its hands than we have. Their financial position to-day is desperate, much worse than Canada's although we are getting worse now. Cannot this government see that the countries which did not increase their tariffs were the last ones to feel the effects of the depression? Why do we plunge headlong where the United States has ventured and failed, where Australia has ventured and failed, and where other countries have met with the same fate? At a later date I shall dwell more upon this comparison. My time now is about expired.

Mr. T. A. FONTAINE (St. Hyacinthe-Rouville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to waste the time of the house, especially at this late hour; neither would I like to unduly prolong the present debate which has been going on for two full weeks. But, since we are not under high pressure as we were at the special session of last September, I believe that it behooves us all to properly fulfil our duties as representatives of the people by serving, to the best of our ability, and in all good faith, free from any narrow party spirit as also from all animosity, the interests of our constituents and of our Canadian people as a whole.

I must acknowledge, Mr. Speaker, that never before have I realized to the same degree the very deep truth contained in the words of the Gospel: "Tarde venientibus ossa," which I would translate under the circumstances: When he follows so many brilliant speakers, so many eminent parliamentarians, so many distinguished debaters as we have listened to since the beginning of the discussion on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the young member finds his task no easy one, indeed, and he feels that there is very little left for him to say.

In my turn, as a French Canadian member of parliament representing the province of Quebec, I deem it my duty, as my good friend the distinguished member for Hull (Mr. Fournier) pointed out the other day, to speak in my native tongue when I rise to-day for the first time as a member of this house. I believe that it is the duty of every French Canadian who is elected to this house to use the French language when he addresses the assembly for the first time.

Mr. Speaker, I trust you will allow me in all humility and with all due modesty to join with all my colleagues on both sides of the house in expressing to you my heartfelt and truly sincere congratulations on your elevation to the exalted position you occupy as Speaker of the House of Commons. This tribute seems to me all the more fitting since I have been given the privilege of occupying the same room in this building which formerly served Your Honour.

I wish also to offer my very cordial congratulations, as did all the hon. gentlemen who preceded me, to the hon. members for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Cormier) and for North Grey (Mr. Porteous) for the very meritorious fashion in which they carried out the arduous task assigned them of moving and seconding, respectively, the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

If time were not wanting, we should like to offer our congratulations also to the French Canadian members, and to the representatives of the other provinces, on both sides of the house, for the very excellent speeches we have listened to during the past two weeks.

If I were a member of acquired standing, I should very likely not be forgiven for singing the praises of the constituency which does me the honour of selecting me as its representative in this house. But since all new members are sure of your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, and of the kindly feelings of all our hon. colleagues, I hope you will allow me to say that I represent, not the finest county in our whole Dominion—the hon. friends beside me would smother me with their protests—but I shall use the expression which can displease nobody—one of the finest counties of the province of Quebec. My constituency is partly agricultural and partly industrial. On the agricultural side we have general farming, the dairy industry, cattle raising, market gardening; we also produce quantities of hay and a very large yield of tobacco, particularly around St. Césaire. The county abounds in magnificent orchards; and the country around Rougemont, St.-Hilaire and Abbotsford is aptly described as the most beautiful garden in the province. We are also given over to the maple industry, to canning activities, to poultry raising and bee culture, etc. From the industrial viewpoint we have silk factories, knitting mills, shoe factories, tanneries and organ factories. We also have distilleries, we manufacture headgear, etc. In my riding during the last election, as was done in all the other counties in Quebec province, in fact in all the constituencies throughout the country, a special appeal was made to the farming community: In an effort to obtain their votes they were led to believe that if they elected the Conservative party to office they would receive much higher prices for their produce. The working people of the cities were promised more work. None of these promises have been fulfilled. But everywhere and always our opponents have fallen back on their well known slogan: "Canada First". Mr. Speaker, whenever the Conservative party is striving hard for victory it always has recourse to some stirring battle cry that resounds like a bugle call. We had an illustration of this in the 1911 campaign when the Conservative party triumphed to the tune of: "No truck nor trade with the Yankees". And in 1911, since we are on the subject, the Conservatives, just as in 1930, played a two-faced game. In one part of the country the fight was waged by feeding the people all sorts of fantastic notions concerning reciprocity; elsewhere the same bugaboos were called into service, but this time the butt was the proposed Canadian Navy. In the 1930 campaign the motto inspired by the Conservative chieftain himself was not quite so blatant: "Canada First".

A fine motto, Mr. Speaker, no doubt about it; perhaps the finest that could be inscribed at the head of a political program on the eve of a general election. "Canada First!", how well it looks in a proclamation, how it stands out in a speech. Every single one of us approves of this magic formula; but we wish to give it its real meaning, its precise and accurate significance.

If it is meant to convey that every effort should be made to find new markets for our products, or even to keep those markets we already have, we are for it. If it means striving to ensure national union, harmony and concord between provinces, between classes, between races, between creeds, we are for it. If this program means protecting the consumer and the middle classes, and not looking solely to the interests of the big capitalists of the country, we are for it. If it means protecting the farmer and the workingman to the same degree as the magnates of industry and finance, we are for it, absolutely and completely; for such, thank God, has always been the program of the Liberal party. But, Mr. Speaker, if by that magic formula it is sought, first and foremost, to support the might of wealth and power, and in the doing to ride roughshod over any and all obstacles; if, as a consequence of the reckless increase of our tariff, all other countries, one after another, close their doors against us; if, instead of a tariff for revenue, we find our custom receipts dwindling rapidly from day to day; if our country must relinquish the enviable position it had acquired in the world of trade among the first nations of the globe; if, instead of piling up a surplus and thus reducing our national debt, the public treasury is constantly losing ground; if, as a consequence, the government, instead of easing or even abolishing certain taxes which weigh heavily on the nation, finds itself under the necessity of increasing them and of creating new imposts; if instead of the peace, the mutual confidence, the respect, the harmony and unity, which must flourish in this Canada of ours if we wish to ensure the survival of confederation; if, I repeat, instead of all that, we find distrust, suspicion, animosity, constant bickerings among the provinces, between different parts of the country, between the classes of our population; if we even find in certain cases, sad to relate, the rights of minorities despised; ah then, Mr. Speaker, are we not justified in asking ourselves if this fine motto was not used to mask the sole object of gaining power through the application of the supremely false and evil principle: "The end justifies the means."

During the campaign of last July, Mr. Speaker, our good friends to your right saw nothing but unrest, depression, unemployment, hardship and untold suffering. For our part we are quite willing to admit the existence of an economic crisis; but we have always maintained that it had its general causes in overproduction, the weakening of the wheat market, the inroads of mechanization, the stock exchange crash, etc. Our opponents absolutely refused to look beyond our own borders, to the countries of Europe of the neighbouring republic; they refused to study the economic situation in other countries. After the election, they soon changed. Several of the hon. members who preceded me brought to the attention of the house statements made, after the election, by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Stevens), for instance, by the hon. Minister of Labour (Senator Robertson), by the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley). The right hon. Prime Minister himself (Mr. Bennett), in the speech he delivered at the opening of the Imperial conference in London, on October 1st, duly stressed the fact that the conference was beginning its labours at a time when the entire world was going through a period of industrial depression. Let me quote his own words, which I find, Mr. Speaker, in the official report of the conference published by order of parliament:

> We meet at a time of industrial depression, falling prices, slackening trade, diminishing revenues and rising unemployment. This situation is world-wide, and while some countries know it only in a modified degree, all are equally concerned in finding a cure for it. Those factors which once controlled the course of international trade and commerce have given place to others. The old order of things has passed. How far the present unhappy state may be regarded as the manifestation of change into a new condition of world affairs, it is perhaps profitless at the moment to enquire.

But whoever had listened to the speeches of the right hon. Prime Minister during the campaign, would have believed that if Canada were suffering from any such economic depression it was due entirely to the neglect and the incompetence of the Liberal administration. But hardly was the election over, when he unhesitatingly accepted the Liberal viewpoint. What a fitting occasion to quote the poet's words: "Quantum mutatis ab illo!"

Whenever anything goes wrong our Conservative friends always have the same explanation to offer, whether before or after an election: Blame the Liberals. As people used to say at one time: Blame Papineau. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) recalled this in one of his speeches during the campaign: "I know this refrain only too well," he said; "it was heard everywhere in the days of my great-grandfather: if the weather were bad, blame Papineau; if it rained, blame Papineau; if the roads were bad, blame Papineau; if the cows were barren, blame Papineau."

But if I remember aright, Mr. Speaker, our friends opposite boasted during the campaign that they had a wonderful cure-all that would immediately rid us of all the evils that beset our country. They told the voters: "Give us a chance, and we'll change all this; our protective tariff will put everything back on its feet again." The right hon. Prime Minister himself, stated in Nova Scotia,—his words will be found in the Halifax Herald of July 3rd and 4th; besides, I believe they are quoted on page 37 of the French version of Hansard:

If the Conservative party is victorious on July 28th I will see to it that old age pensions are paid in every province out of the federal treasury.

Let me, in passing, congratulate the hon member for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Laurin) on the splendid speech he made last night, particularly on his eloquent treatment of this question of old age pensions. As I listened to him I thought: "If he delivered this speech in all the parishes of his county there is nothing surprising about his large majority." Mr. Speaker, who can say how many votes this promise of old age pensions rallied to the Conservative banner in the province of Quebec, and in the other provinces?

The Prime Minister went on—and this is important:

I ask the Conservative candidates who are elected to parliament from this province to vote against me and against my government if these promises are not kept.

Alas, like Sister Anne, we see nothing on the horizon. In the speech from the throne we are told: "Have patience; it will come in time: we have been in office only eight months." But these hon. gentlemen sang another tune during the campaign: there was to be no delay; everything was to be straightened out immediately. It was on the strength of these explicit pledges that they gained so many votes in Quebec and in the other provinces. Does anyone, for a single moment, think that the result of the election would have been the same if our opponents, instead of promising an immediate solution of all our difficulties, had said to the electorate: "We believe we can do better than the Liberals; but we do not know how much time we will need. One thing is certain: no improvement will be possible for a long time". That is what they are saying to-day; so much so that even after being in office for over eight months our Conservative friends are still not able to tell us when their marvellous remedies will begin to show some results.

If the situation is not one whit improved, say our opponents, if our income has decreased to the tune of $72,000,000 during the first ten months of the fiscal year which will end in a few days; if, in the same period our expenses have increased by $20,000,000 and the public debt by $44,000,000; if the government must face a deficit of $100,000,000, as the right hon. Prime Minister himself has acknowledged, there is nothing strange about that: it is the fault of the Dunning tariff. But here again our Conservative friends are caught in their own trap; for if I am not mistaken the Dunning tariff only came into effect on May 1; and the government hastily repealed it at the special session of last September. Is anyone ready to believe that this tariff, in effect only a few months, could have such disastrous results? No, the Dunning tariff which sought to open up new foreign markets for our goods, had as its necessary object the increase of our revenue. The best proof of this is found in the fact that immediately after its repeal our revenue began to fall.

Frequent mention has been made of the Prime Minister's promises during the campaign. Several of our friends opposite have sought to show—without any satisfactory proof it seems to me,—that their pledges had been fulfilled. As a matter of fact I believe that only one was kept, and that only in part; I am speaking of the special session. What were the principal pledges made by the Prime Minister and the Conservative party to curry favour with the electorate? The first was that unemployment would be banished immediately through a special session called for that purpose. The second was an increase in the prices of farm produce, especially butter. That promise has not been kept. The third was to establish a system of old age pensions in all the provinces at federal expense. We have still to see its fulfilment. Fourth promise: A national highway from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from Cape Breton to Vancouver. What has become of that pledge, Mr. Speaker? Another promise unfulfilled.

Fifth promise: a bridge over the St. Lawrence at Lachine; and a bridge, if you please, without any toll-gate whatever. This is being implemented by the provincial government of Quebec province, and not by the federal government.

Sixth promise: The St. Lawrence waterway. Mr. Speaker, can anybody sincerely and in good faith claim to-day in this house that these promises have been kept, or are about to be fulfilled by the party now in power?

I do not intend,—time is flying—to recall most of the important declarations made by the Prime Minister on the eve of last election day, July 28th. But I shall quote a few, as briefly as possible.

When I have become prime minister, on the 28th, I will see to it that all my promises are kept or my government will go down to defeat in the effort to fulfill them.

Here is what he said at Halifax:

I ask the Conservative candidates in this province (Nova Scotia) who are elected to parliament to vote against me and against my government if these pledges are not kept.

And again:

Mr. King promises to study the unemployment problem. I promise to put an end to unemployment. Which plan do you prefer?

What a fine ring there was to such statements made in the course of a political speech.

He also said:

What you want is not conferences, but work; and it is work you will get.

And the right hon. Prime Minister added, speaking this time in Quebec city—and this is important for our conservative friends; I have not yet the pleasure of knowing personally and intimately the Conservative representatives of our province, but they seem well-intentioned; those I have met in this house appear to be men of good-will and I feel sure that at the first opportunity they will dutifully follow the recommendation made to them by their leader in Quebec city—the right hon. Prime Minister stated that he wanted the Quebec members and the other members of his party to throw him out of office if, after his victory at the polls, he should be unfaithful to the pledges he had made to the Canadian people.

An hon. MEMBER: No danger.

Mr. FONTAINE: I have not the pleasure of knowing personally the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. LaVergne); only I know that he enjoys, and rightly, a very high reputation; he has the honour to occupy, or he did occupy —I am not sure on this point—a position of trust at the Quebec Bar; if I mistake not he has been, may be even yet, bâtonnier. I tender him, in passing, my congratulations. He has gained in our own province, and throughout the Dominion, a high reputation as a stalwart champion of the French language. He was not afraid to criticize, as it deserved to be criticized, on the floor of this house, the conduct of the prime minister of Saskatchewan towards our brethren in those parts. But the hon. member for Montmagny has stated that in the last campaign the Quebec Liberals had raised the cry of prejudice, that they were all partisans, and that he himself had become a good Tory because he had become a good Canadian. Being a young member there is nothing I would sooner avoid than any unpleasantness towards the hon. gentleman; but I do believe that he might very well have refrained from such language. It was rather his own leader who appealed to prejudice during the last campaign, claiming that the government was nothing but a mercenary group, kept in office through falsehood and subterfuge, looking solely to their own interests, unmindful of everything save their own personal advantage; he called them traitors and compared them to Judas. Never before in our history, I believe, has the chieftain of a great political party, denounced in such scathing terms the leaders of the opposing party.

It was not the Liberals of Quebec who appealed to prejudice. We remember the attitude of the Conservative party at the political meetings held throughout Quebec last June. They said that the three western provinces were represented in the cabinet by Messrs. Mackenzie King, Dunning, Crerar, Stewart and Motherwell; that these five ministers dominated the government and controlled its financial and economic policies. I believe it was the hon. Secretary of State himself (Mr. Cahan) who, speaking one evening over radio station CKAC, in Montreal, said that for the past ten years that group had held in leash the solid Quebec bloc.

During this time what was being said in the west by the Regina Daily Star, that stupid paper, with only one ideal, one object, one policy: the persecution of our French Canadian brethren in the west; this paper which should not forget that in the province of Quebec and in the other provinces we have a French Canadian press which will always stand as a bulwark against all movements, all attacks directed against the rights of minorities in this country. This press has fought the good fight for twenty years in our province and, thanks be to God, the Saskatchewan paper can well meditate on Lafontaine's fable: "Le Serpent et la Lime;" in spite of all it may do, it will never make the slightest headway against the rights and privileges guaranteed the French Canadian minority by the very terms of our constitution. But what was this paper, friendly towards our conservative opponents in the west, saying about the liberal party? This paper which never had, and has not to-day, the slightest fellow-feeling towards French Canadians, asserted that the federal cabinet was dominated by the province of Quebec, and that through the Postmaster General and the Secretary of State every possible means were being employed to impose the French language on this country and—surprising claim, which goes to show how far bad faith may lead one astray—to impose protection on Canada.

In the west the voters were told that the liberal government was protectionist; to the eastern voters it was said that the government was under the free trade influences of the west. In Montreal it was claimed that the western members dominated the King cabinet; while in Saskatchewan our opponents appealed to prejudice by asserting that the Quebec bloc was forcing the French language and protecttion on the country. If that is not an appeal to prejudice, then words have no meaning.

A goodly number of those who have spoken, Mr. Speaker, tried to make capital out of the new immigration policy of the present government. On this subject I shall not repeat the excellent case made out the other evening by my hon. colleague from Bellechasse; but I should perhaps put clearly before the people of this country the plain fact that during the last twenty years it was the Conservative party, and not the Liberal, which brought the greater number of immigrants to Canada. Under the conservative regime, from 1911 to 1921, there was admitted to this country a total of 2,123,920 immigrants while during the time that the Liberals held office, from 1922 to 1930, the total was only 1,145,475, or almost 50 per cent less.

It must be remembered also that when our Conservative friends claim to have put a stop to immigration, they are saying something which is not so. According to the statistics of the Immigration department, reorganized by the Prime Minister, 25,000 immigrants entered Canada during August, September, October, November and December last. During the month of January 1,480 immigrants were admitted, in spite of unemployment, in spite of the Conservative party's promises to end this evil, and their boast that since they are in office all immigration has ceased. I must mention also that the present Prime Minister lost no time in reviving the Department of Immigration, abolished by the previous government; and that during the session of 1929, as certain hon. members have already recalled, General McRae, chief organizer of the Conservative party, suggested the spending of $300,000,000 for the purpose of peopling our western provinces with unemployed imported here, at our expense, from the British Isles.

We are often told that high protection is the best cure for unemployment. Those who use this argument have failed to note the experience of our powerful neighbours, the United States, high protection country par excellence. Let us follow the unemployment curve in these protectionist states during the last few years. In 1928 the unemployed numbered 800,000; in 1929, 500,000. In June, 1930, this had been increased to 4,500,000 and in the following October, only a few months later, the figure had reached 7,200,000. If the number has increased at the same rate since, the United States will soon have an army of unemployed equal to the entire population of Canada.

But, Mr. Speaker, the United States are not the only country to suffer from high protection. One of our sister dominions, Australia, thought it would be an advantage to adopt a policy of high protection. Australia is at present labouring under a national debt of $5,000,000,000; nearly the entire revenue of the country is required to meet the interest alone. The people of Australia are on the way to national bankruptcy: they do not know how to discharge this debt, or even whether they can pay it. Like our friends opposite, they also built railroads that could not pay, costly highways, and launched into numerous other undertakings of similar character. In spite of their policy of high protection they are suffering acutely from the crisis in the wheat and textile markets. The state has a hand in almost everything; state ownership has gone further in Australia than anywhere else. But all these things have not helped to restore the country's finances, which at the present time are in such a bad way that even the great international financial institutions refuse any further loan to Australia.

Which proves, Mr. Speaker, that every time a country increases its tariff the only result is to encourage other countries to retaliate in the same fashion.

During the last campaign our opponents blamed the low price of butter in 1930 on the treaty we had signed with New Zealand. The treaty was perhaps a contributing cause; and for that reason it lapsed on October 12th, through the initiative of the former government. But the New Zealand treaty was not the only cause, I even say it was not the chief cause, of the situation that existed. We must not forget that the increase in the American tariff on milk and cream had, as was to be expected, the immediate effect of drastically curtailing our dairy exports to the United States, which had come from the southern parts of Ontario and Quebec, and chiefly from the eastern townships, in the latter province. Once the American market was closed to them, our dairy producers had to ship their surplus to Montreal and other Canadian centres or to manufacture butter and cheese; inevitably prices fell as a result.

For proof of this we have only to glance at our statistics which show that in 1929 our dairy exports to the United States were valued at $5,476,254; while the following year, 1930, this had fallen to $2,661,076. I have gleaned these data from the financial and commercial review of 1930 published in the Montreal Gazette of January 3, 1931. Moreover, if I had the time I could easily show that our butter market was no worse off than in the United States, where the highest of high tariff walls protect the American producer.

Before sitting down, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word on the question of mutual understanding, since it is mentioned in the speech from the throne, in the following words:

> In adversity that union is made still stronger by the spirit of cooperation and mutual understanding which is the surest bulwark of the nation's welfare and happiness.

Is it really true that at the present time, all through Canada, in all the provinces. particularly in certain provinces where there is a minority, that we do find that this spirit of mutual understanding that we have a perfect right to expect in a country such as ours? In the Patriote de l'Ouest of March 4th, 1931, there was published an appeal, a veritable cry of anguish and despair, from the French Canadian and Catholic minority of those parts. I am going to read it to the house:

> Citizens of Canada for centuries, explorers and pioneers of the west, it is hard for the French Canadians to see themselves, in their own country, put in the same footing as the immigrant of yesterday. It is hard that the French Canadian alone should have no say in laws which concern only himself. It is painful to see himself despoiled of rights acquired at the very dawn of our history, and for motives which have not even the appearance of truth.
> Altogether aside from the Catholic and French aspect of the question, we are convinced that premier Anderson of Saskatchewan is making a mistake in outlawing the teaching of our language. The result will not be a stronger union among the citizens of our province, nor any progress in the field of education. Whether he knows it or not, Mr. Anderson is leading the country towards a Communist reign of terror and not towards that spirit of brotherhood which is based on the respect of each other's sentiments. This coercive policy will be brought into play in other fields, will strike other groups than ours, perhaps some people dear to Mr. Anderson. Once tyranny is let loose it creates much greater havoc than its master ever willed.
> The French tongue will reecho over our immense country long after the present prime minister will have disappeared from the scene; and many experiments, of a religious or non-religious nature, will have run their course, when the silver voice of our Catholic belfries will still be heard consoling the souls of the faithful with the hope of a future life.

I will end on that. I trust that such appeals will be heard and understood, and that the province of Saskatchewan, emulating the example of the province of Quebec, will safeguard the rights, advantages and privileges of the French-Canadian minority guaranteed them by the constitution of our country; rights, advantages and privileges which Quebec province has always held sacred as regards our English-speaking minority.

On motion of Mr. Dupré the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Guthrie the house adjourned at 10.12 p.m.

Monday, March 30, 1931

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITION AGAINST VIVISECTION

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): I beg to present a petition from residents of Montreal and district and other parts of Canada praying for the passing of legislation to suppress the practice of vivisection.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. O. L. BOULANGER (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Civil Service Act (returned soldiers' preference).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BOULANGER: This bill is similar to one introduced at the last session. It proposes three things. First, it is intended to restrict veterans' preference to Canadian veterans, the term Canadian being defined by the Canadian Nationals Act, chapter 21 of the revised statutes. Secondly, it proposes to extend from three to five years the requirement in regard to necessary residence in Canada demanded of applicants for positions in the civil service. In the third place, it proposes to do away with a practice which has been introduced into the administration of the Civil Service Commission regarding exceptions made to the clause requiring three years' residence in Canada for applicants. The Civil Service Commission has adopted what I might call blanket regulations, which seem to contradict the terms of the Civil Service Act, and in virtue of which applicants are admitted practically as a matter of course into the civil service without complying with the requirements of the Civil Service Act in this respect. This bill proposes to discontinue that practice and return to the sense and spirit of the Civil Service Act. Whenever it may be necessary to make an exception to the requirements of the Civil Service Act, it is proposed that such exception shall be a special case to be specially considered by the cabinet.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to amend the Criminal Code (unlawful assemblies).

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This bill is simply to provide a safeguarding clause to ensure that the general nature and character of speeches on public affairs shall be the ground for regarding any meeting as unlawful. In some of our cities recently there has been what seems to some of us an abuse of the law, whereby citizens have been prejudiced with regard to their utterances, while others who may have been listening have been declared to be members of an unlawful assembly; and this without any regard to the general character of the speeches made. This bill is merely to prevent that sort of thing in future.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

CIVIL GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Prime Minister): Pursuant to notice, and in accordance with our understanding, I move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair and that this house resolve itself into committee of supply.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. LaVergne in the chair.

Agriculture—contingencies, further amount required, $3,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This item represents the excess of expenditures over the appropriation for contingencies by the Department of Agriculture last year. It arises primarily because of over-expenditure in connection with delegations that went out of the country in relation to investigations into agricultural matters.

Mr. POWER: If it is not out of order at this stage, I would ask the Prime Minister to have the courtesy to bring down all the documents and correspondence and statements of accounts in connection with an item, No. 61, which will come up in the course of the afternoon's or evening's discussion. The item in question has reference to a governor general's warrant and deals with certain matters under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. BENNETT: I will see that it is done.

Mr. POWER: I am afraid it will be impossible to go on with the discussion unless the papers are down.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission — contingencies, further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is similar to a large number of items that will appear in these supplementary estimates. The custom grew up of carrying forward balances from one year to the other. A printing account of $25,000 at the end of last year was owing by the Civil Service Commission to the Department of Public Printing. When the estimates for the last year were made available it followed that when the balance of printing accounts for the preceding year was paid there remained just that much less money to take care of the business of the department. The result is that some $22,000 would ordinarily have been required, but owing to economies effected otherwise the amount called for to pay the balance due to the printing department to square the accounts of the commission is $20,000.

Mr. POWER: I do not know whether this is the proper time to discuss the Civil Service Commission, but I would ask the government whether it has arrived at any policy with respect to the abolition of that body. I have in my hand a report of a speech made on February 23, 1931, by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Gagnon). I will translate freely from the French. The hon. member is reported in a newspaper called Le Franc Parler, published in the city of Quebec under the auspices and with the imprimatur of the deputy speaker of the house.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That is the only controlling interest?

Mr. POWER: That question might be asked on the orders of the day and I have no doubt that the deputy speaker, in the non-partisan manner to which he is accustomed, would give a non-partisan reply. However, the hon. member for Dorchester says:

I denounce in my turn this commission. At the next caucus of the party—

I assume he refers to the Tory party in Ottawa—

—the matter will be brought up. The Hon. Mr. Sauvé lately complained about it and regretted that we Conservative members could not recompense the brave servants of our party. This law is a negation of the principle of responsible government.

May I say to the hon. member for Dorchester that he is not the first one to discover that? The article continues:

To-day a minister has no longer the right to name a messenger for his office or a chauffeur without passing by commissioners and by a commission and its employees amongst whom we find often imbeciles and venal persons. Our Quebec ministers—

This is important, and I would ask the attention of the Prime Minister—

—share my ideas and I am sure, I am certain that at the next session this law will be amended, if not abrogated.

An hon. MEMBER: Wait and see.
