Mr. Woolliams: Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not quite follow what you mean but I have always had a lot of respect for the Chair and am trying to stay within the rules. I do not think I am out of order in this regard. I am now coming to grips with the problem. As I pointed out at the outset of my remarks, the function of an official opposition is to check into the expenditures of government departments. One of the expenditures will provide for this committee and other matters in connection with the flag. If I might continue with my remarks, I was referring to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of today's date.

Mr. Fane: The editor is the Prime Minister's nephew.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes; as one hon. member says, the editor of the paper is the nephew of the Prime Minister. It is rather peculiar, Mr. Chairman, but on several other occasions the Ottawa Citizen has been able to publish reports concerning various matters and problems which are about to be reported to parliament prior to their actual report in the house.

Miss LaMarsh: Well at least it speaks the truth.

Mr. Woolliams: Now we have the minister of health speaking and we are always interested in what she has to say.

Miss LaMarsh: That is more than we can say of you.

An hon. Member: Remember the truth squad.

Mr. Woolliams: We all know she knows about the truth because she was the one who invented the truth squad during the last election; but the Prime Minister had to dissolve that truth squad because he was losing more votes than she could manufacture. However, I do not intend to be put off the rails by the minister of health. I was saying that it is peculiar that this newspaper is often able to report upon government business which should be disclosed in the house prior to its actual disclosure in the house. This disclosure is far more serious because the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra had given his solemn oath to that committee that he would disclose no facts found by the committee.

The Chairman: Order. I feel that at this stage I might be expected to make a comment as to whether or not the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River are relevant. I realize of course that discussion on interim supply is rather general in nature and is not, according to our practice, very easily restricted. But on the other hand, in the course of this particular debate the Chair has tried to bring to the attention of individual members the fact that speeches and remarks have to stay within the ambit of the administration of the government. That is to say, they must refer to government business. I have been following the hon. member's remarks to this point and they seem to me to relate to the conduct of an individual member of the house. I have strong reservations about whether at this particular stage of the debate these remarks can be considered relevant and proper to be discussed in committee of supply on the consideration of interim supply. The hon. member for Bow River might wish to keep that in mind.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Chairman; I appreciate the point you have raised. However, with great respect to the Chair, I would say that this is a serious matter of government business relating to how the government conducts its business. I submit there are past precedents for this. The terms of reference of a debate like this are that hon. members can talk on matters which are relevant to government business; and I am saying this is a matter of government business and I should like to proceed.

As I was saying, this hon. member had given his solemn promise, if not oath, to that particular committee that nothing would be—

The Chairman: Order. It is the feeling of the Chair that the subject matter of the hon. member's remarks deals specifically with the conduct of an individual member, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. It seems to me that this cannot be considered government business any more than the conduct of any other individual member could be considered to be within the ambit of the administration of government. I would strongly urge the hon. member to pass on to other considerations perhaps.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, in addition to referring to government business, there has been an infringement of the rights and privileges of parliament. Only the other day on interim supply we were discussing a problem which affected the Canadian National Railways. During the last two or three days we were discussing a problem concerning the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. On both occasions we were talking about the authority of parliament with respect to crown corporations.

We are now dealing with the authority of parliament with regard to the actions of a member on the government side which infringe on the rights and privileges of parliament itself. So far as we can judge the government has given its approval of this type of action on the part of one of its members. Surely this is a problem which should be discussed at this particular time; this is the most suitable period to raise the matter because on interim supply, as on all supply debates, grievances may be raised. This is a legitimate grievance regarding the action of an hon. member who was a member of the flag committee. I think the hon. member for Bow River is within his rights in raising this topic.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre refers to the fact that the privileges of this house have been infringed. This is possible. The Chair cannot, of course, dispute that in any way but machinery is provided to deal with that kind of situation through a substantive motion. Certainly in my view, however, this matter should not be discussed on interim supply because it concerns the personal conduct of an hon. member. In this regard perhaps it might be appropriate to refer the hon. member to citation 128 (1) of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which reads as follows:

A personal attack—

I realize this is not a personal attack in the sense of personalities, but it is personal in the sense that it is directed at one individual member.

—by one member upon another, is an offence against the house, in the person of one of its members, which, on account of the respect due from every member to the character and dignity of the house, as well as the importance of preserving regularity in the debates, calls for the prompt interference of the Speaker, in order that any irregularity, into which a member may have been betrayed in the warmth of debate, may be rectified—

And so on. That is the view of the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, may I speak before you make a ruling?

The Chairman: Yes, I would be pleased to hear the views of the hon. member on this subject before I make a ruling.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the fact that you have read a specific rule, but with the greatest respect I suggest that it is not applicable.

I am not going into detail this afternoon, but what I am attempting to discuss is this. We have a new kind of government: We now have government through newspapers. We are observing news leaks and government through those news leaks rather than by parliament. I suggest that the whole process of government is in question.

I am not making any personal attack at this moment on the member for Vancouver Quadra, but he happens to be one of the actors who has acted on behalf of and for the government. He is the man who allowed the news to leak out so that we could have government by newspapers rather than government by parliament.

Mr. Chairman, the rights and privileges of parliament are at stake, and the expenditure of money is at stake. Surely those matters are related to the matter under discussion this afternoon. This situation was only brought to our attention a few minutes before we came into the house this afternoon. I had some idea of the kind of motion I would move if I intended to make a personal attack, and that is something I may do tomorrow when we have more time; but today we are discussing the privileges of parliament itself.

The news item in question is nothing more than a new kind of process of Liberal government. It is government by the Prime Minister's nephew through the Ottawa Citizen. I submit that we have the right to debate this serious matter this afternoon. I can understand the attitude taken by the government in opposition to my suggestion. They adopt that attitude because they are frightened and do not want these facts disclosed to the Canadian people. The government wants to keep the opposition silent in this regard. We do not intend to be silent about this question. Of course I must respect your ruling, but if you rule against me, and I say this with respect, we may appeal your ruling. We have the right this afternoon to discuss this situation. It should be aired because it goes to the very foundation of this institution.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some observations in relation to the question now troubling you, and the point of order which has been raised in connection with a discussion of this matter.

It seems to me that there is no doubt whatsoever that we are in this committee to discuss the matter of interim supply for the next two months. We are being asked to supply funds to pay all the expenses of parliament and expenses related to committees of parliament. One parliamentary committee is now under discussion. The expenses of that committee will have to be paid by this parliament, and I say to you that if any member on any side of this house chooses to raise a point related to the matter now before this committee he has a perfect right to do so. If that discussion reflects upon the actions of a member of that committee, that is unfortunate, but it is not the point at issue. The point is that we are being asked to vote money to pay the expenses incurred by the flag committee, and we have as much right to discuss those expenses and the actions of that committee as we have to discuss the expenditure of any other moneys.

Mr. Nasserden: Mr. Chairman, in relation to the question now before us, I believe on more than one occasion during the debate on interim supply members of the cabinet, and particularly the President of the Privy Council, have risen to indicate that the time for opposition members, or members on the government side, to air any grievances they have regarding the conduct of the affairs of this nation is during the debate on interim supply. That being the case, I cannot understand how one could possibly suggest that the hon. member for Bow River has been out of order this afternoon.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, at first glance the thought you expressed seems to carry considerable support. However, one knows what happens with some frequency in the law courts during the course of an argument. A lawyer may find the judge in disagreement with his position, but as he continues to argue his case changes take place in the thinking of the judge. I am sure Your Honour is well aware of that fact, because of your experience. I was very much impressed, as I expect you were, by the argument advanced by one whose experience in parliamentary life has been lengthy. One of the ways by which rules are discussed is by assistance given in interpreting those rules. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, former premier of his province, raised a point which I submit is one that deserves Your Honour's fullest consideration.

A committee of parliament is set up for a specific purpose. The committee now under discussion was set up for a specific purpose. It went off to the country and apparently sought strength by looking out at the hills. All these things cost money. Professional witnesses in heraldry and the like were called, and their expenses must be paid. That being so, those expenses are the proper subject of scrutiny by parliament. That is exactly what the hon. member for Bow River was endeavouring to do. He was attempting to ascertain whether those expenditures were in keeping with parliament procedure, and I ask Your Honour to give the fullest possible consideration to this matter so that no one will be able to suggest that parliament does not have the right to examine expenditures, however small they are as compared with larger ones.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer a few brief words on this point of order. I think there must be general agreement with the concluding portion of what the Leader of the Opposition has said. I assume that the expenses of the flag committee are covered in the legislative items, or somewhere in an item a portion of which we are now voting. Therefore if one were merely arguing that we have the right to discuss what that committee did, that argument would be difficult to deny.

However, as I understand the situation, Your Honour is not concerned with the fact that an hon. member is discussing what the flag committee did, but rather with the fact that he is discussing something which took place entirely outside the flag committee, indeed outside the house, namely the publication of an article in a newspaper. I did not understand that Your Honour was trying to cut off a discussion about the flag or the flag committee. However, if an offence against the House of Commons has been committed by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra—

Mr. Churchill: Why do you say "if"? Do you not think he has committed an offence?

Mr. Knowles: I certainly think he was stupid. I also found it quite annoying to watch television last night and hear a member of this house state, before a report had been made to the house, that there were certain things in it he would not accept. I suppose the Leader of the Opposition has the right to be arrogant on television and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra has the right to be stupid—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: —but we also have the right to expect the rules of the house to be observed.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you think there were others involved besides the hon. member?

Mr. Knowles: I doubt it. I do not know, but I think it is the kind of stupid thing that a person does all on his own. But, Mr. Chairman, surely if an offence has been committed against the house, that is for the house to deal with. It is not an offence against the committee of supply. Therefore I submit Your Honour is right in asking the hon. member for Bow River not to bring into the committee of supply the question of what an individual has done which may be an offence against the house.

I agree with the Leader of the Opposition and with the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton that we are discussing the expenditure of money and I believe it is the case that some of that money is for the expenditures of the flag committee. All right, we can discuss what went on in the flag committee; but to discuss in committee of supply what an individual has done outside the house is a different story. While I do not presume to define what Your Honour is trying to rule on, it has been my understanding that it is that narrow aspect of the matter on which you have been trying to make a ruling.

Mr. Thomas: Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to Beauchesne, fourth edition, citation 119, paragraph 2:

> In parliament every corner of the country is represented and no rule should silence elected representatives when they think they have a message to deliver. Freedom of speech is a sacred principle and if there is a place where it should be fully respected that place is the parliament of the nation, and it is the Speaker's responsibility to see that this principle is not infringed upon.

Paragraph 3 reads as follows:

> Relevancy is not easy to define. A wrong comprehension of it may have a serious effect on the freedom of speech. Members are often deprived of their right to speak on the pretext that their remarks are irrelevant when as a matter of fact they refer to matters perhaps remote but yet related, even indirectly, to the question under debate. In borderline cases the members should be given the benefit of the doubt. A great deal of latitude must be allowed in the House of Commons which is a forum where every phase of public affairs can be discussed and every member has the right to be heard, even if in doing so he sometimes disregards the rigidity of procedure.

[Translation]

Mr. Frenette: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank you for giving hon. members the opportunity to express their opinion on the rules of relevancy you would have the committee follow.

Obviously, I am not an authority on parliamentary procedure, but in view of the reputation enjoyed by the parliament of Canada among the public, I feel it is imperative for us to proceed in an orderly fashion and for the Chair to be recognized as the proper authority concerning our proceedings.

In my opinion, it is unthinkable that every time you seek to restrict an hon. member to the matter under consideration, the member in question should rise to argue with you and then keep on with his remarks as if nothing had happened.

I am of the opinion that the authority of the Chair must be respected by all members, and we now have a golden opportunity to prove, not only our maturity, but also our intention to work in the interest of the Canadian people.

I agree wholeheartedly with your decision.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak on the same subject—

The Chairman: Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. Rondeau: No, Mr. Chairman.

[Text]

The Chairman: The point raised has been well discussed and well aired, and perhaps the result of the discussion would seem to indicate that the Chair was on the right track from the start. However, at this point I should not like to make a general ruling, and the ruling that the Chair was attempting to make or was suggesting to the hon. member was that his remarks should not be directed to the conduct of an hon. member individually. I am sure he will want to abide by this ruling of the Chair.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I think I can come within the terms of your ruling in this way. I want to ask this question. Was the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra—I am not talking about him personally—a front for the government?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Woolliams: Government members say no. We would like to hear them on that point. Were government members getting leaks from the committee during the course of the committee's sittings?

Mr. Deachman: On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, today I indicated very clearly to Mr. Speaker in the house that I had not been in contact with anyone in connection with this matter, and the story which I prepared I prepared myself and I released it to the press for publication after the house had opened.

Mr. Churchill: Nonsense.

Mr. Deachman: It was given to the press only after the committee had concluded its hearings.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I would suggest that we might allow the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra to state his question of privilege very briefly, and I will allow the hon. member for Bow River to state his point of order briefly.

Mr. Deachman: I am accused by the hon. member of being a front for other people, of having been in connivance and collusion with other people in connection with the story. I want to repeat again what I said to Mr. Speaker in the house today, that I wrote the story myself, that I did so without getting in touch with any other members of the committee at any time and at no time did I have anything to do with anyone connected with the committee, with parliament or with the Prime Minister's office in connection with the story.

An hon. Member: How much did you get paid for it?

The Chairman: Order. In my opinion there is no question of privilege, but a denial of a statement by the hon. member for Bow River. To my mind both the denial and the statement are out of order because they involve a discussion of the private conduct of an hon. member which should not be a subject of discussion in committee of supply at this stage.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I never made any charge against the hon. member. I asked a question of the government and that is what makes my remarks relevant and within the terms of your ruling. I will proceed to ask the question again. Was the hon. member a front? Was he in communication with cabinet ministers while the committee was sitting? Was the hon. member getting his inspiration from the government in this regard?

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member said he is not making a charge, and I cannot deny that, but he is certainly making an insinuation. The Chair tries to stay out of the debate if at all possible, but certainly the hon. member would seem to be going against the spirit of the ruling of the Chair by using those words.

Mr. Woolliams: Maybe the answer to the whole question I have raised can be found by looking closely at the article itself, which deals with what was discussed in the flag committee. At the beginning of the article it says:

The Commons flag committee has completed its six-weeks task and this afternoon submitted its findings to the house.

One of its Liberal members, Grant Deachman, reveals in this frank report how the committee worked and arrived at its final decision.

Without any reservations whatsoever we know the hon. member disclosed the facts of the committee, the evidence of the committee, the report of the committee before the chairman of that committee could disclose those facts by a report filed in the House of Commons.

There were leaks throughout the time this flag committee was operating. Where did they come from? Did they come from the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, or from other members that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra talked to—and I am talking about Liberal members? We have just to take a look at what he said is the inside story. He said he wrote this a little time after the committee had made out its report. It is a strange thing. He may be speedy on a typewriter, or he may be a speedy writer, but he whirled out practically everything the committee had done a few minutes after the committee made its decision—

The Chairman: I suggest the hon. member is discussing the very matters which the Chair has ruled are not relevant in the discussion on interim supply.

Mr. Woolliams: I take it you are ruling the facts I have been setting out in this debate are out of order, and I would like to appeal your ruling.

The Chairman: I am sure the hon. member realizes the position of the Chair. The Chair has suggested to the hon. member that he cannot discuss the personal conduct of another hon. member, and I am sure the hon. member for Bow River recognizes this ruling. Any comments that he makes which seem to infringe against that rule cannot be allowed to pass without the hon. member being called to order.

Mr. Woolliams: Sir, with the greatest respect to you, I have been in this house since 1958 and I have never asked to appeal any chairman's or Speaker's ruling, but this afternoon I ask to appeal your ruling in this regard so that I can continue my remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman—

Division

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Bow River appeals from the Chair's ruling. The hon. member for Villeneuve may have the floor after report has been made.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker resumed the chair and put the question as follows:

In committee of supply when a vote to provide for interim supply was being considered the Chair ruled that a discussion on the actions of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra in connection with the flag committee was not in order. Whereupon the hon. member for Bow River appealed to the house from the ruling of the Chair.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the chairman be confirmed?

And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

Mr. Brown: Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted to confirm the chairman's ruling.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Speaker, I was paired; otherwise I would have voted in favour of your ruling.

[Text]

Mr. McLean (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I was paired. Had I voted I would have voted to confirm the chairman's ruling.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, in view of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was calling on the pairs. I have to announce the result of the vote, and I declare the ruling confirmed.

And the house having resumed in committee:

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I had a question of privilege while you were in the chair.

Mr. Monteith: So they are breaking all the rules again.

The Chairman: Order. My understanding of the rules is that the chairman was in the Chair as the Speaker only for the purpose of the appeal from the ruling of the chairman. There was nothing before the house so that the Chairman must resume the chair in committee of supply.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman—and you are the chairman now—I would say this. I had a question of privilege to raise while you were in the chair, and under the rules a question of privilege must be made at the soonest possible moment. This has been denied by your walking away from the Chair.

The Chairman: I would suggest to the hon. member, and I respect his experience, that the way to do this would be to ask that the committee rise, and when the Speaker is in the Chair at that moment raise his question of privilege. But certainly there is nothing for the Chair to do at this point except to resume committee of supply.

Mr. Churchill: The committee had risen and reported progress, Mr. Chairman, and the Speaker was in the chair.

The Chairman: I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that the committee had not risen and reported progress.

Mr. Churchill: Then how could the Speaker be in the chair if the committee of the whole house was still in session? That is impossible.

The Chairman: I do not pretend this comes from me but I am advised by the table that this is governed by standing order 59 (4) and is the standing practice. In any event, the chairman never reports progress when going into the chair on an appeal to the house. The hon. member for Bow River has the floor now.

Mr. Woolliams: Then I will raise this question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, while you are in the chair as chairman. In view of the question of privilege which was raised this afternoon while the Speaker was in the chair, I would move this motion. In view of the breach of privilege of this house by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra by disclosing certain facts in the report of the flag committee to a newspaper before the same report was filed in the house, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre:

> That the action of the hon. member be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections to take such action in reference to the said member as may be necessary.

The Chairman: Perhaps the hon. member realizes the situation, since he was rather anxious that the chairman of the committee remain in the chair. The ruling of the Chair must be that the time to raise this question of privilege would be with the Speaker in the chair, and the way to do this would be to move that the committee adjourn. If that motion were carried the Speaker would be in the chair and the question of privilege could then be raised. The hon. member knows that under standing order 59 (2) the committee is bound by its terms of reference, and the terms of reference of the committee certainly do not include a question of privilege such as this. Therefore I would have to rule that the question of privilege cannot be entertained at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I say this. I as a member, and I am sure this party as a whole, would not want to delay this committee on a matter of procedure, so I will make this motion at the first opportunity when the Speaker is in the chair.

The Chairman: The Chair appreciates the co-operation of the hon. member.

Mr. Woolliams: Now, Mr. Chairman, if I understand your ruling I cannot discuss at this time the actions of the individual himself regarding his disclosure to the press of certain facts with reference to the flag committee. I should now like to change the tone of the discussion for a few moments. When the flag committee sat, it sat in camera. What took place at the meetings of that committee should be known only to those members and not disclosed outside that committee by an individual member, whom I will not name at this time. What has taken place is extremely improper and may jeopardize all future committees. It was agreed by that committee that not only would it sit in camera but that any report to be made of its proceedings would be made by the chairman of the committee rather than by individual members. The failure of a member to live and abide by that committee's procedures and rules is a violation of the rules of the committee. If we allow that improper procedure to go unnoticed, then individual members or groups of members of future committees will be able to make statements to newspapers before the committee has made its report to the House of Commons, and therefore any approach—

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member must realize that the decision he now is faced with is no longer a simple ruling of the chairman but a decision of the House of Commons. I ask the hon. member to respect that decision.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the fact you are now suggesting that I cannot discuss any aspect of this matter I will abide by your ruling and resume my place.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: I shall be very brief, Mr. Chairman, because I would not want the passage of interim supply to be delayed indefinitely. There are three clear and simple points I wish to bring to the attention of the government.

Here is the first one. The government should undertake to eliminate slums in our cities through a well-defined program and, with the co-operation of the provinces, to renovate the blighted areas in our cities, following agreements with town planning councils, so that once the program is fully carried out, everything would look wonderful.

Blighted and unhealthy areas such as those exist in Quebec and Montreal. But those homes should also be given all the comfort required: enough room, good lighting, easy maintenance, sufficient space in which to put the car and also for the children to play.

Rents should be truly reasonable and within the means of small wage earners because until now the government has never considered such a program. Instead, it has used poultices to meet the needs and has built so-called low rental units but you should see what they call low rents.

Such a housing project called Les patios has been carried out in my riding under that federal legislation; they have the crust to ask $85 a month and over for rent. The units are badly built so that they are exceedingly warm in summer and very cold in winter.

A special credit provided by the Bank of Canada at very low interest rates—equivalent to service costs—should be made available for the rehabilitation of the blighted areas in our cities. That would get the provinces and municipalities interested in the restoration of such areas.

We could, in this fashion, relieve the distress and poverty which exist even in this 20th century. We would, at the same time, be helping the aged with small incomes and those workers who fail to adapt themselves to present day conditions either because they are too young to retire or too old to be classified as readaptable in the labour market.

By rebuilding certain parts of our cities, we would develop the labour market and, by so doing, reduce unemployment, all the while using our materials which abound in this great Canada of ours.

The second point I should like to bring to the attention of this committee is the urgent matter of railway crossings in the old Quebec capital. It is a continuous hazard for car drivers and for all the people of that city and I think that in that regard, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) would only have to refer to the remarks of my hon. colleague from Quebec East (Mr. Beaulé) to ascertain how easy it would be to carry out such a change.

I take this opportunity to read into the record a request which came to me from the Quebec and district labour council. A copy was sent to the Minister of Transport, the mayor of Quebec city, the Speaker of the Senate, hon. members for Quebec South (Mr. Cantin), Quebec East, Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux), myself and also to the presidents of the C.N.R. and the C.P.R.

Sir,

The purpose of this letter is to inform you of a resolution passed by our council at its last regular meeting.

The object of the said resolution is to protest against the many grade crossings existing in the old capital city. We believe that such a situation is indeed an unnecessary shortcoming and that it represents a continuous hazard for the car drivers and the whole people of Quebec city.

The whole matter is submitted to your attention and in advance, we thank you for all you could do to remedy such a deplorable situation.

Yours very truly,

The Quebec and District Labour Council
by Thérèse Belleau corresponding secretary

The third point I wish to raise in this house, concerns the Minister of Transport and has to do with the Quebec piloting office.

For many years those workers have been called upon to work overtime for which they are paid one month and a half later. But this year many employees are complaining that they have not yet received their salaries for overtime done in June and which should have been paid on August 15, overtime done in July which should have been paid on September 15 and overtime done in August which should have been paid on October 15.

I would like to ask the Minister of Transport to give us the reasons for and cause of this delay in paying overtime. Does it mean that the department has no money available to pay its employees? This is apparently not the case, since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) told us on many occasions that the country was in a very healthy financial situation.

Mr. Stefanson: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speakers from all sides of this house who have taken part in the debate on interim supply, and particularly to those who have dealt with the operations and policies of the C.B.C. At the present time we are being asked to vote $740 million to carry forward the government's program for the next two months. That is a large sum of money. At the end of the period for which we are being asked to vote this money, the government will have operated through interim supply for a period of nine months. There is an indication now that it does not believe the session will conclude before the end of this year. That is a clear indication of bungling inefficiency. This session has now become the longest on record. The government should not be proud of that fact, because its achievements are few.

Mr. Byrne: Tory filibustering.

Mr. Stefanson: That is an example of the usual contribution of the hon. member for Kootenay East. All he ever does is make the odd interruption from his seat.

Mr. Byrne: Not always.

Mr. Stefanson: There has been criticism from members on all sides of the house about some of the programs produced and sponsored by the C.B.C. To listen to the hon. member for Halifax who spoke the other night one would think that anybody who criticizes or raises any complaint against the C.B.C. is committing a sin. It appears to me that members like him have attempted to set up the C.B.C. as some sort of sacred cow against which no one must breathe a word of criticism at any time.

Mr. Nesbitt: A goldplated sacred cow.

Mr. Stefanson: During the past few weeks several members have questioned certain actions by the C.B.C. involving certain programs and also the allotment of free time to various political parties. I feel these are valid complaints and in my opinion they are not an attempt to interfere with the C.B.C. During the past few weeks members of parliament, and no doubt the management of the C.B.C., have received complaints about the caliber of certain programs, especially the effect they may have on morality. Those in charge of programming always point out that you cannot please everyone, that what some people object to other people approve. This is quite true. However, I would hope that the management of the C.B.C. would take heed of these complaints.

Several members have expressed the view that there is a need for controversial programming. This may be true. However, I would think that a program such as the C.B.C. presented last Sunday night when they interviewed the American nazi, Mr. Rockwell, is the type of program they should refrain from producing. I do not believe that the people of Canada favour spending the taxpayer's money on such programs. Several members have discussed programs and have offered some criticism while others have discussed the administration and financing of the C.B.C.

Parliament is being asked to grant a sum of money in the neighbourhood of $88 million to enable the corporation to carry on for the current year. The amount required from parliament for the corporation to carry on becomes increasingly larger each year. This is something which should be scrutinized and checked by parliament. It is true that the officials of the corporation appeared before the public accounts committee in July of this year. In that regard I would point out that on June 18 a motion was moved and passed in the committee in these terms:

> That the public accounts committee call officials of the C.B.C. before the committee in order to examine into the accounts of the corporation including the extent to which the recommendations of the Auditor General and the Glassco commission have been implemented.

At that time the chairman of the committee added these words:

> We should add to that the fact that we are engaged in dealing with the Auditor General's report on the public accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1962, and March 31, 1963. This gives us a framework for our inquiry which is, in this particular instance, not a broadcasting inquiry but an inquiry into the financial and organizational aspects of the C.B.C. within the framework of these terms of reference.

From this one can see that the terms of reference were quite limited. They allowed for discussion of the 1962-63 annual report of the corporation, but this report deals only with finished business. It would have been much more beneficial and much more interesting if we could have dealt with current business. Many members have suggested that the government should appoint a special committee to look into all aspects of the operations of the C.B.C. I support these suggestions and urge the government to appoint such a committee at an early date.

It has been pointed out that the C.B.C. was originally established by the government headed by the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. The C.B.C. is at present under severe criticism and there are some signs that there may have been government interference. Examples of this are found in the incident when the Minister of Transport seemed to force his way into appearing on television last summer and also in the handling of the so-called "Mr. Pearson" film. These things have left doubts in the minds of Canadians about the independence of the C.B.C. and are further reasons why a special committee on broadcasting should be set up. The hon. member for Cartier also raised the question of the legality of producing a certain program, and this too should be clarified.

I believe that the record of the C.B.C. over the years is good. However, I wish to point out that in my opinion the C.B.C., with its radio and television networks, is the most powerful instrument in Canada and if it is misused it can be used to make or break individuals. I trust that the management of the corporation will at all times be free from political interference and will live up to the aims and objectives originally laid down.

The hon. member for Churchill spoke about the need for an extension of service. He referred to the need for the extension of both radio and television services to cover the northland. I also wish to say a few words about the need for extension of service. I represent a riding which is in the centre of Manitoba and right in the heart of Canada. Many people in the area I represent either have no television reception or receive it on a hit or miss basis.

Over the years I have received many petitions and letters requesting improved television service for the people of the interlake area. I have pleaded with C.B.C. officials to take action to provide this service. I believe that one of the aims and objectives of the C.B.C. is to make radio and television service available to all Canadians. I must confess I am disappointed that a greater effort has not been made in this regard. The hon. member for Churchill pointed out that in 1961, after the committee on broadcasting had met, we were led to believe that within three years 98 per cent of the population of Canada would have these services available. However, on reading the annual report of the C.B.C. for 1964-65 it would now appear that it may take 10 years to provide these services. This is not fair to the people concerned. The hon. member for Churchill made out a strong case for the people he represents and pointed out that at least 50 per cent of these people have no television service whatsoever while the other 50 per cent only have canned television.

Since I became a member of the house in 1958 I have made representations to the various ministers to whom the C.B.C. has reported and to officials of the C.B.C. about the situation with regard to television reception in the interlake area. I want to review very briefly the history of the C.B.C. television station in Winnipeg. CBWT, Winnipeg, began operations in May, 1954, on channel 4 with an antenna height of 192 feet. A height limitation was imposed because of the proximity of the tower, which was right on Portage avenue, to the Winnipeg airport. At the time channel 4 was assigned to Winnipeg by the Department of Transport it was the best channel available with maximum fringe area coverage.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock, in order to permit the house to consider private members' business it is my duty to leave the chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES BY PROVINCES

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe) moved:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the report prepared by officials of the Department of Finance concerning federal expenditures in each of the provinces of Canada.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, at this time, we are discussing, or rather asking for the tabling of papers by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon). Unfortunately I notice that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) is not in his seat nor is his parliamentary secretary.

Yet, we are dealing with the tabling of papers concerning them and I am surprised that neither of them is here, especially as I have evidence which will show how very important it is that these papers should be produced.

As you will remember, on Friday, August 7 last, I mentioned in this house figures on the amount of taxes of all kinds the province of Quebec would be paying and what it would be getting in return, compared with the other provinces. Those figures seem to have stirred the interest of all members, since they were referred to afterwards by a large number of members and ministers and became the subject of more than one debate. So meaningful were the figures I quoted that the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) even though fit to put forward his views and, as can be seen on page 6532 of Hansard, in the left column, he said:

I know that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) will in due time set the record straight and that the experts of his department will give us exact figures in keeping with the facts, which will definitely prove that the province of Quebec has, and will always have, everything to gain by remaining within confederation.

These figures were to be given us by the Minister of Finance.

The words I referred to were from the hon. member for Lotbinière.

We asked for that report and we are still waiting for it.

Further on, same page, same column, with regard to the figures I had quoted on the amounts collected in taxes, or taxes paid by Quebec to Ottawa, and on what Ottawa could give in return to Quebec from those taxes, the hon. member for Lotbinière, because so many hon. members had been shocked by those figures, saw fit to add these words:

I say that those figures are wrong—

And if the hon. member for Lotbinière stated that those figures were wrong, it was because he found them shocking, as indeed they were.

He went on:

I say that those figures are wrong, and that in due time, the Minister of Finance will reveal the true situation, as regards the taxes collected by the federal government in the province of Quebec and the redistribution of those taxes in that province.

Well, the Minister of Finance did not provide us with those documents. He announced in his speech of August 7, 1964—he thought it fit to speak about it himself—that experts of his department were making an inquiry, compiling reports and would provide the house with those papers.

Three weeks ago, a paper stated those figures would not be published because that could lead to a sort of revolt among the people of Quebec, as the figures were so prejudicial to the province of Quebec. They were not made known to us and that is why we move today this motion for papers.

We ask the Minister of Finance to bring in the report of his experts, and to bring in those documents on the amount of taxes collected in each province and the amount given back by Ottawa to each province. The Minister of Finance has this information but he refuses to give it to us.

Now, all the figures we can quote can only bear out what we have been saying from time to time to the effect that in this confederation at the present time some provinces are neglected in comparison with others.

Just recently we discussed the Department of Trade and Commerce estimates. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) had published his estimates in which I found something really amazing.

The Department of Trade and Commerce is one of the most important departments and, on a total budget of $83,037,540 for the year 1964-65 as can be seen at the bottom of page 436 of the bluebook for the year ending March 31, 1965:

Special: Payment of carrying costs of temporary wheat reserves and payments in connection with the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act; total, $46,700,000.

Out of total estimates of $83,037,000, the Department of Trade and Commerce spends $46,700,000, that is nearly 55 per cent, in the three western provinces only.

I have no objection to their receiving $46 million to assist western wheat producers, but when an equal share is not given to farmers or producers of other goods in the province of Quebec, when the Department of Trade and Commerce does not assist the other provinces, but only these three small provinces, while the other provinces pay just as much in taxes, then I have an objection.

If the Minister of Finance will not quote figures, while we quote some, then he has no right to state, as he did on August 7 last, that our figures are wrong and that we quote erroneous figures.

I can see that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is in his seat. It is a fact that out of $83 million spent by his department, $46 million are earmarked for the wheat item for the three prairie provinces.

Why not appropriate a further amount for agriculture in eastern Canada, in the maritime provinces, in the province of Quebec, in the province of Ontario?

I already quoted figures on November 12, 1963. On August 7 we were dealing with the figures provided by Mr. K. W. Taylor, and yet the Minister of Finance said that these figures were erroneous. Today I am quoting figures included in the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

On November 12, 1963, as reported on page 4636 of Hansard, in the left-hand column, I started referring to all the reports of the various departments, agencies, and crown corporations. With supporting figures, I showed what Quebec was getting per capita in comparison with the other provinces. For the Department of Forestry, I mentioned for instance the annual report of this department for 1962. We were then in 1963, and I pointed out that out of a total amount of $11 million paid by the federal government with respect to forest surveys and reforestation the province of Quebec received nothing.

In the field of forest fire protection, Quebec received $1,200,000 out of a total of $8,123,000, or less than 18 per cent of the total amount of the grants.

I was also mentioning Quebec's share of the loans granted by the Farm Credit Corporation and I was saying that, at that time, Saskatchewan was getting over 16 times the number of loans granted in the province of Quebec, and Alberta nine times more than Quebec.

On that same date I mentioned the expenditures of the Post Office Department and by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the field of hospital insurance.

I also dealt with the report entitled "Technical and Vocational Education in Canada", and I pointed out that Quebec had received at that time only $25 million compared to Ontario's $200 million.

I was quoting a series of reports. In fact, they practically covered four pages of Hansard, with figures showing that in every field Quebec was not getting its share, except in the field of unemployment insurance, and that is because there is more unemployment in that province at the present time.

After quoting all those figures or reports from various departments or crown corporations, we were told that we would be supplied with the real figures.

On August 7, 1964, we again asked for some explanation about the inadequate distribution of federal expenditures throughout the country or in every province. We quoted once again figures provided by a federal civil servant. At that time many Liberal members rose to say that our figures were incorrect; some even said that the Minister of Finance would supply the correct statistics.

We are now asking the Minister of Finance to supply them, since he stated that for the past several months his departmental experts were preparing a report containing all those figures. This report is now ready. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance said himself that he had a copy in his office.

When the question of this report was brought up, the Minister of Finance being absent from the house, another minister declared that the report was ready but that it had not been submitted to the cabinet. This was three weeks ago, and we would like to see that report, for we are entitled to those figures inasmuch as they will indicate clearly what this confederation represents to each province, what the Ottawa administration is, in short, just how favours are distributed, if the expression may be used, between the federal government and the various provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) objects to the use of the word favour. But when the minister or the officials of a department allot 55 per cent of a budget to the storage or payment of grain in three provinces, leaving only 45 per cent to the other seven provinces, of which two are the most heavily populated in Canada, I say favours are granted to certain provinces as compared with the others.

I repeat that we are not opposed to these three provinces receiving $46 million, as long as the other provinces also receive a reasonable share, a portion of what they are entitled to.

Mr. Speaker, if these figures were given to the people, if the Department of Finance disclosed the true situation in that field, that is if it published what each province pays in income tax, sales tax, succession duties, indirect taxes, etc., and how much the federal government has spent in each province, then the federal government would perhaps make a self-examination and say: Perhaps there has been poor administration and maybe the provinces complaining about confederation have a right to do so.

When those figures are published, it will be possible to detect past mistakes and then attempts could be made to rectify them and to improve the allocation of taxes and funds paid by Canadian taxpayers. Then the people might have a different reaction about confederation.

Mr. Speaker, those figures exist. We think that they should be provided, and this is the reason why we have introduced the motion under consideration.

The Department of Finance should not be ashamed to publish those figures. If they are to the advantage of Quebec or another province, then the necessary steps could be taken to improve the situation or to set the facts straight as soon as these facts are known. But as long as we do not receive these figures from the Department of Finance, we shall continue to declare that the ones which we quoted on November 12, 1963, as is evidenced by Hansard of that date, as well as those we read into Hansard on August 7 last, and as long as the Minister of Finance will not bring forth the report of his experts, we shall keep maintaining that the figures we quoted are accurate and must be accepted as such.

The figures we submitted establish beyond any doubt that the province of Quebec is paying in taxes over $600 million more than it is receiving, while other provinces draw up to $300 million more than what they are paying in taxes.

Mr. Speaker, some members doubted our figures were correct. The Minister of Finance was so astonished by those figures that he has seen fit to have an inquiry made and a report prepared by the experts of his department. That report is now completed and we ask that it be tabled. We are making that request with no ill intent, but because we feel that, when those figures are known, the Minister of Finance will feel even more compelled to correct the situation, which could only benefit the whole country.

[Text]

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): In rising to reply to the hon. member for Lapointe may I respectfully suggest that the hon. member dealt with the issue set forth in the motion in a somewhat distant and indifferent manner. I would suggest also that it would be profitable to look at the exchange which took place between myself and the hon. member for Lapointe when he moved his motion yesterday as reported at page 9515 of Hansard. The hon. member moved:

> That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the report prepared by officials of the Department of Finance concerning federal expenditures in each of the provinces of Canada.

To this, I replied as follows:

> I should say that there is no such report as suggested in the motion. At the same time I should add that work has been done by the officials and is continuing to provide information for the minister with which to answer the large number of questions which have been asked on this subject matter. In view of the circumstances I would respectfully invite the hon. member to withdraw the motion.

Then the hon. member for Lapointe replied, in turn:

> Mr. Speaker, the report we would like to have tabled is the one which the Minister of Finance promised October 7 last when he denied certain figures mentioned in the motion. We believe the Minister of Finance could at least table what he promised us on October 7 last.

My answer to that was as follows:

> I am not aware of the precise answer given by the minister but I respectfully suggest that the hon. member put his question upon the order paper and I undertake to see that it is given attention.

This offer was rejected by the hon. member for Lapointe, who went on to say that these were not privileged documents and that the Minister of Finance had undertaken to communicate this material to the house at an appropriate time. The hon. member added:

> If those documents are too incriminating for the government, let him say so.

I replied with respect to that observation:

> I do not want to enter into a debate with the hon. member but I cannot accept the suggestion that there is anything compromising in the position of the Minister of Finance.

It seems to me that this motion arises out of a misunderstanding, an honest misunderstanding, on the part of the hon. member of what the Minister of Finance said during the debate on August 7 last. The Minister of Finance did not undertake to table any official report. What he did say to the house was that he was preparing answers to the many questions which had been raised on the subject of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. In the course of a debate in which the hon. member for Lapointe played a conspicuous part, my minister said this would mean a great deal of work for the department but they were persisting in their efforts and would table the information.

In the interest of precision may I put on record the exact words used by the Minister of Finance during the debate on August 7? I now refer to page 6552 of Hansard for that date. My hon. friend said:

> There is one other point on which I would ask the house to bear with me if I reply to it in detail. It is in connection with the figures which were read into the record last night by the hon. member—

Then, later, in the course of the same debate, the minister made these remarks, as reported at page 6554. Again I quote:

> The Department of Finance has made a detailed study of the expenditures and finds it can allocate approximately 40 per cent of gross federal expenditures to provinces by residence of recipient. This includes social security payments made directly to individuals, and various payments made to provincial governments and provincial institutions. Another 16 per cent of our expenditures can be roughly allocated by provinces on the basis of the location of the works on which they are spent or the service which they are spent or the service which they are used to provide. When these are eliminated this leaves about 44 per cent of the gross expenditures for items which cannot be said to be paid for the benefit of people in any particular province, and these can only be distributed arbitrarily, for example, on the basis of population.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the very nub of the point raised by the hon. member for Lapointe. I quote again from the remarks of the Minister of Finance as reported on page 6554 of Hansard for August 7:

> Time has only permitted the department to make a detailed study of this nature for the year 1961-62. We shall provide the details of these figures in answer to the questions to which I have referred.

I have read and reread the statement of the Minister of Finance during the debate on August 7, and nowhere can I find an undertaking by the Minister of Finance that he would put a parliamentary report before this house on matters relating to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member agree to my putting on the record another statement from the same speech of the Minister of Finance which he has not quoted and which it is important should be quoted for the record? Would the hon. member accept another quotation—just five lines—from the same speech of the minister on the same day. He said:

[Translation]

> The Department of Finance endeavoured to allocate fairly as much as it could of the federal revenues, by provinces, for the year 1961-62. This endeavour has been taking place over the last several months. I may say the departmental officials have been struggling with this problem for quite some time.

It is in that speech that the Minister of Finance said that for several months the officials of his department have been making an analysis and a distribution of federal receipts and expenditures amongst the provinces.

It is the report of that work carried out by the experts of the Department of Finance to which the minister referred in his speech that we would like to have tabled in the house today.

[Text]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, may I say that the quotation read by the hon. member does not disturb one bit the position I have taken on this matter; and again I point out that no reference is made by the minister to the fact that he would table any parliamentary report or reports such as this.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I never suggested that the Minister of Finance would table such a report. I said that such a report does exist, since the Minister of Finance himself referred to it in his speech of August 7.

I think the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance should not distort my remarks. I never suggested that the Minister of Finance had undertaken to table that report, but that he had said that such a report did exist and that it would be tabled. That is a different thing.

[Text]

Mr. Pennell: I beg to differ with the hon. member for Lapointe and would refer to the precise words he used on October 28, yesterday, when he said, as reported at page 9515 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, the report we would like to have tabled is the one which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) promised October 7—

That is a direct allegation in the house that the Minister of Finance had promised such a report. As I said, I have read and reread the statement the Minister of Finance made on that occasion, and nowhere did he undertake or promise to the house that he would table a parliamentary report on this subject. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say that the position of the government has at all times been consistent on this matter. I might say that the hon. member for Lapointe was neither the first nor the foremost member of this house to raise this question because the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) brought this matter to the attention of the house a few days ago. At that time the question was dealt with by the Acting Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). This occurred on October 9 and the passage is to be found at page 8918 of Hansard. At that time the Acting Minister of Finance, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, informed the house that a study was being undertaken by the department in order to answer a large number of questions that had been placed on the order paper. In the course of his remarks he stated:

> Mr. Speaker, the question is extremely complicated, and perhaps it would assist the house if I mentioned, for example, that one has to distribute sales tax collected at factories throughout all parts of the country. It would not be fair to say that all the sales tax collected at the factory in province A was paid by the consumers in province A; nor, for the same reason, would customs duties collected, for example, in the port of Montreal be properly attributed as revenues attributable to the province of Quebec, because those customs duties of course are paid by all Canadian consumers of those goods which pass through the port of Montreal. This is the nature of the problem; it is extremely complicated. The Minister of Finance has not seen any figures that have taken into account this redistribution of revenues collected at particular points.

At that time the Acting Minister of Finance indicated that every effort was being made to answer these questions on the order paper. I invite the attention of the hon. member for Lapointe to the fact that only yesterday we tabled an answer to question No. 1,755; a very extensive answer to a very pressing question, which answer covered a large part of the information being sought by the hon. member for Lapointe.

I want to assure the hon. member that I am not indifferent or inconsiderate to his desire to obtain information on this very important and interesting subject to all Canadians. Yesterday I invited the hon. member to put his question on the order paper and said we would make every endeavour to deal with it expeditiously. Apparently the hon. member for Lapointe is not interested in asking specific questions and prefers to rely on figures, as he said today, that he has given in Hansard and which have been demonstrated to be inadequate, and therefore misleading. As a responsible member of the house I can only assume that the hon. member for Lapointe accepts responsibility for relying on those inadequate figures. But, Mr. Speaker, I would go back—

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance claims that on several occasions he had asked me to put questions on the order paper in that connection. I must point out that the first time he mentioned that to me was yesterday, and he did so at a time when notices of motions for production of papers were already in the hands of the order paper editors and accepted for consideration today.

He should not say that he suggested several times that I put questions on the order paper.

I might add that replies to questions put on the order paper are always very vague. I know, because I asked some before.

The answers are very vague and inexplicit. We get only what the minister is willing to let us have. So, today, I am not asking for the same thing. I am asking for a report that actually exists, because the Minister of Finance himself stated, last August 7, that his department was attempting a distribution of revenue and expenditures by provinces and had been at it for the last several months—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think there is a real point of order. The hon. member disagrees with the parliamentary secretary who has the floor at the present time. It might be a good idea to let him finish, after which the hon. member for Lapointe, if he feels he has been incorrectly quoted, would have the right, according to our standing orders, to take part in the debate once again, or later on, to clear things up.

[Text]

Mr. Pennell: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think, in justice to the hon. member for Lapointe, I should correct myself in saying that on several occasions I had asked him to place his question on the order paper. The hon. member is quite right; I did that on one occasion only, yesterday. I stand corrected on that point, Mr. Speaker, and would so indicate to the hon. member. To come back again to this question of the report, I think we are here dealing with a difference in words and perhaps it is an honest misunderstanding between the hon. member for Lapointe and myself and other members of the department.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would allow one question perhaps we could settle this matter. Does such a report exist now?

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, I can answer that question best by saying that as questions have arisen and have been placed on the order paper, the officials of the department have compiled information passed along on memoranda, which was necessary to deal with the large number of questions, the whole school of questions, of a particularly extensive nature; and naturally, more and more information is building up as we keep answering these questions.

For instance, let me put before the house one of the questions asked, question 1,755. It reads as follows:

1. What payments did the federal government make to the province of Quebec during each of the fiscal years 1961-62, 1962-63, 1963-64 and 1964-65 (estimated) under the following headings, in detail (a) unconditional grants (b) conditional grants (c) payments to individuals (i) unemployment insurance benefits (ii) family allowances (iii) old age security (iv) others?
2. What is the total amount of all payments made in each of the fiscal years mentioned above?
3. What is the per capita share paid by the government with respect to each of the above items compared with the per capita share paid to the other nine provinces?

The department has spent literally hundreds of hours on just this one question. And we do not take exception to it. As the house is aware, there is a rule in Beauchesne which says that ministers need not answer questions where an unreasonable amount of time is involved and unnecessary expense placed upon the public. I suggest that the Minister of Finance could properly have taken shelter behind that rule, had it been his desire to avoid answering this type of question, as is suggested by the hon. member for Lapointe. However, the answer to that question was given last Monday and is now available to the hon. member for Lapointe. As I say, I appreciate his interest in the matter and take no exception to the question, but the department has spent hundreds of hours—months—trying to answer all the questions of which that is but one example.

May I bring to the attention of the house question 1,615 which has also been answered:

1. What was the federal contribution to the province of Prince Edward Island for each of the following fiscal years, 1961-62, 1962-63, 1963-64 and 1964-65 (estimated) under the following: (a) unconditional grants—itemized (b) conditional grants—itemized (c) payments to individuals (i) unemployment payments (ii) family allowances (iii) old age security (iv) all others?
2. What is the total amount of all payments for each fiscal year mentioned above?
3. What is the per capita contribution in each category and how does this compare with the per capita contribution to the other nine provinces?

I might also mention that there was one question on the order paper which asked the government to go back 20 years and to disclose all the payments paid to the provinces and all the revenues collected province by province. So you can see, Mr. Speaker, the problem faced by the Department of Finance. It would be physically impossible for the department to answer all these questions with the staff it has; and the cost to the Canadian taxpayer would be staggering. As I say, Mr. Speaker, we are endeavouring to answer these questions and have already made a great deal of information available to all hon. members, including the hon. member for Lapointe.

I have made reference to the fact that material has been collected within the department. This material was gathered together to assist the minister in answering questions on the order paper. It is, I suggest, a well established rule that interdepartmental communications by officials to ministers are confidential. This is a very good and sensible rule, Mr. Speaker, and a rule which has been observed in this house for many years.

In that connection—and I do not wish to weaken my argument by repetition—may I refer to one or two precedents. On January 23, 1959—I am sure this is a precedent which will appeal to the hon. member for Lapointe—the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), now the Secretary of State for External Affairs, asked for a report of General Graham on civil defence. On that occasion the government took the position that the report was privileged because it was prepared by a member of the public service for the consideration of the government. I would ask the hon. member for Lapointe to note this particularly: Upon this explanation being given to the house the motion was not pursued. I have come across at least two occasions in Hansard, in which the hon. member for Lapointe has expressed great admiration for the hon. member for Essex East and his conduct in the house. I again invite him to follow in the footsteps of the hon. member for whom he has professed such great admiration and not to pursue this motion further, in view of the explanation already given the house.

Let me quote one more precedent, Mr. Speaker. On March 12, 1956, as reported at page 2016 of Hansard for that year, the premier of Quebec, Mr. Lesage, then minister of northern affairs, was asked to produce a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the government and the superintendent of Banff national park and the constituents of Banff. On that occasion I suggest that the minister correctly stated the well established rule which once more was accepted by the house without debate, that:

Such exchanges are, I believe, of a privileged character as between officials and the government. I therefore could not acquiesce in that part of the motion.

The minister at that time did table the correspondence whch passed between himself and the citizens but he did not table the information which passed between him and his officials. The house without a vote, accepted what is a well established precedent both in Westminster and in this house.

So, Mr. Speaker, I end by once more appealing to the good nature of the hon. member for Lapointe. I say to him with unfeigned sincerity that I appreciate his interest and his desire to obtain information on this important subject, and if he places his question on the order paper I shall endeavour to give it immediate attention and have it answered, bearing in mind the great amount of work involved. But I again ask him to withdraw his motion.

Hon. J. Watson MacNaught (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could make an appeal to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) to withdraw his motion. I think it is obvious from the remarks of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Pennell) that no such report exists. The hon. member for Lapointe has pursued his argument very well and has put his case before the house. I think now that the best interests of parliament would be served if he would withdraw his motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, in reply, to answer the Solicitor General (Mr. MacNaught), on November 12, 1963, I mentioned figures in this house. At that time—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the procedure followed by the house at present is in order. The Solicitor General asked a question, but on the other hand the hon. member for Lapointe has already contributed to the debate and, according to standing orders, the hon. member cannot speak a second time, except under special circumstances provided for in standing order 37. Nevertheless, if he has the unanimous consent of the house, it may be possible to allow him to answer the suggestion made by the Solicitor General.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the Solicitor General, on November 12, 1963, certain official reports were compiled by various departments and crown corporations. I had given those figures to the house, and they were most instructive. But my figures were said to be incorrect. At that time we were told that we would be given the true figures. On August 7, I again quoted official figures provided by officers of the Department of Finance. Again I was told that my figures were not correct. Even the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) said that my figures were inaccurate. In due course, the Minister of Finance himself, as reported on page 6554 of Hansard, stated that his officials were in the process of allocating expenditures by provinces.

All I want to find out is this. Can we know what work has been done by officials of the Department of Finance, not with respect to question No. 1,755 mentioned a moment ago by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Pennell), but rather concerning the amount of taxes and duties of all kinds collected by the federal government in each province and the amount spent in each province? Could we get detailed information in that respect? That is what we want to know. We are not concerned with replies to other questions which do not deal with the same point.

Is that report ready or is it being prepared? If it is ready, we would like to see it. Otherwise, if it is still being prepared, we would like to know when it will be tabled, since the Minister of Finance has told us that his officials have been working on it for some months now.

[Text]

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to reply, I can only repeat what I said earlier, that the department is collecting a great deal of information to answer all these questions. The hon. member refers to reports. Perhaps he prefers to call them reports. We have been gathering all this material, and memoranda pass back and forth among the officials of the department. This information eventually finds its way into the hands of the minister who answers the questions.

As I pointed out to the hon. member, if we followed his request we would be violating a long established and sensible rule of this house, that correspondence between officials and the minister ought not to be made public. I do not think I need explain why that rule has been followed for such a lengthy period of time. This rule has been accepted by the house and I think it applies to the situation today.

I wish again to emphasize that at no time did the minister undertake to table a parliamentary report, in that sense of the word.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that it is not customary —to use the same expression as the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance —for the government to make available to the house and to the general public the correspondence exchanged between a minister and government officials.

However, such a statement is a pure and simple admission of the fact that there does exist at present a report on the taxes collected and expenditures made in the various provinces. It means that it would not be proper for the government to give the house information on the correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Finance and his officials.

Mr. Speaker, there is seldom any smoke without fire. We saw in the newspapers that the report existed and proved that, in Quebec, hardly anything is spent as compared with the money spent in the other provinces. When we study the revenues and expenditures of any department at all, we soon see that there are real differences between what is spent in Quebec and what is spent in the other provinces, for instance, Ontario.

This morning, I learned about the expenses incurred by the Canadian National concerning railway crossings. In Ontario, where the population amounts to 6½ million, $37 million were spent, whereas in Quebec, where there is a population of 5½ million people, $11 million were spent. This means $26 million less in Quebec.

If we look at agriculture, it is the same thing. The federal government gives 25 times more to the other provinces, but it is almost impossible to get a federal farm loan in the province of Quebec. It is useless here to point out that we have provincial loans. The fact remains that it is impossible to get a farm loan from the federal government. Only this afternoon, I received another complaint. Applications from Quebec are driven from pillar to post and nobody is able to find a solution.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Caouette: Why? In the province of Quebec, there is a provincial farm loans program which is strictly and entirely financed by the citizens of that province, while the latter are also contributing to the federal grants and farm loans. We are paying exactly the same taxes as other Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, those differences are strange. I understand that it is embarrassing for the Minister of Finance to give us this report. He has it in his hands; it really exists and it annoys the government. I admit that this does not apply only to the present government and that the same situation prevailed under the Conservative administration—

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Caouette: —and under the Liberal administration which preceded that of the Conservatives.

Mr. Grégoire: That is true.

Mr. Caouette: It has always been the same since 1867, since confederation became known as the Canadian confederation.

Mr. Speaker, time and again, we said that our group is not seeking any special treatment, but just and equitable treatment for the population of the province of Quebec.

We are prepared to pay our share and we are prepared to receive what we are entitled to, as a result of payment of our share.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) says that we receive more, whereas the figures compiled show that we pay $600 million in excess of what we receive annually from Ottawa.

Mr. Choquette: Produce your figures.

Mr. Caouette: Let the hon. member for Lotbinière see for himself what is happening in his own riding.

Mr. Choquette: Everything is fine.

Mr. Caouette: We will know about that next week, because I am going there.

Mr. Speaker, it is in the province of Quebec that we find the greatest number of unemployed as well as the greatest number of designated areas, as they are called. It is time to look after our own affairs, and I say this for the information of the hon. member for Lotbinière who keeps badgering us, on this side of the house. He should co-operate with us in order to obtain for his riding and his province as much equity and justice as we are ready to allow to all the other Canadian provinces.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Caouette: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Caouette: He only has the privilege to speak in his turn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: The hon. member for Villeneuve says that I should co-operate with him in order to help my riding. He thus wants to insinuate that I do not work for my constituency. I work for my constituency in co-operation with the ministers and, consequently, it would be worse to co-operate with the hon. member for Villeneuve, and I do not wish to see him in my riding.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a word about the question of privilege raised by the hon. member. I quoted the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) when he was not in his seat. As reported in Hansard on page 6532, left column, second last paragraph, he said, and I will read this over again for his own information:

> I say that those figures are wrong—

He is referring to my figures.

> —and that in due time, the Minister of Finance will reveal the true situation, as regards the taxes collected by the federal government in the province of Quebec and the redistribution of those taxes in that province.

This is what we are asking for and I say that the hon. member for Lotbinière is not co-operating with the other members to obtain the information requested, and yet he assured us himself that we would get the information.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. In my opinion, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière is not in order; the hon. member for Villeneuve should carry on with his remarks.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with you. In fact, and as usual, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière is a stupid question which does not in any way constitute a question of privilege.

He is always trying to give himself airs and to make it known that he is in favour of the farmers and the taxpayers in the province of Quebec. However, he is not taken seriously either in his own riding or by the members of his party in the House of Commons.

Mr. Choquette: The hon. member for Villeneuve is the least serious man in Canada.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the repeated interruptions of the hon. member for Lotbinière do not frighten me.

Mr. Choquette: Joker.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I am not concerned with these interruptions because the hon. member for Lotbinière is aware that his own party, that is the party in office, does not take him seriously. He is considered as a separatist.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, he is considered as anti-logical—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the dispute or the fight between the members, one rising on a question of privilege, the other trying to reply, departs from the subject under consideration. In fact, the only matter under consideration is whether it is in order for the government to table certain documents, and the member who has the floor should merely advise the house whether or not he feels the said documents should be tabled. I would therefore ask him to restrict his remarks to this point and I ask the hon. member for Lotbinière to recognize that the hon. member for Villeneuve has the floor.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Choquette: The Speaker will decide.

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, because falsehoods will appear in Hansard tomorrow, and I have the right to correct them. I feel that you should grant me this right under the rules of the house.

Unfounded accusations are being levelled against me. I must point out to the hon. member for Villeneuve that I am highly considered in my party, where a fine solidarity exists, as evidenced by the spontaneous applause now being heard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Choquette: The opposite situation prevails in his party; it is a divided and a schismatic party.

Mr. Grégoire: What a joker you are.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I point out to the hon. member for Lotbinière that there is no question of privilege, but that he is simply disagreeing with the hon. member for Villeneuve. He may, when the hon. member for Villeneuve has concluded his remarks, take part in the debate.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I shall revert to my remarks—

Mr. Choquette: Social Credit is like an earthworm; you cut it in two and it still lives.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, when you state that there is no question of privilege, you do not even take seriously the hon. member for Lotbinière, who is well known as a public joker, wherever he goes.

I shall therefore conclude my remarks, since I have no more time to lose on him, and I shall resume discussion of the matter—

Mr. Choquette: National jester.

Mr. Caouette: —of the question raised this afternoon.

Mr. Choquette: You are really an international jester.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the question of privilege, and this is well-founded, according to standing order 17.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Lapointe who intends to rise on a question of privilege, and I should invite the hon. member for Villeneuve to resume his seat while the hon. member for Lapointe rises on a question of privilege.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, there are standing orders in this house; we have a book of standing orders. Now, they provide that when an hon. member wants to speak, he should stand up and take off his hat. The hon. member for Lotbinière violates those standing orders. I do not say he should take off his hat, because it would fall on his shoulders, or rather, it would not even stand on his shoulders. But he breaks the standing orders of the house when he speaks from his seat and mouths stupidities, as he has been doing for some time.

Therefore, I would ask you to call him back to order and to point out to him that if he intends to speak he must rise and be recognized, which he does not do.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Villeneuve is chewing gum; this is contrary to standing order 12.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I invite the hon. members to co-operate with the Chair and other hon. members, so that we might proceed with the study of the question now before the house.

Mr. Caouette: Let us leave the hon. member for Lotbinière to his clowning, as usual.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, let him continue to act the buffoon—

Mr. Choquette: You are an interplanetary buffoon.

[Mr. Choquette.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I asked the hon. member for Villeneuve to co-operate with the Chair and to accept my suggestion that he should confine his remarks to the motion under consideration, and I am sure that he will do so.

Mr. Grégoire: You should also call to order the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I will respect your ruling, but I would like you to call the hon. member for Lotbinière to order, because he is always interrupting us.

Coming back to the matter under discussion with regard to the motion introduced by the hon. member for Lapointe asking for the production of papers showing the moneys collected and spent in the provinces, I feel that the hon. member for Lapointe is not talking through his hat. He knows what he is talking about, because he is aware that such a report exists.

In addition, we read in the papers a report which was denied of course by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that the minister is very much annoyed at the report submitted by his high officials and which points out that for a very long time the province of Quebec has not been treated as it should.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that it is not only the present administration which is to blame; the previous one carries its share of the responsibility.

The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) was in office for six years and, during that time, not only do we feel that less money was spent in Quebec, but the money collected there was used to pay western farmers, at election time, to nab people's votes, to try to win seats. This was done on three occasions.

Now, today we are insisting, and we shall keep on insisting, that the motion for papers proposed by the hon. member for Lapointe be implemented. Even if it is rejected, we shall keep on demanding the tabling of those documents, not at the country's expense, but to find out exactly what is going on.

If the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Pennell) tells us that it is not the procedure or the custom to make public communications between officials and ministers, we believe that the people who pay the taxes in Canada, that the citizens of the province of Quebec and the other provinces who pay federal taxes, have the right to know the truth as far as taxation is concerned, and the whole truth. I do not think that one should play hide and seek, as has been done before and as they are trying to do at this time.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour assigned for the consideration of private members' business has now expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A it is my duty to inform the house that the following questions will be raised at ten o'clock:

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacInnis), Canadian coastguard service.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Canada pension plan.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Stefanson: Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted at five o'clock I was speaking on the need for extension of television service, and in particular on the need to make this service available to the interlake area of Manitoba. I had just begun to outline the history of the C.B.C. station in Winnipeg.

Station CBWT Winnipeg began operation in May 1954 on channel 4, with an antenna height of 192 feet, this height limitation being imposed because of its proximity to the Winnipeg airport. At that time channel 4, assigned to Winnipeg by the Department of Transport, was the best channel available to give maximum fringe area coverage. In July 1954 KXJB-TV, Valley City, North Dakota, went into operation on the same channel with a transmitter located only 192 air miles from Winnipeg, at a power of 100 kilowatts and tower heights of 1,090 feet. This resulted in considerable co-channel interference in the area north and south of Winnipeg.

Following a study of the problem, the C.B.C. decided to make a change from channel 4 to channel 3. This channel was selected since it entailed no change in the existing transmitter and antenna. This is what the C.B.C. said. Another consideration favouring the choice of channel 3 at that time was the fact that receiver antennae in fringe reception areas of CBWT would be almost as effective on channel 3 as they had been on channel 4. CBWT changed to channel 3 with a power of 57.8 kilowatts on April 16, 1958. However, people living beyond the A aid contour area had to purchase new antennae, and I have personal experience of this as my home is at Gimli, Manitoba, approximately 50 miles north of Winnipeg, and we could not operate with the former antenna. The limitation of power and tower height also meant that CBWT's coverage was correspondingly limited.

After the change took place from channel 4 to channel 3 the reception in most places north of Winnipeg became worse. The C.B.C. had assured everyone that this change would bring about better reception, but actually it was worse than ever before. This is the television service we are still getting today.

Following this changeover and the subsequent deterioration in t.v. reception I again pleaded the case for the need of improvement of t.v. services in the interlake area, and the C.B.C. advised me as follows:

> Because of the heavy demands on capital budget due to general extension of the national service in t.v. and radio, no provision could be made to improve CBWT's coverage until 1962, when an application would be made to increase the power and move to a new transmitter location with an antenna 1,027 feet effective height above average terrain.

When it was learned that the C.B.C. planned these changes the people in the interlake area took it for granted that television service would now be made available to them. Subsequently they learned that the C.B.C. had a site selected at Starbuck, Manitoba, which is south of Winnipeg and therefore not likely to bring about substantial improvement in television reception for the interlake area.

Subsequently the C.B.C. made application for an increase in the effective radiated power, a change in channel and a change of antenna site for station CBWT. This application was heard by the board of broadcast governors in April 1962. The people of the interlake area organized and presented a brief requesting that the antenna be located at Argyle, Manitoba, which is an area north of interlake. At the hearing Mr. Joe Karsin, of Arborg, Manitoba, presented the brief and answered questions relating to it. I have a transcript of the hearing that was held and will make some reference to it. I may say this is sessional paper 129A.

The feeling of the people in the interlake area was if the antenna were located north of Winnipeg it would serve all the interlake district. It would appear that there is little co-operation between the Department of Transport and the C.B.C. It now appears that most of the land within 25 miles north of Winnipeg is restricted to antenna heights which would not be suitable. This is most unfortunate and does not make for good planning. Subsequently the board of broadcast governors approved the application for the Starbuck site.

During the hearing, officials of the C.B.C. indicated their reason for wanting the Starbuck site was because it would serve a heavier populated area than the Argyle site. This, they said, was their only reason. By locating at Starbuck, the so-called "B contour" will reach 20 miles into the United States. The area south of Winnipeg is served by the private station CJOY, Winnipeg, whose antenna is located at Ste. Agathe, Manitoba. The south-western part of the province is served by Brandon, and there is a station just inside the U.S. border at Pembina. People in this part of Manitoba will have several choices of t.v. station, while people in the northern part of the interlake area will still be without television.

I maintain that the principle adopted here by the C.B.C. is wrong. It should have been its first duty to provide service to the people who at present are excluded. Every taxpayer in Canada is a shareholder in the C.B.C. and every shareholder is entitled to equal service.

I have asked questions in the house with regard to this changeover and wish to make brief reference to them. The questions are to be found at page 1218 of the 1963 Hansard and 2707 of Hansard for April 29, 1964. In the first question, I asked:

1. Did the B.B.G. approve a C.B.C. application for an increase in the effective radiated power, a change in channel, and a change of antenna site, of station CBWT, Winnipeg, Manitoba?

The answer was yes. In the second part of the question I asked:

2. If so, when was approval given and what changes are proposed in regard to video, audio, channel and antenna?

The answer to that part was:

The application was for an increase in effective radiated power from 57,800 watts ERP (video), 34,700 watts ERP (audio), to 100,000 watts ERP (video), 50,000 watts ERP (audio), a change in channel from channel 3 to channel 6 and an increase in the effective height above average terrain from 196 feet to 1,027 feet. The board's recommendation for the approval of this application was contained in its public announcement of April 18, 1962.

[Mr. Stefanson.]

One of the questions I asked was:

What site was chosen for the location of the new antenna; when was the property purchased, from whom, and at what cost?

The site chosen, I was informed, is at Starbuck, Manitoba. I asked whether any other sites were considered. The answer to this question was: "Yes, and the most suitable site acquired". Well, the C.B.C. said it would serve the most heavily populated area, but it will not provide a service in a large part of the northern area of Manitoba.

Another question I asked was when work on the project would be completed, and the answer given was, October, 1964. Mr. Chairman, we are near the end of October, now, and so far this change has not taken place.

On April 29 I asked further questions. I again asked when it was expected that the new service would come into operation and the answer, once more, was October, 1964. I asked, also:

Will this changeover improve television reception for the interlake area of Manitoba and, if not, how soon can one expect action to be taken to bring about this much needed improvement?

The answer to this question was:

It is anticipated that some areas of the interlake region will receive an improved reception but it is not possible to guarantee reception in specific areas.

I had also asked:

Should these changes fail to bring about an improvement in television viewing in the interlake area, what action will the C.B.C. or the B.B.G. take?

The answer was:

The corporation intends to conduct a survey of reception in the area following the completion of the proposed changes. The results of this survey will be used to determine what action if any should be taken.

At the hearing the C.B.C. officials made it abundantly clear that they could not guarantee that this change would improve the service in the interlake area. The applicants expressed the fear that if they did not get reception as a result of this changeover they would be left without television for many years to come. Remember, this is an area right in the middle of Manitoba; it is not an outlying area; it is not an area in the north. Surely, a situation like this should not be allowed to exist.

I wish to quote briefly at this point from the transcript of the hearing as reported in sessional paper No. 129. Mr. Pearson, for the board of broadcast governors, is questioning Mr. Karsin who appeared for the interlake people. He is referring to a contour map of the Department of Transport where the original B contour of CBWT cuts across north of Teulon over, roughly, to lake Francis. The exchange reads as follows:

Mr. Pearson: And the B contour will now pass somewhere up south of Oak Island Marsh and across Lundar and Mill End and Camp Morton—they would all be within the B contour? Would this not give beyond that some better signal than is presently received?

Mr. Karsin: Maybe a bit better, but not good enough for us.

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate your position, Mr. Karsin, that you feel if this application is granted, as requested, the interlake will forever remain a hinterland without television?

Mr. Karsin: Yes. You can tell by the channel 7 map—

Incidentally, channel 7 is a private station. When it was established in Winnipeg the people in the interlake area thought they would get a television service. But the station built its antennae south of Winnipeg and reception did not extend to the northern part of the interlake area. Mr. Karsin's answer continued:

—we have a map there from CJAY and the fringe just goes north of Teulon and it does come in at times—it depends on atmospheric conditions. It does come in; sometimes it is good and at other times it is not, so this at Starbuck on channel 6 with 100,000 watts would be about the same—we would get reception just some of the time.

As I have said, the fear was expressed that adoption of this proposal would leave the area without television service for a long time to come. There are a couple of questions and answers toward the conclusion of the hearing to which I would like to refer. This is the part I want to quote. Dr. Stewart is now putting questions to an official of the C.B.C.:

Dr. Stewart: I am not sure if I missed this point, but supposing you were wrong and Mr. Karsin is even underestimating the deficiencies in this interlake area—supposing you make your move and it is still obviously quite inadequate service in the significant part of the interlake area, is it technically possible on a VHF band to correct this?

Mr. Fraser: You are thinking of a satellite?

Dr. Stewart: Yes.

Mr. Fraser: It would be technically possible, but I think this would be a matter of economics. Here again, depending on the number of population to be served—the population in that area is quite scattered—they are quite small communities—and a satellite normally doesn't cover a large geographical area. That would be a matter that would have to be figured out.

Dr. Stewart: I thought Mr. Karsin left the impression that if this didn't work, then the interlake area was lost for all time, in so far as service. Technically this is not so?

Mr. Fraser: Technically this is not true.

That is right. Technically, it is not true. At the same time the people of the interlake area fear that if the present set-up will not provide improved service they will be there for a long time without any service whatsoever.

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Stefanson: No, it is not carried yet. I want to point out that station CBWT in Winnipeg went on the air in 1954. From 1954 to 1958 it was on channel 4. In 1958 it switched to channel 3 and the service became worse. It has been on channel 3 ever since. Next month, I presume, it will be changing to channel 6 and it has been indicated to me that as a result of this change the people in the area will have to buy new antennae at an expenditure to them of between $40 and $50 each. It seems to me there has been poor planning on the part of the C.B.C., otherwise they would not have had to switch the station twice.

Mr. Orlikow: Why are they not enjoying private t.v.?

Mr. Stefanson: Private television does not provide coverage for the northern part of the area. The C.B.C. is serving only the more populated area; it is not providing service for the other areas at all. I now ask this question: When can people living in the following areas expect to get television service: Norway House, Grand Rapids, Dauphin River, Matheson Island? I would remind the committee that Norway House has a population of more than 2,000 people.

In closing I would recommend that the officials of the C.B.C. announce the precise date on which the changeover will take place. They should do this as quickly as possible and, in addition, inform the people concerned what antenna changes are required. If the changeover is to take place next month, or a little later, this is the time when the corporation should be announcing the date so that the viewers concerned can prepare themselves and go ahead with the alterations in their antennae which are needed. In the hearing they tried to say no changes would be required, but this has been proven false before and all the people in this area are of the opinion that they will require new antennae.

I trust that the corporation, upon completion of the changeover, will immediately start a survey of reception in the area to determine whether this changeover has effected any improvement in television reception. I am thinking particularly of areas such as Gypsumville, St. Martin, Steep Rock, Moosehorn, Ashern, Eriksdale, Lundar, Poplarfield, Broad Valley, Fisher Branch, Hodgson, Dallas—

Some hon. Members: All aboard.

Mr. Stefanson: —Koostatak, Arborg, Riverton, Hecla and Matheson Island.

Some hon. Members: All aboard.

Mr. Stefanson: Yes, you can all say "All aboard". All these areas are entitled to television service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stefanson: If there is not a substantial improvement for these areas, I am sure there will be a flood of protests submitted by the people from this area to the C.B.C. and to myself.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could for a moment bring the committee back from the reaches of the C.B.C. and its service to Canada, or lack of service to Canada, to present some ideas on our trade policy, because I see little opportunity of being able to do this on the minister's estimates. Perhaps we will never see them again this session; therefore I have decided to seize this opportunity because I can then deal with the estimates of two departments which will be concerned with what I have to speak of this evening, the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of External Affairs.

It used to be said that war was merely an extension of diplomatic policy. I would suggest that today that conception should be changed to read that trade and the credits on which trade can be financed should form part of the diplomatic policy of any country. But Canada, I am sure we are all glad to know and realize, has only had one foreign policy for a very long time, and that is a policy of maintaining and promoting peace throughout the world. We are being called on to follow this policy in some rather strenuous ways. This summer, when I had the opportunity to see one of these forces that we have supplied for action in the Middle East, it occurred to me that perhaps Canadians have been somewhat suckers in this regard, in that we have meekly accepted these responsibilities without having demanded any powers to seek some solutions.

This summer I was fortunate enough to receive invitations from two governments to visit their countries as their guests; not, as some of my friends in the press gallery have been suggesting to the people, to indulge in elderly gambolling in Europe, but it was a very strenuous fact-finding tour of Egypt and of Israel. I must say that I left the Middle East profoundly depressed at the situation there, which leaves one wondering whether the men in the Gaza strip who represent the force we have had there for eight years will be represented 80 years from now with a similar force, because we are doing nothing to deal with this problem. I would suggest this is an area in which our trade policies should play a very important role.

During my quite extensive tour of Egypt I was taken to a number of their developments in which it seemed to me Canada is ideally placed to take part. I was taken to the Aswan dam, and to visit the large fertilizer factory, the CIMA factory, which turns out some 400,000 tons of fertilizer per year; it has been in operation for about 1½ years. This factory, together with a similar factory near Cairo, turns out only just over 50 per cent of the requirements of the country, according to the director of this plant at Aswan. It seemed to me that here was a place in which Canada could well play a role in aiding the Egyptians in the frightful struggle they have at the present time to make their food production keep pace with their increasing population.

We were taken to the area west of Alexandria where the Egyptians are developing a new province, with desert reclamation. This was a very impressive project, but the young director who showed me around all day pointed out that he lacked adequate modern, agricultural machinery. He had been in North America; he had been sent to the Imperial Valley and to Berkeley, the University of California. He was aware—and told me of it—that the only place in which this sort of machinery could be obtained would be in North America, either in the United States or in Canada; that he was seriously handicapped by lack of it, and handicapped by lack of fertilizer to promote growth in that area.

I noticed, in the new town of Aswan that has been built, that in the big department store there was a tremendous preponderance of German household goods of every kind on the shelves. Again it occurred to me that here perhaps was a place in which Canada could play a part. When I was taken to the Gaza strip, as I say, I found our forces there stalemated, getting no further ahead. The Arab-Israeli dispute was still holding everything at a standstill. When I left the Middle East I was profoundly depressed, as I have said, because I realized that this is an area that calls out loudly for an integrated development. I may say that the Israelis need the Arabs just as much as the Arabs need the Israelis. I admit there are terrific problems to be solved, but I think one of the first problems to be solved is that of improving the living conditions in the Arab countries, which are in many instances very bad.

In Egypt they are making tremendous strides, but they are making tremendous strides against fearful odds; the growing population, the large scale illiteracy, and last but not least, the perfectly appalling climate, which makes many operations extremely difficult. It seems to me that our first step in seeking a peaceful solution of the situation in the Middle East is to remove some of the hardships under which the Arab people live at the present time; to give them every aid that we can in the development of their countries. I may say that when I was at Aswan I watched the construction work on the Aswan dam and saw the Russian equipment, and I knew of the Russian technicians who were working there. I felt it was a great tragedy that the late John Foster Dulles was not gathered to his fathers many years before, because he of course was responsible for this development in that area, having pulled the rug from under the Egyptian government with the projected loan that was to be given by the United States and Britain and the world bank. This forced the Egyptian government into the arms of Russia. However, that has been done. Now it seems to me we should try to retrace our steps to some extent and aid in the development of a country whose people have suffered for many, many years from colonial domination; people who were the subject of a savage attack only eight years ago, an unprovoked attack from Israel, Britain and France.

This brings me to the other aspect of the problem, that of releasing our men from service in the United Nations emergency force, and the disbandment of that force. While the major problem may very well be an economic one enveloping the whole area, I think we have to remember there are other aspects too, of bitter memory which are going to be very hard to overcome.

I hesitate to venture onto what I know is very delicate ground, as most of us are emotionally involved in the maintenance of the state of Israel due, I think, to our consciousness—a certain guilt consciousness perhaps—that it was people of our culture, of European culture, who committed such obscene atrocities against the Jewish people. I think that fact has coloured most of our thinking with regard to the state of Israel. I have reached the conclusion that it has led us to the point where we are not prepared to be objective in the assessment of the situation in the Middle East. For instance, I found very great difficulty in persuading people in Israel—though I did persuade some of them—to admit some of the very black spots in the history of the new state of Israel. To me it is extremely tragic that the people who have suffered the appalling treatment the Jewish people suffered at the hands of the nazis should themselves have been capable of the disgraceful conduct of which they were guilty at the time of the establishment of the state of Israel. Some of them finally admitted to me that there was savage destruction and slaughter in Arab villages which had the effect of terrifying the Arab population and driving them out, to become the now festering sore which is the refugee problem in the Middle East.

I have mentioned the attack on the Suez canal, which is of more recent history, though the memory is still very green. It seems to me that if Canada is going to accept the sort of responsibilities which we have been shouldering for the last eight years we must also demand the right to take steps to seek a permanent solution. Our government must be prepared to insist in the United Nations that the state of Israel, for which all of us have the very greatest sympathy and I take it the greatest admiration for what they have done, should accept the resolutions of the United Nations, if it is to be considered a good member of that organization. Among those resolutions—and there are many of them passed by the general assembly—perhaps the most important is the acceptance of responsibility for the plight of the Arab refugees in the neighbouring Arab states. I saw the plight of those refugees, and while I know it is said—there may be some truth in it too—that they are maintained in their present position by the Arab states as a weapon in this war of nerves with the state of Israel, I also think we have to fact the fact that the Arab states are at present not in any economic situation to absorb this large body of refugees.

I do not think, and I have argued with my Arab friends on this score, that it is a reasonable idea that they should be resettled in Israel. If I were an Arab refugee I have a doubt whether I would care to be settled in Israel. I think that our government should be taking steps to bring pressure on Israel to accept some of this responsibility, to see that this sore in the heart of the Middle East is permanently cured; and we, as a member of the United Nations, should be prepared to play our part in financing the sort of development that is going to be required.

However, first of all there must be, as I have told some of my Israeli friends, the conviction of sin before there can be any steps taken on the path toward salvation, and they are not helping the problem by attempting to deny the facts of history. To me it is tragic that a people who have suffered at the hands of those who have habitually rewritten history should be attempting to rewrite it on their own behalf. So I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that in pursuing our foreign policy, wherever we have accepted this sort of obligation the Canadian government should pursue a double-pronged policy: an economic policy, and the other a diplomatic policy. In this case we should provide credit to the Arab states to enable them to build up their economies, and at the same time we should use our position in the United Nations to bring pressure on the other side to this conflict.

It seems to me that a country which for eight years has maintained troops there, has again undertaken a similar task in Cyprus, and before that undertook a similar task in the Congo, is one which should demand that its voice be listened to with respect in the United Nations. It is one which should be able to bargain with the great powers which are so happy to leave these peace keeping operations to the nice, mild, powerless, middle-sized nations of the world. As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I have the feeling that Canada and the other six nations who comprise the United Nations emergency force on the Gaza strip are being made suckers of by the great powers of the world who, behind this nice police action which we are engaging in, holding the status quo, are still pursuing their oil and military machinations and private policies behind the scenes. I think it is time that we woke up. Most Canadians are proud of the role which Canada has played in these affairs, and I think we would be much prouder if, before we make one of these efforts again, we and our partners were vested with full authority from the United Nations to seek a permanent solution instead of merely acting as international cops—an international police force to stand there and maintain the status quo.

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

There is another aspect to this. I have mentioned the necessity to my mind of providing credit to the Arab countries for their development. There is something else which should be done too. We hear a great deal about the boycott which the Arab nations have imposed on a number of firms who have been dealing with the state of Israel, and this is a situation which I deplore. I think that a boycott of this sort is thoroughly evil. But we should not forget that there is another boycott, too, which is taking place simultaneously right here in Canada, where powerful interests are preventing any growing trade with the Arab countries, involving Canada without our knowledge in this war between the two forces in the Middle East. This should also be brought to a full stop if we are to seek a permanent solution in that sad and tragic part of the world.

I should like to conclude, Mr. Chairman, by expressing publicly my great gratitude and appreciation to the government of Egypt and the government of Israel which tendered me this invitation to visit them and who were both so generous and hospitable while I was there. It seems to me that the best service I could render both those governments is to try and persuade the government of Canada to take some positive steps toward seeking a solution to their joint problems in that area; and to my mind trade is one of the major steps which should be taken at this time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Byrne: Oh no.

Mr. Roxburgh: God forbid.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I have just read an article in the newspaper which criticizes the way some members handle themselves in debate. I should like to say that it is that kind of howling and interruption on the part of backbenchers on the Liberal side which is ruining parliament, and I would ask you as chairman to bring them to order. The hon. member for Acadia has just risen in his place to make a speech and even before he starts to speak he is already being heckled and shouted at by people not interested in the dignity of parliament.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I should like to thank the hon. member for Bow River for his remarks.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks, but if the hon. member for Kootenay East wishes to rise in his place and make a speech for me, or for himself, I will be glad to resume my seat and allow him to do so. It seems he is forever making interruptions from his seat.

Mr. Byrne: I would not want to make one of your speeches.

The Chairman: Order, please.

An hon. Member: He has no brains when he is on his feet.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Someone has said he has no brains when he is on his feet. Perhaps that is why he rarely stands up to make a speech.

An hon. Member: He has none, period.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Someone has now said that he has no brains, period.

Mr. Byrne: What do you say?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I do not think he has shown any evidence of having brains since his coming to this house.

The Chairman: Order. May I invite the hon. member to forget the interruptions which greeted him at the commencement of his remarks.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words quietly and sincerely about a subject that has consumed a great deal of time in this chamber in the past few days.

A number of government members, as well as members on this side, have condemned the C.B.C. because of several of its programs. We are now being asked to vote one eighth or one ninth of total government spending for a period of two months. I am pleased to be a member of a party which suggested during the last interim supply debate that interim supply should be granted for a period of three months so we would not be called upon frequently to carry on debate on interim supply, thereby allowing this house to get on with more important business. Before that amount of money is passed by this committee I think hon. members in this chamber feel duty bound to comment on how the government is spending this money—whether it is being spent wisely, with caution and with scrutiny as recommended by the Glassco commission. Is this corporation paying attention to the recommendations of the Auditor General?

Mr. Chairman, this is the kind of question that entered my mind during this debate. A great deal of discussion has taken place regarding the C.B.C. I was a member of the last working broadcasting committee in 1959 and 1961. At that time I took a very active interest in the operations of this corporation. I must say that I was slightly shocked at the manner in which the corporation works. I am not witch hunting because of certain C.B.C. programs, but I am wondering about its general policies and its responsibility to parliament.

This parliament should not act as a censor of the C.B.C. Many programs are shown by the corporation which I do not enjoy. I am sure, however, that many other viewers appreciate that type of program, and I accept that fact. But I am concerned with the corporate structure of the C.B.C. and its relation and responsibility to parliament. The C.B.C. is a public body and should be responsible, through parliament, to the people of Canada.

During an early speech the Minister of Agriculture stated that the C.B.C. was spending more money than his whole department spent in aid to farmers in Canada. I do not know whether that is an accurate comparison, but I point it out to indicate the size of the corporation and its expenditures. A royal commission in the 1930's suggested that Canada needed a national network. The C.B.C. was established to create and operate a radio network system. Since that time this corporation has branched into the television field. Late in the 1950's the board of broadcast governors was established as a regulatory body. I think it was generally accepted at that time, as now, that such a regulatory body performs a useful function. However, I am concerned about the mammoth growth of this C.B.C. structure. There are no real controls over it in respect of expenditure. The corporation is supposed to bring forward a five year capital expansion program. I suppose it has done this, but I have yet to see any real, long range growth policy. The C.B.C. places its expansion program before treasury board and treasury board rules as to whether or not the corporation will receive the required amount of money. What is happening as a result of this procedure? This corporate structure is continuing to grow without aim or direction, and certainly without any controlling reins held by the elected representatives of the people.

I think the whole question of policy of the C.B.C. needs to be closely reconsidered. The corporation should be considered in light of what it is doing and the direction it is moving. The board of broadcast governors should examine this corporation very closely. In earlier years Canada required a national network system. Does Canada still require such a system? Is there a need for a government subsidized body in this field of communications? Most areas of Canada are now being served by the C.B.C., as well as by private radio and television networks, many of which are affiliated with the C.B.C. Perhaps we no longer need this crown corporation.

Mr. Chairman, most of the questions I have posed this evening should be considered and answered. One other question that has been of some concern to me relates to the 55 per cent Canadian content regulation. What does that regulation mean? Does it mean that 55 per cent of the actors must be Canadian? Does it mean that 55 per cent of the actors must be of Canadian origin? Does it mean that the film must be produced by Canadian photographers? I suggest if this regulation is carefully examined one will discover that it means the film must be produced by a crew which is at least 55 per cent Canadian, and that is all. Is compliance with this regulation going to mean that Canadians will have a greater part in the television industry? I suggest the obvious answer is, not necessarily.

Has the C.B.C. gone along with, accepted or rejected the recommendations of the Glassco commission? Not exactly. The Auditor General made some comments a year ago with regard to the financing of the C.B.C. He found it a bit odd, to say the least. I think that was the gist of his remarks when the public accounts committee was studying the financing of the C.B.C. These are questions that I think should be examined by a broadcasting committee.

The whole question of Canadianism is causing a great deal of trouble across Canada today. Is it the C.B.C.'s responsibility to project their image of Canadianism across Canada? Are they the ones who should interpret what they think Canada should be or should evolve into in the years ahead? Should they portray this image to the Canadian public, whether or not they are right in their projection or in their vision? In other words, is it their job as a corporate entity directly responsible to parliament to interpret Canadianism in the years ahead? This is what they seem to think at times.

Questions have been asked in broadcasting committees in the past with regard to whether or not certain expenditures should be made, and from time to time we have had examples of amounts such as $120,000 or $150,000 being spent on various programs which, to say the least, did not receive wide approval across Canada and which did in fact cause a great deal of apprehension in many homes. Is this the kind of business in which the people of Canada want the C.B.C. to be engaged? In other words, is it the C.B.C.'s job to enter into competition with Hollywood? I do not think so. Even the socialist government of the 40's and 50's in Saskatchewan did not go to that extent. They got into many businesses but they did not try to compete with Hollywood in such a risky business as the production of acceptable films. They did not try anything as risky as that. They stuck to shoe leather, bricks, boxes and many other things that one could mention.

We find the C.B.C. now engaged in the business of the production of films in competition with Hollywood and other private enterprises. I think this whole question should be examined in the light of the future policy of this corporate structure, which is now spending over $100 million a year, with nobody holding the pursestrings. Where is it going to end? The member of our party who spoke just before me mentioned the vast interlake area of Manitoba which is receiving no television service. Is the C.B.C. making a worth-while effort to go into those areas where there is no television reception? Is the C.B.C. making a worth-while effort so far as radio is concerned, or have they forgotten about their obligations in the field of radio? These are some of the questions that I think should be examined by a broadcasting committee. Many members have urged the setting up of a broadcasting committee during this debate and I certainly agree with that suggestion.

Some member interjected a while ago that this was a private matter. When I first became a member of the house I know that television reception in my own constituency of Acadia was practically nil. But then ambitious, enterprising, private television stations moved in, long before the C.B.C. In fact, the C.B.C. has been rather reluctant to move into the east central part of Alberta, a vast area which was not able to enjoy television reception for a number of years until the growth of private television stations.

I say this in a somewhat derogatory sense so far as the C.B.C. is concerned, because surely they must feel it is their duty to make radio and television services available across Canada for all Canadians. I know they have said so from time to time in the committee, but I have seen the evidence of how they have carried out this duty. It took the private stations or affiliated stations to move into the area I represent in order for the people there to have television reception second to none. So there are many areas with regard to which the C.B.C. should be subjected to close cross-examination.

I will not go into great detail about the matter of program content, but many members have spoken about the program last Sunday evening in which the nazi leader in the United States was portrayed for 12 minutes. I do not think the C.B.C. should be spending Canadian money to put this type of leader before the Canadian people. But they have done it, and who am I to censor? Maybe a few people enjoyed watching the program; I do not know. But the main complaint I have with regard to the C.B.C. is that this corporate structure is growing, growing, ever growing, with no suggested limit and no suggested aim.

Mr. Byrne: Like the Tory party.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): There is that famous member speaking again from his seat. He makes more interjections than any other ten members of the house.

Mr. Cashin: Better to speak from your seat than through your hat.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): If he would only rise to his feet and make a speech I am sure we would all listen. His interjections are so wise, so well thought out that if he ever rose to make a speech I am sure he would have the ear of every member of the house. Mr. Chairman, I was saying I feel that in many respects the C.B.C. has done a tremendous job. It is a national network and we need such a network for some things, but I do not believe we should allow this structure to continue to grow without any aim or basic policy.

We should have a national network to serve as a news medium and as an educational medium, but it should get out of competition with Hollywood.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Some hon. members on the Liberal side clap their hands. I can well understand this because the C.B.C. tried its hand at making a Hollywood film of their leader and failed so badly that they would not let it be shown.

An hon. Member: They should make one of the galloping ghost.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): More interjections, Mr. Chairman. They filibustered this debate all day yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): They intend to filibuster it all day today, but from their seats. The risky business of making entertainment films should be left to free enterprise.

Mr. Cashin: Good for Barry; he is going to carry three states in Alberta.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have got another hour, Mr. Chairman. If they want to continue to interrupt me, that is fine. If they take this matter so lightly as to laugh about it, that is fine. That is the way the government takes most problems in Canada today. We saw them bring in one bill after another —the pension plan, on again off again; the labour code, in again out again; and with the farm legislation, because they had bullheaded Harry behind it they bulled it through to the benefit of few farmers across the country. We have seen their type of arrogance.

Some ten minutes ago I was trying to summarize my remarks by suggesting parliament should not be a censor of programs shown on the C.B.C., but I do think parliament should give guidance to the general aims and policy of the corporate structure. The capital cost of the C.B.C. continues to grow, and as the capital structure of the C.B.C. grows so will the cost. This is inevitable. The C.B.C. should not be in competition with Hollywood. Let them sell, let them lease, let them do what they may with their film studios, but let them get out of competition with Hollywood in such a risky business.

The C.B.C. can do good work as a news and educational medium. It can educate Canadians on various industries located across the country, and if we feel purely Canadian films should be made, let us leave that up to the national film board, which is another corporate body. We have two corporate bodies and, to quote my hon. friend across the way, they are actually in competition with one another, one having no limit on the amount of money it can spend. That is practically the case with regard to the C.B.C.

Mr. Grégoire: Carried.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): My friends from deep left field are all in favour of the C.B.C. That is the way I interpret them.

Mr. Woolliams: They must have left friends in Quebec.

Mr. Caouette: Amen.

Mr. Grégoire: Alouette.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): We should have a broadcasting committee established, and the chairman of the C.B.C. should appear before it to outline some of his thoughts and aims on where this octopus is going. Surely parliament should be given some idea where it is going. Some time ago the minister who is responsible for the C.B.C. said, "If it doesn't do what the government wants it to do, heads will roll." That is not good enough. The C.B.C. should not be held under the thumb of this or any government. It should be responsible to parliament and should be given guidance and a general outline on aims by parliament.

This can only be done in a committee composed of all parties, perhaps of all hon. members, and if that committee wished the C.B.C. to continue in competition with Hollywood, then fine, but I believe the majority of my constituents feel the C.B.C. should get out of making entertainment films. From time to time many members have complained about C.B.C. programs, and the C.B.C. has striven to project its image far and beyond what it should.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I have said enough. Many expenses with which I do not agree are being incurred across this country, but in order to facilitate the passage of interim supply I have limited my remarks to the subject of the C.B.C.—

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): This should not be interpreted as meaning that I am in complete agreement with the way in which most of the money now requested is to be spent by the government—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Cameron (High Park)): I have allowed the hon. member a few extra minutes on account of various interruptions he suffered but I am afraid, now, that he will have to terminate his interesting speech.

Some hon. Members: Encore.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take advantage of this debate on interim supply to state my views on the economic situation generally prevailing in Canada, and especially on the financial situation of the province of Quebec and its population. I also wish to draw the attention of this house to certain special and abnormal situations.

More than ever the Canadian economy is going around in circles; it marks time, shuffles along, bogs down and moves backward. At present, the worker must face the constant progress of automation. He faces the constant progress of the various modern techniques of production. Facing technological, scientific and other progress, the worker is increasingly threatened by insecurity, hardship and unemployment.

The worker is becoming more and more enslaved and destitute due to mechanization and science, which stemmed in the human brain. Progress came through man and the present government offers no economic solution which would enable him to lead a better life than he did before he brought forth this progress.

The worker should lead a better life, as a result of progress and production, than he did before the mechanization of production.

This problem must be solved by the governments which should allow the workers, through economic solutions in accordance with progress, to enjoy the benefits of progress, that is, the production resulting from machinery, automation, mechanization or science.

The economists in our present system appear on television or write articles to say that two thirds of the human race are underfed. I agree with them, because this is proved by world statistics. The same economists who, on television as well as in their writings, talk about underfed people throughout the world, also tell us about overproduction. They speak to us of underfed people and at the same time of overproduction. And they do so quite seriously. How can the same economists mention in the same breath underfed people and overproduction?

Scarcity means malnutrition, want and poverty. Abundance would mean prosperity. But how can our economists tell us there is abundance of production in the world, while two thirds of the population of the world are underfed?

The solution is very easy. But why is it not applied? Because our governments are slaves to finance, which maintains people in poverty through its monetary and financial system.

Our monetary or financial system should be controlled by the government, so that money be based on production, that it serve production and that production may meet the needs, and by needs I mean consumption.

At the moment, our financial system is topsy-turvy; the contrary is happening, and two thirds of the human race are suffering under such conditions. Finance leads the government, whereas the government should lead finance, as we want it to do.

Mr. Chairman, why has the Bank of Canada, a federal government agency, loaned recently to the Bank of England an amount which is said to be about $50 million, at an interest rate which, we are told, amounts to .075 per cent?

Why can't this bank grant loans to our municipalities, our school boards, our cities at this same rate of interest, that is .075 per cent, for the development of our municipalities, our cities and our school boards?

Our school taxes or our municipal taxes would certainly be reduced by 50 per cent at least, should the Bank of Canada serve our Canadian institutions instead of serving foreigners.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Rondeau: I hear the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) say "shame". Yes, Mr. Chairman, it is a shame.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I must point out to the hon. member for Shefford that I did not at any time say "shame", as I am not interested at all in his speech.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, in my opinion the point of order is not well taken, but I think I heard a member of the caucus surrounding the hon. member say that word.

In any event this Liberal government grants loans to foreigners while taxing and burdening the Canadian people. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) told us that we ought to save the pound sterling. The loan to the Bank of England was to rescue the pound sterling. To rescue others but let our people croak, that is the policy of the present Minister of Finance.

Mr. Caouette: That is quite true.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to say a few words about our Canadian agriculture. Farming, too, is ruined by finance. At the present time the Canadian farmer, and especially the eastern farmer, is as far in debt and mortgages as he can go.

Yet he has received a lot from the Liberal party during the last election, but he cannot pay with promises made by the Liberal party in 1962 or 1963. He cannot make a living for his family with those promises. He cannot meet his obligations with those promises either. Having no farm income, he has to borrow—that is the achievement of the Liberal party: to borrow—from year to year until the farm loan organization or his creditors take his farm away from him because without income, he is unable to meet his obligations.

Mr. Grégoire: That is true.

Mr. Rondeau: And when he has lost his farm, he will become a worker on the socialist collective farms of the federal government.

Mr. Prud'homme: Bona.

Mr. Rondeau: In Cuba they had the land reform. In Canada we have ARDA.

Mr. Prud'homme: Bona.

Mr. Caouette: It is the same with Bona.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, I take this opportunity which would not be given to me otherwise to tell the house, during the debate on this $740 million interim supply motion, the dramatic situation, the inhuman fate and the shameful discrimination borne now by the Montreal harbour dockers who are deprived of their jobs and run the risk of losing great sums of money invested by them in the retirement fund administered by the shipping federation and the international longshoremen's association.

Before coming to the core of my remarks, I should like to set a distinction between the international unions which may have rendered invaluable service to Canadian industries and those which work against our companies. The facts I should like to bring to your attention tonight:

1—Concern the Department of Labour which administers labour legislation in Canada.

2—The department is also interested because it is entrusted with the application of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

3—Those facts also concern the Department of Transport which looks after the administration of national harbours.

4—They are also of interest to the House of Commons and to all Canadians because they indicate that the Canadian Bill of Rights passed by parliament is being violated by the American unions which deprive Montreal harbour longshoremen of their right to choose the union they like.

5—Those facts also show that simple regulations adopted by the international longshoremen's association, a U.S. union which has its head office in New York, have precedence over Canadian legislation such as the Industrial Relations Act which was enacted by parliament and which governs labour conditions and employment of longshoremen in Montreal harbour.

During the past six months Montreal longshoremen went on strike three times and the strangest part of it all is that none of those strikes were organized by the international longshoremen's association, the American union which is negotiating a labour contract on behalf of the longshoremen. Neither were they directed against the employers, the shipping federation of Canada. They were decided by the dockers against their own union which omits to defend them, to represent them properly or to supply its members with the required information concerning the use made of the pension fund administered jointly by the employers and the American union.

As you know, Mr. Chairman, and as the Minister of Labour is also aware, since he appointed him himself, Judge René Lippé was appointed to investigate the pension system of the dockers and the administration of some $6 million in that pension fund.

The report prepared and published by Judge Lippé last August does not satisfy the dockers because it does not say how the pension fund is administered; it does not say where that money is invested, how much it yields, and especially, that report makes no recommendation with a view to improving the lot of dockers being pensioned.

What are the demands of the Montreal harbour dockers?

The dockers' grievances are based on three points:

(1) the pension plan, (2) the security conditions on wharves, (3) the material vexations they endure in their work.

The Montreal harbour dockers now pay an amount of 12 cents per hour into a pension fund.

In 1963, in Montreal, 2,500 dockers worked a total of 3,689,257 hours on the waterfront, which means a payment of almost half a million dollars for only one year and a payment of $200 per docker in 1963.

They would gladly pay that amount if they were sure to retire on a suitable pension. But that is not the case, Mr. Chairman. It is so hard to qualify for a pension that most stevedores will never get one, and all the money they have thus invested during all the years they have been working will remain in the retirement fund which is jointly administered by the employers and the international longshoremen's association.

Normally, to qualify for a pension, a stevedore must be 65 years of age. Should he quit his job and cease to be a stevedore at the age of 64 years, 11 months and 30 days, the poor man loses his contributions to the fund and his right to a pension. But even if he does work until 65, the Montreal stevedore is not sure to receive a pension; he must first be a paying member and must have paid up his dues with the American union, he must have worked on the water front continuously for at least 25 years, that is between the age of 40 and 65; he must have worked an average of 600 hours per year between the age of 60 and 65 years and have worked at least 1,500 hours in all, or an average of 300 hours a year.

If the stevedore meets all of those requirements—brace yourself—he gets a monthly pension of $50. A monthly pension of $50 when he has contributed to the retirement fund 12 cents an hour during 25 years. Is it not ridiculous? Do you not think, Mr. Chairman, that stevedores are entitled to ask questions, to ask how this money is being administered and to demand that a pension be paid out of the fund to stevedores who, because of old age or because they are no longer physically fit to do the hard jobs required of them on the waterfront, have to leave their employment before having reached 65 years?

For all these reasons, Mr. Chairman, the longshoremen of the harbour of Montreal are unhappy with the administration of the international longshoremen's association, and they have decided this summer, within the limits provided by the Industrial Relations Act, to join another union which, they believe, would protect their interest in a better way, namely the syndicat national des débardeurs which is affiliated with the national trade unions federation.

It was at that time that the international longshoremen's association decided to show its teeth and strike hard, seeing that it would lose the benefits and administration of a pension fund which, some people say, is worth over $6 million, and according to the longshoremen themselves, it is worth over $10 million in view of the amounts they have been paying into it since 1953.

Threats were phoned in, and obvious intimidation borne against the longshoremen who wanted to transfer their union allegiance. Some phone callers said: "We'll break your legs", while others asserted: "When there's a war, rebels are shot."

Things got so bad that the national trade union federation had to appeal to the Quebec courts to put an end to the threats and the intimidation against the longshoremen by the international longshoremen's association.

More than that, the international longshoremen's association, not content with making threats, started to act.

They ordered the dissenting longshoremen to appear before the executive of the international union on August 17, 1964 for the following reasons:

He incited members of local 375 to leave our ranks and to join another longshoremen's association.

Everything subject to fine, suspension for a definite period or expulsion by the executive committee.

Then, on August 27 last, the national trade union federation secured from Mr. Justice Lamarre, of the superior court in Montreal, an interim injunction specifying this:

Consequently, by Thursday September 10, 1964, at noon, we enjoin the defendants to cease:

(a) molesting or trying to molest, intimidating, threatening or trying to threaten by intimidation or otherwise present or future members of the applicant the syndicat national des débardeurs du port de Montréal (C.S.N.);

(b) interfering in any way with the formation and legal activities of the applicant, the syndicat national des débardeurs du port de Montréal;

(c) suspending, dismissing, threatening to dismiss or to cause the dismissal, in any way, present or future members of the applicant, the syndicat national des débardeurs du port de Montréal (C.S.N.) or depriving them directly or indirectly of their right to work; because they signed, are signing or will sign a membership card to join the applicant union;

(d) seeking to convince, either by threats, intimidations or imposition of a penalty or by any other means, longshoremen not to join the applicant (C.S.N.) or not to take part in its activities;

(e) ordering and/or trying to order, instructing and/or trying to instruct, advising and/or trying to advise any person whatever to take part in the commission of any or all of the above mentioned acts.

(Signed) Philippe Lamarre
Justice of superior court.

However, on September 21, Mr. Justice Tellier of the same court, without pronouncing judgment on the facts quashed the temporary injunction of Mr. Justice Lamarre, because the affidavits signed by the longshoremen in this case, had been signed before the application was filed. Therefore, the injunction was quashed for legal and technical reasons. Three days after the injunction was quashed, the international longshoremen's association renewed its reprisals and the dissenters received the following letter:

Dear Sir and Brother:

This is to advise you that the executive committee of local 375 of the international longshoremen's association rendered a unanimous decision on the complaint laid against you and heard at the special meeting held on August 28, 1964, at 8 o'clock p.m., in our offices located at 250 St. Paul east, in the city of Montreal.

The executive committee finds Mr. ....., registration No. ....., guilty of the charge heard on August 28, 1964, at 8 o'clock p.m., and decides to suspend the said Mr. ..... for a definite period, that is until December 31, 1965, this suspension taking effect immediately. Unanimously passed on September 24, 1964.

Under the circumstances, all your rights as a member of local 375 are suspended until December 31, 1965.

Please comply therewith.

Yours truly,
Adrien Lemoine,
Secretary-Treasurer.

But what is the meaning of this expulsion by local 375 of the international longshoremen's association?

1. It means that the longshoremen will lose the right to work on the Montreal docks, because the shipping federation of Canada is bound to hire only members who have paid their fees to the international longshoremen's association; therefore, the first result is the loss of their livelihood.

2. Because, in several cases the expulsion of the dissenting longshoremen is decreed up to December 31, 1965, the longshoremen involved will inevitably lose their right to the pension fund, since they will have failed to work the number of hours required to be entitled to their pension.

3. The health insurance, paid by the longshoremen to protect themselves and their families, lapses and the suspended workers, as well as their families, are deprived of coverage against the cost of illness.

4. These workers experience difficulty with unemployment insurance, and they have not received one cent in benefits from the beginning of their expulsion, as confirmed by a letter from the unemployment insurance office, dated September 23, 1964.

An appeal from this decision was lodged and will be heard by the arbitration board on October 30. In their claims for benefits the expelled longshoremen, who are earning $2.53 per hour on the docks, stated they were available for work and able to work as longshoremen, and in fact they reported for work. But work was refused to them by the shipping federation of Canada, on account of the suspension decreed by the international longshoremen's association.

Mr. Chairman, this is a human problem, which cannot leave the members of the house indifferent, and above all, I imagine, the Minister of Labour, who is responsible for the administration of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, and also of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Mr. Chairman, paragraph 4 of section 7 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Act, chapter 152, reads as follows:

> Where a collective agreement is in force, the application for a new certification may be made at any time after the expiry of ten months of the term of the collective agreement.

The dockers tried to become members of another union within legal limits because the existing agreement between the international longshoremen's association was concluded on January 1, 1963 and will remain in force until December 31, 1965.

Therefore, the collective agreement has been in existence for 22 months and the dockers, under a right guaranteed by the law, can freely join another union if they wish to.

It is true that the constitution of the international longshoremen's association stipulates that any attempt to introduce another union among the dockers is liable to expulsion and fine.

How come, Mr. Chairman, that the regulations of the American union prevail over a Canadian law?

How is it possible that Canadian workers cannot change their union allegiance, are denied their trade union freedom because it is forbidden by the constitution of an American union? How can the American unions, just as an ex-president of an American union at the present time, thus ignore our laws and scoff with impunity at the Canadian Bill of Rights which guarantees freedom of association?

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Minister of Labour to intervene and to see that a serious study is made of this matter, to ensure that the freedom of our unions and their members is respected, and that those workers, until such time as they go back to their jobs, or to any job, receive the unemployment insurance to which human beings in their position are entitled.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I want to take advantage of interim supply to make a proposal which I sincerely set out for the consideration of the house, and of those who may be interested in it. It comes technically under the estimates of the privy council and relates particularly to the centennial commission. The suggestion I want to make is basically directed toward this commission and I am hoping it will be taken into consideration when the spending estimates for special projects are considered.

Very briefly I am going to present a confederation student exchange program. By way of background I should like to point out that all who have studied Canada's problems, political, social and economic, agree that they arise from its immense size and diversity of interest. We have really six regions in Canada —the maritimes, Quebec, Ontario, the prairies, British Columbia and the north. Our problems are magnified by a lack of understanding in each area of the outlook of the others. It applies not only as between all regions of Canada. Lack of understanding is most dramatic with the province of Quebec and the other provinces because of difficulty in communication; but other regional differences are just as great and are often overlooked.

It has seemed to me that one of the great opportunities of our centennial celebrations is to do something positive toward removing these areas of misunderstanding. There is no longer any excuse from a transportation or communication aspect. The means of transportation is there; bus, rail, air and motor vehicle travel facilities are fast and plentiful. The beauty and magnitude and diversity of Canada has hardly been explored by Canadians either young or old, but it is the young people in whom the hope of the future lies and who deserve the best we can give them in preparation for building a better Canada.

In this context I propose a confederation student exchange of a magnitude and nature not previously undertaken, and one which only a central body such as the federal government or the centennial commission can sponsor and underwrite. Several public minded organizations are presently sponsoring student exchanges in Canada within the limits of their own resources. Visite interprovinciale and the Canadian council of Christians and Jews are two worth mentioning. They sponsor trips from two weeks to a month, and this year about 3,000 students will have visited other parts of Canada. The plan I propose, however, is different in both magnitude and depth. If accepted, it will throw the resources of the nation into a real effort to create a unified and self-confident Canada.

The fundamentals of the plan are these: first, a home to home exchange of students among the various regions of Canada, for one full school term, for students in their third and later years in secondary school; second, a home to home exchange for the summer months for students who cannot take a whole school term. Registration and administrative arrangements would be handled by the centennial commission. Transportation would be provided by the federal government. Local arrangements for personal supervision, health and education would be made with the provinces. Parents would provide room, board and school necessities for the visiting student. Clothes and spending money would come from home. The exchange would be voluntary, open to all students within the selected grades, provided only that the student had passed his or her previous year's examination. The exchange would be massive, as I see it, geared to make a noticeable impact on Canadian life and its youth, with a target of 100,000 students in 1967 and a continuing program thereafter.

In detail, the idea is that parents of a student desiring to exchange would be hosts to another student of the same age, sex and school grade for one school term, while their child becomes the guest of the other home. The students, in short, would exchange homes. The foster parents would provide for the visiting student as they would for their own child. The friends of the home and absent student would form a circle into which the visiting student would easily fit. Such an exchange would be available to all, and would cost the student and his family nothing. For one school term, he or she would become a part of the life of the new family, town, school and province.

While the idea seems simple in its conception, there are real and practical difficulties to be worked out. Technical problems of educational standards, jurisdiction and registration on the one hand, and personal problems of environment, standards of living, religion and adaptability of both parents and children on the other, are the most apparent. But after giving it a good deal of thought I am convinced they can be overcome.

With regard to registration, parents or students desiring to exchange would make application to the central body on a prescribed application form which could and would be made up for use in a computing machine. The particulars of the child to be exchanged and his home circumstances, as well as province, religion and school the child wished to attend would be indicated on the application. Computers would match up the cards and provide applicants with names of matching families.

A period of time would be allowed in which direct correspondence would take place between families. When a suitable exchange was arranged, both applicants would notify the central agency. Except for the services provided, the arrangement would be a private one, with applicants accepting all responsibilities between themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to move to a consideration of the services which would be provided by the public. In the first place, the federal government would provide return transportation for the student, as well as one visit home at Christmas or Easter during the term. The provincial or territorial government would provide the educational facilities to the visiting student. They would provide the exchange of records and matching curriculum, as far as possible. The province would also provide supervisory services. I think for such supervisory services the best agencies available would be children's aid societies, or welfare agencies within the provinces. Each home would be visited in advance and reported upon by the children's aid society. It would be improper to ask these agencies to evaluate these homes, therefore my suggestion is that the only report which would be made in advance would designate the home as either suitable or unsuitable for exchange while the student is in the foster home, the agency would make visits at regular intervals to see that both student and foster parents were satisfied with the arrangements. A completely homesick or unsatisfied child could return home without prejudicing the other student. No liability would devolve on the welfare agency while acting in good faith in its duties.

Mr. Chairman, I have given some serious thought to the question of what type of student would qualify for such an exchange. When the original centennial commission was set up some years ago a proposal somewhat similar to this was made, and in the general outline there was similarity. The report of that commission suggested that children of the ages from 15 years to 17 years would be eligible for exchange. I have suggested, however, that students in the third and fourth years of secondary school who have completed their previous year's examinations and were in good standing would be eligible to partake in such an exchange. The question of age is one of some difficulty. I felt that in the first or second year of high school many students would be too young to make such an exchange and properly fit into their new homes.

Mr. Chairman, I did mention a second type of exchange. The one I have just outlined is a school term exchange. There should also be provision for a number of students who could not properly make an exchange during a school year. In this category there would be students in their final year of secondary school, whose education should not be disturbed. If these students wanted to make an exchange they might find that the standards of education were so different in the province visited that they would not be able to pass the different examinations. There should also be a summer exchange for students who desire to make an exchange with students in areas not having a comparable curriculum.

There would be a third group of students who would not take the whole year. They would be those who wanted to exchange for cultural or language purposes and who could not properly fit into the language area and get any results from their schooling. These would be people who desired to exchange from one language area to another, to move into a home environment in the other language and acquire fluency in that second language. Such an exchange could work both ways. By that I mean it could be partly in the one province and partly in the other, for one month in the one province and one month in the other for each of the students.

Summer exchanges would be based on the same principles as the others, except that they would be of shorter duration and would not involve any educational problem of any kind. I know of several very successful experiments that have been made in this type of home to home exchange. I know that this summer a large number of students from the province of Ontario who live in English language communities moved into various French language communities in Quebec, stayed there for one or two weeks and returned home bringing their guests with them for a similar period. This experiment was entered upon with a great deal of hesitation by some of these children because they were not sure what they were going to get into. That is the reason why I suggested in my original plan that when there is an exchange there should be supervision by some sort of agency which would verify that the home is proper for the child to go into and, on the other hand, that the new parents are satisfied with the child who has been placed with them.

There is one difficulty that undoubtedly will come to mind and that is the question of religion. There are many situations where religion might cause difficulty, even though other exchange factors would be satisfactory.

[Mr. Aiken.]

The plan I envisage would include the question of religion as part of the application particulars, and if necessary the computers could match up the cards of the student and the parents. But in many cases there would be no problem and as I see it the sole requirement would be that the foster parents agree, as part of their general undertaking, to send the student to a church designated by the parents. There is no real problem but it is undoubtedly one matter that would cause some concern.

As to the time of commencement of this plan, I should like to set as a target date the school term of 1966-67, which is roughly two years away. I have had discussions with people who are interested and who have operated exchange programs and they feel that a two year period would be quite sufficient to enable them to be prepared to carry out this program. I am not putting forward this project as a pipe dream because I have discussed it with people who have been in the field, and it can be done and can make a very significant impact on Canada for the future. I would suggest that the summer exchanges start in 1967, and after 1966 and 1967 these exchanges would be on a continuing basis as students reach the grades designated.

There are about a million students in Canada's secondary schools and about 400,000 of these are in their third or subsequent years and would come under the plan I have mentioned. I have selected this age group because they are mature enough to travel but young enough to adapt to new surroundings. Allowances will have to be made for those who find some disturbance in curriculum, because they will have compensated for it in experience. Final year students who are preparing for university entrance should probably only participate in the summer exchange.

I have discussed this plan with a number of experts in the field. The technical difficulties can be ironed out. Computers can handle the matching of registration cards, provincial curricula can be equated, and the plan can work.

I can think of no better way to meet our obligation to the coming generation, to take a great step toward national understanding, to substitute personal experience and direct exposure for book learning, and to provide a living and meaningful centennial project. For the cost of one public building and one military aircraft, or for the amount the federal government spends in one day, this plan can be operated for one year. The money would all be spent in Canada and for transportation on facilities already running. The centennial commission is now operating and no new body will have to be set up. Every parent who participates in the program will be making a personal contribution to the centennial and will be receiving something from it for his or her own child. Every person in every community can give something to the country in accepting and welcoming the visiting student.

May I conclude by saying that the centennial can become a meaningful experience so that when the bunting comes down, the buildings are emptied and a second look is taken at many of the centennial projects which are expensive and unproductive, there will be a deep satisfaction in knowing that we have taken a real step ahead, one that will be rewarding and permanent. May I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the genial acting house leader if he can give us an indication not only of the business for tomorrow but the business for Monday and Tuesday?

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue the discussion of interim supply. Then we will take up the balance of the estimates of the Minister of Industry, namely the balance of defence production, the national research council and atomic energy. Then we will take up the Department of Forestry followed by the Department of National Revenue. I regret I cannot forecast the items of business for Monday.

Mr. Lambert: Does the acting house leader anticipate that he will be able to indicate tomorrow the business for Monday?

Mr. MacNaught: If we should be so unfortunate as to be still considering interim supply tomorrow night, we shall go on with interim supply on Monday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD—APPOINTMENT OF ADMINISTRATOR FOR TRAINING COLLEGE

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that under the new rules, although hon. members are given an opportunity to put forward questions at this time, the responsible minister is not required to be present. Yesterday I asked the Minister of Transport a question, and I might say that his attitude was rather petulant, in fact ridiculous, in that he expected me to preface my question with a speech welcoming him back to the house, something he had already received from a member of the N.D.P. and a Conservative member.

I know, regardless of what prepared answer someone on the Liberal side may have to give me, it will not in any way, shape or form be a reasonable or accurate answer to the problem before us at this time. My question to the Minister of Transport was:

> Was it necessary for the department to reach into the ranks of the retired to find an administrator for the proposed coastguard college at Point Eward?

Mr. Speaker, I do not mind too often remarks made in the house while members are sitting in the house, but I don't see why I have to put up with members behind the curtain making all this noise. I would very much appreciate a little order, especially from those standing behind the curtains.

In his answer to the question, the Minister of Transport in his usual, complete disregard for the truth had this to say—

Mr. McIlraith: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, we now have the President of the Privy Council calling for order without allowing me to prove he has complete disregard for the truth. If the rules permitted it I would apply the word usually used in that respect. In answer to my question this is what the Minister of Transport said:

> The hon. gentleman, as is not unusual, has his facts wrong. No appointment has been made to this position, because the college has not yet been established.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I have here what we would probably consider an official press release from the Department of Transport, and if the President of the Privy Council wants to take objection to this, he can also. The first paragraph reads:

> No. 84-64 October 16, 1964
> Ottawa—Captain Eric Brand of Ottawa, former director of marine operations for the Department of Transport marine services, has been appointed planning officer of the Canadian coastguard college, it was announced today by Transport Minister J. W. Pickersgill.

We have a complete contradiction here —the answer I received yesterday from the minister completely contradicted by a press release put out under his name on October 16 when this appointment was definitely announced. The Minister of Transport said no such appointment was made because the college has yet to be established. Further on in his answers he tried to give reasons why Captain Brand was appointed.

What amazes me is that the Department of National Defence, despite their efforts and their claims that they were going to reduce the overhead costs of that department, in the year 1963-64 came up with a budget in excess of any other budget since 1956-57 when the Liberals were last in office. This department claims to have brought about a great deal of saving in its expenditures and as part of this economy program they are dismissing men from the Royal Canadian Navy in advance of their normal time for retirement—men of high qualifications; I could start with Admiral Brock and go down the list to show that the government has retired any number of competent men prematurely, men well capable of filling this situation. Yet this government, a government so anxious to save the taxpayers' money, is now reaching into the retired field to come up with the appointment announced on October 16, 1964. This announcement was made in the name of the Minister of Transport who yesterday in this house tried to maintain again, I repeat, with a complete disregard for the truth, that no such appointment had been made. This is why I say it is most unfortunate that when members have an opportunity to bring questions forward at this time the responsible minister is not present to reply to the charges.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): The question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Cape Breton South was:

Was it necessary for the department to reach into the ranks of the retired to find an administrator for the proposed coastguard college at Point Edward?

Of course, the answer is that no administrator has been appointed for the proposed coastguard college at Point Edward. It is clear from the hon. member's remarks that he objects to the appointment of Captain Eric Brand as planning officer to do the organizational work in setting up this coastguard college. The hon. member argues that it was not necessary to have a retired officer to do this job. I would merely reply that he is quite right. It was not necessary, but anyone who knows anything about the subject of the coastguard college or the qualifications of Captain Brand would agree at once that it is highly desirable that the government should reach into the ranks of the retired to get such an outstanding person on a limited contract basis to do the necessary planning to set up this college. In this way, it will be possible to provide the finest training for young persons who need such training before entering upon any of the activities which are open to them by way of careers whether in the Department of Transport, the shipping industry or related activities which they may wish to pursue.

Having known something of the quality of Captain Brand's work at the time the maritime commission legislation was prepared and enacted—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; the minister's time has expired.

PENSIONS—CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, I have been asking for the resolution which precedes the new Canada pension plan to be called for debate at an early date. I have pointed out that our new rules will limit such a debate to one day and therefore, if this item of government business could be called, we could have the bill introduced and move one step further toward the adoption of this desirable measure.

When I put a further question about this matter to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) on orders of the day this afternoon he suggested that interim supply had higher priority, and in answer to a supplementary question he said that a day or two would not make any difference to the Canada pension plan. That of course was the reason I gave notice I would raise this question in the overtime period tonight. Putting this pension plan off for a day or two may not sound serious, but this is what has been going on since the present government came to power in the early part of 1963. We have been put off and put off with respect to this legislation until some of us wonder whether we will ever really get it.

I recognize, as all hon. members do, that the government has the full say as to what items of business will be called in government time, and I am not trying to usurp that right of the government. But the government also has an obligation to pay some attention to its promises. On the second day of this session the Prime Minister said in the house, in answer to a question of mine, that we would proceed with the Canada pension plan in the early days of this session. That was back in February. Prior to Easter, in response to further questions, he gave the assurance that we would deal with this matter before Easter; in fact, that we would get it to the special committee to be established for it. Then we were told later that this would be done before the summer recess. I suppose the excuse is that we did not have a summer recess.

So it has gone right throughout the months of this session; we keep being told that we are going to get this legislation soon. At last it is on the order paper in the form of the resolution that precedes the latest version of the Canada pension plan. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government is failing in its duty and is missing a golden opportunity by not calling this item tomorrow or Monday, or Tuesday at the latest. Let me repeat that once it is called it has to be dealt with within one day, so no time is lost. The government says that interim supply has top priority. I recognize the priority of interim supply, but I would point out what all of us who have been around here for any time are aware of, namely that the present interim supply debate is not a debate that is going to take place for a certain number of days; it is a debate that is going to take place until a certain date—probably about November 5, and on that date there may be a blow-up of some kind and it will be all over. We all know what is involved here. Just as soon as we get close to the brink, or just as soon as civil service salaries are in danger of not being paid, this debate will end. Therefore any day taken out of the present interim supply debate will not postpone the passing of interim supply; as a matter of fact it will save a day's debate on interim supply, and we will have had the debate on the resolution stage of the Canada pension plan and thus get the bill.

I submit further, Mr. Speaker, that if the government would have this one day's debate, which is the limit the rules allow, on the resolution preceding the Canada pension plan bill, we would then have the bill before us and this would be taken by all members of the house and all parties as a sign of good faith that the government intends to go ahead with this legislation. I also think it would have an effect on the temper of this house; I believe it would help the house to realize there is a firm intention to proceed during the next few weeks of this session with important and significant legislation.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I do not like the way we have been put off with respect to this matter week after week, month after month, for the past 18 months or so; and I do not think it is enough for the Prime Minister to say that another day or two will not make any difference. I say that it would make a difference if we were to take a day now on this resolution; otherwise such a day would just be lost in the interim supply debate. We should use that day to get the resolution stage over and get the bill introduced and given first reading. Then we will have the bill before us, it will be printed, it will be there for us all to see and for the country to see; and it will in fact be a sign of good faith that the government intends to proceed with this kind of important legislation, rather than with something else that might just take time and drag things out. If the government would agree to this course being followed we could thus make this session the significant and worth-while one that I believe we would yet like it to be, rather than just the longest session in history.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that the announcement has already been made tonight that we are going to have interim supply tomorrow and Monday, I put to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith), who I take it is the minister who is going to answer me, this simple question: Will the government not reconsider my proposal and call the resolution preceding the Canada pension plan tomorrow or Monday, or not later than Tuesday, so we may take this step forward with respect to this important piece of legislation?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the government is just as anxious to bring forward the Canada pension plan as is the hon. member. I must tell him that the government, as it sees its responsibility, considers that the first priority must be given to interim supply. I think that is elementary. That being the case interim supply has been indicated as the business for tomorrow and I think we will have to proceed in that way.

The next item of priority is, of course, the Canada pension plan resolution. The hon. member developed the argument, or really asserted the proposition, that the debate on interim supply would end at a certain date and that one day out of the period between now and that date would not make any difference. Perhaps I should refrain from picking up that argument now either one way or the other, but its inference is pretty clear. I would merely say that I will look at the point raised by the hon. member. In the light of his remarks if it is clear that the interim supply debate is going to end on a certain day anyway regardless of how much time is given to it in the meantime, I will certainly think over this argument and seek to bring forward the Canada pension plan at the earliest possible date that it can be brought forward.

Mr. Knowles: Early next week, let us hope.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.19 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 30, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DEACHMAN—REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF PRESS RELEASE RESPECTING FLAG COMMITTEE

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, in view of the publication of a story by me in the Ottawa Citizen yesterday a few minutes before the report of the flag committee was tabled, and in view of what was said about that in the house yesterday, I respectfully request Your Honour to have this matter referred to the committee on privileges and elections.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra made a suggestion to the house, but it would require an order of the house to carry out that suggestion. Before any action is taken one way or the other I feel it my duty to make one or two points.

It is undoubtedly a very serious thing to attack the conduct of any member of the House of Commons, and in that respect a specific charge should always be made, not a general charge. I am confirmed in this opinion by an excellent ruling, it seems to me, given by Mr. Speaker Michener on June 19, 1959, which appears at pages 583 and 584 of the Journals. I should like to refer to two short sentences in that ruling. I read from page 583:

> It has been strongly urged by some members that the house should not set in motion its power to try and to judge the conduct of a member unless such member is charged with a specific offence. It is urged further that not only must he be charged, but that he must be charged by a member of the House of Commons standing in his place.

These are the words of Mr. Speaker Michener:

> In my view, simple justice requires that no honourable member should have to submit to investigation of his conduct by the house or a committee until he has been charged with an offence.

Later on the same page, 584, I read:

> In the case before us no honourable member has taken the responsibility of making a specific charge against the honourable member for Peel.

The practice in the Canadian House of Commons, up to the present, has been to give notice of intention. Of course a true question of privilege can be raised at any time, but it should be raised immediately. It seems to me that the matter was referred to yesterday in fairly strong terms, and under the heading of "earliest opportunity" I think it conforms, in view of my statement that I was taken by surprise and would look into the matter.

The role of the Speaker is outlined in Beauchesne, citation 104, subsection 2. I must say that, accordingly, if the house wishes to refer this matter to the committee on privileges and elections, so be it. In my opinion it should not be concerned with the conduct of the member but should be more of an investigation into the matter. However, that is up to the house to decide. Since there is nothing before the Chair, I suggest that if it is the desire to look into this matter an order of the house should issue.

Is it the pleasure of the house to refer this matter to the committee on privileges and elections?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, if a motion were introduced to that effect, I would move an amendment to it. Unfortunately, there is none before the house.

If you simply ask that the matter be referred to the committee on privileges and elections, I would like to move an amendment; it would be my own suggestion regarding a motion designed to refer other related matters to the committee on privileges and elections.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There is no motion before the house at the moment, so obviously there cannot be any amendment. If the hon. member wishes to do anything he will have to take the responsibility of moving his own motion.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): May I be permitted to say something, Mr. Speaker, concerning your reference to your surprise yesterday on the question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: I do not see how any purpose could be served by that. I considered it my duty this morning to point out these few facts, which are very important, namely that no general charge should be made. In the circumstances I propose to continue by calling for the presenting of reports by standing and special committees.

TRIBUTES TO CLERK ASSISTANT ON RETIREMENT

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the attention of the house to an event which has for all of us its element of sadness, as I am sure it has for the gentleman concerned, although perhaps there is also an element of release and anticipation. I refer to the fact that this is the last day our Clerk Assistant, Mr. Montgomery, will be in his chair in the House of Commons.

Mr. Montgomery joined the public service in 1912 and entered the service of the House of Commons in 1915. He is in his fiftieth year of service to the house. With his service to the house he has combined other forms of public service, community service, civil service, war charities and war activities, and for all this over so many years we owe him a debt of gratitude which I am sure we are all very proud and happy to acknowledge this morning. We thank him for what he has done in the public service of Canada, and we wish him many years of happiness and enjoyment ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those times when there is unity in the House of Commons as we do an unusual honour to one who has devoted his life to the public service. The Prime Minister has spoken in detail of that service. All of us who have sat in this chamber know what Mr. Montgomery's contribution has meant. He has been kindly, courteous and always devoted to the welfare of those in this chamber. There will be universal regret that after a half century of service he is about to retire.

We have no means of showing our appreciation for those that serve us well. We have no decoration such as the Victorian Order in the United Kingdom, which permits the sovereign on behalf of the nation to show the appreciation of the nation. We take this means of saying to Mr. Montgomery how deeply grateful we have been, and indeed are, to him and to all those who serve us in this chamber in the capacity of Clerk, Clerk Assistant and the other officials who give of their best to their country. Too often we do not pay tribute to civil servants who serve us so well. This is one occasion when, through Mr. Montgomery, we can pay our tribute not only to him in affection, but also to all those who serve in the civil service in devotion to their country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I think you and all hon. members will realize that had it not been for the top priority afforded the Prime Minister I should have risen in my place and spoken to a question of privilege on this day, which is a sad occasion for this House of Commons.

All of us are aware of the loyalty and ability Mr. Montgomery as Clerk Assistant has given to the House of Commons collectively and to members individually. In order to complete the record of Mr. Montgomery's services I should like to add to the words of the right hon. Prime Minister, and record in Hansard the fact that Mr. Montgomery, the Clerk Assistant of this house, has been a federal civil servant for fifty years and four months. Added to that record is the astounding fact that he has been an employee of the House of Commons for forty-nine years and three months, and for the past 13 years has been Clerk Assistant.

In addition to these services Mr. Montgomery has accepted other responsibilities from time to time. He has had a keen interest in and knowledge of the commonwealth parliamentary association. For the past 13 years he has been either assistant secretary or secretary of that association. I doubt whether there is any man in the commonwealth, except perhaps at the head office in London, who knows more of the details about that association and its work.

Although Mr. Montgomery today is resigning from his position as Clerk Assistant, we in the commonwealth parliamentary association are very pleased that at our last executive meeting he offered to continue his services and lend his knowledge to the work that association must do, commencing next month, in preparing for the commonwealth parliamentary association conference which will be held in Canada in 1967. I am sure I express the appreciation and gratitude of all of us to Mr. Montgomery, who has informed the executive of the C.P.A. of his availability. That offer demonstrates just why we hold him in such affection and believe that although retiring from one position, he will yet be available to serve Canada in years to come.

On behalf of this group, sir, I add our expression of good will and our wishes for his good health and his opportunity to serve Canada for many years ahead.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a genuine pleasure to be able to say a few words in support of the remarks made by the Prime Minister and representatives of the other parties with regard to our respected and beloved fellow worker in the House of Commons, Mr. Montgomery. In the few short years it has been my privilege to be a member of the house I have come to appreciate in a very special way his constant and continual friendly helpfulness. This applies not only to his official responsibilities, but has been carried over so many times beyond the normal call of duty to little things that he was under no obligation to do. I think this is one of the reasons those of us who have come to know him on that basis refer to him affectionately as "Monty." We regard him as more than just a fellow worker and friend. We regard him as what he truly is, a devoted and dedicated public servant and citizen of Canada.

On behalf of myself personally as well as the other members of our group may I say that he is certainly worthy of all the kindly words that have been uttered, and the brevity of my remarks in no way reflects the depth of our appreciation for him. We appreciate the fact that he is going to continue to be with us. We join in the remarks that have just been made with regard to the tremendous contribution he has made to the commonwealth parliamentary association, and we are indeed pleased that in serving that important organization he will continue to be with us.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, we gladly endorse the words spoken by the Prime Minister regarding an exemplary official, Mr. Montgomery, who has always performed his duties with tact and complete devotion.

We, members of the Ralliement Créditiste, also wish to Mr. Montgomery many years of good health and happiness outside the House of Commons. We are sorry to see him go, but we extend to him our best wishes for the future.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: There are a few occasions on which the Speaker is permitted to utter some pleasant words and this is one of them, inasmuch as the recipient of all these tributes cannot speak for himself, nor can the Clerk, the second clerk assistant or at this moment the Deputy Speaker or the deputy chairman of committees. Perhaps hon. members would allow me to say that since occupying this exalted and privileged position I have had the utmost loyalty from Mr. Montgomery, together with great efficiency of service and kindness. We regret that circumstances of health and one or two other reasons force him to take this decision, but we hope that his well earned leave and rest will be very pleasant and that he will enjoy many years of leisure and even co-operative effort in regard to certain government activities.

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT HOUSE LEADERSHIP

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I should like to make an announcement which may be of interest to the house. Some weeks ago the Minister of Justice, the house leader on this side, indicated to me his desire to be relieved from the functions of house leader because of the responsibilities he was bearing as Minister of Justice and leader of the party in Quebec. He made known his desire in this matter in the House of Commons as well. At that time I asked him if he would remain in his position as house leader until the summer recess.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I think it is fairly clear now that there is not going to be a summer recess, at least not this summer. I have therefore acceded to the request of the Minister of Justice to be relieved of his functions as house leader, and I have asked the President of the Privy Council to take on the functions of house leader for the remainder of this session.

NEWSPAPER SPECULATION AS TO EARLY ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. According to some newspaper headlines a general election could take place soon. Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the house whether the government favours an early election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not believe all that he reads in the newspapers.

JUVENILE DELINQUENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONFINEMENT OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-133, to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

He said: The Fauteux committee on judicial services recommended, among other things, that children or juveniles of the age of 16 years or less should not be confined in a penitentiary or other jail or lock-up where adults are also confined. This was brought forcibly to our attention when during a visit to St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary we met and spoke with a young lad of 15 years of age at that institution.

The purpose of this bill is to put into effect that particular recommendation of the Fauteux committee and, because the language of the act at the present time is not as precise as it could be, there are some changes proposed in the definition of "child" in order to make it clear that the purpose of the bill is to provide that no child of the age of 16 or under shall be confined in a penal institution where adults are also confined.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

POSSIBLE ACTION RESPECTING ONTARIO SUPREME COURT JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In the absence of the Minister of Justice I direct this question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with a matter which was raised some days ago regarding Mr. Justice Landreville, who was granted leave of absence during the period in which this case was before the courts.

I have seen in the press that on Monday he intends to resume his judicial duties. Has the government made a decision that no commission shall be appointed to look into this question; and does not the Prime Minister feel that in all the circumstances, the evidence having been what it was, if a decision has not been made on the question of a commission, leave of absence should be continued until a determination is made as to what the government will do in this connection?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): My colleague the Minister of Justice, answering a similar question the other day, said he would be making a statement on this matter. I have nothing to add to that. When he has a statement ready it will be made to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I point out that the judge will resume his sittings on Monday, while this matter remains unsettled by the government; and the administration of justice naturally demands that whatever decision is made should be made before his lordship goes back on the bench.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

DELAY IN APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER RESPECTING RUN-THROUGHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Can the Prime Minister give an indication of the reasons for the delay in appointing a commission of inquiry into the railway matter which developed last week?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The delay has certainly not been a long one, but I regret even a short delay. A commissioner was approached and we had hoped he would accept the appointment; he gave us some reason to believe it would be possible. We have now learned it will not be possible for him to do so, and we are making inquiries of another suitable commissioner. I hope we shall be able to make an announcement very shortly.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

SOUTHERN RHODESIA—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): In the light of press reports that the strong action taken by the Prime Minister of Great Britain with regard to the critical situation in Rhodesia has received strong support from the government of Canada and the governments of other commonwealth countries, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs give a report to the house on the latest developments in the policy of independence which is being pursued by the prime minister of Rhodesia?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The prime minister of Southern Rhodesia has announced that the referendum shortly to be held in Southern Rhodesia will not be regarded by his government as a mandate for a unilateral declaration of independence.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Could he tell us what is the present situation of our troops in Cyprus and what our Canadians are achieving on that island?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian troops, which are part of the United Nations force, are still performing the duties which that force was asked to perform, that is, to maintain peace as it exists presently at Cyprus.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Is the hon. minister aware that, or can we accept the truthfulness of a statement to the effect that soldiers from other countries lead the life of pashas in Cyprus while our Canadian soldiers live like pariahs?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept this statement which was mentioned in the house this morning.

I read an article which was written recently in a newspaper on that subject. We examined those insinuations, and we can assure the house that they are not well founded.

[Text]

EDUCATION

REQUEST OF UNIVERSITIES FOR INCREASE IN PER CAPITA PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I would direct a question to the Prime Minister. Did the national conference of Canadian universities ask for any increase in the per capita amounts now paid to the various universities? In the light of the view he expressed, that education should be free, does the right hon. gentleman agree that the time has come for an increase in these per capita payments, particularly because of the very great increase in the operating costs of universities since 1962, when the last increase was brought in, which had the effect of doubling the grant previously paid?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Whether or not the recent meeting of the universities council discussed this matter I am not sure, though I suspect it did. But no request for additional assistance has been received from that meeting which, as a matter of fact, closed only last night. I do not know whether such a request will be made.

With regard to the observation made by the right hon. gentleman, however, I would point out that the amount of direct assistance from the federal treasury to the universities of Canada this year reaches a figure of $224 million, which is much greater than has been the case in any year in the past.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): A supplementary question. In his speech to the association the Prime Minister underlined the laudable desirability of free higher education for young Canadians. Does this mean that the government is about to announce a federal university scholarship plan? My second question is this. Will the government soon announce its priorities in the field of social interests, inasmuch as we are also about to discuss a pension scheme and questions of importance relating to a national health plan?

Mr. Pearson: As far as the first question is concerned, perhaps the hon. member did not read the text of what I said. While I personally approve of education being free for all Canadians who are able to qualify for it, I said this was an ideal which would not be possible of realization for some time. As a matter of fact, at the present time there are educational experts who would not consider that to top their list of priorities, though I still believe that is eventually the ideal that should be realized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pearson: So far as the second question is concerned, it is a much wider question of policy and priorities generally, and when a statement of that kind can be made it will be made in the house—and I hope before long—in connection with the present program of work. Perhaps we will be discussing that at the party leaders' meeting on Monday morning.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the answer of the Prime Minister indicates the death knell of the vaunted university scholarship plan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that scheme is far from being dead.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I see; just dormant.

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Do the government plan to contribute financially to the recently announced expansion of medical, dental and nursing training facilities in Ontario, and in particular will they consider contributing the 50 per cent recommended by the Hall commission report?

STUDENT LOANS—INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER PARTICIPATING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance has any recent figures as to the number of students who have taken advantage of the student loans program.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not an up to date assessment but a meeting has been called for about the middle of next month to discuss with provincial officials the effectiveness of the scheme and the way it is going. After that meeting has taken place I may have some figures, in which case I would be very glad to supply them.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary question. When the minister is making his statement to the house to the student loans program I wonder whether he would have those figures broken down by provinces.

Mr. Gordon: I would be very glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe). Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Minister of Finance tell us whether his department has handed over to the province of Quebec the share that is due to that province under the student loans program?

Could he tell the amount the province of Quebec received under this program?

[Mr. Pearson.]

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to do that. I would remind my hon. friend that the government of the province of Quebec is perfectly qualified and, believe me, it usually proceeds to look after the best interests of that province.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Minister of Finance mean to imply that members from Quebec ought not to ask questions in the house and that it is neither in their interest nor in the interest of the population to ask questions?

If that is what the Minister of Finance means to imply, Mr. Speaker, this arrogance—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understood the Minister of Finance to say the members from Quebec were extremely capable and efficient.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I agree with your statement, but that is not what the Minister of Finance said.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no question of privilege here. There was no implication in the remarks of the minister; quite the contrary.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: When you read Hansard tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, you will see that there were grounds for the question of privilege.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Whenever a Canadian student goes to the United States in order to carry on his schooling, can the students' assistance scheme be used in that case, so that the Canadian student attending an institution in the United States can take advantage of the loans guaranteed by the federal government?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Yes, Mr. Speaker, if the university in question is designated by the province in question.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST THAT PENDING LEGISLATION BE CONSIDERED BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which was for the Minister of Labour but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary, who from his seat is always asking for a question. It is a matter of importance to the maritime members. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary could advise the house whether the Minister of Labour has received a wire from the maritime motor transport association regarding Bill No. C-126, which asks that the matter be referred to the standing committee on industrial relations. If the minister has received this wire, what decision if any has been reached on it?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to receive the question on behalf of the Minister of Labour and to inform the hon. member that a number of telegrams have been received with respect to Bill No. C-126. All of them are being given active consideration. I shall bring this specific question to the minister's attention when he returns later today.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED PRESENCE IN CANADA OF U.S. NAZI LEADER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and because of the importance of this question to our security, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I ask whether the Prime Minister will have inquiries made to see whether one George Lincoln Rockwell, the president of the nazi party in the United States, was registered within the last week under his own name in the Hotel Georgia in the city of Vancouver, B.C.; and if so, whether he would also cause an inquiry to be made into the operations of the immigration branch to discover how it is that, to use Mr. Rockwell's own words in the program "This Hour has Seven Days", this creep was permitted to come into Canada.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, he crept in.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I will be happy to make inquiries along the lines indicated, because he is not the kind of man we want in this country—even as a visitor.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. With regard to his reference to how Rockwell got into Canada, are we now to understand that Mr. Banks took the same route out?

An hon. Member: He rode out in his Cadillac.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NON-PARTICIPATION BY INDIANS IN DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena asked me a question about the conference on Indian affairs which is now taking place. I have had this question looked into, and am informed that several individuals objected to the holding of this conference without Indian representation and that a telegram was received from the president of the native brotherhood of British Columbia by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on October 28, the evening before the conference started. Mr. Williams, the president, in effect said that the conference was a step in the right direction, but that it would be wrong and undemocratic for any agreement to be reached between the federal and provincial governments without the British Columbia Indians participating. He said the Indians must be consulted and fully informed. That is also the position of the federal government.

The purpose of this conference is to discover—and this is its only purpose, or an important one—whether it is possible for the federal government to formulate programs with each of the provinces for submission to Indians and consideration by them. If it is found as a result of this conference that progress can be made in bringing services needed in Indian communities through provincial facilities, then the matter will be discussed with the Indians. The federal government has made clear, and I am glad to confirm this, that at each step the Indians must be consulted in advance of changes which affect them in any way.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister if he is aware that the province of Ontario brought to the conference, as one of its delegates, a native Indian person. Could not the federal government have done likewise and invited native people to attend the conference, even if they had to do it by way of attaching those native people to the federal government's delegation?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the fact, but I do agree that if the circumstances make it possible to attach an Indian to a federal delegation at a conference of this kind, that would be a very proper course to follow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO BE CONSIDERED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the right hon. gentleman to make any concrete proposals to the house with regard to the organization of parliamentary business over the next several weeks, which will enable the house to get on with important legislation such as the Canada pension plan before being forced to deal with his pet project, the flag?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is no doubt a matter that the party leaders and perhaps the house leaders will be discussing. Certainly we will be having a meeting, as I have said, on Monday, when the question of parliamentary business will be discussed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INCREASES IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. On several occasions over the past eight or ten weeks the minister indicated that by the end of this month he would be in a position to make a statement to the house with regard to war veterans allowances and other veterans pensions. Is he now in a position to make such a statement?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is quite correct that during the last eight or ten weeks in answer to questions, including one from the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, I indicated that I hoped to be in a position to make a recommendation by the end of this month. I am now in a position to inform the house that there will be a government announcement within the next two weeks with respect to these matters.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN POSITION ON ADMISSION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that the new Labour government in London has declared its intention to support communist China's admission to the United Nations at the December 1 meeting, can the minister assure us that Canada will not support the English government in this move?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member study the statement I made in this house on May 22 last.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should remind the Secretary of State for External Affairs that on May 22 there was no Labour government in London and Great Britain had not announced her intention of supporting communist China's admission to the United Nations.

Now that a Labour government is in office, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us whether he will support Great Britain in this matter?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is making a statement.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—USE OF ICEBREAKERS TO CLEAR CHANNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Inasmuch as the breakwater now being built near Champlain bridge will not be completed before the next spring break up, is the Minister of Transport considering the possibility of using icebreakers to keep the St. Lawrence river ice-free this coming winter, so the islands where the world fair is to be located may be protected?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to look into that and answer on Monday.

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister assure the house that there will be no extension of subsidies for winter navigation to provide extended ice-breaker services at the expense of the ports of Saint John and Halifax?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty complicated question which I think I should consider very carefully over the week end, and I will give an answer to the hon. gentleman on Monday.

POWER

ONTARIO—LOCATION AND CAPACITY OF PROPOSED NUCLEAR PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Fred F. Stenson (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry. I should like to ask the minister whether the capacity of the nuclear electric station to be built under a federal-Ontario agreement for Ontario hydro is being increased to two million kilowatts. I should also like to ask him whether a site for this station has yet been chosen.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): With respect to the last part of the question may I say Ontario hydro has submitted a proposed site to the atomic energy control board of Canada for approval. In response to the first part of the question, Ontario hydro is giving consideration to enlarging the capacity of the plant at a future date from one million to in excess of two million kilowatts.

WATER RESOURCES

ONTARIO—CONSERVATION WORKS ON CREDIT RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources told us we would soon have a decision on the urgent matter of the Credit river conservation scheme in Toronto. In view of the urgency of this matter has a decision been reached and, if so, what is the nature of the decision? If no decision has been reached, when can we expect one?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the inquiry of the hon. member was prompted by a story which appeared in the Globe and Mail two days ago, in which it was intimated that a favourable decision might be forthcoming in this matter.

We are still considering this proposal and may be for a short while yet, and I want to tell my hon. friend why. The benefit is almost 71 per cent applicable to recreation as against other uses, in other words the purposes of flood control, avoidance of possible flood damage, and so on. I am going to admit very frankly that this heavy proportion of recreational use applicable under the act is worrying my officials. It has been suggested, and it was suggested in the article, that there might be a division of responsibility among the first, second and third phases and the final phase, and we are looking into that matter now.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of international importance for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. First I should like to congratulate the minister on having been elected honorary president for Canada for the international co-operation year. In the light of his new interest in international co-operation I should like to ask him whether he has given consideration to the appointment of the hon. member for Red Deer, a man of wide African experience, as the Canadian adviser to the Zambian space program.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would treat this question as one of great seriousness coming as it does from such an erudite and scholarly student of international problems. I may say that I have not given consideration to this particular proposal, but I do recognize that the hon. member for Red Deer is perhaps one of those members of this house best qualified to speak with some authority on African affairs.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE USE OF FORMER R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry whether he is now in a position to advise, as was generally indicated would be the case, that a decision has been made by October 28 relative to the Kitsilano park property in British Columbia and the request on the part of the C.B.C. for part of that property. Will the minister say what is the present position in this connection?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the house will be aware that some time ago a delegation from the city of Vancouver came to Ottawa to discuss alternative proposals concerning the use by the C.B.C. of the property at Kitsilano. Discussion arose, and in particular it was suggested that the use of the building at Kitsilano by the C.B.C. would be acceptable to the city of Vancouver if it were for a temporary period. An examination is now being made to determine whether the limited period tentatively proposed by the city would in fact be economically practicable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister and ask him what that period was.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, that period was 15 years.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF RETIRED NAVAL OFFICER AS ADMINISTRATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. Is there a naval officer who has recently retired, or about to be retired, who is qualified as a planning officer for the coastguard college?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question requiring at least a little research, and I suggest that the hon. member put it on the order paper.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, we have been informed in the past by the minister that this research in relation to retiring officers prior to their normal retirement is continually going on, and I believe that any such officers retiring prematurely should be placed in these other positions.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making a statement. There was no dispute about his question. It is a normal, average question which should be placed on the order paper.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, you referred to my question as an average question. That is exactly right. We have been informed that research in this regard is going on each and every day by departments of government. I am only asking whether there is any co-operation among the departments, and whether there is a naval officer qualified for the position to which I refer.

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1965.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, during the last few days in committee of supply we have been talking about the C.B.C. Yesterday I attempted to discuss another problem, but I was ruled out of order. Today I wish to change the subject somewhat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I am pleased to be met with such approval, and I hope that approval will remain throughout the remarks I intend to make. One of the most striking questions which face this nation today is whether we are going to retain the kind of strong central government which the Fathers of Confederation planned when this country became a union of four nations, or four provinces, in 1867.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I have hardly got started, but if you have a question I will try to answer it.

Mr. Regan: Am I to understand the hon. member is a supporter of the compact theory of confederation, which seemed to have been disposed of by the late Hon. Norman Rogers in the 1930's? Am I to further understand that the hon. member is suggesting that there were four nations which joined together in 1867? Is the hon. member not aware that the union between Ontario and Quebec preceded that event by some 25 years?

Mr. Woolliams: I do not intend to get into an argument about constitutional law with my good friend, but I am always very interested in his questions. I am sure if he listens to the address I have prepared he will understand what I feel should be taking place in reference to a strong central government in Ottawa. Perhaps I should answer his question in this way. I do not believe this nation can survive if we are to have ten balkan states. We cannot exist with the kind of loose network of federalism which has been perpetuated by this government.

The present government makes reference to co-operative federalism. I believe it was this party which actually coined that expression. Unfortunately coined words are used in different ways. This government is placing a different interpretation on that coined expression than was intended. The charge I make is that the Pearson government is Canada's assassin, and that you are all honorary pallbearers to this nation. I did not intend to get into that type of address immediately but did so because of the question the hon. member posed.

Canada is still a very young nation made up of people with many cultures and traditions. The population in western Canada, which is made up of people of many ethnic origins, feel very deeply about this fact. They realize that this nation was created by people who came to this land from all the countries of Europe and Asia with deep rooted hatred and prejudice toward one another. These prejudices, hatreds and animosities were the result of European wars fought by their fathers and grandfathers. One could perhaps say that in Europe the Germans hated the French, the British disliked them both, while the Russians disliked all three.

These people came to Canada in search of a new nation and a new destiny with these prejudices, animosities and hatreds buried in their hearts and bosoms. They found, whether they settled in villages, towns or on farms, and whatever avocations the neighbours over the back fences had chosen, be they German, English, French or of another ethnic origin, they were the same kind of people. These people realized that the neighbours had different cultures, traditions and backgrounds, but they had also come to Canada in search of a new destiny, and that they were all friends after all.

The most important thing we must keep in mind in dealing with a nation is that these prejudices and animosities were buried long ago. I believe Canada was the first country to legislate in respect of freedom of religion. I think Canada did so even before Great Britain and other countries, who are looked upon as the mothers of liberty and freedom.

Mr. Woolliams: Surely the hon. member is not going to take the position that the rules of law and tradition we inherited from the Anglo Saxon system are bad. I have always maintained that the rules of law we have in our democracy represent the kind of freedoms that all Canadians enjoy. We do enjoy these freedoms because of those rules of law. A very simple example can be found in the fact that our children can leave their homes, whether they be in Scarborough, Calgary or Montreal, travel to school and return home safely. That is the case not because of the efforts of any one province but because of the protection given to individuals by the rules of law against infringement by the state or other individuals.

Many people feel that Canada is a union of two nations. If they mean that this nation is a union of two great cultures and traditions I agree completely. If they mean that this nation is a union of two completely different states, then I cannot agree. It is now a union of ten provinces. Canada began as a union of four provinces, whether that union took place ten years or 25 years after a union between two provinces. The nation finally became a union of ten provinces.

That is the kind of country we have, but I say that if we are now to weaken the very fabric of confederation by taking away the powers of the strong, central federal government we will end up as 10 nations, 10 balkanized states, and the nation will finally dissolve.

An hon. Member: You are exaggerating.

Mr. Woolliams: My friend says I am exaggerating. He would know something about exaggeration, because he is a master of exaggeration and imagination. I do not want to get into an argument with him and perhaps he might bear with me. I have listened to his views, and I have learned a lot from the hon. member. I admit that he takes a different position from mine. I was born and raised in another province with a different culture. We who were born and raised in western Canada have our culture, our traditions and our heritage. Are we not permitted to present our arguments with regard to confederation? Is this not one Canada? Is the argument to be all one sided, with only one doctrine preached and not both sides of the picture? How can we ever hold the country together in that way? If we all think alike there is no thinking. That is my answer to that hon. member.

Let us take a look at what has really gone on. I say and I really believe that the present government—this may be strong language—has been Canada's assassin and is now acting as honorary pallbearer at its funeral.

An hon. Member: Oh, well—

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody says "oh, well". I want to say this afternoon—it is afternoon by now—that in the minds of the people of western Canada this government has been playing the grasshopper game. What do I mean by that? The two great players in this game are the present Prime Minister and Mr. Lesage. They are the players in the grasshopper game, and they hop in and hop out of certain federal economic programs.

We have some proven programs. We have the winter works program, the vocational training program, even unemployment insurance. Let us deal with unemployment insurance. When it was first brought before the House of Commons in the days of R. B. Bennett it was charged that the act was unconstitutional, but after an amendment to the constitution unemployment insurance finally became the law and applied to all Canadians.

I am going to have something to say about the British North America Act itself, but surely under confederation those things that apply to all Canadians and are common to all of us, those things which are not of local concern to the province of Quebec or Alberta or Ontario, are national in scope. Sometimes we have had to get agreement on the part of the provinces because of the wording of the act, but I say that any federal government that makes deals with Mr. Lesage or any other premier to hop in and out of economic programs which have already been proven is an assassin of the country and is acting as honorary pallbearer at its funeral.

Mr. Pepin: Those words will come back to you.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear my friend saying something. The Liberals do not like what I am saying because they know it is true. I want to deal with my second point, the constitution itself. A question was put to the Prime Minister yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, and the Prime Minister, I believe, answered that there was no change in the new formula for amendment of the constitution from that sponsored by Hon. Davie Fulton, the former minister of justice.

I say that is untrue. It is not intellectually correct and it is not legally correct. I see the Minister of Transport looking at me. I look upon him as one of the intellectuals of the house in this regard, and I think he will be able to look at the act and see that intellectually speaking what the Prime Minister said was not correct. I do not say any more than that. I do not think the Prime Minister deliberately got up and gave a false opinion. I do say you will find that intellectually there is a difference in the formula. That is my first charge.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman has put a question to me, and if he will give me the page I should like to answer it. Could the hon. gentleman give me the page in Hansard?

Mr. Woolliams: I may be thinking of another question, but that is the way it seemed to me yesterday.

Mr. Pickersgill: I listened to the Prime Minister, and I would rather read exactly what he said.

Mr. Woolliams: Let us read what he said.

Mr. Pickersgill: If somebody can find the page faster than I can—

Mr. Woolliams: Anyway, let us have your interpretation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not want to give any interpretation. I want to read it.

Mr. Woolliams: If the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wants to make a speech when I am finished and contradict me, let him do so. He was going to ask a question. I do not think he has risen on a question of privilege. He has not addressed the Chair and I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I have the floor and I have only 20 minutes left. I have a lot to say as far as the constitution is concerned, and I would appreciate it if the minister would resume his seat and allow me to proceed.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have it right here and I can read it right away. I think I can satisfy the hon. gentleman completely.

Mr. Woolliams: Have you asked permission of the Chair to get on your feet?

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought I had permission but, of course, if the hon. gentleman does not want me to—

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister then be prepared to agree to the extension of my time by the amount of my time he is taking now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Delighted. I love to hear the hon. gentleman speak.

Mr. Woolliams: Fine.

Mr. Pickersgill: Here is what the Prime Minister said, Mr. Chairman, as found on page 9547 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, in so far as the delegation of federal powers to the provinces is concerned there is no difference.

He was referring to the delegation of federal powers to the provinces. I believe there is a slight difference with regard to the delegation of provincial powers to this parliament but in so far as the delegation of federal powers is concerned, that is decentralization, the Prime Minister said yesterday that the formula was identical with the Fulton formula, and I believe that can be ascertained by any person competent to read.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Page the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Woolliams: For two reasons I am not going to be as nasty as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. First, he has been ill and has just returned to the House of Commons. Second, I have always looked upon those men who were members of the house before I arrived here as my seniors. Therefore I am not going to hand back that kind of sarcasm.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Hon. members can laugh. I see that one of the backbenchers on the other side has now moved up to the front bench but that is neither here nor there. You can laugh, but I say to the minister that when he implies I am not competent to read I will let the record speak for me. That is what the minister implied. I am not going to be sidetracked, but I will say in answer—

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not imply that.

Mr. Woolliams: —to the minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might be allowed to apologize to the hon. gentleman. I was not implying for one minute that he was not competent to read. I was just suggesting that perhaps he had not yet had the time to do so.

Mr. Woolliams: Again we have sarcasm and we have the boys who laugh at the sarcasm. I will answer in this vein. The other day I picked up an article which was very critical of myself and another member because we had said certain things in the house. I should like to say, and I hope the press is listening—I do not like saying this because many on the other side are my friends—that when we were on the government side of the house there was never anything to equal the howling and shouting of the backbenchers of the Liberal party at this time. You laugh, you scoff, you shout. If a member does work to prepare a speech he might as well pack it up, because he is howled and shouted down by the backbenchers in the Liberal party. I see one of the distinguished members of the Liberal party sitting back there, and I am sure he will agree with me that if you differ with what I say and have something to say yourself, you should have the decency and courtesy to get on your feet and argue like gentlemen rather than howling like wolves. I come back now to what the minister said.

An hon. Member: Say something intelligent.

Mr. Woolliams: You say "is that intelligent". I am not going to be sidetracked. I ask the chairman to bring the committee to order. I intend to finish my remarks in spite of the howling and shouting in which members on the other side are now engaged.

This is my answer to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I have not checked this, but when this matter was first brought before the house it was my interpretation of the Prime Minister's language that he meant that in a day or two this matter would be debated and quickly approved because the 10 provincial premiers had approved it and the government had approved it.

But this is too serious a matter for that kind of treatment. That is why a member of the New Democratic party quite properly rose and said they were going to fight it. I would ask the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to take a look at what the Winnipeg Free Press has had to say in this regard. He will find there an entirely different slant placed on the interpretation of the Fulton formula and the present Liberal government formula. I believe that in the guise of bringing the constitution home and in the guise of toadying to the separatists in the province of Quebec, the Liberal government was slipping a fast one over on the people of Canada.

Why do I say that? I say that because we all know, every political science student knows, that certain powers were delegated to Ottawa and certain powers were delegated to the provinces. I think it is fair to say that this division of powers was preserved under the Fulton formula, but what happens to them under the formula laid down by the Liberal party?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no difference in that.

Mr. Woolliams: The minister says there is no difference. I would be interested in hearing him explain this; I should like to get him on the record. I have always thought the Winnipeg Free Press was a fairly reliable newspaper, even though I have not agreed with it because it seems to be pro Liberal and I am pro Conservative. In the days of Mr. Dafoe all of us in Canada, wherever we lived, realized it was a newspaper of national importance because of the way the editorials were written on those issues affecting the nation as a whole. I wonder if the minister has had occasion to read the issue of October 26, 1964, which carries the editorial headed "A Formula for Constitutional Chaos". The premier's draft of changes in the B.N.A. Act is also set out on the same page.

If I have time I will place some of this editorial on the record. The minister will find there exactly what I suggest our position is. I am going to repeat the charge I level at this government, and it is a serious charge. This is a very important issue. It is not something to be played with, because our whole country is at stake when we change the constitution. It is through these powers that parliament operates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would allow me to ask him a question.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if I can finish my remarks, please.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, of course; I would not think of intruding.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not want to be rude, but I have hurt my friend's feelings. If he will bear with me, I should like to hear what he has to say when I have completed my remarks. As I say, I should like to get him on record about this matter.

I should like to make my personal recommendation to the government right now. I hope the government will allow the top constitutional lawyers, the top political scientists of this country, to examine this proposal thoroughly. Let us have it out in the open. I have a deep suspicion—and I think this is why the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate keeps asking me questions—that under the guise of bringing home the constitution we are in danger of weakening the powers of the central government and dividing up this country into ten balkan states. You, sir, give in to the separatists of the province of Quebec.

An hon. Member: Now you are starting to divide Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear some of them shouting about the province of Quebec. I believe this, and I will say it not only in this house but elsewhere; I believe the people of Quebec want a strong country just as those in any other part of the nation do. It is time that we spoke up like leaders instead of trying to soft soap the whole problem we have in this country. You are never going to cure the patient by giving him these weak soda pills. If the patient has something wrong and he needs surgery, we have to use surgery. All you are doing is saying yes. In fact I often think of that song from the famous play "Oklahoma", "I'm just a girl who can't say no". Now, you never say no. You never measure up to your responsibilities.

There were certain powers delegated to the central government, and certain powers delegated to the provinces. This party has been on record for years in favour of bringing the constitution home so that Canada can attain full nationhood in every respect. I am in favour of it, and this party has been in favour of it. I believe everyone in Canada is in favour of it. If under the guise of bringing home the constitution, because everybody is so happy to see it come home, we carve up and destroy this nation, then I say to the Liberal party that the responsibility rests on their shoulders. You are the assassins of this country.

When they talk about separatists they laugh. We do not even have to go to the province of Quebec to find separatists now. We have one man, a Liberal premier, who has said that if anything happens, if things go wrong, he will join with the United States. I am referring to Mr. Thatcher, the premier of Saskatchewan. This is his latest pronouncement made in Montreal. He was going down to Montreal to appease these people to whom this government will not say no and to whom this government should say no. If the government of Alberta, even though it is my home province, wanted to do something which was detrimental to this country I should hope this government would exercise the kind of responsibility it should exercise, and say no. I would hope that if I were the premier of that province and asked for something that would destroy Canada, this government would say no. The charge I make against you is that you are not statesmen, you are politicians. You never do anything that will prevent the Liberals from winning; let us destroy Canada. This is the charge I make.

I say this. You should pick out the ten top constitutional men or women—

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: No, I am going to finish. This is the thing about which I have complained before. As soon as you get to some point that is important, they want to ask questions. These Liberal backbenchers are not allowed to speak for themselves, and any time you get up to say something that represents Canada as a whole you get nothing but interruptions, especially from the hon. member for York-Scarborough. If he wants to hold a meeting, let him go to Hull and hold a meeting; that is where meetings are held. We should have a committee composed of the top men and women in this country to examine what the Grits are doing. Let us place this matter carefully before a committee. Let us not rush into a situation that is going to result in this nation being carved up and those powers guaranteed under the B.N.A. Act being changed.

What does the Winnipeg Free Press say might happen under this formula? I believe the man who wrote this article, Maurice Western, is one of our top students at the University of Saskatchewan. You should argue the merits of this question with Maurice Western. This is what the Winnipeg Free Press says—I see you are watching and listening, and I am pleased about this, because this is an important issue. A province may not agree with the appointment of judges by the federal government. Some people agree that today some of these appointments are not of the calibre they should be. Premier Manning might say "We have no Social Crediters on the bench," and indeed it may be difficult to find any in that province. Then what about trade? Are we going to build up tariffs across Alberta, across Quebec and across Ontario? If you continue to erode the powers of the central government you destroy this nation.

I say to you that if you are ready to implement what you say you are going to implement, then you are going to destroy this nation, and as a result of that I charge you with being Canada's assassin. You are the honorary pallbearers at the funeral. There are so few ministers on the front benches that there will be very few pallbearers at the funeral.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no one on the front benches on the hon. member's side.

Mr. Woolliams: I suppose you are right. The minister is getting a big laugh to acknowledge his remarks. I say this. You have the responsibility of government; you are the people who were going to govern with responsibility. I say that you have done everything but be responsible. You have been most irresponsible in carving up and destroying this nation.

Let us look at another picture. This is the second point I make. First, you have played the economic grasshopper game; then you have attempted to destroy the constitution of this nation. I want to come to something now to which everyone seems afraid to refer.

When the Queen came to Canada, what did the government do? What was the response from the government? I say you brought the crown, not the Queen—the Queen is a person but the crown is an integral part of parliament—into politics. If the Prime Minister of this country had had his way he would have had her unfurl a new flag, a flag which represented one of the most divisive issues in this country. He would have dragged the crown, an integral part of the parliamentary system of this country, down into the gutter of politics.

If the Prime Minister were here he would be saying that I am dragging this matter into the gutter. Well, I want to say to him this; that there will be more of us sitting on the curb, dragging our feet in the gutter if he has his way, because he will be there too.

I protest on three points. One is the economic grasshopper game you are playing; the second is what you are doing to the constitution, and the third is what you are doing to the crown. You are responsible for carving up and disrupting the nation. I should like to hear from the minister. There are two ministers over there.

An hon. Member: Three.

Mr. Woolliams: Three.

An hon. Member: Four.

Mr. Woolliams: All right, there are four. Anyhow, I will say this to the minister. I should like him to get up now and answer this question. Are you prepared to have your formula analysed carefully by top constitutional men, top political scientists, so that you know exactly what you are doing in bringing home the constitution?

An hon. Member: I thought you knew.

Mr. Woolliams: Here is a fellow who says "I thought you knew". Let me answer that for a moment. I see the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice here, but I am not going to say anything to him. You know what I am thinking. You know what he said, but he never measures up. Be careful. I know exactly what you said to the committee, and you never measured up. I do not want to be interrupted by you because I may say something I shall regret.

I say this to the member behind you, the man who said "I thought you knew". Do you think there is anything wrong with the idea? What are you hiding? I think you will agree with me that the Prime Minister is not a constitutional man. There are very few who understand fully the conditions of the constitution. We have had the judicial committee of the privy council, we have had the Supreme Court of Canada interpret this act ever since confederation. When you compare it with the United States, they had a weak central government and strong state governments. The purpose of our confederation was to have a strong central government and weaker provincial governments. The courts have interpreted the constitution in Canada so as to erode somewhat the central government, but at least we have that interpretation; we know where we stand. But if we put into the hands of the provinces the right to change the powers given to the federal government we will destroy this country and create a new parliament; we will create a council almost equal to the council which used to sit around Khrushchev in this respect, that they were all powerful.

I think the provincial premiers have faced up to their responsibilities, but what you will have done is destroy this House of Commons and substitute provincial premiers to run this nation as ten balkan states. That is the charge I make. I say that in changing the constitution what you have done is this; you have given the provinces the right to change the powers given to the central government and delegate them to the provinces. That is the charge, and that is why it should be called "a formula for constitutional chaos".

You might say why did the provinces not raise their voice? Well, if the provinces come down for something and get something plus, through their premiers, are they going to say no? So this thing should be carefully gone into. If the government has any knowledge or understanding of the constitution why are they acting under the guise of bringing home the constitution, to destroy this nation? I say that some time should be spent on this, and it is surely a reasonable request. It should be examined carefully by a committee of this House of Commons, carefully selected, and then we will have the answers. But we will never get those answers from ministers who are hiding the facts and who since they took office have been Canada's assassins and pallbearers at Canada's funeral.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman challenged me, and I wanted to ask him a question. I have some doubts, I may say, whether it is in order in committee of supply to discuss a matter which is not before parliament and which has nothing to do with supply. But I suppose, since the hon. gentleman has been allowed to deal with this subject, I shall be allowed to clarify the issue.

Mr. Woolliams: It is something which appertains to the whole nation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it has nothing to do with any of the estimates which are now before the house. This is a project which has not been brought before the house and which the Prime Minister indicated yesterday will not be brought before the house for some considerable time. It ought to be debated when it is before the house and not before, when, as the hon. gentleman himself admitted, the facts are not known. Certainly the authoritative interpretations he wanted are not known.

I do not think there is anybody in the government who would hesitate for one minute to ask all the legal and constitutional experts to examine this question as fully as they wish. Indeed, I am sure they will, because this is one of the most important matters which will ever come before the parliament of Canada—when it does come before the parliament of Canada.

But I intend to deal only with a simple question of fact. Before doing so, however, I should like to read part of part II of the document which I understand was tabled in the house while I was away and which is available to hon. members to read. It deals with the proposal to delegate to provincial legislatures the power to legislate with respect to certain matters which normally are under the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of parliament.

Mr. Woolliams: Can I ask the minister one question? Are you dealing with the residuary powers only when you refer to those exclusively under federal jurisdiction?

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course. All the powers that are in section 91.

Mr. Woolliams: Well.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman knows section 91, I hope. He is a member of the bar and I am only an unlearned layman, but I would assume he had read the constitution of Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't be sarcastic.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman is so tempting that it is very hard not to be led astray, but I will try to resist his blandishments. As I say, there are two parts to this document, but I feel that far and away the more important part is the part which would enable provincial governments to delegate their powers to this parliament. I am sure most people would degard this as being the more important part. We all know there are certain provinces which would like to have parliament exercise powers and assume responsibilities which are given to them. And that part, the part providing for the delegation of power from a provincial legislature or legislatures to parliament, is only slightly altered from the Fulton formula, very slightly.

In so far as the words relating to the delegation of power from this parliament to the provinces is concerned there has been no change whatsoever; not even one comma has been changed, as I understand it, though I have not examined the punctuation. In other words, as far as the delegation of powers of the federal parliament to the provincial legislatures is concerned—and that is what the hon. member was talking about—the document which the ten provinces agreed to recommend to their legislatures and which this government agreed to recommend to this parliament is precisely the document which Mr. Fulton submitted, and precisely the document which was recommended to all the provinces by the Diefenbaker government. There has not been one change. It is precisely the same in every particular. It requires, before this delegation of powers can operate, that four provincial legislatures shall have agreed and that the parliament of Canada shall have agreed. Before there can be any delegation there must be agreement by four provincial legislatures and the parliament of Canada.

That was what Mr. Fulton recommended and that was what the Diefenbaker government, after that conference, asked all the provinces to approve. We had rather expected that they would not deny the parentage of their own child, because we were generous enough, honest enough and fair enough to give them full credit for it.

Mr. Woolliams: That is what makes it so dangerous, when you do that.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now they are trying to suggest something else because they think they can get some kind of political advantage out of misrepresenting it. The right hon. gentleman said yesterday that it was not true, when any person who will take the trouble to read can see that the words are precisely the same; there is absolutely no difference whatever.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister permit a question now?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: Would he mind answering a question at this point. I do not want to interrupt his speech, as mine was interrupted—

An hon. Member: Yes, you do. You wouldn't accept a question.

Mr. Woolliams: All I want to do—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I do not mind the hon. gentleman interrupting me, but I do not like him debating with others.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the minister explain, as he sees it, how those powers delegated to the central government can be amended, under the formula he is talking about?

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not even understand that question, and I think the hon. gentleman will realize why when he looks at Hansard. I would not like to be so rude as to say it does not make much sense.

Mr. Woolliams: I will put this question to you.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, the hon. gentleman won't. I will treat the hon. gentleman a little more politely than he treated some hon. gentlemen over here who wanted to ask him questions. When I have concluded I will be glad to answer a question from the hon. gentleman, but before I conclude I think it would be desirable to have this point made very clear. As I said before, if parliament and the ten provincial legislatures see fit to accept these recommendations, the power of delegation to provincial legislatures, the power for provincial legislatures to exercise legislative authority with respect to any matter mentioned in section 91, could only be exercised after four provincial legislatures and this parliament had all agreed to it, and only for so long as that agreement continued.

That is why I did not think Mr. Fulton's suggestion was any danger at all to the powers of the federal parliament. I do not think the right hon. gentleman, who prides himself on being a great lawyer, would ever have recommended it, as he did, to all the provinces if that had been the case. His government circulated it to all the provinces and begged them to accept it, and castigated the former government of Saskatchewan because they would not accept it. It was not that the former government of Saskatchewan objected to this part of it; the former government of Saskatchewan, as I understand it—and this was repeated by the hon. member for Greenwood the other day—and the New Democratic party were not objecting to this power of delegation at all; they were objecting to the inflexibility, as they put it, which provides that in a great many cases no powers can be transferred one way or the other without the approval of all ten provinces. They say that is too inflexible. I do not happen to agree with them, but at least it is an honest point of view, put forward honestly with reference to real facts and not to fictions.

It is astonishing that the right hon. gentleman, who himself sponsored this formula, goes on television—and even does this in the house—and misrepresents the facts about this matter. That is what he has done. This is the thing for which he took responsibility as head of the government of Canada, and when we put it forward in precisely the same terms he condemns our government for doing something that he did, that we approved of and agree should continue to be done.

Those are the facts. I do not think this is a proper place to discuss their interpretation. Of course if the right hon. gentleman thinks he made a grave mistake at that time and wants to change his mind, he can get up honestly and say "I made a fool of myself when I was prime minister. I was willing, when I was prime minister, to surrender these powers. Now I am not. I am sorry. I will put on sackcloth and ashes and admit that I made an awful fool of myself. But I am going to fight it now because it is being put forward by another government." If he wanted to do that, that would be honest; but he goes on television and says "This is different from what we did", when any person who will take the trouble to read can see there is not one syllable of difference. That is not what I would call political honesty.

Of course I am rather simple about these things; I do not have that power to make black appear white and white appear black which seems to be the outstanding quality of some other politicians in this country whose practices I have no desire to emulate. I rather prefer what was said by an honest and honourable gentleman who sat in this house as minister of justice for a number of years, though I did not agree with the government he belonged to and often disagreed with him.

Mr. Woolliams: They are always honest when they are not here, but dishonest when they are here.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can look through all the pages of Hansard and all the debates I had with Mr. Fulton—and there were a great many—when we were on opposite sides of the house, and nowhere will he find any occasion when either of us ever imputed any dishonest motive to the other.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes; but let him end up as leader and then see what you do with him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I can tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that if they ever hope to get back in office again they will have a great deal more chance with him as leader than with the kind of leadership they are getting now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rhéaume: Tell us about your leadership.

Mr. Pickersgill: All I want to do, sir—

Mr. Rhéaume: Where is the UN-man?

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize again for taking any time at all. I want to read from the Montreal Star of Thursday, October 15, a Canadian Press dispatch from Kamloops, British Columbia, dated October 15. It reads as follows:

> E. Davie Fulton, former Conservative justice minister, said today he is "extremely pleased" with the federal-provincial agreement on a formula for amending Canada's constitution.
> "I welcome the agreement on the constitution-amending formula as a major achievement of Canadians in gaining custody and control of our own constitution", Mr. Fulton said in a telephone interview from his home.
> "The fact that it has taken such a short time to reach agreement since discussions were resumed is a conclusive indication that the formula we worked out in 1960 and 1961 was a satisfactory basis for action", said Mr. Fulton, now British Columbia Progressive Conservative leader.

I think all of us know that Mr. Fulton was a good lawyer and an honest man—

Mr. Rhéaume: How would you recognize that?

Mr. Pickersgill: —and we are not ashamed of the fact that we built on the foundation that he laid when he was minister. But we are astonished when that foundation is attacked by the man who was the head of the government when it was laid; the man who is now misrepresenting and denigrating the work that his own government did, and is repudiating one of the very few achievements he had when he was prime minister of this country.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, in one way I agree with what has been said by the last speaker and the speaker who preceded him; that is that the matter of very great importance has been introduced into this debate in connection with our discussion at this time of the interim supply motion. I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion it is completely in order, and I follow without any hesitation the example of the Minister of Transport who also addressed himself to the matter.

I think the subject is important because at some time in the not too distant future the proposed amendments to the British North America Act in the form of an address will be introduced, and it is most desirable that there should be the fullest exploration, discussion and debate of the matter not only in this house but in the country at large, so that when the government comes to take the responsibility for bringing these matters before parliament and seeking the approval of the United Kingdom parliament they may be assisted by what has been said here and will be said throughout the country.

For this to happen I think it is necessary to initiate the discussion now and, as I say, I have no hesitation in taking part in the debate at this time. And I hope others will do so. I also hope that ministers of the crown will take part in the debate and will make some defence of the proposals, if defences are available. Any time spent at this stage would, I am sure, be of the utmost benefit to the house and to the country.

I do not propose to involve myself—I do not think I need to—in the discussion as to whether the proposed amendments which have been tabled and of which we are in possession are the same as those which were labelled as the so-called Fulton formula. As far as I am concerned I do not think that matters. My own personal view is that there are many aspects of them which I do not like. I know nothing as to the details of the proposals made in 1961. If they had been produced in 1961 or in 1962 I would have been opposed to them then as I am opposed to them now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to ask him a question. The hon. gentleman said "if they had been disclosed in 1961". I am sure the hon. gentleman has not forgotten that they were disclosed and published and circulated by the government which he supported at that time, and they were well known throughout the country.

Mr. Baldwin: Let me put it this way. If they had been disclosed to the point of being introduced into the house and had been the subject of debate in which I could have participated, then I would have opposed them. As far as disclosure is concerned, the generality of the proposals might have been available, but I say quite categorically that if the details in the form they are now in had been before the house and available for debate, my position then would have been precisely the same as it is now; that the dangerous pitfalls which lie ahead for this country if they are adopted. These I propose to indicate.

There is no better way of disclosing these pitfalls than by making this point. It may well be that a strong decisive government such as existed in 1961, one not subject to the pressures of provincial governments or required, in order to preserve its political life, to take advantage of and yield to pressures from provincial governments, would not have found such proposals dangerous. But a weak, indecisive government not knowing which way it is going or where it is going, like the hero in Stephen Leacock's book "riding madly in all directions", would find them dangerous, and they will be very dangerous in the future. I do not think I am compelled to take any part in this argument; I simply say I am opposed to it and I intend to give a few of the reasons for taking this position at this time.

In introducing the subject let me say that I think there is a complete misstatement in the wording of the communiqué which accompanied the proposed changes. According to the communiqué of October 14, 1964:

> The conference of the federal and provincial governments, meeting in Ottawa on October 14, unanimously agreed on a formula to repatriate the constitution of Canada.

And later:

> As a result, our constitution will have become, for the first time in the history of Canada, truly and wholly Canadian.

What nonsense is this? Even if these changes are approved by the parliament of Canada in an address, and even if they are approved in their present form without the substitution of a comma or the addition of a period, they will still form part of an act of the United Kingdom. The constitution does not become repatriated; it is still an act of the parliament of the United Kingdom and subject to repeal or amendment not only in Canada but in the parliament of the United Kingdom. I do not think there is any question of that.

If this precise formula is adopted I envisage this situation. Let us say that six of the most populous and wealthy provinces—

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I put another question to the hon. gentleman. He has raised a point of very great interest to me. He is suggesting that by accepting an address of this character and by adopting an act of this character the parliament of the United Kingdom would in words be divesting itself of legislative power. I assume that under the doctrine of the omnicompetence of parliament what they do they can undo. I suggest that under the doctrine of the omnicompetence of parliament that is quite true; but has the hon. gentleman addressed himself to the other and very interesting question, that once this address was passed and the power vested in the parliament of this country we would no longer, in our courts or anywhere else, pay the slightest attention to any further legislation of the United Kingdom parliament even if their parliament were silly enough to do what might theoretically be possible.

Mr. Baldwin: I think the minister is assuming something which may not be correct. For example, once this address has been passed, let us assume that for some length of time no action is taken on it, even in Canada. In that case the courts of Canada will still be interpreting the constitution in the terms of a statute of the parliament of the United Kingdom, and I doubt very much whether the proposition suggested by the minister is a correct proposition at all. The constitution will continue to exist in Canada because it is a statute, and it is a statute of the United Kingdom.

However, that is not the point I am making. The point I am making is that the communiqué is completely erroneous in its assumption that there has been a repatriation of the constitution. There has not been a repatriation of the constitution. There has simply been in a limited way an extension to Canada of the right to amend the constitution under certain conditions.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, just at the one o'clock adjournment I said that technically and theoretically even with this new proposed amendment we would still be in a position where the United Kingdom parliament could at any time amend or repeal the British North America Act, because to them it is just an act of parliament, although to us it is the constitution. Even in a practical sense that could be done, and I envisage a situation where the six most populous and wealthy provinces, along with the government of Canada, would be in favour of making a constitutional amendment. Under those circumstances the government of Canada would be strongly supported in this house, and would decide that it was in the best interests of the country to go ahead with the amendment. This situation still exists that the United Kingdom parliament still has custody and control of the constitution.

I suggest to you that if that were the case and the proposed amendment was a very necessary and imperative one, there is no doubt in my mind that even though the four small and least wealthy provinces vetoed the amendment, approaches could be made to the United Kingdom parliament, in spite of the amendment now proposed, to make the change which was considered essential and necessary. The United Kingdom parliament would be placed in a most embarrassing and difficult position by being asked by the Canadian government, which had the overwhelming endorsation and support of the country and of the governments and legislatures of the six largest provinces, to change the constitution, in the face of a veto made possible by the new proposed change.

Mr. Chairman, I should like at this point to deal briefly with the question of delegation. I shall do so as quickly as possible within the short period of time I have at my disposal. I see great dangers inherent in this situation. Let us look very briefly at what is given and what is taken.

Under the proposal, matters falling within clauses 6, 10, 13 and 16 of section 92, which is the section giving jurisdiction to the provinces, would be subject to a delegation of powers. What are those powers? Subsection 13 deals with property and civil rights. If the federal parliament today legislates in matters within its jurisdiction, but trespasses on property and civil rights, it is notorious that it has the right to do so. Very little is entailed in this concession, and the same thing applies to subsection 16 dealing with generally all matters of a merely local or private nature.

Subsections 6 and 10 of section 92 deal with the establishment of reformatory prisons in the provinces, and local works and undertakings. There is a very minor concession in this regard. On the other hand every matter referred to in section 91 may be the subject of the delegation of authority from the federal government to the provincial governments. But not only those subjects under section 9 are affected, but any matter at all of which the federal government is now seized of jurisdiction under the B.N.A. Act may be the subject of delegation. I think all we need do is turn to that part of the proposed amendment subclause 3 of the proposed new section 94A which says:

> Notwithstanding anything in this or any other act, the legislature of a province may make laws in the province in relation to any matter coming within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

Certainly there is no equality there. Any matter at all with which the federal government is now seized of jurisdiction may be the subject of delegation of authority. In exchange, the provinces have yielded up virtually nothing. This is a most inadequate, unfair and one-sided bargain.

It is my submission that while this might always not necessarily be dangerous, in a situation where we have a weak and indecisive federal government, such as we now have, which has showed itself prepared to concede and yield in almost every case to the provinces, there is a grave and dangerous situation likely to occur. We have been told this is all because of the desire of the federal government to co-operate. It may have been so in the beginning, but what once may have started out as a gentle zephyr of co-operation has now become a howling gale of appeasement and I see nothing to suggest it is going to be brought to a stop.

I have not got too much time but I do not want to leave that subject without pointing out this danger. In a country such as ours with wide disparities economically and geographically it is essential that we do what we can to hold people together, to try to keep within reasonable limits the social, cultural, economic and political levels of the people of all sections of this country. I know you cannot make them uniform, this is impossible. But you must have a situation where, when people move from Vancouver to Edmonton, to Winnipeg, to Toronto, to Montreal, to Halifax, to St. John's, there will be something of a sameness in those conditions which I have pointed out. The danger as I see it is in a weak federal government yielding consistently to pressure from the provinces and delegating authority to provinces to legislate in federal matters. I can see it might frequently happen that a situation could arise where the federal government might find itself in the position of having to make a decision that would be popular in some areas but would definitely be repugnant to other sections of the country, and the simplest and easiest political way to extricate oneself would be to say: We will delegate the authority to do this to the provinces that want it and we simply will not touch it in respect of the other provinces. You will get a situation where, with pyramiding of the use of delegation you will find differing conditions in one part of the country from the other

No country can exist under such a situation. Abraham Lincoln said it much better than I can when he said that a nation cannot live half slave and half free. What he meant by that was that the social and political conditions peculiar to slavery in one part of a country with the other areas where slavery is not allowed are not consistent with the maintenance of a national identity. If I may paraphrase that in a limited way, precisely the same situation appears here, and it is my submission that we will see a constantly increasing delegation of authority from the federal to the provincial governments resulting in a variation of conditions which is inconsistent with the maintenance of our nation.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, much of the blame has been placed at the door of one province, the province of Quebec, and I have no doubt that that province and its premier have been instrumental in pressing for these things. But I think some of the other provinces must take their share of the blame particularly when they realize, as I have said before, that they have been dealing with a weak and indecisive federal government willing to go to great lengths to make present promises without too much regard to the bitter fruits of those promises in the future.

I am one of those who have considerable sympathy with the vitality, lift and resurgence of the people of the province of Quebec and I hope they achieve their requirements with a fresh and vigorous approach which will advance the people of that province. But I would think that the responsible people of Quebec, who in my view are in the vast majority, would realize the dangers of pursuing a course which strengthens one or all of the provinces at the expense of the national government.

Under a federal system the central government must have the power, the strength and the responsibility to govern in the national interest and this must include without any impairment the right to decide fiscal and monetary policies, aspects of foreign exchange, external affairs, external and internal trade and commerce, immigration, national defence and so on. The federal government must have strength to initiate and continue programs and policies in those fields designed to lift up the people of the country within reasonable limits to the same level of economic, cultural and social well-being.

Surely it must be apparent to many of the provincial leaders that a weak central government from which has been stripped real authority and power cannot hope to fulfil these functions. They must realize that by continuing along this course they will surely find that the central government has been so stripped. I make this appeal because it seems that the federal government we now have is not prepared to recognize this and in my view this places some responsibility on the provinces to do so.

There are those who feel that maybe we would not lose much if this country did disintegrate, but I do not think so. I think the world has been a better place because we on the northern half of this continent have seen fit to bring into being a nation which may well be pursuing a course that will lead to the same result as in the case of the people in the southern half of the continent, but which is pursuing it along different roads. I think that if we continue, as we have been doing under this administration, to weaken the federal government and strengthen the provincial governments this experiment is bound to come to failure.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I am not either a very loquacious or a very controversial person but I would not care to allow this opportunity to pass without saying a few words about what I consider the most important subject I have ever heard discussed in this chamber. It is something which in my opinion transcends all other matters to which we have been giving our attention, not only in this parliament but in many preceding ones.

My qualifications are not as good as those of the members who have preceded me. The hon. member for Bow River is a lawyer, the hon. member for Peace River is a lawyer, and the Minister of Transport almost became a lawyer. The closest I ever came to being a lawyer was to wonder one time whether I should go into law or theology, but for some strange reason I chose politics.

The question we are now discussing is a vital one and it is so serious as to cause us to wonder about the very future and form of the chamber in which we are speaking today. We see, as preceding members have said, the very fabric of our federation seriously and dangerously undermined at this particular time, and perhaps it would be well in these days of easy accommodation and diplomatic acquiescence to pause for a moment and look at the kind of political structure which is Canada's.

We call ourselves a federation. Indeed, some of the more precise political scientists say that our federal institution was created so strong that we are not in fact a federal state, because the constituent and component parts have much less power than in many federations and certainly nothing approaching co-equal powers. We know that our nation began as the result of many of our founding fathers desiring a unitary state. This they did not achieve. But they got something which they thought was close to it, and when over 100 years ago the agreement reached in our capital city of Charlottetown was presented to the then Canadian legislature the founding father number one, John A. Macdonald, described it in this manner:

> We have strengthened the general government. We have given the general legislature all the great subjects of legislation. We have conferred on them, not only specifically and in detail, all the powers which are incident to sovereignty.

Then he went on to say that this was the great mistake made in the United States where powers had been conferred upon the states and only the residue given to the central authority. He ended with a sentence which I believe is more timely in 1964 than in 1865.

> We thereby strengthen the central parliament and make the confederation one people and one government, instead of five peoples and five governments, with merely a point of authority connecting us to a limited and insufficient extent.

The figure 5 came, Mr. Chairman, because at that time he no doubt thought Prince Edward Island would be one of the original members of confederation. It took a little more effort to get Prince Edward Island in six years later. This strong society is revealed in our British North America Act, to which reference was made this morning. Under this act the dominion government was given not only all those powers enumerated in section 91, but all powers except those given to the local legislatures. A tremendous array of legislative powers were vested in the central government. Beyond that, the central government was given a special power which is rarely if ever given in a federation. To indicate the strength of our federation, it was given the power of disallowance. As if that were not enough to indicate that this was an unusually strong federation, it was followed up by a provision whereby the dominion parliament could legislate in exclusively provincial fields if necessary to remedy an injustice upon the people of any province. We know that remedial legislation was very much an issue around the turn of the century.

We know, too, that in any federation there are counterpressures against the central government. Provincial rights is not a new cry. John A. Macdonald heard it before he was prime minister for very long. His political enemies used it against him. The leaders of the provinces used it against him and sought incessantly to chip away at the central authority which he considered necessary to build the country and to maintain the country. We know how frequently in those great days of stress and challenge it required a vigorous, aggressive dominion government to do the things that had to be done to make confederation a reality as well as a legality. I could cite the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway as one of those. Down through the years we often found that the provinces would be aided by the opposition group in the House of Commons. Macdonald was in for a generation, and in that time the Liberal party became a strong provincial rights party. This has often happened. John A. fought back. Without a fight the nation would have failed and would have dissolved into its original components, in all their weaknesses, inequality and diversity.

In that time it was found necessary, in order to preserve the nation, for the dominion government to disallow 66 provincial acts. As has been observed across the way, this was in the past. We find it impossible to divorce ourselves from the past. The dreams and intentions of the fathers failed of realization. The dominion government was inhibited and its effectiveness was attacked. Its resources were diminished. Then, as a result of a series of judicial interpretations and decisions, the cause of provincial rights was advanced at the expense of the dominion.

We are always aware that in a country like ours there is constant tension and conflict between the centripetal forces which move to the centre and the centrifugal forces which throw out to the extremities. This has been the warp and woof of our political history. The present era—I hope it will not really deserve the expression "era" because that generally implies a considerable length of time—the present phase of dominion-provincial relations is unique. I think one would look very carefully through the pages of Canadian history to find a situation similar to this one. In the first place, the rate of erosion of dominion powers is more rapid than ever before. The glacial attrition of earlier days has been replaced by a rapid stripping off, as if by the power and speed of an avalanche.

Second—and this is most surprising and intriguing in constitutional history, but I think it is very worrisome and should be worrisome to all Canadian citizens—the dominion government appears not to be the champion of dominion rights, but the willing and seemingly eager agent of increasing provincial rights. In an excellent series of addresses delivered over the C.B.C.—and the Massey lectures justifies the C.B.C. for many other things—Professor Underhill, a former curator of Laurier house has said:

> As things are, however, our national government in recent years has approached the ten lusty provincial governments, and especially that of Quebec, in an attitude of timorous politeness, as if apologizing for the fact of its own existence. And the Canadian people as a whole cannot apparently reach any agreement to entrust their fortunes to any one political party with a majority support. They watch apathetically while our unprotected federal quarterback, looking in vain for a pass receiver, is overrun by the big husky linemen of the provincial defensive team and thrown for another loss.

So says Professor Underhill, a man of eminent perception, learning and great objectivity. I was intrigued by a statement in a speech by the Minister of National Health and Welfare not long ago, delivered to the women's Canadian club in Quebec city on September 28. I always read her speeches with great care. I was intrigued by these few lines:

> Although I hardly think the time has come yet for the federal government to abdicate all its parental responsibilities and head for pasture or pension, I do think it is time to turn over to them the far greater measure of responsibility that they have earned. The federal government has an obligation to do everything within its power to assist all the provinces in realizing their ambitions, and yet at the same time ensuring minimum national standards.

Now, I will be fair to the hon. lady, as I always try to be to both ladies and gentlemen. There are other portions of her address that do not follow that particular golden text, and I would not suggest that was the theme of her remarks. However, it is surprising to find even that statement from anyone charged with dominion responsibility as a minister of the crown.

In order to illustrate further the uniqueness of our present situation, the very source which once seemed to gang up on strong dominion authority, now defends that authority. The opposition in this House of Commons I would list first, and then, of all people, the premiers of the provinces. The premier of Saskatchewan is quoted as having said not long ago after one dominion-provincial conference:

> At one dominion-provincial conference after another the provinces, faced with increasing costs are making ever greater financial demands on Ottawa. And year by year, the federal authorities, for the sake of national unity, have been forced to give ground.
> We believe the federal government must have adequate financial resources to cope with unemployment and economic recessions.

I wonder why he said that.

> Above all, we believe that Canadians, regardless of where they were born or happen to live, should have certain minimum living standards and, as a matter of right, a basic standard of education, health and welfare services.

While I would not expect provincial premiers to be in the forefront in the struggle to uphold the strength and effectiveness of federal powers I welcome this contribution and completely agree with the dangers he points out and the course he suggests.

The official leader of the Conservative party in British Columbia, a man who was lauded, and rightly lauded, this morning described confederation as being—> —so designed that "in giving strength to the union—to the country—the parts would thereby make it so strong that all would derive strength from it. Strength to be given, strength to be received, strength to be shared, in a partnership within a union."

Then another strong provincial voice, the attorney general of Manitoba, Mr. McLean, the other day stressed the importance of a strong central government to the unity of Canada. He said:

> The founders of our nation believed that the predominant power must lie in a central government.

Must we look to the provincial politicians to preserve the dominion structure? If we look elsewhere we do not find that effort.

I am interested to note that the press of Canada has become very concerned about this matter—the Winnipeg Free Press, the great metropolitan dailies of Toronto as well as many other newspapers. I just happened to notice an editorial in the Moncton Times which reads in part as follows:

> The federal government is the string which prevents an object which is being whirled around in a circle from flying away. Only in this case the string has 10 major objects (the provinces) and two less large (the territories).
> If this string is cut the threat of these pieces which comprise Canada flying away (Balkanization) becomes very real.

So perhaps the people of this country are not as apathetic as Professor Underhill thought. I am glad they are not, because in the preservation of a strong dominion lies the future of our great country.

Are there dangers? Is this really a vital issue? Are we setting up paper tigers or straw men? I say there is grave danger. I was interested to read an address by a cabinet minister in the province of Quebec not long ago. It is quoted in the Gazette of October 24; the first paragraph of the report reads:

> Revenue Minister Eric Kierans of Quebec says that federal ministries of industry, agriculture, fisheries and natural resources have become "superfluous" as far as Quebec province is concerned.

The headline above the article reporting this speech is "Minister Tells French Central Economy Now Passé". What does this mean? Do all these federal departments vanish from the province of Quebec if Mr. Kierans' suggestion is valid? Mr. Kierans is a very powerful and able man who obviously speaks with great authority not only in Quebec but beyond. What will happen to the operations of the dominion government if any province decides that it can "go it alone"? Will federal operations within the province be withdrawn? Do the employees of federal ministries working in the provinces go somewhere else? Does the Department of Agriculture, for example, become operative merely in nine of the provinces? If so, what would happen to its effectiveness? What would happen to the standardization of services? What will happen with regard to equality of opportunity as between one province and another? Perhaps Mr. Kierans is right and his province can cope with these matters, and cope with them better. Like my hon. friend from Peace River I would be the last to suggest that every opportunity should not be given to the people of Quebec to work out the changes in their society which they feel are necessary for their advancement at this time. But I am not sure the best method of dealing with this is within the rigid framework of dominion-provincial relations or that it is proper to justify the desire of one province by suggesting to all the other provinces that they should similarly move to take over responsibility because to do this, in my view, amounts to a massive attack upon the dominion structure, a great surrender of dominion efficiency.

Reference could be made to a subject which I believe is under discussion at this very moment at yet another dominion-provincial conference—the question of control of the Indians of Canada, a responsibility placed squarely upon the federal government. What is the next step to be? What about provincial banks, restraint of interprovincial trade, the wholesale opting out of joint sharing programs on the part of provinces which can operate on their own? It is a great mistake to discuss this vital question of dominion-provincial relations and focus one's attention only on the province of Quebec. It is not now, nor was it historically the only province to urge greater provincial rights.

Many of the great advances in social welfare and resource development which have brought benefit to all kinds of people in this country were initiated by the dominion government and carried out by co-operative effort between the dominion and the provincial governments. But can this sort of activity be carried on if there is a wholesale evacuation by a number of the provinces? What will be left to the authority of the central government?

I do not intend to discuss amending procedures because these were ably discussed by some of my colleagues this morning. Perhaps, in time, the development of legislation for social needs and the general development of our country may lead us to a situation where we should take a new look at the constitution and perhaps even consider a new constitution. We know the British North America Act is only part of our constitution. But it will be serious, it will be a tragedy, if in any effort to deal with contemporary problems we were to follow a general policy of acquiescing in the face of every provincial demand with the result that there is a complete dismantling of the central authority.

What was confederation all about? What did our predecessors have in mind in 1867? It was a merging together of peoples, a sharing of sacrifice, a sharing of poverty and a sharing of wealth. How many times have provinces less well endowed by nature with the resources for modern industrial wealth had to go to Ottawa for equalization payments, for assistance, for subsidies? Where will they go if, in the process of accommodation, of accelerating provincial rights, the national treasury is depleted and the cupboard make bare? It is not any wonder, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Thatcher of Saskatchewan should be concerned about this.

What about the provinces in the maritime area? Our forefathers made great sacrifices to enter confederation. Many people maintain that we were far better off before that, and indeed this produced our share of separatists. They were always of a law-abiding type, but they were separatists. We made our sacrifices; we pooled our resources in a confederation, one principal purpose of which was to bring about some sharing of the wealth of the whole land, some equitable division of the benefits of the whole country. The great force for equalization must be the central government, which is supported by all the people and which is the only source of leadership for all the people.

We live in a world when many other countries are looking to supranational associations; we talk about the world of the super state. We will be terribly out of tune if we in 1964 should move in the other direction toward decentralization and the exalting of the parts to the disadvantage of the whole. This is a fundamental matter, Mr. Chairman. We can only get strong national leadership if we have strong national leaders; and they can be strong only if they have strong institutions in which to operate.

It is one of the great misfortunes of our day—perhaps one could use a stronger word than "misfortunes"—that at a time when the dominion structure is buffeted more than ever before, when we need a strong government more than ever before, we have an administration noted for its appalling weakness. We find that from the dominion-provincial conferences the provinces always emerge the victors. Sometimes one wonders if those who represent the dominion conceive themselves as mere arbiters between principals, diplomatically negotiating differences; or whether they conceive themselves as the spokesmen, the principals in the negotiations for the senior level of government, for the government whose actions affect the lives of every single Canadian.

The dangers are numerous and widespread; the loss of revenues has been tremendous. We now see that while provincial areas of jurisdiction remain sacrosanct, dominion areas are being opened, great financial resources are being moved back to the provinces. Can one imagine what funds in ten years time, if the pension plan goes through, will be available—not to the dominion but to the provinces? We see the situation arise where the dominion government is becoming the mere collector, the agent collecting moneys from the people for the benefit of the provinces. Can we, out of this, develop a stronger country? Will we get, out of this, a common purpose? Will we overcome our differences and difficulties, if we have no common rallying point? And where else could that be but at the national level, in the national capital, and from those charged with national responsibility to lead the whole country?

No one is suggesting, and it would be idiotic to suggest, that the provinces do not have legitimate needs and legitimate areas of operation; but we are living in an age where I submit the dominion authorities presently incumbent are engaging upon a course which is dismantling the dominion structure which they should be upholding. Many things have been charged to this government. They have made many mistakes; in fact, the multiplicity of their mistakes is not something new. Perhaps in this regard they are fortunate, because these mistakes come so often that no one gets really aroused about them for very long. But there is a big difference between the administrative blunders, bureaucratic flubs, alterations and changes which have characterized the government up to now, and the egregious error such as I am convinced they are making in not seeing the importance of sustaining the national institutions. It is their responsibility so to do. They can hardly expect those who operate on the provincial scene to do it for them; they can hardly expect the newspapers to do it for them; they can hardly expect the opposition to do it for them.

I would say that up to now they have been very fortunate in the assistance they have received from certain sources. I would say that if the present premier of Ontario were the kind of man that some of his predecessors were, Mr. Hepburn or Mr. Mowat, the fabric of confederation would not only be sagging, but it would be completely rent and dragging in the ground of a loose assocation of ten practically autonomous but terribly unequal states. Premier Robarts—and he has had other colleagues in this respect—has taken, albeit while a provincial premier and the spokesman of a province, a stand that shows a realization of the necessity of keeping this country strong and keeping it united. I think we can be very thankful that in Canada's most populous and largest province we have a man who, as the Halifax Chronicle-Herald said the other day, "didn't make a show of strength but had strength enough to show restraint".

I have noticed that Premier Robarts has been very concerned about what is going on and he is going to give leadership in this field; because he realizes that the people of Ontario are also people of Canada. While we all have provincial loyalties—and I come from a province where sentimentality is deep; we love our homeland—Canadians, I maintain, are Canadians before they are provincials of any province, and I think look for national leadership. If by some strange development this government began to give that leadership, they would be given the kind of support that has been denied them ever since the people gave them that uncertain mandate in April, 1963. I appeal to them to do so; to remember the importance of a strong dominion; to fight for it and to preserve it.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the remarks of the hon. member who just resumed his seat, according to whom a certain province would ask Ottawa to collect funds to give them back to it later, I must say that I do not share his opinion at all, and I shall tell you why.

More and more at the present time we hear about amendments to the Canadian constitution. These suggestions do not come from one province only but from the whole of Canada. The Ontario premier seems to recognize—and he is a Conservative—that our constitution must get a second sober thought.

Not very long ago Her Majesty the Queen was in Canada and she said, in Quebec city, that a protocol which dates back a hundred years is not adequate and does not meet present needs. This is not surprising. It must be noted that it is the Queen herself who declares that the constitution must be changed, and adapted to the needs of the times.

I do not accept either the statements made by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) who makes a distinction between one province and the nine others.

We have no objection to other provinces claiming for themselves what the province of Quebec is claiming. We have no objection to the province of Ontario fighting for the recognition of its rights, provided that all the provinces continue to exist and constitute a nation with two cultures, the French and the English.

This reminds me of an example: let us take a Canadian family, no matter whether it is French or English speaking. If my friend from Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) brought up a family, he must have found out that when a family includes five, seven or ten children, no two of them are alike, and each of those children, upon growing and reaching maturity, endeavours to become independent. In other words, at 21 years of age, upon reaching majority, he wants to fly on his own, according to his aspirations, his possibilities, his capacities and his abilities. As soon as one lives on his own, he wants to raise a family, establish a home, operate a business or a farm.

It is strange to note that among five brothers or sisters issued from the same family, none is willing to take orders from a sister or a brother; they all insist upon exercising their full independence. None the less, Mr. Chairman, come Easter, Christmas, another feast, or the mother's or father's birthday, for instance, the whole family will gather and get along very well. Every member of the family is happy to reunite, and then a brother tells how he is getting along in life, whether he is successful or not, and narrates his personal life.

We can see, Mr. Chairman, that there is unity among that family, but every member wishes to retain his independence.

In my opinion the same situation exists on the federal level; we have a country called Canada; it is composed of ten provinces which wish that their own particular ways, customs and traditions be respected.

No province is entitled to infringe upon the liberty of another province. The province of Quebec has no right to infringe upon the liberty of Ontario or of Prince Edward Island, just as Prince Edward Island or Ontario is not entitled to infringe upon the rights of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, we are no longer in 1867, but in 1964 and the Canadian constitution must be suited to 1964 requirements, granting as much independence as possible to every province. On many occasions we suggested in the house some amendments to the constitution: give the provinces more latitude, give them the required financial means not through taxation, but by using new sources of credit to provide for a normal development of the provinces.

A few days ago my colleague from Lapointe indicated with good reason that the Bank of Canada is now being used to help to stabilize the English pound. Why not use the Bank of Canada to stabilize the economy in this country, to abolish unemployment and get the economy really moving in Canada?

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing to prevent the government from using the Bank of Canada for that purpose. But when the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) suggests that the provinces are asking Ottawa to collect money in the provinces to give it back to the provinces, it is not the case, that is not what is happening.

The provinces are asking Ottawa to withdraw from their own fiscal and taxation fields. In particular, that is what the province of Quebec is asking for.

We are not promoting any division or discord. We are simply asking to be understood as we understand others in Canada.

If the nine other provinces want to take part in a joint program with the federal government, want to be taxed provincially by the federal government and receive in turn federal equalization payments, they are quite free to do so. We will not encroach on the freedom of those provinces. But we want the province of Quebec to be respected by all the other provinces, for Quebec has every reason to ask for what it is now requesting.

Mr. Chairman, certainly there are matters that should remain under federal jurisdiction —we do not dispute that—defence, for instance, must remain a federal concern, as must transport and finance.

However, if those areas stay under federal jurisdiction the government must then—whether it be the present government or the next government, regardless of its political tag—establish branch offices of the Bank of Canada in each and every Canadian province, with specific instructions to make financially possible, in those provinces, what it is physically possible and desirable for them.

You will then see that there will be no need for any ARDA plan, any strait-jacket or socialist or communist-minded plans in an attempt to cast everybody in the same mould. At that time you will see the provinces blossom out, not only the province of Quebec, but also the others, because everyone of them without exception is faced not with a constitutional problem, not with a theoretical problem, but with a problem that goes to the core, if you will, in that they are all beset by the financial question.

When those poor provinces meet in Ottawa with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) or with the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) and all federal ministers, what is the subject of their discussions? Monetary matters? No, they discuss fiscal matters. Ottawa takes too big a share and does not leave us enough. Both levels of government argue about which of them is going to deprive individuals of part of the fruit of their labour, in one word, which of them is going to tax the people. That is what causes the imbroglios which occur at all federal-provincial conferences. The purely monetary question of Canadian credit, of bank credit is never discussed. They are content to play the fiscal game and to share the crumbs or the little money in circulation among the Canadian people.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Social Credit has been advocating a solution for a long time. I mentioned it the other day. There are those who find it ridiculous but these same people find rational the system with which we have to cope at present. The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) and others speak of national disunity, etc.

I read today on page 5 of Le Devoir that university students are meeting tonight at a dinner given in Toronto to study the evolution now taking place in English Canada. At the dinner tonight Mr. John Holmes will ask the following question: Is the commonwealth a factor of unification or of division?

Some suggest that the commonwealth constitutes an element of division while others say it is an element of unification. I personally think that each member nation of the commonwealth has the respect of the commonwealth as a whole and, therefore, that could constitute an element of union and not of division.

Certain countries, apart from Canada, for instance India, belong to the British commonwealth of nations, yet India is independent and amended its constitution several years ago; the same thing can be said of Ireland; in Africa, there are an increasing number of small countries remaining with the British commonwealth of nations while enjoying their full independence. Recently a small country, Zambia, obtained its independence or reached nationhood; in short, it became independent. In that country the first step taken, that is the selection of a flag, was not discussed as we see discussed here by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Conservatives, the choice of a Canadian flag. Until recently, the union jack was the national flag of that country, but a distinctive flag was adopted, hoisted on public buildings and accepted as the distinctive national flag of that small country which has just reached its independence. The same thing happened in Jamaica. All those nations remain member countries of the British commonwealth of nations while remaining independent. They remain within the commonwealth because they feel they need to belong to an international organization which will help them and not oppress them.

Let Canada think along the same lines, let the federal members think in the same way, let us consider Canada as a sovereign state, part of the commonwealth, yes, but united and not divided, and where we would keep our own identity.

Yesterday I heard in an interview on the radio—"When I enter a social club, I do not enter the club in my neighbour's shoes but in my own shoes." Then as a Canadian, as a French Canadian moreover, I think we can continue to be part of the commonwealth while keeping our own symbols, with our own Canadian organization, with the greatest respect for every other nation in the British commonwealth.

For that, of course, the constitution needs to be amended. I repeat once again that the Queen, very rightly and sensibly said in Quebec city that a protocol having existed for a century is not appropriate in 1964. There is nothing surprising about that.

Some members are trying here in the house to create the impression among the public that there really is a division between French Canadians and the rest of Canada. French Canadians, it has been said and I repeat it, ask not for special treatment. No, we merely ask permission to administer ourselves as we see fit in the province of Quebec without affecting the freedom of others, and without depriving others.

The province of Quebec has its own characteristics just like the province of Ontario has its own.

Let us respect each other; let us put a stop to untimely and unreasoned accusations against the province of Quebec saying, for instance, that the province of Quebec is overrun by separatists who want to break confederation at all cost.

I have evidence to that effect. A few weeks ago I received letters from English speaking people of the University of Toronto telling me that I had done wrong when I rose in this house to condemn certain disgraceful demonstrations which occurred in Quebec city on the occasion of the visit of Her Majesty the Queen. Those letters came from Irish people of the University of Toronto who blamed me and called me a coward because they say Canada has no business in the British empire.

If there are separatists in the province of Quebec, there are also some elsewhere in Canada. All those who attack the province of Quebec when the latter is asking that the constitution be amended to meet the needs of our time are separatist elements in Canada.

We want understanding, but real understanding. Real understanding is not a one way street. No one just asks for the co-operation of someone without being prepared to give the same co-operation. I think that every member of parliament, no matter his party, has a bounden responsibility, as a Canadian, as a representative in the federal government, to see to it that such co-operation, collaboration and understanding start right here in parliament.

I can understand that some hon. members are trying to play politics; they are thinking of the next election, and that they do not care at all about the people they represent in this house.

Well, if we are simply here to play politics —I heard this morning the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) who delivered a speech as if an election were going to be held very shortly—but we will not follow that lead.

Each member believes that he is a statesman, and I will point out to the house the difference between a statesman and a politician. A statesman is the one who thinks and acts with future generations in mind, while the politician thinks and acts in terms of the next election. That is the difference between a politician and a statesman. If hon. members were more truly statesmen—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Duplessis said that.

Mr. Caouette: —Mr. Chairman, we would achieve better results than those we have obtained since the beginning of this session.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not elaborate any further, but I ask all hon. members, whether they be Liberals, Conservatives or New Democrats, to face Canada's future squarely, to recognize that the provinces are entitled to recognition and respect, each and every one of them, and that no province has the right to encroach upon the rights and freedoms of another. Quebec will not trespass on the rights of any other province but, on the other hand, Quebec will fight against those who will attempt to infringe on its freedoms and its right to be itself within confederation.

[Text]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, after listening to the in so many ways, excellent speech delivered by the leader of the Creditiste party I cannot help but agree with much of what he has said, and I am sure that many other members will also. Most of my remarks this afternoon will relate to the constitutional amendment procedures which are about to be brought before us. When the resolution is brought before the House of Commons it is my intention to speak in greater detail on this subject. However, I think it is very important that at this time many members of the house make what I would characterize as keynote speeches as we approach what will perhaps be one of the more important debates in the history of the House of Commons, certainly one of the more important since I became a member of the house six years ago.

My remarks at this time will in no way be irresponsible because, together with other people, I have done my very best to examine the general outline and details of the constitutional amendment procedures. I am not going to say now that these provisions alone constitute the seed from which an associate state can very well grow. However, the approach of the present government to this matter, together with other things that are going on in Canada at the present time, lead many responsible Canadians and members of the House of Commons to believe that, wittingly or unwittingly, the actions of the present government are sowing the seed of the possibility of an associate state coming about.

Just a few days ago I read that a minister of the province of Quebec, Mr. Kierans, had travelled overseas and had listed a number of departments now administered by the federal government which he said Quebec did not need any more because they were superfluous. This speech has gone unanswered. I know he spoke in what he thought was a responsible way but the fact is that his remarks have gone unanswered. There is also the fact that we are soon to be confronted with the constitutional amendment procedures that the government has in mind, and while I do not make any accusations at the present time there is a rumour which many people firmly believe that Mr. Lesage wants a consulate established in Paris. Then we can also add the fact that in regard to federal-provincial relations the Prime Minister is not leading the federal cause but is negotiating it. He was good at that sort of thing for many years, but once you become Prime Minister it is your obligation at all times, no matter what the situation is with regard to federal-provincial relations, to outline the federal case, to lead the federal cause and not to negotiate the federal government out of the capacity to govern at all.

Quite frankly, sir, a year ago I did not think it was possible that as a member of the house I would be speaking in this tenor at all because I remember getting up time and time again and asking the Prime minister and other ministers, including the Minister of Natonal Health and Welfare who is in her seat now, whether they had consulted with the provinces. A year ago federal-provincial relations were in a terrible state because this was before the present government had coined the idea of co-operative federalism. A year ago federal-provincial relations and, in fact, the whole domestic economic program of the government were floundering because the government had failed to consult the provinces, especially in matters of conjoint jurisdiction.

I feel that as a responsible opposition we did a good job in bringing this situation to the attention of the government on many occasions, and as a Conservative I must recognize that, everything else being equal, I believe strongly in local autonomy. This is a part of Conservative principles. We believe that very often people at the local level know what is best for them and how best they should govern their affairs. I believe in this kind of decentralization. But, Mr. Chairman, in the old world and in the new it has been a consistent principle of Conservatives to fight extremes wherever we find them.

Last year we fought the extreme of an unwitting centralization superimposed upon the provinces by a cabinet largely made up of ex-senior bureaucrats who did not understand the real meaning of co-operative federalism. It is unbelievable to me that in less than a year this same government has unwittingly gone from one extreme of the swing of the pendulum to the other. So I believe it is now one of the challenges facing the opposition to save confederation, to save the federal government, just as it was a challenge to Macdonald, Cartier and the Conservative party almost 100 years ago to forge the bonds of confederation in the first place.

Mr. Gelber: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Grafftey: Yes.

Mr. Gelber: I find it difficult to recognize the description of the hon. member for Queens, the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member now speaking of the present trend in federal-provincial relations. Would he tell us whether federal powers have been eroded over the last 30 years or are we merely adjusting from the centralization resulting from the war? Has there been an erosion of power in the last 30 years?

Mr. Grafftey: That is a very good question and I hope to answer it in a general and perhaps in a detailed way as I proceed with my speech.

Mr. Choquette: A good answer.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, if I have said a few partisan things up to this point I hope I can say what I am about to say in a bipartisan spirit. We in the House of Commons recognize, and I think are beginning to recognize more and more no matter to what party we belong, that parliament as an institution only works well when each of us has done all he can in a positive and dynamic spirit of good will to unite the country. No matter what party we support in the House of Commons, we are now beginning to recognize that parliament as an institution really works well only when we have done all we can to improve federal-provincial relations.

I would be the first to recognize that the present government has been faced with a very difficult situation. Things have been moving very quickly in terms of federal-provincial relations, in fact, in an almost abnormal way in the last three or four years, and adjustments have had to be made rather rapidly. Possibly hon. members who support the government will say that I am being partisan but I think we are faced with a very serious situation so far as the attitude of the government is concerned, in that the pendulum has swung from where it was a year ago, when the government would not consult at all with the provinces and its whole economic program was floundering, to the point where many serious-minded Canadians are wondering whether we will have any federal government left at all if the Prime Minister continues on the same course.

I believe that four basic things must be done and probably must be done even before we consider the constitutional amendment procedures soon to come before the house in all their detail. Along with many Canadians I believe that before or certainly by 1967 we must have a modern constitution suited to modern times. I am not going into the niceties of whether or not we should completely scrap the one we have now and draft a new one, or whether we should simply drastically amend the one we have. I am convinced of one thing, Mr. Chairman, and I think there is great support for this in every corner of this house, that much sooner than later we must have a modern constitution suited to modern times.

Second, I should like to dwell on a point that I realize is repetitive coming from me. I am more than ever convinced, as I see things going on that are going on, that one of the reasons for our present ills relating to federal-provincial relations is the lack of permanent consultative machinery between Ottawa and the provinces. Again, I suggest the immediate establishment of a federal-provincial permanent secretariat at the heads of the governments level, based on the ARDA approach. I am not really interested in whether or not it is done in exactly this way, but I am interested in the immediate establishment of federal-provincial permanent consultative machinery.

When this is done, then the federal and provincial governments can meet and immediately plan priorities in the social and economic fields. This is something that must be done immediately. There must be co-operation between the federal and provincial authorities in planning priorities in the social and economic fields. Then we could have meetings on the constitution at different times and in different parts of the country in order that long before 1967, I hope, we can come up with a modern constitution suited to modern times.

Some people feel that Conservatives have preconceived ideas about whether the federal government should be strong or the provincial government should be strong, or whether there should be centralization or decentralization. This is a purely hypothetical debate so far as Conservatives are concerned because we do not approach federal-provincial relations in any doctrinaire sense at all. Some people have said that back in 1867 Macdonald and Cartier were strong defenders of central government. Of course they were. In 1867 there was no whole, there were just the parts. It was the great challenge to Macdonald and Cartier to form the whole out of the parts and to defend it. As I have said before, Conservatives fight extremes wherever they find them. As the pendulum swings too far in any direction I think you will find the approach from our side of the house, and I am sure very often from the other side of the house, is based on principle and not a doctrine that will not change.

I should like to say this, in my closing keynote remarks. As I said, when we bring the constitutional amendment procedures before the House of Commons, I should like to talk in more detail on the various clauses. I say this, Mr. Chairman, that representing Brome-Missisquoi in the province of Quebec, a constituency which is 70 per cent French speaking, I declare now that I have never met one separatist in my constituency. I have never met one. I notice the hon. member for Verdun is paying special attention to this remark, and I should like to congratulate him upon the worth-while and laudable contribution he made to this debate a number of days ago. I know he is interested when I say, as an English speaking member from the province of Quebec representing a constituency which is 70 per cent French speaking, that I have never met one separatist. I believe the house should know that. The people I represent in the House of Commons want to remain in confederation, as do the majority of the people of the province of Quebec. The separatists do not stand for elective office, Mr. Chairman, because they know what the result would be in Quebec.

In Quebec today nearly 20 per cent of our urban families and over 85 per cent of our farmers are attempting to subsist—certainly not exist—on annual incomes of under $2,000. Great pockets of poverty exist. Since confederation, much has been improved. One of the primary roles of the federal government has been to attempt to guarantee minimum economic and social standards from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The people I represent, as do most Canadians, realize that when we are meeting the challenge today, when we are moving forward in social and economic spheres, we must have a strong federal government acting in a true spirit of co-operative federalism with strong provincial governments, both acting within their respective constitutional jurisdictions. I repeat, the federal government must remain strong.

This is one of the great debates of our time. I must say that the sooner we get to this debate the better. I hope there will be no other debate coming in between this debate and the one on the constitution which may tend to get us off on an unnecessary diversion. From 1867 up until today the two great languages, the two great cultures have lived side by side and now apply to the millions of Canadians who have since come to our shores from many lands. The melting pot theory cannot be superimposed on the Canadian mosaic. I believe, as I have always believed, that the people of the province of Quebec, in a special sense want a strong, united Canada, Mr. Chairman. The Conservative party, which in a spirit of optimism helped to build our confederation, is now called upon to defend the spirit of confederation. I should like to say to the leader of the Creditistes, and I do not say this in any electoral hustings sense, that this is the challenge in Canada. I ask the Prime Minister and Mr. Lesage to look at this challenge that is immediately in front of us. Here we are, the two founding races, living together in a positive spirit of good will.

In most organizations, it has been said that 90 per cent of events are caused by 10 per cent of the opportunities. The 90 per cent area is the area of problems, the headache area as it is sometimes called, and the 10 per cent area is the area of opportunity. In my view, in so far as these problems are concerned, we have devoted most of our energies to the 90 per cent problem area while the 10 per cent area of opportunity has been typically ignored. It seems to me that, in relation to national unity, in relation to questions of confederation, we have spent an inordinate amount of time on the 90 per cent problem area, while we have typically ignored the 10 per cent area of opportunity. Representing a constituency in which I have been able to witness at first hand how the two founding races live together in a dynamic and positive spirit of good will and national unity, I can only say that while mutual understanding, comprehension, and collaboration are good terms, simply by talking about these we are not being positive enough in emphasizing the dynamic, positive qualities which are contained in what I call "unity in diversity", which certainly can be applied to the Canadian scene.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian constitution is the first one in the world to combine a federal system of government with a parliamentary system. I have always felt that a federal system of government should tend to combine a measure of unity with a measure of diversity.

In my opinion, Canada's unity has never been and will never be based on the melting-pot principle.

[Text]

I should like to say I tried to get a logical and literal translation of "melting pot". The word is "creuset" but it just doesn't apply.

Everybody knows that we have a thin population scattered over a great expanse of territory. I believe that even when we have a much larger population and means of communication are faster, our attitude toward Canada and its population should still be inspired by the slogan "unity in diversity". Our federalism is based on a particular psychology found among the various groups and in the various provinces, a psychology which makes union desirable, but not unity of language, culture, religion and so on.

Mr. Chairman, this "unity in diversity" approach should always be looked upon as a positive and dynamic factor in our national structure. True, the diversity which is basic to our national life often raises numerous problems during the development stage of the nation. We are faced with some of those problems at present. I believe that, when we are content with paying lip service to the need for mutual respect and understanding, we are adopting a "live and let live" attitude which is far from being positive enough. Of course, co-operation and understanding are essential elements of the attitude we should take, but the sooner we concentrate on the positive advantages of our diversity, the less we shall hear about a confederation crisis. Then we shall start turning our eyes towards the outside world instead of merely looking at ourselves.

[Text]

At this stage of our proceedings in this session of parliament I thought it was opportune for me to rise and put on record some general ideas relating to our constitution, some general ideas relating to our federal-provincial relations, some general ideas relating to what I consider to be the dynamic and positive aspects of unity in diversity, as one who speaks for a constituency in which the two great founding races, together with so many who have come to our shores from other countries during the past few decades, live together in this positive atmosphere. I thought this was a time for a general, keynote speech in this regard as we approach what I consider to be one of the most important debates, if not the most important debate, which has faced members of this parliament for a number of years.

Mr. Woolliams: I did not intend to speak twice today but I should like to answer certain arguments which were put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I wish to refer particularly to the charge he made that the formula proposed today is no different from the formula presented by Mr. Fulton. I wish also to say a few words about the personal attack he made on our leader in this regard.

I realize it is not easy to discuss a complex legal problem of this kind in the house. It is not easy for anyone, and I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, it is very difficult for me. I do assert—and in this I support what was said by the hon. member for Queens, the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi—that we must have a strong central government in Canada if this country is to survive. What is the difference between these proposals? To answer that question I suggest we should take a look at the British North America Act for a few moments. I intend to refer to Dawson's book "The Government of Canada". All students of political science have studied this book and referred to it from time to time in their classes. It has been cited by the best constitutional lawyers. What are the powers of the central government as laid down originally by the Fathers of Confederation? Without going into too much legal phraseology, let us consider what those powers were. Then let us look at what the amendments had to say in 1949 and, lastly, at how the situation might be changed by the formula which apparently the present government intends to bring in.

I repeat my assertion that under the guise of bringing back the constitution we are whittling away the federal powers laid down by the British North America Act as drafted by the Fathers of Confederation who helped to bring it into law. What are these powers? They include: the public debt and property; the regulation of trade and commerce; the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation; the borrowing of money on the public credit; postal service; the census and statistics; militia, military and naval service, and defence; the fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the government of Canada; beacons, buoys, lighthouses, navigation and shipping; seacoast and inland fisheries; ferries between a province and any British or foreign country or between two provinces; currency and coinage; banking; incorporation of banks, and the issue of paper money; savings banks; weights and measures; bills of exchange and promissory notes; interest; legal tender; bankruptcy and insolvency; patents of invention and discovery; copyrights; Indians and lands reserved for Indians; naturalization and aliens.

What happened on December 16, 1949, when the amendment was brought in? Briefly, this is what happened as I see it. The federal government was put in a position where it could itself amend the constitution by the process of petitioning the imperial parliament, subject to certain reservations. That is where the power remains. Basically, of course, the imperial parliament alone has the power to amend the British North America Act which is a creature of the imperial parliament. It is the only power that can do it. In actual fact, of course, no amendment would be made unless such a course were suggested by this House of Commons, or this parliament, to the imperial authority. I intend to refer at this point to the Winnipeg Free Press because I think that paper is on absolutely the right track in this regard. This is a difficult argument to present to parliament in the short time available to me, more particularly because of the kind of research which is needed.

I will digress for a moment. The research we need and the research the government needs should be carried out by ten or 12 top constitutional people in this country so as to make sure we are not making a mistake. I was happy to hear a previous speaker, a member who represents a constituency composed of French speaking Canadians to the extent of 75 per cent, tell us that what the people in the corner mean by central government and what I mean by central government may be two separate and different things. I was speaking to one of his friends in the corner—in fact to his leader; I am not giving away any confidences—and I am not sure we are so far apart. When we talk about what we mean by central government I do not mean the kind of central government we would have set up if we had had a legislative union. This would have meant that all the powers were given to a central government, which in turn delegated to the provinces whatever powers they possessed. Our confederation was the result of a compromise reached between John A. Macdonald, Cartier and others, in which the form of government and the powers of the dominion government were spelled out in a federal system. The federal residuary powers and the powers allotted to the provinces were spelled out, and where there was a conflict the residuary powers were placed in the hands of the federal central government. What is the difference? Mr. Fulton said:

> In so far as there is now incorporated by clause 6 a new provision which limits the federal power of amending the constitution in those respects which are of exclusively federal concern, (which power was contained in section 91(1) B.N.A. Act), by attempting to define the limits of what is of exclusively federal concern, there is a new policy question for consideration: are the limits thus defined reasonable, or are they unduly restrictive? But this is a question which does not, it seems to me, affect the integrity of the remainder of the amending formula as contained in the 1961 proposal.

But this is the point I want to make, and it is a difficult point to get across. If in the new formula which this government apparently has in mind and is contained in either the recent release or the document filed in the House of Commons, there is the kind of formula that by its interpretation confines the powers as laid down by section 91 of the British North America Act, then we are in fact limiting the powers of the central government as originally planned by the Fathers of Confederation.

Therein lies the difference between the Fulton formula and the formula before us today. When the Minister of Transport says that the Leader of the Opposition can make black white, or white black, and is misrepresenting the facts, I say with the greatest respect to his intellect, and without making any personal attack on him, that he does a great disservice to a man who has been in parliament since 1940, a man who has been a great leader of our party and one of the great, outstanding lawyers of our country and who pointed out on the occasion that has been referred to that there is a difference in the formulas.

I wish the Minister of Transport were in his place now to hear my answer to his remarks, but I know he is a good enough student that he will read it in Hansard, and if he wishes to answer me, he may do so. I know he will do so if he does not agree with me, because that is certainly his privilege as a member of this house and a minister.

I am calling it as I see it. I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are now, by the amendment, limiting the powers originally set up by section 91 of the British North America Act, and we are particularly limiting what was intended by the amendment of 1949. What did the amendment say? Let us look at it. I have read from page 609 those powers of the central government contained in section 91 of the British North America Act. This is what it says:

> Section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby amended by renumbering Class 1 thereof as Class 1A and by inserting therein immediately before that Class the following as Class 1:
> "1. The amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other constitutional act granted or secured to the legislature or the government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language or as regards the requirements that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least one each year, and that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the writs for choosing the house; provided, however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the Parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one third of the members of such house".

2. This act may be cited as The British North America (No. 2) Act, 1949, and shall be included among the acts which may be cited as The British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

Briefly, what does all that mean? It means, except those powers given to the provinces; except as to the English language; except as to the French language; except as to some of those other rights delegated to the provinces by the act itself, the federal parliament, by the proper methods, may petition the imperial parliament and they could amend and restrict or extend their own powers as defined. But under the new amending formula I say that the right of amending our own powers, the right of being master in our own household, has been assigned to the provinces. Therein lies the difference between the Fulton formula and the formula today. That is why I said this morning—and I want to repeat it—that if that formula goes through we will have carved up this country into ten Balkan states.

I listened with great interest to the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste and I am sure, after listening to his argument, that we are not far apart, even though we are many miles apart in a great country. It is a matter of definition; it is a matter of defining what we mean by "centralization". I say, Mr. Chairman, that this country cannot exist without a strong central government. When I refer to a strong central government, I do not mean a central government that erodes and usurps provincial rights; I mean a strong central government that has the power to control what those rights are under our constitution. The only protection we have are the rights spelled out in the constitution; we have those rights in law. What is the danger in the future? As one hon. member has said, we are today making history; we, in this institution, are as important as were the Fathers of Confederation; because it is not the government of today or the government of tomorrow, but it is our sons, daughters and grandchildren who will have to live with a constitution that may have whittled away and eroded the powers of the central government.

So when the Leader of the Opposition said there appears to be a difference between the Fulton formula and the formula today, and the Minister of Transport says on the other hand that the Leader of the Opposition has misrepresented the facts, I say that the Minister of Transport admitted he was not a constitutional lawyer and did not know too much about the British North America Act. I am not saying he was insincere in his remarks, but he failed to see the difference, and because of his failure to see that difference he accused the Leader of the Opposition of misrepresentation—

Miss LaMarsh: And lying.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare say I have lied. Is that what the Minister of National Health and Welfare just said?

Mr. Churchill: She won't answer.

Mr. Woolliams: I would ask the minister whether she said that. That is what I heard.

Miss LaMarsh: I did not say you were lying.

Mr. Woolliams: Did you say the Leader of the Opposition lied? Mr. Chairman, if the minister said the Leader of the Opposition lied, or I lied, I would ask the minister to withdraw those words.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw.

The Chairman: Order. I might say that the Chair did not hear the remark.

Mr. Churchill: That does not matter.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, as a member of this house—

The Chairman: Order. If the minister says she made no such remark, there is no point raising a point of order.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the remarks the minister made were to me, and about an entirely different topic.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, come on now.

Mr. Mackasey: Unfortunately for the hon. member for Bow River, we have not found anything he has yet said sufficiently interesting to pay attention to. I apologize for that, and—

Mr. Smallwood: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, this is ridiculous, if it is the kind of behaviour going on in the House of Commons. The minister was not talking to the hon. member who has just spoken. She looked directly over to the hon. member who was speaking and said he lied. This is the kind of attitude adopted by hon. members opposite, and it is ridiculous in this House of Commons.

Miss LaMarsh: It is nice to see you back in the house after two months.

Mr. Smallwood: We will deal with you on your pension plan.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to answer the hon. member for Verdun who said I have not said anything that is interesting; but I would like to suggest to him—and I do not say this sarcastically—with great respect, that I doubt he would understand the kind of constitutional point I am trying to get across at this moment; and I am not being an egotist when I say that. But if he would listen and pay a little more attention, he might learn something.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order—

Mr. Woolliams: I do not intend to get into an argument with the hon. member, because he wants to build himself up in the newspapers.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I confess that I am not a lawyer but I did understand the clarity and simplicity with which the Minister of Transport pointed out the real facts. This I understood very well. If some time the hon. member for Bow River shows that degree of maturity in the house, I am sure I will be able to understand all that he says.

The Chairman: There is no point of order and I would ask the hon. member for Bow River to continue.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not going to answer the hon. member, because it would be beneath my dignity.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: But I am going to answer something for a few minutes.

Mr. Turner: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if I could suggest to the hon. member that it might also be beneath his dignity to impute motives to the hon. member for Verdun. After all, some of us did not expect he would be speaking in instalments today; and had the Minister of Transport expected a rebuttal to his speech of earlier today, he would have been in his seat. I would think perhaps the hon. member for Bow River would wish to continue without imputing motives to those on this side of the chamber for whom he has some affection.

[Mr. Smallwood).]

Mr. Woolliams: As far as I am concerned I did not impute motives. The minister of health called the Leader of the Opposition or myself—I heard it with my own ears and she looked right at me—a liar, or she said it was a lie, and it is that sort of thing which is ruining the dignity of parliament. However, I should like to answer the argument which has been put forward because I think it is only fair to answer it. I want to read something which might interest the Liberal government. I want to refer to "The Round Table", a quarterly review of British commonwealth affairs. I do not know whether the hon. member for Verdun will understand this, but this is what the writer says concerning the commonwealth:

Mr. Gordon—

I am not attacking Mr. Gordon but I must read everything; if I do not it will be said that I am talking out of context.

—the Minister of Finance has done something to redeem the calamitous errors of his first budget but is far from having won the complete confidence of the country, while Miss Judy LaMarsh, Minister of National Health and Welfare, has become notorious for her indiscreet utterances.

Then he goes on to say this, and this is one of the reasons I am concerned about the formula. Incidentally, these articles are written by the top people in the commonwealth.

Mr. Turner: To which article is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. Woolliams: If my hon. friend has read "The Round Table" he will know the writers of these articles are selected by a committee.

Mr. Turner: It is an unsigned article.

Mr. Woolliams: Of course it is. No article in the British commonwealth affairs review is signed.

Mr. Turner: Then you cannot read it.

Mr. Woolliams: We are not like the hon. member known as Mr. "Leakman", who signs his stuff. The writer goes on:

On the eve of the Liberal convention—

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Even on the assumption that the main tenor of the hon. member's speech is relevant, although the Chair has tolerated this line of argument all day I hardly see how the present intervention is relevant even to an irrelevant speech.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not going to get into an argument because the hon. member may have an argument of his own to make in the future.

Mr. Rhéaume: I doubt that.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member is a good lawyer. If it is not relevant to discuss section 91 or the Fulton formula or the formula of the government, then I would ask him what is relevant here. This is what I was discussing before I was interrupted by the minister of health. I would ask hon. members opposite to read the article entitled "Futility in Parliament" and in particular what it says about their own members and their own government in this regard. That is all I am going to say about that.

Now I will go back to my original argument. I outlined a few moments ago the powers which are set out in section 91. I also pointed out that the amendment of 1949 gave parliament the right to petition to change its powers. Under the new formula that right to amend the powers of the central government which are set out in section 91—the residuary powers provided either by section 91 or section 92—have to a certain degree been given to the provinces. Therein lies the danger: The powers of the central government may be whittled down and lost.

Let us look at what the Winnipeg Free Press says about this in an article written by Maurice Western on the editorial page:

> It would be pleasant if all Canadians could join in the heady self-congratulatory mood of the federal and provincial governments over the scheme they have announced for making the British North America Act a Canadian document. In the fortnight that has passed since the scheme was unveiled it has become clear that no one at either level of government has the slightest intention of telling the whole story. On the contrary some of the premiers seem not even to comprehend the real meaning of what they have done; others have tried to throw a smokescreen around the whole subject.

The hon. member for Queens talked this afternoon about the contribution which the premier of Ontario made, and I think he made a good contribution. He gave a warning to the country about the whittling away of the powers of the central government. Because without the central government there will be no provincial governments; Canada will consist of ten states.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: Someone says "hear, hear". I think it must be Mr. Thatcher from Saskatchewan, but anyway that does not matter. The article continues:

> What is the truth behind all this obfuscation? What has really happened is that the ten provinces and the federal government have connived to bring about the most sweeping constitutional change in Canadian history, enormously enhancing provincial authority and introducing principles which could go a long way toward destroying the essential powers of the central government.

Those were my words this morning and they are the words of a competent newspaperman in this country and appear in a national newspaper. They are words of warning to Canadians that we as members of parliament may be endorsing a new and sweeping constitutional change.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question at this time?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. McIlraith: Is he arguing that that undoubtedly responsible newspaperman is a better authority on constitutional law on this point than is Hon. Davie Fulton?

Mr. Woolliams: No. I want to read now what Mr. Fulton said to me about this. He agrees with the Winnipeg Free Press. I am glad the minister asked that question because Mr. Fulton says this:

> In so far as—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. Woolliams: There you are. As soon as I make a point in answer to the minister a point of order is raised. Surely there is no point of order here. The minister has asked me a question and I want to refer to what has been said in this regard.

The Chairman: A point of order when raised by an hon. member has to be submitted for the consideration of the Chair.

Mr. Grégoire: My point of order is completely in order and is meant only to facilitate the task of the hon. member for Bow River. May we know from what source he quotes Mr. Fulton, just to have it on the record? I do not want to insult the hon. member but I do want that on the record.

Mr. Woolliams: I am reading from a brief from Mr. Fulton. I have been in communication with him; he is a friend of mine, a former minister of justice and he is a Conservative. Naturally I am interested in his comments. I have my ideas and he has his ideas. No one suggests that law is an exact science; we have only to read the many cases concerning the interpretation of statutes to determine that.

Now I want to answer the minister because he asked me a perfectly proper question. I am now reading what Mr. Fulton said to me and I should like to proceed. He said:

> In so far as there is now incorporated by clause 6 a new provision which limits the federal power of amending the constitution in those respects which are of exclusively federal concern (which power was contained in section 91 (1) B.N.A. Act), by attempting to define the limits of what is of exclusively federal concern, there is a new policy question for consideration:—

That is the point I was trying to make when I first rose in my place this afternoon, that this new policy is placing a brand new interpretation on the meaning of the delegated powers and residuary powers contained in section 91. If you attempt to define the limits of those words you trim down the powers of the central government. If you enlarge the limits of those words you enlarge the powers of the central government. That is exactly the position that I understand he takes.

I was referring to what was said by the Winnipeg Free Press, and I want to finish this quotation because some good examples are given. Let me take one example. If you were going to form two or three new provinces in the Northwest Territories, then I would ask this question—I think I know the answer but I may not be right: Do we have to get the consent of the other provinces to do this? If, for example, we want to whittle away the power of the central government in connection with banking as outlined in section 91, can the provinces then force an amendment to that section? Could they force an amendment on things other than under section 91, which are exclusively reserved to the federal government? These are the difficult questions that must be answered, and this is the kind of control I am talking about. This is where the erosion could take place. Again I repeat that this is not an easy subject to understand, and I have given it a great deal of study.

Would the government in Ottawa turn down such a request from four of the populous provinces in respect of monetary policy, external affairs and tariffs? In other words, have four provinces, with a sufficient population, the power to assign from the federal government by a constitutional change such things as banking, trade, tariffs or the forming of provinces? Therein lies the danger of this legislation and that is why these matters must be aired. That is why I recommended that we should have a committee before which the top men in this country could appear and explain this whole subject to those members who do not understand it. If they are not made to understand what is being done, and made aware of the dangers which are inherent, it may well be that we are about to endorse something of grave danger to the very unity of this country.

An hon. Member: This is just like the flag issue.

Mr. Woolliams: I heard someone say something about the flag question, but I am not going to get into that argument.

This is what Mr. Maurice Western had to say about this subject. I have said these things in a different way, but his statements give weight to my argument. Maurice Western wrote in an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press on October 26, 1964, the following:

> Despite soothing official assurances, the patriation agreement announced by the 11 premiers involves a drastic amendment of the constitution, leading Canadians into country unexplored during our century of existence as a nation. A prudent parliament will wish, no doubt, to examine the project with some care, weighing the risks and probabilities before passing the address which will carry us past the point of no return.
> What is unfamiliar in the agreement is the principle of delegation, unknown to the constitution with which we have lived so long.

That delegation is, of course, spelled out by the law. The provinces have tried many times to erode federal powers. I recall when Mr. Aberhart first came into office. He wanted to take over the making of money, and he did issue some scrip. That legislation was declared unconstitutional. He tried to pass legislation in respect of the press, to make the situation more fair on the part of the press, but that act to control the press was declared unconstitutional.

An hon. Member: He was right.

Mr. Woolliams: He may have been right; I am just telling you what happened in the courts.

The province of Saskatchewan attempted to legislate in respect of the banking industry in reference to the farm security act but if you read the famous decision of the Supreme Court of Canada you will find that that legislation was declared ultra vires.

I suggest that four provinces with a sufficient population might be able to erode the powers of the federal government spelled out and defined in section 91 of the B.N.A. Act. Where would this country then be?

I suggest to those who are the most extreme supporters and promoters of this philosophy of strong provincial government that they ask themselves this question. If we erode the powers of the central government will the provincial governments remain provincial governments, or will they in fact be national governments having all their own rights to tax each other, set tariffs, create their own exchange, and have their own rights in respect of trade and various other fields? When that time comes we will be the assassins of confederation, not the ones who have endeavoured to carry on the aims and ambitions of the Fathers of Confederation in an attempt to hold this country together and to unite it as it has never before been united.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks about the amount of money we are being asked by the government to vote in order that it may carry on its program for the next two months. I think we must look at government spending very carefully before passing interim supply. I think we should look very carefully at the operations of the famous C.B.C. corporation.

We have heard a great deal about this corporation. There are some people in this country, including the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, who feel the C.B.C. should be untouchable. I think it is time that the public was enlightened about what the C.B.C. is doing and how it is wasting their money. If the programs shown by the C.B.C. are of a type that should not be shown, we as members of parliament have the right to stand in this house and say so.

Mr. Chairman, on March 2, 1964, I rose in my place in this house and complained about the program "Quest". I have in my hand a file of letters I have received from people across Canada thanking me for the action I took on that occasion. I might say that it contains hundreds of letters. I received two letters expressing opposition to the action I took.

Of course, there are these so-called intellectuals and critics in this country, such as Frank Moritsugu of Toronto, and Mr. Frank Penn of the Ottawa Citizen, who suggest that I had no business condemning the C.B.C. For two days I tried to contact Mr. Penn to have a talk with him, but I was unable to locate him. These people are difficult to find, and I suspect they hide in their ivory towers writing articles about members of parliament.

The general public feels quite differently toward the extravagance of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think this feeling has been expressed in an editorial which appeared in the Edmonton Journal in September, 1964. This editorial states in part as follows:

Members of parliament will be derelict in their duty if they do not ask why it was necessary to spend $6,160,000 of the taxpayers' money merely for a site for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's new headquarters in Montreal.

I suggest that is typical of the way the C.B.C. is wasting the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Bushnell, a former top executive of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, when speaking in Toronto, charged that the C.B.C. has become extravagant. In 1963-64 the C.B.C. spent $115 million, of which $78 million came from public funds. This year this publicly owned corporation is going to spend more than $100 million of the taxpayers' money. It is time that we as members of parliament sat as members of a parliamentary committee to inquire into the extravagance of the C.B.C. I suggested as early as March, 1964, that a committee to perform this function be established. At that time we were assured by the Prime Minister that this committee would be set up.

Mr. Chairman, we are now being asked to donate over $100 million of the taxpayers' money to the C.B.C. in order that that corporation may spend that money wastefully in the construction of new buildings. At the present time there are buildings owned by the C.B.C. in Ottawa of an aggregate value of $3 million. I think we should look at the situation today, bearing in mind that many individuals are unemployed in this country and living in poverty. I suggest there are many programs carried by the C.B.C. which are not fit to be seen by television viewers.

Some people have stated that we should not criticize the producers and script writers of C.B.C. programs. Perhaps those individuals should take a trip to Toronto and visit the C.B.C. club there to see the kind of people who write these scripts. I had the opportunity of making such a visit.

I still maintain that the time has come for us to take a very close look at the operations of the C.B.C. It is time a committee was set up in this house to scrutinize the spending of this crown corporation. As a last resort I ask the Secretary of State, who is not in his place, or the Prime Minister, to give us some assurance that a parliamentary committee will be established to look into the affairs of this corporation so that we may at least attempt to save the taxpayers some money and stop the C.B.C. from exposing its viewers to programs which, in my opinion, are completely unfit.

This government is asking us to vote this money so that the government may carry on with its business. The government has been in power for over a year and has brought in no useful legislation. It has been hiding it in the cupboard. It has been playing with the flag, it has been playing with the pension plan, and all this time farm prices have been going down. What are they doing about it? Absolutely nothing. We see that today the price of cattle is as low as 15 cents a pound, a reduction of 10 cents from last year. Yet the Minister of Agriculture is not even around the house. This is a do-nothing government. They are just playing for time and engaging in tricks. They have even got magicians in the government who take something out of a hat one day and put it back the next day. This has been going on for nearly two years. It is about time we had some action from the government. Otherwise I think we should be tempted not to give them any more money to fiddle with.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Chairman, I want to put a few remarks on the record at this time when the committee is discussing the whole matter of revision of our constitution.

Mr. Grégoire: Carried.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Chairman, would you ask the hon. member for Lapointe to come to order so I can do my thinking and speaking in some kind of orderly manner?

An hon. Member: Can you not think otherwise?

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Chairman, in answer to that question, whether I cannot think otherwise, may I say I am not used to thinking in the midst of noise, chattering and jabbering.

Mr. Grégoire: Are you stating you are not used to thinking?

An hon. Member: He is only going to read his speech anyway.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Chairman, once again I say that I intend to continue my speech. If these members on the Liberal back benches wish to make speeches I am sure you will recognize them, Mr. Chairman, if they will stand up and be identified.

The whole question of the revision of the constitution poses rather special problems for 50,000 of our northern people who happen to live in the Yukon and Northwest Territories because neither the Yukon nor the Northwest Territories is in confederation yet. As hon. members are probably aware, when the responsibilities and tax fields that were to be divided were defined in the British North America Act only two spheres were envisaged, the federal sphere and the provincial sphere. The transitional stage of being a territory was meant to be precisely that, transitional, and I think it is most important that at this time when we are talking about repatriating the constitution the situation in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories should be reviewed rather carefully. It is even more important at this time, because neither of these territories was represented at the conference of attorneys general held recently to consider these matters.

I have listened attentively and quietly, Mr. Chairman, all afternoon to the remarks made by other members in the course of this debate and I would recommend to the hon. member for Lapointe that he should do the same. I too am concerned about the piecemeal dismemberment of this country at the hands of the Prime Minister and I do not hesitate to say that he must take full responsibility. He is supposed to be the leader of the government, although whether or not he is is something for him to worry about. But certainly we have seen the federal authority purposely weakened by his actions at a time when more than anything else we need a strong central government.

I know that the background of the Prime Minister is certainly an interesting and distinguished one in terms of his work at the United Nations. No one would question that the present Prime Minister was a great United Nations man, but although he may have been a great UN man he is certainly unable or unwilling to provide the kind of federal leadership that is required at the present time. This is the worst possible time for Canada to have a windsock prime minister. I am sure those of you who do any flying know what I mean when I refer to a windsock administration that turns in response to whichever way the breeze is blowing. This kind of approach to our problems is a source of real concern to me as the member for the Northwest Territories and to my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, because if the Prime Minister insists on calling conference after conference at which the whole federal pie is put up for grabs, then those people who live in areas that are weaker in terms of their representation, either provincially or territorially, are going to be left with little more than crumbs.

There is another reason why I feel the situation within the two territories is serious. Right now neither the Yukon nor the Northwest Territories has full representation in parliament. If you will recall, Mr. Chairman, that parliament consists not only of the House of Commons but of the Queen and also the Senate, you will understand what I am driving at. At the present time neither the Yukon nor the Northwest Territories is represented in the Senate. There are no senators from either of these territories.

Some may automatically ask why we do not have such representation, or why we should have, in view of the sparse population of these areas. I am aware of the historical reasons for Prince Edward Island having four senators but I think it is fair to point out that at the present time more than 40,000 people live in the two northern territories. In my own constituency of the Northwest Territories we have over 26,000 people. Prince Edward Island, with a population of approximately 107,000, has four senators. As I say, I am aware of the historical reasons for this but I draw this matter to the attention of the committee, because in justice I think the two northern territories can insist on having representation in the Senate.

The previous administration made tremendous strides in opening up the Canadian north and embarked upon a program that concerned not only physical resource development, involving such things as airports, roads and railroads but which also gave the federal franchise to all residents of the Northwest Territories through the medium of the Nielsen bill, named after the hon. member for Yukon. This was part of a program to speed up the political development of Canada's far north, so that the logical step after the people were given elected representation in the House of Commons was to strengthen the local government and also to provide for the representation of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories in the other place.

The advantage of this sort of thing is surely obvious to anyone who will do a little thinking. It distresses me to see the Prime Minister deal away federal responsibilities in reaction to the slightest bit of pressure exerted upon him, but it is of particular concern because it tells those of us who live in the Canadian north that we may never get representation in the Senate.

The charge was made last week in Edmonton by the hon. member for Yukon and myself that for the past 18 months at any rate there has been a complete neglect of the affairs of the two northern territories, perhaps in retaliation for the northland having dared to send other than Liberal members to this house or perhaps because of the traditional approach of the Liberal party which has been to neglect, to deride and overlook the needs of the rural areas of this country, whether they be in the west, the maritimes or the Canadian northland. In the past 18 months, there has not been a single new project initiated by the federal government in either of the two northern territories. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was in Edmonton and he talked about the wonderful railway that was now pushing the frontier up to latitude 62. He described this railway as the greatest single development in the Canadian northwest, and said it would be of even greater importance in the years ahead as the tremendous Pine Point lead and zinc deposits were exploited.

Fortunately, the Leader of the Opposition arrived in Edmonton on the same evening. He was quick to point out, and this was not lost to westerners, that every Liberal member in the House of Commons voted against the Pine Point railway at the time the bill was up for second reading. Now they are taking credit for this railway and saying what a wonderful thing it is. I mention these things, Mr. Chairman, not to thresh old straw, if you will, but because it is more crucial than ever for these two territories to rather quickly get representation in the Senate. This is a time when the creation of two positions in the other place for people from the north would be of great help. It is a time, perhaps because our territories are evolving very slowly, when the Senate, which is less involved in the day to day speculation about a general election and certainly does not need to be alarmed by partisanship in any of its strange forms, would be able to provide the sort of advice and study so necessary on behalf of the two northern territories. Now, in all the hundreds of thousands of words that have been spoken in this House of Commons in the last year in relation to solving problems, I have not heard a single member of the government refer to the fact that no provision was made to provide the Yukon and Northwest Territories with Senate representation.

The question I want answered is why this has happened? Surely, at a time when we are sitting down talking about making essential revisions, overdue revisions of the British North America Act, this is the logical time to plan an article in the constitution whereby the northern 50 per cent of this country can be brought under the British North America Act in a more meaningful way, and given full representation in parliament. In late 1962 the hon. member for the Yukon was attempting to have this matter brought forward. At that time delay occurred because the development of political institutions in the Northwest Territories was proceeding apace. I do not believe anyone will quarrel with me seriously when I say it is more important for a resident of the northland to at least have the right to vote in federal elections, and it does not hurt to remind hon. members of this house that it was only in 1962 that every Canadian citizen over 21 years of age had the right to vote in federal elections. Prior to that time thousands of Canadians who were living in many parts of Canada's northland, whether they were Indian or Eskimo, were deprived of their vote. There was nothing in the election act that prevented them from voting, but they did not belong in any constituency. When the writs were issued and the lists were put up of the voters, tnere was nowhere they could vote.

There used to be a saying, when I was first knocking around the Northwest Territories, to the effect that if you wanted to lose your right to vote in Canada, all you had to do was to go to prison, go insane or go north. This situation was corrected. Not only were residents of the north given the federal franchise for the first time in June, 1962, but so were the Indian people. Prior to that time they did not have a franchise, because of their racial origin. When the accomplishments of the previous prime minister were being ridiculed and derided by the great exponent of political integrity, the Minister of Transport, to the jeers and catcalls of his loyal backbenchers, it was distressing to me to note that no one gave credit for this sort of thing. Yet, prior to the passage of the Canadian Bill of Rights and the implications that this had on the franchise in northern Canada, it was true that Canada had no right to hold up her head in the councils of the United Nations, at a time when many of her citizens were being deprived of the basic right to vote, solely because of their racial origin. I am speaking now of the Indian and Eskimo people. No one in this house knows what a tremendous step that was. If for nothing else, the previous prime minister deserves the commendation of Canadians and a place in history as the prime minister who, after 22 years of Liberal government, was the first to see that every Canadian citizen had the right to vote.

May I call it five o'clock?

Progress reported.

[Mr. Rhéaume.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will proceed to private members' business, namely, public bills and private bills.

Mr. Knowles: Since it is generally known what order we will be proceeding with, could we not arrive at it by unanimous consent rather than calling 20 or 22 items and having each one stand?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall all the items but one be allowed to stand?

Mr. Churchill: I raise the suggestion that I raised before, that after bills have been called on two or three occasions they should drop to the bottom of the list. Then you would not have to go through this procedure of calling bills day after day that have been on the order paper and retained their position for months.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that one particular item will be called, item No. 23?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING SENATE REPRESENTATION FROM QUEBEC

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-76, to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960, with respect to representation of the provinces in the Senate and qualifications of senators.

He said:

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as all hon. members know, the object of this bill is to bring the Senate abreast with the times we live in. There is no question of abolishing the Senate but to bring it to proportions more appropriate to our times.

Bill No. C-76 reads as follows:

An act to amend the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960, with respect to representation of the provinces in the Senate and qualifications of senators.

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

1. Section 22 of the British North America Act, 1867, is amended by deleting the last paragraph thereto which at present reads as follows:

"In the case of Quebec, each of the twenty four senators representing that province shall be appointed for one of the twenty four electoral divisions of Lower Canada specified in schedule A to chapter one of the Consolidated Statutes of Canada."

Explanatory Note: "This paragraph, together with paragraph 6 of section 23, which it is also proposed to delete, was inserted at the time of confederation to protect the English Protestant minority which was then located mainly in the eastern townships of the province of Quebec. Needless to say that no such provision has been inserted in the constitution to safeguard the French and Roman Catholic minorities of the other provinces.

However, as the population of the eastern townships is now mostly French Canadian, there is no need to perpetuate in the British North America Act such an obsolete provision.

Why should we keep in the statutes of the British North America Act a provision dating back to 1867, at a time when confederation comprised Upper and Lower Canada, while today our country includes ten provinces?

There is no such provision in any other Canadian province, except in the province of Quebec.

It seems to me that the federal parliament should remove that section which is altogether obsolete and outmoded.

Clause 2 of Bill C-76 reads as follows:

2. Clause 23 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"23. The qualification of a senator shall be as follows:

(1) He shall be of the full age of thirty years;

(2) He shall be a Canadian citizen;

(3) He shall be resident in the province for which he is appointed.

It seems to me that we have come to maturity and that we should repeal what is incorporated in clause 23 of the British North America Act, namely:

The qualifications of a senator shall be as follows:

(1) He shall be at the full age of thirty years;

That qualification does not change.

(2) He shall be either a natural-born subject of the Queen, or a subject of the Queen naturalized by an act of the parliament of Great Britain, or of the parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the legislature of one of the provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, before the union, or of the parliament of Canada, after the union;

Since this is the parliament of Canada after the union, after confederation, it seems to me that we should revert to more equitable requirements, that is to be Canadian citizens, which implies the whole thing in itself and proves that we are masters of our destiny and that we can decide for ourselves.

The third paragraph of that clause 23 reads as follows:

(3) He shall be legally or equitably seized as freehold for his own use and benefit—

In simple terms, he must be the owner of property worth $4,000 over and above all his debts, mortgages, liabilities, etc.

(4) His real and personal property shall be together worth four thousand dollars over and above his debts and liabilities:

(5) He shall be resident in the province for which he is appointed.

Now, I come to the sixth paragraph and that is the one we want to eliminate. It reads as follows:

In the case of Quebec he shall have his real property qualification in the electoral division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that division."

Here is the explanatory note on that matter:

The main reason for the proposed change is that now that Canada is no longer a colony, only a Canadian should be qualified to be a senator. It is further suggested that if it is true that it is most difficult for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven, a poor man should not be prevented from entering the democratic Senate in the Kingdom of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the abrogation of clause 23(6) is proposed for reasons indicated in clause 1 of the bill. We are also suggesting that clauses 26, 27 and 28 of the said act be repealed and section 4 states:

That this act may be cited as the British North America Act, 1964, and the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1960 and this act may be cited together as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1964.

Clauses 26, 27 and 28 which at the present time read as follows:

26. If at any time on the recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that three or six members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by summons to three or six qualified persons (as the case may be), representing equally the three divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.

Clause 27 reads as follows:

27. In the case of such addition being at any time made, the Governor General shall not summon any person to the Senate, except upon a further like direction by the Queen on the like recommendation, to represent one of the three divisions until such division is represented by twenty four Senators and no more.

Clause 28 reads:

28. The number of senators shall not at any time exceed seventy eight.

Since we never had to apply those clauses, why not repeal them? In fact, those clauses have never been used and we, nevertheless, tolerate them as it is provided that the number of senators should never exceed 78. At present, we have more than 78, we have 104. Therefore, clause 28 is outmoded and obsolete.

Mr. Choquette: We have 102, but we are entitled to 104.

Mr. Caouette: I thank the hon. member for Lotbinière for giving me this information.

I think that the attention of the house should be drawn especially to clause 23 where it is stated that a senator shall have the following qualifications:

(1) He shall be of the full age of thirty years;
(2) he shall be a Canadian citizen;
(3) he shall be resident in the province for which he is appointed.

This means also that, in order to be called to the Senate, the qualification of Canadian citizen does not imply that one must be a partisan of the party in power, or of the opposition party, or a political organizer of any party. The qualification of Canadian citizen means that any Canadian citizen is eligible for appointment to the Senate.

Quite often, appointments were made on a purely political basis. Of course there were exceptions, and I will mention them.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: When?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: For instance, Senator J. Hackett, a Conservative member of parliament for many years, was appointed to the Senate by the then prime minister, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. Mr. Hackett was a Conservative. We also had appointments—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. François Pouliot.

Mr. Caouette: —which were not entirely of a political nature. I am thinking of businessmen like Senator Molson who was neither a known Liberal or Conservative, but whose appointment is a contribution to the Senate. We also have Senator McCutcheon, who somewhat entertains independent political views, though he is considered as a Tory.

My hon. friend from Lotbinière referred to Senator Pouliot. I do not think that, strictly speaking, Senator Pouliot's appointment was a political one. As as matter of fact, I knew him personally from 1946 to 1949, when he sat as a Liberal member, and whenever he wanted to let the government in office have a piece of his mind, the senator did not hesitate. They called him the enfant terrible of the house, precisely because he did not always agree with the government of the day, that of Right Hon. Mackenzie King, and also because, in those days, he severely criticized the then minister of national defence, Mr. Ralston. If Senator Pouliot had been willing to accept the Liberal party's discipline, he would have been appointed to a cabinet post long before that, for he was a very brilliant member, and this I admit, despite the fact that he was a Liberal member. For instance, when it was necessary to take a stand on the 1942 plebiscite, Senator Pouliot was one of those who crossed over to the other side of the House of Commons to protest against the fact that the Liberal government of the time was betraying the province of Quebec. This is all to his credit and we commend him for it. That is why I say that he was not appointed strictly as a Liberal member nor as a very influential member of the Liberal party.

On the other hand, others were appointed to the Senate after being defeated in an election and who were and still are active political organizers. Under the rules of the house, we have no right to attack a senator, but I know that in the case of Senators Bourget and Flynn, who were defeated in their ridings and appointed to the Senate soon after, those appointments were solely and strictly political and reflect no credit on democracy. When the electorate turns down somebody, why should the government go counter to the popular will, so clearly expressed?

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house, take exception to some of the Senate's activities and we object to bills coming from this august house called the Canadian Senate.

Mr. Speaker, there are four bills on today's order paper, on page 21, that is Bills S-32, S-6, S-13 and S-27 designated as follows:

1. Bill S-32, an act to incorporate World Mortgage Corporation.
2. Bill S-6, an act to incorporate Bank of Western Canada.
3. Bill S-13, an act to incorporate Laurentide Bank of Canada.
4. Bill S-27, an act respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

We object to the passing of these bills and we have reasons for it. We are not blackmailing the Senate, but there is now before the Senate an application for another bank, the bank of British Columbia; it has been there for months, but the Senate does not pass this bill nor send it to this house.

We think that this is a flagrant piece of injustice as far as the Laurentide bank of Canada or the bank of western Canada are concerned because this bank has rights and is entitled to request this charter.

Mr. Lachance: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have found most interesting the speech made by the hon. member for Villeneuve on the bill he introduced today, but I do not believe that we should discuss, at this stage, various bills concerning banks or any other bill but the one before us at present.

I think the members might like to say a few words on this most interesting bill, and I do not believe we are ready to discuss all those other bills this evening.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I duly note the remarks of the hon. member who has just interrupted me. On the other hand, I should like to tell him that we are not discussing Bills Nos. S-32, S-6, S-13 and S-27.

I am talking about the Senate whose members must be of the full age of 30 years and be Canadian citizens, resident in the province for which they are appointed. I am also referring to the role the Senate can play when its members possess those qualifications. In fact, I hope that some day the hon. member attains those qualifications, not as a politician, but as a Canadian, in order to reach what is called the heaven of Canadian politics.

Mr. Speaker, we object to those bills because we believe that it is unfair to delay the passage in the house of certain bills or certain requests, while the same privilege is granted to other measures. That is the only reason. This is no blackmail, and we do not want to practise blackmail; however, we would like that the most elementary justice be meted to everyone.

And I am wondering why the upper house objects to sending here, in the House of Commons, the bill that has been submitted by the province of British Columbia.

[Text]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Basford: Is the hon. member aware that at the third last meeting of the committee on banking and commerce of the other place, on the bill to which he is referring, the attorney general of British Columbia asked that the committee not proceed with the bill at that time and that they adjourn their hearings?

Mr. Caouette: I am aware of that but my hon. friend's statement is not right. He knows very well that the attorney general of British Columbia never asked that that bill be deferred to a later date. He wanted the bill to be accepted and passed right away, but somebody else objected to the passing of the bill on that occasion.

Mr. Basford: Then on a question of privilege—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I should point out to the house that the bill before the house at the moment deals with the representation of the provinces in the Senate, and the qualifications of senators. I am just trying to bring the house to order before the discussion goes too far afield. I would point out to the house that this does not give hon. members leeway to discuss the operations of the other chamber, and I would ask them to stay within the confines of the bill now before the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I shall follow your suggestion with pleasure, and point out that the principle of the bill, as I have just mentioned, does not change anything much in the B.N.A. Act or acts. I simply suggest that the situation with regard to the appointment of senators be up-dated, in the provinces and throughout Canada.

Such clauses as have no longer any value must be deleted. In short, what does the bill mean? That the qualifications of a senator shall be as follows:

1. He shall be of the full age of 30 years.

2. He shall be a Canadian citizen, without a long string of qualifications or epithets after his name, and no matter where he comes from.

3. He shall be resident in the province for which he is appointed.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that hon. members, regardless of party affiliation, will not object to these three qualifications of a senator. We will thus have amended the B.N.A. Act or acts, in accordance with the spirit of 1964 and not of 1867.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of interest that I read the bill introduced by the hon. member who just returned to his seat. I also listened to his comments with no less interest. In my opinion, there are provisions in the proposed measure which deserve serious consideration. But I do not feel that, were they to be accepted, the amendments brought forward would entail any real change. What is being asked for, at the present time, is a major and substantial reform of the Senate.

Mr. Grégoire: Its abolition.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, as for its abolition, if the hon. member will bear with me, I shall deal with the matter later on. I agree with those who say that our constitution contains provisions which are obsolete and archaic. That is why, throughout the country, we hear about a reform in depth, if not a brand new constitution.

Last July I introduced a bill for the sole purpose of removing the obsolete provisions which are still in our constitution, that is clauses 55, 56 and 57, which provide that bills may be reserved to be given royal assent by the Queen of England personally; that has not been done for a great number of years now and dominion conferences had indeed suggested they should be dropped, since they serve no practical purpose.

I will now argue from analogy to deal with the provisions of the bill under consideration. In fact, the provisions which the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) would like to see removed are surely antiquated, as can be seen from the following subsection:

> In the case of Quebec each of the 24 senators representing that province shall be appointed for one of the 24 electoral divisions of Lower Canada specified in schedule A to chapter 1 of the consolidated Statutes of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I will now deal with that provision for a moment. We must of course define territorial constituencies if we want to appoint senators to represent those constituencies.

If, in the eastern townships for instance, senators were appointed to represent constituencies of that area I would not object, especially since, in the explanatory notes of the bill introduced by the hon. member, we find this:

> However, as the eastern townships are now predominantly French Canadian—

Mr. Speaker, since the population of the eastern townships is now mostly French Canadian, I see no objection to the appointment of senators from that area, because they would represent the French Canadian nation in the Canadian Senate. That is why I fail to see the point of lingering over the study of the proposed amendments.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, would the member permit a question?

Mr. Choquette: With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member aware of the fact that the act provides for 24 electoral divisions or senatorial districts in the province of Quebec and that it is the only place in Canada where those divisions exist? A similar situation cannot be found elsewhere. When such provisions were enacted for the province of Quebec, they were intended to protect or to help the English minorities which were then living in the eastern townships of the province of Quebec. Since a similar situation cannot be found in any other province of Canada, we ask that the qualifications of a senator in our province be exactly the same as in all other provinces.

Mr. Choquette: This seems to be correct, Mr. Speaker, and, for all practical purposes, those who are called upon to represent the senatorial constituencies, whether their limits be marked or not, their number remains the same.

If the hon. member's purpose is to standardize the legislation in this field, I believe such purpose deserves consideration.

But, if I am not overly enthusiastic because the proposed amendments will not involve major consequences, this is because I would personally suggest—and I would not want to hurt the beliefs and the feelings of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Pepin), who has perhaps not a particularly high opinion of this reality that the Senate represents—that the Senate should be precisely the image of the Canadian reality and institution designed to protect and promote the bicultural and bilingual character of Canada.

Mr. Grégoire: This is utopia.

Mr. Choquette: That place should precisely be the one where the binational character of our country should be asserted.

That is why I believe that should we reach such a reform, that is a thorough reform of the Senate, which appears to be a utopia, I would advocate a binational composition of the Senate, since the upper house exists precisely in order to protect minorities.

That clause which it is proposed to have repealed was aimed at protecting an English speaking minority living in a district of the province of Quebec.

Let us keep the spirit which existed in 1867, let us preserve the spirit which has prevailed and let us see to it that in the Senate reform which is proposed and which will be implemented some day—it must be ardently hoped —the bicultural character of our country is present in the Senate, since the Senate is designed to protect minorities.

A moment ago, the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) asked me if I was in favour of the abolition of the Senate. I am not in favour of abolition under the present circumstances, and I think that is the policy of those who sit on this side of the house. We seek to reform the Senate, not to do away with it.

If the abolition of the upper house is being considered nowadays, it is because the Senate is not performing adequately.

Mr. Grégoire: Quite true.

Mr. Choquette: In this day and age, Canada needs modern institutions. If public service is being increasingly sneered at, it is our duty to restore its dignity and to give it proper efficiency.

People are asking themselves whether the House of Commons and the Senate truly hold any power. If they have doubts about that, it is precisely because neither house has any real influence. We sometimes have the feeling that we are administered by a ghost government, and this has been going on for years, Mr. Speaker.

The best way to remove this unpleasant feeling would be to improve fully our institutions. If the Senate continues to languish as at present, if it continues to sleep, there is no doubt that a strong movement will advocate more efficiently than the hon. members opposite the abolishment of the Senate, and this is not advisable under the circumstances.

The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska has made his comments on the sad state of the Senate. His comments were quite interesting, Mr. Speaker, but he is pessimistic about the reform of the Senate.

His pessimism may be justified—

Mr. Grégoire: Yes.

Mr. Choquette: The only way to amend the constitution of the Senate is to include in a political platform, as one of its essential items, the reform of the Senate.

What is being proposed on the order paper? It is suggested to impose a compulsory retirement to the senators—nobody dares to go any further—but if such a reform can be effected, that would be fine.

This proposal has not yet been carried out, but it is merely suggested at present to set at 75 years the retirement age for senators.

Mr. Grégoire: That is too old.

Mr. Choquette: I feel that we should put forward more clearly and specifically to the voters the matter of the Senate reform, and any political party likely to come into power, and I automatically rule out our friends of the Ralliement Créditiste.

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Lotbinière is violating the most basic rights of democracy where the choice of governments should be left to the people and not solely to the hon. member for Lotbinière.

I shall ask him to withdraw and to be more democratic by putting an end to his dictatorial manner in the House of Commons.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I would not want to cause you any trouble with this point of order. I do not want to deprive the people of the right to wipe off the Ralliement Créditiste from the electoral map in the next election. I speak for the future wish—

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. A few moments ago you called me to order because I was getting away from the subject of Bill No. C-76.

At this time the hon. member for Lotbinière is trying to brag as regards the Ralliement Créditiste, which he will not bother at all in the province of Quebec; on the contrary, we will replace him in his constituency at the next election.

I would ask that you call him back to order so that he may confine himself to the subject of Bill No. C-76.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The point of order raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve I think is well taken. The hon. member for Lotbinière has strayed away from the subject matter of the bill now before us. Perhaps I should point out to him that there is no mention in this bill of the retirement of the members of the other house. All that is mentioned in Bill C-76 is the qualifications of members of the other house, and their representation of different provinces. Perhaps the hon. member will confine himself to the bill.

Mr. Choquette: I abide by your ruling, Mr. Speaker. In trying to be witty I got away from the principle of the bill. Please forgive me.

Besides, Mr. Speaker, I very well understand the feeling of my good friends opposite, because in referring to the cordial words of the hon. member for Villeneuve, I have the impression that if we go by the provisions of this bill and by the spirit of his remarks, it is not impossible that one day the hon. member for Villeneuve might be called to the Senate. I would not object, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Caouette: Order.

Mr. Choquette: He spoke a while ago—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The bill we are discussing right now makes no mention of the appointment of the hon. member for Villeneuve to the Senate but simply of the qualifications required to be appointed a senator.

You have already called to order several times the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette). He is again wandering from the principle of the bill and I believe you will have to call him to order. If he fails to comply, I suggest that you should order him to leave the house.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, the standing orders of the house are for everybody, for me and for any other member, and I shall willingly comply with your ruling. However, may I be allowed to state that obviously some Créditistes would like to gain admission to the Senate, since they are precisely proposing the removal of the basic qualification of $4,000 provided in that section—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order—

Mr. Choquette: —and it is clear that the reason why that party wants the removal of the property qualifications required to become a senator is that the members of their party aim at being appointed to the Senate—

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Why not send them both to the Senate?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, please. I am having some difficulty listening to two members at the same time.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Lotbinière, even though you called him to order, is departing from your ruling. I think that it would be your duty to call him to order again more strongly than the first time.

Mr. Choquette: These points of order, Mr. Speaker, have taken a lot of my time.

In any event, I want to say this: Clause 2 of the bill under consideration lists three qualifications which a senator must have in order to be appointed under the new provisions.

In our modern times, if we really wanted to democratize the Senate, why would we not have people under 30 years appointed, that is if we actually intended to rejuvenate the Senate? I ask this question without expressing any opinion on its merits.

If one wants to democratize and rejuvenate the Senate, it might be possible to delete that provision and amend it so that people under 30 years of age could be appointed.

He shall be a Canadian citizen. With that I agree. To be a Canadian citizen is important.

Mr. Grégoire: For Canadians.

Mr. Choquette: There is, in the citizenship act, and this should be pointed out to the hon. member for Villeneuve, a provision under which we are Canadian citizens and British subjects. Long live England. Long live the British people. I love them, I respect them, I admire them.

Today we have reached such a point of development and maturity that Canadian citizens, anyone of us from sea to sea, do not need to remain subject to another country, no matter how great, how noble or how powerful it may be. I say that honestly. I think that by Canadianizing all our institutions to the full, we are not offending the feelings of national unity which, I am sure, are shared by the majority of Canadian citizens.

Let us be truly and essentially Canadians everywhere, as regards facts and symbols.

Mr. Speaker, you saw how we respected the symbol of the British crown as represented by Her Majesty the Queen when she came to Canada. In the province of Quebec unfortunate incidents may have occurred, but such incidents were in no way a true reflection of the thinking in Quebec.

We respect the heads of state of all friendly countries. We particularly respect those of members of the commonwealth. But some day our constitutional evolution will be brought to completion, and to promote Canadianism is surely not to be against national unity. On the contrary, to see that this constitutional evolution reaches its ultimate goal shows a desire to do away with all ties of bondage or subjection to another country and thereby achieve true Canadianism. Such is the ideal of a young Canadian, and that is why I am happy about the new provision contained in my hon. friend's bill.

Let us be true Canadians, let us remain in the commonwealth with countries friendly to us, agreed. On the other hand, a minister is called honourable due to the fact that he is a member of the Canadian government but, in order to have the title of right honourable, a foreign government must confer it upon him, and this shows a certain subjection.

I say that it is in our interest to promote a Canadian ideal to the point where we shall no longer accept any sort of bondage.

One is not anti-British or anti-English because one hopes for such a thing. That is being pro Canadian. That is why I am happy about the provisions of Bill No. C-76. I am pro Canadian. I want us to fight for this ideal of Canadian unity and strength, which is the only dynamic means of discouraging any extremist movement at work in our country.

At times ideas like that may seem revolutionary to some people whose minds are receptive to such thoughts, but I feel that they do not reflect the true opinion of our young people who seek to assert themselves and who want the Senate to be truly Canadian. I am happy about that.

The Senate must be really Canadian; it must be reformed and it must protect our minorities. By transforming it into a binational institution, we will strengthen Canadian solidarity. I am not in favour of appointing senators according to their political affiliation. The hon. member for Villeneuve mentioned certain names and he was right. Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent wanted to appoint Rev. Georges Henri Lévesque to the Senate, but the bishops were against it. Nevertheless, I am in favour of having clergymen appointed to the Senate.

[Text]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house are prepared to commend the purpose of the bill, which is to remove certain anomalies relating to the appointment of senators. The explanatory notes accompanying Bill No. C-76 set forth that a system of 24 electoral divisions, together with a property qualification of $4,000 worth of real estate in the electoral district for which the senator is appointed, was established for the province of Quebec and was designed to protect the English Protestant minority located for the most part in the eastern townships.

Although in 1867 the English Protestant minority was in the majority in 12 of the counties mentioned in schedule 2 of the British North America Act, I believe that by 1900 they retained a majority in only four of the counties. In practice, over the last 60 years the provisions which the bill seeks to eliminate have not been followed. In the province of Quebec senators have tended to be appointed from the districts of Montreal and Quebec, with little regard to the original intention of section 22, which was to assure appointment from each of the 24 divisions mentioned in schedule A of chapter 1 of the consolidated statutes of Canada.

Although this act providing for the protection of English Protestant privileges in the province of Quebec has in fact passed into our folklore, there are certain other Quebec English Protestant positions which have remained inflexible and stagnant, to the disadvantage of all Quebeckers and Canada as a whole. I refer specifically to one of our better known organizations in the province of Quebec, the Quebec Protestant board of education. Every society has its sacred cows and the English Protestants of Quebec certainly have theirs. Foremost among them is the Protestant board of education and its French teaching division.

The Quebec education act provides that the lieutenant governor in council may appoint by proclamation a Roman Catholic central board of examiners and a Protestant central board of examiners for the examination of candidates of each of the two religious beliefs for teachers' diplomas. This means in effect that each of the teaching professions in the Roman Catholic and Protestant systems is restricted to people of that particular faith, with the result that in the province of Quebec people who are called upon to teach the French language in English Protestant schools are for the most part English speaking and are all Protestant.

This has resulted, Mr. Speaker, in what I believe is one of the saddest situations that we face today in the province of Quebec, which is found in the fact that a considerable percentage of our English speaking population in the province of Quebec is not able to converse in French. All of these people who have been raised in the province of Quebec have studied French from grade 3 for five days a week in most cases. Yet by the time they finish high school 90 per cent of them at least are unable to converse in the French language. I submit this is the fault of the Protestant board of education and their inability to adjust to changing circumstances, and to make progress in the face of what has become a closed shop so far as the teachers are concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; I hope the hon. member is going to indicate some relationship between his remarks and Bill No. C-76.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I will do this. The reason I have made these remarks is that the explanation the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) gave for his bill was related to the English Protestant minority in the province of Quebec. I do not believe my remarks are completely irrelevant when I refer to certain English Protestant positions. The explanatory notes to the bill indicate that one of its purposes is to remove this anachronistic Protestant privilege which seems to have been created by sections 22 and 23 of the British North America Act. I thought it was fitting that I should refer to certain English Protestant sacred cows.

I have one further point I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker, if you will bear with me for a moment. The Montreal Protestant school board recently was absolved, with no excuse, by a royal commission of the province of Quebec, of any ill doing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; I feel that I am unable to see the relationship between the remarks which the hon. gentleman is making and Bill No. C-76. It may be true that there is a very dim relationship here, but I would advise the hon. member to recall that the bill before us deals with representation in the Senate from the different provinces, and the qualifications of senators.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): We all agree that the Senate as a whole, and its framework, needs a complete re-examination. I feel the approach of the hon. member for Villeneuve is piecemeal. I am quite prepared to admit that perhaps his ideas are excellent and his objectives are excellent, but perhaps if we are going to consider the Senate we should consider not only these particular sections but all the sections of the British North America Act relative to the Senate.

Mr. Grégoire: Let us start with something.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I feel that these clauses 22 and 23, together with several other clauses of the British North America Act, were established because they reflected the demographic make-up of Canada in 1867. I think that today, when we are talking about changes in our constitution, changes in our approach to our national life, we should look clearly at the changes in our demography since 1867. We now have well over a million French Canadians living outside the province of Quebec, and yet our constitution is based on the demographic set-up of French Canadians living in the province of Quebec. I feel that this is something all Canadians are going to have to consider and to which they will have to pay a lot more attention in the future, especially in the months ahead when we are considering the report of the commission on biculturalism and bilingualism.

Earlier I saw fit to mention the English Protestant sacred cows in the province of Quebec because the hon. member for Villeneuve refers to the English Protestant position in his explanatory note. I just want to close by making one final point, that the Quebec royal commission's failure to criticize the Montreal Protestant school board—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): —is one of the most disgraceful whitewashes a royal commission has ever given the activities of that body.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; will the hon. gentleman resume his seat, please? I have asked the hon. gentleman to remain within the confines of the bill before us. I would hope he would continue to do so.

Mr. Watson (Châteauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): I thank you for your patience, Mr. Speaker, and I will conclude my remarks.

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the three or four minutes that remain I should like to express my appreciation to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) for bringing to the attention of the house some of the anachronisms that exist under our constitution. I think I can best do so by referring to the contribution a distinguished Haligonian has recently made to the literature of Canada on the subject of a new constitution for a great country. His name, by the way, is J. H. Ahearn, and he is writing on peace, order and good government. He says that it is time this battered hulk of the British North America Act and its amendments were replaced by a clear constitution made in Canada. In other words, the fundamentals should be sought out and propounded in a document accessible to all, including the youth of the nation; it should be a comprehensible document expressed in dignified and understandable language, so that the people will have a charter that they can know, understand and cherish.

I wish to thank the hon. member for Villeneuve for drawing attention to this anachronism in this legal work, in its application to our time and place. He has done a service to the house. I agree however with my colleague who has stated that this is but a very flimsy start. What we should do is address ourselves to an examination of what shall eventually be the reconfederation of Canada, to give Canadians a charter which is clear in its direction.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Lloyd: I say, Mr. Speaker, that if in doing so the qualifications of senators need to be examined, if by subtracting that out of the anachronisms, we leave a residue of inadequacies, then it may be necessary to set some further qualifications for representation in this body, this sort of slow-down body, and on what might be accomplished.

May I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I had hoped that the new government house leader would be present now, so that I could offer him a kindly welcome to a position that is so dangerous, that of government house leader. He is the third government house leader in a year and a half, which establishes some sort of a precedent. May I ask the acting house leader what is the forecast of business for next week?

Mr. MacNaught: On Monday we will continue with the discussion of interim supply, and should it be secured on Monday, we will take up redistribution.

Mr. Knowles: I realize that everything that needs to be said was said this morning, but I wonder if we could not arrange, those of us who are here, for the last entry in today's Hansard to be a round of applause for Mr. Montgomery?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHOQUETTE—REPORTED SPEECH BY MEMBER FOR PORT ARTHUR

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, as a result of a speech delivered in Toronto by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), in which he said that the province of Quebec was the greatest obstacle to a comprehensive vision and a common effort in federal politics. He said:

> The Quebec members of parliament tend to stand aloof from their colleagues speaking the other language and to consider their provincial capital as the real seat of power in Canada.

Such statements, Mr. Speaker, are unfair and unfortunate and cannot but deeply annoy the Quebec members in this house.

The main political concern of every Canadian citizen should be the greatness and prestige of Canada.

Quebec members are Canadians and are prompted by that national political ideal. Of course, they refuse to be assimilated because they are prompted by a true national ideal, which is based on their will to spread the influence of the French fact throughout Canada.

We categorically reject the statements made by the hon. member for Port Arthur and we declare that, contrary to the ideology preached by the Liberal federation of Quebec and its officers, the main political expression of French Canada is the Quebec members sitting in the House of Commons who wish to contribute to the greatness of their country, of which they are proud.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE TO HUNGARY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian wheat board announced in Winnipeg that it has negotiated a contract for the sale of approximately 100,000 long tons of wheat to Hungary. This sale, totalling about 3.7 million bushels, is for shipment during the period December through March, 1965, from Canadian east coast ports. This is the first sale made to Hungary under the provisions of the long term agreement signed on June 11, 1964, whereby Hungary had agreed to purchase 250,000 long tons of wheat during the three years of the agreement.

Payment for the wheat is to be made on the basis of ten per cent at time of shipment with the remaining balance to be paid in equal instalments, plus interest, at two, two and a half and three years respectively. These credit arrangements were authorized by the government of Canada under the provisions of the Export Credits Insurance Act. The buyer has the right to divert the wheat to any other eastern European socialist country.

TABLING OF PRESS RELEASE ON CONCLUSION OF CONFERENCE

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table French and English copies of a release which was handed out last Friday after the two-day conference on Indian affairs. This release outlines the general opinion of those who took part in this conference, as representatives of the parties concerned.

SPORTS

DESIGNATION OF LACROSSE AS CANADA'S NATIONAL GAME

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-134, respecting the national game of Canada (lacrosse).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Speaker, if I read the preamble to the bill and the explanatory notes, both of which are very brief, I think this will explain the purpose of the bill. The preamble reads:

Questions

Whereas lacrosse has been played in Canada from time immemorial; whereas it has long been assumed that lacrosse is the national game of Canada; and whereas there is an attempt to have a lesser game adopted as the national game of Canada—

The explanatory notes read:

Lacrosse has been played in Canada for an unknown period of time, having been played by the original native Indian people. It is uniquely Canadian and was not imported to this country as all other games have been.

The purpose of this bill is to rectify what was probably an oversight on the part of the Fathers of Confederation who were so preoccupied with drafting sections 91 and 92 of the B.N.A. Act that the question of declaring a national game escaped their attention.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for New Westminster has seconded this bill not simply because he is my seatmate, but he represents the home city of the Salmonbellies, which team has won the Canadian senior lacrosse championship more times than any other team.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PROGRESS REPORT ON P.E.I. CAUSEWAY

Question No. 1,916—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. In the light of the public statement recently made by Mr. A. D. Margison and Associates Ltd. in reference to the building of the Prince Edward Island causeway, when does the government of Canada intend to issue a progress report on the project?

2. Have any other private companies expressed an interest in undertaking the construction of the causeway and, if so, what has been the government's reply?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): 1. The government of Canada is considering a progress report on the Northumberland strait crossing project received from Northumberland Consultants Limited.

2. No other proposal has been received though an approach has been made from one company other than A. D. Margison and Associates Ltd.

P.E.I. CAUSEWAY—CONSTRUCTION WITH OR WITHOUT RAILS

Question No. 2,045—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Are any officials or agencies of the government of Canada making a study of the effects on freight movements to and from Prince Edward Island which might result from the construction of a causeway on which no railway tracks would be laid and, if so, when is such a study expected to be concluded?

2. What is now the estimated cost of constructing such a causeway between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick (a) without rails (b) with rails?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Yes, and expected to be concluded about January, 1965.

2. There is as yet no firm estimate.

FREIGHT CARS USING DETROIT AND TOLEDO SHORE LINE RAILWAY

Question No. 2,104—Mr. Marcoux:

1. Do Canadian National Railways freight cars to, or through, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati and Cleveland, Ohio, exclusively use the Detroit and Toledo Shore Line Railroad Company as far as, or from Detroit, Michigan, via the Grand Trunk Western Railroad and, if not, for what reason?

2. Do the freight cars of American companies destined for Toronto, Montreal, or Quebec city, from, or through, Toledo, Columbus, Cincinnati or Cleveland, Ohio, exclusively use the Detroit and Toledo Shore Line Railroad Company as far as, or from Detroit, Michigan, via the Grand Trunk Western Railroad and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. Canadian National cars moving to or through the points mentioned do not move exclusively via the Detroit and Toledo Shore Line Railroad. There are competitive routes to all of these locations and the routing of freight traffic is governed by the shipper and/or consignee. However, where traffic originating on Canadian National lines is not specifically routed and where there is no difference in rates, the railway applies routing via the Detroit and Toledo Shore Line.

2. The answer is the same as in No. 1 above, except where routing is not specified by the shipper or consignee, it may be applied by the railway on which the traffic originates.

CANADIAN STUDENTS VISITING CUBA

Question No. 2,117—Mr. Laprise:

2. When did they leave?

3. When are they expected back?

4. Who is paying for the travelling and stay of these students abroad?

[Translation]

Cuba. Canadian citizens are not required to inform the Department of External Affairs of their plans to visit that country or to supply to the department any personal particulars in connection with such plans.

2. The Cuban press reported the arrival in Cuba of the Canadian students on July 6, 1964.

3. Newspapers in both Cuba and Canada reported that they returned to Canada around the end of August, 1964.

4. Information published in Canada by the organizers of the tour indicated that the Cuban government would provide transportation and accommodation for the students.

Question No. 2,122—Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke):

1. Was official transportation made available to the provincial premiers on Tuesday, October 13, 1964, to take them to R.C.A.F. station, Uplands, to attend the departure of Her Majesty the Queen and, if not, for what reason?

2. Were one or more requests for official transportation made on behalf of the premiers and was this courtesy refused and, if so, for what reasons?

3. When the provincial premiers arrive in Ottawa to attend dominion-provincial conferences are they met by an official of the Department of Secretary of State to assure that all arrangements have been satisfactorily made for their convenience; on such occasions is official transportation made available to them at their place of arrival or is any official transportation provided for them during the course of the conferences; if not, for what reasons?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 of this question is no. It is not customary to provide official transportation for guests invited to departure ceremonies at R.C.A.F. station Uplands. In answer to part 2 of the question, no such requests were made. In answer to part 3 of the question, it has not been the practice to meet provincial premiers or to provide them with transportation upon their arrival in Ottawa to attend federal-provincial conferences. However, transportation is normally provided in connection with official functions during the conferences.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

Yes, and the Grand Trunk Western and the New York, Chicago and St. Louis Railroad Company are jointly and severally liable as guarantors of the principal, interest and sinking fund payments with respect to $2,708,000 first mortgage 3¼ per cent 30 year series "A" bonds due December 1, 1982.

Has the government received representations from the St. Catharines city council deploring the increase in P.S.I. insurance rates, and recommending the early implementation of a national medical health plan and, if so, what has been their reply?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The Prime Minister has been notified by the deputy city clerk of the city of St. Catharines of a resolution passed by the city council on this matter, and the city authorities have been advised that their representations have been noted.

7. Is the land zoning policy in national parks contemplated by the minister in his statement of September 18, 1964, the same as that announced by the former government in January, 1963 and, if not, what changes have been made?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. The telegram of July 10, 1964 from the president of the Banff advisory council asked me to review the proposed construction of the Bow View motor lodge after considering their reasons for opposing the development.

2. At a meeting I recently attended, the Banff advisory council suggested that the developers be offered another site in exchange. However, the Bow river site was designated in the Oberlander report for tourist accommodation.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

3. The Banff townsite interim development committee initially opposed the proposal for a motel development on the basis of land use.

4. Yes, by the closing of Bow avenue to vehicular traffic as recommended by the Oberlander report.

5. Such buffer zone has already been provided by virtue of a 100 foot reservation along the shore of the river for use by the public as contained in the national parks general regulations.

6. Yes. Decisions concerning future commercial development will be made if and when applications are received.

7. There are no available records which would indicate that an official statement concerning the land zoning policy in national parks was made by the former government in January, 1963. If such announcement was made at that time it was not made in the House of Commons.

USE OF RECREATION HALL, P.E.I. NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 2,169—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. During the season 1964, what use was made of the recreation hall at the Cavendish section of the Prince Edward Island national park?

2. What employees carried out their duties in this building?

3. Was a register of visitors to the building maintained and, if so, what was the total number of visitors for the season 1964?

4. Who held the post of director of recreation during the 1964 season?

5. What recreational programs were carried on under the direction of the park personnel at the beach in Cavendish?

6. In 1964, were representations received from groups or individuals requesting the use of the recreational hall for directed group programs?

7. What was the nature of the replies given to such representations?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. The recreational building was used as a park information bureau.

2. An information bureau attendant was the only employee of the park who utilized the recreation hall in 1964.

3. Yes, during the period of July and August the information bureau attendant served 1,494 visitor groups.

4. No such position was on the establishment of this park during the 1964 season.

5. The park naturalist undertook evening programs at the Cavendish campground three evenings each week and the lifeguards at Cavendish main beach and campground beach provided swimming instructions for those visitors who were interested.

6. Yes, requests were made on three occasions for the use of this building.

7. In one instance, a theatre group performing at the new centennial theatre in Charlottetown and accommodated in the area, utilized the building for rehearsal purposes in order to avoid transportation difficulties to Charlottetown. In the other two instances, the Cavendish Beach development association used the building to serve refreshments to the R.C.A.F. Summerside band and the R.C.A. band, following band concerts in the park. These requests were all made by telephone and they were granted in view of the fact that they were made by responsible groups for a specific use.

UNIFORM FOOD GRADING SYSTEM

Question No. 2,192—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to establishing a uniform food grading system throughout the country, such as Canada No. 1, No. 2, No. 3?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Yes. This matter is being studied to determine if it would be feasible and practicable to establish a uniform grading system. Uniform food grading is no doubt desirable, but the grades of many food products, which have been established for many years, are understood and recognized in international trading, thus they do not lend themselves readily to change.

STUDENT LOANS

Question No. 2,196—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. As of September 30, 1964, how many students in each province and territory have been granted Canada student loans?

2. In each province and territory, what was the total of loans granted as of September 30, 1964?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. This information is not yet available.

2. This information is not yet available.

* SITE FOR QUEEN ELIZABETH OBSERVATORY

Question No. 2,198—Mr. Basford:

Has a site been selected for construction of the Queen Elizabeth II observatory and, if so, what is the site?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard as to whether a site has been selected for construction of the Queen Elizabeth II observatory and, if so, what is the site, I should like to state that public announcement of the site was made on October 28, 1964. It will be located on Mount Kobau in the southern Okanagan valley in the province of British Columbia.

WIDENING OF TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY, WINNIPEG

Question No. 2,234—Mr. Enns:

1. Has the Minister of Transport been approached by Manitoba's minister of public works in connection with widening the trans-Canada highway to four lanes west from Winnipeg to the junction of No. 4 highway?

2. Is the unused Cabot line of the C.N.R. required for this project and will the Minister of Transport urge the board of transport commissioners to consider Manitoba's request to have the C.N.R.'s application to abandon this line, heard before the end of the year so that the said track can be lifted during the winter to allow an early start on the expressway next spring?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): 1. Yes, informally.

2. It has been indicated to the minister of public works of Manitoba that, if he makes a proposal in the name of the Manitoba government that the hearing on the abandonment of the Cabot line be proceeded with, the Minister of Transport would pass that request on to the board of transport commissioners with the suggestion that this particular application for abandonment be removed from the freeze.

For each department, for each of the past three years (a) how many closed competitions were held (b) how many of these competitions were subject to appeal (c) in how many competitions was an appeal sustained (d) in how many appeals was the final result the promotion of a different candidate than originally recommended?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

METHOD OF CONSULTATION RESPECTING CHANGES IN RELATIONSHIP

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in reference to the press announcement about Indian affairs. Will the minister indicate what procedure the government has in mind, and his department in particular, to assure that each Indian band, reserve and tribe in this country will have a right to vote on whether they want a change in their relationship with the federal government or its control over them, and when will the vote take place? In general, what is going to be done or what is envisaged to assure that the Indians will not be pushed around as chattels?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. Leader of the Opposition asked me this question which will allow me, after the federal-provincial conference which was held here Thursday and Friday last and which was quite successful, to give clarifying explanations concerning the consulting procedure which was agreed upon at that conference.

The first point upon which the participants to that conference agreed upon was the necessity of consulting the Indians concerning any program which might affect them in the future.

This consulting procedure will operate at two levels.

First, in every province of Canada there shall be held a conference to which all Indians will be invited so they can express their wishes and their suggestions on the very principle of extending provincial services to the Indians in every province. After this consultation and provided the Indians agree that such provincial services would be desirable, there shall be a second method consultation: the bands will be consulted. Every band in Canada or in every province will be consulted—that is, the councils of those bands will be consulted in order to ascertain if they wish to take advantage of a program to be established in a province, and every band which does not wish to take advantage of provincial services will be free to reject such services and, under those circumstances, the federal services will remain in force.

This double consultation will make the federal and provincial governments aware of the feelings and wishes of the Indian population concerning the provision of services by the provinces.

Third, it was decided at the conference to set up, in each province, a standing Indian affairs committee which will be consulted on any administrative question concerning the Indians. As can be seen, at the very first official meeting the federal government and the provinces have been able to agree on machinery which will ensure adequate consultations with the Indians in the future.

For the first time the Indians will feel that they will be the first to benefit from the steps taken by the government and that far from seeking to impose its decisions upon them, the latter wishes to approve steps which they themselves would consider advantageous.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has dealt at great length with the question of consultation. He stated that the band chief and the council of each band or reserve would be consulted. I want to ask him particularly whether there will be a vote held for each band as well as for each reserve, so the desires of the individual Indians will be ascertained?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, a vote will be taken by each band to determine whether its members wish to participate in any proposed program.

[Text]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What is the view of the Canadian government with respect to the proposal put forward at the weekend conference that Indian reserves be incorporated into various school districts in order that a land tax may be imposed upon them for school purposes?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, we have had a lengthy discussion on the problem of incorporation of Indian reserves in any province where there are schools. No decision was arrived at on the matter. These discussions will be re-opened with each province and, of course, the Indians will be consulted in this regard; however, no decision has been reached concerning new taxes on Indian reserves, although many views were expressed on that subject.

[Text]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say whether the government intends to seek parliamentary approval for any such changes as he contemplates, or does he consider that the governor in council now has the authority to deal with the matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we have to amend the existing legislation to conclude agreements with the provinces in connection with certain provincial services, because this is a situation which has been prevailing for a number of years in several provinces and no new principle is involved in this matter.

[Text]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the house how the permanent Indian advisory committees he mentioned are to be set up? Who is going to take the initiative to establish them?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, we shall take the initiative, in co-operation with the provinces, of establishing these provincial advisory councils which might prove very valuable for the federal government and any provincial government planning to extend these services to the Indians.

[Text]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In addition to these provincial consultative committees is the minister giving any thought to the setting up of a federal consultative committee with some idea of having a co-ordinated program? Second, will the minister specify what are the particular provincial services which he is going to suggest to these meetings might be made available to them?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, we shall discuss with each province in particular what services it would be advisable to extend to the Indians. These can vary and include social welfare, education, health services as well as community development.

There is no precise program for the country as a whole and it is only following negotiations with the provinces that we shall be in a position to establish the categories of services some provinces are ready to offer immediately to the Indians; the other services may be extended at a later date.

In reply to the question asked by the hon. member with regard to Indian committees, I must say that these provincial committees will be under a general Indian committee and there will be joint advisory committees within the provinces to complete the matter.

[Text]

Mr. Howard: My question is really a reiteration of the first supplementary I asked, which I think the minister did not fully understand or, if he did, did not answer. I asked what was the position of the Canadian government with respect to the proposal that Indian reservations or reserves be incorporated into the various school districts in order that they may be taxed for school purposes. What is the position of the government with respect to that proposal, which emanated at least from the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows as well as everybody else that Indian property on reserves is, under the act itself and under the powers granted by the B.N.A. Act, exempt of any possibility of taxation at the provincial level as well as at the municipal level. Therefore, I do not want to change this undeniable right of the Indians to enjoy tax exemptions on all property they own on their reserves.

On the other hand, we know that certain Indian property outside the reserve, is subject to certain provincial taxes, but the right to tax exemption on property within the reserve is something sacred, protected by the constitution itself.

[Text]

Mr. Howard: No, it isn't.

[Later:]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, for clarification purposes. Did I understand him to say that this vote that will be held on individual Indian reservations will be a vote of all the rank and file, and not just a vote of the band?

Mr. Pickersgill: What is the difference?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is the proper place to give the detailed technique of each Indian council for the consultation method.

However, the principle is established that it will be a consultation of each band, and the council and the members will decide the methods of those consultations. The essential thing is that the council and the band be consulted with relation to the extension of services.

[Text]

Mr. Hamilton: I still have not the clarification for which I asked, Mr. Speaker. When I mentioned bands, I assume there is a council of each band. Is the vote going to be held just among the band council, or is it the rank and file who are going to have a chance to vote?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I know that each band possesses a structure whereby they determine their own problems. I do not think this is the place or the time for the minister to determine the way this consultation will take place. The essential thing is that the band is consulted. It is up to the Indians to decide whether this consultation should take place by means of the council or whether the council should seek the advice of the members themselves, and to do so in a democratic way.

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Will the minister require a 95 to 98 per cent majority before accepting the decisions?

[Text]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DELAY IN APPROVAL OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. This might be a question for the order paper, but in view of the fact that winter works projects start today, and that several municipalities have yet to receive the required authorization to proceed with their plans, I would like to ask the minister to give us an answer tomorrow.

If there is delay, will the minister take the necessary steps to allow these municipal winter works to be undertaken this week, where they have been accepted by the provinces? Moreover, will the department's approval be retroactive and, is the number of projects that had been approved on November 1, 1964 the same as on November 1 of last year?

[Text]

PRESS RELEASES ON WINTER WORKS IN ENGLISH ONLY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Following complaints received by several weeklies of the province of Quebec to the effect that the press releases from the Department of Labour on winter works and other matters are received only in English, and after finding that those releases come to my office both in English and in French—for which I thank the minister—will the minister investigate in his department to determine why the newspapers of the province of Quebec receive those press releases only in English?

Moreover, will he correct that mistake?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to make inquiries.

REQUEST THAT PENDING LEGISLATION BE CONSIDERED BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Labour. Since further and numerous recommendations made over the week end indicate that the trucking industry is far from assured about Bill No. C-126, I wonder whether the minister has given further consideration to referring the legislation so the industry can make their representations before an all party committee of the house, rather than considering the bill in committee of the whole house? Has the minister given further consideration to this?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): We are giving no further consideration to this point, which I dealt with last week.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he would give consideration to the point raised by the hon. member for Regina City. The truckers in general want to be given an opportunity of placing their views—and they seem to be thoughtful views—before the members of the house. Would the minister in replying also say whether the wheat pools in western Canada have made representations as to the changes which they believe should be made in the legislation as presently formulated, to the end that their industry will not suffer in consequence?

Mr. MacEachen: Of course, Mr. Speaker, the industries which have been mentioned have already made representations and are continuing to make representations, and I am sure that each of us individually would be glad to hear their views with respect to this important bill. I have already given consideration to the question of sending the bill to a committee, but taking into account all the circumstances I did not feel that it was necessary. However, if this is a matter which requires further consideration I will be glad to give it such further consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN STUDENTS IN U.S. PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether government authorities have been informed of the action taken by 15 students from McGill University, in Montreal, who will go tomorrow to the state of Vermont in order to work for the democrat candidate, Mr. L. B. Johnson?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of this.

INDIA—POSSIBLE USE OF CANADIAN BUILT REACTOR TO PRODUCE NUCLEAR BOMB

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. There have been some recent statements in the press as to the possibility of India using the reactor, which was contributed by Canada through the Colombo plan, for the production of a nuclear bomb, perhaps in response to the explosion of a nuclear bomb by the Chinese communists. Can the minister tell the house whether there is anything in these reports?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for giving me notice of this question. My attention has been drawn to these press reports. As regards the policy of the Indian government in this matter, I think the record is clear. Prior to the Chinese explosion, and subsequently in the face of this event, the prime minister of India stated that India is maintaining its policy of not manufacturing atomic weapons. I regard this declaration as a positive contribution to world peace.

In so far as the Canada-India reactor is concerned, under an agreement concluded with India in April, 1956 and tabled in this house on May 9, 1956, the government of India gave an unconditional undertaking to use it for peaceful purposes only. The relevant article of the agreement reads as follows:

> The government of India will ensure that the reactor and any products resulting from its use will be employed for peaceful purposes only.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON MEETING OF PARTY LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to report on this morning's meeting with the various party leaders, and could he tell us of the proposals and the progress that have been made?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we had an interesting and I think useful exchange of views on the procedure that might be followed during the remainder of the autumn, as a result of which, Mr. Speaker, we agreed to meet again later in the week.

[Later:]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether there was a certain agreement made this morning, at the meeting of the leaders of the parties, that they could not disclose to their seatmates the results of the meeting?

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION TO INCLUDE COOPERAGE TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that local coopers or barrel makers in Nova Scotia have been threatened with the necessity of repaying unemployment insurance benefits received during periods of unemployment since 1959, will the minister take the necessary steps to classify the cooperage trade as insurable under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I will be glad to take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR EARLY CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government house leader. Pending the making of an arrangement among the party leaders regarding the question of the flag, may I ask the government house leader whether the commitment that the Canada pension plan is next in priority to interim supply still stands. Can he also say whether a decision has been made to give one day this week to the resolution preceding the Canada pension plan, so that we can get the bill?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe the commitment was as to the resolution stage of the pension plan, and it still stands exactly as made.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the terms in which that commitment was made, can the minister say whether we will have that one day this week?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that answer. The answer I gave when the question was asked originally made it clear, I think, that interim supply would have to take priority. The hon. member's remarks during the last part of the sitting that day contained an implication that the interim supply debate would terminate on a certain date in any event, and invited the government to take one day out of the interim supply discussion for the resolution stage of the pension plan. I said that the government would give that consideration; but I also made it clear that I did not necessarily accept the implication contained in the argument put forward. That is still the position; there has been no further decision taken on the matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PINE POINT RAILWAY—COMPLETION OF TRACK LAYING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Could the minister advise the house whether it is correct that the C.N.R. has completed the laying of track on the Great Slave lake railway from Peace River to Pine Point and Hay River, and that the date of completion is approximately 12 months ahead of schedule?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was good enough to give me notice, through my office, of this question. As this is the first time a railway has ever gone into the territory I do not think we should regard it as a local matter; therefore I am very happy to answer the question by saying that the management of the C.N.R. advise that at the present time it is anticipated that track laying will be completed about 12 months ahead of schedule. This has been possible, I am informed, because working conditions turned out to be exceptionally favourable. I am also very happy to be able to add that the work, by being expedited, will enable the mining company to bring in heavy equipment to open the mine.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. If this is the case, would the government give consideration to making use of the time and money, I hope, so saved—mainly by adopting the proper route for building the railroad—in building further extensions of the railway for northern development?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is in a bit of a hurry.

TRANSPORT

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—USE OF ICEBREAKERS TO CLEAR CHANNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer two questions that were put to me on Friday, which I took as notice. One was asked by the hon. member for Longueuil, as follows:

> Inasmuch as the breakwater now being built near Champlain bridge will not be completed before the next spring break-up, is the Minister of Transport considering the possibility of using icebreakers to keep the St. Lawrence river ice free this coming winter, so the islands where the world fair is to be located may be protected?

The best answer I am able to give to this technical question—the hon. member will appreciate that I am not an engineer—is that to avoid endangering the world fair works, especially because of the narrowing of the river downstream by the temporary cofferdams protecting the construction of the Boucherville tunnel and bridge, and to protect these cofferdams themselves, an extra icebreaker was assigned last year to flood prevention duties as required. No change in the amount or nature of icebreaker operations is required or contemplated for the coming winter.

I think that might also be regarded as a short answer to the question asked by my hon. friend from Halifax, but there were certain implications in my hon. friend's question which I think would make a long answer out of order, sir. Therefore I would ask my hon. friend from Halifax whether he would agree that we discuss this matter further when my estimates come up again.

Mr. Regan: It will be a pleasure.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON REPORTED PRESENCE IN CANADA OF U.S. NAZI LEADER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in response to a question by the hon. member for Skeena on Friday, October 30 the Prime Minister indicated that inquiries would be made concerning the alleged presence in Canada last week of George Lincoln Rockwell. These inquiries have been completed. It would be well to first explain that the television program involving this individual did not originate in Canada but rather was filmed in the United States some little time ago.

As to the possibility that Rockwell was in Vancouver for other purposes within the last week or so, a check has been made of all ports of entry in the vicinity and there is no indication of Rockwell having been allowed entry. I can assure the house that all immigration officers are fully aware of this man's personal particulars. Furthermore, a check was made at the Georgia hotel in Vancouver where Rockwell was alleged to have been staying, and there is no record of his having been registered there. Also, employees of the hotel were unable to identify Rockwell as a person whom they had seen in the hotel.

As a result of all these inquiries I am satisfied that it is highly unlikely that this man entered Canada as alleged.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it is the fact that Mr. Rockwell is barred from entry into Canada?

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

SUGGESTED HONOUR FOR LATE SUPERINTENDENT LARSEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister relating to the news last week that Superintendent Larsen of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had passed away in Vancouver. I should like to know whether the government would give consideration to honouring Superintendent Larsen by perhaps naming one of the coastguard ships or perhaps an Arctic location after him. I do not know whether that has been done in the past, but this man made a very great contribution to the geography of this country, and I think this question should be given consideration.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be very glad to give consideration to this interesting suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO EXPANSION OF MEDICAL TRAINING FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is now in a position to answer the question I asked him last Friday, which was:

> Do the government plan to contribute financially to the recently announced expansion of medical, dental and nursing training facilities in Ontario, and in particular will they consider contributing the 50 per cent recommended by the Hall commission report?

Mr. Speaker: Unless the Prime Minister wishes to answer, this is certainly a question for the order paper.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATE ON LOAN TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Regarding the investigation being conducted by the GATT committee—

Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance should also be asked whether he paid the electricity bill.

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, following the investigation conducted by the GATT committee about the necessity for Great Britain to charge an additional 15 per cent duty on imports, the Bank of Canada should not divulge to that committee the amount of the loan granted to Great Britain and the rate of interest charged?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): In reply to the first question, Mr. Speaker, I think if interim supply were passed in reasonable time we could see that the electricity bills are paid. Even if we cannot "see" they are, we would take steps to undertake that they are paid on time. With regard to the second question, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the two matters are quite unrelated.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Following the announcement to the effect that the Bank of Canada had granted a loan to Great Britain at a low rate of interest, did some Canadian provinces apply to the Bank of Canada for similar loans?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: I wish to correct the preamble to that question, Mr. Speaker. I said nothing about a small rate of interest. I said I was not prepared to disclose the rate of interest but that it approximated the market rates. The answer to my hon. friend's question is no.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1965.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Chairman, at five o'clock on Friday I was briefly pointing out to the committee the undesirable situation in which the Yukon and Northwest Territories find themselves at present by not having full representation in parliament. I had made the point that although for the first time since 1962 the Canadian northland had members of parliament, the situation had not yet been corrected in terms of representation in the other place. I had made the point that at the present time there are in excess of 40,000 Canadian citizens living north of the 60th parallel, yet neither the Yukon nor the Northwest Territories had been allowed representation in the other place. I believe I made the point that even though there may be historical reasons, a province such as Prince Edward Island with a population of 107,000 had four senatorial representatives in parliament. It seems to me that the political development of our northern areas warrants this move.

One need only think back to last year, when we had legislation in this chamber intended to divide the Northwest Territories into two separate parts. Presumably that was going to be a step in the political evolution of that area. As another example of just how unsure of itself this government is, I point out that that proposed legislation was sent to a committee, and we have heard nothing about it since. Nor has the government reintroduced that measure.

Mr. Chairman, I mention these facts because I intend to give notice that at the time the formula for repatriating the constitution is brought before the house I will expect the government to have some sort of plan ready along the lines I have mentioned. It seems to me this would be the logical course of development, not only in terms of the political evolution of the Northwest Territories but also to ensure that all Canada is fully represented in parliament. This can only be done if the Yukon and Northwest Territories are allowed representation in the other place.

I do not know what answer the government can give at the present time for overlooking this matter during the last 18 months, nor am I particularly interested in that answer. I hope all hon. members of this house will support me when I say that in a few months' time it will be completely unacceptable to us as Canadians to have the government bring in a formula for amending the constitution without first having taken the steps necessary to give the Yukon and Northwest Territories full representation in parliament.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a constitutional lawyer, but I did listen very carefully to the debate on Friday, and it seems to me that at the present time the federal government has the authority to create a province or provinces in the Canadian northland. If the proposed formula is adopted then it will require two thirds of the provinces, including either Quebec or Ontario, before the federal authority can create a new province. Speaking as the member for the Northwest Territories I can assure this committee that for several reasons the implications of such a formula are frightening. They are frightening because the present federal government has never shown any interest in the north country. Certainly that has caused a great deal of distrust and will remain the source of distrust as long as the present Minister of Finance holds that portfolio. One need only think back a few years, when that individual headed a royal commission on Canadian economic prospects, and stated in effect that if people living in the maritimes could not make a go of it they should move to Toronto. In other words his solution to the problems facing people who live in depressed areas is for those people to move out. He certainly wrote off that 60 per cent of Canada which lies north of the 55th parallel, as having any real future as far as our economy is concerned.

If the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territory are to be dependent upon the whim of one province, let us say Quebec, for example, before they are allowed full economic and political status, they will find themselves in an impossible position. If one thinks back a few months he will realize that the present government made great political capital everywhere in the southern part of this country by accusing the previous administration of throwing away thousands of dollars in the northland. There is no doubt in my mind that the Liberal government won hundreds of thousands of votes in the southern area of Canada by writing off the Yukon and Northwest Territories. That is a frightening situation. My colleague the hon. member for Yukon is unavoidably absent today, but I can assure this committee that he also is alarmed by this situation.

In the last two days we have seen examples of what can happen to us if we become dependent upon the good graces of the other provinces in Canada. For example, one can easily imagine the difficulties we might encounter if we had to obtain the approval of the province of Quebec before provinces could be created out of either the Yukon or Northwest Territories; and that would be the situation should the suggested formula be adopted. You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that the province of Quebec has expressed a great deal of interest in the offshore islands which lie immediately adjacent to the coast of that province. One can easily envisage the sort of blackmail position in which we could find ourselves in the Northwest Territories if we were seeking full political status as a province, having to obtain concurrence of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I am not discussing the merits of the suggestion that the offshore islands should belong to Quebec.

The Chairman: Order, please. Perhaps I will be allowed to bring to the attention of hon. members that there are many conversations being carried on in this chamber, and that it is very difficult to follow the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Rhéaume: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. For the benefit of those who did not hear what I said because of a preoccupation with a little caucus across the way, I suggested that the offshore islands off the coast of Quebec, which at the present time are considered a part of the Northwest Territories, might well for administrative purposes, or for all purposes, belong to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Rhéaume: Indeed, I personally support such a suggestion, because I think it would make geographic sense. As hon. members may realize, the problem exists because when the boundaries of the Northwest Territories were being determined they were not determined in terms of co-ordinates or metes and bounds, but in terms of high water marks. When one considers the straits which separate Baffin land from Quebec and realizes that at times and in places the tide there is in excess of 60 feet, he can see what happens when the tide goes out. All the land that is exposed belongs to the Northwest Territories. This is an illogical situation and should be corrected. I know my hon. friend from Lapointe has pressed for this before, but I am merely using this as an example of the sort of problem that would occur should it be necessary for the federal government to obtain the consent of two thirds of the provinces, including either Quebec or Ontario, in order to create a new province in the northland.

There is one other current problem worthy of mention in this context. Only a few weeks ago the premier of British Columbia expressed a new found interest in annexing the Yukon territory and part of Mackenzie territory. That was not a laughing matter, or considered as a joke. Nor was it a display of the bad manners of the newly rich by Mr. Bennett.

It was not just an attempt on his part to become prime minister by buying up Canada even though we know he already has $100 million worth of Quebec in his pocket. It was a serious move on his part to take over a large section of Canada. He too recognizes the policy and planning vacuum that has existed in the Northwest Territories since the change of government. He knows that nothing new has been initiated by the Liberal government in the last two years. He knows that the people of the Yukon and Mackenzie districts are discontented because of the neglect they have experienced once again at the hands of a Liberal government.

If the premier of British Columbia had said two years ago that he wanted to take over the Yukon and part of the Northwest Territories he would have been laughed at throughout the country, and to the people who live in the territories it would have been unthinkable. However, today in both the Yukon and the Mackenzie districts there are people who are seriously pondering the offer made by Premier Bennett. They are doing so because they have come to the conclusion that the present federal government has no interest in developing the area and has not retained the impetus initiated by the previous administration, and therefore they had better give serious consideration to the offer made by the premier of British Columbia.

The people who live in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories do not intend to be pawns in federal-provincial conferences in the future. Why should our status from the point of view of being provinces be dependent upon the acquisitiveness of various provincial premiers who recognize that in Ottawa at the present time there is a weak federal leader and that this is an appropriate time for them to swoop in because they know that all their demands will be met? We in the territories are most alarmed over the policy followed by the present government of yielding to whatever pressures are exerted. We are alarmed because we are totally dependant on the federal authority for the time being, and if at the bargaining table the only thing the federal government is going to consider is political strength you can imagine how we in the north feel with only one lonesome member from the Yukon and another from the Northwest Territories. Only two federal seats are at stake, and if the government intends to follow a policy of responding only to political pressure related to the distribution of seats you can imagine our alarm and concern with regard to the situation.

The Chairman: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member to bring to his attention that his time has expired, unless he has the committee's permission to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Winkler: Who said no?

The Chairman: Order, please. Shall the resolution carry? The hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, it is always instructive to listen to hon. members across the floor, who as long as they are speaking think the house should pay the closest attention to their words, but when members in other parts of the house dare to get up to speak there is the clucking of hens—

Mr. Winkler: The quacking of ducks.

Mr. Lambert: —or there are shouts of "filibuster" or what have you. It seems that, as in the past, divine right is again vested in the Liberal party, and they believe they are the only people with any knowledge or intelligence. They seem to subscribe to the doctrine of infallibility. I do not know whether that would apply to them in all respects, but certainly in matters political they believe they are infallible.

The subject we are discussing this afternoon and which was discussed on Friday is one that was raised by members on this side at the first opportunity because of certain events that occurred in mid October. I make no apology at all for participating in the debate on the question of the amendment of the constitution. I make no pretence whatsoever of being a constitutional expert, but in the light of the comments that are being made with greater and greater frequency throughout the country I must say it is incumbent upon us to raise questions about these highly important events which took place in mid October.

We all know that Her Majesty was here prior to the 15th of October, and that on that particular day a communiqué was issued by the federal government and the provincial premiers dealing with the matter of the amendment and patriation of the constitution. Stripped of its aura of self satisfaction the communiqué was more than ever unenlightening. Therefore we must ask questions in regard to this matter.

There was an attempt the other day by the Minister of Transport to say that we were wrong in raising these questions. He said that the hon. member for Bow River, the hon. member for Peace River and the hon. member for Queens were wrong in posing questions about this matter because the formula, he claimed, was the self-same formula as in 1961, with no changes. This I question. I have very great reservations with regard to the equality of positions as between 1961 and now. Even if there is a similarity with 1961 in certain respects, and there is, it must be remembered that the proposals were made within a conference and that while certain details of the negotiations did get out, no document was deposited in the house to indicate any agreement. Actually we are being presented with a fait accompli.

In that regard I would refer to a story under the byline of Anthony Westell which appeared in the Globe and Mail of October 22. I disagree entirely with Mr. Westell's conclusion in his last paragraph. He is expressing his opinion and I disagree with it, but I will say he is factually correct when he says that within the last two years there has arisen what might be called a form of superparliament, if one can really use the word "parliament" with regard to dominion-provincial conferences. A fourth level of government has crept into the picture, because there have been any number of dominion-provincial conferences at which major agreements were made which were then presented to the house as something already binding upon the house because the government was bound.

We have yet to discuss the implications, in regard to the pension plan, of the step taken last April. It was a very quiet, under the table, cloak and dagger sort of proposition. Ministers at Quebec were going in the back door while other ministers were going out the front door, neither knowing that the others were present. Provinces were not being consulted beforehand and were being presented with agreements to such an extent that Premier Robarts has now said we must bring a halt to this type of procedure.

In so far as this parliament is concerned, we are now being presented with an agreement, and gracious only knows what would be the implications if this parliament were not to accept this agreement between the federal government and the provinces or were to amend it in some major particular. I must say that I believe it is all right to consult on matters of this kind, but the hands of this parliament must not be bound. I think it is high time hon. members raised this question. Quoting one paragraph from the article by Mr. Westell:

> Federal-provincial conferences are becoming the real seats of power—the places at which national policies are set in private to guide 11 governments. But there is no legislature or equivalent authority and prestige to check and balance this exercise of executive power.

Then there is this paragraph with which I disagree entirely:

> There may have been a time when the federal parliament could have filled this role. But not the present parliament, which is low in public esteem and in which most members seem to have little concept of their changed position.

I disagree with that because I think hon. members, at least in the opposition, are exercised as I know other hon. members like the hon. member for Greenwood are exercised. I am sure there are many hon. members on the government side, if we hear correctly about some of their discussions in caucus, who are also very concerned about this. Now that this agreement of October 15 will be coming before us, it is fundamentally important that we must raise questions which cannot be discussed and analysed on short notice. We need the advice of constitutional experts who will examine all the implications of this proposed agreement. In due course—I do not know when the Prime Minister stated this proposal would come before us for discussion—we must be fully prepared to analyse the problem.

In his remarks on Friday afternoon the hon. member for Bow River—I have not got the page of Hansard immediately before me —made some reference to Canada being the first nation in the whole British commonwealth to enjoy full religious liberty. I was astounded to see that usual symbol in Hansard, "Some hon. members, oh, oh.", being an indication that a number of members did not believe him. Obviously this exclamation came from across the floor.

I would point out to hon. gentlemen, and this is a very brief run through of history, that if we look back to pre-1763, the inhabitants of Canada, whether they were Roman Catholic or Huguenot, enjoyed the same rights of freedom of worship and security of properties. With the treaty of Paris in 1763 these same rights were guaranteed to Roman Catholics. They were confirmed by the Quebec Act in 1791, and they were extended to the new province of Upper Canada with the act of union just a few years later.

In the year following, with the passage of the Roman Catholic emancipation bill, all disabilities for Roman Catholics were removed in the remaining portions of Canada, that is the maritime provinces. This is a recognized fact that is all too frequently forgotten. Under the aegis of Westminster we have enjoyed in this country full religious liberty without the disabilities that applied for so many years even in Britain. I hope, therefore, that hon. members will correct their estimation of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bow River in the early part of his speech on Friday afternoon.

Let us look at the proposed amendment to the constitution. Briefly, if we look at the categories under the formula we find there is, first of all, the 100 per cent consent of the provinces for the federal parliament to amend provisions of the constitution relating to (a) the powers of the legislature of a province to make laws; (b) the rights or privileges guaranteed or secured by the constitution of Canada to the legislature or government of a province; (c) the assets or properties of a province; (d) the use of the English or French language and, further, the senatorial floor or representation of a province in the House of Commons. Almost in the same category is the right of a province to deal with education, except that Newfoundland is in a class by itself. This province cannot have anything to say about education generally, and no other provinces can have anything to say about education in the province of Newfoundland. This is a result of the confederation act of 1949.

There is another category in which the amendment would affect one or more but not all the provinces, and in this case only those affected would have to give their consent. Almost all the remaining amendments must be concurred in by legislatures of at least two thirds of the provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population of Canada according to the latest general census. We know that there are entrenched areas and that they are of long standing. It is agreed also that if you have amendments that affect only certain provinces, then those provinces should consent. This has been accepted. What I am concerned about is this two thirds of the provinces representing 50 per cent of the population.

It was indicated the other day that this was not the essence of the formula of 1961. In 1961 there was no proposal to do away with section 91(1) which had been passed in 1949. Yet if we examine the proposal I put it to hon. members that it goes much further, because the first numbered paragraph of the proposed constitution of Canada amendment act reads as follows:

> Subject to this part, the parliament of Canada may make laws repealing, amending or re-enacting any provision of the constitution of Canada.

In other words that is the paragraph granting the maximum of power. Then all the exceptions follow, and they are legion. Under paragraph 2 we have seen that the four points, the entrenched clauses, are included in section 2, and section 3 deals with the case of "less than all of the provinces," and with the case where the affected provinces must all give their consent. Section 4 deals with education, but section 5 says this:

> No law made under the authority of this part,

The language is clear and unequivocal.

> —affecting any provision of the constitution of Canada not coming within sections 2, 3 or 4—

Which I have already dealt with.

> —of this act shall come into force unless it is concurred in by the legislatures of at least two thirds of the provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population of Canada according to the latest general census.

In other words no amendments, unless covered by those categories enunciated in sections 2, 3 and 4, may come into force unless there is the concurrence of at least two thirds of the provinces in number representing 50 per cent of the population.

Then paragraph 6 says:

Notwithstanding anything in the constitution of Canada the parliament of Canada may exclusively make laws from time to time amending the constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada and the Senate and the House of Commons—

In case anyone has any illusions as to how much this means, he has only to turn to the British North America Act where it will be found that the executive government of Canada is covered by sections 9 to 16 of that act, and even there some seven—no, eight—limitations have been introduced to this exclusive right of jurisdiction, and they are in part those that were included previously in section 91(1).

I suppose this is the quid pro quo, but frankly we in the parliament of Canada under these proposals are ceding to the provinces far more extensive rights than they previously had. As I pointed out the other night in the debate on the redistribution bill this house had a right to determine its composition, but now we will have to seek the approval of the provinces if we are to change the proportionate representation of any province in this house. In other words, if it were necessary to cushion the effects of redistribution in any particular province, or if it were necessary to grant a province more seats than it would be entitled to under the application of the mathematical formula contained in section 51 of the B.N.A. Act, we would have to obtain the consent of two thirds of the provinces to do this.

If this is to be the case, then I can assure hon. members there will be a great deal of jockeying and horse trading at any dominion-provincial conference at which the question of the representation of a province in the House of Commons comes up for discussion and settlement. In many ways this may make mockery of the principles of redistribution if one is to follow the logic and principle of the act which is now before us.

Next we come to the delegation of legislative authority under the proposed section, 94(A). One would have thought there would have been a free exchange in this regard, but this is not the case; because the federal government will be able to legislate in four sectors of provincial jurisdiction, those covered in subsections 6, 10, 13 and 16 of section 92; subsection 6 covering the establishment and maintenance of public and reformatory prisons in and for the provinces, subsection 10 having to do with local works and undertakings, subsection 13 with property and civil rights, and subsection 16 with generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in a province.

This right of the federal government to legislate in provincial sectors will come about only if the government of Canada has consulted with all provinces——and the enactment of the statute is of concern to fewer than four of the provinces and the provinces so declared by the parliament of Canada to be concerned have under the authority of their legislatures consented to the enactment of such a statute.

In addition to that, in other cases we must have the consent of at least four of the provinces to the operation of such a statute. Then we get the reverse side of the coin, and the provinces will now be able to legislate—

—in relation to any matter coming within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

However, there is a provision that:

Prior to the enactment thereof the parliament of Canada has consented to the enactment of such a statute by the legislature of that province, and

A similar statute has under the authority of subsection (3) of this section been enacted by the legislatures of at least three other provinces.

In other words the consent of four provinces and of the federal government will entitle those four provinces to legislate in a federal field. As has been questioned by certain editorial writers, what stand would the federal government take if, say, the four most populous and wealthiest provinces decided they wanted to invade the fields of trade and commerce or customs or immigration? We have had attempts by some of the provinces in the past to do this. But if Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and Alberta decided among themselves that they would make a certain demand on the federal government and wished to enter into the field of immigration, for example, how could the federal government resist this pressure? Up to the present time it has been clear that any such attempt could be resisted either across a bargaining table or in the courts, in that it is unconstitutional; but if these amendments go through, this argument goes by the board. Only then could the political strength of the federal government withstand such concerted pressure from four provinces.

I am pointing this out as one of the prices that we may be asked to pay. This house is going to be asked to accept this constitutional amendment; the people of Canada are going to be asked to accept it. But what is the price? Is the achievement to be merely the one that no longer will we have to go to Westminster to amend our constitution; that we can take pride in the fact that we are now grown up and can amend our constitution by ourselves? After all, there has never been any opposition from Westminster. That would certainly be a step in constitutional evolution; but what is the price we are going to be asked to pay for it? These are the questions I want to ask. It is too bad that the Minister of Justice is not here, and I trust he will note these questions. What price has been exacted by the provinces in order to get their unanimous consent? Why did the provinces of Saskatchewan and Quebec withdraw their previous objections? After all, these sessions were in camera and we do not know what bargaining went on. Have any of the provinces indicated already that they would like to proceed under section 94A; that they want to get into certain fields? Do they want to get into banking? After all, Alberta has taken certain steps in that regard. It may be that British Columbia will want to do so. Every one of the provinces, I think, may have some reason for wanting to come into the federal field. We would like to know the answers to these questions.

There is another point I would like to make in this regard. Not all the provinces will view these changes with equanimity. We know some of the provinces want to have as much power as they can get, or want more power for themselves, and that they would reduce the authority of the central government to a few limited spheres. Shall we say these are the extreme provincial rights people. On the other hand there are those who would have the government of Canada much stronger in order to give them opportunities for balancing out the economy. I think it is fair to say that probably the maritime provinces do not want to see a greatly weakened federal government. In any event, Mr. Chairman, may I conclude my remarks this afternoon with this quotation from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Star of October 20:

> It may be nothing short of a national disaster if parliament rubber-stamps the agreement reached last week between the federal and provincial premiers regarding the amendment of Canada's constitution.

Then further on the editorial says:

> The agreement as it stands, in fact, represents a triumph for the extreme "provincial rights" faction which wishes to exalt the role of the provinces and reduce that of the federal government to a minimum. It could be a milestone in the breakup of confederation.

I cite this editorial as an example of the division of opinion that exists on this question. There are other citations I could put before the committee. I have a goodly number of them. I have some from the Winnipeg Free Press. These two newspapers are not unfriendly to the present administration. That is why I believe we must ask these questions. Therefore I agree with this editorial when it says:

> For this reason, it is essential that this agreement should not be hastily approved by parliament as so many dominion-provincial agreements have been. It needs to be given a very close, careful and critical examination by a qualified committee of the House of Commons, which should invite testimony by constitutional and other experts.

It is merely because this matter is so important that I make this plea that we get as much information as possible and that a very careful study be made of the agreement when it comes up for ultimate decision.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, it is not often in the house that we are considering an action of the government which offers an appropriate stepping-stone for us all to take a look at the general trend of government action over the last while, to see whether there is any pattern emerging out of government action, to note the behaviour of the government and the provinces, what its present effect is on Canada and whether it gives any indication as to where similar action is likely to lead us in the future.

I certainly think that when the government has announced that it has reached an agreement with the provinces on a method of amending the constitution, all of us who take seriously our responsibilities as members of the Canadian House of Commons should discuss this question in a very broad terms and try the best we can to see whether there is any trend as to where we are going, with the piecemeal legislation that now and then comes up. I am sure we are all aware that now and then the government takes a step, or a measure is passed, which seems to nibble away at a freedom, which seems to limit the economic activity of certain people; and many times we shrug it off and say, "Well, it is necessary for the greatest good at this time that some slight inconvenience be experienced". But such nibbling away does add up to a general erosion of freedom; it can mean the weakening of the country as a whole, and certainly a gradual limitation of the power of the federal government to effect the economic welfare of the people of Canada generally can lead to the impotence of the government.

While this measure is not before us directly, I think now is a good time to take a look at the various factors which I believe are important, to get us in the state of mind in which we can properly consider the importance of the change in the constitution. Certainly many members have already indicated that they feel this agreement with the provinces amounts to a further reduction in the power of the federal government. I suggest that all of us should look seriously right now at how much power the federal government has and how much power it has to have. I get the feeling sometimes that because we have had so much pressure from the provinces we have been altogether too preoccupied with the growing responsibilities of the provinces and their inability to cope with these responsibilities out of limited resources. Also they have not seriously enough considered the fact that federal responsibility is growing, while federal capacity for action and influence on all these factors has been eroded away, and not just by giving in to the provinces.

When confederation started I am sure most of us would have agreed that the Fathers of Confederation laid great emphasis on the necessity for having a strong central government. They did not give to the provinces those fields which had the greatest influence on Canada's economic status or which gave the provincial governments the power to have a great influence on Canada's economic status. At that time it was the internal problems of the provinces—the problems of vast distance, the immaturity of the nation, etc.—which made them see clearly why the federal government, if it were to bind together such a loose confederation of provinces, had to have the main power in its hands. I suggest that if we are to approach the problem today it behooves us to look and see whether those factors have been changed so much that the same thinking does not still apply.

It is true that today we are in a much different world from the world of a hundred years ago, but I suggest that each other nation in the world today is in a different position too. Let us look at some of the outside factors which show that power has been taken away from the federal government, its capacity to manage, to conduct and influence the economic welfare of the people in the country. Trade situations have changed. We are now more than ever depending on international trade, balance of payments, tariff agreements and such general agreements as GATT. Each one of those limits the capacity of the federal government to be able freely to influence the destiny of our own people. Every time the federal government binds itself to a new agreement to limit tariffs it must of necessity limit its own capacity to influence the opportunities for our own industrialists now more than ever dependant on international markets and resist the impact of potential importers into this country.

I suggest that we consider what has happened in Europe, where nations with much longer established governments, with in many cases much larger populations, governments without our problems of vast distances, transportation and difference of climate to contend with, nations with vast pools of skilled labour to call upon, much experience in industrialized machinery, in all of which we are just acquiring experience, have themselves found it was not within the legislative competence of their own governments to influence enough their own economic chances for survival, let alone spreading it down through the subdivisions or sections of the country. The federal governments of such countries have not had the power, acting alone, to be of sufficient use to private entrepreneurs within their own countries, so as to keep up with the cry for a rising standard of living, but have found it necessary to give some of their own economic independence to an economic union. In light of this I suggest we must look very carefully when we see in this country a strong move in the other direction.

Certainly Canada as a country has as many problems as any of these nations to which I have referred. We are blessed with perhaps a certain greater natural wealth in this country. But we do not have the wealth of manpower. We do not have the skills of some of them, and we do have the disadvantage of great distance.

I suggest that any thinking person who considers that other nations of the world have become more and more preoccupied with economic union, are spending more and more time trying to negotiate satisfactory trade agreements, have tried to bolster the purchasing power underdeveloped countries and tried to work out a lessening of tariff barriers, etc., so that the federal governments in those countries may give some assistance to their industrialists, will come to the conclusion that we would be very shortsighted indeed not to take every opportunity we have to give our federal government the chance to be of influence in that type of work.

I think that one of our major difficulties has always been the increasing demand for social justice, each of the provinces finding itself beset with new and increasing demands for more and more money and becoming more and more aware of the limitation of its own action or its own ability to act, owing to constitutional difficulties. The provinces were given only certain powers. They can act only in certain ways, can influence industry only to a certain extent and can raise only so much money. When a bewildered provincial treasurer or provincial premier tries to find ways and means of satisfying the cry for new services he must find it very frustrating indeed to discover his hands are tied because the federal government has so much power, power which he might himself find useful.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that there is anything wrong with any of the provincial premiers who are striving to get for their provinces a little more power if they feel, and honestly feel, they can use that power to better the lot of the peoples in their provinces. But I do think we should be aware that that problem is not unique to any one province or to any one government which might be in power. I think we should examine the demands made by a province and remember that generally the demands made by a province represent the viewpoint of the government of that day. We must remember that when the government of the day says that there is only one solution to a certain problem, part of that cry may be a political one and part an actual one. But certainly we do know that there are different political governments in the provinces, and we have heard enough, from some of the premiers at least, to know that there are many and various approaches to economic affairs which these different governments reflect.

I should like to single out the government of the province of Quebec for a moment, just as an example of what has been going on. I suggest that the pressure put on by the government of the province of Quebec is explained, in part at least, by political pressure rather than just economic pressure. We are aware that there has been a resurgence of interest in government and government status and in the role of government in that province. There has become an awareness—and a voice to express that awareness as seldom heard before—that there are many depressed areas in the province. There is an awareness that the agricultural industry, for instance, is not faring as well as the agricultural industries in other parts of the country. Certainly when this awareness is coupled with a very high pressured political campaign to convince the country that that province has the best government it can get and that it is working the hardest, we can understand why the ordinary citizen in that province and perhaps throughout the country as well—and sometimes those in the government itself—fail to appreciate that a lot of this pressure is political propaganda. It is to the welfare politically of the Liberal government in the province of Quebec to convince the rest of the country that there is only one solution to Quebec's economic difficulties, to say that there is no help other than by giving more power to provincial governments so that they will be able to solve those difficulties for themselves. We have observed some of that type of thing in Mr. Bennett's approach to this problem in British Columbia.

Since we in this house are politicians, we are not blind to the advantages to be reaped by provincial premiers who can convince the rest of the country that the only thing wrong with their governments is that they do not have sufficient power to do those things which they in their wisdom think are necessary, and that the big bad government in Ottawa will not let them have those powers. The present government has been politically disappointing along this line. Certainly we are all aware of the Liberal government's ability to sell itself as the government of this country which can handle all the difficulties. In considering the supposed generosity of the Liberal party, I have never been able to comprehend why it farmed out this area to the provincial Liberal government of Quebec. I should think that the first people to seize on this gradual erosion of federal power to excuse their own incompetence as a government would be the Liberal politicians sitting opposite.

Certainly if we are going to consider taking away any further power from the federal government we must also consider the problems the federal government will have to meet, and whether those powers are sufficient to meet those problems. We must consider the difficulties facing the people of Canada and the necessity for increasing the standard of living and services available. How shall those problems be met across Canada. I for one believe that most people in this country are Canadians first. While they are proud of their own provinces they readily agree that the standard of living available to all Canadians in all provinces should be considered in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

We must be wary of giving economic powers to the provinces, because we should attack these problems first as a nation. We must consider the capacity of the provinces to raise their standards of living if we are to divest the federal government of some of its authority in order that provincial governments can take care of the provincial economic situation.

Earlier I referred to the necessity in Europe of creating economic unions. Those of us who have considered some of the problems of increasing Canadian exports are very much aware of nations such as Japan which have larger populations, and have greater productive capacity as a result of using devices such as state trading cartels, and prohibiting private manufacturers from competing with each other on the world's markets. We are aware that communist nations use the governments themselves as trading agencies. If we are going to give some of the economic authority in Canada to the provincial governments in order that the provinces may take a purely regional and local approach to the economic situation we are going to be very shortsighted.

The economic problems in Canada are such that all the assistance and help the federal government has been able to give private enterprise in the past has proved in many cases to be inadequate. Should we complicate the matter by giving extra legislative competence to provincial governments which will move in the direction of assisting only those industries within the province? I am sure such a situation would result in industries within the borders of one province having a great advantage over competing industries in another province. In contrasting the conditions of government within one province with those within another we can at this time find situations where concessions given by provincial governments are almost tantamount to tariff barriers. Certainly there is no difference between imposing a tariff between the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario and the effect of one of those provinces lowering the tax on an industry within its border by 5 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, we are already beset by problems of this type. How far is it fair for a province to go in attracting industry to its area? When do the concessions given by provinces amount to penalties imposed upon the manufacturers in other provinces? If we are going to increase the power of the provincial governments to the point where they can influence the economy of the provinces to the extent I have suggested, then certainly we are going to increase the provincial potential for making these unfair adjustments. We know that it is unconstitutional for provinces to impose tariffs between provinces. Unless we get our thinking straight and realize that in today's economic world every nation is concentrating on obtaining a fair trade situation, we will find ourselves in difficulty. I suggest that every bit of power possible should be left with the federal government so that our economic and trade problems can be handled on a nation-wide basis.

The feeling of some provinces that there will be an immediate advantage to the provinces as a result of this transfer of authority is understandable. However, I suggest the provincial governments are thinking only in terms of the immediate advantage. I do not blame premiers for coming to Ottawa, suggesting they want the power to do certain things, and I suppose they have the right to point out to their voters that this would remedy certain situations. However, we as members of the federal parliament are duty bound to consider these problems on a nation-wide scale. We are especially duty bound to consider the powers of the provincial governments and those powers which they are new seeking. No matter how inadequate we feel at times we must look at Canada and its position in the world. We must consider the economic factors which effect the economy of this country and, above all, remember that the responsibilities of the federal government are growing even as provincial responsibilities are growing.

This government has given some indication of its own in ability to cope with the increasing demand for funds. Certainly those of us who supported the previous government are not likely to forget quickly the derision and condemnation of the deficits the Conservative government had to face. The present government came into office partly at least because it was able to picture the problems Canada faced as needing only the assistance of the Liberal experts for their solution, but one would think that after the length of time they have been in office, during which period they have run up bigger deficits than ever and have yielded constantly to pressures from the provinces, they would begin to realize that they do have a problem. It is not just a matter of getting the masterminds in and the dopes out, as they used to say, and I do not pretend that that prescription even applies today. We need to do more than just get the dopes out. We need to take a look at the pressures and try to wipe out some of the politics in dealing with these matters. We need to try to understand how far politics will carry us and how far a little sound planning will go.

There should be no more piecemeal consideration of whether the country can afford a pension plan. The pension plan has to be viewed in the light of its effects on industry and what it will do for the provinces and their ability to finance the carrying out of their obligations. I suggest that many members of the house have not bothered to look at the whole picture and try to piece things together. I am sure that many, like myself are just a little afraid to look at the whole general picture, say that it is a bit beyond them and ask where the experts are. I think the only experts we can rely upon in approaching a problem of this sort are the members of parliament who are elected to represent the people of the country.

In approaching many of these problems the government has emphasized its desire to cooperate with the provinces, but in my opinion it has really been neglecting its duty. To the federal government co-operative federalism means: Give up all responsibility to a conference of provincial premiers and let them handle these matters. I have seen such an erosion of federal powers that I sometimes feel that the powers left to the federal government have been reduced to a level comparable to the capabilities of the present government to deal with these matters. This is a disgraceful situation, and I hope that when we are considering amendments to the constitution our attitude will be that we will not give even a fraction of an inch. Things have gone so far under the present government that every day we must look to see what power we can get back into federal hands which has been so unnecessarily thrown away.

If the present members of the cabinet feel they want to divest themselves of as much power as they can so that the job of governing the country may be reduced to their level of competence, it is up to us as members of the house not to let them do it. If they want to give away their responsibilities I submit they should divest themselves of those responsibilities immediately by resigning, so that competent individuals can take over the government.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief, but due to the fact that the Conservatives intend to monopolize the entire time of this house to talk about every matter possible on the occasion of interim supply, I would like to say a few words this afternoon concerning certain persons from Montreal who are visiting Toronto, and I would like to make some comments respecting a news story which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of October 30. Here are the title and the text of that item:

[Text]

Baptist: Catholics Support Separatism.

A French speaking Baptist minister from Montreal said here yesterday that the Roman Catholic church in Quebec supports the separatist movement. Rev. W. H. Frey, pastor of Montreal's French Evangelical Baptist church, was a delegate to the annual convention of the Canadian Evangelical Baptist fellowship which met this week in High Park Baptist church. The fellowship represents 100,000 adherents and nearly 250 churches, 20 of them in Quebec.

"If the Roman Catholic church were against separatism she would not have failed to thunder against it, as she has against everything else she opposes," Mr. Frey said in an interview. The "strange silence" of the Catholic hierarchy in Quebec about separatism could only be interpreted as tacit approval, Mr. Frey said.

He said that although there has been a "thaw" in Catholic-Protestant relations in Quebec since Pope John XXIII started the ecumenical movement, Quebec is still a "church-dominated society."

"Converts to our Baptist faith from Catholicism have told me that they had only learned to love English speaking Canadians after the conversion," Mr. Frey said.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, it is statements such as those which undermine the good understanding between the various groups which make up the Canadian nation.

When Pastor Frey states that the Roman Catholic church approves of separatism, he knows he is lying shamelessly to those he is addressing.

When he maintains that it is only when Roman Catholics are converted to the Baptist church that they learn to love their English speaking fellow citizens, again Mr. Frey is lying shamelessly to his audience.

We find in Quebec, especially because we live in Quebec, that cordial relations do exist between the elements—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve will please allow me to interrupt him for a moment to remind him that the committee is now dealing with interim supply and any contribution to this debate should refer to the matter at hand, at least in some way.

At present we are discussing questions relating to public administration.

I do not see how what the hon. member is discussing at the present time is connected in any way with the administration of the state or government business.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, we are studying interim supply amounting to $740 million. I am convinced that a part of this amount will be apportioned to the department of national health. Now, if it covers expenditures by this department, I submit that the case of mental health I am referring to could be dealt with under appropriations of this department.

The Chairman: I believe there is a far-fetched relation between the hon. member's contribution to the debate and the resolution now under consideration. I would therefore ask him to limit his remarks to the resolution now before us.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, may I very humbly suggest that all the members who speak of the constitution, for instance, do not relate their remarks too much to the appropriations of $740 million now under consideration. The speeches of those who for some ten days have dealt with the relations between the various ethnic groups in this country do not either have a direct connection with the expenditures of $740 million for which the government seeks approval.

I would ask you to be as patient with me as you have been with the Conservative members, who have said nothing for ten days but who have nevertheless spoken and dealt with subjects of much less importance than that about which I am speaking at the present time. I wish I had approval in order that I may resume my remarks.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member, for the sake of this discussion, to relate his comments to the resolution before us.

The hon. member is referring to certain comments which were made about the constitution during this debate. He will admit that to a certain extent the constitution falls under public administration and certainly under the Minister of Justice.

On the other hand, the government can in no way be responsible for the statements made by the person referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, once more I humbly submit that this matter falls under the Department of National Health and Welfare. I do not wish to make many comments on this item, but I would point out that some people deserve our attention, even with respect to the very large estimates now before us.

What I wish to point out is that the question of national unity, the understanding between Canadians, does fall under the government. It has responsibilities in this respect.

Even if the constitution may fall under the Minister of Justice, in my opinion the government has responsibilities as regards persons who try by all possible means to sow hatred and discord in this country; it should denounce those who endeavour to divide the people of Canada instead of uniting them.

And here, as a French Canadian from the province of Quebec—

Mr. Prud'homme: Would the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Caouette: Certainly.

Mr. Prud'homme: Does the hon. member feel that the speech delivered by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) during the last week end was a contribution toward national unity?

Mr. Caouette: I have not yet had the opportunity to read the speech made by the hon. member for Port Arthur, although I have heard comments about it, and as far as his speech is concerned I was told that he spoke as an irresponsible man.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Caouette: The hon. member for Port Arthur might deny it; however, I will certainly read the speech he made in Toronto over the week end and I will report in due time to the hon. member who asked me a question.

Before being interrupted, I was saying that it is as a French Canadian and as a practising Roman Catholic that I object to such statements, stupid statements aimed only at pitting people against one another.

The Roman Catholic clergy in the province of Quebec has never taken a stand for or against separatism. It is not within its purview and the priests will tell you so just as they will tell you that the Roman Catholic church stands behind no party, be it Liberal, Conservative or Social Credit; it is not its role. The Roman Catholic church in our province, as elsewhere, has a part to play which has to do with the salvation of the soul; as for the salvation of the body, this is our role and the Roman Catholic church leaves it to us.

I am sorry to see publicity given to reports such as this one in a city such as Toronto and even Montreal. They are untrue and accomplish no purpose in terms of the national good. We are here as federal representatives to serve this nation, and I think that we have a moral obligation to denounce those, wherever they come from, who try, in such odious ways, to divide the people in the various parts of Canada.

These are the few remarks I wanted to make today on these estimates amounting to $740 million which we are now discussing with the rather full co-operation of the Conservatives who are looking forward to the Christmas holidays.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, while we are dealing with the interim supply, I wish, like some other colleagues, to express certain views regarding a problem of capital importance, that of Canadian unity.

I take this occasion to comment on some statements made by certain of my colleagues. I hasten to add that these are colleagues whom, I admit, are competent and of good faith and whose opinions I respect also. I hope that they also will respect my views and that they will let me express them as clearly as possible.

Three very interesting questions have been raised in regard to the constitution during this debate.

It has been said, if I am not mistaken, that confederation act was not an agreement and, in short, that it was an ordinary piece of legislation just like any other. It was added, however, that when the British North America Act was passed by the British parliament, as it was wont to do, it was necessary to remove any suggestion of an agreement.

I am against the concept that the British North America Act would only be a mere piece of legislation. I maintain that it was an agreement binding the provinces in a union based on the good faith of the two main ethnic groups then constituting the Canadian people.

The B.N.A. Act is, in the tradition of British public law, on the same footing as the great pieces of British legislation which are the very basis of the personal freedoms and even of our western civilization.

I have in mind for instance, the Magna Carta, the 1689 Bill of Rights, the petition of rights and all the others. In order to convince oneself that in the minds of all the participants who united the North American colonies in 1867 an agreement was really being entered into, only one has to read the discussions held in the British House of Commons at that time. One can read, for instance, the words of the sponsor of this legislation in the British parliament, Lord Carnarvon, who stated:

To those resolutions—

He was referring to the Quebec and Charlottetown resolutions, which have resulted in the adoption of the act itself.

To those resolutions, the British provinces of North America gave their consent, and the measures based upon those resolutions must be accepted as a union treaty.

Then it was said that this was an essential pact. And, if we look at it closely, we realize that such was the case, because if it had been merely a piece of legislation of the British parliament, why would the consent of the participating provinces have been required previously? Why would not all the British provinces have been united, even those which had not given their consent?

It is therefore obvious that the constituting act of our constitutional existence is a pact and was considered as such by the Canadian participants themselves, the Fathers of Conferation, and by the British legislators. In addition, the main judgments of the Supreme Court of Canada and, especially, of the judicial committee of the privy council all confirm the theory of a pact between the provinces but mostly between the two ethnical groups. In fact, for nearly a century no French Canadian living in Quebec or elsewhere has ever thought that it was anything but a freely accepted union of all to form a new entity, Canada. Under the circumstances, there could have been no question of either direct or indirect coercion or domination.

Mr. Chairman, some astounding things have been said. It has been claimed that some plot had been contrived and reference was even made to an assassination, for words of exceptional violence have been uttered in the course of this debate on the constitution, one which surely should be marked by level-headedness and complete objectivity. It was said that the present government had contrived a sinister plot to abdicate its responsibilities in order to decentralize constitutional and administrative authority in this country and, as a result, achieve the dissolution and disintegration of confederation itself.

I have made my share of speeches in this house and never to speak on behalf or uphold the cause of the present federal government. If any charge could be laid against this government, I would rather accuse it of being a centralizing government striving under the guise of that co-operative federalism formula, to deprive the provinces of much of their powers. Therefore, I say that there does not seem to exist any immediate or remote conspiracy to take away from the central government any of its legitimate powers. On the other hand, decentralization in itself is not by any means a bad thing, on the contrary.

By the way, may I say very frankly and very openly at this stage of my remarks that I am in favour of a united Canada, that I have confidence and hope in the future of confederation. And, in my capacity as the authorized spokesman for the Quebec caucus of our party, I add that like the provincial leader of the Conservative party, the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), we on this side of the house do not consider that we have been given a mandate to take away from the present federal power its legitimate rights.

If we acted any differently, we would not then truly understand where our duty lies. Still, I must say we are aware that, if confederation is to continue and progress, if it is to rally the support of the majority in Canada and more especially in the province of Quebec we must face present realities, and especially that which implies recognition of the French fact, of the legitimate aspirations of the French group as an essential partner in confederation. As such, we must endorse and support as much as possible, and with all the constitutional means of which we can avail ourselves, the autonomist attitude adopted by almost all the governments of the province of Quebec, whether Liberal, Conservative, Union Nationale or other.

Mr. Chairman, were it not for such an autonomist attitude, confederation could not survive. This is not a Quebec problem only; it is a national problem, because Canada is not only composed of two main ethnic groups coming from two founding races, it comprises also many other ethnic groups. There is, in this vast geographical territory called Canada, many different economic and geographical areas which, in order to survive, must have powers which, within their jurisdiction, are completely autonomist, independent and free from any interference by the central power.

Mr. Chairman, there is another argument to support the claims of the partisans of provincial autonomy: the transformation within confederation and throughout the country in the last few years, especially since the last world war.

Everyone knows that under cover of the war and of the economic needs resulting therefrom, the central government monopolized as never before nearly all the powers and the economic sinews in the country. On the other hand, since the war the wind of decentralization started blowing and the provinces, having under the constitution sovereign powers in their own field, acquired responsibilities which they never had before and were faced with all sorts of needs. Now, to carry out their responsibilities in these fields, the provinces had to have fiscal means which, largely under cover of the war and also for other but less obvious reasons, were monopolized by the central power; the provinces have been claiming these fiscal resources since the end of the war. I am thinking, for instance, about their responsibility in the fields of public education, communications within the provinces, municipal services, social welfare and particularly about the development of national resources of all provinces. Those are concrete tasks, tremendous responsibilities the provinces must assume and that is why there was a whole series of federal-provincial conferences during which all premiers spoke with one voice in order to give back to the appropriate jurisdiction the means to legitimately carry out the obligations incumbent to them under the constitution. And I think that such a trend will certainly continue.

There was much more. Since the end of the war—it is proper to say so—there has been a new awakening in the province of Quebec, and especially among French Canadians. Quebec is now conscious of its power and of its human as well as material resources. I think it is accurate to say that the great majority of its population, having such resources, want to use them for legitimate purposes and to promote its development in all fields, so that it can be strong, more powerful and more united to share in this great Canadian achievement.

I think that such is the true voice and desire of the moderate elements in the province of Quebec. I leave out of consideration all those who, because of past disappointments, have lost their illusions, and no longer believe in the possibility of the existence of a confederation where their rights would be fully recognized.

Mr. Chairman, I think that while desiring national unity, we must demand from our government leaders, from all those who have responsibilities, to pursue a genuine Canadian policy and I cannot see the pursuit of such a policy without the implementation of a great many reforms, the need of which is getting more pressing day by day.

I am thinking in particular of the necessity for our country to approve a truly distinctive flag. I am for this distinctive flag, Mr. Chairman. I, for one, am quite satisfied that a committee looked into this matter for nearly two months and held a great many meetings at the end of which it finally made its choice. I recognize that this choice has been freely accepted by the majority of the members on this committee, and I feel that to delay the approval of the committee's report, at this stage, would certainly not help the cause of national unity.

I also believe that legislation concerning the repatriation of the constitution should be passed quickly. I have examined the two formulae: the one brought forth in 1961 and the 1964 version. I am unable to see any essential difference between the two, or at least, no difference in respect of the federal government powers. Even if this formula is examined carefully with a magnifying glass, nowhere will there be found a lessening of federal powers. Therefore, it seems that when one is speaking of a plot, in this repatriation formula, in order to get rid of certain powers of the federal government, this assertion cannot be proved by the text that was submitted.

Certainly, there are differences. Sections 6, 7, 8, and part 3 of the press release or legislative project are different from the Fulton formula of 1961. But nowhere is there any lessening of the powers of the central government, except in section 6 which contains a definition of what constitutes federal jurisdiction, and also certain powers under which the federal government could not unilaterally make any amendment.

This is why, Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is advisable to adopt quickly and without acrimony the necessary address in order to bring home the constitution in accord with the wishes of most Canadians and of the British authorities themselves.

I also believe that once we have brought home the constitution, we should also think of revising and modernizing it. It is not difficult to realize that the British North America Act and some other statutes that are part of our constitution are antiquated, rigid, and do not meet the realities of today.

It is only normal that after 100 years there should be this anxiety to modernize an instrument which certainly served us well in the past but is no longer adequate in the light of today's needs. And when I say today's needs, I do not mean only the legitimate claims and aspirations of only a section of the population, namely the French Canadian people, but I mean also all social, economic and cultural problems which are not mentioned in the constitution and for which a solution does not seem to be provided.

In my opinion, those are facts about which we, the members of the Canadian parliament, must think seriously.

We live in a changing world, and Mr. Chairman, the very basis of the British genius is to accept changes when they become necessary. Where would the British commonwealth of nations be today if the British genius had not changed with the times, accepted changes, and created a large association of free nations which are an important factor in the peace and prosperity of the world?

Mr. Chairman, the world we live in is an independent world, and it is certain that no matter under which system we live we will still be subject to that interdependence between all the nations of the world and will have to accept it.

In my opinion, to refuse changes when their necessity has become absolutely obvious and clear is to show a lack of flexibility, a lack of political realism.

One of the greatest virtues which made the western civilization great is tolerance, and I believe that we, the members of parliament, while considering today and in the following days our very future, will have to show much tolerance. If we consider the problems I mentioned in that spirit we will find a solution and Canada will become a greater nation.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, I was not able to be in the house last week but I have been checking the Hansard record to see what subjects were under discussion at that time. I was interested to discover that most of the complaints which were presented in the committee with respect to government action, or lack of action, related to a problem that I was exposed to directly last week during my absence from the house. It was my privilege to attend the opening of parliament in another commonwealth country, the island of Bermuda. I was interested to note the different functions of parliament as they exist here compared with those in a parliamentary body which has not yet completed the transition from representative parliamentary democracy to responsible parliamentary democracy.

It was also interesting to note that the Bermuda parliament had some of the problems with which we are faced in this country. As a matter of fact the newly formed opposition in that country decided to demonstrate its protest against the policies of the administration by boycotting the opening ceremonies of parliament. As I have been listening to the groans and moans emanating from the government benches this afternoon as opposition members have risen to their feet to take part in this important discussion on interim supply I have come to the conclusion that some of my hon. friends across the way might hope that the opposition in the Canadian House of Commons would demonstrate its protest by being absent from the sittings of the committee.

Mr. Knowles: Most of them are right now.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that most of them are absent at the moment from the sittings of parliament. I am always surprised when a member of his broad experience in parliament makes a comment of that kind, because he has been in the house long enough to know that members of parliament have other responsibilities than those which bring them to the House of Commons.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, that line.

Mr. Dinsdale: I know my hon. friend is always aware that this will get him a headline and I suppose that is why he makes these frequent interjections into our parliamentary discussions here.

Before I was interrupted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I was pointing out, Mr. Chairman, that judging from the reaction of members opposite they might wish that the members of the opposition would discharge their responsibilities by being absent from this chamber. It seems to me that that would demonstrate the attitude I saw in the Bermuda parliament, which has not yet completed the transition from representative democracy to responsible democracy.

In this regard I should like to make some comments on the discussion which took place last week on the subject of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

An hon. Member: Again?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, hon. members keep interjecting from across the way. Unfortunately I cannot hear their mumblings so therefore am unable to reply. However, I make this comment just in case the Hansard reporter has been able to catch their mumblings, instead of their rising to their feet and discussing intelligently these important subjects.

I think that by failing to recognize that we do have responsible democracy in Canada the government brings trouble upon its own head. As I read the discussion which took place about the C.B.C., member after member made the point that it would be in the best interests of our parliamentary process if the subject of the C.B.C. were brought before a parliamentary committee. This house of course is the highest court of public opinion in the land. Whenever the government is questioned on the functions of the C.B.C. it always replies that that important public corporation is responsible to the parliament of Canada. If that is so, Mr. Chairman, how can parliament discharge its responsibility better than by having an opportunity to hear from representatives of the C.B.C. before a parliamentary committee? In addition, we as members would have an opportunity to make comments and suggestions to the officials of the corporation in the process of discussion in a parliamentary committee.

This was the practice when I first came into parliament back in the early 1950's. There was a parliamentary committee on broadcasting almost every second year and it led to some of the useful reforms brought about in this house in 1958. But this government, in its stubborn refusal to refer such a difficult and complex subject to a parliamentary committee on broadcasting, brings trouble down upon its own head. This seems to be typical of the actions of the present government in handling the affairs of the nation, and certainly in handling the affairs of parliament: its failure to present business in an orderly fashion, and its introducing divisive subjects in an arbitrary manner.

In this connection I make merely a passing reference to the flag, which has so disrupted and confused the deliberations of this body during the current session of parliament. They knew by introducing a divisive subject of this kind that this would be the inevitable result. In its failure to allow representatives from the C.B.C. to come before a parliamentary committee the government is creating difficulty as well for that body.

There is bound to be criticism of a crown corporation charged with the responsibility of carrying on a comprehensive national broadcasting service. Questions are being asked on orders of the day, cluttering up the preliminary procedures of this house. It is inevitable that on a motion for interim supply, which provides an opportunity for discussing these matters, we have an extended debate on the subject. The parliamentary committee system has been extolled as a time saving device by parliamentary reformers from all sides of this house. Yet the government has resorted to a cover-up procedure by appointing an advisory committee which will in due course report to parliament, and in this arbitrary way has by-passed the basic principle of parliament and the responsibilities of the elected representatives.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question at this point?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. McIlraith: When the hon. member mentions the C.B.C. and the reference to the advisory committee, does he not think it would be fair to comment on what was said about a parliamentary committee at the time of the announcement? He will recall that at that point there was reference made to a parliamentary committee, and that reference can be found in Hansard.

Mr. Dinsdale: The point I am making is that instead of setting up a parliamentary committee the government has decided to set up an advisory committee which will in due course report to parliament. If we are going to adhere to the principles of responsible democracy, it is essential that the elected representatives of the people have an opportunity of reviewing from time to time the functions of this important body.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the hon. member understood my point. In the announcement regarding the advisory committee there was a commitment made, as I recall it, that a parliamentary committee would be set up to study the recommendations of that advisory committee.

Mr. Dinsdale: This is precisely what I am saying. The government is introducing an intermediary body. In other words the government is setting up another court of public opinion in this country to give consideration to the problems of broadcasting, and is stating that that secondary court of public opinion must report before the primary court of public opinion can take action. No democratic country can afford more than one high court of public opinion. This is our complaint and protest.

If the government had even a simple knowledge and understanding of the functions of the C.B.C. it should have been able to avoid this error. If the government had an understanding of responsible parliamentary democracy it would be aware that in order to satisfy the interests of the members of parliament in the functions of this tremendously powerful public opinion and educational service, it would have to make it possible for direct contact between the members of parliament and the officials of this organization. That has been the practice in the past but, as I have already intimated, but for some inexplicable reason, the present government has not resorted to the established practice.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member has made reference to an action taken by the government as announced on May 25, 1964, and which appears at page 3520 of Hansard. However, in referring to that announcement he has omitted to refer to a statement therein about a parliamentary committee and a time limit within which it would be set up. I am asking him whether he thinks that is a fair way of presenting his case.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the point I am making is that an advisory committee is to be set up.

Mr. McIlraith: A parliamentary committee is to be set up also.

Mr. Dinsdale: A parliamentary committee is to be set up following the recommendations of the advisory committee. The reason I have difficulty in understanding the government's devious device in this regard is because the government itself reiterates that the C.B.C. is not responsible to the government, but is responsible to parliament. What better way could it demonstrate that responsibility than by giving members of parliament an opportunity from time to time of making its wishes, comments and criticisms known with respect to the operations of this huge public corporation?

Mr. Chairman, the minister suggests that I am ignoring a statement which appears in Hansard. I am not ignoring that statement, but I am criticizing the government because a parliamentary committee is going to be by-passed in the first instance by an advisory committee which has no responsibility, or a lower level of responsibility, to the elected representatives in the House of Commons.

Various commentators have pointed out that it is unfair for members of parliament constantly to raise questions on orders of the day concerning the operations of the C.B.C. This is the only possible opportunity hon. members have to ask these questions, if the procedure which used to be followed, having the affairs of the C.B.C. submitted for review by a parliamentary committee on a regular basis, is not to be followed. Certainly discussions about an item of expenditure of some $100 million is in order during the debate on interim supply because, by the very actions of the government, we have a prime example of taxation without representation.

The government for some reason has tried to make a sacrosanct organization of the C.B.C. by removing it from the arena of public discussion. As I have already indicated, this is not only embarrassing to the government but is a source of embarrassment to the C.B.C. I think we should consider again the fundamental points which the C.B.C. reiterates in the midst of the current and continuing controversy. The C.B.C. admits that the air waves do not belong to any corporation, either private or public, but that they are a trust to be administered in the interests of the people. The air waves belong to the people. The officials of the C.B.C. also indicate that they are charged with the responsibility of carrying out broad national objectives. In this parliament we have the representatives of the people. This is the court of opinion where these broad national objectives are debated, and where we are trying to achieve a national consensus.

If we consider the early organizational period of the C.B.C. we will find that it was patterned after the British Broadcasting Corporation. The policies and techniques that had already been developed in the B.B.C. were adhered to very closely in the initial setting up of the C.B.C., and it has been pointed out over and over again in the house that the British parliament discharges its responsibility through regular referral of B.B.C. matters to a parliamentary committee at Westminster.

What are some of the main broad national objectives which make it important for parliament to have an opportunity to make its wishes known to the officials of the C.B.C.? First of all, Canadianization is the major function and role of the C.B.C. as defined in the Broadcasting Act, to encourage the development of Canadian talent, and to counter the influence of the powerful broadcasting media south of the border. We should have an opportunity to see how the C.B.C. is discharging this most important of all functions. Second, there is the question of national unity and the efforts of the C.B.C. to assist in the achieving of national unity. If we are to learn any lesson from the discussions that have been going on in the house and throughout the country in recent months, I think we will readily come to the conclusion there is something wrong with the national consensus and national unity in the Canadian body politic at the present time. Therefore it would be most advisable for members of parliament to have an opportunity to see just how the C.B.C. is assisting the cause of national unity at this time through its radio and television facilities.

I have heard comments outside the house by responsible ministers of the Quebec government, for example, to the effect that the programming of the C.B.C. in recent months has tended to have a detrimental effect, rather than encouraging national unity. I refer in particular to the statement of Hon. Bona Arsenault just the other day when speaking on this subject. Mr. Arsenault is no stranger to the House of Commons. He sat in the house for many years. In his remarks the other day he was not speaking from a provincial or regional point of reference but as one who was a federal member of parliament for many years and who, if I recall correctly, took a special interest in the operations of the C.B.C. through the parliamentary committee that used to meet.

Then of course there is recurring criticism by members representing various parts of the country that there is a tendency for the national broadcasting system to have a regional bias. When we think of the development of Canadian talent we find that most of such talent is developed in the more populous areas of Canada and we sometimes hear protests raised from the less populous regions of Canada, the maritimes or the western part of the country, that the same opportunities for program origination and cultural development are not provided in the non-metropolitan areas and regions. This of course is because the large metropolitan communities tend to dominate the national life of Canada as they dominate the life of any nation.

I should like to refer to a third important function which is often cited as basic to the operations of the C.B.C. I have in mind the educational and cultural function. It is recognized that a broadcasting organization with the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation bears very important responsibility for educational and cultural development. This is reflected in the $100 million annually which is made available for its operations by the parliament of Canada.

It must also be recalled that when the C.B.C. was first organized as a federally operated institution Ottawa was very sensitive about invading the field of educational responsibility because of the jurisdictional problem with which we are all too familiar and which has been a part of the discussion today on the subject of dominion-provincial relations. But back in the 1930's the government at Ottawa moved into the broadcasting field because it felt this was a most important medium for cementing Canada together and developing a sense of national unity largely through educational and cultural programming.

We in this parliament have moved quite a distance from our attitude toward educational priorities in those days. I need only refer to the grants to Canadian universities, to the amount of over $400 million that has been poured into the development of the excellent system of technical and vocational schools now available to the young people of Canada. Yet even though parliament has expanded its educational activities in other fields the fiscal demands of the C.B.C. continue to mount in an almost astronomical way. University leaders of Canada constantly remind parliament that they are being hard pressed to meet the challenge of education in the modern world because of the tremendous influx of the post-war generation of Canadians, the population explosion resulting from the war baby generation now reaching university age. It is high time that parliament gave some consideration to priorities in regard to assistance in meeting the educational problems of the nation. We grant $100 million to the C.B.C. I do not know what the figure is for federal grants to universities but obviously it has not increased in equal proportion.

As I have intimated, it was the practice to have the broadcasting committees up until the change of government in 1963. The Conservative government established a parliamentary committee to deal with broadcasting matters and the preceding Liberal government set up several parliamentary committees for this purpose. Arising out of the deliberations of the parliamentary committee in 1957 and 1958 there came very important policy recommendations which resulted in changes in broadcasting procedures that had a beneficial effect in regard to the functions of broadcasting in this nation. The B.B.G., for example, was established and it is high time an opportunity was given for an examination of that body such as is made possible through the device of a parliamentary committee. We must remember also that there has been a continuing shift from radio to television. I do not have the relative expenditures at my fingertips, but I would imagine that a large part of the $100 million made available for the C.B.C. is designated for the telecasting function rather than the radio function.

I neglected to mention in the earlier assessment of the functions of public broadcasting in Canada that it was always emphasized that it was desirous to have adequate broadcasting services without resort to commercialization. I think we are all aware that more and more, in both the telecasting and radio fields, the C.B.C. is resorting to revenues from advertising in order to assist in financing. Here is another aspect that could be examined by a suitable parliamentary committee.

Then, we now have alternative broadcasting services available. The private stations, both radio and television, have broadened their services to the Canadian public within recent years. During the past hearings of the parliamentary committee, it has been possible for members of parliament to hear representations from the representatives of the private broadcasters. I wonder if this advisory committee the government has set up is even going to give the private broadcasters an opportunity to make their difficulties and problems known.

Then, another major item that will confront the C.B.C. and the private broadcasters, and because of parliament's function in scrutinizing the operations of the C.B.C. it will concern all members of this house, is the fact we are about to face the decision of whether or not Canada should go into the colour telecasting field. I recall that back in 1952, I believe, the parliamentary committee of that year gave attention to the question of whether or not the C.B.C. should go into the telecasting field. As a result of the discussion in the committee, the C.B.C. was able to come to a decision that was in tune with prevailing public opinion of the day. I can recall, too, we even had a discussion in that committee of whether or not it was desirable to have an FM broadcasting network that would supplement the AM broadcasting facilities at that time. Well, the recommendation came strongly from the parliamentary committee that the C.B.C. should move into FM broadcasting, and as a direct result of the deliberations of that committee the Canadian Broadcasting facilities were considerably improved.

During this debate I do not want to go into the question of programming on the C.B.C.

The Chairman: I have to interrupt the hon. member to inform him that his time has expired, unless he has unanimous consent to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman; I will not trespass for very many minutes on the patience of the committee because, as I have intimated already, I do not want to discuss, either in a positive or negative way, the programming of the C.B.C. I do not believe that this committee of the whole is the place in which this subject can be dealt with adequately. It is easy to criticize a particular program, as happens from time to time in this house. Then we hear the minister, speaking from his exalted level of non-partisanism and non-political interference, say that he would be very happy to bring the comments of the hon. members to the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. How much more useful and effective it would be if hon. members could sit across the table and make their comments about these programs and get answers directly from the C.B.C. officials. I am sure the C.B.C. officials would be pleased to explain the motivation behind some of these programs that give rise to discussion and comment not only in this house but in many parts of Canada.

It is not only a public information media such as the C.B.C. that comes under criticism. The press is always under criticism. Of course, we have more direct access to the press through the printed page, and the press is also a private information service. Unfortunately the C.B.C., as a public information body, has to consider the delicate relationships between politicians and the corporation. This makes it a very much more sensitive and difficult area in which to operate. It is not only the press that is criticized. I can recall year after year in this house discussions going forward about the problem of salacious and indecent literature, in much the same terms as the pornography on the C.B.C. comes under discussion here. It was the former member for Kamloops who kept this subject alive over a number of years in such a way that finally this parliament was persuaded to take some legislative action. I am certainly not at all in favour of censorship, but I am absolutely in favour of an expression of public opinion from this responsible parliamentary body that can make the wishes of the people of Canada known to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

I have one final word on this subject, and that is to underscore the importance of a mass media of communication in the world in which we live. We know that the printed word and the earlier means of communication have had an important role to play in shaping the destinies not only of nations but of whole civilizations. I remember, for example, that well known economist, Dr. Innes, at the University of Toronto, giving a series of lectures on the subject of civilization and communication. His thesis was simply this, that the values of the civilization achieved by man in any particular period of time are strongly determined by the means of communication which are available.

He went back to the days of the Egyptian civilization, pointing out that the great leap forward was made possible by the invention of even a simple improvement in communications such as papyrus as opposed to the cuneiform writing which had been the only means of written communication up to that time. But how much more important is this thesis in the kind of world in which we live today, which has mass media able to engage in all sorts of subtle propaganda which can brainwash people without their even knowing they are being brainwashed. I refer to the hidden persuasion which is made possible by the subliminal advertising available in television, whereby one can flash a message on a screen, a message the viewer is not even aware of but which seeps into his subconscious and thus determines his behaviour and motivation.

We hear many criticisms from responsible groups that the avante garde has taken over in certain areas of the C.B.C. and are using this important mass medium to put forward their views, views which obviously are motivating many people, if we are to judge by a generation of angry young men and women making its protests heard in many national areas. All of this has been brought home to us in a forceful manner in recent weeks.

That is all I have time to say at the moment, Mr. Chairman. We have not even begun to exhaust the comments that could be made on broadcasting. I have endeavoured to put forward a case for the referral of C.B.C. and broadcasting matters to a parliamentary committee rather than resorting to the devious device of an advisory committee, such as the government has done. This is a dereliction of duty on the part of the government, because in our form of parliamentary democracy the government and the agencies operating under its aegis must always be responsible to the elected representatives of the people.

Mr. Ormiston: In the few minutes left before six o'clock I should like to remind the committee that when I led off the debate on interim supply on Friday, October 23, a serious problem confronted us with regard to transport. Those of us who participated in the debate were certainly gratified to note that on the following Monday certain action was taken which we hoped would make it possible for a commission to investigate the situation, but even though some work has been done, to date the situation has not been resolved.

I understand there is difficulty finding someone to head an investigative commission, and we have no guarantee on how long the railway employees will keep their contract to run and operate the trains if no positive action is taken. If, because of the inability of the government or the Minister of Transport to find someone suitable for this job, services were again disrupted, this would be most unfortunate. I sincerely hope that in the very near future a commissioner will be named to investigate the situation, and that an arrangement will be reached satisfactory to both management and the unions involved. The President of the Privy Council was good enough to say we can expect some action in this respect in the near future, but I believe such an announcement should come from the Minister of Transport who holds direct responsibility.

This evening I wish to pursue the topic discussed this afternoon by the hon. member for Edmonton West. We have received some legal interpretations of the constitutional problem, but it is the layman and the public in general who will be affected by the great changes envisaged.

It is only normal that as a country develops and its provinces flex their muscles and become prosperous, they wish to expand in many ways, and in looking for the means with which to expand undoubtedly they look toward the political aspect of a question. This is not only true of Canada but of developing nations all over the world. We have heard much about the winds of change. They do not blow just in one direction or in one country; they blow in many places. As confederation develops we must accept the necessity for change, but every care must be taken and every preparation made before changes are effected and accepted.

As I say, changes have been taking place in many parts of the world. With their experience of the parliamentary system we expect the British to be the most adult nation politically, but just a short time ago we found there are nationalists in Scotland who believe they should be given some recognition. Some of them want a form of parliament for their own country and they go to considerable lengths to make their views known not only to the people of Britain but to people in other parts of the world. They do not, of course, resort to the more callous means of bringing their case to the attention of the public, but it will be recalled that a few years ago, in the dark of night, they stole the stone of Scone which had been sitting in Westminster for hundreds of years, and took it back with them to Scotland. This was their way of showing that the parliamentary representation they were getting was not adequate, and though there was a great hue and cry months went by before the stone was taken back.

There has been little said about separatism since then, these people being very rational, as are all Scottish people, and deeming they had made their point. Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Ormiston: Mr. Chairman, before the supper hour I was trying, with limited success, to point out that the winds of constitutional change are blowing everywhere in the world, even in the British Isles, where the Scottish nationalists used some unorthodox methods of bringing their views before the public. However, having done it in a rather polite manner, they were not ostracized, as is shown by the fact that the people of Great Britain had two Scottish prime ministers prior to the recent election. While the stone of Scone, or the stone of destiny, as I mentioned, was resident in Westminster, I am one of those who feel that we are not inconvenienced to too great an extent by the residence of the constitution in Westminster; but I did feel that the repatriation of the constitution would begin a war of attrition on that constitution.

We see this because of several situations which have taken place in the last few months. We see that the premier of British Columbia is trying to extend the boundaries of his province into the Yukon and Northwest Territories. We see that the minister of revenue in the province of Quebec has said there are several departments in which there is too much overlapping and that as far as the federal field is concerned they could be done away with. We see the premier of Saskatchewan, after attending the meeting of the federal and provincial representatives, certainly taking exception to the ideas which were voiced at that meeting. The premier of Saskatchewan was so incensed, evidently, by what took place that he felt that any change in the constitution, if Quebec was affected, would require the province of Saskatchewan to join up with the United States.

This of course is a most unusual approach. Those of us who know something of the economy of Saskatchewan and of the great potential there realize that in the years ahead the economic power of Saskatchewan will probably equal that of the province of Quebec. There are those tremendous deposits of potash which underlie so much of the area of Saskatchewan. The great potential in the province of Saskatchewan is not equalled anywhere else in Canada. Those minerals in the province which will be transported in ever increasing quantity to the underdeveloped and undernourished countries of the world will create an economy for Saskatchewan which will not be equalled. That is why I am wondering why the premier of a province such as Saskatchewan feels so concerned that after a federal-provincial conference he says that if certain other situations are prevalent Saskatchewan will also have to take some steps to dissociate itself from confederation. I am wondering just what did transpire in so far as the change in the constitution was concerned.

There are many people in all parts of Canada who have that same view, and I think it is only pertinent that we should at this time make some inquiry into and expect some explanations as to what the analysis of this whole situation can be. I am particularly concerned because I have heard in other quarters of people in public life who are concerned, and really concerned, about the attitude that was prevalent at that meeting.

One of those individuals is a constitutional lawyer of some note; in fact he is the former lieutenant governor of the province of Saskatchewan, Hon. Frank Bastedo. For the benefit of the committee I should like to put on Hansard tonight some of his opinions in this regard, because Hon. Frank Bastedo is recognized in most quarters as an eminent lawyer and one quite well fitted to analyse the situation as it prevails today. Mr. Bastedo was one of those who was a witness when the commission on biculturalism and bilingualism held its meetings in the city of Regina in the province of Saskatchewan. Mr. Bastedo was very concerned and some of his remarks illustrate his concern to some extent. He told those who were present that the terms of reference of the commission on biculturalism and bilingualism was in effect the first draft of a new constitution for Canada. This is a very strong statement, Mr. Chairman, but he felt this was a constitution that would divide us into an alliance of regions, a partnership of what he called two preferred "founding races" with a silent partnership for those of us who are what he called the "foundling" races.

In the British North America Act there is no talk of races and there is no talk of Quebec or Ontario agreeing to enter into confederation either. The preamble to the British North America Act begins:

> Whereas the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one dominion—

Section 3 provides for the formation of the provinces of Canada, of Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick into one dominion. Then section 5 declares—and hear this carefully:

> Canada—

That is, the new dominion:

> —shall be divided into four provinces, named Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick.

In other words, with the exception of those two provinces which temporarily stayed out of the union in 1867, all of British North America was lumped together to form one nation and then, for the purposes of local government only, it was divided up again. The province of Canada was divided into the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. These provinces were born, as was our nation of Canada, with the British North America Act. One third of the act sets up constitutions for these provinces. Reading the plain English of the B.N.A. Act—as we must, because there is no official French language text, not even of that part which is the constitution of the province of Quebec—how can there then be talk of an alliance of two founding races, of the parts being greater than the whole?

The Fathers of Confederation deliberately conceived our constitution as a union of parts into one nation, not as an alliance of states. They knew that the United States of America had begun to fall apart within ten years of its founding as an alliance of states. They had read the words of the American statesman James Madison, who was later president, when he successfully fought for a union and repudiated an alliance of states in these words, which I will now put on Hansard:

> In time, the world would have seen, for the first time, a system of government founded on an inversion of the fundamental principles of all government; it would have seen the authority of the whole society everywhere surbordinate to the authority of the parts; it would have seen a monster, in which the head was under the direction of the members.

Madison and his fellow statesmen succeeded in strengthening the bonds of union, but they were not so successful as to prevent the war between the states which was burning fiercely at the very time our Fathers of Confederation were planning our union. It was because of the experience of those Americans that Sir John A. Macdonald analysed the situation as it then was across the border and also made some pointed remarks. Having seen the situation which existed across the border he said this:

We can now take advantage of the last 78 years, during which the constitution—

He is referring to the American constitution.

—has existed, and I am strongly of the belief that we have, in a great measure, avoided in this system which we propose for the adoption of the people of Canada the defects which time and events have shown to exist in the American constitution... Ever since the union was formed the difficulty of what is called "state rights" has existed, and this had had much to do in bringing on the present unhappy war in the United States... They commence, in fact, at the wrong end. They declared by their constitution that each state was a sovereignty in itself, and that all the powers incident to a sovereignty belonged to each state, except those powers which by the constitution were conferred upon the general government and congress. Here we have adopted a different system. We have strengthened the general government... We thereby strengthen the central parliament, and make the confederation one people and one government, instead of five peoples and five governments, with merely a point of authority connecting us to a limited and insufficient extent.

This is certainly a point to analyse when we realize today that to some extent we are again trying to divide the powers of our governments.

When these statesmen such as Madison, the American, and Macdonald, the Canadian, have so spoken, why does the present government revive this type of proposition—this monster government which Madison repudiated and Macdonald slew; the monster of which the head is under the direction of the members; the monster of which the parts are greater than the whole; the monster that spawns that monstrosity of wars, civil war?

There was another American who was very conscious of the division of power between the state and the federal government, and I refer to George Washington. Washington, who led the armies of the colonies in revolution, who lived under the alliance of states and wrote that it seemed little more than a shadow without substance, who served two terms as first president of the strengthened union, knew the answer. In his farewell address to the people of the United States Washington said this—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): We have enough problems over here without hearing about the United States.

Mr. Ormiston: This is quite relevant, if the hon. member will listen. He said:

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your tranquility at home, your peace abroad, of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union, to your collective and individual happiness...frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts...In contemplating the causes which may disturb our union, it occurs as a matter of serious concern that any group should have been furnished for characterising parties by geographical discriminations—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavour to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence, within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts...

I may say now, Mr. Chairman, that the evil which Washington foresaw as a constant and active threat to the union of the United States has come upon us in Canada. There are designing men in all parts of the country, both on the provincial and the national level, who can easily raise the cry of discrimination in one quarter and favouritism in another. I think it is evident that those of us who analyse what was said by Macdonald, Madison and Washington feel that here is a lesson which we can take to heart. They foresaw the difficulties which would ensue where the country was divided, where the federal government was weakened, where the provincial or state government became too powerful. This is a lesson which we would do well to take to heart in the days ahead when we have to examine all of the propositions which have come forward from this federal and provincial conference.

Mr. Willoughby: Mr. Chairman, I do appreciate the applause which I am getting from the other side of the house. I hope I will be worthy of the courtesy hon. members opposite are showing and that they will continue to be courteous during the few remarks I have to make. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the remarks which I have will be brief and they will be based on criticisms which I hope are justifiable. I feel they are. But in addition to being criticisms I hope they will also be criticisms of a constructive nature. It is not criticism, Mr. Chairman, of the intent; it is the criticism which I have in my mind of the methods being used in this house.

I feel I am wholly correct when I say that at the present time parliament is in disrepute. It is in disrepute not only in local circles here, but from talking to constituents and from correspondence I have received from all over Canada I feel this is the attitude of the general public toward this institution, and I think it is something which should be taken very seriously. The House of Commons cannot afford to continue in this manner.

Everything this parliament has done is not wrong, and I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys upon his recent announcement regarding the choice of site for the construction of a $10 million telescope, which I believe is of national importance, This telescopic complex represents a tremendous memorial to the 1967 centennial celebration. The location of this site was decided after careful consideration and study by the scientists involved in the project, and I congratulate the minister and his government in this regard.

My criticisms are not directed toward the things brought forward by this government, but toward the manner in which it has brought them forward. Far be it from me to profess expert knowledge in many of the fields of legislation which have been and will be covered during this session, but I do feel that we should receive more expert advice regarding the problems with which we are faced. The legislation brought forward during the past 18 months has been submitted to this parliament without due study and preparation. As a result we have witnessed one blunder after another. We were promised 60 days of decision but instead we have observed 16 months of indecision.

Mr. Chairman, are we to witness further decisions of the same type which will not stand up to scrutiny and criticism? Is the government creating more problems? Let us find the answers to these questions before it is too late. Let us take a lesson from what has happened during the last 16 months and thereby avoid making the same errors. During the present session of parliament many federal-provincial conferences have taken place. While I think the principle behind these conferences should be encouraged, I believe more have been held during this session than during any other session in history. Perhaps that is an indication of uncertainty or insecurity on the part of the government.

What is the trouble with Canada? This is a country with unlimited opportunity, and I am sure no one will deny that fact. Under present circumstances can we not be a happy family? Why are we so divided at this time? I think our problem is one of misdirection. Let us stop pussyfooting, locate the trouble and cure it. We should stop treating the provinces and each other like sick children. More candy never cured a sick child. This is an adult nation, so let us be adult in our thinking. Separatism is a word which we should banish from our vocabulary.

Mr. Chairman, I am not alone in my thinking, and as support for my argument I should like to quote the sentiments expressed very well by Mr. Westell in the Toronto Globe and Mail of October 22. Mr. Westell was writing about the situation existing in Canada today and has stated:

> A whole new system of government appears to be emerging in Canada without conscious planning and with no one quite sure how it will end.

He then states:

> Prime Minister Lester Pearson calls the new system co-operative federalism—a phrase which has become a cliché and thus tends to conceal rather than reveal what is happening.
> The Canadian constitution provides in theory for a division of powers between the federal and provincial governments. But more and more, the two levels of authority are merging their fields of jurisdiction and making policy jointly.
> The extent to which this is happening is best seen in the extraordinary rapid development of federal-provincial consultation at the ministerial, or policy-making level.
> Mr. Pearson remarked in a casual aside recently that there were federal-provincial talks going on nearly every day. He was hardly exaggerating.
> Until his government took office last year, formal consultations between Ottawa and the provinces were rare. The prime minister and the premiers met about once every five years to renegotiate tax-sharing arrangements and there were occasional special conferences to deal with special problems, such as repatriating the constitution.

As I have said, this type of conference may be helpful and I do not think they should be discouraged, but let us be more adult in our thinking. Let us think at a higher and more important level. What did the last conferences really accomplish, and I refer to the one which has just concluded? What is the meaning of the proposed amendment to the so-called Fulton formula?

Mr. Chairman, I am not an authority on the technicalities of these things but I do know we must accept the statements of the authorities in these fields. The Minister of Justice should know what he is talking about, and I should like to quote from something he said on the C.B.C. This quotation has been referred to already here in this debate, but I think it is worth repeating. The following question was asked:

> If, for example, at any given time four provinces, or indeed more than four provinces, decided to delegate important powers to the federal government in the coming year, and that the province of Quebec, for its own reasons which we all understand, decided to retain these powers, would we not arrive at a kind of associate-state status for these two ethnic groups, two nations?

The Minister of Justice in reply to that question made the following statement:

> Up to a certain point, that is possible. Because in at least four important areas as, for example, property and civil rights, which is considered as almost sacred by the province of Quebec, it will be possible to have a delegation of power by seven or eight or nine provinces and thus, of course, for this end, there could be a distinction between Quebec and the other provinces, which would be at least a distinction in fact, if not in real status, because it would be the same constitution.

What does this mean? Does it mean that the provinces may expect to have jurisdiction over immigration? Does it mean they can expect to have jurisdiction over Indian ffairs? Does it mean that the provinces will have jurisdiction to override the recent federal-provincial conference on Indian affairs, concluded just last week? During that conference it was suggested that the Indians should use their own judgment as to whether they should stay under federal jurisdiction or opt out and fall within provincial jurisdiction. These are things that should be left to the experts. I do not think the majority of members of the house are qualified to decide these points.

Mr. Winch: Then why are you discussing them?

Mr. Willoughby: What am I discussing? I am trying to discuss the idea of bringing some degree of reason into the House of Commons and I hope I am being successful.

Mr. Rhéaume: Any more questions down there?

[Mr. Willoughby.]

Mr. Winch: You said these matters should be left to the experts. Then why are you discussing them?

Mr. Willoughby: If you will hear me out I think you will come to the same conclusion, and after that I hope I will hear what you have to say. We have further evidence of this situation of uncertainty in our midst and I think I should quote from another article in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 15 last which has reference to the constitutional problem. It refers to the supreme court ruling some time ago with regard to the jurisdiction of the provinces and the federal government, in which these words are found:

> "The powers of parliament and of the provincial legislatures are strictly limited by the British North America Act and cannot be enlarged even with the joint consent of parliament and with the legislatures. Jurisdiction cannot be conferred by consent. None of these bodies can be vested directly or indirectly with powers which have been denied them by the British North America Act and which, therefore, are not within their constitutional jurisdiction."

That was the ruling of the court. The article goes on to say:

> With this road blocked, the present government at Ottawa attempted a new approach. The idea was that affected governments should simply turn a blind eye to the court. It should be possible to get around the constitution by a cosy agreement that it was not there. This was attempted in the Eskimo case although the matter was confused by an unconvincing and shabby pretence that administration could be transferred while jurisdiction remained untouched.
> We now have a third approach which has at least the merit of honesty. The constitution is to be changed to make possible what was not possible before.
> The power of delegation to be conferred on parliament by the draft amendment will be restricted in two ways. It will have authority to delegate provided that at least four of the provinces have, prior to the enactment of the statute, consented to its operation. But this is followed by a rather curious alternative.

The article goes on to show how the situation becomes more and more confused. I ask this question, Mr. Chairman: Are we at the present time facing a fait accompli? Are the provinces to be given powers that may not serve the best interests of our country? Everyone agrees with the principle of bringing home the constitution. We are mature enough, I hope, to handle it. We have not been handicapped particularly by the fact that it has been in Great Britain and that we have had to apply to Great Britain for necessary amendments to the constitution. We have at least received fair play there. But our national dignity and pride have been hurt and I believe we all agree that the constitution should be brought back to our own country.

With regard to the question of the results of these alterations to the constitution, I think this is a matter that should be left entirely to the experts and certain questions must be answered before we proceed with the legislation about to be introduced into the house. As soon as it can possibly be done I believe the house should refer this matter to a committee for study. The finest experts in Canada should be brought before the committee to assure us that the constitutional amendments are in the best interests of everyone in this country, every province and the federal government.

I hope we will not let this matter go until it gets into the position where the Supreme Court of Canada has to hand down rulings with regard to whether the constitution is really valid. Now is the time for us to place this matter before a committee. We should not wait until the legislation is brought before the house because it will then be tossed around from party to party and from man to man. People like myself are not in any position to judge, and in my opinion we now have the opportunity to get away from the situation that arises when legislation is brought in, and then has to be taken out of the house and brought back in again in modified form before it is finally accepted. I think this is our opportunity to see that this most important piece of legislation is placed in the hands of a committee, where the finest experts in the country will be able to pass judgment on it. In my view this is in the interests of Canada's future, because I feel that the House of Commons must make provision for a most careful investigation.

This is not a partisan issue, Mr. Chairman. Our future depends on seeing to it that the alterations made are fair and safe. I say that now is the time to stop, look and listen and to see just what this legislation really means. Does the proposed transfer of powers really alter national control? Is the constitution in danger of being relegated to political expediency? These are things we want to find out. These are things we must know. Will parliament have the courage to refuse amendments when requested by certain provinces or will these matters have to be referred to the supreme court to find out whether or not the provinces are within their constitutional rights?

What does all this add up to? I would say it adds up to the fact that we should take steps immediately to bring about something that we know will be in the best interests of our country, something that will stand up to the criticism that is bound to come before these amendments to our constitution can be made. Let us have a committee study the matter as soon as it can possibly be arranged. If this is done I believe we will probably find that many of the criticisms we are hearing in regard to this matter may not be justified. I think we will probably find that what we are afraid of can be clarified without difficulty. In my opinion the original Fulton formula with these alterations will probably stand up in the House of Commons and we will find that it is satisfactory to all Canadians. If this course is followed I believe we can get the legislation through much more quickly, save a lot of the time of parliament and of the government and get ahead with what is best for our country.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, in today's debate considerable discussion has taken place regarding the constitution of Canada, commonly known as the British North America Act, and methods of repatriating and amending it. I want to take the opportunity for a few moments to discuss these points because in my province, indeed in the constituency I have the honour to represent, for the whole of this year we have as a community been celebrating the centennial of the first meeting of the Fathers of Confederation which took place in Charlottetown commencing on September 1, 1864. We in the maritime provinces are happy to celebrate the centennial of this occasion because we felt and still feel that the fondest dreams of the Fathers of Confederation who met in Charlottetown 100 years ago are within our grasp and that many of them indeed have already been achieved. After all, they met 100 years ago to weld together into a nation a few scattered colonies in what was then known as British North America. We can be proud of the success they achieved because if we consider the nations of the world as they existed at that time and especially the governments that dominated the face of Europe, we realize that most of them have changed their shape or have gone out of existence entirely during those one hundred years. Our dominion has survived and grown, and there is much of which Canadians can be proud in the achievements of the last 100 years.

The delegation that met originally in Charlottetown met for the purpose of considering the union of the maritime provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. However, they knew that their lieutenant governors had previously been asked by Lord Monck, who was then the governor general of the province of Canada, in a letter written earlier, if the province of Canada could send a delegation of observers to this conference. Those eight delegates arrived from what was then Canada, and their discussions were given priority in the Charlottetown meeting—that is, the discussion of the larger concept of the union of all the colonies of British North America. This was discussed for several days. There was agreement in principle as to the type of union that would be suitable. It was agreed that it should be a confederation, a federal state.

After these discussions had concluded, the conference that had met originally for the purpose of discussing maritime union, then turned to the first item on their agenda. In the light of the progress made in consideration of the wider suggestion, it was decided to postpone indefinitely any thought of union of the maritime provinces. Instead, the delegates from these three maritime provinces, plus the augmented delegation from Canada and two representatives of Newfoundland, met a little later at Quebec city and passed the Quebec resolutions, which became what we know as the British North America Act.

I believe, in retrospect, that the Fathers of Confederation made two unfortunate omissions from the things they agreed upon. In my judgment, one was that they neglected to devise a means of bringing the constitution to Canada, a repatriation of the British North America Act.

Mr. Lloyd: May I raise a point of order?

The Chairman: The hon. member for Halifax wishes to raise a point of order?

Mr. Lloyd: Earlier today in this debate on interim supply, Mr. Chairman, you cautioned the hon. member for Villeneuve to be mindful of the matter before the committee. You reminded him of the need to be relevant in the observations he was making. I suggest to you that the same general observations should apply to the speaker who is now addressing the committee.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I want to thank my good friend, the hon. member for Halifax, for bringing this to my attention, because if he follows my remarks he will find that shortly I will be relating what I said to the item before us, which is interim supply.

An hon. Member: This is 1964, not 1867.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): That is right; we are a country which came into being because of what took place in 1867, and in order to understand what we are I think it is only reasonable that we should review briefly what happened before.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. This afternoon you called me to order two or three times because my remarks did not bear directly upon the $740 million interim supply now before us.

Now, then, is the member who now has the floor speaking on the expenditures or the supply under study? He is speaking of 1867, while we are in the year 1964. If you remind him that we are now in 1964, I will agree with his remarks.

[Text]

The Chairman: It is certainly a good point that has been raised by the hon. member for Halifax and the hon. member for Villeneuve. From time to time during this debate the Chair has reminded hon. members who have participated in the debate that we have a specific resolution before us. The rules of the committee are that discussion in committee should be strictly relevant to the question at issue. What we are considering now is interim supply. Certainly hon. members cannot continue discussing theoretical questions. They have to relate their remarks specifically to government business. I assumed that the comments which have been made to this point by the member for Queens were perhaps laying a foundation for a future specific reference to the resolution before us. I would ask him to keep that in mind.

Mr. Byrne: I rise on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I am sure that unless Sir John A. Macdonald left some unpaid bills in Charlottetown 100 years ago, these remarks could not possibly be relevant.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): You are quite right, Mr. Chairman. I was saying, when I was interrupted, that I felt two areas in our constitution, as it now stands, have been of great concern to this session of parliament. We would not be in the state of disarray in which we are as a nation if these omissions had not been made. The first is, as I said, that no provision was made for bringing the constitution back to Canada. This is one of the things that is immediately concerning us. The second omission was the lack of a provision for national symbols in our constitution, so that changes therein could be made in a constitutional way.

In 1962, the ten provincial governments of Canada and the federal government, decided to create a memorial, which is still not paid for in its entirety, to these Fathers of Confederation. We should look for a minute, I think, at what the objectives of the day were as they apply to the present situation. I should like to quote briefly from one of the Fathers of Confederation:

> What we desire and wish is to defend the general interests of a great country and a powerful nation, by means of a central power.

This is a quotation from Hector Langevin. Then, I should like to quote from George Etienne Cartier:

> Shall we be content to maintain a mere provincial existence, when, by combining together, we could become a great nation?

As I have said previously, provision was made two years ago for this fine national memorial to the Fathers of Confederation, which happens to be located in my constituency as that is where they first met. At that meeting, and in subsequent meetings they laid down what should be the jurisdiction on the one hand of the federal government and on the other of the provincial governments. Now, before the memorial is completed, we find ourselves with a government which has the rather fatuous theory that you can have your cake and eat it, that every part can have its own way completely, independent of the whole.

We have a government that tries to create the impression that each province can go its own separate way and enjoy the narrow benefits which accrue from that course while at the same time enjoying all the benefits of unity. That these two things are possible is a fallacious theory. The two points are mutually exclusive. We need a fairly strong central government.

The repatriation of the British North America Act is something which has been desired by Canadians for many years. It is not a fact that our constitution has to be amended in Westminster because of a desire by the British government to hang on to some vestige of colonial power. Far from it; Britain would have been pleased to be rid of this anachronism years ago. The reason it was not repatriated was because the various segments which make up our great country did not always feel in concert that their interests would be safeguarded if a change were made, or at least they could not arrive at a formula which would guarantee them their own interests.

I for one welcome the repatriation of the British North America Act, but I would point out that at the recent federal-provincial conference other matters were introduced, and in the proposal we find not only the question of bringing the constitution to Canada but also the question of amendments which would provide a sort of floating jurisdiction between the federal government and the provincial governments. Changes in jurisdiction may be made without further amendment to the act, provided four provincial governments act in concert, and if they did I am sure they would not be resisted by a federal government as weak as this one, even though their action was not in the national interest. This concerns me deeply. For more than one reason we must have a strong federal government.

D. G. Creighton, the well known Canadian historian, speaking of the British North America Act and of the feelings of the Fathers of Confederation said:

> They had no desire whatever to break with Great Britain or to make any radical change in their own system of government. They firmly believed that constitutional monarchy, parliamentary institutions, and responsible government on the British model provided the best and freest political system in the world. All they had to do at Quebec was to recast these institutions in a federal form, but without giving too much power to the provinces and thus weakening the federation. They were convinced that it was "States' Rights" that had led to the American civil war. They must avoid the mistake of the Americans and make confederation a strong union with a predominant central government.

The federal government should also be strong in the area of its financial resources. When a number of colonies unite, the union is bound to be more beneficial to some than to others, and although on the whole it is beneficial to everyone the benefits that accrue to some will not be as great as accrue to others. Therefore there has to be a central government that can even things out a bit, and by subsidy guarantee a minimum standard of services in various things that are the responsibility of the provinces, so that a minimum is established which is the right of all people in the nation, in this case all the citizens of Canada, whether they live in Newfoundland, Quebec, Manitoba, B.C. or anywhere else. In my view it is essential that the financial resources of the central government be fairly strong, not only to fulfil the responsibilities which fall to it under the constitution, but also to provide this evening-out effect between the provinces that make up the nation.

I am greatly concerned with the proposal which emanated from the recent federal-provincial conference in that any consortium of four provinces can set upon the federal government and piecemeal take away part of its powers, this without any reference to the legislatures of the provinces which are not in accord with the procedure. These other provinces would have no voice in what was taking place except through their members of parliament in the House of Commons.

I have a question in my mind with regard to residual powers. As hon. members will remember, 35 years ago when the case of broadcasting came up this matter had not been contemplated by an earlier age, and the question arose as to whose jurisdiction applied. Such a thing will occur in the future and I wonder whether jurisdiction will automatically lie with the central government in the first instance.

It is unfortunate that during the last two years there has been an accentuation of discord and disharmony in this country, which was conceived with such great prospects for the future. As a nation we find ourselves disenchanted with our government. We find ourselves dismayed by some of its tactics. We find ourselves disconcerted with the lack of progress parliament is making because of the manner in which matters are placed before it. We have a great responsibility and it behooves us all to realize that at best we are only very temporary custodians of the nation's interests.

That being the case, our greatest responsibility is to improve the potential of what future generations of Canadians may inherit. We are, after all, still nation building and I think it behooves the government to raise its sights above petty, shortsighted, myopic political considerations of the moment and realize that this is a great country, deserving the services of great men. They should raise their sights and look to the future, realizing that their greatest responsibility is to future generations of Canadians.

We should remember that our actions should not be governed by the short term view of what may keep a government in power for a few weeks longer, or anything of that sort. We have the future of a nation to consider. I think I can best express what I am trying to say by quoting very briefly from John Ruskin's "Seven Lamps of Architecture", in which he says:

> Therefore, when we build, let us think that we build for ever. Let it not be for present delight, nor for present use alone; let it be such work as our descendants will thank us for, and let us think, as we lay stone on stone, that a time is to come when those stones will be held sacred because our hands have touched them, and that men will say as they look upon the labour and wrought substance of them, "See! this our fathers did for us".

I am—I was going to say disenchanted but that is not a strong enough word, Mr. Chairman—disgusted on occasion with the attitude of this government, even in the normal life span of a government, that has been given by the Canadian people the responsibility of conducting their affairs for a short period of time. I hope that in the future this government will realize that it has not been elected to power to govern for its friends, or to govern only its friends; but its responsibility is to the whole nation and to every Canadian.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of speaking tonight in this debate, but like all other members I realize that the Conservative party apparently, intends to somewhat gag the parliament of this country. In fact, we have been discussing for ten days estimates to the amount of $740 million which are before us, and for the past eight days we have been told behind the scene, here in this house, and almost everywhere, that nothing will be passed because the Conservatives have so decided.

They have been talking about the constitution, the flag, assistance to farmers, immigration, Indian affairs, in short about everything, but the Conservatives are not at all interested in the appropriations which are before us, which are already spent and which we must pay. According to what we read in the newspapers, and according to what we can see in this house, they are interested in a general election. And yet, if a general election were held probably half the present Conservative members in this house would be defeated.

What I find strange—

[Text]

Mr. Rhéaume: What about you?

Mr. Caouette: Never mind about me. I will be back here much faster than you will.

Mr. Rhéaume: You hope.

Mr. Caouette: I do not hope; I am sure of it.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who just interrupted me knows very well that he is in much greater danger of not coming back than the member for Villeneuve. He is quite aware of the fact. He knows perfectly well, too, that the debate now going on is nothing else but what, in the King's English, is called a filibuster on the supply motion brought forward by the government.

[Text]

Mr. Rapp: Didn't you say the same thing in 1963?

Mr. Caouette: Yes. I said it in 1962 also. And in so far as your party continues to act the way it does, I will be fighting you; don't worry about that.

Mr. MacEwan: We are awfully scared of you.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: We on this side of the house are not interested in protecting or siding with either of the old line parties. However, I will remind the Conservatives that they were in office one year and a half ago; indeed, they were in office for six years. A moment ago I saw the former minister of agriculture preparing to rise when I stood up and you gave me the floor.

What are the Conservatives doing now? They blame the party in office in regard to agriculture, labour, public works, mines, in short, in regard to every field. They were in office for six years; why did they not act differently from the government they are now blaming? Let us be consistent and logical with ourselves.

Mr. Chairman, we often hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) repeat that he is the right hon. leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition. However, let us keep in mind that not so long ago he was not the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, but the prime minister of the royal government of Canada.

The then prime minister was not very active in those days. When he was defeated by a majority vote in the House of Commons on February 4, 1963, it was through his own fault and not through that of others; everyone was asking him to take action and to present a budget, which he and his government had neglected to do for a couple of years. Today he sits on the opposition benches and he blames the government for failing to do what he neglected to do himself.

For the last eight or 10 days many matters, many questions have been discussed in this house, and no one seems to know exactly where we are heading. Some talk about immigration. A while ago, I heard a member, who has since left the chamber, talk about immigration and Indian affairs. Are we going to leave those matters to the provinces?

Others spoke about repatriating the constitution. They do not know what repatriating the constitution means; they do not know what we should do with the constitution.

As I said a week ago, all those who are attached to the British crown should have listened to the speech made in Quebec city by Her Majesty the Queen on the Saturday of her visit because she stated at the time that it is hardly surprising that a 100 year old constitution should be outdated.

Why always depreciate Canada as it now stands or as it could be?

A while ago I heard a Conservative—they are the only ones who speak but I manage to squeeze in a few words now and then—say that the province wants to control immigration. What is wrong with that? Would it not be normal for a province to keep track of the people who move into its territory and of those who move out and, if necessary, that it object to the admission of undesirable immigrants? If that were done by a province instead of by the federal government as at present, what would be wrong with that?

This does not mean that we will chase away from the provinces immigrants coming from any country whatsoever in the world. But if any Canadian province were forced to accept as an immigrant a man like Castro from Cuba, for instance, could you blame it for objecting?

First of all there is dissension among the Conservatives, that is as clear as day; they disagree amongst themselves. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer) was here a while ago, the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent) does not share his leader's views, nor has the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) shared them for a long time now, and the same goes for the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Valade), the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul), the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) now occupying his seat in the house, and the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) who spoke intelligently this afternoon in favour of a Canada for Canadians, not a bound Canada, a trapped Canada, an enslaved Canada, but a Canada belonging to Canadians. That hon. member was logical when he spoke thus. He was justified in calling for the adoption of a distinctive national flag. Of course, if he only represented the southern part of his riding he would say: "Any flag but a distinctive national flag." It is because Témiscamingue is in his constituency and some people there insist—

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Caouette: —that the hon. member should advocate a distinctive national flag.

Mr. Martineau: I feel flattered by the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve, but he is mistaken when he suggests that I would speak otherwise if I represented only one part of my riding. He is not in a position to make such an allegation and I am sure that, in all his usual fairness, he will not pursue that course.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I take due note of the explanation given by my very good friend, the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue. However, I know his riding, I would not say better than he does but at least as well because I once was the member for that riding. I know the difference between the northern and southern parts of that riding; I used to get a beating in the southern part and get elected in the northern part; the hon. member knows that.

However, should there be an election the hon. member is certainly interested in getting elected in the northern part of his riding without offending the southern part and, therefore, he is trying to run with the hare and to hunt with the hounds. That is his business, since I have nothing to do with that riding.

An hon. Member: A majority of one.

Mr. Caouette: Someone says that he was elected with a majority of one; it was not with the vote of the elector but the vote of the returning officer.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that I am straying far away from the subject matter of the debate at this time. The election of the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue has nothing to do with the $700 million expenditures which we are now considering.

I am also willing to record in Hansard that I have much admiration for the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue, that I respect him, and he knows that. We never exchanged cattish words. I would not wish tonight to start a battle which I am convinced he would lose in advance.

Mr. Chairman, we have heard all kinds of recriminations, all kinds of allegations, but what surprises me, I say it again, is seeing that the Conservatives seem to take a malicious pleasure, a pleasure that I should call sadistic, in forcing us to discuss for hours, for days on end, a supply motion for $740 million which nobody considers important.

Their objective is obvious; to prevent the legislation from being introduced and discussed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of each member of the Ralliement Créditistes, which I represent, I say: "We do not object to a debate on the legislation, but we strongly object to boycotting. If this boycotting was reasonable or had a commendable objective I would probably agree with the Conservatives at this time. But under the circumstances, everybody is tired. In hallways one meets Liberals and Conservatives who are tired and disgusted by the present attitude of certain members of the Conservative party. They are the ones who say: Introduce your legislation.

No opportunity is given to introduce legislation, but it is said: Introduce that legislation.

Mr. Chairman, people cannot be fooled like that forever. The flag question was mentioned. That matter will be discussed in due time. We had a meeting of the party leaders; we will have another one and the whole matter will probably be discussed at that time.

Why do Conservative members discuss the flag question again? We can discuss it, indeed. But what can we answer the people we meet on the streets in our ridings, in Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Montreal, in short, everywhere in Canada, who ask us: When will you settle this flag issue, so that we do not hear any more about it? You should settle important problems for Canada instead of wasting your time on the flag issue. That is what we hear all over Canada, not only in one province.

Then, they try, as they did last week, to pit the English against the French Canadians and make people believe that the province of Quebec wants special treatment in Canada; the Quebec people do not ask for special treatment, but for fair treatment in Canada; they want to be recognized as real Canadians entitled to the same advantages and benefits as other Canadians, and ready to face the same obligations.

That is what we ask.

Why do the Conservatives make us waste our time here? They will try in the province of Quebec—Mr. Chairman, I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) probably finds my remarks humorous; I am ready to discuss those same matters with him any time he may choose, in his own riding in Manitoba.

Mr. Chairman, we want justice to be done. But let us stop wasting tax money paid by the Canadian people. The Conservatives are the ones wasting the tax money paid in by Canadians who sweat and labour to make an honest and honourable living in Canada.

They do not want to stop, they go on with their filibuster. As far as I am concerned, I shall not indulge in filibuster any longer. Let them go on, let them talk, they are the only ones who want to take the floor.

I took the liberty of making these few remarks to indicate exactly who are those responsible for this intrigue work, this shameless parliamentary work which does honour to no Canadian, no matter his origin.

In the province of Quebec, we want action. In the other provinces, people also want action. It is not a policy of nuisance, aimed at preventing others from acting, that will give Canadians satisfaction.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Conservatives and I ask them to be more honest towards the Canadian people, more honest towards the Canadian taxpayers, so that we can pass these estimates as soon as possible and go on to legislation which will at last give more security to every Canadian citizen.

[Text]

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that you have listened with great interest to the Liberal member for Villeneuve who has just taken his seat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton: If ever we have heard a member preaching for a call, there it was.

The hon. member mentioned something about Quebec's wishes. I wonder whether he would do me the honour of recognizing that those who come from areas in other parts of Canada have just as many rights to their deep-felt traditions as do the people of Quebec. This involves a fundamental point. If we ever find in this country of minorities that a minority has its rights trampled upon, we expect every member in this House of Commons—on all sides of the house—to join in the defence of that minority. All that is happening in this parliament today is that a group of members of only one party are attempting to put before the Canadian people the fact that some feel the rights of a minority are being trampled upon.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak on this subject, but was provoked into doing so by the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve. I came here tonight to speak about the expenditure of $740 million. Each member of parliament has the right to refuse to vote supply to a government that is not meeting the wishes of parliament.

Mr. Lloyd: On the general estimates.

Mr. Hamilton: It is not only the right of an hon. member to do so—

An hon. Member: Go ahead and do it; let us vote.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Batten): Order, please. The Chair is having some difficulty hearing the hon. member.

Mr. Hamilton: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am sure if I am out of order at any time the hon. member for Halifax will object. I have listened to that type of objection on previous occasions and I am sure he will do so now if he thinks I am transcending the rules.

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. It is my right to object, on a point of order, and I will exercise that privilege whenever in my considered judgment the situation calls for such an objection, and I do not need the hon. member to indicate when I should object. I have only risen on a point of order twice during the present session. He and his associates have taken up the best part of 72 days to obstruct, and to insist upon what he proposes should be put to the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Stand up and take a bow.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member's sensitivity speaks for itself.

Mr. Skoreyko: That is the first speech he has made in the house.

Mr. Hamilton: The reason I feel we should not vote supply in this house at the present time is that those who sit opposite are not the successors of the Fathers of Confederation of this nation, but are the fathers of deconfederation.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Hamilton: One of the most pronounced feelings expressed by the people across this country is of deep disturbance. This disturbance is being covered not only by the flag issue, but by a whole series of events. We are in the middle of preparing to celebrate our centennial in honour of the Fathers of Confederation, but by the actions of this government over the last 18 months we are making a mockery of all that the Fathers of Confederation sought to achieve.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hamilton: Tonight I intend to use the words of the Liberal members, not only in this house but in many other places across Canada, to show the type of confusion which exists. One cannot overlook the existing rights of the people of Newfoundland, British Columbia, Quebec or Ontario, or any other province. One cannot overlook the concern of residents of Canada for what has been happening. The purpose of bringing this country together 100 years ago was to join together as one nation, to do what could not be done by six, seven or eight separate colonies.

Mr. Habel: You cannot do that by division, as you are attempting today.

Mr. MacEwan: Read your paper, Joe. Look at the sports page.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I hear a voice that rasps from disuse talking about division.

Mr. Woolliams: Isn't that terrible.

Mr. Hamilton: One hundred years ago we joined together for defence, for political reasons and above all to raise our economic standards.

Mr. Regan: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hamilton: When I am finished the hon. member for Halifax can make his own speech.

Mr. Regan: It would be much more timely now.

Mr. Winkler: Is that the junior or the senior member for Halifax?

Mr. Regan: Will the hon. member not agree—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I think the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has indicated that he does not wish to receive any questions.

Mr. Regan: He is afraid to answer.

Mr. Hamilton: These hon. members do not want me to read what I am going to read tonight because it is the mark of division of this country that I brand them with. I said a moment ago that we are not satisfied to let these people facing us tear this country asunder. One hundred years ago we did not form a unitary government, we did not form a confederate government, we formed a federal state.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Hamilton: And with respect to those matters over which the federal government has jurisdiction every Canadian owes his loyalty to the federal government and to the federal government alone. When we hear this divisive nonsense being uttered at this time by so-called responsible ministers it makes us in the opposition wonder whether we can vote supply to such a government.

The situation confronting us is not unknown in our history. In any federal state there is always a tug-of-war between the central power and the provincial powers, because no matter how carefully you try to draft the respective jurisdictions there will always be overlapping and conflict. In our history we have seen power shift from one side to the other. We have seen a period when the provincial governments became stronger and the federal government became weaker. We have seen a period when the federal government became stronger and the powers of the provinces were reduced. One of these periods was from 1935 to 1957 and if you go back over our history you will see that there was good reason for it. In order to meet the challenge of the depression the people of Canada were quite willing for the federal government to assume extra powers to try to bring the whole strength of the nation to grapple with the very serious economic difficulties. During the war there was a tremendous expansion of the federal power and I believe all Canadians were glad to see this power assumed by the federal government so that we could prosecute the war with maximum effectiveness.

Following the war there was a period of rehabilitation, but the tendency to centralize did not stop with the end of the rehabilitation period. It continued, and there is no doubt that in the latter years of the Liberal government which was in power from 1935 to 1957 the Conservative party began to object to this centralization on the ground that it was not so necessary, and on the ground that it was being pushed beyond the point of good sense.

When the government changed in 1957 the new Conservative government tried to strengthen the provinces financially. This was done by increasing their share of federal revenues from three direct taxes. It was done by increasing the grants and by increasing the number of joint programs. All these things were done to strengthen the ability of the provinces to carry out their responsibilities within their jurisdictions. This program cost the federal government almost twice as much as was spent in 1956-57. It is a matter of common knowledge that there would not have been a single deficit in the period 1957 to 1963 if it had not been for our trying to strengthen the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hamilton: In arranging the distribution of the revenues between the federal and provincial governments there was none of this take it or leave it attitude at the conferences. We consulted with the provinces, listened to their case and tried to do the best job we could do for them.

Take a look at the things we did. When we moved into those areas where there was concurrent jurisdiction and into those areas which were strictly provincial in jurisdiction we were scrupulously careful not only to consult with the provinces but to get agreement. I give as evidence of this—

Mr. Byrne: The Columbia river treaty?

Mr. Hamilton: —the resources for tomorrow conference. I give as evidence of this the negotiations in regard to the Columbia river treaty. We set up a joint liaison committee between the federal government and the province of British Columbia. The Liberals had been unable to do anything since 1944 with regard to the development of the Columbia, but we got the Columbia agreement moving forward. We carried the support of the government of British Columbia every step of the way. The minutes of that joint committee are available for ministers of the crown to read. This is one of the best examples of a federal government with power over an international river co-operating with the owner of the resource, the province of British Columbia.

I give as another example the joint programs we embarked upon where the provincial governments were consulted not only singly but together until we got agreement all across the country. There was none of this uproar we have today. I give, for example, the ARDA program. So far as agriculture is concerned the ARDA program was within the jurisdiction of the federal government, but because it moved into areas which were under the jurisdiction of the provinces there was very careful consultation and agreement. All during the tremendous amount of action that took place to get at the problems facing Canada there was not a serious quarrel with any province.

An hon. Member: Just among the ministers.

Mr. Tardif: Nobody gets into a quarrel when he does not do anything.

Mr. Hamilton: Never in the history of federal government was so much done in so short a space of time as we did it. But what happened in 1963 when the new government came into power?

Mr. Woolliams: Calamity.

Mr. Hamilton: Without any consultation with the provinces, without any agreement with the provinces, the federal government rushed into the Canada pension plan, into the Department of Industry legislation, into university scholarships and so on.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the matter with them?

Mr. Hamilton: Every one of these things was an invasion of provincial rights.

Mr. Benidickson: What is the matter with them?

Mr. Hamilton: Not only was there strong objection from the provinces but there was such an uproar all across the country that the government turned in panic and confusion and began the greatest retreat since Napoleon left Moscow. The government has moved into its old policy of centralization and I ask you, Mr. Chairman, why? There may be two reasons. First, eight members of the new government were ex-civil servants indoctrinated with civil service ideas and they wanted to follow the old fashioned policy of encroaching on provincial rights. More important than that is the second reason. The second reason was that in the new government there was a new group of men who believed in their own writings as the gospel, and that the only way to govern the country was by planning and interference with the affairs of business in this country.

Mr. Benidickson: Barry Goldwater.

Mr. Hamilton: These planners got on the treasury benches. Read what the Gordon commission report says. Read what the present Minister of Finance said in his Kingston paper of 1960. Read that book, "Mein Kampf".

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Hamilton: You will find that all those things that came about in the budget were mentioned prior to that time in these documents. These people who came into power tried to plan and direct the economy under the guise of a protective nationalism. This is the reason for the policy of the federal government of interfering with provincial rights. The reaction of the provinces was so strong—

Mr. Benidickson: I want to know if that is the Progressive Conservative defence.

An hon. Member: It is nice to see the minister of mines here.

Mr. Hamilton: —that the federal government fell back and followed up this panic by one of the longest retreats we have ever seen. As a matter of fact, so great was the confusion going into the year 1964 that they had to think of something to avoid this powerful public confrontation, not only between Quebec and the federal government but between all the provinces and the federal government, that they dragged in the flag issue to try to cover up.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Has the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) the right to try to incriminate the province of Quebec at this stage of the discussion by stating unceasingly "Quebec with Ottawa, Quebec versus the other provinces"?

Is the hon. member unable to prove himself purely and simply a Canadian who speaks on behalf of his party for Canada and not only in the name of one province?

[Text]

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member's translation system was not working too well. I made it very clear that this reaction from the provinces was a reaction from all the provinces and not only from Quebec. I am actually trying to point out that Quebec is not the culprit in this matter. I am trying to say that the provinces had their rights infringed during the first three or four months of the new Liberal government régime, and so strong was the reaction that the federal government retreated to such a point that they are scattering to the four winds. The people of this country, in Quebec and every other province, are concerned about what is happening. It is for this reason I am concerned about these petitions that are beginning to come before us and I am wondering if we should even vote supply to keep this government in power any longer.

I should like to start by quoting from a speech the Prime Minister made which is reported in a well known Liberal newspaper, the Winnipeg Free Press for Tuesday, October 27. The speech by the Prime Minister dealt with the subject of co-operative federalism, and the portion I wish to quote is in quotation marks:

> It means that the federal—the central—government should not enter provincial fields without the willing consent of the provinces; that in all matters over which jurisdiction is shared in the constitution, the federal government should co-operate closely with the provinces; in some cases, and always by agreement, taking on the responsibility for action; in others, again by agreement, leaving that responsibility to the provinces; in still others, sharing both the responsibility and the action.

Then, this Liberal writer says, and I quote:

> This is a bit hazy, but if it means what it seems to mean, questions are surely in order.

Then, this writer goes on to deal with another minister in this article and quotes what the minister said in the House of Commons. I am taking the liberty of quoting from the article rather than from the Hansard report. I was present in my place when this answer was given to an hon. member to my right. This is what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said, and this was two days after the Prime Minister's speech:

> It is not only unusual but I might say rather improper for a federal government to request heads of provincial governments to approve either in advance or concurrently what is wholly federal legislation.

Here we have one minister saying it is even improper to discuss a matter with the provinces, while the Prime Minister is laying down all the conditions for consultation, for action and responsibility. This contradiction is causing confusion for more reasons than would appear on the surface. We have other people out making speeches. One is a Quebec minister who went across to Europe and spoke about what is happening at the present time. This is the man who won fame and fortune as the head of the Montreal stock exchange, Mr. Kierans. I will read his little statement:

> The federal government...is running superfluous ministries of industry, agriculture, resources and fisheries—

Not only does Mr. Lesage say the federal members from Quebec are superfluous, but here is one of his ministers saying that four federal departments are superfluous.

Mr. Regan: What did you say in China?

Mr. MacEwan: He said that the junior member for Halifax should be quiet.

Mr. Hamilton: If the hon. member who represents a port city would do a little more to encourage trade where trade possibilities are, he would be a help to this country.

The Chairman: Order, please; the two hon. members for Halifax are rising on points of order.

Mr. Lloyd: I should like to have the name and date of the newspaper from which the hon. member is quoting.

Mr. Woolliams: Take the gum out of your mouth so you will look like a member of parliament.

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Halifax on a point of order.

Mr. Lloyd: I believe it is the privilege of members to speak in this house. If there is any point an hon. member wishes to discuss or any question concerning this parliament, if the hon. member will be honest enough to state his proposition in such a way that he cannot run and hide but will state his proposition on any platform anywhere, I will be happy to take him on.

Mr. Regan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member has suggested that I do not concern myself with the proper interests of the port of Halifax. I would only suggest in answer that if he did as good a job for the prairies as I do for Halifax he would be well off.

Mr. MacEwan: We will quote that.

The Chairman: Order; these are not proper points of order. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle should continue.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that by now you must be used to this high level of interruptions that occur. I think when the people of these constituencies read the high intellectual level of the interruptions made by their members, these members will not be back.

I was speaking about a Quebec minister who holds the view that we have no right—

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I rise—

Mr. MacEwan: Look who has come out of the bulrushes.

Mr. Byrne: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure the house will agree with me that I have a legitimate point of order. I should like to refer to Beauchesne, citation 157, paragraph (6), which reads:

> The rule is quite clear, that the quoting of a newspaper, an author or a book which reflects upon debate before the house, either directly or indirectly is entirely out of order, because members are here to give their own opinion and not to quote the opinion of others.

At the outset of his remarks, the hon. member said that a large part of his speech was going to be taken up with newspaper quotations. I think at this point, Mr. Chairman, we should have a ruling. There is no doubt about it the hon. member is completely out of order when he reads at length from newspapers and quotes those who have no responsibility as representatives in the House of Commons.

The Chairman: The point of order raised is a legitimate point to the extent that the newspaper articles from which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has been quoting may reflect upon a debate before the house. I did not notice, however, that there was a reflection to any extent on actual debate in the house in the quotations used by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, and I think he should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Byrne: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the debate that is taking place is one that has been chosen by hon. members themselves, dealing with repatriation of the constitution. The hon. member having introduced the debate, when he introduces quotations from those outside the house he is, in my contention, abrogating the rules of the house and should cease and desist from such practice.

Mr. Hamilton: In the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, my sympathy goes out to you.

There is not too much time for me to finish my remarks but I want to make my point doubly clear. At the beginning I said that of all the things that were disturbing the Canadian people today the worst was the confusion in high places here in Ottawa. At first they thought the government was overcentralizing. Now it is not even holding the positions that have been traditionally held and as a result, more important than any one other issue, monetary or political, the people of the country want it held together as one country.

However, we have all these different theories, some of which would mean that the federal government would be left with almost no power. Such statements are being made by people in high places in the Liberal party, and there is no correction from the Prime Minister. There is no correction from any spokesman for the government. If any government ever needed a respite it is this one so that its members could get together and learn each others' first names, and find out what the course is, instead of one going this way, the other going that way and all the little ones scattering in every direction.

This is not only a schizophrenic government. This is a government gone completely mad, and because of this uncertainty in high places why should we vote it supply? Does it deserve this $740 million? Does it not think it should come in here and clear up these difficulties that are disturbing the nation? Why should we give it two months supply? There are big issues involved. For two or three years a situation has been developing in the province of Quebec and across the nation, but especially in that province where 83 per cent of the farmers get less than $2,000 a year. Who is going to stand up in this chamber and defend the people of Quebec?

An hon. Member: Balcer.

Mr. Hamilton: The people of Quebec are being bypassed. The same thing is happening in Quebec today that happened in my province and in Alberta 30 years ago. Indeed I suspect that not too long from now you will find knocking at the doors of this parliament building several hundred, if not several thousand farmers from Quebec asking, "What are you doing about our problems?" All we get is this double talk.

It is said that all we want is a flag with one maple leaf on it. What will that do to help the farmers not only of Quebec but all through the Ottawa valley, and all through northern Ontario, through New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland? I have been there and I have seen their problems. Just walk down the streets of Montreal today and try to explain to those people how happy they will be now that they have got a flag that is coloured red, with nothing of their religious background or traditions displayed on it. What a mockery this is.

Why should we vote $740 million to a government that allows these conditions to continue? This government has allowed all the policies we initiated to die on the vine and fade away. Why not ask the Canadian people if this double talk is what they want? We did not bring the flag into the house. It was not in the speech from the throne. It was brought in by the Prime Minister, and he has to take it out.

Who wants a flag when the weakness we have is due to the fact—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member's time expired about three minutes ago and the Chair allowed him those extra minutes in order to take interruptions into account.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle has expressed a good many views which I am sure are unanimously held on this side of the chamber, unless you want to count the leader of the Liberal party in the far corner. He expresses most of the sentiments which are agreed to by the government—or perhaps it might be the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, because they voted for his flag.

The Chairman: Right at the outset, and before the hon. member calls it ten o'clock, I would invite him to relate his remarks to the resolution before the committee.

Mr. Bigg: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the house is expectantly awaiting some announcement from the house leader that will be of importance to the people of Canada. Has he anything for us tonight?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the most important announcement to be made is that when interim supply is dealt with by the house we will go on with other business. When we reach that happy stage tomorrow we propose to submit the redistribution bill for consideration by the house, and if that is disposed of by the house we will then call the hours of labour legislation.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 3, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

FISHERIES

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING KILLING OF SEALS

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I have stated on several occasions in reply to questions by hon. members that all aspects of Canadian sealing operations conducted off the east coast of Canada were being carefully examined with a view to bringing more restrictive regulations into effect before the next sealing season starts next March. I am pleased to be able to inform the house that new regulations to conserve the seal stocks and to ensure the use of humane methods were passed by order in council P.C. 1964-1663 on Thursday, October 29.

In view of the interest shown by many hon. members I wish to outline a few details of the new amendments to the existing seal protection regulations.

During the sealing season of March and April, 1964 newspapers and television stressed that very young seals were taken in this fishery and were killed with clubs. Unfortunately the inhumane aspects of the fishery were exaggerated by giving prominence to the few instances when inexperienced hunters did not kill the seal with the first blow. Hundreds of letters and petitions of protest were received from interested individuals and societies in Canada and the United States.

A month or two later another storm of protest arose when an erroneous article appeared in a German weekly newspaper which was widely reprinted by other European papers and, more recently, by certain Canadian newspapers. Indignation was aroused because the article stated that the seal herds off the east coast of Canada had declined from 20 million to 1 million animals during the last two years. The estimates of our scientists, based on aerial surveys and tagging experiments conducted for many years, indicate that the decrease has been from 3 million to 1¼ million animals over a ten year period. The feelings of humane persons were shocked by the statement that the animals were deliberately skinned alive in order to produce a more beautiful pelt. This statement was completely without basis.

Because of the widespread public concern I instructed officials of my department to examine all aspects of the seal fishery, including the considerable body of scientific evidence on the condition of the stocks, the effectiveness of the current seal protection regulations and their enforcement, and the methods used in commercial sealing operations. A meeting was then held in Moncton on May 20 with representatives of the Canadian sealing industry to discuss proposals to amend the seal protection regulations. A draft of the new regulations was prepared, and this was discussed again with industry representatives at a meeting in Ottawa on October 1. I then invited representatives of the major Canadian conservation and humane societies to meet with me on October 14 to obtain their views on the draft regulations. Careful consideration was given to all the views expressed by the representatives of these various interests.

The new regulations provide for much stricter control both to conserve the seal herds and to ensure against inhumane practices. To give better control over sealing operations, all vessels over 30 feet and all aircraft used in sealing will now require licences, as will all the seal fishermen they carry. As a conservation measure, the season for licensed vessels and aircraft will be shorter both in the gulf of St. Lawrence and in outer areas. To protect the mature females, which are most important for the maintenance of the herds, the killing of adults is now prohibited in the so-called breeding patches where the seals have their pups. To reduce waste it will be required for the first time that all seals killed in any one day must be landed ashore or on the sealing craft that same day.

The new regulations limit the use of aircraft for transporting sealers or skins to the gulf of St. Lawrence south of 50 degrees north, where their use is now well established, and in this area the number of young harp seals taken by vessels and aircraft will be limited to 50,000. This is an important new measure. To reduce inhumane practices the new regulations require that the clubs used be long and heavy enough to kill at one blow, and that no seal shall be skinned before it is dead. The use of set lines with hooks for catching seals is also prohibited.

I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that these measures will assure the maintenance of the seal herds and will go a long way to reduce inhumane practices and waste. I wish to assure the house, however, that my department will maintain the closest possible surveillance of the seal fishery so that, if necessary, further restrictions can be put into force. During the coming season commencing early in March, 1965, our patrol of sealing operations by land, sea and air will be greatly intensified to assure that the regulations are observed. The results will be carefully studied.

At the request of major Canadian conservation and humane societies I shall provide an opportunity for representatives of these societies to visit the site of sealing operations and obtain first hand knowledge. After the 1965 season it is proposed to hold further discussions on the regulation of the fishery both with the industry and with the humane societies.

I firmly believe, Mr. Speaker, that these measures will maintain the seal herds and permit the Canadian industry to develop in an orderly manner. This industry is very important to many coastal communities dependent on the resources of the sea.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be general satisfaction with the announcement made by the minister, although I was somewhat surprised that he went out of his way to criticize various Canadian newspapers which in the interests of the preservation of humane methods of killing gave publicity to what was apparently gross cruelty among certain sealers though not by any means the majority of those who participate in sealing.

I want to say, too, that what is set forth in the announcement is further evidence of the beneficial effects of public opinion when aroused. All over this nation men and women in all provinces were asking for action. I am glad that action has been taken, and also that in the regulations now to be promulgated provision will be made for conservation so the industry may flourish and expand while at the same time ostracizing everything in the nature of cruelty.

[Mr. Robichaud.]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Fisheries a question to clarify an aspect of the welcome statement he made regarding sealing regulations. Is it anticipated that nationals of other countries will be excluded from hunting seals in the gulf of St. Lawrence? Will the coordinates under the legislation that was passed be established in time, and will this have the effect of excluding all nationals from sealing in the gulf of St. Lawrence and other national waters? Second, what initiative is the Canadian government taking with regard to the general problem of the conservation of the seal herds as far as sealing on the high seas is concerned?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the first question I wish to assure the hon. member and all hon. members of this house that there will be no discrimination in so far as Canadian or foreign vessel operators are concerned; in other words, all foreign vessels will be subject to the Canadian regulations. In connection with the effect these further regulations will have on operations outside the gulf of St. Lawrence, this matter, as I have stated before in the house, is under consideration by ICNAF. New regulations have been suggested for discussion. They have already been ratified by a certain number of countries, but I understand that more countries are going to accept these regulations so that we can make them effective according to the ICNAF terms of reference.

I may also add that in so far as the operation of foreign vessels in the gulf of St. Lawrence is concerned, they will be subject to the implementation of the law of the sea.

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether regulations have yet been made to govern the use of helicopters in the seal hunt?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear in my statement that helicopters were affected by the new regulations.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

RECOVERY OF CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP BY LORD THOMSON OF FLEET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State and I should also like to draw this question to the attention of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that, as reported in this morning's Globe and Mail, the premier of Quebec, Hon. Jean Lesage, has accepted a decoration, namely the Grand Cross of the Royal Order of the Phoenix, from His Majesty King Constantine of Greece, and presumably the premier of Quebec is retaining his Canadian citizenship, can the minister inform the house whether Lord Thomson of Fleet, who accepted an honour from Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, will now be permitted to recover his Canadian citizenship?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I will be pleased to look into this matter.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM OF COMMENT ON ROYAL VISIT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Is the minister aware that, according to an editorial in yesterday's l'Action Catholique, the C.B.C. refused to present or produce a program on which Mr. Lorenzo Paré had been invited to express his views on the occasion of the Queen's visit to Quebec City? The C.B.C. claimed that the subject was too controversial but, on the other hand, they invited Mr. Berque, from France, whose program was recorded at the Palais Montcalm last October 2, to describe to Quebec the beauties of the separatist-communist revolution.

Is the Secretary of State aware of those facts?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the instructions given to me by the house itself, it is not in order to comment upon statements made in newspapers.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Could the minister inquire of the C.B.C. authorities as to which Montreal clique, within the corporation, decided not to present an interview with newspapermen on the occasion of the Queen's visit in the province of Quebec, under the excuse that the matter was too controversial, while at the same time the same clique gave to a notorious communist the opportunity to be heard over the C.B.C.?

Would the minister inquire about the reasons behind such action and then tell the house what is going on in the C.B.C.?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to get the information for the hon. member and the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DELAY IN APPROVAL OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAMS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether he is in a position to answer the question I put to him yesterday.

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In reply to the question raised by the hon. member concerning the municipal winter works incentive program, a number of municipalities which have projects on which they are ready to start work have been unable to submit their applications to the provincial governments and to the federal Department of Labour by the commencement date, November 1. As a result the total number of applications received this year is less than last year.

To help meet this situation the provinces are being informed that applications, covering acceptable projects, received in the Department of Labour by November 9 will be accepted with effect from November 1, and if this date does not give complete satisfaction consideration will be given to a later date.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell the house why approval of those municipal loans was delayed?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think the delay has resulted from the processing of the forms which had to be translated and sent out anew this year. This may have caused the delay which we are attempting to meet by this particular method.

REQUEST THAT PENDING LEGISLATION BE CONSIDERED BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with a matter that has been raised on a number of occasions, namely the request of the truckers across Canada who operate in interprovincial trade to have the question of the labour code submitted to a committee so that an opportunity will be available to them, and to such other industries as the wheat pools, to press for their exemption from the code when the rate of pay of their workers is over $1.25 an hour. I may say the truckers' average rate of pay is $2.90 an hour.

Again representations have been made to me asking that these people be given an opportunity to make their views known. In view of the fact that we have brought this to the attention of the Minister of Labour on a number of occasions I would ask the Prime Minister, in the interests of all Canadians, that this matter be permitted to come before a committee so that evidence might be placed before it to support the request of these two organizations and of others who believe they should not be subject—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —to the provisions of the labour code providing their rate of payment is $1.25 an hour or more.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): It was only yesterday that the Minister of Labour said this matter was under consideration. Meanwhile I can assure the right hon. gentleman that the representations which have been received from the organizations in question have been given very careful consideration indeed.

PICTOU COUNTY, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ACTION TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry. I should like to ask the minister whether he has received a telegram from the president of the united steel workers of America, local 4702, Pictou, Nova Scotia, regarding the possibility of a naval refit to help out the unemployment situation in that area. If so, has the government decided on something in this regard, or will this request be taken into consideration?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have received a telegram, a copy of which the hon. gentleman has read. We are now exploring any possibility there may be to help out the situation at Pictou.

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT FOR MEN TO BE LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry concerning the economic livelihood of a number of my constituents. Is he able to report any successful efforts relative to securing an alternative source of employment for the men at the Enamel Heating plant at Charlottetown, whose present work contracts are soon to terminate?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as a result of efforts made by the Department of Defence Production arrangements have been made to provide the necessary base load of work for Enamel and Heating Products Company to enable them to compete successfully in the production sharing program with the United States. This arrangement has been and is working out quite satisfactorily, and I think the workers of Enamel and Heating should be rather pleased at what has been done in this direction.

PRESS RELEASES ON WINTER WORKS IN ENGLISH ONLY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Lapointe, may I advise him that there is a weekly summary of press releases sent to both French and English language newspapers. We have attempted to keep this list up to date and observe it meticulously. If there is a newspaper to his knowledge which is not receiving these bulletins in the appropriate language and he draws the situation to my attention, I will be glad to remedy it.

TRADE

SUGGESTED VISIT TO MAINLAND CHINA BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that one of the senior ministers of the U.K. government has visited mainland China to discuss trade matters with the Chinese government, would the Minister of Trade and Commerce consider doing the same thing?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I am under the same disability as my hon. friend when he was a minister. He did not go to China either. However, I have had some discussion with my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and in view of the special relations or lack of relations that exist between the two countries I would have to be guided by his general policy in this respect. This does not necessarily rule out a visit, but the situation would have to be looked at very carefully before a minister of the crown, whether myself or someone else, would go.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISTRIBUTION OF APPLES TO MARK NATIONAL APPLE MONTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. V. Pugh (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, may I direct attention to the fact that November is national apple month. I know it is not necessary to address a question to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the minister of national health on the importance of our apple production, its value as an export and money maker for Canada, the apple's prime health giving qualities and its great enjoyment in eating, for these are well known. And, Mr. Speaker, may I say in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, that the apples distributed today to hon. members, senators and members of the press gallery are of the famed B.C. variety known as "Delicious," and a delicious reminder that November is national apple month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Inquiries of the Ministry

STATEMENT AS TO FRENCH EDITION OF GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE DIRECTORY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer a question which the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) asked me some time ago concerning the date of publication of the French version of the telephone directory of the government of Canada.

I am informed that this directory will be ready within three weeks and that steps have been taken to ensure that in the future both editions be printed at the same time.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State.

Can he tell us why, this year, the French telephone directory will be printed six months after the English directory? Can he also give us the reasons for this unwarranted delay?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the English version was sent to the translation bureau too late. Furthermore, despite all our efforts at the present time, the translation bureau is overloaded with work.

Mr. Grégoire: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the fact that the translation bureau is overloaded with work, does the minister intend to increase the personnel of the federal translation bureau?

Mr. Lamontagne: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I will have supplementary information on this subject for the hon. member for Lapointe and for the house when the estimates of my department are discussed.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Could he tell the house whether the delayed publication of the telephone book is due to the fact that members of the Ralliement Créditiste systematically refuse to pay their phone bills?

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Lotbinière has just mentioned the fact that members of the Ralliement Créditiste systematically refuse to pay their phone bills.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I must say that I rise on a question of privilege on behalf of most members. We protest against the fact that we are being asked to adopt measures in the house and that the government fails to implement them afterwards.

In addition, the committee on procedure and organization has recommended that those phone bills be paid; now, the government has ignored this recommendation and still refuses to implement a measure already passed by the house on two occasions.

We do not refuse to pay those telephone bills, but we feel that the government should implement measures adopted by the house.

REPORTED PRESSURE ON DISTRICT RETURNING OFFICERS TO RESIGN

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Could he check with the chief electoral officer whether it is true that Liberal organizers have brought pressure to bear upon district returning officers to force them to resign?

I would ask the Secretary of State to seek information from the chief electoral officer and to report to the house.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I doubt very much that there is any basis to the accusation implied in the question, but I will be glad to secure that information.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

When we ask the Secretary of State to check whether our information is correct, he does not have the right to say that we are making implications or accusations. That is dishonest on the part of the minister.

I have the right to ask the minister to get information—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member for St. Mary would care to rephrase his question, because it seems to me it contains certain allegations which should be substantiated by facts.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Secretary of State.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

[Translation]

Could the Secretary of State inquire from the chief electoral officer whether pressure was brought to bear upon the returning officers so that they would resign from their jobs?

Mr. Lamontagne: I shall be pleased to obtain this information, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEDURE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as chairman of the house's internal economy commission.

Does the minister intend to take action with respect to the report of the special committee on procedure and organization and more particularly concerning report No. 12 or 13, which was unanimously carried by the house and which deals with telephone, telegram and telecommunication expenses?

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I am not aware precisely what the hon. member has in mind, but if he is referring to the right of members to have their long distance telephone bills paid I would point out that under the legislation applicable this could only be done with the approval of the house, and that the commissioners of internal economy have not brought forward any submission on that subject for approval by the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Has the President of the Privy Council read the report of the special committee on procedure and organization which received the unanimous approval of the House of Commons, recommending the implementation of Bill No. C-91, passed last year, which provided that telephone expenses incurred by members be paid by the internal economy commission?

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

ASSISTANCE TO PROPOSED WEST INDIES FEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, arising out of an article which appeared in this morning's edition of the Toronto Globe and Mail to the effect that a new West Indies federation has been agreed upon by seven of these British colonies, including Barbados. Does the government intend to convey to Britain and to the seven colonies concerned Canada's special interest in this project, and does the government intend to offer special aid to the fledgling nation once it achieves federation, since Canada's relations with the proposed new nation should be closer than those with any other country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Canada has noted with great interest the formation of this federation and has already expressed in a message its best wishes and congratulations. I would call the attention of my hon. friend to the increase in Canada's external aid program which is designed to provide greater assistance to the Caribbean area.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF FAMILY OF FORMER DOMINICAN REPUBLIC OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. On the C.B.C. news last night there was a story to the effect that Mrs. Espaillat, the wife of the ex-security chief of the Dominican republic, is being asked to leave Canada by tomorrow midnight. As I understand it, her visitor's visa expires November 20 and she has been given no reason why she has to leave tomorrow. I wonder whether the minister could explain to the house and the country the reason for the sudden desire to deport Mrs. Espaillat and the three children who are attending school in Montreal.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Espaillat was deported from the country several months ago while Mrs. Espaillat remained in Canada with her children provided she would herself look after her departure for Portugal. She obtained from Portugal a visa providing for her entry into Portugal until the beginning of November and it was essential, in order to maintain the unity of that family, for Mrs. Espaillat and her children to join Mr. Espaillat before the said visa expired.

I was informed this morning that the Portuguese government was willing to extend Mrs. Espaillat's visa until next spring so that her children could at least complete the school year they have started in Ottawa. I am now reconsidering the case in the light of that new development.

ONTARIO—MOVEMENT OF SKILLED WORKERS FROM HONG KONG AND JAPAN

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether it is true that Canada will bring over 15,000 workers from Hong Kong and Japan in order to meet an acute shortage of manpower, as stated by Mr. Stanley John Randall, minister of economic development of Ontario?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the report is true. I did read it in the newspapers, and I have no doubt that if Mr. Randall, when he returns to Canada, has any proposals of this kind to make he will take them up with the proper federal authorities.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—MEETING WITH MINISTER RESPECTING MILK POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister tell the house whether he has met lately with the Quebec provincial minister of agriculture, Mr. Courcy, concerning a new milk policy?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I met the minister of agriculture and his officials a week ago today.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Is he in a position to announce a federal-provincial agreement intended to improve the situation of the dairy industry?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: Not at the moment, Mr. Speaker. When we are it will be announced in the usual way in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Does the Minister of Agriculture intend to consider the policy which was in effect before his appointment to the office of minister of agriculture, a policy which was satisfactory for farmers?

[Text]

TURKEYS—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MAINTAIN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, while we are on the subject of agriculture I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has thought of, discussed or is prepared to institute any immediate plan in regard to the turkey producers, who he is driving not only to the wall but up the wall?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a colleague of mine would say if he were here, this is a question of urgent national importance which I will address to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can she tell the house whether there is any significance in the fact that all the hon. ladies on the Liberal side of the house are today dressed in red?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that this matter falls within my departmental responsibilities. It is difficult enough for one woman to speak for herself let alone for two others, but I imagine it has something to do with the fact that not only is it the more prominent of the two Canadian colours but it is also the colour of the party we represent.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

H.M.C.S. "BONAVENTURE"—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FIRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. J. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence concerning newspaper accounts of a fire which is alleged to have taken place on the Bonaventure when in drydock at Saint John. Would the minister have any information to give the house about this matter?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have very little additional information. As has been reported there was a fire on the Bonaventure which began in one of the refrigeration areas. Regrettably it resulted in tragedy, in that one civilian worker was asphyxiated. An investigation is being carried out to determine the cause of the fire.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—APPEARANCE BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister report any success in his efforts to have the maritime trustees appear before a parliamentary committee?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there has been under discussion with representatives of other parties a motion which would refer this matter to the industrial relations committee, giving that committee the opportunity of meeting with the board of trustees. It is my wish, if this motion can be adopted without debate as soon as it appears on the order paper, that the board of trustees appear before that committee.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Is there any foundation for the press report to the effect that the members of this board will be resigning immediately after the election of the S.I.U. officers has taken place?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have not heard a report to that effect.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION TO INCLUDE COOPERAGE TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. In respect of the circumstances stated by my hon. friend affecting the cooperage trade, this is the result of a decision taken by the local insurance officer, ruling this group as not eligible for insurable employment. These persons are free to appeal this ruling to the commission itself and later to an umpire.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I have a supplementary question. Would the minister not agree that the national employment office, or the inspectors employed by that office, were derelict in their duties in that in 1959 they made no mention of these facts as presented by the minister, and in view of the fact that contributions have been accepted from the employer of these coopers since 1959 and benefits have been paid? Would he not agree that it is unfair to place this responsibility upon the coopers at this time, when it appears that the deficiency lies within his own offices?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am advised that the ruling made in 1959 was disregarded by the principals involved, who continued to make contributions on behalf of these employees.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. From what source does the employer obtain unemployment insurance stamps?

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question which relates to the answer given by the minister to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg. The complete disregard of the regulations in 1959 would be impossible unless the unemployment insurance offices also disregarded the regulations. Surely the responsibility rests with the department itself.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CONSIDERATION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING BENEFITS AND ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister give the house any idea what position in the legislative priority list is occupied by the government's legislation in regard to veterans benefits?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of program and priority is now under consideration. I hope there will be an announcement made in this regard before the end of the week.

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1965.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, once again this committee is being asked to vote a sum, in round figures, of $740 million.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Bigg: The cry "filibuster" is being made already today; the same old cry by the same old gang. Last Easter we were being asked to pass a similar amount, roughly $700 million, without debate. As you realize, we missed our usual Easter recess because of that cry "filibuster".

The people of Canada have the right to know why we are spending this large sum of money. The people of Canada, through the press, have complained that we here are not doing our duty as members of parliament. I can assure you that we are going to do our duty in this regard. We are going to consider this vast sum of money with great care. We are going to scrutinize the workings of all the departments concerned, and briefly consider the record of what the government has done during this longest and most tiresome session of parliament since 1867.

I am one of the first to admit that the legislative program during this long and arduous session has not been impressive, because the Liberals have failed to give us that leadership of which they boasted during the last two election campaigns.

The Liberals said they had the answers to our problems and would show us how to run this country if elected. Do they have the answers to the problems facing agriculture? The Conservative party when in power had the best minister of agriculture that Canada has ever had. He was the man who sold a billion bushels of grain at a favourable price, putting at least western Canada on its feet. I have very good authority for making that statement. I refer to the present Minister of Agriculture who had this to say at Falher, Alberta, as reported in the Toronto Star of October 30, 1964:

> "I think the last Liberal government had forgotten the farmers during its declining years," he said. "I'll even go further—I think that on the basis of its record with our farmers, the last Liberal government deserved to be kicked out when it was."
> He said the present government has continued the agricultural policies started by the Conservatives and expanded them.

I only wish they had. After the tremendous criticism of our sales of wheat to red China and other communist countries, the Liberals in fact continued to sell to these countries; but they claimed that our administration had had nothing to do with bringing about those sales and that they were the result of the efforts of civil servants and the wheat board. Now that they are selling grain to the same countries they say they did it all, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be the first to claim that he had had a great deal to do in this regard. It is a sad state of affairs when the present Minister of Agriculture can only say that it was a good idea to put his own party out, and that the only contribution he has made to Canadian agriculture has been to continue our policies. Again I say I wish he had.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the hon. member—

The Chairman: Is the minister rising on a point of order?

Mr. Hays: I am rising on a question of privilege. It is quite all right for the hon. member to quote me, but I think he should give the whole quotation where I said that "1964 is drawing to a close and it now seems"—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Lambert: Make your own speech.

The Chairman: Order. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Bigg: I will be delighted to accommodate the minister. After saying that his government had continued the agricultural policies started by the Conservatives, and had expanded on them he went on to say:

> We have tried to show the same kind of concern for our farmers under the present government as was shown by the previous government. I won't take anything away from them on that score. They did things for our farmers that should have been done long before. My only objection is that they only went half as far as they should have.

That is a very good point. I will be the first to admit that we did not solve all the problems of agriculture, nor did we ever pretend to; but we made such a tremendous change that even the present Minister of Agriculture has to admit that the previous Liberal administration was completely derelict in this regard. I can speak with some authority for the people of western Canada because that is where I have lived all my life, and my constituency of Athabasca is in the northeastern part of Alberta. I can say on their behalf that there has been very little comfort in the new, expanded policy of the Liberal government. What has happened to the price of beef? What has happened to the price of pigs—

Mr. Winkler: And fowl.

Mr. Bigg: —and to the price of turkeys? Not long ago the minister said he had stabilized the price of turkeys by importing some eight million pounds of turkeys from the United States.

Mr. Winkler: Twelve million now.

Mr. Bigg: He stabilized the price, but where did he stabilize it? At a level which has hurt not only Canadian producers of turkeys but has affected the prices of beef and pork as well. Nothing the previous administration ever did could have given the minister the idea that the way to stabilize prices was to import turkeys from the United States and lower the price so the small turkey farmer can no longer make a living. If that is the kind of action he is going to take, and this is why I rose to speak, then it is time not only he resigned but the whole government, and handed back the reins of office, especially in the agricultural field, to those who knew what they were doing.

This is not the only field in which we are lacking leadership today. On the government front benches we have a whole crowd of confused stars. Where are we going with regard to international policy? No statements are made in the House of Commons to enlighten us, but from everything I have been able to read in the press it would appear that the government is in favour of recognizing red China completely. Is this going to maintain our friendship with the United States, which alone preserves the safety of our modern world? Before we go off half cocked with a unilateral plan I think we should discuss the plan with our neighbours to the south. My position in this regard is not new. I have always favoured full co-operation with the United States, with honour.

This administration did not know where it was going with regard to atomic bombs or atomic missiles. It is not so long ago that the Minister of National Health and Welfare said it would be the sheerest folly to bring atomic weapons into Canada and the Minister of National Defence, of all people, agreed with that statement. Then the government changed around and brought in atomic weapons without any regard whatever for Canadian sovereignty. Now we have them on Canadian soil and we have no sovereignty in this regard. I understand we are now going to try to negotiate out of atomic weapons. This is a fine time to take such action. As we would say on the farm, this is like locking the barn door after the horse has escaped. We are all looking for more leadership in international affairs.

When the present Prime Minister took office he had won the Nobel peace prize. He knew how to get along with people. He knew how to get all the nations of the world together. But what does he know about getting Canada back together again? One hundred years ago the president of the United States was Abraham Lincoln, who is famous in history as the man who split rails. If we go on the way we are we will have a prime minister who will be famous for splitting Canada, and I for one want no part of it.

We are patting ourselves on the back now that we are becoming a great big grown up nation and are going to repatriate the British North America Act. How is that going to make us a greater nation? I am not against repatriating the British North America Act. As a matter of fact the British North America Act was drafted in Canada and passed by the British House of Commons at Westminster in one of the shortest debates in its history. We drafted the British North America Act, and if there is anything wrong it is because we have not lived up to it.

We need a strong federal government in Canada. Our problems are great. There is great inequality in the wealth of the provinces. Are the provinces going to opt out of all the things that are of benefit to them? I do not think so. I think it would be a retrograde step to introduce this new formula which says that two, three or any number short of all the provinces can change the basic structure of the British North America Act. If the provinces will examine the British North America Act they will recognize that it is a great charter of freedom.

Without the co-operation envisaged by the Fathers of Confederation, the founders of our country, we would have no country called Canada. We would have been absorbed by the United States at least half a century ago, probably at the time of Laurier and the free trade experiment. The reciprocity experiment did not work and we wisely threw it out. Since that time Canada has gone steadily forward. But Canada has not gone forward at times when the provinces have been selfish. Canada has gone forward when the provinces have seen themselves as integral parts of a great state, one state, one country, but a country in which minorities will always be protected.

Whenever the present government want to make a point they try to pretend that the Conservatives are the great imperialists and that we have tried to keep Canada in her diapers. I do not think so. It was a great Conservative who drew up the British North America Act in the first place in co-operation with his Conservative partner from Quebec, Cartier, a man equal in every way to Macdonald in vision, loyalty and integrity. Macdonald and Cartier would turn over in their graves today if, after 97 years of co-operation, they saw the Liberals proceeding as rapidly as they can to undo all they did and dreamed of. A formula for amendment, indeed. If the British North America Act were lived up to by the provinces and the federal government it could still be a complete formula for freedom for all people who live in Canada.

We will be glad to have the British North America Act back in Canada, because we are in fact a grown-up nation, and have been for 50 years. Great political hay was made out of this cry that the Conservatives were imperialists, and William Lyon Mackenzie King won an election back in 1926 on the phony issue that we were being dictated to by Westminster. In 1867, when the B.N.A. Act was passed, Macdonald and Cartier and all those who went over there were annoyed by the fact that the British parliament passed the B.N.A. Act without debate. They thought it was a slur upon Canada that it was not important enough to worry about whether or not we took our complete independence. As a matter of fact Mr. Bright, who was famous for championing the underdog in British politics back at that time, even suggested that they cut the strings entirely and turn Canada adrift and let her go completely on her own. Is this imperialism? They gave us everything we asked for, and more, in 1867.

The British parliament bore the full cost of defending us, and it was not until 1914-18 that Canada made that magnificent contribution which showed that she had in fact grown up and appreciated freedom under the British flag such as no other colony or nation has ever enjoyed. I think the greatest freedom has been enjoyed by those same Quebec people. We still have them with us today, and I and all hon. members know that it is a very small but vociferous group in Quebec who believe in separatism. I was very pleased to hear one of our usually loud and outspoken members say he believed that in the British crown we really have the essence of freedom. This I believe.

I think it would be a good idea if we went back to 1925 and 1926 and read again what happened at that time. I think hon. members will all realize that when we took away the prerogative of the crown to call a successor between elections and try and form a government, we lost a very, very important part of our freedom under the parliamentary system. It is possible now for a leader, not knowing where he is going himself, to blame the opposition for every move and to threaten parliament with an election.

Everybody knows that the people of Canada have had too many elections. They have had at least two too many, one in 1962 and one in 1963, when a vicious campaign of half truths and complete falsehoods destroyed the confidence of the Canadian people in an administration that in five short years had certainly done more for western agriculture than all the previous Liberal administrations since 1867.

Even this was used in every husting east of Winnipeg to say that western Canada was a spoiled baby. Western Canada only enjoyed what she should have always had, something approaching a fair share of the national income. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the former administration instituted these programs; the ARDA program, for example. I suppose hon. members opposite say this was their program, but it was brought in by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, as everybody knows. This is one of the reasons I said, and I say again, that he was the greatest minister of agriculture Canada has ever had. He is still full of ideas; he is still full of drive; and I know, and you know, that if he were back in that same position he would expand the ARDA program and give the maritime farmers, the small Quebec and Ontario farmers, the same hope that has regenerated agriculture throughout the west.

We hear the present Minister of Agriculture say he has expanded our program. I want to know where. It is no good talking about total farm income; we want to know how much of that income is distributed amongst the smaller farmers who need it the most. This vertical integration, the kind of legislation this government has brought in to back up the large corporation farms, is not putting one dollar in the pockets of the small farmers; and I understand from the bureau of statistics that we are losing 14,000 family farms a year.

How long can this go on; and what kind of a country are we going to have when they are all sitting in the city looking for free wine and corn oil, etc., to be produced on collective farms? The happy, small farm in Canada has always been our strength, and I want to see continued the policy of the former administration under the present Leader of the Opposition and his then minister of agriculture. He introduced the ARDA program into this house. Only under this program can the small farmers, not only in western Canada but also in eastern Canada, derive any hope; otherwise they will be leaving the farms in even larger numbers than the present rate of 14,000 a year.

I do not think the people of Canada are interested in long winded talks about ideologies, about whether or not you like socialism. They are interested in simple things, such as can they earn a living? They were able to earn a living thanks to our government and to the policies we instituted when in office. We must go to the small farmers in Quebec and give them a chance to live and see they have the amenities of living. An automobile these days is not a luxury; it is a necessity in this country of ours. Also, Mr. Chairman, I believe that every home in Canada should have television in order that they may participate in this great educational program that we want. That is why I have pressed for greater television coverage. So far I have not been able to get it, but I will keep on pressing for it. I do not care if I never make a name for myself as a statesman, as long as we feed the people who sent me here and improve their standard of living.

If some of our leaders would stop worrying about the history books and would get down to brass tacks, dollars and cents, income security, this country would be a great deal better off. I do not think you have to be a socialist in order to give this country security. This is the richest country in the world by far, as far as capital is concerned, when one considers what we have produced already and the potential that is ours. In my district of Athabasca 500 billion barrels of oil are there for the taking, and what are we doing about it? We started it. We should do something in this respect and get this inertia out of our policies.

We can all now say that Mr. Hees is a great man. Why? It is only because he is not in our party any more. Isn't he the same man? It was not Mr. Hees alone; he was encouraged by a whole front row of people who were on the march.

Mr. McIlraith: Leaving the party.

Mr. Bigg: He has not left the party, and the flattering office which you people gave him did not get him into your party either. Personally, Mr. Chairman, I am a great admirer of Mr. Hees. He got this country rolling. How did he get this country rolling? It was because he listened to the backbenchers of his own party. George Hees did not think he had all the answers; he consulted us on many occasions, and if we came to him with a bright idea he used it. It was not all window dressing; he put Canadian manufacturers and Canadian products back in the markets of the world.

Then it was said that our minister of finance was a terrible man for the way he dealt with one of the spoiled boys of the party opposite. What did he do? He devalued the dollar and the present Minister of Finance wrote a book about it, "Troubled Canada". I tell the house that Canada is still troubled, and it is troubled because the government has the author of that book as Minister of Finance. The sooner we get him out, the better.

There are those who want to weaken the federal system. What about education? It is said, "Don't talk about education; that is a provincial right". Everything in this country is too hot to handle, but if the government does not handle it somebody else will. And in handling it the government should not play around with socialism.

I warn you people over there that if you continue allowing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to make up your minds for you, he may well end up sitting in the Prime Minister's chair, because he has more intelligence than all of you put together. You have got to do what he says. You brought in a stillborn flag, but when he brought in his flag you all voted for it like a flock of sheep. If he is your leader put him in office and let's get going. If he is the dynamic leader you think, then let's have him over there.

Or why don't you have the hon. member for Villeneuve? He speaks out; he isn't silent, but 80 per cent of you people are silent whenever there is a controversial issue too hot to handle.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): We are keeping our eyes on you.

Mr. Bigg: You had better have your eye on me, because you will hear more from me. Your half truths and your propaganda machine will do me no harm unless you go to the people I represent and show you are doing something to help them earn a living. My people are tired of talk; they want action. Your own Minister of Agriculture admitted we took action, and he knows. He is a farmer; I will say that for Harry. He knows what has happened to the price of cattle since you fellows got in.

My people want something done about the price of farm machinery. You people brought in a bill to fix that, but I defy you to tell me how you have reduced the price of farm machinery by one cent for farmers in western Canada or elsewhere. I speak for myself. A lot of you people don't have far to go on week ends and are able to commute to your homes. Maybe that is why you are keeping the session going.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Stop talking and we will go home.

Mr. Bigg: On September 8 the hon. member for Mégantic moved that we stop talking about things which really do not count and get on with important legislation, but every one of you voted against that. You had been accusing us of filibustering, but on September 8 every Liberal in the house voted to continue the flag debate. You really did not want your own flag, or you would not have sent it to the committee. In that committee you had the mother of that flag sitting there. It was supposed to be a non-partisan flag, but of course that is impossible. That is why I for one never wanted the flag to go to a committee. We knew we would end up with the flag proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The members of the committee went in knowing they were going to vote for the flag of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Fourteen to none.

Mr. Bigg: Yes, we understand how that was worked. If you want me to go through it I shall put it on the record. You brought in Hobson's choice, the devil or the deep blue sea. You voted in that plugged committee 9-4 against the red ensign and you thought that was the end of it. I have news for you.

An hon. Member: Ten to four.

Mr. Bigg: You are good at hair-splitting, but what are you doing about the price of turkeys? We can't eat maple leaves. This is not the place to talk about spiritualism. William Lyon Mackenzie King relied on his crystal ball and his little helper who is now the Minister of Transport, but we need more than that. Give the people action; then they will not be ashamed to pay you $18,000 a year. We raised our own income, didn't we?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You did not vote against it.

Mr. Bigg: If you have anything to say why don't you stand on your feet and say it? Would you like the floor?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I said you did not vote against it.

Mr. Bigg: Against what?

[Mr. Bigg.]

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): The increase in salaries for members.

Mr. Bigg: No. I think I am worth it. I can't say that you are. I backed policies which raised the price of cattle and stabilized family income on the farms. I am proud of the small part I played, and with the same amount of devotion to the Canadian people I think I could earn $18,000 a year anywhere. I am a lawyer, and I am devoting what small legal brains I have to looking through the holes in your specious arguments. I am an advocate for the people of Athabasca, and they know it. I spend 100 per cent of my time representing them, and I don't care if we have a recess or not. This is my life. I will spend 24 hours a day 12 months of the year here if you will produce some results for my people. But if you don't come up with something dynamic I will be here when you are forgotten.

If you members from Quebec want to be returned from Quebec, then do something for the little people of Quebec. Give them a chance to earn a living and share in the wonderful opportunities we have. No people ever had greater opportunities than those facing the Canadian people today. We are fighting over dimes when we should be having dollars. In some cases little, petty provincial governments are shuffling dimes around when they should be using dollars, and this is due to lack of vision and co-operation. When we have an administration that gets things done we should get behind it and stop telling lies about it. Whenever you people introduce something good I will vote for it. You are in the driver's seat.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): And you are talking.

Mr. Bigg: In this chamber you are supposed to stand on your feet and make your contribution. You are not helping Canada by heckling me. If you have a contribution to make I am willing to sit down and listen to it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. gentleman to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Chairman, while we are studying interim supply, and after the fashion of various members of the official opposition, I should like to put on the record a few short quotations which are assuredly relevant to today's debate.

The first quotation is taken from Psalm 115 and reads as follows:

—eyes have they, but they see not;
They have ears, but they hear not:

The other quotation, taken from St. Luke, chapter 23, says this:

—forgive them; for they know not what they do.

Mr. Knowles: Amen.

Mr. Lambert: So you are innocent.

[Text]

Mr. Thomas: I am happy at the opportunity to take part in this debate on interim supply. I know there are some objections to the length of time which has been consumed by this debate, but one of the duties of members of parliament, particularly members of the opposition, is to seek to guide the government along right lines through control of the monetary supply.

I think the members of the government will be ready to agree that across this country today there are a great many worried people. They are worried over the conduct of business in this house—

Mr. Lloyd: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomas: They are worried over the proposed imposition of a flag. They are worried over the conduct and performance of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and they are deeply worried over the proposed formula for amending our Canadian constitution and the effect it is likely to have on Canada in the years ahead.

I should like to deal first with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Back in the thirties the corporation was set up for several purposes, the chief of these being to foster Canadianism through disseminating Canadian news, sports, educational achievements, science, history and whatever else might be going on in Canada which the Canadian people should know and which no outside news media could possibly supply to the Canadian people in the same way a national broadcasting corporation could. Its purpose was to foster national unity. It was concerned only with radio in those first years. Later on, when television took its place alongside the other media of communication, the C.B.C. arranged for the broadcasting of television programs.

Now, no organization other than a government organization could possibly provide the remoter areas of this country with radio and television facilities, particularly the latter. This was one of the fundamental purposes of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to provide these facilities in the remoter areas which would not be attractive to private enterprise because there would be no profit in broadcasting to those areas.

Then again, in addition to supplying these facilities to remote areas, another purpose of the corporation was to keep open and active our east-west lines of communication. We in Canada live in five regions spread roughly along the 60th parallel of latitude. These five regions are separated by areas of rock and communication is difficult. This has always been one of the problems of Canada. It has made the construction of railways very expensive. It has made construction of communicating east-west lines very expensive. But these east-west lines of communication are essential to the well-being and continuation of our national existence.

On the whole the C.B.C. has done a very good job of serving Canada. The corporation has produced some very good programs. It has brought into this country some very good programs. Nevertheless, in recent times particularly, the C.B.C. seems to be letting down its standards—I would not like to say of decency, but it is letting down its standards of, shall we say, acceptability. There is no reason why the C.B.C. should become a showcase for pornography, but there has been serious criticism of the content of some recent programs which have been broadcast over our national facilities.

I submit to this committee that nothing should be broadcast which would cause embarrassment in any way in an average well adjusted Canadian home when all its members are sitting around watching television. I submit that freedom of speech and truth should not be used as an excuse for broadcasting subjects and pictures which are ruled out in polite mixed company. In other words, if it is not lowering the standards of decency, the C.B.C. in recent times has been guilty of lowering the standards of acceptability. Acceptability cannot be defined by law; it can only be defined by public usage and by public acceptance. The C.B.C. has violated this law of acceptability.

I should like to read the committee a letter from a lady who lives in the constituency of Middlesex West. The letter is addressed to Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, with a copy to myself. It says:

Dear Mr. Ouimet,

I have just shut off our television set in disgust and indignation during this evening's program "This Hour Has Seven Days". If you are in any doubt as to the reasons, I suggest you check the program content. The freedom its producers allow themselves is no licence for insensible insult. There are still areas of decency.

I protest too the general terms two weeks ago of this same program during the visit of H.R.H. Queen Elizabeth. I do not know whether on that occasion Dr. Laurier LaPierre was reading from a prepared script or airing his personal opinion. In either case I was ashamed as a Canadian citizen that he, over a publicly owned medium, called into question the right of the Queen to be in Canada at all.

I would suggest, sir, that it is past time to withdraw the privilege from the opinionated individuals associated with this program of presenting their private viewpoints along with a number of very low-taste items.

Yours sincerely,

Mrs. A.G. McColl,
38 Lonsdale drive,
London, Ontario.

I have before me a clipping taken from this morning's Globe and Mail entitled "Professor and cleric defend C.B.C." The article is as follows:

A Unitarian minister and an associate professor of art have spoken in defence of the C.B.C., under fire recently in speeches by members of parliament and in a strongly worded petition signed by women's groups.

George Swinton, associate professor at the University of Manitoba's school of art, said in an interview that overzealous, self-appointed spokesmen for the general public attempting to suppress truth and fact because they do not like them are vicious, irrational and un-Christian.

That is one person's view. I will have some more to say about that later.

Rev. William P. Jenkins, in a Sunday address to his congregation at the Unitarian church of Winnipeg, said members of parliament and a group of women were seeking, in the name of morality, to enforce a rigid censorship of Canada's most popular and penetrating medium of communication.

The defenders referred to the declaration of Canadian women, a petition circulated among women's and church groups and carried door to door in some communities, and to members of parliament's criticism of the network for an interview with George Lincoln Rockwell, leader of the American nazi party.

The women's petition said its signers aim "to end the domination of a minority who misuse the C.B.C. to spread propaganda for perversion, pornography, free love, blasphemy, dope, violence and crime".

Mr. Swinton said groups that accuse the C.B.C. of contributing to juvenile delinquency, alcoholism and immorality have not the slightest idea what morality really is.

It is the duty of the C.B.C. to show the truth and things that really exist, even though they may be unpleasant, he said. "Bigots are like ostriches with their heads in the sand. They think if they don't look at something, it doesn't exist.

He said Canadians "should be grateful to the C.B.C. for defending our freedom of opinion and expression".

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Jenkins said a victory for pressure groups against the C.B.C. would mean the end of all free expression on television, a body blow to the cultural growth of Canada and a long step toward totalitarianism.

He said Canada cannot remain free unless the people face and examine the problems of morality.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment on the suggestion that it is the duty of the C.B.C. to show the truth and things that really exist. I agree this is true, but I think all of the members of this committee would agree that there are some areas of our lives which are not to be exposed to the public view. People do not exhibit themselves when they take a bath. On nearly every toilet door in the country there is a lock. We do not wash our dirty linen in the living room. Mothers do not change their babies when there is a lot of strange company around. There are certain areas of our lives which are kept private, and it seems to me that this fact should be recognized by the C.B.C.

Surely the C.B.C. know what is acceptable in polite social circles; and surely what is acceptable in polite social circles should be respected by the corporation. Why the Canadian people has to accept some of the tripe, to use that expression, which is put over the C.B.C. networks and which is certainly a cause of embarrassment to many people, I do not know. I cannot understand the attitude of the management of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in permitting this sort of thing to continue. I think that one incident where, according to accepted standards, an improper and indecent program is broadcast by the C.B.C. is sufficient for the severest disciplinary measures to be taken against the producers of such programs. I do not know where we can start except at the top of the C.B.C., not at the bottom. Mr. Ouimet himself should be held responsible for what is broadcast on the C.B.C. networks. The producers all the way down to the bottom of the ladder should have a thorough understanding that this far out type of program, which may be acceptable to a very small minority of Canadians, is found to be objectionable and embarrassing by the average viewer of television. I say that the C.B.C. should know better than to broadcast this type of program, and everyone in the organization should understand that.

Now I come back to a clipping taken from the London Free Press for January 6, 1961, which illustrates the sort of thing to which I am referring. This is a Canadian Press report which is as follows:

Arch Oboler, controversial movie producer-director-writer, is making a film in Toronto about the Kinsey report and is using Canadian actors.

Leo G. Carroll, veteran Hollywood actor best known for the Topper series, will play the lead and will be supported by Canadians Kate Reid, Austin Willis, Sharon Acker, Toby Tarnow, Garrick Hagon and Maud Whitmore. Scenes are being shot at the grounds of the Canadian national exhibition, Malton airport and in Toronto streets and at a church.

The plot takes the form of a symposium on the famed report, chaired by Carroll. The title of the film is "One Plus Two".

Calling Canadian actors and technicians "nothing but wonderful," Oboler refused to divulge the cost of the movie but said that the film should take about five weeks to shoot.

Said Oboler: "I've written something like 700 plays, but this is the one dearest to my heart."

If ever there was a subject that was not fit for showing in the living rooms of homes in Canada it is the Kinsey report, yet we have producers who think that this sort of thing is good for public showing. I should like to stress again the point that there is an element in the C.B.C. that is going too far. It is going beyond the point of acceptability by the Canadian public.

The former government was unable to rectify this situation and the present government seems unable to take care of it. Certainly something should be done. I think when we are considering granting the government further interim supply, during which time we have the right to raise grievances and demand recourse, is a suitable time to impress upon the government the fact that this sort of broadcasting and programming must be stopped.

I should like to read a short excerpt from a speech made by Mr. Alphonse Ouimet to the Toronto Rotary club on November 25, 1960. Mr. Ouimet stated:

I wouldn't be surprised if every person in this room who follows C.B.C. programs is mad at the C.B.C. for something they saw or heard yesterday, or will be mad at us for something they will see or hear tomorrow or the next day. I would be less than honest if I did not admit that there is much that is not to my particular taste either, but I believe in freedom of taste.

Perhaps we all believe in freedom of taste, but within reason. We do not believe in unrestricted freedom of taste. If we followed that reasoning where would it lead us? It would lead us to the fringe of lunacy, indecency, immorality and everything that accompanies those things. Let us believe in freedom of taste, yes, but within reason. The C.B.C. has exceeded the limits of reason by some of its recent programs.

Mr. Ouimet then went on to say:

I don't want to labour this point. Canada, thank goodness, is not made up of 18,000,000 sheep, and we all know it.

Despite their differences of opinion, and their differences in taste, most Canadians, when they see a program they dislike, are fair enough to remember the number of programs they did enjoy. They probably also remember that the other fellow may have other preferences in programs—and that he, too, is a shareholder in the C.B.C.

Broadcasting—the kind of broadcasting we have in Canada with C.B.C.—has something for everyone.

Again we have this suggestion that there is something for everyone and freedom of taste. This freedom should not go beyond the point of reason and acceptability, but the C.B.C. has gone beyond that point.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need say anything further in this regard. I hope I have made my point clear and that the government will do something about this situation. There is a problem in this regard, but surely if the present management of the C.B.C. does not understand the standards of acceptability in Canada today, changes should be made in that management.

At this time I should like to make a few comments in connection with the proposed formula for amending our Canadian constitution. The suggested formula has caused grave doubt in the minds of many Canadians. I think we all believe that the repatriation of the Canadian constitution, providing for its amendment in Canada without having to refer it to the government of Great Britain, is desirable. However we do not want to weaken our nation because of our anxiety to repatriate our constitution. It is better to leave things alone than to damage our national unity. It is better to leave things alone than to prejudice our future well-being as a nation.

In 1867 two levels of government were established, a national or federal level, and a provincial level. The powers of each were clearly outlined. Under sections 91 and 92 the powers of the federal government and the provincial governments were clearly stated. The language aspect of the situation was covered by section 133. This is not a long section, and for the sake of those people who may read Hansard I think it would do no harm to put it again on the record.

Section 133 of the British North America Act, which deals with languages, reads as follows:

Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The acts of the parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both languages.

That is the way the language problem was settled back in 1867, and this solution has served Canada for 97 years, and has been the basis for the use of languages in this country. The problem of representation in parliament was dealt with in sections 51, 52 and others, and the admission of new provinces was dealt with in section 46. The Fathers of Confederation made a long and careful study and gave lengthy consideration to the drawing up of this act, and it has been found to be a good act.

I should like to quote from an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of October 30, 1964. It is headed "Present Constitution O.K." and reads in part as follows:

One of the crowning glories of confederation and of the foresight of the founding fathers has been the fact that the structure which they built has withstood these changes without being altered in any fundamental way.

The second paragraph of the editorial goes on to say:

No convincing case has been made in Quebec or elsewhere for any basic changes in the constitution. On the contrary, there is every evidence that the B.N.A. Act, a superbly flexible and adaptable document, is as capable of meeting the nation's needs today as it was in 1867. Even Premier Lesage of Quebec has conceded this.

The Chairman: Order. I have to bring to the attention of the hon. member that unfortunately his time has expired, unless he has unanimous agreement of the committee to continue.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: I regret there is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, in listening to hon. members on the other side who have spoken this afternoon I had occasion to look up the word "filibuster" in the Concise Oxford Dictionary. It is defined here as an "obstructionist in legislative assembly". I want to spend a few moments of the committee's time to suggest to the committee that what we have been hearing again his afternoon is a continuation of what has been an obstructionist technique in this legislative assembly, the House of Commons.

[Mr. Thomas.]

Mr. Rapp: The same as you did in 1963.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): May I ask a question?

Mr. Turner: Certainly.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is in substantial agreement with the argument put forward by the hon. member for Middlesex West?

Mr. Turner: In answer to the hon. member's question may I say that whether or not I am in agreement with what was said by the hon. member who has just taken his seat is irrelevant because I want to suggest to the hon. member that what we have been hearing during the last seven days, and I say this with the greatest respect to him, has been irrelevant and I do not want to compound that irrelevancy by getting into that type of argument this afternoon. May I say that the subject matters that have been discussed on interim supply have been noted for the fact that they have not really constituted a proper discussion of interim supply at all. Members have been talking about patriation of the constitution and the amendment of the British North America Act, when this measure will be brought before the House of Commons in due course and will open up at that time an opportunity for relevant and appropriate discussion. Members have been talking about the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, when the estimates of the Secretary of State have not yet been brought before the house but will be brought forward in due course. There has also been discussion about the flag, when this matter is on the order paper already and should therefore not be a proper subject for debate on interim supply. Indeed it is the object of a report by a committee of the house, which report is before the house.

I should like to cite to the committee a few figures. Out of the 182 days that this house has been sitting this session, 76 have been taken up with estimates and supply. Yet the estimates of only eight out of 23 government departments have been passed. We are now on the 26th day of debate on interim supply during this session whereas in the nine previous sessions of the House of Commons interim supply took only 22 days.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member a question? When he is speaking would he mind addressing the members of the house and not the press gallery?

Mr. Turner: I wanted to make sure that the hon. member would hear me. During the years of Conservative administration no interim supply debate was prolonged for more than two days, except the debate in December, 1962, which took seven days because in that instance no budget had been presented in the 1962-63 session—

Mr. Lambert: You are wrong.

Mr. Turner: —and only seven days had been allowed for the consideration of estimates.

The Chairman: Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George who started his remarks by expressing the opinion that perhaps some members who had spoken before him had not been entirely relevant to the subject matter of the resolution. I am in accord with him to some extent but I do not think that, as the Speaker says, two wrongs make a right and I would hesitate to recognize that he is in order when he discusses past proceedings of the house under the guise of suggesting that perhaps some of the contributions to the debate have been irrelevant. It may be that what he is saying now is by way of preface to other remarks, and if that be so perhaps he could get to the subject matter and essence of his speech.

Mr. MacEwan: Talk about the water levels on the great lakes.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, in response to your suggestion I should like to talk about interim supply, because the time spent in debate in this house involves the taxpayers' money—

Mr. Lambert: How would you know? You are never here.

Mr. Turner: —and within that scope I would hope Your Honour would find me relevant. With regard to interim supply, the first interim supply debate took two days, the second interim supply debate took one day, the third interim supply debate took seven days, the fourth took nine days and the fifth has taken seven days up until today for a total of 26 days. All I want to suggest to Your Honour is that the proposed flag resolution appeared in Votes and Proceedings on May 26, 1964, between the second and third interim supply debates, which may explain these figures better than any further words of mine.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to participate in the debate this afternoon, but since the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Northern Affairs and Natural Resources (Mr. Turner) apparently wants to lecture us, I feel it is my duty to say a few words.

I object to any attempt by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George to muzzle the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot, or any other member.

We have rights, and in rising to deal with the remarks and representations made by my constituents, I am only performing my duty. Therefore, even though I have great regard for him and even consider him as a friend, I spurn the lecture that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George tried to give us.

Mr. Chairman, I also have a few remarks to make about the C.B.C.

I feel that this crown corporation is costing the Canadian taxpayers so much money that we should look into it. I feel that we do not get our money's worth from the C.B.C.

Of course, the C.B.C. presents very good programs, but it also presents some that are not so good, and some that are definitely bad. Therefore, I will deal for a while with the unfavourable aspect, even if I have had very little time to prepare the remarks I am going to make—

Mr. Drouin: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Ricard: What does he mean by the remarks.

Mr. Drouin: What does he mean by the C.B.C.?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to be corrected by my hon. friend from Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) when I use an English word instead of a French word, but I think that in doing so I merely follow the example set on several occasions by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Tremblay) who dealt the other day with "bands." Besides, he used other English words during the remarks he made in French in this house.

Mr. Chairman, I am willing to tolerate a few interjections from the other side of the house, but I must warn you that if those who always remain seated cannot do otherwise than make interjections from their seats, I will have no alternative at a certain time but to reply in kind.

Some t.v. programs are especially shocking; they encourage delinquency and are a danger to our youth. Some of those programs are definitely indecent and they should not be shown to our young people.

Other programs also intended for teenagers are equally indecent. Some of them undermine the established authority, whether it be the family, the parish, the province or the country. Other programs present a simply revolting aspect of crime to young people; and in this connection, I would point out the remarks made last year, if my memory serves me well, by the chief of police of Montreal, Mr. Robert, who said that unless steps were taken to cancel certain programs on crime, we would find it very hard to control our young people.

Mr. Chairman, I have a letter which was sent to me—

Mr. Choquette: By a parish priest.

Mr. Ricard: Not by a parish priest, but contrary to the hon. member for Lotbinière, I receive letters from parish priests; perhaps the parish priests of his riding do not trust him enough to write him.

Mr. Choquette: I receive letters from bishops.

Mr. Ricard: I often receive letters from parish priests, but this letter is from a citizen of Varennes. It reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Ricard:

Even though I am a Liberal, I sympathize with Mr. Balcer with regard to the destruction of his car. As I have written to many members and ministers for years, the cause of these acts of violence and gangsterism, of this flippant attitude on the part of young people is the t.v. films—

Mr. Chairman, you have a family, as I have, and you know by personal experience that a picture has a very important and far-reaching influence, especially on youth.

Therefore, it is important that films shown on our t.v. screens are not detrimental to our youth. I think it is our duty, as representatives of the people, to watch over the protection of our families.

I am certain the minister is anxious to give all his consideration to that question and that he will revise, if that is possible, the answer he gives to questions directed to him: "I have no authority whatsoever on programs shown by the C.B.C."

Decency as well as the moral well-being of our children require that the minister do his utmost to ensure that our youth will not be corrupted.

Going on to another matter, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the house that the C.B.C. is not as careful as it should be concerning the broadcasting of news. One does not need to listen too long to certain news programs to notice that there is partisanship among the C.B.C. staff.

When the time comes to present news unfavourable to a political party—and so that there should be no misunderstanding, I say that I mean the party to which I have the honour of belonging—

Mr. Chrétien: Dubious honour.

Mr. Choquette: Pitiful honour.

Mr. Ricard: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Choquette: I say it is a pitiful honour because I would be ashamed of being a Conservative myself. You can be sure of that. Your party is trying to destroy confederation.

Mr. Ricard: In the mouth of the hon. member, the word "shame" is meaningless because he himself is a shame for the house. If I had a piece of advice to give him, I would suggest that he keep quiet; he would at least be showing some respect for his constituents.

Mr. Choquette: After the next election, you will be quiet because you will be nothing.

Mr. Ricard: I was saying, in spite of the remarks and ill-timed and perhaps naughty interjections of the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette)—

Mr. Choquette: I merely laughed, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ricard: I was saying that the C.B.C. did not always give a true report of facts.

You have heard those Liberal members, Mr. Chairman, they are not allowed to speak.

Liberal members are allowed to make noises and interjections in this house but they are not allowed to rise in their seats to give their personal opinions.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I do not make any noise in the house, I only laugh at the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot who is utterly ridiculous.

Mr. Ricard: This, Mr. Chairman, will not prevent me from continuing with my remarks—

Mr. Turner: What a pity.

Mr. Ricard: I did not think the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George could stoop to the level of the hon. member for Lotbinière. I am quite amazed.

The Chairman: Order. May I ask hon. members to come back to their senses and allow the hon. member who has the floor to pursue his comments without being interrupted?

Mr. Ricard: I thank you, Mr. Chairman. The Liberal members have to be called to order, in view of the unwarranted interruptions and interventions they keep on making when a Conservative member has the floor.

The Chairman: I have to tell the hon. member that I must also call him to order and ask him to co-operate with the Chair by limiting his remarks to the resolution now before the committee.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what I have been doing all along, and if I was forced to digress it is due to the lack of seriousness of the members opposite.

The C.B.C. costs the Canadian citizens $86 million per year. It seems to me that it would be fair and advisable for this corporation to spend more cautiously the funds that are being provided to it by the Canadian taxpayers and workers.

I believe, I do not only believe but I am sure, that many expenditures are incurred inconsiderately.

Money is no object to the C.B.C., especially in regard to television. The responsible people in that corporation incur any expenditure that comes to mind. It is true that in so doing, they only follow the example set by the government itself; last spring, when the C.B.C. president's annual salary was increased from $20,000 to $40,000 it could have been increased by an additional $10,000, as was stated before us by the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne).

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, we do not have to go any farther to find an example. The C.B.C. is criticized for its inconsiderate spending, but the example is set at a higher level, that is by the very people who direct the business of this country.

I would therefore—

Mr. Guay: Demagogy.

Mr. Ricard: Now, the hon. member for Lévis believes he should also interject, for, as may be seen, he is not allowed either to speak in the house.

Mr. Guay: I would not want to speak like you; I would rather remain silent.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, this is another proof that the Liberal members on the opposite side of the house can do nothing but interject.

Mr. Guay: You are acting as demagogues, and this is not any better.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, it is therefore important that a thorough inquiry be made into the C.B.C., in order to introduce sound financing in its management. I am convinced that the C.B.C. could, and with a lot less money, give better programs, offer high quality programs that would promote culture and information.

Furthermore, I am of the opinion that the Prime Minister should launch an investigation into this matter.

It is no secret that the C.B.C. harbours a core of separatists who are a real danger to our society. If the members on the opposite side of the house had the courage to deal with this matter, if they had the courage to state publicly what they think in the bottom of their hearts, they would corroborate what I am saying at this moment. This is also another area which the minister should investigate in order to bring about the remedies required.

Furthermore, there exists an extraordinary patronage within the C.B.C. Unless he knows certain officials in the C.B.C., it is impossible for the ordinary citizen to obtain a position or do business with that corporation. You cannot do anything or get anything if you do not have the ear of the person responsible for patronage within that crown corporation.

That works against the people in general and should not be tolerated in a country like ours. The minister should stop saying he can do nothing in that respect. The Secretary of State should take into consideration the grievances and recommendations made by his colleague from York-Humber (Mr. Cowan) and give closer attention to the steps which should be taken to correct that situation.

Mr. Drouin: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Ricard: Certainly.

Mr. Drouin: Could he give us the name of the person responsible for patronage within the C.B.C. so that the minister who answers to the house for the corporation may take the necessary steps and put an end to the situation mentioned by the hon. member?

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, that will not be necessary since the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes knows him even better than I do.

Mr. Guay: Let us hear you give his name.

Mr. Kindt: I am delighted, Mr. Chairman, to have the opportunity of participating in this supply debate, particularly since the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is in his seat in the chamber. This afternoon I should like to talk about Indians because I happen to have five reserves in my area, and I consider the Blood Indian reserve, being so close to it, as one of the five reserves. At least the Indians from it come over to Fort Macleod and we see a lot of them.

These Indians entered into a solemn obligation with the Queen and the federal government in 1877 at Blackfoot Crossing south of Cluny in Alberta. Over five or six thousand Indians were present, and Colonel Macleod, the head official of the federal government, attended the drafting of treaty No. 7 and the signing of it. This particular treaty may not mean a great deal to present day officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I would say to them that as far as the Indians are concerned, there is nothing more sacred than the obligations they undertook at that time and there is nothing more solemn than the promises which Her Majesty's representatives made on that occasion. They sealed them by saying that as long as the rivers flow and the sun shines these obligations of the federal government would be carried out. I would remind the committee that this treaty was not made between the Indians and any minor government—any local government, or provincial government. It was made between Her Majesty's representatives and representatives of those nations which were ceding certain territory. The Indians agreed to this treaty. It took them seven days to do so. And anyone who reads treaty No. 7 can see the rights which were given on that occasion to these Indians and the benefits which the government of Canada received. To have called such a meeting as the minister of citizenship had in mind without first consulting the Indians on matters which pertain to them is entirely wrong—wrong in principle and wrong in practice. These Indians feel affronted by this type of procedure.

Under this treaty—and I have a copy of it here in my hand—the federal government promises to set up reserves. Reserves are named for the Blackfoot, Blood and Sarcee bands. A reserve is named for the Peigan band of Indians. It was to be on the Old Man river near the foot of the Porcupine hills at a place called Crow's Creek. The reserve of the Stoney band of Indians was to be in the vicinity of Morleyville. They gave $25 to every man, woman and child in order to have the treaty signed on the occasion when they all met at Blackfoot Crossing south of Cluny in September, 1877. Our representatives on that occasion gave these Indians a solemn assurance that they would pay the salaries of all such teachers to instruct the children of the Indians as Her Majesty of Canada might deem advisable, when such Indians were settled on the reserves and should desire teachers. Well, the present government is doing that. We are providing teachers. But whenever there is any change in the treaty rights which the Indians enjoy, the Indians deserve, and indeed, as citizens of this country they are entitled to expect, that whatever government is in power in Ottawa, there should first be consultation with those who are primarily affected. First of all, the Indians should be consulted. Then the administration should obey the treaty obligations which the federal government undertook.

This treaty No. 7, I would say, was one of the worst real estate swindles I ever read in my life. What did they receive in return for ceding that entire territory? In addition to having certain reserves set aside they were to receive, the treaty says—and I shall read the committee some of the terms:

> Her Majesty agrees to supply each head and minor chief, for the use of their bands, ten axes, five handsaws, five augers, one grindstone, and the necessary files and whetstones.

Well, a whetstone might have been a very valuable piece of equipment to an Indian. At the same time there is not much monetary value attached to any of these things which were given to the Indians as part of a settlement. Later, the treaty promises to give to the Indians, if they wished to go into agriculture, "two hoes, one spade, one scythe and two hay forks." Every three families were to receive one plow and one harrow, and for each band—> —enough potatoes, barley, oats and wheat (if such seeds be suited for the locality of their reserves) to plant the land actually broken up. All the aforesaid articles to be given, once for all, for the encouragement of the practice of agriculture among the Indians.

As some spokesmen for the Peigans have said to me when I last visited them—and I have a great deal of contact with these Indians—it was a case of a bunch of sharp lawyers talking to a bunch of savages. That, undoubtedly, is a fair summary of what happened. In the event, Crowfoot signed this treaty and the Indians felt that in signing it they had done the right thing. They did get their reserves and they do enjoy certain rights and privileges. One of them is that before anything in the treaty is changed the federal government must go back to the Indians and discuss the proposed change with them. It is necessary to get the consent of the people who are most concerned, and discuss the matter with them before discussing it with anybody else. This is only fair in view of the solemn undertaking into which Her Majesty entered by virtue of the agreement with these Indians.

Those who were privileged to attend the ceremony which marked the signing of this treaty back in 1877 at Blackfoot Crossing remembered it as one of the most solemn occasions in the history of western Canada. As a token of respect, Crowfoot and some of the other chiefs were brought east where they were wined and dined by the federal government. They were taken to government house. They were sent down to Montreal and Toronto and were taken around various places, and then returned to their respective reserves in southern Alberta.

My purpose in recounting this visit is because other events took place. Even if it is at the ministerial level, the idea of the federal government is to make changes affecting the Indians. The government wants the provincial governments to make these changes. But let us not fool ourselves: the Indians are a proud people. They entered into obligations, laid down their arms, and so on, as a result of solemn pledges made by the federal government. In speaking on their behalf here today I feel I am only doing what should be done and raising matters which should be understood by the minister and his staff in their relations with the Indians.

Before I close there are some other items I should like briefly to mention. I do not think I need spend any time on the flag question, except to say that some of the things I do read disturb me. They leave one with the feeling that whoever is spreading the propaganda concerning the flag might be a little more considerate of the truth, instead of creating a wrong impression of what is taking place and may yet take place in the days ahead. If the flag issue is buried, as it should be, nothing will be done and no one will be harmed. If it had not been for the Conservative party we would have today a three maple leaf flag flying throughout the country. Even the committee has indicated—

The Chairman: Order, please; would the hon. member kindly resume his seat. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member for Macleod but I have listened to him with great interest until now. I feel that all hon. members, including the hon. member who now has the floor, should exercise great restraint and caution when discussing the question of the flag issue. To my mind this is a matter which should not be discussed in the present proceedings because it has nothing to do with any of the items before the committee. If I may refer to standing order 39(2), it is there stated that discussion in committee should be strictly relevant to the matter before the committee. Therefore I humbly and earnestly suggest to the hon. member that discussion might be left to some other occasion.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, with all due respect, every other hon. member who has taken part in this debate has talked about this matter and I ask for the same privilege. That is item No. 1.

The Chairman: I do not know which other hon. members have discussed the flag issue, but certainly that is the position which the Chair must take as regards the hon. member who has the floor at the moment, namely that that subject is not relevant to the resolution before the committee at this time.

Mr. Kindt: Well, Mr. Chairman, I register an objection to your ruling and just let it go at that. As far as I am concerned I have plenty of subjects to talk about. However since payment for the flag committee comes out of the revenue which we are being asked to pass, I think I have a legal right, as has every hon. member, to talk about any subject pertaining to it.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member seems to contradict what he said a moment ago when he recognized that he was prepared to accept the ruling of the Chair. If he does, then I would ask him to pass on to another subject.

Mr. Kindt: I think I am being denied my rights as a member and should have the same privilege as all other hon. members who have spoken on this matter. Why did the Chair not make a ruling at the beginning? Mr. Turner on the other side spoke for ten to 20 minutes on the flag.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I think the record will bear out the fact that I spoke for no more than five minutes. I would also ask the hon. member to follow the rules of the house and to refer to my constituency.

Mr. Kindt: I apologize but I could not remember his constituency. Which is it?

Mr. Turner: St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. Kindt: Thank you. Now, turning to some of the other issues raised in the press, it seems there is a general impression that people from the west are opposed to this, that and the other. As a matter of fact, I have a press cutting before me headed "Anti-Dief line-up grows". I should like to tell all hon. members that here is one representative from western Canada who is 100 per cent behind the Leader of the Opposition. There is no question but that the Grits, the Liberals, would like to get rid of him more than any other man.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Kindt: They say "Oh, no", but the very fact they say that means "Oh, yes".

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Moreau: Heaven forbid.

Mr. Kindt: In connection with this feeling of the people, let me say I am going to speak at a meeting of the Legion next week at Barons, and the Legion there covers members over the whole area of southern Alberta. It will be a good meeting and there will be in no respect whatever any friendly talk about the present Prime Minister, his program on the flag and other matters.

Since I am prevented from raising some of the matters I had in mind I shall close my remarks by saying to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that I would hope he would come out to my constituency and meet the five or six thousand Indians who live there, and also give them an opportunity to meet him, either in Calgary or Fort Macleod, or some such spot. If he did that he would learn from them what their views are regarding their treaty rights. I will go one step further and suggest that he should make an honest effort to reread these treaties and to put down in writing his interpretation of what they mean to the Indians. The officials of his department are not aware of these rights. I received a letter some time ago, and in order to answer that letter I purposely worded a request for information to the department in such a way that to answer they would have to read treaty No. 7. I did receive an appropriate answer from the department, so I know that at least one official read treaty No. 7. We are making a little progress.

I hope the minister, for the sake of his relationships with the Indians, will give them what they deserve and what Canada as a nation has promised to give them. Let me repeat, so long as the sun shines and the rivers flow the rights given under these treaties should be respected, and they must be respected, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Macleod permit a question?

Mr. Kindt: Yes.

Mr. Badanai: Is he aware of the fact that the minister made a statement recently in this house to the effect that the Indian bands would be consulted before any changes in the services provided to Indian communities are made? In view of that statement, no change will be made without consultation.

Mr. Kindt: I am aware of that statement, but why did the department not call the Indians together and ask them whether they want these changes? I think the department is going at it in the wrong direction. You are ignoring the rights and insulting the Indians.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, in order to give a breather to the Conservatives who continue their marathon, and to give them a chance to charge their batteries, because it seems they intend to continue the same marathon until Friday, I will make a few remarks with respect to the doings of some people within the C.B.C. The C.B.C. was mentioned this afternoon; it is a crown corporation whose yearly deficit of $80 million has to be paid by the Canadian taxpayers, and when we ask questions of the Secretary of State about it, it is practically impossible to get any information. We always get the answer: "the C.B.C. is a crown corporation which does not have to reveal such and such information", so that it is very difficult to get any information.

A while ago I heard the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot use rather strong language in connection with the C.B.C. when he told us that there is partisanship within that corporation and that it harbours separatists.

However, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot forgot to tell us that when his party was in office, there was also partisanship in the C.B.C. and that it is perhaps at that time that separatism started within the C.B.C. because at the time when his government was in office, there were one million unemployed in Canada, the greatest number of them in the province of Quebec.

Maybe that is one of the reasons why there are within the C.B.C. people in favour of separatism.

Are they to be blamed, or should we not rather blame those who tolerated an economic system which produced poverty in the midst of plenty for six years, while we had one million unemployed in Canada in 1962-63?

Mr. Chairman, there are shortcomings at the C.B.C., as I said time and again, there is especially a socializing group in this corporation, where parliament is treated in an indifferent, indeed, offhand manner; for those people, a member of parliament or a minister has no importance. But it is noteworthy—and Liberals as well as Conservatives noticed it, and it is not new—that as soon as a socialist from abroad visits this country, the C.B.C. presents interviews with those socialist visitors from France, Belgium, the Soviet union, in short, from any part of the world. Yet, those C.B.C. people refuse to give more or as much importance to what happens here in Canada in our own country.

At noon I mentioned an editorial published in L'Action of yesterday, signed by Mr. Lorenzo Paré. The title is:

In the caldron of Le Devoir's witch.

Mr. Paré says this:

L'Action had published an editorial giving the reasons why, in our opinion, the Queen deserved a nice welcome in Quebec. Local C.B.C. officials—

This is in Quebec city.

—asked us whether we would be prepared to express again the same opinions on the national TV network. Of course, we were. We had to get approval from Montreal, which refused to accept this plea for the Queen on the pretence that the C.B.C. avoided controversial issues.

However, in the same telephone call in which they refused a commentary on the forthcoming visit of the Queen, the C.B.C. offered us, from Montreal, to take part in a televised conference by Mr. Jacques Berque who advocates separatism for Quebec as a preliminary to the triumph, in our province, of the Marxist revolution.

In the opinion of a small C.B.C. Montreal clique the Queen's visit to Quebec was "too controversial an issue"; but the separatist and communist revolution was not. The interview with Mr. Berque was taped at the Palais Montcalm, on October 2 last.

Who is this Jacques Berque? He is a bird from France: he has visited us three times in less than two years, and one visit lasted a month. A specialist in "decolonization", he has come to "sell" the French Canadians the Algerian recipe of blood and bombs. He is the one who wrote, between two trips to Montreal, that "Quebec will soon become a gigantic Cuba". He is the high priest whose words one finds, almost literally, in the Parti Pris communist manifesto, and the speaker provided for the students of the University of Montreal—

—by the Marxist or socialist organization of the province of Quebec.

Does this crown corporation, which exists, thanks to the funds supplied by the French Canadian public as well as the English Canadian public, in short the Canadian people, have the right to act in this manner, to refuse that wholesome discussions be broadcast over its network while such people as this Jacques Berque are invited to appear on its network?

That is the situation. In my opinion the minister is in a position to find those who are responsible for the programs which are presented to the listeners throughout the province, to the televiewers throughout Canada.

A while ago I heard Liberal members say: Why not give us the names of the socialists with the C.B.C.? We are not even capable of finding out who is responsible for the programs in general, for this or that program. It would seem that no one person holds a responsible position within the C.B.C.

You request information from the president of the C.B.C., Mr. Alphonse Ouimet, and he dares to reply to you without even signing the letter. In fact, it is only signed with a rubber stamp.

That is the manner in which the members of parliament requesting information are treated by the C.B.C. officials. And this is why I object to these flagrant abuses.

I mentioned several times the fact that during the national news, at half past ten in the evening, the C.B.C. out of a ten minute period devotes only one and a half minutes, two minutes, two minutes and a half at most to the events taking place in Canada, inside our own boundaries, while we are told about what the socialists and communists of the world are doing.

Why not give more importance to events at home? Why not invite more regularly and more often speakers who are able to inform our Canadian people right here in Canada; in short, why not invite authentic Canadians? But no, they invite people like Mr. Berque, to mention only one.

Not so long ago another individual, a man by the name of Chartrand, of Montreal, spent a month in Cuba. As soon as he returned, he was a guest on the C.B.C.'s press conference program, to inform us that since Castro took over in Cuba the country has become an earthly paradise and all that is missing now over there is American soap and toilet paper. Imagine telling us that on the C.B.C. network.

Recently the new attorney general of the province of Quebec gave a conference or presided over a meeting of the members of the Montreal chamber of commerce. Mr. Chartrand was there and interrupted the speaker with abusive remarks.

If Mr. Chartrand or any other Canadian did the same thing to Mr. Castro in Cuba when he holds a meeting, he would be shot on the spot before he had time to break or try to break a meeting of the Cuban dictator.

They ought to be logical at the C.B.C., a crown corporation which spends every year $80 million of the Canadian taxpayers' money, instead of broadcasting programs likely to shock the Canadian people and especially the French Canadians.

The French Canadian people are not revolutionaries. They want justice in their country and they want justice from the C.B.C., whose broadcasts should be of such a nature as to inform the public and not to rouse it, as it is the case at the present time.

I have received anonymous letters from Montreal, advising me that the C.B.C. will not invite me any more to press conferences broadcast from its studios. As a matter of fact, it has been more than a year now since I was invited to press conferences by that corporation. It makes no difference to me, for I shall make use of private television in due time. But, here again, it is discrimination.

Who tells the C.B.C. to invite so and so but not to invite somebody else? We have no objection to seeing Liberals, Conservatives, New Democrats or Social Crediters invited to press conferences. But we do object to having the C.B.C. commit the most glaring and awful injustice toward the Canadian people.

Not all the staff of the C.B.C. should be held responsible. The ordinary employees are respectable men and women who work hard at their jobs. We have here in the press gallery some model employees. There is Mr. Grenier, Mr. Poliquin, Mr. Baulu, model employees who are keeping Montreal informed on what goes on in this house.

But who, in Montreal, is authorized to cut down the news submitted? Who are the responsible parties? That is what we should like to know. We want to know the people we are paying and we want to know those who are interested in presenting to us the supporters of subversive doctrines in the world. That is what we want to know: the programming authorities, and even those above them. Surely, there are some, but we cannot know their names.

When we put questions to the minister responsible in the house for that corporation, he replies that he will get information. He makes inquiries and the next day, he says: Well, nobody is aware. Thus, they pass the buck. One says it is not his fault and he passes the buck and the next one says: It is not my fault either.

There is no one responsible at C.B.C. and yet, we are sometimes presented with absolutely stupid programs, and that is an understatement. The C.B.C. must be brought back to reason and the government must see to it that the greatest importance is attached to what is going on in that corporation.

The C.B.C. is not "Radio-international," it is not "Radio-France", it is not "Radio-Cuba", it is the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

The C.B.C. should first of all be concerned with what is going on in Canada and it should inform the Canadian population on that. That is its role and it is for that purpose that this crown corporation was set up.

And let the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at least respect the intelligence of Canadians in all provinces.

As far as French programming is concerned, let them at least respect what is happening in the province of Quebec as well as the intelligence of our people.

The C.B.C. is the organization responsible for the publicity given to terrorism in the province of Quebec.

I agree that there are separatists, that there are people who do not share the views of others; I admit that there are people who want to attain a greater degree of independence and of freedom; but they should resort to honest means and not to bombs and blood, as Mr. Berque wishes. It is not in bloody revolutions that the people find their way. In every bloody revolution, it is the people who suffer and pay with their liberty.

Mr. Chairman, the C.B.C. should be the champion of security, of freedom of the press and also of freedom of speech. On the other hand, these freedoms are not one-way freedoms. There are means of holding a dialogue, of reaching an agreement, and also there is always a means of discussing, but the C.B.C. definitely does not allow it.

Mr. Chairman, those are the few remarks I had to make regarding the C.B.C. I think that all the political parties in this house are fed up with the actions of certain C.B.C. officials.

That Montreal should dictate the policy of the corporation at Quebec or at Ottawa, we do not agree; with respect to French programming, this is neither logical nor normal. Let those in Montreal who are unable to assume their responsibilities be removed from the positions they are now holding.

Terrorists and other persons should stop being paid to try and arouse the people or attempt to stir up a revolution. That crown corporation should stop being used to cater to the lower instincts of human nature. On the contrary, it should appeal to people's intelligence and common sense and present educational programs that will raise the intellectual level of the nation instead of lowering and depreciating it.

Mr. Chairman, so far as French programming is concerned, many are afraid to criticize the C.B.C. for fear of some kind of retaliation or to have officials of this crown corporation replaced.

Mr. Chairman, whatever threats some official of the C.B.C. may choose to make, this will never stop me from exposing evil where it exists, from denouncing such communists as may be hiding within the confines of the C.B.C., because it is not those people who are paying for the C.B.C., but the whole Canadian population. Let us assume our responsibilities as members of parliament and let us stop playing politics.

I heard a short while ago the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) blame the Liberals and suggest that they tolerate the doings of the C.B.C. The Conservative party tolerated it the same way during the six years they were in power. Let us not pass the buck but, all together, let us take our responsibilities and make the necessary changes in order that the C.B.C. may reflect a truly Canadian spirit directed towards its destiny.

[Text]

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, one always listens with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Lapointe, and we did so today. I must confess that his vehemence and his emphasis do not always convince us he is correct. However, I feel that some of the points he made today indeed merit very full consideration. I cannot agree with him, though, when he attributes to the past government the programming mistakes of the C.B.C. today. This seems to me to be carrying the principle of responsible government just a little bit too far. I do not see how any government can be responsible for actions that take place after it is out of office. This indeed is the responsibility he would have us accept.

I know that during the last few days a great deal has been said about the C.B.C. generally, and in particular about its programming. I should like to add my voice to these comments because the conduct of the C.B.C. undoubtedly affects my constituency much more than it would the constituency of the hon. member for Lapointe or the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. Caouette: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am the member for Villeneuve, for the information of my good friend.

Mr. Turner: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The C.B.C. is in the constituency of St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. Cantelon: I did not say these gentlemen were not concerned with the C.B.C.. However, I believe I am still right in my contention because the only television programs available in my constituency are those brought to us by the C.B.C. These are the only programs we are able to see, so I believe I was quite correct.

The C.B.C. is of concern to the Kindersley constituency, particularly because it is one of those unfortunate fringe areas where television coverage is such that it is described by the operators as a class B or class C fringe zone. Those of you who have had experience with this will know it is not too good. As I have said before, the C.B.C. is of concern to my constituency because it is a constituency in which there is nothing but C.B.C. coverage. The private network has no coverage in the area. Obviously, for these reasons, and since we have no alternative, C.B.C. programming concerns us very much.

When we learn that the C.B.C. intends to invest $128 million in developing, expanding or consolidating services in the three major cities of Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto, we are very much concerned indeed, and I think I ought to say we are not very happy about the situation. No one, I believe, could expect us to feel other than that this is an unfair use of the taxpayers' money. It is the taxpayers' money when we, in parliament, are asked to vote $88 million this year to cover the operating deficit of the C.B.C. In this respect, I should like to quote from the Winnipeg Free Press editorial of August 13 of this year, as follows:

> The financial statement of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for 1963-64 shows the continued expansion of the government owned corporation. During the year the C.B.C. received, as a grant from parliament, some $78 million; in advertising revenue, interest, etc., it took in a further $33 million, giving total revenues of $111 million.

Expenses, however, totalled $115 million, leaving the C.B.C. some $4 million in the hole, over and above the $78 million subsidy it received from parliament.

More alarming to the Commons public accounts committee, however, was the sharp increase in C.B.C. capital costs, particularly those relating to the consolidation of facilities in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal.

Those are the facilities to which I just referred.

A year ago the cost of consolidation was given as $83 million. But last month the C.B.C. president told the committee that this figure had been raised to $105 million. Now the annual report raises it again, this time to $128 million.

In other words, up and up it goes and there does not seem to be very much control.

The committee has expressed "grave concern"—and understandably—at the size of these capital outlays. It is particularly concerned at the amount of money being spent in these three eastern cities when there still remain areas of Canada that do not have adequate television facilities. Part of the C.B.C.'s purpose as outlined in the annual report itself is "By using its physical resources to bring the national program service to as many Canadians as finances allow".

Now, I would not want anyone to think that I regret spending this money. I know, and everyone knows, that we cannot have a good C.B.C. operation unless money is spent. In this country in particular where much of the service must be given to rather slimly settled areas, there is no way in which enough money can be garnered to carry the whole load. Generally speaking we feel however that in past years the C.B.C. has been doing a fine job. I think we feel also that in recent years there has been a tendency, first, to forget that all Canadians and not just the heavily populated areas are entitled to satisfactory service and, second, the C.B.C. goes to the homes—I want to emphasize that point—goes to the homes and should regard its programs in a corresponding light.

The hon. member for Calgary North, who was a member of the public accounts committee and so had an opportunity to study the accounts of the C.B.C. at some length, and who is familiar with the Glassco report, had some very pertinent points to make about the C.B.C. and its financing. I think the most important one is the fact that parliament has no practical way of controlling the expenditures of the C.B.C. We might refuse to vote the money asked for, but to me this is an impractical procedure and I feel many others feel this way too.

We suspect that in the operations of the corporation there are areas where the money might be directed to other purposes, and areas where there are inefficiency and waste. Unfortunately there is no committee specifically charged with the responsiblity of reviewing the C.B.C.'s operations, particularly its financial operations.

True, the government makes much of the fact that it has appointed an advisory committee outside the house to bring in a report and the President of the Privy Council says that a house committee will be set up to study this report. This sounds fine, but it is not what we want. If the government proceeds no faster in this matter than it has in others, we will be discussing the C.B.C. two years from now, and meanwhile the C.B.C. will be spending in its usual, unrestrained way. This is an organization that consistently overspends its budget and it seems to say, "Why not—the deficits are paid by the people." If it were a private corporation, as the hon. member for York-Humber suggests it should be, certainly no deficits would be incurred. However, I would be one of the last to suggest that the corporation be sold to private interests. There are strong reasons why it should not be.

It is my belief that the C.B.C. is primarily an instrument of national policy. It should be a unifying force for the nation and this, with perhaps some exceptions, it has been. It should be its interest to maintain and develop a Canadian culture; and I mean a Canadian culture, not a French Canadian or an English Canadian culture. So far I have not been able to see anything especially remarkable in French Canadian culture which indicates it is worth retaining, in preference to a truly Canadian culture which we might, and indeed should, develop. However if the French Canadian wants to keep it, let him, so long as he does not want to force it down the throats of the rest of us. I am sure this is the way he feels about English Canadian culture. He does not want to be compelled to accept English Canadian culture, and I think most of us are generous enough to concede him the right that we want for ourselves.

Nevertheless, this will never be a nation if we do not develop a truly Canadian way of thinking and unify our two diverse cultures. The C.B.C. is one factor that should assist in the melding of the two cultures. I am not foolish enough to think that this unification will mean similarity. This is most unlikely, but it ought to mean a greater interchange and much more co-operation between the two parts of Canada concerned, and certainly the C.B.C. has its part to play in that interchange. I doubt if it would play such a part if it were a private business. Indeed, if it were it seems to me we would find U.S. programming and United States events taking a disproportionate amount of the time of the medium. This would lead to even faster and greater Americanization than is occurring. Neither English speaking nor French speaking Canadians care for that. Although we may admire and respect the American way of life I think we prefer our own.

I would like to return again to the principle of one of the comments made by the hon. member for Calgary North as recorded at page 9472 of Hansard for Tuesday, October 27, when he said:

> In order to deal effectively with the C.B.C. from year to year there is no question in my mind that we need a standing committee on broadcasting and a committee should be set up immediately to go into the affairs of the corporation forthwith.

There is no question in my mind either that a committee is necessary.

It is quite apparent that the board of directors does not exercise effective financial control. If it did, would it tolerate consistent overspending? Surely no board cares so little for its reputation that it would allow the company it controls to overspend year after year. This in itself is sufficient reason.

Since I have previously pointed out that my constituency is limited to the reception of C.B.C. television programs I would like to ask what is going on? I would also like to emphasize the dissatisfaction which many of my constituents, if not most of them, feel with some of the programs presented. Of course I refer particularly to the far out plays—I suppose the C.B.C. would call them artistic dramas, the sort of thing which we have been subjected to this last two years.

At once I would like to make the point that the C.B.C. is not a theatre in the accepted meaning of the term. A theatre does not have the entrée to the living room of the home. No indeed, people who go to a theatre are spending the night out, if I may put it that way. They are adults, the majority of them, with fully formed characters not likely to be influenced by the licence and immorality, and the preoccupation with sins of the flesh which a good proportion of recent C.B.C. plays has shown.

People who go to the theatre choose to do so. But the t.v. sets in my constituency must be turned off if people in their homes do not want to watch the play shown. Indeed parents may do this, but parents cannot always be in the home when such plays are shown, and the t.v. set may be running whether they want it or not. Tens of thousands of Canadians have this reaction, and the best article to state their view that I have come across is one written by Patricia Young in the July 30 edition of Our Sunday Visitor, which is the most widely read Roman Catholic weekly on this continent. I quote from the article as follows:

> Recently, a prominent C.B.C. official, Mario Prizek, in defending some of the television fare that has been coming our way these days, is quoted as saying: "If you don't get some angry reaction from the public, what you're doing doesn't matter to them." I've got news for Mr. Prizek and others of his ilk who seem to have made it their cultural duty to fritter away our hard earned Canadian tax dollars "getting angry reaction." In 1951, when the findings of the Massey commission on broadcasting were made public, the broad objectives of the national system of this public corporation were given as being "to maintain a flow of information and ideas throughout the country." Information, Mr. Prizek, ideas—not a constant assault on character, patriotism and our accepted moral standards.
> Of course, some perverted viewers may have an unhealthy preoccupation with homosexual prostitution, pornography and sadism, but the subjects hardly rate the morbid attention, time and money being spent on them. Take a look at a sampling of the "art and culture" being offered to us by the men who have been hired to spend our tax dollars for us. There was "Two Soldiers," a drama in the Quest series, which depicted two servicemen returning from the army. Not only were they devoid of patriotism, but mouthed the typical ban-the-bomb line and had become homosexually involved (because of their army service?) Oh yes, the public reacted angrily and the Saskatchewan command of the Canadian Legion passed a resolution strongly condemning it.
> You can bet your life we're angry, Mr. Prizek—and justifiably so. Remember "A Second Look" on February 9th, which featured Ralph Ginsburg of New York, publisher of Eros and other pornographic magazines, who was allowed to defend his case on this public corporation of ours despite the fact that he'd just been convicted on 28 counts, sentenced to five years in jail and fined $28,900 for peddling his filth? Obviously, he was happy enough to come across the border and state his case. After all, there was all that taxpayers' money waiting to be spent in the name of "art and culture". And how about the Observer, produced in Toronto and shown on February 13th. Here was a St. Valentine's day offering for starry-eyed romantics which featured Dr. Albert Ellis, who was introduced to us as a "prominent sexologist from the U.S.A.". Did he dwell on the delights of St. Valentine's day? No, sir; that would be kind of "corny" and wouldn't provoke any "angry reaction". Instead, he offered his "professional" view that premarital and extramarital sexual relations were not only normal but necessary, and the best thing for family life!
> On May 13th, we saw The Private Memoirs and Confessions of a Justified Sinner on the Festival series. This gave a distorted conception of religion by showing a pious religious fanatic turn into a man who indulged in violence, rape, perversion, drunkenness, and murder. Certainly, Open Grave, which purported to be a modern day analogy of the Crucifixion, was a sickening perversion of the truth, showing as it did a modern "Christ" as a "misunderstood" ban-the-bomber who was persecuted for leather-jackected fascists" who dared to call him a communist! On June 4th, came to the Trespassers—a C.B.C. radio show on the Assignment series, where we heard the users of marijuana bragging about the joys of using the stuff and making a case for it to be taken off the restricted list in the interests of "personal freedom".

There is a lot more on the same lines but I am afraid I will run out of time if I read it all, so I had better proceed.

As the hon. member for Grey North said in this house a week ago:

Each play appeared to be an effort to outdo the previous one in vulgar language and in portrayals of seduction and illicit love.

Thousands of television viewers across the country were alarmed and disappointed to think that the C.B.C. with its great influence would give time to such revolting plays, which not only displayed bad taste but could be instrumental in promoting immorality in our young people.

With this view I agree 100 per cent. Thousands of television viewers across the country were alarmed and disappointed to think that this kind of stuff could be presented.

Now I should like to refer to some correspondence I have had from my constituency. I would begin by referring to a letter which I received on October 16. It reads:

Dear Sir:

It is with deep regret that we of the Leader "Little Flower" parish council C.W.L. have to protest some of the C.B.C. presentations on television. That such scandalous, licentious, illicit, lewd, irreligious and corrupt pictures are shown is beyond our comprehension. We expect pictures of uplifting and educational qualities to be viewed on a country-wide scale.

We sincerely hope that you, our most worthy representative, will voice our opinion to the C.B.C. and trust that action will be taken to bring us films worthy and fit to be seen on a country-wide scale.

I referred this matter to the Secretary of State. He treated my request with great courtesy and brought it to the attention of the C.B.C., which replied.

As to the quality of reception in my constituency, this is something which has been of concern to us for years. I could best bring it to the attention of the committee if I were to read a letter which I have received, together with a reply on behalf of the corporation. Here is the letter I received on August 20:

[Mr. Cantelon.]

I do not know if you get the opportunity of doing anything relative to our T.V. reception in this locality, but when we read about the C.B.C. spending millions on added facilities in areas where they already have half a dozen outlets, it sure does burn us up living in these fringe areas.

As you know we seldom have a real clear picture, always snow, and most of the time so bad that one can hardly make it out, this summer it seems to be worse than ever, and everybody complaining, the sound has been worse than ever, an odd time you can hear other stations butting in to say nothing of local interference.

Then there is the item of antennas. I imagine they are all 40 feet or more and hundreds of these in a town of our size certainly does not add anything to its general appearance, to say nothing of the cost of them, plus the service. With such a weak signal naturally the antennas have to be kept in good shape, regardless of their unsightly appearance.

These points are not to be laughed off lightly, especially when one sees such large sums of money being spent by the corporation in the consolidation and development of existing facilities. Again, I appreciate the courtesy of the Secretary of State in dealing with this particular problem and I should like to retail his comments briefly. He said:

Unity, Saskatchewan, is situated just outside the "B" service contour of CFQC-TV-1, Stranraer, Saskatchewan, which is a rebroadcasting station of CFQC-TV, Saskatoon, at present an affiliated station of the C.B.C. television network. The corporation does not have a television station of its own in Saskatchewan.

Incidentally, I think it is time something was done about this. I know there is a freeze at present but surely it is time for this freeze to be taken off. The reply continues:

The corporation did make an application to reserve a channel in Saskatoon and was on the verge of applying for authority to establish a station when the freeze on applications for alternative service stations was effected. It has been announced that this freeze will remain in effect until after the report of the committee on broadcasting has been received.

I believe this may be far too long. The letter goes on:

You may recall that the recommendation of the board of broadcast governors for the Stranraer rebroadcasting station was challenged in the courts by Swift Current Telecasting Company Limited, owners of CJFB-TV, whose application for a television rebroadcasting station in Kindersley, Saskatchewan, was recommended for denial by the B.B.G. At the appropriate time, if the corporation is granted authority to proceed with its plans for a television station in Saskatoon, the present Saskatoon station CFQC-TV will no longer be affiliated with the C.B.C. network. In this event, the Swift Current Telecasting Company Limited, which is affiliated with the C.B.C. television network, has given the C.B.C. and the B.B.G. notice that it will apply for authority to establish a station of substantial power to serve the Kindersley areas. In this way, the area would receive a proportion of C.B.C. service along with local and regional programs via Swift Current.

Unity, Saskatchewan, is on the fringe of the "B" service contour of this proposed station.

With these comments, Mr. Chairman, I should like to call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, when I called it six o'clock I was left with only a few minutes of time, and in these few minutes I should like to deal with two matters which were brought up by previous speakers. First, it is evident that Liberal members do not want a committee to supervise the spending of the C.B.C. or to recommend program regulation. The hon. member for Halifax made this abundantly clear, in my view, when he listed three reasons for not having such a committee. These reasons are to be found at page 9443 of Hansard and the first reason is because it would be contrary to the principle of independence. Just what does he mean by that? Independence to do just as the C.B.C. pleases? I call that licence. I am sure the hon. member would agree it should have freedom to work within the framework of what is envisaged as its prime function. As that great prime minister R. B. Bennett saw it when it was created, it was to be a vehicle for national education and for national unity. I am sure he did not see it operating within that framework as a vehicle to deprave the morals of the youth of this country. We need a committee to check that licence. We need a committee to see that it does not subvert that purpose and to bring it back to reality if it does.

The second reason the hon. member gave was that it would be using parliamentary time to discuss the internal direction of a crown corporation. When I consider the many ways in which we use time in parliament I must confess that this does not disturb me very much. His third objection was the lack of expert knowledge by members of this house of the broadcasting art. I just wonder whether he is really making this suggestion seriously. We deal with a great many matters in this house on which it can be said that many members are not too well informed. This is partly due to the fact that there are inadequate opportunities for the members to become so informed. However, his criticism does not seem to me to be a valid one, for if we are going to deal with the work of the C.B.C. I am sure there would be many members who would be interested enough to inform themselves on the business of the C.B.C. and be able intelligently to discuss it and to deal with it. So much for his objections.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George spent five minutes this afternoon accusing my party of filibustering.

Mr. McIlraith: Hear, hear.

Mr. Cantelon: If we are, then we had a good lesson from the Liberal party in 1962-63. He can quote figures, but the facts are that the government does not know how to run or how to organize the business of parliament and the business of the country. This has been demonstrated over and over. Does he need proof? There were the 60 days of decision; the withdrawal of the withholding tax; the fiasco of the 1963 budget; the painful orthodoxy of the 1964 one; the 11 per cent sales tax reduced to 4 per cent, upped to 8 per cent and which finally will become 11 per cent; the Canada pension plan with its "three times and out"; and the 38 pieces of legislation which the Prime Minister would have had us consider before summer recess. A Prime Minister should know more about the business of the country than that. And so one could go on ad infinitum, but I think I have demonstrated the point I set out to make, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the last speaker have clearly summarized the reasons why this country is facing today some of the gravest problems in its 97 years. There are grave doubts about our future expressed in every area of this nation, and these doubts do not decrease as time goes on but rather increase. They increase because people are concerned not only about the manner in which the present government is endeavouring to run the country but the manner in which it is giving away, around the bargaining table, rights which have been accepted as federal in nature and, even more than that, rights which have been accepted as necessary if we are to maintain a strong federal system in this nation of ours.

On September 17, in a press conference in Vancouver, the Prime Minister stated, among other things: "We have had more federal-provincial meetings in the last year and a half than I think in any other period". I believe that is true and I have no argument with that statement. The only realistic argument in this regard is that the federal government is taking an awful beating from the provincial premiers at the federal-provincial meetings. If we are to continue to have this type of conference, and that appears to be the case, we will end up without a federal system of government, and without a nation.

Mr. Lloyd: Why not get the facts?

Mr. Coates: The elder spokesman from Halifax once again is speaking from his seat. I cannot understand what he is saying, but perhaps he will get up on his feet at a later date and make some contribution to this debate. I am sure his constituents are very anxious for him to do that. I think he should make some constructive suggestions, in view of the problems in his constituency which did not exist 18 months ago.

Mr. Lloyd: You are well informed, sometimes.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, I come from a part of Canada which cannot afford to allow a weakening of the federal system. There is a great deal of concern in the province of Quebec about its future, where it is going and how it is going to obtain the financial assistance from the people of this nation, and the people of Quebec, necessary to run its affairs in a manner satisfactory to the citizens. If this problem does exist in the province of Quebec I suggest it is the type of problem which is of some concern to the people of that province. If that is a problem there, what must be the problem in the Atlantic provinces, which have been battling these difficulties for a much longer period of time? Those provinces received no assistance whatsoever from the federal government until the Conservative administration took office, and lost that assistance which it received for six years as soon as the present government was re-elected to office.

I have no argument about the fact that the province of Quebec has financial problems, because I believe that is the situation. That may very well be the basic reason for the unrest we have heard and read so much about lately on television and in the newspapers. I do not believe this government is giving enough attention to either the economic problems of the province of Quebec or the economic problems of the whole Atlantic area. This is of great concern to the maritime provinces because unfortunately we do not have as many people to speak for us as do other provinces. Furthermore, fortunately or unfortunately, we do not have so many unstable residents who, when they do take action to bring their problems to the attention of the public, do so in a manner which neither befits that province nor the nation as a whole. We in the maritime provinces try to bring attention to our problems in a sane and sensible manner. However, we have received nothing but rejection from the government of the day.

If the Prime Minister of this nation spent less time at the table with the provincial premiers giving away federal rights and more time placing legislation on the statute books of this nation, it would be of benefit to the people of this nation. We would not have the provincial premiers on our backs so often, because the people of their provinces would be more satisfied with what was being done by the government in Ottawa, and less concerned about the fact that the provincial governments need more money to take the action which should be taken in the first place by the federal government.

Mr. Chairman, it is all very well for one government to blame another for the difficulties which arise within a nation, but what we have got to face more than anything else is that, unless we maintain a strong federal system, we have no chance of surviving as a nation. It is the height of ridiculousness to talk about associated states. What we need is one nation from coast to coast with equal opportunity for all, wherever they live. There is only one way to obtain this type of future welfare for our people, and that is by maintaining a strong central governmental system.

In this nation, which really has only two rich provinces—Ontario and British Columbia —and some other provinces which were have-not provinces when the Conservatives came into office in 1957, but have had many of their ills cured by the actions of the Diefenbaker administration during those years, there is only one area that is deserving of preferential treatment as far as I am concerned, and that is the area which lies east of the eastern Ontario border. It is absolutely essential that the federal government establish policies which will be beneficial to all these provinces. That cannot be done by a weakened, vacillating government which makes one blunder after another, earning little or no respect from anyone with whom it holds conferences. That is the situation which exists today. The provincial premiers look at the federal government and at its record during the last year and a half, and say to themselves that any negotiations will be a piece of cake, because the federal representatives are diplomats and believe that diplomacy is a matter of agreeing to everything suggested. That is an illustration of what we have received from the government in the way of negotiations at the federal-provincial level.

There has never been a more realistic statement made during the past 18 months in relation to federal-provincial negotiations than that made by Premier Robarts of Ontario on October 22. Here is the premier of one of the rich provinces speaking, one of the men who is in the best bargaining position, no matter how you look at it, one of the men who has less to fear from an economic point of view from the erosion of federal powers as we see it today. Yet we find the premier of Ontario stating that he is finished with these special deals that have been going on between the federal government and the province of Quebec, that he will not countenance separation either by one province or a group of provinces and that he will not countenance the contracting out of federal-provincial programs unless there are guaranteed national standards in these fields.

From the point of view of a member from the Atlantic provinces these were mighty good words to hear. This is the type of words we like to hear spoken, because there is no hope for us in the Atlantic provinces if the present government allows this country to be balkanized as is the case at present in the propositions it is putting forward. In an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of September 11 Joseph Scanlon stated among other things that $200 million would be made available to the province of Quebec on the basis of contracting out agreements which would run until 1970. He lists in detail the various programs which the government of the province of Quebec plans to contract out of and they include hospital insurance, old age, blind and disabled persons pensions, health grants, forestry agreements, campground and picnic area agreements. Some of them expire before 1970 and some of them continue until 1970.

But what a dangerous situation is inherent in this contracting out program. Where do we go when this is finished? How difficult must the financial situation of the province of Quebec be if the government of that province has to turn to this type of method to secure the finances it needs to discharge its duties to its citizens. There must be other ways. There must also be other ways in order to protect the have-not provinces of this country and to see that they are assured of at least minimum standards in every area of services.

Along with the erosion of federal responsibilities a degree of disunity has developed in this country which no one would have anticipated even five years ago. I say five years ago because I consider that period of time a good yardstick. In 1959 our Queen visited us, as she did this year, and all one has to do is to go back to 1959, recall her visit then and compare it with her visit this year. When she visited Canada in 1959 we were a happy people. We looked forward to her coming. We celebrated in a joyous manner while she was here. There was great pride in our achievements and great hope for our future.

She came this year and before she even arrived there was tremendous concern that if she did come she would never leave alive. Harsh words were spoken about her. She came to the beautiful and gracious city of Quebec, and Quebec was like an armed camp preparing for the visit of a dictator. What a change in five years. Why? Why all of a sudden have we become so disenchanted with our own country? It is strange indeed that so much could have happened in such a short period of time.

There are many things that one can point to as reasons why this change has taken place. Certainly one of the reasons is the fact that we have so many parties in the house at the present time. I think another realistic reason is found in the fact that that portion of the Social Credit party which later became the Ralliement Creditiste party decided they had an opportunity to grasp a good deal of power and influence in the province of Quebec. They developed a nationalistic feeling in that province which they cannot now control, nor for that matter does it seem that anyone else can control its outer fringes.

There is also the fact that the people of the nation could not make up their minds as to what party should form the government and they still have not made up their minds. I have no doubt that if we had an election tomorrow there would be a good deal of difficulty in trying to predict what number of seats any party would have when the votes were counted. But associated with this reason is the fact that in the election of a minority government the people were convinced they were going to get able and aggressive leadership, and instead they got a government that has been accident prone ever since it took office. I do not think you have to take my word for that, Mr. Chairman. Too many articles have been written by too many men in the press gallery who were formerly strong and devout supporters of the Pearson team as it went to the people in 1962 and 1963. The Liberals had all the answers during those two campaigns but today they neither have the answers nor do they know in what direction they are going, nor can we be sure they will be going in the same direction today as they were going yesterday.

In order to fortify my statement I will put a few short quotations on the record from a number of men who, apparently, have become disenchanted with Prime Minister Pearson and his followers. The first is Peter Newman, well known for his articles about the Conservative government of John Diefenbaker, and their attitude when in office. I am looking for the quotation and there is so much interesting material here it is difficult to find. He says:

> Although there have been almost none of the brassband disasters of the Diefenbaker years, in my opinion the domestic policies of the Liberals have been a grave, quiet failure.

They just sort of rolled up their sleeping bags and died.

Then, there is this article in the Montreal Star of September 12, 1964 entitled "Mr. Pearson's Diet of Crow":

> No one eats crow with nicer manners or more grace than Prime Minister Pearson.
> One concludes he must like the dish, since he returns so often to the table.

The article continues in that vein and is no kinder in its treatment of the Prime Minister as it reaches the end. Then, there is Charles Lynch, certainly not a writer to whom we could ever point as one who gave us strong support. He has made similar comments on more than one occasion. I think, from a maritime point of view, what he says about the Minister of Finance is interesting. The Minister of Finance is the one who is well known as the man who was going to solve all our problems in the maritime provinces by giving us a one way ticket out. Charles Lynch says this:

> Mr. Gordon is an optimist—it would be uncharitable to call him a cockeyed optimist, after all the other things he's been called—and he really believes these new measures will work, and will benefit the economy, and will erase the memory of his measures to keep Canada Canadian last year, which wrecked his budget and nearly wrecked him.

These are not very kind words about the man who was one of the strong advocates of the Pearson team. These are the men about whom we are concerned, about whom I am concerned as are most Canadians, because we wonder what our future is and where we will be when we celebrate our 100th anniversary.

[Mr. Coates.]

We have a lot of serious problems facing us in the next three years. If we could get some decisive policies from this government, if we could see ourselves going forward with programs which were in the best interests of Canada, if we could hope that they would try to shore up the powers of the federal administration at the conference table rather than continually being forced to give in and back down, if we could hope that this government would provide that type of leadership for this country they would receive our support because it would be the type of action we know would be in the best interests of Canada.

How can you stand back and review the sad story of the first 18 months this government has been in office and want to allow them to give away any more of what we have worked so desperately hard to build in the last 97 years? I do not blame Premier Robarts for making the statement he did in the way he did. It is like a professional playing in a game with an amateur. After a while, you get tired of winning and I would think that this must almost be the case with the provincial premiers as they sit down at the table with the Prime Minister and his cabinet ministers. They must not only get tired of winning, but they must see what is happening to this nation as a result of the fact they are winning every round. There are not many more rounds in this fight if we keep watching the Prime Minister get flattened in the ring. If he is flattened many more times in the same round, the championship will be awarded to the provinces and we will have ten associated states, but not for very long. We will become, whether we like it or not, a part of the United States of America because there will be nowhere else for us to go.

I would think the people of Quebec would be more concerned about this situation than anyone else because they seem to be so jealous of the special rights they have received under the British North America Act. Surely, they are not so unrealistic as to believe they could maintain that culture they love so dearly, and that language they love so dearly if they became part of the United States. Certainly they cannot exist as an island on the North American continent for any great length of time.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that anyone could accuse me of having impeded, in any manner whatsoever, since the beginning of this session, the work of this house, if the word "work" can be considered as appropriate.

Most of the time I observed, and this allowed me to note interesting facts which explain to a certain extent the economic disarray which at the present time afflicts the people of Canada.

At the beginning of my remarks allow me to sum up some facts which one can easily observe daily in this house: approximately 50 per cent of the questions asked at the beginning of the sittings are out of order, because they are not urgent and even a great number are futile. The press gallery attracts too many members who are more interested in showing off than in looking for true solutions to the present economic problems.

In my opinion, this unrestrained pride denotes a state of mind which is incompatible with the duties and the responsibilities of a representative who must first of all endeavour to serve his electors before helping himself.

One would not need to look around very long to find illustrations of the results of such a state of mind. The flourishing speeches delivered in view of raising the dignity of the representative of the people will carry no results if the persons concerned do not attempt to prove seriously that they are somewhat conscious of their responsibilities.

In my opinion too many seem to strain their ingenuity through a verbiage which is often useless, to waste much of the time of the house, by repeating time and again, with some variations in delivery, the same things which were previously said.

I concede that, in politics, repetitions are better than contradictions. However, I have known liars who would come to believe their own lies just by repeating them often enough.

Certain politicians should be careful on that point, lest responsible observers notice that rather weak side of their personality.

I know that parliament is a place where one must necessarily expect discussions, since we are here to legislate and to amend the laws governing our land, but it is always a good thing to stick to a happy medium and I feel that one should not break too often the rules of normal limitations. Consequently, I would be in favour of any reasonable amendment to our standing orders which would make it possible for us to get practical results from our discussions.

In final analysis, that is what the Canadian people expect from us.

At present, we do not seem to find the time to consider serious legislation but that does not stop us from wasting time in spite of the fact that, in all walks of life, Canadians have to pay the taxes we levy.

I fail to understand how a certain number of supposedly serious people can be so lacking in their responsibilities to those who, at the price of great sacrifice, pay us high salaries that we do not have too much trouble negotiating. Those who claimed that members of parliament would be more interested in their work if they were well paid or better paid, must admit that the results of this session do not prove them right.

Those who are responsible for the introduction of legislation should make use of the best talents in the drafting of the various bills in order to prevent contradiction and especially to display enough foresight so as not to be faced with the alternative of having to make radical amendments as a result of pressures or discussions indicating want of foresight incompatible with common sense.

I would add that the problem is not a lack of legislation; I rather think that there is too much—it is somewhat like the flag models; we have thousands of them, but we lack determination on the means to take to adopt one.

This brings to my mind a thought which sums up a form of diplomacy in politics consisting in giving what we do not have and promising what we cannot give.

We have perhaps too many politicians who practice this kind of diplomacy; it is a cooing diplomacy which gives a great deal of expectations without any fulfilment.

The financial and economic situation in this country requires that personal political ambitions be left aside and that all people of goodwill endeavour to direct our country towards the objectives wanted by all Canadian citizens; peace, security and freedom to live in accordance with the vast potentialities of the country; this constitutes a great program of activities requiring an active and well-understood co-operation.

We have within reach a very efficient instrument of action, provided we get the loyal support of the majority of citizens of goodwill.

Among the various ways of celebrating properly the centennial of our confederation we should include, in the light of our errors and achievements, the firm determination to prepare for the future another 100 years better than those the Canadian people have lived through since the 1867 confederation, taking into consideration the facts existing now, with the knowledge that tomorrow's happening is often the result of yesterday's or today's action.

We should consider the situation of the Canadian people as a whole who have to support three governments, municipal, provincial and federal, paying taxes of all possible kinds conceived by the servants of our present financial system which is in continuing disagreement with the existing economic realities with its powers, it becomes a determining factor of the type of living the citizens of our country may enjoy.

And here I believe it is in order to quote an excerpt from a pamphlet entitled: "Merci du Communisme", written by Reverend Father Dugré of the Jesuit order. He said:

When hungry people ask for bread or for houses, should we give them a fine admonition or a house? When a young nation wants to avail itself of its vacant resources to develop, establish its sons, work for its own self, organize a fruitful life, why support it for ten years through the dole, while saving the national wealth for foreign capital?

By the way, I can say that I had personal knowledge of the famous ten year depression, and I may add that I have never forgiven the administrative system of that time for having kept us, healthy young men, ready to prepare their future, deprived for ten years of the possibility of earning 50 cents per day, or at least, deprived of the work we wished to have. And now I shall resume the quotation:

If there is a country which offers the possibility of a temporal life, it is indeed ours. In those resources challenging us, which God puts at our disposal, we should find a fuller life, or, otherwise, we shall clumsily go against the Creator's will, without being able to put the blame on Him. The fault will be that of the idle leaders, of the improvident ones, who apologize for their inertia by practicing what they call a strict economy.

Our democracy is imperfect, often hypocritical and heartless. It pays too little attention to legitimate complaints or grievances. It is too soft with important people, too hard on the little man. Such a thing ought never to happen in this young country of ours, with its potential prosperity amounting to millions which is hampered by miserable money or only meant for immigrants. There has been too much election politics. What we need is a social policy, aimed at the well-being of the family and the common good rather than for the benefit of friends and contributors to the slush funds.

Those words should make politicians stop and think, at least those who are still able to do so. This booklet is so interesting, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot help quoting another excerpt for the guidance of our planning experts and socialist-minded people. Speaking of Russia, Father Dugré states:

[Mr. Dionne.]

Property, they claim, is being made collective, but you go ahead and try to make your streetcar ticket collective just to see who gets the ride? Communists have stretched to the extreme a calculation which is only half-right. They believed that boundless land, tremendous plants and big housing projects could save labour, heating, etc. They forgot that man is not a set of figures, but has various likes and dislikes, inclinations and aversions. And experience has also shown that 20 plants staffed with 100 men can produce more than just one plant with 2,000 employees, and with less control and more relaxation. Remember the sophism about the house being built by two men in six months; therefore, by 12 men in a month, 300 men in a day, 3,000 men in an hour and 180,000 men in a minute. It can no longer work, and yet the figures are right—

Mr. Chairman, in a civilization where the value of labour is of vital importance but runs the risk of being ignored or jeered at because of lucre, dishonesty and class struggle; charity must replace fear and compromise in the relations between management and labour if the world is to be saved from communistic materialism and if labour is to regain its true worth. It is not in the midst of constant insecurity that labour can carry out its lofty mission of feeding mankind.

Several labour leaders and businessmen begin to admit that a source of income other than the salary must be found in order to ensure a more equitable distribution of the increased production due to technological progress and developments of all kinds. Distribution methods applied up to now according to scarcity will have to be changed so as to adjust to an era of abundance.

There is an interesting article in the August issue of the Reader's Digest entitled:

Will robots control the world?

In a magazine published in 1936 appeared a summary of a study conducted by several scientists who had met in order to find a solution to the problems prevailing at that time. May I quote a few excerpts of an article by Mr. P. Barraud, an engineer:

In short, while the production equipment is work and leisure and, in this way, eliminate destibution have to be completely reorganized.

Therefore, there is only one problem: to distribute the actual wealth, the purchasing power, work and leisure and, in this way, eliminate destitution and insecurity. Let us keep in mind this scene of distribution among children:

10 children, 2 apples, the strongest wins;

10 children who have money, 2 apples, the highest bidder, if protected by police;

10 children, 15 apples, each his own according to appetite.

This is a symbol of the present crisis. We are acting like children.

We must restore the balance between the purchasing power and the value of consumable goods, probably through a distribution of the purchasing power based on needs and not on a piecemeal accountable inventory, or on work which no longer requires energy.

The first step will be to condemn the following ideas:

1. scarcity;
2. value based on supply and demand;
3. freedom of price, work, trade and profit;
4. capital having priority over purchasing power;
5. domestic money based on gold.

We are not building castles in Spain nor proposing a theory, but the consequences of obvious facts.

Canadians are willing to work to manufacture goods. The government should manage to find the money, but should not take it from the needy.

It is not by looking for new terms to qualify the unemployed that idle hands will be provided with an income.

The fact that there are several kinds of unemployment: frictional, residual, chronic, or extended does not provide any income to a discouraged and inactive person.

A sound and orderly economic system geared to the needs of society must provide the necessary factors for security and should enable the people of a country as rich as ours to earn a decent living.

Production is too profit-geared and forgets that its purpose is consumption. I believe that now, during the debate on interim supply, is the time to cast an eye on the way our country is getting into debt. It would help us to see where our system is getting us.

As Canada grows and develops, the national debt increases. Under a system where new developments must be represented in dollar values, and where every new dollar is created in the form of a debt, we have here figures that are astounding. In 1867, the national debt was $93 million. In 1912, $500 million; in 1920, $3,041,529,587.

In 1939, the debt was $3,710 million; in 1947, $17,660 million, and in 1963, over $20 billion.

In the answer to a question I had put on the order paper under No. 854 concerning the amount paid in interest by the Canadian government on the national debt since confederation, we find that Canada has paid to financiers the fabulous amount of $15,287 million, from July 1, 1867 to March 31, 1964.

Mr. Chairman, imagine what could have been done in this country with this fabulous amount of $15 billion in interest only on the national debt.

When the country is in a state of lethargy, during a depression period for instance, its debt remains stationary or increases very little. It is when the country is very active, in wartime for example, that its debt increases the most.

Any increase in the production capacity represents progress and should bring in dividends to the shareholders of Canada, to Canadians. To attain this, the government should, on behalf of the population, issue and distribute new money in order to finance new activities. But when this is left to the banks, which are lending with interest, to supply the necessary funds for progress, it is impossible, financially, to make such progress without running into debt.

We have reached a point where we do not hear any more about the possibility of paying the debt of this country, since too great a percentage of the revenue is being used to pay the interest only which amounts to more than $1 billion.

The government of this country is doing precisely what the law does not normally allow a citizen to do that is "the non-payment of its own debts".

Our wise politicians from all parties may claim to know many things, but they seem to forget that the modern monetary system is above all an accounting system and that accuracy must be its prime quality: accuracy in the outstanding volume of credit. Since this credit represents the method of payment, it is obvious that it should be in keeping with the goods to be disposed of.

The greater the number of products offered for sale, the better prepared to buy them the consumers should be, since these products are made for them. This is not the case at present, control by the banks being what it is. Money is scarce whereas products are plentiful and there are machines and hands waiting for orders to start producing. We find credit controls under various forms and we know there are so many needs to meet.

Of all the dictatorships mentioned in history, of all those at least that we are able to see in action today, the most widespread is, of course, the financed dictatorship. As soon as a country passes the threshold of civilization, it passes under a financial dictatorship.

And this kind of dictatorship has made more victims, imposed more hardship, caused more suffering, wiped out more talents, broken up more homes than any other kind. It left more moral and physical ruins than all wars, however devastating, in the history of the world.

The succession of parties in power changes nothing. It seems that governments are there to tax, impose restrictions, preach hardship, even if there is everything in the country to ensure an easy living for everybody.

This is the same financial policy imposed by the same system upon the men who are in command whether they are from one party or the other.

This does not mean that the financiers are those who invented political parties. No, but as soon as parties became established in politics, first with modest slush funds supplied by those who are favoured with public contracts, the world of finance found there an excellent machinery to control public affairs.

Electoral funds have assumed proportions—and chains also.

All financial credit originates in the bank. By monetizing the national credit on behalf of the government, by means of debentures, the banks are making of the government, whatever party it belongs to, a perpetual debtor. By monetizing the production capacity of the great corporations to which it lends the credit thus established, the banks are placing in bondage the very ones who are filling up the election coffers so as to obtain the protection of the law.

Thus it can be seen that either directly or indirectly, the banking system is placing the government under tutorship. The time has come, I believe, for the people who have the welfare of the country at heart to find another way of coping with this problem.

The present government has succeeded in securing the greatest number of members by means of American financial assistance or publicity. Goods that are subject to such a high pressure advertising campaign always find buyers in the long run, be they of good or poor quality.

In this country we have heard the words "economic crisis", brought about by the stock exchange financiers; we have had deflation, inflation, regression and you know that I am forgetting some; but when all is said and done, it is always a money problem.

The demoralizing situation in 1929 left unforgettable marks which we still feel today. The old parties can no longer count on a meek body of citizens, ready to accept their unforgivable negligence; they will have to admit that the present financial system is obsolete and that it must be replaced by a system intended to help rather than subdue human beings.

Here, I quote from a newspaper published in Montreal an item entitled "Philosophy of Life", and written by H. Louis Arbour:

> One of the greatest mistakes of modern times is that stupid belief in the necessity of poverty. How many people imagine that the poor are necessary and indispensable.
> If in God's creation plan there is no room whatsoever for material wealth, we believe it is our duty to state that poverty also was excluded therefrom. In his great mercy and infinite province, God gave to the earth the power and the order to nourish all his children. Material wealth belong to this world and if they are so badly distributed now, God is not to be blamed. Only man is guilty. We are poor amid a phenomenal affluence. It is up to us to organize in the best interest of all.

In a democracy, the essential function of the government is to manage public affairs according to the principles set up by the people themselves, through their representatives. It is not the function of the government to interfere in the fields of private or co-operative enterprises, to assume responsibilities which belong to the individual by right, or to interfere with the rights of the individuals, except in order to protect the rights of the others.

The purpose of a national finance system is to supply an acceptable means of exchange with an adequate purchasing power, in a free economy, to make possible the distribution of goods equal to the value of the nation's production at a given time, so that each and every citizen may get at least the vital minimum.

A major objective of any well organized society must be to help each citizen obtain by his own work the necessary financial resources to be able to get, for himself and his dependents, an acceptable standard of social welfare, without having to resort to the services of the state. When that is impossible, society must assume the cost of such an acceptable social service, so that this service can be within the financial reach of citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I conclude my remarks by quoting this thought of the founder of the distributive economic doctrine of social credit, Major Douglas:

> Social Credit is a new strategy for an old battle, between the tyrant's will to dominate and the individual's will for freedom.

[Text]

Mr. Chatterton: Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this debate on interim supply I want to refer to a question which I believe will be one of greatest importance in the history of Canada, namely the question of the relationship of the federal government to the provincial governments. I propose to divide my discussion into four general parts under the following headings: (1) federal-provincial fiscal arrangements; (2) co-operative federalism and the process of opting out; (3) proposed amendments to the British North America Act; (4) unilateral provincial action to create barriers along provincial boundaries.

First then, Mr. Chairman, with regard to federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, we have a revenue pie, and the question arises as to how this pie should be divided between the federal government and the provincial governments. One could further ask how the local governments should receive their share. It is largely, though in my opinion not exclusively, the responsibility of the provincial governments to say what share of this revenue pie the local governments shall receive.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should make a few comments about what has happened in recent years with regard to the splitting of this revenue pie as between the federal and provincial governments. The British North America Act delegates or gives to each of the federal and provincial governments certain rights of taxation. Early in the war, I believe in 1941, by agreement the provincial governments gave up to the federal government the important rights of direct taxation, particularly in respect to income tax.

Let us consider what the federal government has paid to the provincial governments in recent years. In the fiscal year 1956-57, for example, the payments by the federal government to the provincial governments amounted to some $689 million. This amount increased in the fiscal year 1961-62 to $1,500 million, which is more than double what was paid in the fiscal year 1956-57. Those were years in which the previous government was in power.

I remember very well how that government was blamed for operating under large budgetary deficits. The fact is that if there had not been an increase in the payments to provincial governments there would not have been federal budgetary deficits during those years. There was no thanks given to the federal government of that time for those increased payments to the provinces. As a matter of fact, the government of that day was blamed for the large deficits it was incurring. This trend has been continued by the present government.

In the fiscal year 1963-64 the payments by the federal government to the provincial governments amounted to $1,900 million. Just recently, under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, a further increase was made by the present government in the payments to the provincial governments. In 1964-65 there is to be an increase in those payments to the extent of some $87 million. In the fiscal year 1965-66 there is to be an increase in the payments of $167 million. In the fiscal year 1966-67 there is to be an increase of $264 million.

I refer to these figures, and the recent Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act because of the interesting feature that appears in this legislation in respect of the distribution of these payments paid by the federal government to the various provinces.

When the previous government introduced the equalization formula it was designed to help the have-not provinces. Those provinces generally are conceded to be the four provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Revision Act, passed a few months ago, that trend seems to have been changed. Under that provision the total sum of $218 million, in round figures, is to be paid to the provinces in the three years ending 1966-67. Of that amount some $136 million, or 61 per cent, is to be paid to one province, which is not one of the four have-not provinces. Those provinces receive a total of $44 million, which represents 20 per cent of the equalization payments under this provision. I mention that fact only as an aside. My main theme is, how is the revenue pie being divided between federal and provincial governments?

What should the test or criterion be as to which government, federal or provincial, needs the biggest slice of this revenue pie? It seems to me as a layman that one of the criteria that might be used is the extent to which each of these governments has a budgetary surplus or deficit. Quite often a government, such as the federal or provincial governments, will have a planned budgetary deficit for political reasons. However, in general terms it seems to me that the extent to which the expenditures of the government exceed its revenue is a good indication of the need of that government, and the extent to which that government feels it can increase taxation so as to increase its revenue.

Let us take a look at the deficits of the provincial governments as compared to the deficits of the federal government in recent years. In the five year period, 1960 to 1964, the combined budgetary deficits of the provincial governments amounted to some $12 billion. In the same period of time the budgetary deficits of the federal government amounted to some $29 billion. That is more than twice the combined deficits of the provincial governments. One might ask, what does twice the deficit mean? I have tried to relate the deficits of the provincial governments to the deficit of the federal government by relating them to the total revenue of those governments.

Expressing provincial deficits, for a four year period, as a percentage of the revenue available to the provincial governments, we find that the deficits amount to about 8 per cent; whereas in the case of the federal government, the deficits in relation to the revenues amount to over 8 per cent. My contention is that when it comes to splitting up the revenue pie between federal and provincial governments, the provincial governments have had their share.

In 1961 Hon. Donald Fleming, who was then the minister of finance, told us that during the federal-provincial conference held late in 1960 the provincial representatives to those conferences put their demands to the federal government, and that if the federal government had acceded to those demands it would have had to pay out some $2 billion each year in order to satisfy the provincial governments.

It is traditional that provincial governments place more and more demands upon the federal government, but the question is, how should this revenue pie be divided among the federal and provincial governments. A further question then arises as to what are the proper responsibilities of each of these levels of government.

I call to mind what the premier of British Columbia said in a brief he presented to the federal government late in 1960. He said that the proper source of revenue to finance education was income tax. At that time the provinces had given up their rights in respect of income taxes, by way of agreement. In 1961, under the new arrangements made by the previous government, that right was returned to the provinces, allowing them to levy income taxes. After the premier of British Columbia had received the right again to levy income taxes, no longer was this a proper source of revenue to finance education.

We then come to the question as to what are the responsibilities of the federal government compared with those of the provincial governments. Certainly the provincial governments have major problems but it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there are certain questions which, although under our constitution they might properly be provincial responsibilities, are problems that can be solved only by either direct or indirect federal action, and this certainly involves federal expenditure.

I have in mind, for example, higher education. Late last year the Canadian universities foundation requested that the federal government make available the sum of $300 million in matching capital grants. There is the question of northern development. There is the problem of the urbanization of Canada. In my opinion one of the major questions that will face Canada in the next quarter of a century will be what is to be done to solve the problems created by people moving into the metropolitan areas. Certainly the actions that federal governments have taken to date with regard to urban renewal have merely scratched the surface.

Another federal responsibility that will have to be faced is medicare. There is the question of water resource development across our country and the question of a transcontinental power grid. There are innumerable questions such as these that obviously have to be tackled by the federal government, although they may not be clearly its responsibility under the constitution. Therefore there has to be a reappraisal of the position of the federal government in relation to the provincial governments in so far as the division of revenue is concerned, and it seems to me that the premier of the province of Manitoba put his finger on the right spot when he said that there should be a clear definition of priorities in so far as the federal and provincial governments are concerned.

The next heading I want to deal with under the general question of federal-provincial relations is that of the so-called co-operative federalism or opting out process. Throughout the world today there is a trend promoted by necessity for governing bodies to get together and through a more central organization solve the problems which are common to the lesser parts. A good example of this is the creation of the common market, but even in Africa there is a general movement, though a halting one, of the emerging countries to get together to see whether in a co-operative fashion they can solve the problems that each of these countries faces.

It seems to me that today in Canada the trend is in the other direction. I know it is said frequently that Canada is a country of widely differing parts and therefore it is necessary for each of these differing parts to have a large measure of autonomy. The fact is that Canada is a difficult country to govern, largely because of the differences of geography of its parts, but also because of ethnic differences; but by the same argument I think it is essential that the central government introduce a certain measure of equal opportunity in every sector of these differing parts of Canada.

When we are considering the problem of opting out, co-operative federalism and the relation of citizens of Canada to their provinces and the federal government the question arises, which am I first? Am I first of all a Canadian and second a provincial? I believe the hon. member for Queens raised this question in his very thoughtful speech a couple of days ago, and this brings me to what seems to be a problem in at least one of our provinces. I refer to a speech made by the Minister of Justice on October 20, 1964, before the chamber of commerce of the district of Montreal. As found on page 9 of the released text of the minister's speech, he is talking about the position of the members of parliament from the province of Quebec, whether there is a difference in loyalty, and he said:

> How, in practice, do these members of parliament reconcile their double loyalty as Quebeckers and Canadians? They do so by realizing that the cultural ideal incarnate in Quebec does not deny the political ideal incarnate in Canada. My colleagues and I are, to begin with, French Canadians; we seek intransigently the free flowering of French civilization from sea to sea, beginning with the province of our birth.

The words I want to emphasize in this quotation are:

> My colleagues and I are, to begin with, French Canadians.

It is this question of emphasis as to what I am first which it seems to me creates the problem in Canada today. The Minister of Justice seems to feel that he is first of all a provincial. Should I say that I am first of all a British Columbian and then a Canadian, or should I say I am first of all an English Canadian and then a Canadian? In my opinion there should be no question that we are first of all Canadians, and then after that we can offer our allegiance to our provinces or our municipalities or our ridings or whatever it may be.

There is a trend recently in Canada toward the decentralization of power from the federal government to the provincial governments. When I speak of centralization I am not referring to bureaucracy. Under the present government there is also a growing trend toward increasing control and increasing bureaucracy. For instance, in the d.b.s. bulletin for October 30, 1964 some figures are given with regard to federal government employment. The government of Canada together with its corporations and agencies employed some 341,153 persons as of May 31 this year, which is an increase of 2,619 from May, 1963. The bulletin goes on to point out that the increase in cost is some $20 million for five months of the year or some $50 million per year. This is a different kind of centralization. This is what I would call the growth of bureaucracy, and certainly it is a trend away from what the Glassco commission recommended.

But what I mean when I refer to centralization or decentralization is the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments.

In this regard, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote from the Vancouver Province of October 6, 1964. This editorial is headlined, "One More Strike and They're Out". I quote:

> Any government can make a mistake and, through public forgetfulness or forgiveness, expect to survive. But when a government—such as the present Liberal administration in Ottawa —makes blunder after ghastly blunder, its life expectancy becomes precarious.
> This could explain why the government is under pressure from some of its supporters to take a tougher line with the provinces in a series of constitutional and tax talks which start in the capital this week.
> If Mr. Pearson and his advisers fritter away much more national authority by allowing the provinces to "opt out" of more national programs they can endanger the whole fabric of Canadian unity. Such weakness might be the last straw for the government, a minority government that holds office only at the pleasure of splinter groups in the House of Commons.

I skip part of the editorial and read another paragraph:

> Little more need be said about Mr. Pearson's so far unsuccessful effort to impose a new flag on the country. His misguided plan to promote greater national unity with his maple leaf banner has inflamed the most violent regional quarrel in years. It brought parliament to a standstill for more than three weeks and is still unresolved.

This, Mr. Chairman, indicates how editorial writers across the country feel with regard to this so-called co-operative federalism of the present government. There are one or two instances recently which I could cite relating to acts passed by this parliament. One is the Canada Student Loans Act, a piece of legislation that was excellent in its intent but I believe the Minister of Finance will find out when he has completed his investigation that serious weaknesses have shown up in the administration of this act. This results almost entirely from the fact the administration was left to the provinces, and the fact that the legislation did not apply to the province of Quebec.

Then, we have on the order paper a resolution relating to the Canada pension plan. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has assured us that the plan the province of Quebec will pass will be in major respects similar to the proposed national Canada pension plan. But what will happen in the years to come? We have been assured that there will be complete portability between all provinces in so far as the pension is concerned. What will happen if five or 20 years from now the province of Quebec, which is the only province that so far has indicated it will opt out of that plan, makes changes within its own plan? How portable will the pension then be if the Quebec plan differs materially from the Canada pension plan that is created by a federal statute and then applies to the other nine provinces? These are problems that may well arise in the future.

When it comes to this question of opting out, not only are the provinces allowed to opt out of new programs proposed by this government, but this government is going one step farther and allowing the provinces to opt out of existing, well established and proven programs. The Prime Minister, in his letter of August 15, 1964, gives the provinces the right to opt out of hospital insurance, old age assistance, blind persons allowances, disabled persons allowance, unemployment assistance, vocational training, health grants and several others such as forestry agreements, hospital construction, roads to resources and so on. It seems to me that the need to strengthen some of these programs by action by the federal government is even greater today than at the time these programs were instituted. For example, there have been a number of briefs presented by the forest industry of British Columbia to the effect that the federal government should take more initiative in carrying out research in so far as forest fire protection is concerned. Yet the proposal of the present government is that these provinces could opt out of these forest agreements.

In this regard, Mr. Chairman, I should like to quote from an editorial in the Vancouver Province of October 24, 1964. The headline is, "Leading Canada toward the abyss". I read a part of this editorial:

> From every part of Canada come indications that well-meaning peacemaker Lester Pearson is blandly and blindly leading the Canadian union into a bottomless manhole.

I skip a part and I quote again:

> This is supposed to mean a system of give and take between Ottawa and the provinces. But it is rapidly becoming a synonym for a division of this nation into a headless collection of minor principalities.

Again, I skip a part and continue to quote:

> Canada is changing its constitution (the British North America Act) through secret conversations between Ottawa and the provincial governments. The public will be told what is good for it in pompously phrased communiqués or in what leaks out from the secret meetings...
> Canada is in danger of ceasing to be a nation in the truest sense of the word and becoming a collection of provinces divided by regional and racial interests having few common goals and interests.
> Canada has stood united for nearly 100 years. It can fall apart in five if positive steps are not taken to avert such a tragedy. Already Premier Ross Thatcher of Saskatchewan has warned that his province would consider union with the U.S. if Quebec left confederation...
> In all this the chief burden of responsibility falls on Mr. Pearson and his government. It is the national government, charged with leading, not following, the provinces. This demands toughness and steadiness, and more than a little of what Winston Churchill calls a "touch of the brute" on the part of Mr. Pearson.
> "Co-operative federalism" sounds good. But it could be the death rattle of nationhood unless there is a great deal more federalism and a great deal less enthusiasm for the idea of subdividing our country into ten little satraps.

I am afraid that this government does not have this toughness to which this article refers, but they have demonstrated—

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him his time has expired.

Mr. MacRae: Mr. Chairman, I wish to enter this debate briefly this evening to make a plea to the government on behalf of a group of Canadian citizens who I believe are not being fairly treated. This particular group is the federal civil service superannuates. My submission is on behalf of all of this group in general but especially on behalf of those who retired between the years 1952 and 1958.

My attention was drawn to this matter early this year when I and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton met in Fredericton with the Fredericton branch of the federal superannuates national association and heard their submission. These men and women have rendered loyal and faithful service to our nation, and in a great many cases they are suffering severe hardship because of the meagre superannuation they are being paid.

I would like to quote from a letter dated April 13, 1964, signed by Mr. Fred W. Whitehouse, national secretary-treasurer of the federal superannuates national association, and addressed to the Prime Minister. I shall not read all of the letter, just the parts that are pertinent to the point I want to raise:

Under the Public Service Adjustment Act 1958-59, no person who retired under the five year plan after December 1959 and under the ten year plan after December 1952, received any benefits. E.g. an officer of the immigration branch who retired March 3, 1954 as an I.O.7, received a salary for 1953 of $4,553.26, and his superannuation was computed on his last ten years of service, his salary in 1944 being $2,530. Had he retired the same day in 1964, he would have a rating of F.S.O.2 with a salary of $7,460 and superannuation would be computed on his last six years of service. This example applies throughout the service.

This particular group I have mentioned, those retiring between 1952 and 1958, are by far the worst off of all the superannuates. The letter goes on to say:

The United Kingdom increased pensions in 1952, 1956, 1959 and again in 1962. The commonwealth of Australia passed an act which came into effect November 13, 1963, granting increases to retired civil servants of that country. The government of the United States of America—

In which we are all deeply interested this evening.

—recognized the need for upward adjustment in pensions of its retired federal personnel some years ago and made periodic upward adjustments. A bill was recently passed to provide an escalator clause in that pensions of retired federal personnel would automatically be adjusted when the cost of living showed an increase of 3 per cent or more.

We know your government is aware of what other countries throughout the world have done for their retired employees and, as pointed out in previous representations, Canada is sadly lacking in this respect.

We are not unmindful of the fact that our basic superannuation plan is considered one of the best, and we would like to keep it in that category. This cannot be done unless amendments are made in the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act which are so vitally necessary, as we have tried our utmost to point out to your government.

These are some figures quoted in this letter which amazed me:

According to the Public Accounts of Canada, March 31, 1963, volume I, page 167, the public service superannuation fund had an accumulated surplus at that date of $1,724,116,105—

Note that figure of $1 billion.

—an increase over the previous year of $137,187,000. I am requested to state once more it is the considered opinion of the superannuates of this country that an upward adjustment in their pensions could be made from the superannuation fund without cost to the general public when such a huge surplus has accumulated, as shown in the above figures.

As reported in the press this morning, the Civil Service Association of Canada took this matter up with the Prime Minister yesterday, and I would like to place on the record the press release which the association issued:

The Civil Service Association of Canada today released the text of a letter to Prime Minister Pearson calling for a review of civil service pensions. The letter to the Prime Minister cites the straitened circumstances of many pensioners and calls for a new policy of periodic pension review.

The C.S.A.C. wants the government to ensure that retired civil servants will have their pensions increased by a percentage equal to any salary adjustment for active civil servants. The association asks for a cyclical review of civil service pensions, every two years, as is now the case with salaries.

The association spokesman went on to say that his organization had made representation on many occasions seeking an equitable system for periodic pension review. In asking for a new government policy for pensioners the C.S.A.C. says:

We do not believe that we exaggerate in saying the situation of many pensioners is tragic.

Reviewing the developments of the past 20 years the C.S.A.C. notes that the purchasing power of the 1943 dollar has been reduced now to 56 cents and the association declares that it believes "some regular procedure of periodic pension adjustment is necessary."

The actual resolution that was referred to reads as follows—and I wish to place it on the record for the benefit of hon. members interested in this problem:

Whereas in many cases, retired civil servants have been superannuated on the percentage of salary retirement, and

Whereas many of these retired civil servants, because of age, sickness or other reasons are unable to supplement their superannuation pay, and

Whereas the cost of living has steadily risen and continues to rise, causing hardship to those who, after, in many cases, long and faithful service to the country are now living in very straitened circumstances with no consideration being given to adjusting pensions, when salary increases are being given or considered for government staffs, therefore

Be it resolved that the government implement on a regular two year cycle a review of pensions for all superannuated employees, and that pensions be adjusted in line with the percentage of salary increase granted employees during this period, and

Be it further resolved that moneys to cover such increase be recovered from the general consolidated revenue fund.

There is also a table included which I will not put on the record but it emphasizes that the 1943 dollar is now worth only 56 cents.

I would therefore ask the government, and more specifically the Minister of Finance, who I regret is not here and neither is his parliamentary secretary—but I see the President of the Privy Council in his seat and I am sure he is deeply interested in this problem—to take action at once on behalf of these people, who I believe are being unfairly treated.

There are many problems facing our nation in this day and age. Some of them have been discussed during the last few days of this debate. There is the constitutional problem and a great many others such as the unrest in one of our founding provinces, a province in which I am deeply interested; the increase in crime, especially among juveniles in our larger cities; the impact of automation which is changing the whole pattern of employment, and the large number of Canadians we find who are without proper skills and education and who form the hard core of the unemployed.

But there is another problem that is pertinent to what I have been discussing this evening, the very insidious problem of inflation. Almost every monthly release of the dominion bureau of statistics shows an increase in the cost of living. The purchasing power of the dollar is going steadily downward year by year. Inflation falls especially heavily on those who are living on fixed incomes, particularly those who are living on small annuities and pensions. We know, of course, that over the past eight years old age pensions have been increased in several stages, from $40 until they now amount to $75 a month, and we are also aware that there have been corresponding increases in pensions to the blind, the disabled, and others. There remains the group of people about whom I have been speaking. I think more could be done for them by government, not only by this government but perhaps by the previous one, too. Those who have served this nation and who have retired on very small pensions, and upon whom the effects of inflation have fallen most heavily—these are the people upon whose behalf I have taken a few minutes of the time of the committee this evening.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. McIlraith thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-135, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1965.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Knowles: Now, by leave.

Mr. Churchill: Next sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the wish of hon. members that the Chair call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the leader of the house about the business tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: The first item of business tomorrow will be the completion of the further stages of the appropriation bill. When that measure is completed we will call the estimates beginning with the items of the agencies for which the Minister of Industry reports to the house—those items which have not yet been dealt with. Then we shall consider the items for which the Minister of Labour reports and, after that, the Departments of Forestry, National Revenue, and Public Works.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask whether we shall continue with the main estimates on Thursday and Friday, if the appropriation bill is completed?

Mr. McIlraith: I think I will reserve answering that question until the morning; I had not quite anticipated that it would be asked.

Mr. Knowles: I trust the minister will not forget the Canada pension plan?

Mr. McIlraith: I never forget that plan, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

However, many of the other officials in the privy council office are concerned from time to time with federal-provincial meetings on particular questions with the federal-provincial aspects within their particular fields of responsibility.

2. The total time spent by the two officials working directly for the secretariat would average from two thirds to three quarters of their working time. The time spent by other officials varies considerably, depending on circumstances.

*ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS ON MEDICAL EDUCATION

Question No. 2,166—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Has the government given consideration to the implementation of the Hall commission report recommendations on medical education, as distinct from the recommendations as a whole, so that the future quality of medical care in Canada will not be jeopardized?

Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): No. The report of the royal commission on health services is being intensively studied and the recommendations dealing with medical education are receiving a great deal of attention, but must be related to other aspects of the report.

*OWNERSHIP OF OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS, B.C.

Question No. 2,170—Mr. Basford:

2. What is the immediate course of action proposed to be taken by the government of Canada to determine the question of the legal ownership of the offshore oil and mineral rights in the offshore area of British Columbia?

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. At the meeting in October last of the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers, the question of conflicting claims with regard to jurisdiction over offshore mineral rights, including oil and minerals off the coast of British Columbia, was raised and discussed. This was the first occasion in which this question was raised formally as a subject for discussion at a federal-provincial conference and it was not expected that any decisions would be reached at that time. At the conclusion of the discussion of this matter the Prime Minister indicated that the federal government would shortly be in touch with the provinces so that steps might be taken to move to an early definition of the respective positions of the federal government and the provincial governments.

2. At the federal-provincial conference the federal government proposed to the provinces that a reference be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada so that the question of jurisdiction could be settled. It was also proposed that the terms of the reference to the supreme court should be on an agreed basis with the provinces if possible and that some arrangements be entered into between the federal government and the provincial governments to ensure that there would be no interference with resource development while consideration by the Supreme Court of Canada takes place.

SALE OF JACQUES CARTIER BARRACKS RESERVE LAND

Motion No. 182—Mr. Knowles:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all correspondence, dated since January 1, 1964, between the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and any persons, organizations or public bodies, regarding the sale of any portion of the Jacques Cartier barracks reserve land, or regarding any proposals to sell such land.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONSULTATIVE MACHINERY

Motion No. 170—Mr. Grafftey:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents, prepared by the office for federal-provincial relations in privy council since the creation of said office for federal-provincial relations, relating to federal government suggestions and proposals for the improvement of permanent consultative machinery between the federal government and the provinces.

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 170, made by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi and dated October 14, 1964, is probably out of order because these documents are of the nature of privilege documents. I am informed further as follows. There was no exchange of correspondence on proposals for the establishment of permanent federal-provincial consultative machinery as such. However, this question was placed on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa in November, 1963. It was raised again in Quebec city in March, 1964.

At the latter conference the Prime Minister informed his provincial colleagues of the decision of the federal government to establish a provincial relations secretariat in the privy council office. The terms of reference of this secretariat were outlined to the house on May 12, 1964. This arrangement is working well, and as it appears to be meeting the needs of the federal government and the provinces, no further changes are contemplated at this time.

In view of this information perhaps the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi will wish to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I certainly will withdraw the motion at the present time. The hon. gentleman's answer confirms my suspicion that no practical steps have been taken in this important area of government.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

ORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY

Motion No. 181—Mr. Grafftey:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all charts and documents prepared by the Department of Industry relating to the administrative organization and jurisdictional organization of the said department.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, with respect to charts and documents prepared by the Department of Industry relating to the administration and organization of the department, in general one might say two types of documents of this character have been prepared. One is for internal use only, and under the rules of the house they are not normally producible. The others are of a character intended for publication and there will be no objection on the part of the government to the production of these charts which were prepared and intended for publication.

Mr. Grafftey: That is acceptable.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MOREAU—INTERPRETATION OF MEMORANDUM ON CONSTITUTION BY FORMER JUSTICE MINISTER

Mr. M. J. Moreau (York-Scarborough): I rise on a question of privilege affecting all members of the house and concerning a matter of national importance. My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arises out of a press report by Arthur Blakely in this morning's Montreal Gazette. This report refers to a memorandum sent last month to former cabinet and party colleagues by the former minister of justice, Mr. Fulton.

Last Friday the hon. member for Bow River, during the debate on interim supply, quoted from this document in an attempt to show that, and I quote the hon. member's words appearing on page 9632 of Hansard:

That is the point I was trying to make when I first rose in my place this afternoon, that this new policy is placing a brand new interpretation on the meaning of the delegated powers and residuary powers—

It is my contention that the hon. member quoted from the Fulton memorandum in such a way—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Moreau: —as to not fully and accurately represent the views contained therein—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Moreau: —a fact clearly revealed by this morning's press report in which extracts of the memorandum appear. I quote from the press report—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Moreau: I quote:

—that these provisions—

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Question of Privilege

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would like to hear the end of this short statement before I decide on the matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Moreau:

—do not confer any new jurisdiction or power on the provinces nor do they have the effect of diminishing the federal jurisdiction or power in the slightest.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would request that the hon. member for Bow River be asked to table the document from which he was quoting, so the house may be fully informed of all the facts.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I respectfully ask your ruling as to whether this was a point of privilege. It appears to me to be just a flagrant abuse of the rules, and is the type of thing that should be struck out of the record entirely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): On a point—

Mr. Churchill: I asked a legitimate question of Your Honour. Is this a legitimate matter of privilege?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think it is a legitimate matter of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I had not intended to raise it at all, but the hon. member for Bow River quoted what he alleged was an extract from this document in order to refute the argument I had made in the house earlier that day. The fact is that I have the whole document here in front of me, and the interpretation which Mr. Fulton puts on it is the exact opposite of the interpretation which the hon. member for Bow River tried to foist on the house on Friday. I would be glad to table this document, if hon. members agree, and have it printed in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear. Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Having taken advice I am glad to say my own opinion is confirmed that this is a matter of debate and not a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Balcer.]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'Homme (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if he is acquainted with the statement made by the former minister of justice, Mr. Davie Fulton, concerning the "domiciliation" of what is known as the British North America Act and which, we hope, will soon be known as the Canadian constitution?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I read about it in an article published in this morning's Gazette and, in so far as the facts as reported by the Gazette are concerned, the statement is exact, precise and true.

AGRICULTURE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO APPLICATION OF ARDA PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Forestry?

Several days ago I asked the minister of "rural displacement"—pardon me, of "rural development" the extent of implementation which had been reached concerning ARDA, in co-operation with the department of agriculture of the province of Quebec or with the various departments of that province. At that time the minister promised to make a statement in a few days. May we expect a statement before the end of the debate on the flag?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I apologize, but the hon. member for Villeneuve never asked me that question during the normal question period. Anyway, ARDA applies in its entirety in the province of Quebec and in all districts of that province. As we all know, the provinces must initiate any measure respecting ARDA, and only the provinces can propose to the federal government concrete programs and projects for the districts in which they are interested. We have no initiative in that field.

Mr. Caouette: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Inasmuch as proposals can only come from the provinces, do cases not occur where the department would suggest under exceptional circumstances, to the provinces, including the province of Quebec, to consider designating certain so-called under-developed areas?

Mr. Sauvé: No, Mr. Speaker. The question of designating areas is entirely up to the provincial government, and that goes for Quebec as well as for the other provinces.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

Could the minister tell us whether his department is responsible for the administration of the Crop Insurance Act and, if so, what have been the results of its policy in the province of Quebec until now?

Mr. Sauvé: Crop insurance comes under the Department of Agriculture. Since there is no provincial crop insurance legislation in Quebec, federal legislation cannot apply there.

[Later:]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry. It stems from a speech the minister delivered before the Canadian federation of agriculture, where he stated that $11,500,000 were granted to the four western provinces under ARDA, and $6,000,000 to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario.

Can the minister tell us if he deems that those amounts are normal, in proportion to the population of Canada?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, in the first stages of the ARDA program, grants had been provided for every province, and evidently, some provinces, for reasons of their own, refused to take advantage of all the benefits provided under ARDA. This explains the difference between the amounts provided for and the amounts they received.

QUEBEC—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS DURING COMING WINTER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour.

In view of representations received from several farmers of my area, who are wondering whether the government can help them to find some work during the winter, since they are not entitled to unemployment benefits, have no income, have large families and many obligations to meet, could the minister tell me what I should answer in such cases?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: It does seem to me that this is such a wide question it would be almost impossible to give an answer, and therefore is not in order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—CHANGES IN UNIVERSITY NAVAL TRAINING DIVISIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Has the minister received representations from the student association of Sherbrooke and Bishop Universities protesting against the abolition of the U.N.T.D. in Sherbrooke?

If so, could he tell us whether he intends to reconsider his decision, so that those two university groups may enjoy the same advantages as the other Canadian university students?

[Text]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Representations were received from the association as well as from a number of interested members of parliament on both sides of the house by both the associate minister and myself following the detailed statement I made here on September 16 with regard to the over-all university training plan sponsored by the Department of National Defence.

In reply to these representations it was pointed out that the naval training unit at the Université de Sherbrooke and Bishop's University was one of eight to be closed down in universities across the country due to the reduction and reorganization of the Royal Canadian naval reserve. It was further explained that the decisions were based on the number of cadets being absorbed into the active lists, the nearness of units to the associated reserve divisions and to the enrolment patterns.

In so far as the decision to close the U.N.T.D. at the Université de Sherbrooke and Bishop's University is concerned, this decision was based on the fact that the parent division, H.M.C.S. Donnacona, received an adequate supply of U.N.T.D. graduates from the universities located in Montreal; that it was located some 120 miles from the parent division, and that some difficulty was being experienced in providing adequate instructional staff in Sherbrooke. Up to the present time only four graduates from the U.N.T.D. units at the Université de Sherbrooke and Bishop's University have been absorbed into the R.C.N./R active list. In view of these circumstances it is not intended to alter the decision.

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON NAVAL SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): I should like to direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. In view of press reports in regard to announcements of policy concerning a naval shipbuilding program which he is reported to have made, will the hon. gentleman inform the house as to the statements he actually did make and what policy, if any, has been decided upon with regard to a naval shipbuilding program?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): The occasion on which these questions were asked, and on which I gave answers, was Exercise "Yeoman" in Argentia. During the course of the interrogation I was asked whether I thought a sealift capacity in our navy was a good thing. I for one think a sealift capacity would be extremely useful to the navy, and I said as much. I also stated that no decision had yet been taken as far as a naval shipbuilding program was concerned, but that some decision might be expected within a month or three weeks.

REPORTED AGREEMENT ON PRODUCTION OF NEW TACTICAL AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister able to tell us whether there is in fact an informal agreement with respect to the joint production with Great Britain and the United States of the McDonnell Phantom tactical aircraft, and if all that is waiting is a formal ratification by the respective governments?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): The answer, Mr. Speaker, is in the negative.

POSSIBLE PHASING OUT OF SECTIONS OF MID-CANADA LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister inform the house whether the government are now planning any further phasing out of sections of the mid-Canada line?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker; there are no plans in that direction at the present time.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

INQUIRY AS TO COMMITTEES TO CONSIDER PENOLOGICAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Justice whether he has reached a decision with regard to the setting up of the commissions or committees he plans with respect to penological matters.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I have already answered that question in the house. I told the house that for the immediate future two committees are planned, one a parliamentary committee to deal with the physical institutions of detention, and the other a committee composed of experts which will deal with the broader field of correction in Canada.

ST. VINCENT DE PAUL PENITENTIARY—SOLITARY CONFINEMENT OF PRISONER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. It deals with a question I put to the Prime Minister a week ago last Monday. This referred to an interview with the warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary concerning a French Canadian prisoner who had been sentenced to 14 years because of his participation in a riot two years ago and who has been kept in solitary confinement, his letters not getting to his family or to others, and other matters. I asked the Prime Minister to request the Minister of Justice to give an explanation to the house of these circumstances and say whether these charges are true.

Mr. Favreau: I will be in a position to report on this matter at the beginning of next week.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED EXTENSION OF REMEMBRANCE DAY HOLIDAY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister but, in his absence, I shall put it to the Acting Prime Minister or to the President of the Privy Council.

Considering that next Wednesday, members of parliament will have a holiday under the new standing order of the house and that members did not have any holidays or any free time to discuss future legislation with their constituents, does the government intend to consult the leaders of the various parties in order to grant us a long holiday, that is, on the 11th, 12th and 13th?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this suggestion is not without merit. I shall take it up tomorrow with the Prime Minister who will then be in a position no doubt to advise the house.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CHARLOTTETOWN, P.E.I.—ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT FOR MEN TO BE LAID OFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry based on his reply to a similar question yesterday and my mystification arising therefrom. Is the minister able to report any success in his efforts to find alternative employment for the workers at the Enamel and Heating plant in Charlottetown?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I regret that yesterday in connection with the hon. member's question I heard the reference to Enamel and Heating rather than the reference to Charlottetown. While my answer yesterday related to the general affairs of the company, in response to the hon. member's specific question I regret very much to say that in spite of the most diligent and intensive efforts we have been unable to find alternative work for the plant of Enamel and Heating in Charlottetown.

TORONTO—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING TRAINING OF UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour, asking him whether he has received a report from the metropolitan Toronto advisory committee on the training and retraining of unemployed workers, which has been approved and adopted by the metropolitan council. If so, has a date been set for conferring with these people on this very important subject?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received this very interesting and helpful brief. At the present time it is under consideration. If a date has not yet been set it will be set in the near future.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BILINGUAL PRODUCTION CONTROL SYSTEM IN POINTE ST. CHARLES SHOPS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Chrétien (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell us what are the reasons that prevented the setting up of bilingual systems as regards the control of production in the C.N.R.'s workshops, at Pointe St. Charles, before the railway company was forced to do so following pressures on the part of the general public?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This surely is a question for the order paper.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED COMMUNIST INFILTRATION OF FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Justice, and its urgency is based on the fact that a very serious charge has been made against a federal crown corporation which is meant to unite this country. Has the attorney general of the province of Quebec, or have any other officials of the Quebec government including Mr. Arsenault himself, offered to the R.C.M.P. or to anybody in the minister's office any definite names or definite facts relating to the allegation by Mr. Arsenault of communist activities in the C.B.C.?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be meeting the attorney general of Quebec tomorrow, and this is a matter which I will be taking up with him.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, would the minister meet at the same time with Hon. Bona Arsenault?

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the minister.

Is it his intention to discuss also accusations of communist infiltration into the Quebec Liberal federation?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, we shall discuss those accusations which may be in the public interest.

[Text]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the minister make a report to the house following his meeting with the appropriate authorities in Quebec regarding this serious charge against a crown corporation which is meant to unite this country?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OFFICIAL STATUS OF MEMBER FOR RED DEER ON AFRICAN TOUR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister, arising out of a report which appeared in the Montreal Gazette to the effect that Mr. Thompson is touring Africa on behalf of the Canadian government. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether that represents the facts, and the hon. member for Red Deer is presently touring Africa on behalf of the Canadian government. If so, has an order in council been passed to authorize such an appointment and the payment of his expenses?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is a question for the order paper. I do not see any particular urgency, inasmuch as that gentleman will be touring for some time.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, when someone is reported in the press as representing the Canadian government, surely that is a matter of some importance. The house is surely entitled to an answer as to whether he was appointed by order in council or became a member of the cabinet recently in some surreptitious fashion.

Mr. Speaker: There is no doubt that the question is of interest, but I have serious doubt as to whether it is in order. My instructions from the house are that questions should not inquire as to whether statements appearing in the press are correct.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Any expenses in this regard must be paid by the Canadian taxpayer, and if we are going to spend money sending people around the world I think we should know about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is making allegations rather than asking questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question is quite simple. Is the hon. member for Red Deer representing in any way the Canadian government during his tour in Africa?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of your ruling concerning the question put by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose, I think I should respect your ruling and therefore I could not answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think that having been in this house for so long the Acting Prime Minister should know the procedure well enough to know that the question asked by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose was out of order, but that the one asked by the hon. member for Villeneuve did not refer to any newspaper report. On the contrary, it was asked in accordance with our standing orders and the instructions given to the Speaker, and therefore I do not think it is up to the Acting Prime Minister to decide whether the question is in order or not.

If it is in order, I think he should give an answer.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is Acting Prime Minister. I should like to ask him in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister whether the hon. member for Red Deer is touring Africa by appointment on behalf of the Canadian government.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The point in suggesting that this was a question which should be put on the order paper was that there was not that desperate urgency that it had to be answered this afternoon. If the hon. member is not satisfied with this suggestion he always has the privilege of debating it at ten o'clock by giving notice.

Mr. Smallwood: That does not give us an answer as to what they are doing with public money, so we will give up.

CANADIAN COASTGUARD

POSSIBLE APPOINTMENT OF RETIRED NAVAL OFFICER AS ADMINISTRATOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does the Department of National Defence receive the full co-operation of other government departments in placing qualified personnel who are being prematurely retired.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have received excellent co-operation from other government departments in this matter.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a supplementary question. Will the minister then indicate why some qualified officer has not been appointed as a planning officer for the new coastguard college? Mr. Speaker, I think I have posed a very fair question to the Minister of National Defence. As I indicated before, if he does not choose to answer it I will accept that refusal—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman will send me the specifics of his question I will be glad to refer them to the appropriate department for consideration.

Mr. MacInnis: I have a further supplementary question. If the Minister of National Defence had been following the affairs of his department he would realize that there is not full co-operation—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member asking a question or making a charge?

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, the minister has informed me that there is full co-operation between his department and other government departments, and has now requested me to send him the particulars of something of which he has said he is already aware.

SHIPPING

REPORTED LACK OF SERVICE TO CARIBBEAN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question arises out of a report in this afternoon's Ottawa Journal—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Regan: —to the effect that the Canadian commercial counsellor in Guatemala, Mr. Lemieux, said that Canadian exporters are missing the boat because of the lack of adequate shipping services to the Caribbean. Will the minister investigate the desirability of providing some form of government assistance to promote frequent sailings to this important area?

Mr. Speaker: That is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I intend to debate the matter at ten o'clock tomorrow evening.

FISHERIES

NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a non-controversial question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister state where and when the next meeting of the parties to the international fisheries convention for the north Pacific is to reconvene and where it will be held?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as I stated in my report to the house on October 1 at the conclusion of the negotiations which took place here in Ottawa among Canada, Japan and the United States, and in answer to a question addressed to me by the hon. member for Queens, I then said, I am not now in a position to say definitely when the meeting will be reconvened. The United States delegation has expressed the hope of its government that the next meeting will be held in the United States at a time and place to be determined by the three governments concerned. Following the events which took place yesterday in that country I express my sincere hope that the negotiations will take place without undue delay, after a determination of the date and place of the next meeting.

INDUSTRY

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING MANUFACTURE IN CANADA OF JAPANESE AUTOMOBILES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I should direct my question to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Industry. I am sure the Minister of Finance must approve agreements, but probably the Minister of Industry negotiates them. I should like one of the ministers to inform the house whether reports are correct to the effect that negotiations have been completed between representatives of a Japanese motor car company and the Canadian government, and that these motor cars will be built in Canada. Presumably an announcement will be made within the next few hours in this regard. Is it also correct that if these negotiations have been completed, the industry is going to be established in Nova Scotia?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the report that negotiations have been completed for the manufacture of Japanese designed motor cars in Nova Scotia is incorrect. A Canadian company proposes to hold a press conference this afternoon at which time an announcement will be made regarding its future intentions. I can say that these intentions do not include an announcement in respect of completed negotiations with a Canadian company for the manufacture of motor cars in Canada.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ESTABLISHMENT OF PROVINCIAL CONSULTATIVE COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. On Monday in response to a series of questions the minister gave some information to the house about the results arising from the dominion-provincial conference on Indian affairs. Would the minister be kind enough at some time in the near future to outline to the house the mechanics and details with regard to how the various provincial consultative committees are going to be established, the manner of their selection and the way in which they are going to operate?

[Mr. Robichaud.]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an ideal question for the order paper. It would give us an opportunity to provide more details.

[Text]

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—APPEARANCE BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I put a question to the Minister of Labour in respect to the progress being made in having the maritime union trustees appear before a parliamentary committee. The snakes are out again, Mr. Speaker. I should like a little order, if you don't mind. At that time the minister answered to the effect that a motion was under discussion with the other parties which would refer this matter to the industrial relations committee. I wonder whether the minister would care to amend that statement today.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker. It is expected to have this motion on the order paper as soon as possible, and my intention in that regard has been conveyed to the representatives of the various other parties. Maybe my words were construed by my hon. friend to mean that the terms of the motion were under discussion. If that was his interpretation I apologize to him, but I did indicate to the other parties what my intention was.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, in answering the question yesterday the minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, there has been under discussion with representatives of other parties a motion which would refer this matter to the industrial relations committee—

I have made further inquiries to try to find out to what persons in the other parties the minister had spoken, and that is why I put the question.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

FORT WALSH, SASK.—INQUIRY AS TO SUGGESTED RESTORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, some time ago I directed a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in regard to Fort Walsh in Saskatchewan. Is he now prepared to give the house some information with regard to that historic site?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the house is aware that when my estimates were under consideration the hon. member advanced the idea that Fort Walsh should be commemorated, and I think most people are aware of its importance in the history of western Canada. We have had some discussions with the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan with respect to the establishment of a national park in the area in which Fort Walsh is situated.

APPROPRIATION BILL

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-135, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1965.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, before the house deals with the second reading of this bill, there is certainly a two twelfths portion provided for the Department of External Affairs. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) is gone, but we should have liked to know, whether part of that two twelfths portion under his department is provided for payment of the expenses incurred by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) while travelling through Africa. We could have found out thus whether, in his tour of Africa, the hon. member for Red Deer is an official delegate of the Canadian government. Maybe another minister could answer this question instead of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because before voting we should like to know the purpose of these expenditures. Maybe the acting minister, namely the Minister of Transport, could answer that question?

[Text]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs perhaps the hon. member would be satisfied if I would undertake to take his question as notice, draw it to the attention of the minister and secure an answer.

Some hon. Members: No.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, we are now studying the spending of money by the government—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—maybe the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre wants to raise the same point of order as I do. I believe a report has been adopted by the house concerning the procedure in committee of the whole in studying a bill. It was agreed that if clause 1 was the short title it would be discussed and approved following the consideration of all other clauses of the bill. Inasmuch as clause 1 has to do only with the short title of the bill I think the correct procedure would be to proceed with clause 2 now and return to clause 1 later.

On clause 2—$740,710,974.77 granted for 1964-65.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, I understand I can make a few brief remarks on clause 2, which deals with the spending of money by the government. I was unable to get certain information today. I have before me a press report that the hon. member for Red Deer is touring Africa on behalf of the Canadian government. This article appeared in the Montreal Gazette. If I can get this information I will not hold up this supply bill. I should like to know from the government if it is a fact that the hon. member for Red Deer is touring Africa on behalf of the Canadian government. I should like to know if an order in council has been passed covering his appointment and the payment of his travel expenses.

How much is it going to cost the Canadian people to have this member touring Africa on behalf of the dominion government? What good are we going to get from it? Did he go over there to give more information on the space program? If hon. members over there will give me this information I will resume my seat.

Mr. McIlraith: I regret that I do not have the information the hon. member seeks.

Mr. Smallwood: Yes or no?

Mr. McIlraith: The minister for external affairs is otherwise committed at the moment.

An hon. Member: He disappeared in a hurry.

Mr. McIlraith: I think you will agree that there is important and urgent work for him. His estimates will be before the committee shortly—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: —and he will be able to give the information in detail. I will be glad to see that those estimates are brought forward at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. Lambert: Perhaps the President of the Privy Council would agree that amongst his colleagues there would be the chairman of the committee that deals with orders in council, and if the appropriate order in council has been passed the minister responsible would certainly be able to give us that information. It would be rather singular to find that such an order in council had been lost in the usual routine. Perhaps the minister could help us in this regard.

Mr. McIlraith: I will be glad to help the hon. member. I do have a good deal to do with orders in council. I have no recollection of one being passed, but it is the sort of thing on which I shall have to get information and provide it later, as I said when I was asked about the matter in the first instance by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose.

Mr. Churchill: I think we should have the information right now. A question was asked earlier today and it was ignored by the minister for external affairs. Then we had the Minister of Industry saying that he would take the question as notice. Now we have the President of the Privy Council saying he will look into the matter and let us have the information. Let us have the information right now. Is the hon. member for Red Deer travelling in Africa at the expense of the Canadian people? Is he acting on behalf of the government of this country, or what is he doing over there? Surely the government can tell us. Either they say he has been sent on government authority and therefore his expenses are being paid out of the estimates with which we are now dealing, or he is travelling on his own.

I think the house is entitled to an explanation. We have had a press report here indicating that he is representing the Canadian government. Surely the members of the cabinet know something about this. They do not have to take the question as notice; they can give us a definite answer.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. gentleman is quite right when he says the house is entitled to the information he requests, but the question is at what point does one give that information.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIlraith: I repeat that I have no knowledge of it myself at all. I do not know whether there was any such order in council. I have already given an undertaking to get the information. I will try to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs brought before the house within a reasonably short time so that hon. members might ask this type of question, because it is the type of question for committee of supply; but not on an appropriation bill. It should be asked when the items of estimates are before the committee.

In so far as the question asked earlier today is concerned, I must say that in my view the committee is bound by the ruling given by Mr. Speaker at that time, that it was out of order. I do not know if there is much more I can usefully say at this moment.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I suggest in all seriousness that the government is playing with the house in a manner that is quite unfair. The President of the Privy Council is correct in saying that Mr. Speaker ruled this was not a proper question to be asked on orders of the day. Whether or not I agree with Mr. Speaker's ruling does not matter. The ruling was made and we have to accept it. However, we are now in committee on a bill to appropriate money, and surely the question is now in order.

Now, further to my suggestion that the government is playing with us in a manner that is quite unfair, I point out that there are 10 or 11 members of the cabinet in the house right now. There were more of them here a few minutes ago. To suggest that there is no member of the cabinet who knows whether or not the member for Red Deer was given some kind of special credential, whether there was an order in council, is ridiculous. If the minister is not able to say that there was no order in council and that there is to be no payment of expenses, then he had better find out and let us know right away.

Whether or not it was a serious and unusual thing, Mr. Chairman, to send a private member off in this way I think is now overshadowed by the manner in which the government is treating the members of this house. I think we are entitled to a clearcut answer on this right now.

Mr. McIlraith: We should make something very clear. A charge by the hon. member that the government is treating the house badly because of the answer I have made surely does not lie in his mouth. He has been here long enough to be familiar with the practice on these appropriation bills. I would remind him of my answers, because he apparently did not listen to them or perhaps, because of the noise, he was not able to hear them. I told him that I had a great deal to do with orders in council, or most of them, and that I had no recollection of any order in council on this matter.

I coupled with this the undertaking to find out and provide information as to whether or not there was one, and I do respectfully suggest it probably is not good practice for the committee to start insisting that every department have its staff here to answer all the detailed questions that may be asked. We should recognize that this is the committee stage of a financial bill. Although it may be technically within the rules to ask for this information, I do not think we should hold up the bill. I have already given an undertaking to call the estimates of the department, at which time the numerous questions that have been asked on this subject can be asked and answered, because the committee is entitled to have the answers.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the explanations of the President of the Privy Council to the effect that the terms used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) may not be accurate and that we must accept his word, his statement as he made it. However, a fact remains—I see that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) is back in his seat, he will certainly inform us about the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson).

We appreciate the fact that the hon. member for Red Deer has a wide knowledge of matters respecting Africa, but we want to know whether or not the government has sent him on a mission, or whether he cooperates in any way with the government or whether the government makes a contribution to the trip of the hon. member for Red Deer in Africa. In my opinion, we are entitled to know.

We are now considering supply authorizing certain expenditures. Whether or not there were orders in council, there is certainly a part of that money which will go to pay the travelling expenses of the hon. member. When a minister refuses to answer that question, that almost implies that, in fact, the government did send the hon. member for Red Deer to Africa. We want an answer to that question, we want to be informed.

If it is necessary to make speeches during the whole afternoon to give the minister an opportunity to inquire about the facts, we will do so and we will know what we want to know.

[Text]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I would not have left the chamber earlier if it were not for the fact that in Ottawa at present we have the distinguished Belgian foreign minister who came here to carry on certain conversations. He is leaving the city at 4.50 p.m. and that is why I left the chamber at 3.20. I would have answered the question but for the fact that His Honour the Speaker said the question was not in order.

The hon. member for Red Deer has gone to Africa, at the request of the government, to perform an important assignment in an area with which he is more familiar than perhaps any other living Canadian because of the fact that he lived in Africa for many years, particularly serving in Ethiopia for almost 18 years. That is why we asked him to undertake a mission, and he has done so willingly at the request of the government of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Could the minister tell us whether the hon. member for Red Deer has now been admitted in the ranks of the Liberal or government party?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am not concerned with political questions but in this matter, I know that the hon. member is familiar with the great problems concerning Canada and Africa.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could the minister tell us whether the Department of External Affairs is now considering appointing the hon. member for Red Deer as ambassador or to some other office in the near future?

Mr. Caouette: In Africa?

Mr. Grégoire: Could the minister give us an answer?

Mr. Caouette: Is the matter under consideration?

Mr. Grégoire: Is this contemplated?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If something concerned me in the riding of Lapointe, I might, in a limited context, ask the hon. member to represent me. That is what we did with respect to the hon. member for Red Deer, in Africa.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, now that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has answered part of the question perhaps he could give us the rest of the information that was asked a moment ago. As a matter of fact a great deal of time could have been saved if this question had been answered earlier.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But don't you think we should observe what the Speaker decides?

Mr. Knowles: Now that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has declared that a private member of the house has been asked to do something on behalf of the government, will he say whether the travelling expenses of this private member are being paid by the government and, if so, was there an order in council authorizing the payment of these expenses?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not believe there was an order in council.

Mr. Knowles: Then how are the expenses being paid?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman will have to indicate what his expenses were, and they will be examined and the proper procedure will be observed.

Mr. Knowles: Is there an understanding that the expenses will be paid?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It would be very unfair to ask an hon. gentleman to undertake such a responsibility and pay the expenses himself.

Mr. Knowles: I have just one other word to say. I suggest that the President of the Privy Council was quite out of turn in saying it did not lie in my mouth to ask the kind of questions I asked. As he must have known the facts he should have admitted them, instead of playing around with words.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, as Hansard will indicate, that is not the charge I made. I stated that it did not lie in the hon. member's mouth to make the charge against me that he had made, and it was to that I objected.

Mr. Nesbitt: I know the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in a hurry so I will make my question brief. In view of the fact that a private member, the leader of a group of other members, has been assigned to a mission by the government—perhaps a very important mission as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has told us—does this represent a complete change in the policy of this and previous governments, going back to 1945 when members of all parties formed the original Canadian delegation to the United Nations at San Francisco? It was later agreed among all parties, as I understand it, that this policy would be discontinued so far as the United Nations was concerned, and that other parties would send parliamentary observers so that they would not have to take responsibility for the government's actions. Now we have a private member of the house, belonging to another party, acting on behalf of the government. Does this mean that the policy established with respect to foreign affairs some years ago has been changed?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the conclusions which my hon. friend is suggesting in his question are necessarily accurate. In 1945, as my hon. friend mentions, it is true that the United Nations delegation was made up of delegates who represented all the political parties in the house. The then leader of the opposition, Mr. Bracken, leader of the Progressive Conservative party, was one of the delegates; but after that assembly meeting, in which he had rendered valuable service to Canada, he took the view that thereafter he would not want to go as a delegate but would be content to have representatives of his party attend in an observer capacity.

He took that position because he felt that having participated as a delegate he did not want in any way to be excluded from subsequent examination of government policy at the conference which he attended. That was not the position taken by the government of the day, nor is it necessarily the position I would take in similar circumstances. I have endeavoured to give as objective a character to foreign policy as can possibly be done.

In this particular situation there was a good functional reason for picking a man who knows Africa, and I have no excuse for doing that. If I thought my hon. friend could serve Canada in a particular capacity in a special way at the United Nations I would not hesitate to ask him to do so, and I know he would not refuse to undertake the responsibility.

The responsibility undertaken by the hon. member for Red Deer would in no way preclude him from criticizing government policy generally. As the hon. member for Oxford knows, there is no more dangerous situation now developing in the world than that in certain sections of Africa. Need I say any more?

Mr. MacInnis: Was this arrangement to send the hon. member for Red Deer to Africa made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend who has not shared the heavy responsibilities of government perhaps does not realize these are matters one has to share with one's colleagues as a whole.

Mr. MacInnis: It is very apparent to all of us that the cabinet does not know where it is going, but to have an admission from the Secretary of State for External Affairs is something else. Thirteen of his cabinet colleagues failed to answer that question and maintained they did not have the answer.

Mr. Benidickson: That is nonsense.

Mr. MacInnis: Maybe we should apologize for waking up the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. If we keep up the noise we may keep him awake. What I want to know from the minister for external affairs is this—maybe he or his colleagues will be able to answer this question: Who made the arrangements to send the hon. member for Red Deer to Africa, and is there no one qualified on African affairs within his own department?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I made the arrangements. I am not sorry for having done so. They were in the national interest.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Well, why did you try to hide it?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member, who is a fair member, asks "why did you try to hide it?"

An hon. Member: None of those ministers answered.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let us not get excited.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair is having some difficulty in listening to more than one member at the same time.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might say a word for a moment. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has arranged to meet the foreign minister of Belgium who has come here to see him this afternoon, and the foreign minister has to leave at 4.30. I may not know everything that goes on in the cabinet but I do happen to know this is a most important discussion having to do with NATO and I wonder whether it could be agreed that the minister could return to the house after Mr. Spaak has left in order to deal with any points concerning this particular matter which have not yet been dealt with. This would enable us to extend a common courtesy to Mr. Spaak while he is here.

Mr. MacInnis: When I put this question to the minister for external affairs, when I asked him whether the arrangements had been made by himself along with the member for Red Deer or not, he informed the house that because of the rule as to cabinet responsibility, this must be something which was shared. Mr. Chairman, 13 members of the cabinet have been in this house. They were apparently concerned with this. Then the minister rises to tell us he made the arrangements.

Mr. Drury: On a question of privilege, perhaps I could just make this point. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs remarked, the hon. member has perhaps not had too much cabinet experience.

An hon. Member: Nor have you.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): You have so much to learn.

Mr. Drury: I am very glad to hear all those aspirants giving me advice. I am at least reasonable enough to admit that I have something to learn. The question was asked of me as to what the arrangements were. I think members would appreciate that a more orderly way of doing business is to allow the Secretary of State for External Affairs to formulate precise answers to the questions for which he is responsible, rather than to have one or other of his colleagues attempting to give answers off the cuff. This was the purpose of my reply to the hon. member for Villeneuve. I said I would take the question as notice and provide an answer by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This does not mean that the Secretary of State for External Affairs alone knows what is going on. It is an attempt on the part of the government to see that business is conducted in an orderly and reasonable fashion.

Mr. McIlraith: I have just been advised that there is no order in council to pay the expenses of the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Fisher: You would be surprised, Mr. Chairman, how I move from this topic to the controversial film "Mr. Pearson", but it has real relevance in this particular case. It may be even more germane than that. Many people will be surprised to discover that the hon. member for Red Deer is such an authority on African affairs. Yet there is no doubt that if the Pearson film had been shown, as it should have been, we would have known this. We got an insight from that film of the relationship of the hon. member for Red Deer with the Emperor of Ethiopia, and how he plays a fundamental part in the reception ceremonies of the day. At the same time we discover that the Prime Minister believes that this is the last emperor in the world, apparently forgetting about the Emperor of Japan. It does give you a bit of a feeling that the member for Red Deer is an African authority and the Prime Minister is not. Apparently the hon. member for Red Deer is a person of some stature in Africa, aside from whatever stature he may have here in relation to the Liberal party. I should like to suggest to ministers that they get together and review again that film in which they took such an interest before. If they would release it to the country it would provide an explanation of what may seem on the surface to be a baffling move.

I know all of us were aware that the Minister without Portfolio was touring the world as a roving ambassador throughout this period, and we admire the wisdom of the government for despatching him on this task. Some of us thought it would be wise if they kept him on such travels a great deal of the time. Now, just because of the ideas we have about the travels of the Minister without Portfolio, what are we to think about the member for Red Deer being absent from his place in the house at such an important time, when there are so many ideas in people's minds about co-operation or the lack of co-operation in this house It seems to me I have made a good case for the Pearson film being shown to the Canadian people, so that they can see the hon. member for Red Deer, the leader of the Social Credit party, in his true light as an expert on Africa and well worth sending there by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Some of us have a suspicion —and perhaps we should not noise suspicions abroad unless we can prove them—that one of the main figures in seeing that the Pearson film was not shown was the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, we do know, saw the famous film. I think that in a sense he has been caught in his own trap here. He sent the hon. member for Red Deer away on a great mission to Africa. In a sense he himself defeated his purpose beforehand in getting recognition for this by acting in such a way that the film "Mr. Pearson" has not seen the light of day.

I shall say no more about this. I know there are a lot of men, wise in their own opinions, sitting over there and a word to the wise is enough.

Mr. Smallwood: I opened this subject today on the quiet basis of question and answer. The answer we have now is that the hon. member was sent over to Africa on behalf of the government. All I am wondering now is whether this open acceptance of the hon. member into a political party was just a plum for the support he has given. I will let it go at that.

Mr. Churchill: I think the government has been treating the committee in very cavalier fashion today on this particular item. We recognize that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is temporarily engaged with one of the ambassadors—

An hon. Member: The foreign minister.

Mr. Churchill: But I am not content with the answers he gave to the questions which were put to him on this particular matter. It has been suggested by the Minister of Transport that the hon. gentleman might return later on today and clear up his answers on some of these points. I want to know when he is going to return and I suggest it might be advisable to stand this appropriation bill for the time being and go on with the estimates of Atomic Energy Limited and the national research council, thus making it possible for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to come back and give us a complete answer to the questions which were put to members of the government prior to his entry into the chamber. I would ask the leader of the house what the proposal is.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the hon. gentleman has made a proper suggestion—a very good one—and I am quite willing to undertake to have the estimates of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, brought in—

Mr. Pickersgill: As soon as he is available.

Mr. McIlraith: As soon as he is available after his present interview with the foreign minister of Belgium. We could interrupt the estimates of the Minister of Industry at that point in order that the hon. member might have all the information he wishes with regard to this particular item.

Mr. Churchill: Just so that we may be clear, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will return to the house this afternoon. When he does so, the chairman will call an appropriate item in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs so that we can found our discussion on it. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I just want to say a few words because of the implications of this matter, which I think are very important to a great many members of this house. This is not agreeing with the suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council. I think it should be made known in this house what disposition the government intends to make with regard to future arrangements of this sort. As hon. members know—and the ministers are aware of this—members of this house are invited from time to time to participate, in their capacity as members of parliament, in meetings of international organizations or other conferences throughout the world, and sometimes members of the government and members of the opposition parties have to refuse these invitations. The invitations are made according to the status of members of parliament. If the government acknowledges that there is a precedent in the case of the hon. member for Red Deer, it becomes prejudicial to other members of this house who may be invited to participate—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I could interrupt the hon. member for a moment. That is precisely the sort of thing we propose to bring the Secretary of State for External Affairs back to the house to answer. I wonder whether the hon. member would not agree that the question could be more directly put to that minister when we call his estimates later in the afternoon.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to quarrel with the minister, but my point is quite apart from the case involving the hon. member for Red Deer. I think the question raised was, what commitments has the Secretary of State for External Affairs made, as far as the hon. member for Red Deer is concerned, and what special mission is he involved in on behalf of the government? However, Mr. Chairman, I am not talking about this; I am talking about the precedent we are going to create in recognizing an individual member of an opposition party and giving him authority to represent the government. If we do this as a general principle; if we recognize the right of a member to go abroad in order to participate in conferences or other kinds of international meetings, the principle we are recognizing here in regard to one hon. member should also be recognized in regard to any other member of this house in the future. This is my point, and it is very important. I do not think the Secretary of State for External Affairs can make a decision on his own on this matter; I think it is a matter of government policy to be determined right now.

This does not involve the specific case of the hon. member for Red Deer; it involves the general principle or general policy being established by the precedent we are now creating in regard to the hon. member for Red Deer. I am interested to know what will happen in the future, because in the past I have been invited to participate in international conferences and felt I could not accept because I could not represent the government; but I assumed that I was invited because of my capacity as a member of parliament. If this is right, we have to know ahead of time whether the government is now defining a new kind of approach or policy in respect of this matter. I think it would be fair, personally, if the government were to recognize a member of parliament who is invited to participate in any kind of international meeting or conference. I believe it would be a good thing if the government were to recognize the right of a member of parliament to participate in such meetings in his capacity as a member of parliament.

Mr. Byrne: Wasn't the hon. member in the Place Pigalle one trip?

Mr. Valade: I did not hear the hon. member, Mr. Chairman. I wonder whether he would be good enough to stand up and ask his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may be permitted to interrupt the hon. member to say that I do not think my hon. friend the President of the Privy Council had any thought of restricting the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the question of the hon. member for Red Deer. I think the question the hon. member for St. Mary is raising is a perfectly proper one, and when the Secretary of State for External Affairs comes back I think the hon. member should state his question so that the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is the minister responsible, may answer. All this is being said now and it will have to be said over again. If the hon. member would put his question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs later, it will avoid repetition. I hope this is agreeable to the hon. member. We are not seeking in any way to restrict, within the limits of the time available today —and we could go on tomorrow also—the Secretary of State for External Affairs being subjected to any questions that the chairman considers proper with respect to this matter. Is this agreeable to the hon. member?

Mr. Valade: This is perfectly agreeable to me, Mr. Chairman. I raised the question because I did not want the government to forget that we should discuss this whole question and not just decide one single issue, namely that of the hon. member for Red Deer. I would like to have a general statement from the government as to the policy in this regard.

Mr. Clancy: Mr. Chairman, it took us 37 minutes to get a "yes or no" from the government as to whether they paid the expenses in this regard, and the question should have been answered in 30 seconds. I will ask any minister here: Has the hon. member for Red Deer the power to commit the Canadian government to any kind of agreement?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think I will answer that question; I am the senior minister in the house. I can say unequivocally that he has no power to commit the government. I do not think even a minister, by himself, would have power to commit the government; the government has to consider these matters. But certainly the hon. member for Red Deer has no power at all.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

Emergency measures organization—

20. Administration and operation, $2,600,000.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, if I remember correctly, I adjourned the debate when these estimates were last being considered by the committee, following the minister's brief statement. I was particularly concerned with the points that had been raised in the report of the special committee on defence with regard to an annual exercise and the suggestion that there should be a national exercise with all survival defence bodies participating. I believe the last such exercise was held in the fall of 1961. Three years have now elapsed, the personnel have changed, and I am sure that some of the practices, some of the good work that had been developed, and the thinking, may have fallen a bit by the wayside. People get out and talk with their opposite numbers. I think this is one of those things which we must study by periodic exercise, rather than just use them in the event of an emergency. Perhaps the minister or his officials could give us an assessment of the efficacy of these exercises.

What use is being made of the training college at Arnprior for the training of municipal officials, doctors and various other persons concerned with survival training? The course offered by that college has been deemed to be very effective. What is the government's intention in respect of this course?

What is the degree of co-operation being received by the authority from the various provinces in regard to these training courses? In 1959, 1960 and 1961 some of the provinces brought attention to themselves by their refusal to co-operate, or if not by refusing, by merely offering a token participation. I am interested to know whether there has been any change in this attitude. Some provinces are doing very excellent work in this regard, but unfortunately the standard is not uniform across Canada. Certain changes were made in fiscal grants to provinces in order to encourage them to participate, but it seems to me that some provincial administrations could show an ostrich how to bury its head in the sand when it comes to civil defence training and survival operations. I cannot imagine what some of these senior provincial officers have been thinking in this regard. Certainly municipalities are not going to take the lead, but must be encouraged, and I am wondering what the government's official policy is in respect of actively encouraging the provinces and municipalities to hold various training exercises.

Mr. Chairman, we will know what further questions should be asked of the minister after he has made his reply.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if there are no other questions, perhaps I might reply briefly to the questions raised mainly by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

In respect of the desirability of national emergency measures exercises, it is of course understood that there has not been such an exercise on a national scale for a number of years. One was projected for a couple of years ago but in fact was not carried out. Those who were responsible for the preparation of that projected exercise did in fact derive a great deal of benefit from the preparation of it, and the emergency measures organization benefited from a review of its activities in this regard. Obviously that value is something less than the value to be derived from a full scale national exercise, but such an exercise would be much more expensive.

It is the view at this time of the emergency measures organization that rather than to attempt another national exercise at this juncture it would be better—this is what we are indeed planning to do—to have a cycle of exercises, as is normal in military training, starting at the municipal level, followed by the provincial level and finally followed by a full scale exercise at the federal level, involving all levels. This is the plan under which we are now operating.

In respect of the civil defence college, I should like to advise the hon. member that the average intake now is approximately 80 students per course. The program includes a basic orientation course for federal employees, specialists courses for departments such as the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Agriculture. It also includes emergency supply planning, technical courses on radiation monitoring and fallout protection, national survival organization and planning, and an operations course for provincial and municipal civil defence workers who have previously received their basic training through a local civil defence training course.

In 1963 the college trained 2,866 planners and 1,453 planners so far in this current year, making a cumulative total to date of more than 33,700. It is evident that the college facilities are normally used to maximum capacity providing courses in both the French and English languages. Recently the government approved the construction of a new single college structure to replace the complex of temporary buildings which we have found are increasingly expensive both to maintain and operate. This new building will not only improve the facilities for training, but will reduce the operating and maintenance costs of the college, it is hoped, by the sum of some $100,000 per annum.

I agree with the suggestion by the hon. member for Edmonton West that the civil defence training college at Arnprior does fulfil an important role in civil defence training and emergency measures planning. In regard to the co-operation from the provinces, I am sure the hon. member will agree that it would be highly inappropriate for me to endeavour to make a comparison between the performances of each province. I can say, however, that we are pleased with the co-operation being received at the present time from all the provinces, and are happy to take account of the fact that the degree of participation in emergency measure planning and training is increasing from year to year. I do not know that one can expect a millennium, but one can hope, as long as there is continuing improvement. I think we should take comfort in that fact.

Mr. Lambert: I have one or two further points I should like to make, Mr. Chairman. During the original planning for the national survival program the post of a federal regional commissioner was discussed. During two exercises the commissioners were appointed on an ad hoc basis and were in fact either cabinet ministers or members of parliament representing the government. As I said, these individuals occupied the positions on a fill-in basis. These two exercises were very interesting and educational. At the planning stage consideration was given to the appointment of a permanent federal regional commissioner for a certain period of time. I have heard nothing more of this projected appointment. Perhaps the minister could indicate what the government's intentions are in this regard.

The next matter with which I wish to deal is one to which reference was made in the report of the defence committee, involving the testing of the siren system. Apparently some communities test their sirens on a regular basis and people have become quite familiar with them. I am sure that other communities have not tested their sirens in the past two years. It would be very interesting to know whether they function at all at this stage, or whether a comic situation would develop such as developed here in Ottawa several weeks ago when because of technical difficulties they began to sound. At that time nobody could be reached to turn them off and for a considerable period of time nobody could be reached to find out what was going on. This is the sort of thing that should not occur again and no doubt appropriate steps have been taken. Perhaps the minister could tell us about them.

Mr. Drury: In respect of the appointment of federal representatives on a permanent basis at the regional level, the hon. member is aware that at the time of the last exercise permanent arrangements had not been made. They have not yet been made, and indeed it is difficult to see, because of the changing nature of the federal representation, how one could evolve a permanent system which would always be workable. Consideration is continuing to be given by the emergency measures organization and consultations are taking place with the provinces to see whether some rather more continuous arrangement can be made for federal representation at the regional level than has been the case in the past. I must confess we have not yet found the solution.

In relation to the testing of sirens the house will be aware that the erection and maintenance, including the testing of sirens, has been put into the hands of the Department of National Defence. The emergency measures organization does recognize that tests as to operability must be carried out in order that one can be satisfied that the sirens will work when required. There is the further obvious advantage in periodic testing that the populations for whom the sirens are intended to be useful will become familiar with the conditions under which they are hearable, if I may use that term, and the conditions under which they are not hearable. In that regard it has been suggested that the practice observed in some municipalities of a periodic turning on of the sirens might be followed throughout the country so that, first, the people will acquire some degree of familiarity with these things and, second, it will be possible for the military authorities charged with their maintenance and reliability to satisfy themselves that in fact they do work. This is now under review by the Department of National Defence and I hope we will have a policy in this respect in the not too distant future.

Atomic energy control board—

1. Administration expenses of the atomic energy control board, $159,000.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, this is an item which very frequently passes the house without much notice. I think this is rather unfortunate although I do not propose taking much time to discuss it today. The atomic energy control board, as I am sure the minister will confirm, performs a very important function in providing control over all the atomic energy activities that are going on in this country, so that the people are protected from the danger that can occur if something goes wrong with atomic energy research stations. Although the house frequently lets the atomic energy control board estimates go through without much consideration, I think it is important for us to recognize what the board does. It has a very important function to perform and over the years we have been singularly fortunate in Canada that we have not been unduly alarmed at any time or subjected to any danger from radioactive materials from any of our own establishments.

This good situation results from an absolutely first class piece of work on the part of the atomic energy control board. It has been chaired by various people, all of whom have carried out their duties efficiently. I thought I would draw the attention of the house to what my own experience was in working with the atomic energy control board and recommend commendation for the board for the work it is doing for the people of Canada. That is all I want to say on item 1, but perhaps the minister would like to add something to these few brief remarks. I have some questions on the next item.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am most appreciative of the kind remarks of the hon. member commending the work of the atomic energy control board. Needless to say, in this important field involving the regulation of the peaceful uses of atomic energy in Canada we have been fortunate in the high purpose, assiduity and perspicacity of the members of the atomic energy control board.

During the past year the board has considered applications for and issued some 1,117 licences covering the use of radioisotopes in Canada. It has issued some 172 permits covering dealings in other atomic energy materials and some 62 permits covering operations with fissile material. As the hon. gentleman has just pointed out, the board is responsible for ensuring that within this country all the applications of nuclear energy are conducted in a manner which will cause a minimum of danger and risk to the general public. I would agree with him that we have been lucky to date and, because of the soundness of the regulations and the degree of wisdom with which they are applied, I hope we will continue to have the same good fortune in the future.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask two short questions of the minister. I read in a trade journal recently that there is some danger that the whole western world will be short of uranium oxide and other fissionable substances throughout the 1970's. I was wondering whether the commission might make a survey of the situation and advise other departments of the government whether in fact Canada is facing a shortage so that we might encourage the development of the industry which was doing very well a few years ago. We heard a lot about the lack of sales of fissionable material to the United States, and if this situation can be improved it will be a tremendous source of income for Canada.

My second question is closely related. Should we not at this time make a proper survey of our mineral resources throughout Canada, even in our national parks? If commercial ventures are not going to be allowed in the national parks, at least independent government teams could look for possible sources of uranium oxide in the parks so that if a shortage does develop in the 1970's we will not lack fissionable materials for our projects at Chalk River and other such places.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the supply of uranium oxide in Canada has been in the past primarily the responsibility of Eldorado Mining and Refining. As the committee will be aware, this organization reports to parliament through the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Consequently I should refrain from commenting on the observations of the hon. gentleman, but I will be glad to bring them to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who I think will in all probability, if I could express a personal view, be in agreement with the suggestion made by the hon. member.

In so far as a survey of our mining resources generally is concerned, I will be glad to draw this to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Item agreed to.

5. Grants for researches and investigations with respect to atomic energy, $1,250,000.

Mr. Churchill: On this vote, Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear from the minister with regard to grants for research and investigation by atomic energy. I recall the importance of this subject as it was discussed in years gone by when I had some responsibility in this area. I was never of the opinion that we were giving enough, granting enough money, for this important research. However, there are limitations placed on some ministers who want to spend money by the Minister of Finance, who does not. I presume my successor in this field may have had the same experience as I did. Could he tell us just how this money is being distributed and where the research is being done?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, knowing the responsibility and great interest of the hon. member in the past in this subject, I am glad to say that I share his views that these grants in aid of research are, from the point of view of the development of the national economy, important. I fully share his view in this regard, and he will be glad to note an increase of some 30 per cent in the money devoted to this purpose between 1963-64 and the current year under discussion, 1964-65. There has been an increase in this appropriation from one year to the next and I think one can look forward to some modest increase in the years ahead.

These grants for research have been designed to assist Canadian research workers to purchase and operate major items of atomic energy equipment so that they may carry out fundamental atomic energy research and train the scientists and engineers needed for future atomic energy operation in Canada. At the present time, atomic energy projects are being conducted at nine universities, namely British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, McMaster, Queen's, Montreal, McGill and Laval. These universities are being assisted in this way.

Item agreed to.

10. Current operation and maintenance, including expendable research equipment, $34,861,400.

Mr. Churchill: We are now on votes 10 and 15, Mr. Chairman, dealing with the operations of Atomic Energy of Canada. We are moving rather hurriedly. Several years ago I had the experience of this vote passing through the committee before the president of the corporation arrived in the gallery. I do not believe we need to go quite that fast today. I think the minister might favour us with a statement with regard to the activities of Atomic Energy of Canada, the operations and developments that are going on. His statement does not have to include all the items that appear in the annual report, but could be comprehensive enough to cover the field. Perhaps he may summarize the activities for the record and for the general information of hon. members. Then, we may ask him some specific questions on some of the details.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; may I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre if his remarks are directed to vote No. 10 or vote No. 15?

Mr. Churchill: I would think, Mr. Chairman, that 10 and 15 might be combined for the purposes of our discussion, and when this is over we might pass the two of them.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drury: The hon. member will recall when last I spoke of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, I did give an extensive review of the progress up to that time of the operations of the company. Perhaps I might try to bring the committee up to date briefly.

The heavy water moderated and cooled natural uranium fueled reactor system continues to dominate the Canadian nuclear scene. The successful operation of Canada's first nuclear power station, the 20,000 kilowatt nuclear power demonstration unit, coupled with the enthusiasm for the Canadian nuclear power system shown in many quarters internationally, fully vindicates those who first urged its development.

Canada's first full scale nuclear power station of 200,000 kilowatt output with its single reactor, generally known as CANDU, now being built by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited with the co-operation of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario at Douglas Point, is expected to be completed in time for commercial operation in 1965 and at a cost that is not expected to exceed the budget figure of some $81.5 million. The preliminary design by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited of the nuclear system and by Ontario hydro of the conventional system of a one million kilowatt nuclear generating station employing two reactors has been completed and, as the committee is well aware, agreement has been reached between the government of Canada, the government of Ontario and Ontario hydro concerning the arrangements that will prevail in respect of the construction of such a station. I might emphasize that the decision to adopt this particular design and to employ Atomic Energy of Canada Limited as the designer has been made by Ontario hydro and it is Ontario hydro not Atomic Energy of Canada Limited that will build this plant. In other words, Ontario hydro is using its normal procurement methods for this plant, rather than the special arrangements worked out for Douglas Point.

Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has always enjoyed a close relationship with Canadian industry. In response to an invitation by atomic energy, individual companies are seconding staff to atomic energy research and design locations to gain first hand knowledge and experience of the Canadian nuclear power system. Now that decision has been taken to proceed with the proposed new Ontario hydro station, it is expected that this type of liaison between atomic energy and industry will be accelerated. This procedure has the advantage of releasing atomic energy facilities for new and diversified projects, while giving industry an opportunity of being more closely integrated with the Canadian program.

The design of the 200,000 kilowatt nuclear generating station for India is proceeding at full speed and in full co-operation with atomic energy's power product group acting as nuclear consultants for the Indian department of atomic energy. Montreal Engineering Company Limited has signed a contract with the department of atomic energy of India for the design of the conventional part of the station and will act as consultant to that department in the construction of the station.

Negotiations are at present under way between Canadian General Electric Company Limited and the Pakistan atomic energy commission for the sale of a 132 megawatt nuclear power station of Canadian design to be located at Karachi. Elsewhere on the international scene it is safe to say that interest in the Canadian system is keen; so also is competition from other industrialized nations. But I am sure that an aggressive Canadian industry employing a very sharp pencil, and encouraged by A.E.C.L., should be able to look to markets abroad in the nuclear power field in the years immediately ahead.

Research, of course, is the lifeblood of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. The Chalk River nuclear laboratories research team, a group with a world wide reputation for original work, continues to employ the excellent facilities located at Chalk River to their limit. While, of necessity, effort must be concentrated on research and development incidental to all aspects of the heavy water moderated and cooled reactor system in order to back up commitments made, A.E.C.L. is making the preliminary studies necessary to the launching of a program for the development of a heavy water moderated, boiling light water cooled, natural uranium reactor system.

Construction of the Whiteshell nuclear research establishment in Manitoba is continuing on schedule. Four major buildings are now in use and some useful research work is at present under way.

Hon. members will be interested to learn that A.E.C.L. has now firm requirements for heavy water that exceed the 1,000 tons of production in the first five years of the operation of the plant in Nova Scotia being built by Deuterium of Canada Limited. A.E.C.L. has, on behalf of the government of Canada, undertaken to guarantee the sale of the first five years of production from this plant at the rate of 200 tons per year, starting July 1966.

The requirements of the Douglas Point generating station borrowed from the United States atomic energy commission, plus the requirements of the million kilowatt station recently announced for Ontario hydro, total about 1,150 tons. There are additional smaller amounts needed during this five year period to meet the Chalk River and Whiteshell research reactor requirements, which total about 35 tons. There is also a need for 150 tons for the 132 megawatt nuclear plant for Pakistan, if that project proceeds, and there are several other potential requirements that could total some hundreds of tons in the same period.

A.E.C.L. and other users will be exploring the possibility of further production in Canada, as it is now obvious that 200 tons per year will not meet Canadian requirements, and foreign sales appear to be considerable. If, during the 1970's, the heavy water moderated power reactors are developed to use boiling light water or light water steam for the coolant, the total requirements of heavy water for each plant will be reduced by about one fifth. However, at that time the rate of installation of these plants should be such that there will be an assured market for increased production, assuming of course that the price is competitive with other sources of supply.

Hon. members are familiar with the success that has been achieved by A.E.C.L.'s commercial products division in Ottawa. The products manufactured by this group find their way to purchasers in every corner of the globe. So great has been the increase in the volume of sales that A.E.C.L., in order to keep pace with the orders, has decided to construct a new building on the outskirts of this city.

I think this suffices to give a brief summary of progress to date of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and I would recommend that these estimates be passed by the committee.

Mr. Starr: I am not going into the intricacies of atomic energy because I know nothing about them, but on at least two or three occasions I asked the minister whether a decision has been reached by the atomic energy commission on the application of Ontario hydro for a definite site for the location of its nuclear power plant, more particularly in Fairport in Ontario county. Since he has already admitted that the application was received on September 8, and since two months have passed since then, I would like to know whether this site has been approved. If not, when does the minister think the commission might be able to give approval in order to expedite the construction of the plant?

Mr. Drury: I can hardly resist the temptation to point out to the hon. member that we have passed items 1 and 5. Consequently I cannot avail myself of the advice of Dr. Lawrence, who was here a few moments ago. However, I did discuss this point with him. It is correct that an application has been made by Ontario hydro for a permit to construct a plant in Fairport, Ontario but the application, as in very complex projects of this sort, is unlikely to be complete in itself and further details are expected to be sought.

In fact further details have been sought and, in the nature of things, it is likely that when the second set of information has been obtained the scientists will ask for more. This is quite normal. It is expected by Ontario hydro and by the atomic energy control board. However, I can assure the hon. member that I understand the time being consumed in examining the facts in relation to this particular site will in no way hold back the timetable which Ontario hydro has for the construction of the station. Indeed, were atomic energy control board to grant a permit tomorrow, this would not advance the construction of the building by one day.

Mr. Starr: I must apologize to the minister for raising the matter under the wrong item. Nevertheless great interest has been created in that area and the local people would like to know whether the site has been approved.

Once we know the site has been approved that will ease the minds of a lot of people.

Mr. Drury: Well, if I may suggest so, there is no such thing as an appropriate site and an inappropriate site. It all depends on what you are going to do at any given site. What might be right and proper to do in a certain way on the shores of Hudson bay would be quite wrong to do downtown in Toronto, particularly in the nuclear field. It is not so much a question of approving the site as examining what Ontario hydro proposes to do, and how it proposes to do it in Fairport. I think I can say, without revealing anything I should not, that in relation to the initial proposals of Ontario hydro for the operation of this station the atomic energy control board made some counter-suggestions as to how it should be done. It is the interplay of suggestion and counter suggestion, looking toward the safety of the general public, which takes the time; it is not simply a case of saying yes or no to a site, but it is, rather, the making of decisions with regard to the technical aspects of what is to be done at a particular site.

Mr. Slogan: I think it is only appropriate for me to have a few words to say when the estimates of Atomic Energy of Canada are being considered, particularly since one of the research establishments is located within my riding. I must say the people of Springfield are proud of this research centre which is located there. It has done a great deal to stimulate this part of the country. I think it is a most beautiful site for a most worthwhile project.

The former government set up a special committee of the House of Commons a few years ago to deal with research, and representatives of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Eldorado, Eldorado Aviation and the national research council appeared before it. At that time some of the controversy surrounding the type of reactor which Canada should be producing was brought into the open. I think a good deal of healthy discussion came out of that committee and I believe that to a large extent the stand taken by Atomic Energy of Canada has been vindicated and that the type of reactor which Canada is producing is practical and saleable. There are a number of questions I should like to address to the minister. Perhaps he could take note of them while I am speaking and provide me with some answers.

First, I wonder whether he could explain to me the manner in which housing is financed at Whiteshell and how those houses are taken over by the residents. Are they rented, or are they bought? How much money is Atomic Energy putting into the townsite? Is Central Mortgage and Housing underwriting this expenditure?

The minister mentioned that Atomic Energy of Canada is considering the production of a different type of reactor, one which would be cooled by hot water or steam. He told the committee this would reduce the cost of some of our reactors and the amount of heavy water which would be required. There has been talk, also, of an organically cooled reactor. I should like the minister to tell us what is meant by an organically cooled reactor as well as by a hot water cooled reactor, and whether the use of such coolants would reduce the cost of the reactor. I should also like to know the effect of these developments upon the use of heavy water.

In the United States at the present time there is a great deal of talk about using nuclear reactors for the desalinization of ocean water. This is a pet project of President Johnson and, indeed, it will be brought up at the forthcoming meeting of NATO parliamentarians. As one of the leaders in the field of nuclear research, Canada should I believe be in a position to play an active part in the development of reactors which could be used for desalinization. I notice that invitations have gone out to 114 nations to attend an international symposium or saline water conversion to be held in October, 1965, and I am sure that Atomic Energy Limited must have some plan about attending this conference. Perhaps the minister could outline to us the action he intends to take in this regard. I notice also that at the present time a Montreal company has submitted a proposal for an 80 megawatt plant with a desalinization capacity of 14,000 cubic meters per day. I think this would be a combined power station and desalinization plant.

I mention this because it seems to me that the interest in desalinization among various nations of the world where there is a shortage of fresh water is such that it might provide a definite market for nuclear reactors produced in Canada. There is no doubt that United States companies will be bidding in this field and I should like to be assured that Atomic Energy of Canada is not dragging its heels in this regard but, rather, doing work which would put it in a position to tender for the supply of reactors to be used for desalinization. I realize that desaliniza-tion is not of primary importance to Canada, because we are fortunate in having an ample supply of fresh water. But because of the limited market for these reactors and because the taxpayers of Canada are making such large amounts available for research to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, we should not miss any opportunity to capitalize on overseas markets. Perhaps the minister could give us an answer in this regard.

I just want to say that relations between the town and Atomic Energy Limited are most cordial. The people in this town are somewhat above the average. I understand that the I.Q. of school children at Deep River is considerably above the average. I know there were some problems of administration at Deep River in the early days and I hope these difficulties will be avoided in Whiteshell. I trust a certain amount of autonomy will be granted to this town so that it will not be a company town, but rather an incorporated municipality as soon as a decision to let these people govern themselves is warranted. I hope also that this community in Manitoba, one which thousands of visitors will go to see and marvel at every year, will not become isolationist. I know there is a tendency among these people to keep to themselves. But I hope the public spirit and leadership which is evident among the people will be shared by the community at large. The former government chose a site in Manitoba for this research establishment in order to decentralize the operation at Chalk River which had grown to capacity. I think this decision was a proper one. I am glad the minister is following up the work which has been done and I trust the work being done at Whiteshell and Chalk River will in the years to come contribute to the advancement of Canada and of the world at large in the nuclear field.

Mr. Stenson: The hon. gentleman said that Ontario hydro was building a new plant with the assistance of Atomic Energy Limited. I wonder whether the minister would tell us whether, as different contracts come up, private industry will be given every consideration in regard to them. Does the hon. gentleman feel that private industry today is playing a large enough part in the promotion of atomic energy and the construction of different plants in this country?

Mr. Drury: The hon. member for Springfield asked some questions about housing in connection with the Whiteshell reactor in Manitoba. These houses are financed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, who secure the necessary money to build them from the government under the heading of loans or advances. This money is borrowed from the government at commercial rates of interest. Atomic Energy of Canada constructs the houses and then rents them to its staff at economic rents designed to pay for the cost of the house, repay the loan and provide investment. In a sense this is the same kind of arrangement which Central Mortgage and Housing has in effect elsewhere.

Mr. Slogan: What about the amortization?

Mr. Drury: I cannot give this information offhand, Mr. Chairman. I suspect it is of the order of 30 years; the same kind of criteria used by central mortgage and housing. The hon. member also asked whether I would undertake a brief dissertation on organically cooled reactors. As the hon. member knows, in a reactor there is required a medium to control the flow of neutrons, known as a moderator, and another substance is required to carry the heat generated from the interior of the reactor to a source where the heat energy can be used. In the case of the CANDU reactor, heavy water is used both as a moderator to control the flow of neutrons and also as a coolant to carry the heat generated by fission from the interior of the reactor to a spot where it can be transformed from heat energy to mechanical energy. Heavy water is an expensive item in itself—at the present time costing the Canadian government some $20.50 a pound—and using it as a coolant can be expensive, in terms of leakages and losses of one sort or another which require replacement.

As a consequence, as I outlined in my opening remarks, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is investigating the possibility of a system employing heavy water as a moderator—that is, continuing its employment as a moderator—but using as a coolant, or the medium for the transfer of heat from the reactor to the power generating system, boiling, light water, or ordinary boiling water—that is, ordinary water under considerable pressure, which will boil. Obviously the loss of this kind of water is not nearly so expensive to make up and replace. In addition to the possibilities of using heavy water as a moderator and boiling, light water as a coolant there are also some organic substances, organic liquids, whose values, advantages and disadvantages are currently planned for investigation at Whiteshell. This will be one of its main, initial preoccupations, namely the investigation of organic coolants, together with inorganic water. As hon. members know, the reactor there has its future ahead of it rather than behind it, so what the results of these investigations will be I of course cannot now say.

The hon. member also asked whether we would be participating in a 114-nation symposium next year on the use of nuclear energy for desalination, if I understood the question correctly. The answer to this question is yes, of course we will be. But I might say, in relation to the desalination program generally—and this is also to some degree an answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Peterborough—that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited is in the business of research in the field of nuclear energy and also in design, but is not in—and indeed in my view should not get into—the business of manufacturing and selling nuclear reactors. The function of A.E.C.L. up to the present has been—and I suggest should continue to be for the future—to produce ideas which it endeavours to farm out to manufacturing industry in Canada, and let industry make use of their capacities, their talents, to refine, to manufacture and to sell the reactors and the components of the reactors in this particular field.

We have potential manufacturers of reactors in Canada. In my opening remarks I pointed out that the government of Pakistan and Canadian General Electric were now negotiating for a contract for the manufacture and delivery, on a turnkey basis, in Karachi of a reactor. The role of Atomic Energy of Canada in this matter is to act as adviser, but the negotiator, the contractor who will manufacture, deliver and guarantee the apparatus will not be Atomic Energy of Canada; it will be Canadian General Electric. Similarly in the desalination field, the reactors required for heat generation in what is, in effect, a massive distillation process, will be their manufacture and their sale; in other words, the manufacture and sale will be the responsibility of manufacturing industry in Canada, rather than of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. Consequently our role at the conference to which the hon. member made reference will be that of technical expert or technical adviser, rather than a manufacturer interested in sales.

The hon. member also had some kind things to say about the relationship between the scientific community at Whiteshell and the local community. As the hon. member well knows, one of the reasons for choosing the site at which the Whiteshell reactor, or the Whiteshell research station is being put up is the proximity of the University of Manitoba. It was because it was intended that there should be the closest possible relationship between the scientific community of Whiteshell and the university communities, not only of Manitoba but of the other provinces as well, that this site was chosen. It is certainly the object of A.E.C.L.—as indeed it is the object of the government—that there should be no tendency to what I think the hon. gentleman referred to as isolationism, of which I do not think there has been any evidence so far.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, I am prompted to say what I want to say now by the fact that the minister said the product with which we are concerned—I think I quote his words correctly—has to look for markets abroad and has to find its way to purchasers in every corner of the globe. If this is true, it seems to me it is about time we began to seriously consider looking for a different system of measurement than the one we use today. Of course I mean the metric system of measurement. Dr. Howlett, who is the director of applied physics at the national research council, says that a real crisis confronts the users of the English system.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I think we will be coming in a moment or two to the estimates of the national research council, of which, as the hon. member has just mentioned, Dr. Howlett is a distinguished officer. Perhaps that might be a better time to examine the problems of our system of measurement and the possible advantages of the metric system.

Mr. Cantelon: I will be pleased to keep my comments until we reach that point, Mr. Chairman.

Item agreed to.

National research council, including the medical research council—

1. Salaries and other expenses, $26,086,600.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I may be allowed to continue what I began at the wrong place a moment ago. It seems to me that this is a favourable time at which to open the issue as to whether we should seriously consider taking the first steps toward introducing a metric system in this country. As Dr. Howlett pointed out, and as I quoted a moment ago, it is a matter of grave concern that Canada is not readying for the switch.

I think everyone in this country realizes that it will be a very difficult thing to do, and it will require a long period of time to make the proper preparations to do this with the least possible disruption to the country. Consequently I think we should begin to take these first steps.

I am prompted to say this by my experience with measurement, although purely academic, for a great many years. I know of the difficulties that students in this country have in handling our system, and I know of the lack of difficulty and the simplicity of the metric system when it is applied in the scientific field, including chemistry and physics. It seems to me that even if we begin to make preparation for this move we would not only be assisting our students, who find themselves in the world today facing extremely heavy competition in the field of science from every other country of the world, but also assisting those who are trying to capture markets outside this country.

I should like to point out that some 90 per cent of the world's population today uses the metric system and that 27 countries in Europe, the Soviet union, China, Japan and India, where we are interested in selling atomic projects, central and South America all use the metric system. In fact as the years go by Canada becomes an anachronism in this sense. We are becoming old hat when it comes to working with a modern system of measurement. This being so, are we making preparation for what I consider to be an inevitable change? We are handicapping our position in world markets if we do not make this change. We are handicapping our young people educationally if we do not make this change, and we are certainly going to handicap the consumers of this country by not making the change.

One can go into a supermarket to purchase something and find four or five different sized cans, each with a different price. If we used the metric system I am sure that many producers of goods would find it impossible to confuse the consumer as they do today. I suggest it is time that we began to consider making this change.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question? Without disagreeing with what he has said, because it has a good deal of merit and is attractive to me, what are his comments as to whether Canada could introduce the metric system before the United Kingdom and the United States do so, in view of our trade relationship with those two countries?

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, we would find it very difficult to introduce this system, particularly if the United States did not do so. The hon. member will recall that I said it is time we began to make preparation for the introduction of this change so as to simplify this change when we do make it. If we start preparing for this change we might be able to influence the United States and Great Britain to also prepare for the change. Great Britain is in fact changing its outmoded system of monetary measurement, and I think it would not be so stubborn as to refuse to change the other system.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, as I make my very brief remarks under this heading I should like to thank the minister for his courtesy and promptness in answering the number of questions I have placed on the order paper during the past several weeks relating to research grants.

Leading into my brief remarks this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should say that while most people of this day and age recognize that we here in Canada are privileged to live in a prosperous country, most responsible political leaders on all sides of this house recognize that we are still facing a basic challenge. I know the minister in another department of government is aware of this challenge in respect of general and regional poverty. I think we can also be thankful that in this day and age we do not meet poverty with old fashioned demagoguery, but by action. Here in the federal sphere of government, while we have not met with the provinces and planned priorities in the social action and economic fields, Canadian governmental leaders in the federal and provincial fields recognize that education stands high on our list of priorities.

I shall now come to my point. In fighting regional and general poverty the federal government has a keen leading role to play in encouraging what I have often termed individual and national excellence. The research council has a great role to play in encouraging basic research in Canada. I thought this would be an opportune time for the minister to make a very brief statement based on my general remarks.

At this particular time in our nation's history many university leaders are conducting symposiums to discuss the pros and cons of what is becoming known as the brain drain.

Some people think there is a serious brain drain of scientists from Canada. Others are not sure if there really is such a drain, while yet others recognize there is one but feel it is not as serious as it might be. In general terms there is a debate going on in the nation today relating to what people loosely and generally call a brain drain.

I know the minister will report to us at a future date on the many findings of the research secretariat, but I for one, without going into great detail, feel that if individual and national excellence is to be encouraged here in Canada, as we fight poverty with facts and not with slogans, and if we are really going to play a role in doing this, we have got to pay much more attention to encouraging basic research here in Canada, and this is going to cost the federal government a lot more money. I do not know whether these figures are correct or in exact detail, or on what they are based, but I have heard time and time again this coined expression expressed publicly, that while Canada spends $1 per scientist, the United Kingdom spends $3 and the United States spends $10 to $15. Perhaps the minister and his officials will wish to comment on these statistics I have put forward.

Prime Minister Wilson in his recently concluded campaign in the United Kingdom stressed that in his country, in order to get the economy moving forward in a realistic way, and in order to meet the basic challenge of poverty, he recognized the vital role as does President Johnson—that the government must play in increasing assistance to basic research. I should like to ask the minister to make some general statement at this time relating to his opinion about the causes of the brain drain of scientists from Canada to other countries, the extent of its seriousness and what positive policies the federal government now contemplates to encourage more Canadian scientists to stay in Canada, as we are attempting to encourage, through the federal government, individual and national excellence. This is something I feel we must do if we are going to really fight regional and general poverty.

As I said at the outset, I have put many questions relating to medical research matters on the order paper and I should like to thank the minister for his helpful answers and cooperation in this regard. It has been said over the last few months that we are about to face a critical shortage of doctors in Canada and that we must have more doctors in training if we are going to have the same standards of medical care in 1970 as we have today. We have been warned time and time again not only in the Hall report but by other responsible individuals that unless we meet the challenge immediately we are going to be faced sooner rather than later with a critical shortage of doctors and dentists in Canada.

With assistance from various departments of government I have tried to get information in this regard. The Canadian universities foundation is carrying out a pilot research project in Ontario alone to find out how many applicants to study medicine were refused admission to medical schools this year. The initial figures are misleading because one student may have made four or five applications, but has only been accepted by one medical school, and yet the three or four refusals appear in the statistics. The Canadian universities foundation is doing important work in having individuals on their staff trying to get the true picture in this regard from the universities, but no matter what their findings may be I think we are all agreed that in the future, as we have learned from the Hall report and other sources, we are going to have to build more medical schools.

I should like to get to the point we are discussing under the particular item relating to grants for medical research. It seems to me that the federal government is going to have to play a much greater role in the future if we are going to keep our medical research scientists in Canada at more properly staffed medical schools. I should like the minister to outline the problem generally as he sees it at the present time. I know that nobody, including the medical research council, can always get exactly what it asks for. However, I feel it must be emphasized that if we are going to have more medical schools we will also have to have more medical schools doing more important research projects, which is going to involve a greater degree of assistance on the part of the federal authorities.

I know it is impossible to do justice to a subject of this nature in the time at our disposal. I also recognize that the minister is going to report on the findings of the research secretariat at a future date, but I hope he will find it opportune at the present time to give the committee a general outline of government policies intended to increase assistance for medical research in particular and industrial research in general, in order that we can keep more Canadian scientists doing their work in Canada.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words along the same lines with regard to medical research. In looking over the estimates for the last 10 years I notice that the budget of the national research council has increased from $14,794,367 in 1954-55 to $47,101,571 in 1963-64. This is quite a substantial increase. I think it is very well merited and perhaps reflects somewhat the interest that is being shown in research throughout Canada.

In the year 1963-64 $5,100,000 was allocated to medical research out of the over $47 million spent by the national research council. My beef, and it is one I have brought up in the house before, is that the amount of money allocated to dental research, which would be included of course in the figure I have given for medical research, bears no relationship whatsoever to the relationship of dentistry to medicine in our communities. The relationship between the amount spent on dentistry and the amount spent on medicine by the average person is far different from the relationship of the amount of money spent on dental research to that spent on medical research. I believe that only 1 to 2 per cent of the money spent on medical research is allocated to dentistry.

I am making this point for a very valid reason in that dental diseases are almost universal and yet are largely preventable. So it is a most deplorable situation when the community as a whole neglects to try to do something about dental diseases, which no doubt could be largely prevented if certain public health measures were followed and if further research were carried on.

My plea is that the national research council look into the matter to see if more money cannot be allocated to dental research. Perhaps the minister could give me an answer on that point. I know one answer is that it is pretty difficult to get anybody to do this type of research. Last year $31,953 was allocated for fellowships for dental research and $165,500, I believe, was allocated by way of grants for dental research projects, but all the money allocated in the last 10 years for dental research comes to less than $1 million, which is not even 20 per cent of the amount of money allocated for medical research last year alone.

I think there is a very great discrepancy here. I am not placing the blame solely on the minister or the national research council. I think that the bulk of the blame falls on the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the officials of that department, but I certainly should like to see the national research council allocate more of its budget for dental research and I would hope that this would be done in the future.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Mr. Slogan: Before the vote is carried, I asked the minister a question and I should like an answer.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I was planning to wait until all the questions on the various items had been asked but if the committee would prefer me to go ahead now, I will. I think it might be more convenient for all questions to be asked and then I will answer them all at the same time.

Mr. Grafftey: That is in order.

Item agreed to.

15. Assistance toward research in industry, $2,700,000.

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, the record is not unbroken here. The minister indicated he would be prepared to answer questions and we are almost on the last item for the council.

Mr. Drury: I can give the hon. member the assurance that if the last item does carry I will still answer the questions.

Mr. Lambert: We are on the last item save one. Let the minister reply on item 15.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, this lack of confidence is somewhat distressing.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I want to correct that impression. All I was doing was trying to slow down the speed with which you were turning the sheets.

Mr. Drury: Clearly, Mr. Chairman, our research activities which are devoted to the improvement of efficiency and overcoming unnecessary slowness have now uncovered a new field for examination. Perhaps we could have a look to see if we could devise some way of stopping this slowdown.

The hon. member for Kindersley suggested that something should be done concerning the adoption of the metric system by Canada. I think the parliamentary secretary made the point fairly clearly that Canada cannot adopt the metric system unilaterally. Indeed, Canada cannot take very large steps toward the introduction of such a system as long as our largest buyer, the United States, is not taking comparable steps in the same direction. However, preparations are being made looking toward this being achieved. As the hon. member will be well aware, in very large areas of the scientific community the metric system is the standard of measurement, not only in respect of weight and volume but also of length. This, of course, has extended into the schools now. When I was a boy, which was relatively few years ago, the metric system was unknown at the school I attended. We were satisfied with the English system of measurement. I understand now from my children, however, the metric system occupies as important a place as the English system of measurement in our schools today. This is extending, then, through the educational system some preparation for the adoption of the system.

As the pamphlet read to the committee by the hon. gentleman indicates, there is an awareness of this problem and a willingness to do something about it on the part of the national research council and its staff. I, myself, periodically in speeches exhort Canadian industry to prepare itself to meet the great markets of the world outside North America and to recognize that they are liable to have to sell their products under the metric rather than the English system of measurement. The changeover does call for a very substantial investment in both measuring equipment and manufacturing equipment. Perhaps one of the things we should be doing is giving some thought to the development or evolution of machinery which will be able to measure with equal facility in either the metric or English system. Some preliminary thought has been given to this. I believe the hon. member has raised a valid point and thought should be given to this. Preparations should be made. I should like to reassure him that thought has and is being given and preparations are being made. However, this is not something which is likely, nor indeed could, happen overnight.

The hon. member for Springfield, taking the easiest part of the task first, made the observation that in his view the amount of money devoted to dental research, as a proportion of the total amount devoted to medical research, was too small. I am not quite sure how one should divide up either the organs of the body or the ailments of the body and apportion the amount of money devoted to their investigation. I can tell him, however, that I have had representations from those interested in pediatrics who make exactly the same suggestion, that the amount of money devoted to the ailments of children is too small; that more is needed. Those who are interested in communicable diseases are of the view that too small a proportion of the total amount of money going to medical research is devoted to this series of ailments from which we suffer from time to time.

An hon. Member: What do you think?

Mr. Drury: I have no answer as to what are the right proportions. I am told by the medical research council that where they can find high quality fellows in any medical field, including dentistry, they are only too glad to support them. In fact, the big problem in this area is to find competent, high quality people to support rather than trying to deny funds to deserving research fellows. The same is equally true in connection with applications for equipment grants in respect of medical research. Where there are deserving, high quality research projects, with what appears to be a useful potential, these are supported.

The hon. member may have noted that in the period from 1959-60, to date, the funds allocated to the medical research council have risen from some $2 million at an annual rate to a figure in 1964-65 of close to $7 million. This represents a growth factor of three during that period.

The medical research council, and indeed the national research council, are fully alive to the needs for increased research effort in our research community in this country, both for the work it can produce and the support research produces for the teaching apparatus in Canada. As a consequence, they are pressing the government which, in turn, is in agreement with this philosophy, to have increases almost on an annual basis in the amount of funds allocated for fundamental research in both the field of natural science and the field of medicine.

If the hon. gentleman has any influence in the dental community, I hope he will be able to urge them to bring forward high class applicants who would be interested in undertaking research in the dental field. If this can be done, I do not think there will be a refusal on the grounds of a lack of funds.

The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi really invited me to survey the whole field of research, not only to survey it but also produce justification for it. This is a rather tall order. Perhaps I could briefly say that, in respect of medical research, what I have just said to the hon. member for Springfield has some relevance. The total amount devoted to medical research has risen by about the same factor of three during this period 1959-60 to date. Here again the shortage, if any there be, is of qualified people rather than funds with which to support them. The hon. gentleman made some reference to the brain drain and of the investigations now being carried out to establish the real facts in connection with this situation, as distinct from what I believe to be some effort to try to extrapolate a few individual experiences and turn them into a condemnation of the whole system. The fact of the matter is that we have not too much factual data in this field. This is something I regret and something about which I hope I will be able to do something. We have got to have a great deal more in the way of background and factual information on which to base not only intelligent prognostications but also intelligent policies for the future. This, as the hon. gentleman is well aware, is one of the main reasons for the appointment of the scientific secretariat.

Mr. Fisher: Hasn't the government a policy at the present time with regard to this? I may have misunderstood some of the things that were said during the campaigning and in this chamber since then, but I understood the government had a policy in relation to all these matters. I am now left with the impression that there is not any policy except "We will do some research and find out the facts and then get a policy."

The minister is really confusing us and I suggest to him we would appreciate something a little bit more positive, or else he should explain to us why we need facts and statistics now instead of a policy.

Mr. Drury: I have not quite finished what I was going to say in reply to the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi. Surely an intelligent policy should not be elaborated in the absence of facts? There are some people who advocate the construction of a policy on emotion, rumour or intuition, but in the field of science I do not think this should be the foundation upon which a policy is built. The hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi asked what we were doing about the so-called brain drain—

Mr. Fisher: I would like the minister to explain to me what the national research council has been doing all these years and why we have had ministers responsible for scientific research all these years if now, in the fall of 1964, we find the minister coming forward saying we have not got a policy, that it is emotional and intuitive to enunciate a policy, and that he is waiting for the facts. What is the justification for the N.R.C. and all these fat reports we have had if we cannot get a statement on policy now? The only justification we have had is that each year the branch is getting a little bigger and so it could not be too bad.

The minister had better come off it and give us the government's policy on this whole question of science. The point raised by the hon. member for Springfield has been known to laymen such as myself who have only a nodding acquaintance with the dental profession. Yet the minister comes in and foists off a professional with the suggestion that some people have ideas and other people have other ideas. That is no answer. When the hell are we going to get some answers from the government and from people like the minister who has the responsibility? What bothers me is the casual slackness of coming with an item such as this and really dusting us off, saying he has to get some facts and figures.

Does the minister realize how aggravating and annoying this attitude is, especially when on other occasions, particularly when speeches are made outside the house, all the honours are given to the national research council and all these various academic people working in these fields? When we are given information in this chamber it is as though we were a bunch of dunces who could not understand it. I am going around in circles but I suggest the minister is going around in circles too.

At the very least the minister should give us an undertaking that some time within the next year, if this parliament survives, he will be able to come in and tell us the government's policy in the field of science and research, and fit into the picture somewhere the point raised about dentistry. He might even mention pediatrics, and give us some indication where the government is going.

Every damned ministry I know of has some kind of research or fact finding program going. For example, the Minister of Labour says he is getting a manpower consultant service going. We want to know what the government is going to do about the Hall commission recommendations but we are told, "Just wait until we analyse and get all the facts in." There are committees by the dozen all over the place finding out things, yet here is a government which came to power on a platform that it knew what it was doing.

The minister was a t.v. star, along with the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, in those one minute blurbs which were broadcast again and again, in which the main theme was "We know how to get Canada going. We know the answers." I am not going to say any more. Today the minister has revealed he has not got any answers. He is just reading something off, giving details about atomic energy that his civil servants prepared for him. He shows no indication that he has a grasp of this field of science or research. I don't mind him dismissing us as though we did not know anything, but I don't see how a minister, responsible for the field the minister is responsible for, can come into this chamber and treat us so cavalierly and tell us "If you just wait until we get a few more facts and statistics everything will be fine."

I am sorry I have had to express what in effect is a bad temper, but seeing this performance I cannot help but feel we had a giant rooking in the last election campaign and in the general stance of this ministry, which seems to be all-wise and all-knowing.

Mr. Drury: I do not think I have made claims to be all-wise and all-knowing. If the hon. gentleman asked me what is the policy of the government in relation to science I would say this covers a large field indeed. I am prepared to answer specific questions, but this is a general one. I could answer that the government's policy with regard to science is an approving one; is one of assistance.

Speaking of election campaign undertakings, one of those undertakings was implemented in relation to the proposed appointment of a Canadian science council which, in the scientific field, will perform the same role as the economic council of Canada. It will be the purpose of this body to try and delineate—and I am sure it will be successful—the areas in which scientific endeavour can most usefully be undertaken and those areas in which effort might be less productive than if otherwise employed. This is a step in the organization of the development of science.

If the hon. gentleman has a specific question I would be glad to try and answer it, but to ask what is the policy of the government with relation to science covers a very wide spectrum.

Mr. Fisher: It is your responsibility.

Mr. Drury: Yes, I agree. It is currently my responsibility and I am prepared, in respect of scientific policy, to give factual answers to the extent that I am able. The hon. gentleman has suggested that the question with regard to dentistry was brushed off, but if the hon. gentleman had just listened I suggested, as the hon. member for Springfield knows, that there has not been in the dental community the interest and enthusiasm for research that there has been in other fields. Further the medical research council will sympathetically receive applications for assistance in the field of dental research. As far as the medical research council is concerned, there is no shortage of funds or of interest on its side. It is the dental community which has to develop a greater interest in research than it currently possesses.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if I could ask the minister a question. It is not loaded. If there is a shortage of something obvious, such as librarians or teachers, provincial governments I know of follow a policy of establishing courses to deal with this shortage. In Ontario the provincial government is thinking of establishing a library school. If necessary, teachers colleges are established. In other words, the government accepts responsibility for getting specialists in these fields. But if I understand correctly what the minister is telling the committee, he is really passing the buck—he is passing the whole problem back to the profession. If this is the policy of the government, I am glad to know. The minister has made it perfectly clear. It really means the government has no policy with regard to science or specialties within the field of science; the policy is really one which must be generated within the disciplines themselves. If that is the policy of the government, it is very clear. I do not know whether the hon. member for Springfield received the same impression, but that is what I consider to be a brush-off. I took the minister's answer to be: It is up to the dentists themselves to generate a response.

I just happen to have a different conception of the role of government in the scientific field and all I can do in closing the contribution I am making to this discussion is to suggest that the minister look at some of the papers which have been prepared by the Labour party in Britain, or that he read Mr. Wilson's speech on science. I could also suggest he read a little of C. P. Snow.

Mr. Slogan: I do not wish to become involved in a long debate. However, I cannot accept the minister's proposition that all this money has always been available but there has been nobody to take it. I base this on the fact that the dental profession in Ontario was asked to contribute to a research fund and I think its members did contribute some $50,000.

I am sure they would not have done this if more than enough money was already available for research.

It seems to me that with only one half of 1 per cent of the money going into medical research generally being spent in the field of dentistry, there is an inordinate discrepancy and I believe some initiative should be taken by the national research council to see that it is rectified. The dental profession itself has taken some steps in this regard; it has contributed money to dental research. So, as I say, I cannot accept the proposition that there has been money available which has not been taken up.

Mr. Drury: I would point out that the medical research council does not support dental institutions or organizations. Its help is directed toward individuals, not toward organizations. There are a number of dental organizations across the country which either provide their own funds or which receive assistance from endowments, other bodies such as municipal governments, and so on. The moneys of which I am speaking are the sums available to help highly qualified fellows in the dental field pursue research activities. Obviously the dental associations have projects of their own, both research and performance projects, but the medical research council and, in the wider field, the national research council devote their efforts to individuals rather than to organizations and would not be a source of funds for organizational or institutional activity.

Mr. Churchill: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to the annual report of the national research council. The distribution office of the House of Commons has furnished me with the report for the fiscal year 1962-63, the latest one in the possession of that office. Where is the annual report for 1963-64?

Mr. Drury: As on a number of occasions, there has been some difficulty in getting the current report translated, but I am told that it is now in the hands of the printer and we hope it will be available soon.

Mr. Churchill: We had the same answer from the Minister of Veterans Affairs. This makes two reports which have been very seriously delayed this year.

Mr. Grafftey: Very briefly, as we close this discussion, may I say I think the minister was going a long way toward answering our general inquiries to my satisfaction before we were slightly sidetracked. May I assume that the scientific secretariat is making a study in depth of the reasons for the so-called brain drain and will make recommendations to the minister as to how such a drain can be stopped, if it does exist? Do I understand it will recommend a policy designed to encourage more scientists to stay in Canada and carry out scientific research in Canada.

Mr. Drury: I was about to say with regard to the brain drain that it has been established that over the past six or seven years there has been a net increase of scientists in Canada. The numbers who have been lost either temporarily or permanently by emigration have been more than matched by those gained as a result of immigration. In addition, we have the natural output from our educational institutions. There has also been recently an encouraging return, particularly in a number of medical fields, of senior scientific people from the United States, either Canadians who, having carried out postgraduate work south of the border, return to Canada or of United States citizens who come up here because of the opportunities offered for research work.

It is recognized generally I think—certainly it is recognized by the government—that the scale of research work being carried out in this country is probably not as great as we would like. Consequently, whether or not there is a net brain drain it is desirable to increase the scale of research being done in Canada, and encouragement should be given to this end. The means of encouragement are provided through a number of mechanisms, one of which we have been discussing this afternoon, namely the medical research council. Its appropriations, and consequently its grants, have risen over the current year as compared with the preceding year and are expected to rise again in the coming year. The same is true of the national research council. It is recognized that there should be an increase in the amount of grants made available and we are proposing an increase with a view to lessening whatever net brain drain there may be.

As the hon. member suggested, it is hoped the scientific secretariat will be successful in gathering the basic information upon which an intelligent long range future policy can be based.

Mr. Grafftey: One last question. Can it be generally admitted, before we know the findings of the secretariat, that the salaries and remunerations of scientists and the facilities open to them need reconsideration? It seems to me that seven or eight years ago higher salaries and better research facilities per se in the United States seemed to attract our better research brains. They felt it necessary to leave this country in order to work with better facilities in many general fields, and naturally there was talk of higher salaries to a very great extent.

Is it correct to say that in the last few years there has been a general improvement for Canada in this situation? I make these general remarks, Mr. Chairman, realizing that there is a certain amount of folly in preaching nationalism in scientific research, because we have to share our brains with the rest of the world and I do not believe we should always get very excited about our scientists crossing back and forth across the border to the south. But in the two fields I have pinpointed, namely salaries and facilities, has the situation improved considerably in the last year in order to keep Canadian scientists carrying out work in Canada?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think I can safely say that both situations have been improved, perhaps to the point now where salary differential is not a significant or too important factor. I am told that what most interests a research scientist are his opportunities to develop his chosen line of research, and that this to him is very much more important—namely the environment in which he works and the kind of work he is doing—than the annual remuneration. So while both have been improved over the past few years, perhaps the more significant is the environment, meaning facilities, than the salary differential.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister how much of the money in this vote is being extended to assisting in scientific—

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I can interrupt the hon. member for a moment. I had undertaken earlier to have the Secretary of State for External Affairs appear in the chamber to answer questions as soon as he was available from the interview he was having with the foreign minister of Belgium. The minister has now come into the chamber. I am in the hands of the committee as to what they wish to do, and I realize how very late it is.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the only trouble is that only five minutes are available and I am not certain that the Secretary of State for External Affairs could answer our questions in that short space of time.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

Mr. Knowles: That would give him time for only one sentence.

Mr. Churchill: Could we have the minister's estimates brought forward first thing tomorrow and restricted to the questions and answers with regard to the subject we raised this afternoon?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I could not be here earlier, but I think the committee will understand that the foreign minister for Belgium was here. I have just seen him off at the airport. He came specially for a two or three hour visit on a matter of some importance; otherwise I would have been in the chamber this afternoon.

I am in the hands of the house leader. If he wishes to proceed with the estimates tomorrow, I think that is satisfactory; but I do not know that we should proceed for one purpose: I believe we should proceed to discuss the estimates. I cannot, however, be here tomorrow night. The United Nations peace keeping conference is in session here and I have to meet with them tomorrow evening. I could be here tomorrow afternoon. In the few minutes remaining I would be very glad to deal with any questions my hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. McIlraith: I made the undertaking to the committee, Mr. Chairman, and I wanted to keep it. Do hon. members wish to proceed now?

Mr. Lambert: No, there is not enough time.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering how much scientific development and research is being undertaken by the department into the problem of the development of industries in underdeveloped areas such as the one I represent; whether any research assistance has been given to this problem, how much, in what areas, and for what purposes?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, in respect of assistance to underdeveloped areas perhaps some confusion arises in that I am the minister of the Department of Industry whose responsibility it should be, whereas now we are dealing with the national research council, which reports to parliament through me. As the hon. member will recognize, the national research council is not charged with this kind of responsibility. I refer to the development of less favoured areas in Canada. Consequently—

Mr. Peters: This vote is $300 million and it is authorized for assistance toward research in industry. I would think that some of this money must be used for the development of industry, if it is authorized; if not, we should know it is not being used.

Mr. Drury: I am not sure what vote the hon. gentleman is now talking about.

Mr. Peters: I am talking about vote 15(a).

Mr. Drury: That vote, Mr. Chairman, is related to grants made to industrial concerns to assist them in the development of research within the corporate organization. These grants are unrelated to the area in which the industry is operating, but they are made with a view to improving the quality and the quantum of research within a company. They are designed to develop within Canadian industrial organizations a greater ability and a greater talent with which to carry out effective research.

Mr. Peters: I would assume this to mean that all this money is being used for is to assist industries themselves. Is this the policy of the department? The charge has been made by people that come to my office that if we were to look into the Department of Industry very closely we would find that under the previous deputy minister an immense amount of research and studies was carried out in connection with the aircraft industry, but at the expense of all other sections of research. This may be true, and it may not be true. We are certainly not finding out today. I would think that part of the minister's responsibility should be in respect of those industries that are not as well off as some of those that are able to carry out their own research programs to a degree. I believe some of this vote should be expended in assisting them.

For instance, in my area we have the silver mining industry which has a very great problem in regard to refining. I think development of other industries should take second place to the over-all responsibility for the underdeveloped industrial areas where industrial research could produce industries that would provide employment in the area and do some of the jobs the Department of Industry has so far not been able to do in the underdeveloped areas.

If it is the policy of the department to use this money only to bolster existing industries, then personally I am opposed to it and I think we should reduce the amount. I say this because in my opinion this sum of money could do a great deal of good in areas where we have not been able to develop industries, simply because we do not know what types of industry will use the by-products of the primary industries in those areas. This is certainly true in most of the mining communities. We find, for instance, large quantities of slag left in all parts of northern Ontario. Refractory brick, with the proper treatment, could be made from this type of material. We are not capable of doing research in this field. If the national research council is not willing to do it, I ask, who is? The gold mining industry that is leaving the mine is not going to do it, even if it has the money with which to do it. The Department of Industry has to be interested in it, and I think the work has to be done under the national research council. Certainly I am not satisfied that this is being done. I am not satisfied that type of assistance is available.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if hon. gentlemen are agreeable perhaps I can make a reply to the hon. member's suggestion.

In respect of his specific suggestion about the utilization of slurries, slags and slimeys, this is a field in which the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has developed very considerable competence and a great deal of skill. It is that department rather than the national research council, which is charged with the responsibility for development in this particular field. It would be inappropriate and perhaps unwise for the national research council, whose estimates we are now considering, because the hon. member does not feel enough is being done, to duplicate or redo the work the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is doing.

In so far as the second portion of his suggestion is concerned, namely that research money should be expanded in a way to improve the prosperity of small businesses, or in a way to get small businesses established, I should like to point out that research in any field generally calls for an expenditure of something of the order of $30,000 per year per scientist. It is not possible to have any kind of research of a significant character done by much more than a team of three scientists. If we are going to have a coherent and likely productive research effort it calls for a team involving an annual expenditure of something in the order of $90,000 per year. This means that it is very difficult to organize within very small businesses research grants which are going to have a likely and useful productive result. To this end we are trying to encourage industry and the sciences to undertake research work on behalf of all of their constituent members, and thus be able to afford a greater load than one small firm could carry by itself.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Batten): Shall vote No. 15a carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to call it six o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader what matters will be engaging the attention of the members of this house tomorrow and Friday.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to submit first the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, and then proceed to the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State and the other agencies for which that minister answers to the house. On Friday we will be calling the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Knowles: Can the minister yet tell us what we might be doing on Monday?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. We will be proceeding with the resolution stage of the Canada pension plan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: Can we count on that?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes. After that we will proceed with the redistribution bill.

It being eight minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DELEGATES TO PEACE KEEPING CONFERENCE

Mr. Speaker: May I take this opportunity of recognizing the presence in the galleries of 100 delegates from 23 countries, including Canada, who are attending the meeting of military experts to consider the technical aspects of the United Nations peace keeping operations. This important conference began on Monday, November 2, 1964 and will end tomorrow, Friday, November 6, 1964. It is a pleasure to have you with us.

STANDING ORDERS

Third report of standing committee on standing orders—Mr. Asselin (Notre Dame de Grâce).

AIRPORTS

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL FACILITIES IN HEAVILY POPULATED AREAS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I make a brief statement about assistance for airports in heavily populated areas. The federal government has for many years assumed full responsibility for capital expenditures in connection with main line and other airports required to support scheduled air services in Canada. It has also provided cost sharing grants to assist in the development of local airports, and outright grants for airstrips in remote areas.

For some time it has been apparent that the policy of grants to local and remote airstrips needed review because of changes in costs and in requirements, as well as changes in technology. The Department of Transport has had this whole matter under intensive review for some months, and I hope soon to be in a position to make a general statement.

Meanwhile, because of problems at certain airports in heavily populated areas which have substantial traffic although they are not served by scheduled air lines, action has already been taken to improve local airports by provision of additional facilities. This has taken place with regard to Sherbrooke and Hamilton—Mount Hope—airports. The government has today decided to take steps at once to meet urgent situations at Sarnia; at the Niagara regional airport at St. Catharines, and at the Waterloo-Wellington airport by providing additional facilities at these air fields as well. Officials of the department will be getting in touch with local officials in the next few days.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRIES RESPECTING TELEVISION INTERVIEW BY PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence for good reason of the Prime Minister I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether his attention has been drawn to a television interview given by the Prime Minister in Hamilton last night. I ask, on the basis of that interview, is it to be concluded that the government has decided, even before the meeting of party leaders, on the imposition of closure on the flag committee report?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not have the pleasure of listening to the Prime Minister last night on television. If I had I am sure I would have derived at least equal pleasure with the right hon. Leader of the Opposition over the masterly exposition which the Prime Minister generally displays on such occasions. I would want to see the full text of his statement before making any comment. However, I am sure the right hon. gentleman would agree with me it is desirable in the national interest that our business should not be unduly protracted.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So desirable is it that I ask the hon. gentleman, who is the greatest wholesale purveyor of the smooth speech in this house—soporific, sometimes—will he direct the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that we would be only too happy to go ahead with those important matters of legislation which have been kept in abeyance as an excuse in order to have the flag debate concluded?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I will certainly see that the question asked by the right hon. gentleman is conveyed to the Prime Minister, and I am glad he and I are now agreed it is in the national interest that there should be no undue delay in the despatch of the public business of this house.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a supplementary question.

At the same time and concerning the same game, could he determine if the leader of the official opposition really stated in Toronto, the day before yesterday—I think, while addressing the chamber of commerce —that the main function of a leader of the opposition was to oppose. The right hon. gentleman is reported to have repeated at least ten times: our role is to oppose and oppose and oppose, no matter which debate comes up, whether on the flag or some new legislation. Is it true that the Leader of the Opposition intends to oppose and keep on opposing, as he said in Toronto the night before last?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope not, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a wonderful alliance between you and the Creditistes.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A supplementary question. May I ask whether the statement of the Prime Minister, to the effect that when the Secretary of State for External Affairs says "we shall take it under consideration it means it is not likely to happen", is to be taken at its face value?

Mr. Churchill: A further supplementary question—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Before dealing with a new question may I just deal with that one. The Prime Minister has a great capacity for proper interpretation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the secretary of state this. In view of the statement just made by the hon. member for Villeneuve, has the minister promised that hon. member a trip overseas to Africa or Asia?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not promised the hon. member for Villeneuve a trip such as is suggested, but I will say to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre that I am prepared to promise him a trip.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I would rather stay here and watch you.

OFFICIAL STATUS OF MEMBER FOR RED DEER ON AFRICAN TOUR

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. What specific mission has been assigned to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) by the government on the occasion of his trip to Africa?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I gave the reason yesterday, but I shall be ready later on today to supply a further explanation.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the minister is saying that there are two reasons why the hon. member was sent on a mission. Would he specify which is the official one?

[Text]

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is based on the appointment of the hon. member for Red Deer as a special envoy for the government of Canada. I was wondering whether the minister's attention had been brought to the fact that most of the inhabitants of the continent of Africa are of the negro race; that they have been taking a very keen interest in political developments in the United States, are well aware of the significance of Senator Goldwater's candidature and will undoubtedly take equal cognizance of the expressions of regret over Senator Goldwater's defeat by members of the party of the hon. member for Red Deer; and does he think this is likely to place the hon. member in a suitable position as Canada's representative in that continent?

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I want to emphatically deny that I ever said anything of the kind.

An hon. Member: Nobody said you did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman would not expect me to be responsible for all the political views—if indeed these are the views held—of any particular member.

Mr. Winkler: You might wish to be.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I do share with my hon. friend the opportunity for saying that we in this country are pleased that the United States elections are over and, without commenting on the results of those elections, of observing that Canada will continue to collaborate with the administration of the United States.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that Russia is attempting to send cosmonauts to the moon, and that the United States are doing the same, that Canada has sent the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) to Africa, and that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) is suggesting that I be sent somewhere in the world—

Mr. Valade: Or to the moon—

Mr. Caouette: —would the minister consider sending, as the first Canadian cosmonaut to the moon—

Mr. Valade: The hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Caouette: —the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who would feel perfectly at home there.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has just reached the moon.

[Text]

I should point out to my hon. friend, Mr. Speaker, that I was only speaking figuratively.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Before the minister appointed the hon. member for Red Deer to his present assignment, I wonder whether the minister considered sections 10 and 11 of the Senate and House of Commons Act which, unless there is an appropriate order in council, might cost the hon. member for Red Deer his seat; or was that the purpose, and is that the purpose of the invitation offered to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Villeneuve?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that in putting his question my hon. friend wanted to give me the opportunity to say that was not the intention. The Senate and House of Commons Act in my opinion does not warrant that conclusion. This morning I looked at section 16 of the act, and I have discussed the matter with others, and I am sure the conclusion that my hon. friend might want to be able to draw would not be warranted.

Mr. Knowles: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has a firm decision been made on whether or not to pay the hon. member's expenses on this trip?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. I said that yesterday.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED PRESENCE IN CANADA OF U.S. NAZI LEADER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and ask whether his attention has been drawn to a statement by Mr. Pat Burns, a radio station interviewer and commentator from Vancouver before a meeting of the board of broadcast governors recently, to the effect that he had received a telephone call from George Lincoln Rockwell, the leader of the nazi party in the United States, from Vancouver international airport at about the same time it was alleged Mr. Rockwell was there. If this has been drawn to the minister's attention would he care to comment on it?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As a result of the additional information which came to light from the news reports, immigration officials conducted an immediate investigation into this matter. It has been learned that George Lincoln Rockwell was able to gain admission to Canada as an air lines passenger on October 25 at Vancouver. He left Canada the following morning. The circumstances under which he was able to effect entry are under investigation.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DEPORTATION OF FAMILY OF FORMER DOMINICAN REPUBLIC OFFICIAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on November 3, in response to an inquiry by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I indicated that I would be reconsidering the case of Mrs. Espaillat and her children in the light of the apparent willingness of the Portuguese government to extend the validity of her entry visa to that country. I have now received confirmation of this extension. In view of this development her stay in Canada has also been extended and it is expected that this will permit Mrs. Espaillat's children to complete the current school year.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONGO—INQUIRY AS TO RELEASE OF MISSIONARIES HELD BY REBELS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he received a telegram from Pastor Perry Rockwood of the People's Gospel Hour concerning what steps are being taken to release missionaries held in the Stanleyville area of the Congo; and is the minister able to bring the house up to date with any information he may have received since he informed us quite fully on this matter a little over a week ago?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will remember that several questions about this very serious situation have already been put by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Later in the day I hope to deal with some aspects of this situation, not unrelated to the reasons for the hon. member for Red Deer now being in Africa.

CYPRUS—REPORTED INCIDENTS INVOLVING CANADIAN SOLDIERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, seeking merely information. Have there been developments in Cyprus recently in which, according to certain press reports, a Canadian soldier has been wounded? Second, did a Canadian soldier fire a certain number of shots at one of the Greek or Turkish Cypriots who failed to halt on command?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe that a Canadian soldier was wounded by accident within the last few days. As to the second part of the question, I do not have the facts but I shall ascertain what the situation may be and if the allegation is in fact correct. With regard to the situation in Cyprus generally, I am sure my hon. friend will agree that the relative calm in that troubled island has been made possible in part by the presence of the United Nations peace keeping force, in which Canada continues to have the largest complement.

[Later:]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. I would ask him if he has more information than the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to the reported wounding of a Canadian soldier in Cyprus. What were the circumstances under which it happened, and how serious is the casualty?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I have nothing to add, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, surely the Minister of National Defence can answer a question with regard to the troops who come under his jurisdiction. Under what circumstances was this soldier wounded in Cyprus? The Secretary of State for External Affairs said "accidentally". Was he shot by one of the Turkish or Greek Cypriots, or was he accidentally hit by his own comrades?

Mr. Hellyer: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has indicated already that a report would be sought respecting the situation.

Mr. Churchill: You do not know anything about your troops.

AGRICULTURE

STEPS TO IMPROVE POSITION OF EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I have had this question for a number of days, and in the minister's absence would direct it to the acting minister, whoever that may be. Will the minister say whether he has any immediate statement to make on steps to be taken that may alleviate the depressed position in which the farmers of eastern Canada find themselves?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, if this question is related to a new dairy policy, an announcement will be made in due course.

Mr. Winkler: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is not specifically related to the dairy policy; it is related to the whole question of eastern agriculture.

Mr. Sauvé: We are working on a program that will improve considerably the situation of eastern farmers, and the announcement should come in the near future.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well; improve considerably.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. members will remember that yesterday I ruled one of these questions out of order on the ground that it was far too wide to expect an answer at this time. We seem to be proceeding along the same line this afternoon. I would hope that a vague, general question like that would not be asked at this time.

Mr. Winkler: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I will admit that your statement in this regard is absolutely correct. However, over the past few weeks I have been rising in this house to ask questions about turkey producers, beef producers, hog producers and the whole range of operations of eastern agriculture, without receiving one answer. There has always been a dodge and a hedge in reply to my questions, and that is the reason for my wide ranging question today. I will not take advantage of the opportunity to refer the matter for discussion at 10 p.m. until the Minister of Agriculture returns to this house.

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I should like the hon. member to bring the question forward for discussion this evening at 10 o'clock, when I will be here to answer it.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Forestry? Did the government this week receive a delegation from the Catholic farmers' union, and what does he intend to do to assist agriculture in the eastern provinces and particularly the Quebec farmers?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, until 2.30 this afternoon we had not received any telegram from the Catholic farmers' union asking us to receive a delegation. On October 22 that union sent us a telegram concerning the dairy policy, but we are still expecting a telegram asking us to receive a delegation from the Catholic farmers' union.

I know that the Minister of Agriculture will be very pleased to receive such a delegation. Tuesday, the minister announced that last week we met Mr. Courcy, the minister of agriculture of the province of Quebec, together with his officials, concerning the establishment of a dairy policy, and we will soon be in a position to announce important changes which, I am sure, will satisfy the eastern farmers, especially as concerns the dairy industry. I am sure that my hon. friends will then be pleased to congratulate us.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask another supplementary question?

Does this mean that to date the federal government had no policy respecting this matter?

[Later:]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Forestry a question supplementary to those which were directed to him a few minutes ago. It deals with the new government policy which will be announced in connection with the dairy industry.

Can the minister tell us whether this new policy, which the opposition has been asking for for several months, will be retroactive to May 1 last?

Mr. Sauvé: Certainly not, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry who seems to be looking after agricultural questions in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture. Would the minister take into immediate consideration the assistance of eastern beef cattle raisers in the form of loans that could save them from disastrous losses because of the current low and unsatisfactory prices for unfinished beef at the present time, and because of their financial inability to hold these cattle?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, I will bring this question to the attention of the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FEEDER CATTLE—REQUEST FOR PRICE PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the federal government is going to move into the market to protect the level of prices on feeder cattle in western Canada?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Perhaps I could take the question as notice and see that it is answered tomorrow.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INCLUSION IN WHITE PAPER OF OPINION OF FORMER JUSTICE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, or perhaps in his absence the President of the Privy Council would answer the following question. Whereas the Minister of Justice has stated that a white paper will be issued respecting the history of and events leading to the domiciling of the constitution, would the minister consider including in the white paper the legal opinion furnished following the federal-provincial conference by Hon. Davie Fulton, the immediate future leader of the national Conservative party?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—REPORTED INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has he read a news item in this morning's Gazette to the effect that in the province of Quebec unemployment increased by 27 per cent from April to September, this year? Can the minister tell us whether it is his government's intention to take some action in order to curtail that unemployment increase in the province of Quebec, since the Liberals committed themselves during the last election campaign to full employment in our country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read this article but I know that the hon. member is aware of the fact that the situation in our country has greatly improved under the present administration.

Mr. Valade: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Acting Prime Minister give us some explanation as to why unemployment has increased by 27 per cent, as compared with last year? Does that mean that such conditions are of no concern to the present government, which had promised full employment during the last election campaign?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's statement is not in accordance with the facts.

[Text]

[Later:]

Perhaps I could supplement the reply given a few minutes ago to the hon. member for St. Mary. The figures he quoted in regard to unemployment in the province of Quebec were so extravagant and unrelated to the facts that I should point out that in September, 1964, the figures were 4.3 per cent; in August, 5.0 per cent and in September, 1963, 5.3 per cent. This confirms what I said, that there has been substantial improvement in this very difficult national problem.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the minister tell us when he is going to implement the promise that was made during the 1963 campaign, that a Liberal government would reduce unemployment to zero?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Since my hon. friend asks me this question, may I point out to him that there was never any such statement made. What was said was that when this government assumed office it would resort to policies that would considerably improve this situation. Those have lead toward an even greater improvement than it anticipated. The results are apparent now. We have now the lowest unemployment we have had, generally speaking, for over eight years, and we have had greater improvement than we have had in 17 years.

Mr. Ricard: May I ask a supplementary question. Will the Acting Prime Minister read his speeches of 1962, where he will find that he did promise full employment all over Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have already reread those speeches many times—

Mr. Ricard: But you do not understand them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —and every time I read them, I derive greater satisfaction.

Mr. Valade: I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister if he denies the statement that I quoted before, which was issued by Mr. J. P. Reid, who is the local general manager of the national employment service at Montreal, in which statement he says that some 38,000 persons were unemployed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member must know, and I did not interrupt him before because it seemed to be the quickest way to get over the hurdle, that he should not inquire as to whether statements made in newspapers are correct. This also gives me an opportunity to remind hon. members of section 3 of the instructions given me by the house, that answers to questions should be as brief as possible, should deal with the matter raised and should not provoke debate. The same thing applies when asking questions.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister quoted some figures but he did not indicate the source of those figures. I think the minister should tell us from which source he took this information.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The dominion bureau of statistics.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether the figures he brings before the house include the number of unemployed receiving unemployment insurance benefits or whether they include also those who receive only social assistance benefits or receive nothing at all?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think that I shall have to consider this question before giving an answer.

[Text]

Mr. Valade: I wish to give notice that we will debate this question at the earliest opportunity.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REVIEW OF FORMULA TO DETERMINE DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Industry.

Several times in the house I asked when the minister would announce the new designated areas. Is he now in a position to tell us when he intends to announce the new areas to be designated for the economic assistance provided?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, the annual review is still proceeding and I hope to have an announcement to make in the not too distant future.

[Text]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of external affairs based on a Canadian Press report datelined Detroit which appears in the Financial Post. It says:

> Eternal affairs minister Paul Martin reiterated yesterday that the Canadian government is determined to achieve a somewhat better balance in Canadian-U.S. trade in auto parts.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that the minister's duties are wide and varied, including those of acting prime minister, which he handles with great skill, but would he advise the house when he was appointed to look after affairs in eternity?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is growing evidence that the government is possessed of what one might call earthly eternity.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has he been able to straighten out the base lines along our coasts?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, it is not a problem of straightening the base lines along any coast. It is a matter of completing all negotiations and taking appropriate action.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are the negotiations with the United States completed in so far as the west coast is concerned?

Mr. Robichaud: The second phase of negotiations is completed but there are still details to be negotiated.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPORTED DISCRIMINATION SHOWN BY PENSION COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Could the minister order an investigation respecting several complaints which were received concerning the allocation of pensions to veterans by the pension commission, due to the fact that they would be members of some political party or other and as it seems that there exists some discrimination against certain veterans?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to deny categorically the accusation laid by the hon. member and assure him as well as the other members that no political consideration intervenes in the allocation of pensions to veterans. Therefore, no inquiry is required.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Would the curiosity of the minister be satisfied if I told him about certain specific cases, either in his office or in this house?

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell this house that any specific case which is brought to my attention is studied immediately, and if the hon. member would be kind enough to submit to me, as soon as possible, the cases he is referring to, I would be glad to look into them.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a point of order arising out of the question put by the hon. member for Mégantic. The hon. member for Mégantic has taken up the answer of the minister and has said he can supply some proof that prejudice is involved in some veterans affairs cases. I think the hon. member for Mégantic should put to the house the case that he assures the minister he has in his own hands. This is my point of order.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RETURN OF RAILWAY STOCK CARS TO WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the congested conditions in some of the market places in western Canada with regard to feeder livestock, I wonder if the minister would make representations to the railway to see whether there is anything that can be done to speed up the return of livestock cars from eastern Canada.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I would be glad to do that, sir.

AIR TRANSPORT

MEDICAL REQUIREMENTS FOR PRIVATE PILOT'S LICENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): My question is for the Minister of Transport. Will the minister inform the house when the medical requirements for a private pilot's licence will be eased?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, even though I have been under medical care recently, I would care to give an answer to that question without better advice than I have available at this moment.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

1. Administration, operation and maintenance including payment of remuneration, subject to the approval of the governor in council and notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, in connection with the assignment by the Canadian government of Canadians to the staffs of the international organizations detailed in the estimates (part recoverable from those organizations) and authority to make recoverable advances in amounts not exceeding in the aggregate the amounts of the shares of those organizations of such expenses, and authority, notwithstanding the Civil Service Act, for the appointment and fixing of salaries of commissioners (international commissions for supervision and control in Indo-China), secretaries and staff by the governor in council; official hospitality; relief and repatriation of distressed Canadian citizens abroad and their dependents and reimbursement of the United Kingdom for relief expenditures incurred by its diplomatic and consular posts on Canadian account (part recoverable); Canadian representation at international conferences; expenses of the third commonwealth education conference; a cultural relations and academic exchange program with the French community, and grants as detailed in the estimates, $10,826,300.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Chairman, the other day it was suggested that because of the importance of certain events that have transpired in the world community, I owed it to the house to make a statement on behalf of the government with regard to those events that have such implications for peace in the world and have such important implications for the United Nations and for NATO. I readily concur in the view that it is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to seize the first opportunity to make a statement with regard to at least two events, the changes in the top level structure of the government of the Soviet union, and the detonation of an atomic bomb on mainland China.

Mr. Churchill: You were to deal with the hon. member for Red Deer first.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. I think I said clearly yesterday that I did not know that we should proceed for the one purpose, but I believe we should proceed to discuss the estimates. I am prepared to do this, as well as to deal with the important matter to which my hon. friend now directs my attention.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The understanding yesterday was simply this, that the minister for external affairs, who was delayed returning to the house before six o'clock, would deal with the subject that had been under discussion yesterday afternoon, namely the representation of the government of Canada by the hon. member for Red Deer. This promise was made to us by the house leader and was agreed to by the minister for external affairs. It was on that basis that the estimates of the Department of External Affairs were to be called today. This is the subject he should deal with first instead of dodging and trying to hide behind something. He must be afraid to deal with the subject we raised yesterday. I ask him now to be fair with the House of Commons and deal with that subject first, then go on to these other important matters that he has mentioned.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to speak to the point of order, Mr. Chairman. I was in the house and I was the one who made the suggestion—I thank hon. members for accepting it—that because of the presence here of Mr. Spaak, the distinguished foreign minister of Belgium, the Secretary of State for External Affairs should be excused until later in the afternoon in order to complete Mr. Spaak's visit. He did come back later in the afternoon, and it is true it was about a quarter to six.

Mr. Churchill: Five minutes to six; be accurate.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. gentleman opposite says five minutes to six, then it was at that moment; and an offer was made that the Minister of Industry should relinquish his estimates so the Secretary of State for External Affairs could be given an immediate opportunity to deal with the subject which it had been agreed would be dealt with at that time, but hon. gentlemen opposite said they preferred to go on with the estimates of the Department of Industry.

It was then arranged that the whole of this afternoon until five o'clock would be taken up with the estimates of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and so far as this afternoon was concerned I can recall no commitment made at that time that this particular subject would be extracted from the other matters with which the minister would wish to deal.

I just want this question of good faith to be dealt with separately. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is not perhaps the leading authority in the chamber on good faith.

Mr. Churchill: I rise on a question of privilege. What is the imputation in that statement that I am not an authority on good faith? Is my good faith not as acceptable to the house as that of the hon. gentleman?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Churchill: Withdraw.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order. May I have the co-operation of members of the committee. I understood the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre was rising on a question of privilege. The Minister of Transport was speaking on a point of order, and perhaps the committee would agree that we should hear him out, after which we could consider the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Pickersgill: I apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, but I must say I was betrayed into saying this because he started out his observations by questioning our good faith. I know it is wrong for us to retort in kind to hon. gentlemen opposite. I know it is contrary to the sermon on the mount, and I withdraw immediately and apologize.

I made no reflection except that I did not think the hon. gentleman should set himself up above the rest of us.

I do believe there was an engagement for yesterday afternoon, but there was no formal engagement for this afternoon except that the estimates of external affairs would be brought up. How the Secretary of State for External Affairs chooses to deal with those estimates is, of course, his concern, but I did not think it was quite fair to allow this implication of bad faith to go unanswered.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon about seven minutes to six, when the hon. gentleman and the Secretary of State for External Affairs came into the chamber, we were endeavouring to complete the estimates of the Minister of Industry. There was an effort to get through with his estimates and I, who at that time was leading the discussion for this party, indicated we would prefer to go ahead with the estimates of the Minister of Industry because at five to six there was not time to start on the other question. Then it was said that we would consider the item this afternoon. It was certainly my understanding that we would be dealing with this particular item, which in itself is relatively minor compared with other things the Secretary of State for External Affairs will want to discuss. Perhaps the Minister of Transport should have learned a lesson from the events of yesterday afternoon, when with early frankness this matter could have been dealt with in five minutes or a quarter of an hour.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On the same question of privilege, I should like to refer also to a statement made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) as can be seen on page 9757 of Hansard, top of the first column:

> As soon as he is available after his present interview with the foreign minister of Belgium. We could interrupt the estimates of the Minister of Industry at that point in order that the hon. member might have all the information he wishes with regard to this particular item.

Therefore, it is clear that yesterday the minister intended to have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs discussed today, not to discuss the explosion of an atomic bomb in China or the change of government in Russia, but precisely the matter on which a commitment was made by the President of Privy Council, as stated yesterday by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

Therefore, I think that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill)—whom I should like to see on the moon—is right on that score but the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) should come back to the matter under discussion yesterday concerning the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson).

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I must thank the hon. member for what he just said, but I want to be fair to all hon. members.

[Text]

First of all may I say I had of course intended to deal with this matter, but as it had been suggested that the Secretary of State for External Affairs should deal at the earliest opportunity with two significant and important world events I readily conceded that I would do so. However, I do not think we ought to quarrel over matters of this sort, and I would be very glad to change the course that I had thought was generally desirable because of the importance of these two matters.

But before I deal with this particular question I take it my hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre would readily acknowledge that it is my duty to go on with the other subjects, and I would like to point out what actually transpired yesterday so far as I was concerned. As has been mentioned, I was not in the chamber for most of yesterday because I was in conversation with the Belgian foreign minister, who had come here especially to see me on a matter of great importance. As he could only stay between twelve and five o'clock it was necessary that I should take advantage of his visit to Canada to see him at a time when normally I would have been in my seat in the chamber.

As recorded at page 9774 of yesterday's Hansard the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre asked:

> Could we have the minister's estimates brought forward first thing tomorrow and restricted to the questions and answers with regard to the subject we raised this afternoon?

I said:

> Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I could not be here earlier—

[The Chairman.]

And explained, as I have just done now, why I was not in the house. Then I went on to say:

> I am in the hands of the house leader. If he wishes to proceed with the estimates tomorrow, I think that is satisfactory; but I do not know that we should proceed for one purpose: I believe we should proceed to discuss the estimates. I cannot however be here tomorrow night. The United Nations peace keeping conference is in session here and I have to meet with them tomorrow evening. I could be here tomorrow afternoon. In the few minutes remaining I would be very glad to deal with any questions my hon. friend has in mind.

There was no comment on this observation of mine. The hon. gentleman did not say "Oh, no." The understanding was that we would deal with one item in particular and so far as the record is concerned it is clear what my intentions were for today.

I would not want my hon. friend to accuse me of bad faith in the matter, because the record is clear on what I said.

Mr. McIlraith: And the record is clear so far as I am concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the President of the Privy Council points out that the record is clear on what he said. However, I am now prepared to deal with this particular question if my hon. friend thinks it is more important than world shaking events.

Mr. Winkler: Does the minister not feel that the integrity of any ministry, and particularly his own, is equally as important as any report from his department that he has to make to us?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I certainly agree, but I do not think I need spend much time trying to establish my integrity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, yesterday on orders of the day I gave some of the reasons why the government had asked the hon. member for Red Deer to undertake at this time a journey of some two weeks to Africa. I stated that the hon. gentleman had spent some 15 years living in Ethiopia, one of the important countries with which Canada enjoys a very close relationship, and that in addition to having spent this length of time in Africa he has had an opportunity, such as perhaps no other membe of this house has enjoyed, of getting to know personalities in many of the governments of Africa. He has followed for a long time the evolutionary events of that emerging continent.

There are a number of matters which are of concern to Canada at this time in relation to some of the situations in certain African countries. Canada has a limited number of diplomatic missions in Africa and a limited number of missions where we have non-resident heads of mission. In the light of events which are of great concern to foreign communities all over the world, in the light of some of the problems which will face us on December 1 at the United Nations, and for other reasons, we felt it was in this nation's interests that we should take advantage of the services which I believe the hon. member for Red Deer is eminently qualified to perform in this area.

It was only in this light that he was asked to undertake a task which, I think, will have useful results. He will visit, at our request, the headquarters of the economic commission for Africa in Addis Ababa, a capital which he knows very well, having lived there for 15 years. He will have meetings with certain officials there including officials of the organization for African unity. Hon. members will recall that there was a very important conference of non-aligned states held in Cairo a few weeks ago, attended by representatives of many African countries. It was not constitutionally possible for Canada and for other countries not represented at that conference to send observers, yet it is of the utmost importance that we should have the fullest information placed directly at our disposal, in addition to information from other sources, so we can take the necessary steps and prepare for some important decisions which will have to be made very shortly, at the United Nations in particular.

I should like to point out that we are taking advantage of the presence in Africa of the hon. member for Red Deer for another purpose. Hon. members will recall the question which was put to me a few moments ago by one of the members for Halifax—

Some hon. Members: Which one?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One of the very active and useful members of this house. This question, as others have done, underlined our concern for the safety of a number of Canadians resident in the Stanleyville area of the Congo where 800 hostages are being kept by the rebel forces in circumstances such that the Red Cross and other bodies have not been able to elicit satisfactory assurances as to their safety. I may say that in this total of 800 some 26 Canadians are included. The government is using every method it can to extricate these Canadians and, indirectly, others, from the regrettable and dangerous position in which they have been placed. I may say that the hon. member for Red Deer has a knowledge of this area and knows some of the personalities involved.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the minister whether the hon. member for Red Deer will visit Stanleyville?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman knows he cannot visit Stanleyville. Even representatives of the Red Cross cannot visit Stanleyville. But I hope there are certain contacts which can be made, in the Congo and elsewhere, which may lead to satisfactory negotiations. At any rate that is our thought, and that is what we intend to do.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask what cities and towns in the Congo it is expected the hon. member for Red Deer will visit?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure he will go to the capital, but it may be he will go elsewhere for the purpose of making contacts which we believe, from his acquaintance, he may be able to establish. In any event, we shall certainly resort to every effort in order to ensure as far as possible the safety of these Canadians, as the people of Canada would expect this government to do.

On October 14 a message was sent to a number of the governments which are members of the conciliation commission of the organization for African unity. This message asked these governments to use their influence to ensure that the Geneva conventions of 1949 were observed in the Congolese dispute so the lives and safety of the civilians involved, including Canadian and other nationals, who are presently held in rebel territory could be preserved. This appeal was made because it was considered that the articles of all four Geneva conventions is pertinent to the task of the conciliation commission. These articles impose on all signatory countries, even on those not parties to the conflict, an obligation to ensure respect for the convention and for the lives and safety of persons not actually involved in the dispute, such as our residents in the Congo.

The hon. member for Red Deer is due to visit Kenya next Monday and Tuesday and we are arranging for him to call on the distinguished prime minister of that country, Mr. Kenyatta, who is the chairman of the O.A.U. conciliation commission and a key figure in efforts to ensure the safety of our people in the Congo. I very much hope that in addition to other appeals which have been made to Mr. Kenyatta this personal appeal by one who, I understand, knows him, will reinforce the messages which have already been sent.

We also hope that while in Ethiopia the hon. member for Red Deer will be able to ask the government of Ethiopia, which is also a member of the conciliation commission, to support measures for the safety of our citizens in the Congo. We all recall that when the Emperor of Ethiopia, that gallant and distinguished head of state, came to Ottawa a few months ago it was apparent that the hon. member for Red Deer had a very special relationship with him. We hope that in the circumstances this relationship will help in solving the problem of these people who find their safety threatened in Stanleyville.

I should add that in addition to visiting Ethiopia and Kenya I hope the hon. member for Red Deer will be able to visit at least one other country. I believe it is proper for us from time to time to utilize the experience and ability of members of this house. We do so at the United Nations. We ask members to constitute themselves as members of the Canadian delegation at the United Nations. We send members to sessions of the United Nations as observers. We send members to other international conferences, and I believe the assignment given to the hon. member for Red Deer to visit certain key countries and key personalities in Africa is in the interests of the formulation of clear and desirable foreign policy in these particular situations. I believe the course we have followed is one which will commend itself to most reasonable people, and I have no hesitation in commending it to this committee.

Mr. Nesbitt: I listened with great attention to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs had to say on this interesting subject. I think most members of this house are aware of the previous experience of the hon. member for Red Deer in Ethiopia for some length of time in the field of education. I think hon. members, particularly those who had the pleasure of seeing the film "Mr. Pearson", realize that there is a relationship between the hon. member for Red Deer and the Emperor of Ethiopia. I believe that as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just said, most reasonable members would go along with that. However, there are some other things which seem a little obscure in this whole situation, and I was wondering whether the minister would elaborate and elucidate a little more in respect of them.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, it is my information that at the present time the hon. member for Red Deer is visiting Ghana, in fact is just leaving that particular country, and that his next stop is the new United Republic of Tanzania, formerly Tanganyika. The minister has said he will then be visiting Kenya, and after that it is my understanding that the hon. member for Red Deer will be paying a relatively brief visit to Ethiopia and then on to Cairo, in the United Arab Republic. It is my understanding that at no time is the hon. member for Red Deer visiting the Congo or anywhere near there. The minister has just told us that he will be some place in the Congo, and I wonder whether the minister would expand on that just a little more.

There is another question that I think arises in the minds of many people. As the minister has said, naturally when the interests of Canada and Canadian problems are involved—particularly the lives of Canadian missionaries in the Congo—certainly this house would want everything possible done to protect the lives of these very courageous people. I have had some experience in this field and realize that sometimes in the field of external affairs you have to do things indirectly that you cannot do directly. Nevertheless it seems strange to me that if in fact one of the objects of the mission of the hon. member for Red Deer is to help protect the lives and security of Canadian and other missionaries in the Congo, he would not be visiting some designated place in that area or even close to it, perhaps some of the adjoining states.

Another matter that comes to mind is this. The hon. member for Red Deer has had experience in certain parts of Africa, but it is my understanding from people who are also quite knowledgeable about that continent that though you may be well received in one part of Africa it does not necessarily follow that you are going to be received with open arms in other parts of Africa. While I have no doubt the hon. member for Red Deer will be more than welcome in Ethiopia, and perhaps in certain other places in Africa, this perhaps would not apply to all the countries he is intending to visit.

I realize that in Africa, and indeed in other parts of the world, the position held opens doors to persons of influence, but the hon. member for Red Deer is a private member of this house. True, he is the leader of a small group of members here, but he is not a member of the privy council or anything of that nature. It seems odd to me that there is not some senior member of the Department of External Affairs who has perhaps a wider and greater knowledge of Africa in general, if not in particular—and even Ethiopia—than the hon. member for Red Deer. We have a great many highly experienced senior members of the Department of External Affairs who have had experience in Africa, and it seems rather odd that one of these persons was not sent as a special representative of the government of Canada, rather than a member, albeit the leader, of one of the opposition parties in the House of Commons.

The minister dealt with this matter slightly in his remarks, but I do not think he has satisfied most of us completely. I mentioned this yesterday briefly and the minister replied, also briefly. I refer to the question as to what extent members of opposition parties should take part in the formulation of government policy, because this in fact ties the hands of opposition parties and in this respect perhaps makes them an even closer ally of the government. I understand this question was settled some time ago. I believe I mentioned 1945 yesterday, but the minister of course was correct when he said it was 1946, after the initial organization meeting of the United Nations in San Francisco when members of all the political parties in this house at the time formed the Canadian delegation.

The minister mentioned Hon. Mr. Bracken, but it is my understanding that really the procedure was instigated by Hon. Mr. Coldwell, namely that it would be unwise for members, and particularly leaders, of opposition parties to take part in the formulation of government policy because it would completely tie their hands in the House of Commons on that particular subject and perhaps even on other subjects when they were being debated. As a result the institution of parliamentary observers was put into effect at the United Nations, which system has of course been copied by a great many other countries.

Now that the minister, for reasons best known to himself—he has probably told us a good many of them—has selected the hon. member for Red Deer for this job, he has certainly departed from that policy, which subsequent governments have followed ever since 1946. I have already mentioned that a policy such as this would help tie the hands not only of the member concerned but of his party, in this regard, and I think it is a very bad precedent to set.

True, there has to be a balancing of interests in this regard. If it was very clear that the hon. member for Red Deer had a complete and unequalled knowledge of all parts of Africa, particularly the Congo—because that is apparently one of the leading items of business for the hon. gentleman—we might stretch a point; but it seems clear that the experience of the hon. member for Red Deer is largely confined to Ethiopia and not particularly to the Congo or these other parts of Africa mentioned by the minister. I was wondering, Mr. Chairman, whether the minister could give us a little further explanation with regard to some of the matters I have mentioned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear, of course, that the hon. member for Red Deer is not formulating policy, any more than an observer who goes to the United Nations formulates policy. The hon. gentleman is going to make a certain assessment and undertake, as a result of discussions I had yesterday with Mr. Spaak, a particular assignment in Nairobi.

I believe my hon. friend will recognize that in this there is no departure from policy or the procedure for participation from time to time by private members of this house in assignments which are accorded to them. The formulation of policy is something that resides with the government, but that does not preclude the government from utilizing the services of individuals, either in the government service or elsewhere in special circumstances such as those presently before us.

My hon. friend is quite correct; there are in the Department of External Affairs, in some of our missions and here at home, individuals with a very wide knowledge of and an expertise in African affairs. The hon. member for Red Deer will be accompanied, when he goes to a number of these places, by an official from the Department of External Affairs. It is in part because the hon. gentleman has knowledge of the area, together with knowledge of some of the personalities there, that it was thought this was a desirable course to pursue.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister permit a further question. Could the minister tell us at what point in time in the next ten days or so the hon. member will visit the Congo or nearby?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just said that he would be in Nairobi.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Nesbitt: Nairobi? In the Congo?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly correct that there are many matters in the field of external affairs more important than the one the committee is now discussing, but it is also true that a very important matter is that of the relations between the government and parliament. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the government has not been playing fair with parliament with respect to this whole question.

In the first place, yesterday there was an obvious attempt to avoid having to deal with this matter. Then when we got into committee and the government was unable to avoid dealing with the matter we were given answers which were not as completely frank and straightforward as we feel they should have been. The President of the Privy Council, who is a member of the cabinet and who was present with ten or a dozen other ministers, told us he knew nothing at all about it. Finally we managed to get the Secretary of State for External Affairs into the house and he admitted to us quite openly that the hon. member for Red Deer had been asked by the government to undertake this assignment in Africa. Then when the minister was asked whether there was an order in council in this regard and, if not, how were the hon. member's expenses being paid, the reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, first of all, was in this very direct sentence:

> I do not believe there was an order in council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nor was one necessary.

Mr. Knowles: That is not what the minister said yesterday.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And that is what I am saying now.

Mr. Knowles: What the minister said yesterday was:

> I do not believe there was an order in council.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Knowles: Then I asked the minister:

> Then how are the expenses being paid?

The reply of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was:

> The hon. gentleman will have to indicate what his expenses were, and they will be examined and the proper procedure will be observed.

I then asked:

> Is there an understanding that the expenses will be paid?

The minister's reply was:

It would be very unfair to ask an hon. gentleman to undertake such a responsibility and pay the expenses himself.

Those exchanges, Mr. Chairman, are to be found at page 9754 of Hansard for yesterday, Wednesday, November 4. One can draw from that—one has to draw it; it is not there in clear language—that the expenses of the hon. member for Red Deer are being paid.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no doubt about that.

Mr. Knowles: The minister now says there is no doubt about it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And I said that yesterday clearly.

Mr. Knowles: The minister did not say that yesterday. The minister said yesterday what is reported on the pages of Hansard—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Knowles: —and he should stick with what the record shows and not try to distort it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman—

Mr. Knowles: I am reading the record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member must not say that I am trying to distort things, because I am not trying to distort things. I will look at Hansard, but I understood that I clearly indicated this yesterday.

Mr. Knowles: That is no point of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not know why my hon. friend says I am trying to distort it, because I am not trying to distort it.

Mr. Knowles: There is no point of order. The minister is now trying to say what he indicated yesterday to the house; but I am telling the house what he actually said yesterday, and I am doing so not by way of paraphrasing it or by putting it in my own words but by reading his words.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Knowles: What the minister said was:

I do not believe there was an order in council.

Then he went on:

The hon. gentleman will have to indicate what his expenses were, and they will be examined and the proper procedure will be observed.

He did not tell us whether they would be paid or what the proper procedure would be, so I went on to ask:

Is there an understanding that the expenses will paid?

The hon. gentleman's answer was:

It would be very unfair to ask an hon. gentleman to undertake such a responsibility and pay the expenses himself.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Knowles: So I say, Mr. Chairman, that we are right back where we were before the Secretary of State for External Affairs lost his temper a moment ago; that one can draw from that exchange that the expenses are being paid, although it was not said so clearly.

When the minister answered my question in this regard on orders of the day today he said "Yes, and I said so yesterday". At any rate, Mr. Chairman, we now have it clear; the expenses of the hon. member are being paid. This whole matter could have been dealt with yesterday in a matter of two or three minutes had we had a couple of direct answers.

Now we have this situation. The minister says now in the midst of this present exchange that no order in council is necessary. Obviously, knowing the sections of the Senate and House of Commons Act to which I was referring when I asked my question on orders of the day, he would know that there is a part of the Senate and House of Commons Act which is headed "Independence of parliament". Section 10 of the act reads as follows:

Except as hereinafter specially provided:

(a) no person accepting or holding any office, commission or employment, permanent or temporary, in the service of the government of Canada—

It has been made very clear today that the hon. member for Red Deer is out in Africa in the service of the government of Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Just in the same way as any ordinary member going to a conference is in the service of the government.

Mr. Knowles: The section goes on:

—at the nomination of the crown or at the nomination of any of the officers of the government of Canada, to which any salary, fee, wages, allowance, emolument, or profit of any kind is attached; and

(b) no sheriff, registrar of deeds, clerk of the peace, or county crown attorney in any of the provinces of Canada, is eligible as a member of the House of Commons, or shall sit or vote therein.

Many members of this House of Commons have been on delegations of one kind or another. We all know that in order to have our expenses paid when we are on such delegations there either has to be a special vote containing some wording to make it clear that it does not violate this act, or there has to be an order in council covering the special case. Unless the minister can produce a vote in his estimates so worded as to provide for a private member of parliament to be sent on a special mission to Africa of the type the hon. member for Red Deer has been sent on, I submit there will have to be an order in council before the hon. gentleman's expenses can be paid. Otherwise he will have to forfeit his seat under the provisions of section 10 of the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. Rhéaume: They do it retroactively. They have done that before.

Mr. Knowles: That is probably what they will do, yes. I do not mind their doing it so long as they tell us and are frank about it. Whether the government wants to choose a particular person to do a job for the government is for the government to decide. I am not questioning the policy. I think there are questions which could be asked about it. I think it is an awkward position in which the hon. member for Red Deer will find himself when he comes back to Canada as the leader of a party outside of the government, but that is for the government to decide.

What I am concerned about, Mr. Chairman—and let me pinpoint it—is this. The only reason I have entered this debate at all is because I think parliament cannot carry on unless there is the best of relationships between the executive and the members of the House of Commons. You do not get a good relationship when we are played with, as we were yesterday and as we have been today with respect to this matter. If it was formally decided by the minister or the cabinet before the hon. member for Red Deer went to Africa that this was going to be done, and if it is definitely the case, as it now seems to be from what the minister has said, that the hon. member was given an assignment or a job, why did the government not do it in a regular, formal way, and why did the minister not so inform the House of Commons? This is my concern, Mr. Chairman.

There are other angles. The hon. member for Oxford has raised some of them and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands raised one and may pursue it later.

But my concern is the proper relationship that should exist between cabinet ministers and members of the House of Commons and I submit we have not had that proper relationship in this instance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend is usually very precise and generally very fair, although sometimes he may not realize that he overstates his case. I think in the very words he has quoted from the record yesterday he will see that I clearly indicated there was no question that the expenses of the hon. gentleman were going to be borne. In fact my hon. friend quoted my own words to that effect. Yet he says that if we had said that yesterday it would have resolved the matter. My hon. friend does not think I am so naïve as to believe that that would resolve the matter. I have seen too many situations in this house, including some of the participations of my hon. friend, to fail to realize that he would not refrain from taking advantage of any occasion which would cause merriment to the treasury benches. I must say that on occasion I have enjoyed that merriment myself but I am not going to say that this is one of the occasions.

With regard to the section of the Senate and House of Commons Act to which my hon. friend has directed our attention I may say quite frankly, and I may be overly naïve in this frankness, that when the question arose of asking the hon. gentleman to undertake this assignment it certainly never dawned on my mind, or in the mind of anyone with whom this matter was discussed, that this action was one that was open to the interpretation which my hon. friend is seeking to give. It must be clear that the hon. member for Red Deer is receiving no emolument and no allowances. He is only going to get his expenses and, as I indicated yesterday, it would be unfair to expect him to undertake this particular assignment if his expenses were not paid.

I have checked with the officials of the privy council office and have been told that unless there is a contractual relationship, which would involve the payment of an emolument or of an allowance or of a consideration, there is no question of an order in council at all. The procedures advised by the treasury officers have been followed. I had no relationship with these arrangements myself except to suggest to the hon. member for Red Deer some of the things that were in our minds with respect to the reasons for which he was going to Africa.

Our authority, of course, is clear with regard to a situation of this kind. In the formulation of foreign policy or in the administration of the department I believe I have the authority under the general powers of administration to utilize those instruments, and this my hon. friend acknowledges, which will enable me and my colleagues to make the necessary policy assessments in this kind of situation. I have presumed, and I am told this is correct, that we have this authority under the departmental item which includes as well an amount for travelling expenses.

As my hon. friend knows, from time to time we engage individuals to do particular jobs in the department. We engage international law lawyers, university professors, in the summer particularly. They are, if members of parliament, clearly within the purport of the two sections to which my hon. friend has referred, but section 16 is the relevant section which calls for the payment of moneys by Canada. If I remember correctly, I do not think my hon. friend referred to this section at all. There is no public money, within the meaning of that section, to be paid to the individual in question. All he is receiving is his expenses, for which he must make a proper accounting to the department. That is the situation.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to partake at length in this debate. The question has arisen whether or not this action is a violation of the Senate and House of Commons Act and I should like to speak very briefly on that point. As has been pointed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, there will be no payment by the government out of public funds for any fees, wages, allowances, etc. So this puts the whole matter, in so far as the payment of expenses is concerned, into the same category as the payment of expenses to members of the House of Commons who are appointed as delegates to various interparliamentary bodies.

If the argument that has been advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is valid, then I suggest that almost all members of the house are in violation of section 16 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. It is not by my choice that it is necessary for me to go into this matter at this time, but we know for example that the Canadian branch of the commonwealth parliamentary association is granted approximately $20,000 or $25,000 annually and out of that grant members of the House of Commons who go to the conferences, both regional and international, are paid their expenses for travelling and accommodation, plus a certain limited amount of money for certain out of pocket expenses.

With regard to those members who go to the United Nations as observers, I believe they are paid out of the funds of the Department of External Affairs. They are paid the actual amount of their travelling expenses from Ottawa to New York. In addition, accommodation is provided during their stay in New York and they are also paid something like $13 per diem for out of pocket expenses. This is true for the United Nations observers, for the commonwealth parliamentary association delegates, for the interparliamentary union delegates, for the NATO parliamentary delegates and in a number of other special cases such as the recent trip to NORAD and also to SAC. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we must accept the statement of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that only actual travelling expenses will be paid in this instance, and certainly this is completely in line with the practice that has been followed in the case of a great many members of the house.

I do not wish to deal at length with some of the other allegations that have been made. I want to say, however, to those members who have suggested that the Social Credit party is probably going to be tied to Liberal government policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rhéaume: That is nothing new.

Mr. Monteith: It always has been.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, if you can hear me over the babbling of these hon. gentlemen—

Mr. Ricard: Why do you deny it so strongly?

Mr. Olson: —I should like to say that the Social Credit party has always regarded its duty to Canada and Canadians as coming first—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Olson: —and these allegations of being tied to or allied with any other party are completely unfounded. If you can hear me, Mr. Chairman, over these rumblings and mumblings that are going on to my right, I should like to point out that we were subjected to this same kind of abuse by the hon. gentlemen who now occupy the government benches when we gave our support time after time to the Progressive Conservative government when they were in office. We gave the reasons for that.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Olson: During the session of 1962. This policy has been followed regardless of which party the Canadian people happened to choose to occupy the government benches. I should like you to know also that the Canadian people generally have appreciated the measure of stability this party has given the last two parliaments. We do not intend to depart from that course, regardless of the insinuations or allegations that may be hurled at us.

I may say also, Mr. Chairman, that we are not impressed with these small time insinuations that are being made. As has been very well pointed out by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, there is a very critical situation in certain parts of Africa which requires not only the interest of but certain action by the government and by the parliament of this country. Surely, the purpose is quite obvious. These insinuations are to obtain some temporary political expedient and should be completely disregarded in view of the gravity of the situation. I do not want to get into all of this. I had no intention of taking part in this debate to defend anyone. However, when allegations are made that there may be a violation of the Senate and House of Commons Act to the extent that the hon. member for Red Deer has no right to sit in this house, I simply repeat that if this argument is valid then a majority of the members of this house who have at different times accepted money through one route or another from the public treasury to pay their expenses on trips to the United Nations, Europe, Africa or Asia in the course of the last 12 months, are in the same position. We do not, therefore, accept this allegation at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and I have just heard those of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) about the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), who is now in Africa as a delegate or ambassador of the federal government.

The minister stated yesterday that no one could represent Canada so well in Africa, inasmuch as the hon. member for Red Deer had greater experience concerning Ethiopia, and perhaps a few neighbouring countries, than anybody else in Canada. Granted, the hon. member for Red Deer did spend some 15 years in Ethiopia as the man in charge of the educational system. However, I feel the minister could have found in the Canadian diplomatic corps, someone perfectly aware of what is happening in every African country.

Five or six day ago we learned that the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) has been in Africa for one month on behalf of the Canadian government. I wonder if he is selling three maple leaf flags on stickers for automobile bumpers.

Be that as it may, the Minister without Portfolio is in Africa. Why also send the hon. member for Red Deer? Could it be that the Minister without Portfolio is a useless member within the federal cabinet? We know that he obtained his post of minister merely because he fought Social Credit during the last federal election. Today why does the secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) appoint the hon. member for Red Deer as a double to the Minister without Portfolio in Africa?

The minister tells us: We have very restricted missions in Africa, and that is why we are sending the hon. member for Red Deer, and even in the Congo, where 800 people are kept as hostages, including 26 Canadians.

It should be noted that the hon. member for Red Deer does not speak French, while the language spoken in the Congo is not English but French. If the Minister without Portfolio was there, I would say that perhaps with his convictions, his stakes in this government, he might have some influence on political doings in the Congo. But no, we were told that the hon. member for Red Deer was going there.

Mr. Chairman, in those conditions, if it is decided that because the hon. member for Red Deer lived in Ethiopia for 15 years we will send him to the Congo or to some other African country where he had never gone before, I do not see why the Secretary of State for External Affairs could not send Mr. Michel Chartrand to represent the Canadian government in Castro's Cuba? Why not send Mr. Chartrand to Russia, for instance, where he would feel perfectly at home, where he has close friends and where he might perhaps get somewhere on behalf of the present Canadian government?

Mr. Chairman, it seems childish to me to give us such explanations. They should tell us frankly that the hon. member for Red Deer just has been done the favour of going on a visit to African countries at the expense of the Canadian people, because he and his group promised to support this government until the next general election and to keep it in office. Then, the minister would be more honest with parliament.

[Text]

Mr. Leboe: It is not true.

Mr. Caouette: I hear the hon. member for Cariboo say "It is not true". He knows himself that it is true, and he is the one who opened the door for that situation between the Liberals and his own group.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, we have had enough of those electoral manoeuvres. This has been going on since 1963. I am not a Conservative and I support neither the Liberal nor the Conservatives, but the Liberals are sure that thanks to the support of the Social Credit group led by the hon. member for Red Deer, they will remain in power. That is the main reason why the hon. member has been sent to African countries he has never seen in his life. He will be visiting countries whose language he does not even understand, the Congo, for instance, where French is spoken.

Moreover, I wonder why the people of Canada have to pay for the trip made by the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. Why is a second representative being sent to Africa? What is the Minister without Portfolio doing in Africa at this time?

The Conservatives have forgotten to ask that, and so have other hon. members, but we all know that the minister has been visiting Africa for the past month. What is he doing there? If he is serving no useful purpose in Africa, he should be brought back to Canada to prevent him from being the shame of our country abroad.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: What about the Minister without Portfolio?

Mr. Caouette: Over here he stays quiet; over there he says too much. The hon. member for Red Deer does not say anything.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I recognize that the hon. member for Red Deer has some of the qualities of a diplomat. What is keeping the present government from appointing him ambassador to some country or other, in Africa if need be? But let the government ask him to resign as a member of parliament.

A while ago mention was made that members of the opposition parties had been sent to the United Nations. Yes, that is true. One member of the Social Credit party, one member of our group was sent at intervals of six months, and each time there were two or three Conservative members and some ten Liberals. But when it comes to Africa, two are sent: the Minister without Portfolio and a member of the opposition, the leader of a minority party in the house. This is a feat never before witnessed in parliament. Can the minister give us examples of the appointment of Conservative members, or members of the New Democratic party, or other parties, who were delegated, under similar circumstances, anywhere in the whole wide world? We may have sent delegates to Formosa once, but I do not know under what auspices nor for what reason. At all events, I would not criticize the government for doing so at that time, for I am not even sure of the facts.

Mr. Chairman, they should stop treating us like a bunch of gapers. They should be frank with us instead of telling us fairy tales and cock-and-bull stories.

Let the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us what it is all about. If he intends to appoint the hon. member for Red Deer ambassador in some country or other, let him appoint him right now and there will be no more questions.

[Text]

Mr. Winkler: Does the hon. member consider it might be possible that the hon. member for Red Deer is there to keep an eye on the Minister without Portfolio, or vice-versa?

Mr. Caouette: That is exactly what I said a moment ago. He is over there to check the other man or they are checking each other, I don't know which.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, let them stop stringing us a line. If they wish to appoint the hon. member for Red Deer as ambassador, if he has the required qualifications—if he has lived in Ethiopia for 15 years and if he wants to go back—let the Secretary of State for External Affairs say so frankly and appoint him ambassador to Ethiopia, to Emperor Haile Selassie—for he is an emperor—and let there be an end to the whole thing. Let them stop laughing at us in the house.

On the other hand, if the Secretary of State for External Affairs thinks that to keep his government in power he must absolutely use the good services of the hon. member for Red Deer; here again I wonder whether the method is very honest.

At any rate, we should get explanations as regards, not only the presence of the hon. member for Red Deer in Africa but also that of the Minister without Portfolio.

What is the Minister without Portfolio doing there?

Assuming the hon. member for Red Deer is there to see to the goodwill between the various African states, what is the Minister without Portfolio doing in Africa at the expense of the government? It is time that we know and that the minister gives us the information we want.

Some hon. Members: Jealousy.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I hear some members to my right saying that I speak through jealousy. As usual, these people talk through their hats.

[Text]

Mr. Winch: I welcome the opportunity of making a few remarks on this matter but I have no intention of taking the same approach as the hon. member for Oxford, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the hon. member for Medicine Hat or the hon. member for Villeneuve. In their own way they have all raised most important matters regarding constitutionality, irregularity, payments to members of the house on this kind of job, and implied conspiracy between one party and another.

I do not want to discuss those angles because people better qualified than myself have already done so. Personally I wish the hon. member for Red Deer well during his three weeks in Africa. With his experience and contacts I hope he is able to do what is expected of him and what was anticipated of him when he was appointed to do this job. I hope he can bring back the information which the Secretary of State for External Affairs desires, and I think I would be less than honest if I failed to say that.

However, I would like to have the reasons behind such an appointment explained to me. I find it difficult to understand what kind of African bureau must exist in the Department of External Affairs. I find it difficult to understand that in that bureau there are not those with sufficient experience and knowledge to tackle this kind of job. I am not referring to the hon. member for Red Deer on a personal basis, but I am interested in what kind of advice the minister got when making this appointment. I do not pretend to be an expert on Africa, but in 1960 I had the privilege of attending the United Nations for six weeks, and there meeting a great many African ambassadors, delegates and officials.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the hon. member knows something about the situation in Africa too.

Mr. Winch: Eighteen months ago I had the opportunity of being with the commonwealth parliamentary association in Africa for six or seven weeks, and one thing I noted, both at the United Nations and in Africa, is that the African people in emerging nations have something which perhaps we as whites cannot appreciate, a prestige consciousness which gives them a certain psychological attitude. You go to Washington, you go to the United Nations, and the emerging African nations have such a sense of prestige consciousness they have to rent or own the most expensive homes; they have to own the most expensive cars; they demand diplomatic immunity as no other nation ever does. Here in our Commons area I believe there is only one car with a chauffeur, and that is for the Prime Minister. I have been to one state in Africa where, attached to the prime minister's office alone, there are 64 cars and 74 chauffeurs: prestige consciousness. There is the building of skyscrapers—incomplete: prestige consciousness. As the minister must know, very serious trouble has arisen in some countries, particularly in the United States, with regard to diplomatic immunity and the major problem is not one of traffic tickets only, not one of passing through red lights or of accidents; it extends even to killing.

Prestige consciousness: we have to admit it is there, we have to understand it. I say this not only as a result of what I learned by attending meetings of the United Nations or of what I saw while in Africa; it has been confirmed by what I have read ever since then. We may not understand this attitude, but it is the product of long years when Africans were submerged by colonialism and dictatorship along with all that went with such a history. Now, as the Africans rise to independence and are able to take part throughout the world in conferences at the United Nations and so on, this feeling expresses itself. Is this not the understanding of the minister? Is this not the understanding of his African bureau?

Why then was the recommendation made that a member of the opposition, indeed a member of the smallest group represented in the opposition, should be sent to Africa in the name of the government in an attempt to find out and understand their problems, rather than a cabinet minister or a high ranking official of the department? This question, to me, has a psychological aspect and I am afraid it is a very important one. It follows from the prestige consciousness which I have outlined. It stems from the efforts of Africans to show that they are at least the equal of the white man, if not better than the whites. I am disturbed that the man chosen for this mission is not a member of the government or a representative of parliament at top level. It is not a personal matter at all. I am surprised the man chosen should be a representative of the smallest group in this house.

I think the Secretary of State for External Affairs will appreciate the point I am making. I ask him whether my view is not shared by members of the African bureau of his department or by himself. If I am wrong, let him correct me, though may I say, Mr. Chairman, that I think I am correct. As a matter of fact I had this opinion driven home to me only two days ago at a reception here where there were a group of Nigerians. Because I dared to criticize them out of turn, they told me that if I was ever allowed in Nigeria they would put me on the next plane back. They do not like the white criticizing the black, this is the point I am making. I suggest the basis for a decision of the kind the minister has taken should be an understanding of the psychology of the African and of the prestige consciousness to which I have referred, and that the representative should have been chosen not so much on the basis of the knowledge and experience of the hon. member for Red Deer as on the acceptance and the prestige attaching to the choice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like to say to the hon. gentleman, who has made a thoughtful contribution, that I have noted the points he has mentioned. I was aware of the problems he mentioned before a decision was taken in this case. Perhaps the hon. member will recall that one of the reasons in our minds was that the hon. gentleman in question, because of his long stay in Africa, had made acquaintance in a number of instances with personalities of great importance. This was the primary reason for the decision. We have in our African division and in the limited number of diplomatic missions in Africa, both resident and non-resident, very able officials and they will not regard the assignment as being in any way a reflection upon them, nor is it any reflection upon them. As the minister in charge of this department I wish to say that in the African division here in Ottawa, and in the foreign service in Africa, there are officials of the highest calibre who are doing an outstanding job.

Mr. Churchill: I realize that people on the opposition side who enter into this debate and are critical of the minister may lose an opportunity to be sent abroad as representatives of the government in the future.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On the contrary.

Mr. Churchill: With the sole exception of myself, because the minister earlier today committed himself to sending me abroad as soon as possible. I think the hon. gentleman will now find that members on the opposition side of the house will be seeking to establish their claim to represent the government overseas by letting us know the number of years they have spent in various countries. I want to draw to the minister's attention the fact that I have spent several years abroad in England and in Europe and that I have met the heads of state of most of the countries of western Europe, and in view of the lack of experienced personnel—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the hon. gentleman allow me to point out that it is not so much what he did when he was in Europe as what he has done since?

Mr. Churchill: There is such a scarcity of talent among the hon. gentleman's colleagues that I thought I would just draw this to his attention.

I wonder at the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yet, why should I wonder? In an accident prone government every one of the members of the cabinet eventually becomes infected with the virus, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs is no exception. Travelling, as he has been for a number of weeks and months, in the stratosphere, he has finally been grounded; we have got him down to earth and he is now in communication with people on the terrestrial sphere—and this is where we want to keep him.

Earlier this afternoon the minister attempted to evade this one question which we raised yesterday, and which could have been settled yesterday had he returned to the house earlier than he did and sent out to the airport with Monsieur Henri Spaak, the distinguished representative of Belgium, one of his colleagues also interested in NATO, the Minister of National Defence or the Minister of Finance. Then he might have returned to the House of Commons yesterday and we could have had questions and answers on this matter and settled it promptly. But he did not do that; he came back to the house late in the afternoon. Then today he wanted to divert our attention to what he called much more important matters and he wanted to discuss the changes that have occurred in world affairs, in the country neighbouring us, and the atomic explosion that occurred in China. These, he said, were much more important matters than this particular one. Then when we pinned him down to discuss the problem that we raised yesterday, he came up with the story that the hon. member for Red Deer was on a mission abroad with regard to the safety of Canadians who are kept prisoner in the Congo.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what I said.

Mr. Churchill: I think the safety of Canadians in the Congo overrides, at the moment, some of these other international situations, important as they are. If this had been the purpose of sending the hon. member for Red Deer abroad, we would have had a statement in the house when this occurred—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what I said.

Mr. Churchill: —or we would have had a press release; because this minister is not reticent at all about telling us what he is doing. If you mention the word Cyprus, his breast swells like that of a pouter pigeon and he talks about the great peace keeping activities of Canada, and if action had not been taken in March there might have been serious trouble in Cyprus. You mention the United Nations and again he swells with pride and gives us a long discourse about his experience at the United Nations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: But here, when the safety of Canadians in the Congo is concerned, it is an afterthought; he said nothing about it yesterday or the day before, and there was no press release. If the safety of Canadians in the Congo is uppermost in the mind of the minister—and I think it should be—why has he not some permanent official in Africa carrying on the negotiations on which he has now sent the hon. member for Red Deer?

The hon. member for Red Deer cannot go to Stanleyville, the minister told us this afternoon. He cannot even go anywhere in the Congo, I presume; he has to go to neighbouring countries. What does he know about these countries neighbouring the Congo, except Ethiopia? The minister raised this in order to cover up what he has been doing. I thought he would give us an exact itinerary of the peregrinations of the modern Marco Polo from Red Deer. Why doesn't he tell us exactly where he is and where he is going? He dropped out some of the points which were brought to our attention by others. Why didn't he say something about Ghana? Is the hon. member going to Ghana?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Thanks. We have that on the record now.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said that a long time ago.

Mr. Churchill: Is he going to Cairo?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. That was mentioned earlier in the day.

Mr. Churchill: I suggest that when he goes to Cairo he should be sent to Cyprus, which is not far away, to find out the information that is not available to the Minister of National Defence or to the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to a wounded Canadian soldier. Where is that wounded Canadian soldier? Is he hospitalized in Cyprus; is he on his way home; or is this just a minor matter? The hon. member for Red Deer is the particular man for the job; he has been in Ethiopia for 15 years and knows something about the troubles in that area. He is going to be in Cairo. Cyprus is not far away; send him there and he will bring back the information. Talk about carrying a message to Garcia. He is the man who will find out and let us know what the situation is there. I would like to ask the minister something else.

Mr. Knowles: Why not send him to Timbuktu?

Mr. Churchill: I would be very pleased if my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre was in Timbuktu to give him a welcome. Those two together would not only astonish the Africans—

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I assure my hon. friend that I am not jealous of the offer that was made to him earlier today. He can go; I won't.

Mr. Churchill: Let me ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has already been asked the question: Was there nobody within the government circle who could go on this very important mission? This is what the Canadian people wonder about. We who sit here in the House of Commons realize the lack of ability on the benches opposite, but the people of Canada have not had this brought to their attention by the government members. I bring it to the attention of the people of Canada now that the people who have the skill and ability are sitting on this side of the house, and one of them is the hon. member for Red Deer who now represents the government abroad.

I ask the minister, what credentials is this hon. member carrying with him? To whom does he present those credentials? When he meets the head of state in Ghana—where I understand they keep the opposition out of the house and in prison—and says he is a member of the opposition in the Canadian House of Commons, will he be treated in the way they treat members of the opposition in that country now? How does he represent the government when he goes to these other countries? What credentials does he carry?

Mr. Rhéaume: He will say he is a Liberal.

Mr. Churchill: My final question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs is this: How do we get a report to parliament from this hon. gentleman when he returns? Is there any way by which we may question him here in committee? I do not know. This is another problem for the committee on rules and procedure. How can the hon. member for Red Deer, representing the government abroad, be questioned here in the House of Commons with regard to the policy statements he has made on behalf of the government?

Mr. Jorgenson: He will be a parliamentary secretary by then.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder if he would look into the matter and see whether possibly he could move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 the day the hon. member gets back, and we could spend the day getting a report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Don't put the idea into his head.

Mr. Churchill: That and other ideas may occur to us. But if we cannot get a report from the hon. member for Red Deer, will we get it from the Secretary of State for External Affairs; and will we then have to check with the hon. member for Red Deer, I would not say with regard to the accuracy of the report but with regard to the completeness of the report? These are questions which arise in the minds of hon. members, and I hope the Secretary of State for External Affairs, now he is back on earth with us, will give us satisfactory answers.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, I listened with very great interest to my hon. friend. He will not misunderstand me if I say that there are occasions in this house when he does not provoke the kind of benevolent interest which attended his remarks during the last ten minutes or so. He has asked a number of questions and I would simply remind him that he himself, I think perhaps on several occasions—on one occasion, certainly, that I know—undertook one of these journeys. Perhaps it was not exactly in the same circumstances, warranting the attribution of being an expert in or knowing exceptionally well the area he was going to visit, but he will remember the report he made to this house on that occasion. We shall profit, I am sure, from the experience of the member for Red Deer in the same way we did when the hon. gentleman on that occasion reported to the house on his peregrinations. I am sorry if my remark on orders of the day today got under my hon. friend's hide when I said he had already arrived on the moon. As I indicated later in a qualification I just was speaking figuratively.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the minister. I did not hear that remark earlier this afternoon but I am glad to have it now. So it did not get under my skin at all. I am very thick skinned anyway.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend should not tell me he is thick skinned.

Mr. Churchill: But not thick headed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, not thick headed; I would never accuse my friend of that. However, I do not draw any conclusion from that remark either, because I do want to keep this debate on a very high plane. When the member for Red Deer comes back he will of course make a report. In the light of the report which he makes it will have to be determined whether it is possible at that particular moment for the government to make public some of his findings. I am sure that he himself will take the opportunity, as he does from time to time, to make a report on some of the things he has seen and some of the people with whom he has spoken.

My hon. friend did ask me one important question and that is the reason for which I rose. I am not saying that was the only important question, but as I recall now I do not think there were any other important ones.

Mr. Nugent: This is the only one you can answer, Paul.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be true; but I have a suspicion that I do not have much difficulty in answering some of the questions put, particularly from one quarter of the house. He asked: Did we have anyone in the department who could undertake a mission like this? I have already dealt with that question. My hon. friend has served in the executive arm of the government and he knows that in the Department of External Affairs there is a body of men and women who, by training, have a special qualification for the work assigned to them. This also applies, as I have already indicated, to the African division of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. Churchill: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. The minister is a little muddled here. I did not say anything about members of the Department of External Affairs. Please do not confuse me with the hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know my hon. friend did not; but I am, and that is the important part of my intervention which apparently the hon. gentleman has not understood. There were good reasons for the decision which was taken. One of the reasons for the decision was that the hon. gentleman had an acquaintanceship with the area in a special way because of his long period of residence there and because he knew certain personalities.

Mr. Churchill: Was there no one else who could go?

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question. What particular experience has the hon. member for Red Deer had in those parts of Africa which have been listed this afternoon as the places he is visiting? Does he speak the Bantu languages?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not think that would necessarily be a disability. It would, of course, be helpful if the hon. gentleman could speak the language. I know my hon. friend went to Cairo the other day and had a very useful visit. He was able to draw some conclusions which were very valuable and was kind enough to give me some of them.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

But I do not think, unless I am wrong, that he speaks the language spoken there.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I would not expect to be appointed representative of the government of Canada when I do not speak Arabic and have very little experience of the area. However, I should still like to know what experience the hon. member for Red Deer has of the Congo, of Ghana and of some other areas like Kenya, for instance? Has he a close association with Jomo Kenyatta?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I dealt with that earlier. He will be seeing Mr. Kenyatta, who is head of the organization which Canada, the United States, Belgium and several other countries are counting on for assistance in connection with the situation in Stanleyville. But that was not the only reason for which the hon. gentleman was sent there. In fact it was not even the primary reason. It was because of our conversations with Mr. Spaak that this became a very useful thing for us to do, and it was done with the knowledge of that distinguished gentleman.

Now, my hon. friend asked me whether there was no other person who could have been sent. For my hon. friend's benefit—and I was not too anxious to say this—we have sent another person in connection with the particular situation in Leopoldville and Stanleyville. That person has gone to Brussels for purposes of trying, before he goes to Leopoldville, to review in particular the situation which might be expected in the period following the visit of the hon. member for Red Deer. He is a person in the department who has had long experience, as has the hon. gentleman, in Africa and who knows some of the personalities there. I am sure hon. members will appreciate why I cannot go any further.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friends laugh. In this particular situation the lives of 26 people from Canada are involved as well as 800 others.

Mr. Rhéaume: Do not use it as a smokescreen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure my hon. friend understands that it is not desirable to give away facts which would prejudice a very important mission which I hope will be a successful one.

My hon. friend asked me a question about the Canadian soldier in Cyprus. I regret that my hon. friend has less faith in the United Nations than I have. I regret that he does not think the Cyprus operation has been a useful one. That is his judgment. I am sure it is not the judgment of this house. It is not the judgment of the people of Canada; nor is it the judgment of those 108 soldiers who are conferring today in the west block on peace keeping matters.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, the minister knows—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let me answer the hon. gentleman's question.

Mr. Churchill: I am speaking to a question of privilege. The minister, who up to this point has been unexpectedly reasonable, is now falsifying the record. I was not finding any fault whatever with the United Nations operations.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The official reports which I have now seen indicate that the Canadian soldier suffered a flesh wound in the arm. However, I am glad to report that his condition is not serious. At the time of the shooting he was not on duty and was unarmed. He apparently failed to stop when challenged by a Greek Cypriot policeman, who did not recognize him as a Canadian soldier. When warning shots were fired he ran toward the Turkish sector. It was then the firing took place which resulted in the arm wound.

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to private members' business.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a communication has been received as follows:

Ottawa, November 5, 1964

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 5th November, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions for papers, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

BANK OF WESTERN CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, September 3, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Konantz for the second reading of Bill No. S-6, to incorporate bank of western Canada, and the motion proposed thereto by Mr. Perron.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, today, for the third or fourth time since the beginning of this session, Bill No. S-6 entitled, An act incorporating the bank of western Canada is submitted to this house. This bill originated in the Senate, and the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Perron) proposed an amendment thereto that this bill be not now read a second time but that it be read this day six months.

On several occasions during the discussion on this bill we pointed out that three bills for the incorporation of banks were introduced in the Senate and House of Commons.

Two were passed by the Senate, namely, Bill No. S-13 entitled "An act to incorporate the Laurentide bank of Canada", and the present bill incorporating the bank of western Canada.

Another group of citizens request this incorporation of a bank to be known as the bank of British Columbia. The Senate committee on banking and commerce has been studying this bill for several months; the Senate took no action respecting this third bank, and it does not seem at present that it intends to take any more action about it than it has in the past. We stated in this house, and clearly enough so our remarks could be understood by the members of the other place, that our work would be facilitated if we could examine those three bills at the same time, that is Bills S-6, S-13, and S-20, which deal with the incorporation of three banks.

The members of this house are elected by the people; they represent ridings and consequently are entitled to a minimum of consideration by the members of the other place.

Since members of the house have on several occasions expressed the wish to study the three bills at the same time, the senators should at least do something to comply with this wish.

But far from sitting and working to submit this third bill, the members of the other place are constantly taking holidays. The Senate sits two, three or four days and then takes a month's holiday. It sits again and takes another holiday. It has been adjourned for a month and today it is taking another month's holiday.

If the senators do not want to sit, they should tell us so we would refrain from sending bills for their approval, since they are not apparently willing to accept them.

What right have the senators to reject bills brought forward by the people, for the House of Commons' approval, as they are doing when they refuse to defer those bills to this house for study?

By acting this way, Mr. Speaker, I say that the other place is assuming powers which it does not have, that of blocking the passage of legislation, because those powers belong to the elected representatives of the people and not to persons who owe their appointment to the Senate to mere political partisanship.

If members of the other place want to keep on taking holidays, adjourning and not doing their work, then, in my opinion, they themselves are bringing on all the reflections cast upon their institution.

So, when members of this house express the wish to study and analyse those three bills at the same time, I feel this is a perfectly legitimate request and one which the Senate ought to take into consideration.

We have no objection to seeing the banking and commerce committee of the Senate take into serious and due consideration Bill No. S-20, an act to incorporate the bank of British Columbia, but at least let it meet for such a study.

At the rate things are now going, the Senate is not meeting and the senators are enjoying perpetual holidays. Now, how can they pass a bill if they are never in Ottawa? The House of Commons should at least remind the senators now and then that if they want the Senate to keep existing, they must fulfil their duty toward the Canadian people and toward the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. member goes any further with his remarks, I take the liberty of pointing out to him the provisions of a section of the standing orders which prohibit him from criticizing the procedure of the other place. I suggest that he should refer to standing order 35 and confine his remarks to the bill now under study.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues is asking me whether we are entitled to speak of the dead. In my opinion, we should leave the dead bury their own dead; I think this would be the best solution.

At any rate, I was able to observe one thing, Mr. Speaker, without being out of order, and it is that the Canadian parliament as a whole is made up of various bodies and that in order to allow progress to be made in the business of the entire parliament, including the House of Commons and the other place, all those bodies must co-operate and do their share of the work to be carried out.

Now, it is noted—and I do not think I need name anyone in particular—that at a certain time of the week, that is, Thursday evening from five to six, the business of the house is brought to a standstill. This is a waste of time both for the House of Commons and all members of parliament. Why? Because one of the parliamentary institutions, namely the House of Commons, is not in a position to play its part entirely.

Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the House of Commons—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows that he cannot do indirectly what our standing orders forbid him to do directly. It is certainly not permissible for him to criticize indirectly the procedure of the other place, as he is trying to do now, when standing order 35 forbids him to do so directly.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Since we are now considering an amendment to Bill No. S-6 moved by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Perron), do you not think that the hon. member for Lapointe has the right to state the purpose of the amendment, which is to refer the bill to a committee or to give it the six months' hoist?

In my opinion, the hon. member has the right to say why we seek to give the bill the six months' hoist since we would then know where we stand.

I should like you to give a ruling on this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair's ruling consists merely in calling the attention of the hon. member who has the floor to standing order 35.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I should like to read standing order 35, and then I suggest you will realize that my observations are not altogether irrelevant.

It says:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of Her Majesty, nor of any of the Royal Family,...

You must agree with me that this is not what I am doing at present.

...nor His Excellency or the person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof.

I am not using offensive words. I am just saying Mr. Speaker, that the House of Commons has expressed, on several occasions, the desire to consider those three bills together and that, on the other hand, we cannot do so because one is being kept over there.

There is nothing offensive in that, Mr. Speaker. I fail to see how it could be offensive, since it is true. When I say that the members in the other place have been on holidays now for a month it is not offensive; it is the truth, and they know so. If they feel offended, then they should not go on holidays.

Mr. Caouette: When they sit, they sleep anyway.

Mr. Grégoire: When I say that they come back and sit two days and then go back on holidays for another month, under the rules you will admit that it is not offensive; it is true, they do go on holidays. If they feel offended, they should not go on holidays.

I think that I am in order and I have no intention of offending them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member has submitted his arguments and so has the hon. member for Villeneuve.

The argument of the hon. member for Lapointe, who stated that a remark cannot be offensive if it is true, is unacceptable.

I refer the hon. member to quotation 381 of Beauchesne's which provides that the debate on the second reading of a bill must deal with the principle of the bill. I think that when he speaks about the consideration given or denied to the bill at the other place, he is wandering from the principle of the bill or the motion now before the house.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I was more particularly referring to the amendment providing that the said bill should not be read a second time, but that it be postponed for a period of six months.

This is what I am talking about. Why give it the six months' hoist? It seems to me that this amendment was moved long ago and it has already received a six months' hoist. The other place had begun to delay the sending of the third bill, Bill No. S-20, to the House of Commons. We thought that six months would have been time enough to enable us to receive this bill. However, today we are surprised to learn that six months have not been enough.

Therefore, it may perhaps be necessary to ask for the second reading to be postponed for a year in order to give those who are supposed to send us the third bill I mentioned, more time for consideration.

Mr. Speaker, that is the reason—I want to make that clear—why we are asking to postpone the second reading of this bill until a later date.

We feel that we will then better fulfil our duty as members of the House of Commons, as representatives of the people—and I insist on the expression "representatives of the people"—because we will have all the facts before us.

To our minds, to have all the facts before us is to have the three bills, not one or two, but three.

We do not oppose second reading of the bill as such. We do not oppose the setting up of other banks in Canada. But we are against the fact that we are denied the opportunity of studying the three bills at the same time.

I insist on letting it be known, clearly, categorically, and unequivocally, so that the members of the other place might know that we do not want to be handicapped in our work with regard to private bills.

We express the wish, and I trust there is in this nothing offensive, that in the vicinity of this house our request be taken into serious consideration so that we may receive all bills bearing on corporations and new banks, in order that we may be able to do justice, not only to the members of the house who will study the bills in committee, but also to those who have submitted petitions with a view to obtaining a bank charter for they too suffer serious detriment as a result of what goes on in a certain branch of this parliament, and suffer losses through ensuing delays.

That should be taken into consideration. That is why I make this appeal through you, Mr. Speaker—for I know you have the opportunity of meeting the parties concerned—that the people from the other place send us Bill No. S-20 as soon as possible in order that second reading of the three bills on banks might be proceeded with and that they be studied in committee; thus we might give satisfaction to all interested parties who are entitled to such consideration.

Mr. Barry Mather (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this discussion,

I thought it might be useful first of all to put on the record a few facts about British Columbia, the province most likely to be affected by the passage or otherwise of the legislation before us. Personally, I represent the riding of New Westminster which is the most populous riding in Canada west of Toronto. It lies in the centre of the lower mainland of British Columbia, and the lower mainland of British Columbia is an area in which we have now more people concentrated per square mile than is the case in comparable areas in either Belgium or Holland.

There are very good reasons, Mr. Speaker, why British Columbia should have had long ago, and certainly now should have, a large financial institution with its head office in our province. I should like to put before you some statistics concerning British Columbia and its commercial operation. British Columbia, of course, is third in size of all the provinces and third in size with regard to population. Excluding the lakes, it is actually a larger province than Ontario but its most important financial community, Vancouver, is isolated from the centres of financial activity in Canada, namely Toronto and Montreal, by almost a continent. It is in those areas of Toronto and Montreal, of course, in which we find the head offices of our leading financial institutions.

Mr. Lloyd: May I raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax on a point of order.

Mr. Lloyd: My point is that the bill before us has to do with the incorporation of the bank of western Canada. I believe, generally speaking, that under the rules of relevancy we should be considering the merits of this private bill and the matters which it contains. I do not believe we should be discussing the importance of a bank being located elsewhere or established by some other people.

Mr. Mather: In reply, may I say that I am directing my remarks to the point that several bills are on the order paper which affect western Canada, and particularly British Columbia. I was going to go on and try to prove that we cannot consider one without keeping in mind the other two bills which bear on this point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With regard to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Halifax, I would say that the rules of the house allow us to consider only one thing at a time and the matter now before the house is Bill No. S-6, dealing with the incorporation of the bank of western Canada. Even though there are other bills which may come up and which may be affected, directly or indirectly, by this particular measure, I suggest the hon. member should confine himself as much as possible to the principle of the particular bill before us now.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I also point out that there is a motion which, as I recall, provides for a six months' hoist. It seems to me this has some relationship to other bills which are coming before us having to do with the incorporating of banks, and it may be an explanation why the mover of the motion suggested a six months' hoist. There is some relevancy to the other banking legislation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is the interpretation of the hon. member, but the only things before the house are the bill and the amending motion, and the amending motion makes it still more restrictive and does not in any way enlarge the scope of the bill.

Mr. Mather: Keeping your view in mind, Mr. Speaker, may I say that in my opinion B.C. is a section of western Canada and anything affecting western Canada affects B.C. However, I shall try to abide by your ruling. Present business activity in B.C. was well illustrated by the brief recently presented by that province to the hon. gentlemen in the other place. It revealed that while the population of that part of western Canada which is B.C. is somewhat less than the population of the combined area of the Atlantic provinces, nevertheless it has a labour force 2.5 per cent greater, a labour income 55 per cent greater, retail sales 21 per cent greater, factory shipments 134 per cent greater and cheques cashed 238 per cent greater than the combined Atlantic provinces.

Mrs. Konantz: On a point of order, I would like to ask why the hon. gentleman is discussing the facts of B.C. and not the proposed bank of western Canada which will have its headquarters in Manitoba and will be primarily concerned with that and the other two provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta?

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, I tried to make it clear that in my opinion we cannot consider this bill without taking into consideration the needs of B.C., which is part of western Canada. I think that the realities of B.C.'s international and national trade position differ greatly from those of the areas in the central provinces which are served by the existing private banks, and there is great need for the establishment of a bank in western Canada, particularly in B.C., to serve the interests of that area.

Having said that, I want to express my opposition to the passage of the bill before us and my support for the amendment, which I understand would give a six months' hoist to the bill. My contention is that this bill cannot logically be considered unless we keep in mind with it the other two bills which have been before the other place. The people in western Canada to my knowledge, particularly those in B.C., have never asked for the establishment of the bank which this bill would establish. On the other hand the people in that part of western Canada which is B.C. have overwhelmingly endorsed the idea of the establishment of a provincial bank of British Columbia.

As hon. members know, the government of B.C. and the official opposition in that province, although they differ upon many matters are united in their desire for the establishment of the bank of British Columbia, for its incorporation, and for the provision that it should have the origin of its finances in that province.

As hon. members also know, approval of the incorporation of that institution was rejected—

Mr. Lloyd: I appreciate how the hon. member may feel about the possible development of a bank in British Columbia but I think he should be required to relate his observations to reasons why this bill should or should not pass, or to reasons why the amendment should or should not be accepted. We are getting far away from the intent and purpose surrounding the introduction of a private bill during this hour.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to understand why this point of order should be raised by a member from Halifax, inasmuch as the area under discussion is rather remote from the area he represents. Perhaps he does not appreciate the points of view the hon. member for New Westminster is trying to express. It seems to me that in considering the principle of this bill the general impact of banking proposals in the region which some of us over here represent should be considered.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I suggest the hon. member is participating in the debate rather than making a contribution on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd). On that point may I say it is a basic rule that we have to be relevant at all times, but as Beauchesne says it is not very easy to determine to what extent the rule has to be applied. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather) knows the rule and I would ask him to try to relate the remarks he is now making to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Lloyd: I have a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. Some reference was made to the fact that because I was a member for Halifax this should deter me from raising a question of order. Surely that is fantastic. I am concerned with the procedures of the house and it makes no difference whether I come from—I was going to say Red Deer—B.C. or Nova Scotia.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. member for Medicine Hat rising on a new point of order?

Mr. Olson: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before he does so may I say there was not a point of privilege in the matter raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd), and I suggest we forget that aspect in our discussions. I am wondering if the hon. member for Medicine Hat is rising on a new point of order, because the Chair is under the impression that the first one had been disposed of.

Mr. Olson: I merely wish to say that on two occasions the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd) raised a point of order attempting to confine or restrict the area of discussion chosen by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather). I heard nothing in the remarks of the hon. member for New Westminster that led me to believe he had violated the rule of relevancy. On page two of the bill before us there is a list of names of directors. I have not counted them, but there are about 20 from the province of B.C. Surely that is an indication that this bank intends to extend its operations into B.C. Everything the hon. member for New Westminster has said concerns the financial community within B.C., and therefore he is completely in order.

Mr. Mather: I would like to thank hon. members who in their wisdom support my contention that B.C. is a part of western Canada. I do not have much more to say, but I do want to affirm there can be no doubt that, in sending this bill to us, the other place has acted contrary to the wishes of the vast majority of British Columbians, whose enthusiasm for a real provincial bank of British Columbia is so great that they are already offering to subscribe money in such volume that the province will likely have to put up only a mere 10 per cent of the share capital.

I think there is no question but that the passage of the bill before us for the creation of the bank of western Canada would mitigate against the successful establishment and growth of the proposed provincial bank of British Columbia. Speaking as a representative from British Columbia I think the action taken in the other place on the legislation before us has resulted in making more difficult the satisfaction of the aspirations of British Columbians. It seems to me to be highly questionable, to put it mildly, that some gentlemen who have no electoral responsibility and who either have had, or retain, private banking interests should sit in judgment upon the applications of three banks—two private and one public—and for them to bless two and stymie the third. I think that in doing so they have done a deep injustice to the people of British Columbia by withholding permission for the establishment of a bank capable of doing great service for British Columbia.

Mr. Basford: May I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for New Westminster is clearly out of order in reflecting upon the proceedings in the other place, contrary to the terms of citation 149 of Beauchesne. It is clearly stated there that reflections upon proceedings in the other place are out of order. Moreover, the hon. member imputed motives to hon. gentlemen in the other place—

An hon. Member: They deserve it.

Mr. Basford: —and I suggest that for the sake of the record it might be well to point out two facts. First, the measure concerning the bank of western Canada received first reading in the other place on February 27 of this year. The bill concerning the Laurentide bank received first reading on March 24 and the bill having to do with the bank of British Columbia received its first reading on May 6. These three bills came into the other place at different times of the year and it would seem to me only proper that they should come out of it at different times.

The other point I wish to make is this. It is simply that the committee on banking and commerce in the other place met only yesterday to consider the bill about which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather) is complaining, and that committee is prepared to meet again as soon as British Columbia produces further evidence.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I may say a word on that part of the point of order which had to do with references to the proceedings of the Senate. Do I understand that the citation referred to by the hon. member was citation 147?

Mr. Basford: Citation 149.

Mr. Howard: In any event, the citation is an extensive one and if I were to undertake to read it now I would not be able to comment on the point of order because you, Mr. Speaker, would wish us to proceed with the debate. But it has been a long standing practice, as some hon. members know who have taken part in the marathon debates on certain private bills with which we do not now have to deal, to use as a basis for argument for or against any particular private bill, evidence given before a committee of the other place, because this is the only information in detail we have, apart from that which may be provided by the sponsor of a bill on second reading. I submit it is entirely in order to use the evidence taken before a committee of the Senate which may have heard this or any other private bill, to bolster arguments for or against the principle of the bill.

With regard to the information given by the hon. member as to what is taking place in the Senate, I am afraid some of us are not so enamoured of the other place as to pay a great deal of attention to what is going on there. But it is a fact that the Senate is now proceeding to deal with the bill relating to the bank of British Columbia, I think this is all the more reason why the sponsor of the bill now before us should agree to postpone or withdraw it until we can deal with all three of these measures in an orderly fashion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) is well taken. The Chair did bring to the attention of one hon. member who participated in the debate the standing order itself, and there are, of course, various citations which also deal with the matter. Citation 147(1) says:

> Allusion to debates in the other house are out of order and there are few orders more important than this for the conduct of debate and for observing courtesy between houses.

Citation 149(b) says that a member while speaking must not——refer to any debate in the Senate, but he may refer to the official printed records of the upper house, though they have not been formally communicated to the lower house.

Citation 157(3) (e) says it is out of order to read extracts in the debate if they allude to debates in the other house of parliament. These citations are all fundamentally the same and I think they reflect a basic rule of debate which members with experience in this chamber would wish to recognize. In view of this, I invite the hon. member who has the floor to keep the standing order and these citations in mind and to restrict his consideration to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): On the point of order, may I point out that the reference was not to debates in the other place but to proceedings before the banking and commerce committee, the printed record of which is a public record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I believe it is the same thing—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is the suggestion of the Chair that members of the house in their speeches may not refer to proceedings in the Senate—I believe that is the rule—or "reflect on the proceedings in the Senate". Perhaps that is a better way of putting it.

Mr. Leboe: I wonder if I might point out that citation 149(b) reads:

—but he may refer to the official printed records of the upper house, though they have not been formally communicated to the lower house;

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that we move on and continue our discussion of the measure being studied by the house. The point just raised by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Leboe) is highly hypothetical. The citation says a member may refer to the printed record of the upper house, but I did not hear the hon. member who has the floor refer to the official record of the upper house. I would ask him to continue his comments.

Mr. Grégoire: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A point of order has been raised and the Chair has given a ruling. If there is a new point of order it can be considered but I suggest the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) has been sufficiently discussed and that we should go on with the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather).

Mr. Basford: My point of order did not refer to reading from the record of Senate committees. It referred to the hon. member for New Westminster making imputations as to the motives of senators. Had he referred to the record of the committee of the other place he would have found that the premier of British Columbia supported the incorporation of these two private banks.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on an entirely new point of order in connection with the point of order raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford).

The hon. member mentioned that the motion for first reading of Bill No. S-20 had been carried after the motion for first reading of the two other bills on May 7.

Mr. Speaker, if the motions for first reading of these bills were carried on May 7, it proves beyond a doubt that the other place did not proceed with dispatch inasmuch as seven months have elapsed since then.

[Text]

Mr. Mather: I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the other members of the house who have given me the benefit of their counsel.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): For using up the time.

Mr. Mather: What I have to say now will come as somewhat of an anticlimax. I will make one more reference to the subject I mentioned earlier. Although I am one who, perhaps for sentimental reasons, has some affection for the gentlemen of the other place, it is actions such as this which affect bills to incorporate banks that make me wonder whether it will not bring the gentlemen of the other place into disrepute if they are continued, because they go so contrary to the will of a great many people in this country, and certainly a great many people in western Canada.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to reiterate that on every logical ground there is a need in western Canada, and particularly in British Columbia, for a bank of British Columbia with its head offices in Vancouver and its funds in or from western Canada, and particularly British Columbia. As the passage of the bill before us—disregarding for the moment the amendment—would delay the creation of this very important service for that part of western Canada which is British Columbia, I oppose it.

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it so happens that my viewpoints are not too distant from those expressed by the members who have indicated their concern about the actions of the other place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lloyd: I feel, however, that our tactics have been completely wrong. I think it is clear that there are two companies here who have put forward their propositions to incorporate a bank and comply with all the conditions of the Bank Act. I believe that is obvious. Therefore I see no reason why in this private members' hour we should not recognize the efforts of private entrepreneurs to enter the competitive banking field of Canada when they have all the indications of being successful ventures that are well organized and can meet all the requirements that we normally impose upon banks in regard to the purposes to which they commit themselves.

If this house were to pass these two bills would we not have established a very solid criterion of legislative procedure, and would not the case be strengthened for forcing the other place, if that is required, and certainly to strengthen the arguments in this house to require anybody opposing the establishment of a bank of British Columbia to state specifically why they oppose it at this time? I suggest that the motion to defer this matter for six months defeats the very purpose of its proponents, and I earnestly suggest that we should pass this particular bill and give favourable consideration to the bill with respect to the Laurentide bank of Canada—

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Lloyd: —withdraw this motion and then proceed—

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Lloyd: Not at the moment; when I have finished my remarks. We could then proceed and see what happens with respect to the third bill. I think hon. members would have a much stronger case if they were to allow the passage of these two bills, rather than forcing the identification of the reasons for passing these two bills and holding up the other one.

[Mr. Mather.]

[Translation]

Mr. L. P. Antoine Bélanger (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to speak against the passing of this bill.

Mr. Choquette: Why?

Mr. Bélanger: For several reasons which I shall give you in a moment if you will bear with me.

First, I want to say that I entirely agree with the statement made by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) concerning the work in the other place. I also have another very important reason for opposing the passing of this bill. As all hon. members know, the revision of the Bank Act will be proceeded with next year. So, I do not see why all those banks that are asking for new charters could not wait until we have studied the amendments to the Bank Act to get these new charters from parliament.

But my main objection to the granting of a new charter to the bank of western Canada is based, as I mentioned when the bill was brought before the house, on the methods used in the banking system itself. I have already attempted to explain that such methods are arbitrary, anti-democratic and anti-social privileges.

I have shown that, with their ability to create and suppress credit, the banks hold such great powers that they control all the people's business and even the government. This means that the country or the provinces are actually governed by the banks, that is by citizens who have not been elected by the people; and we dare call our parliamentary system a democratic system.

At any rate, the reasons which led me before to vote against this bill still prevailing, I shall, therefore, continue to oppose the passing of this bill.

Quite sincerely, I do not see why I should vote in favour of extending to some citizens certain rights which, I feel, are prejudicial to the people.

The power to withdraw or create credit should no longer be left in the hands of private interests; instead, it should be assumed by the government, which could use it with the interests of the people and of the country as its first concern. As it is, that power benefits only a few and is prejudicial to all.

That would be the only way of making it possible for the provinces to meet their increasingly heavy obligations without plunging into debt the future generations and enslaving them even before they are born.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It has just been drawn to my attention that the hon. member has already participated in this debate; if he will refer to Hansard, he will see that he spoke on this bill on August 6.

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker, I must say quite sincerely that I thought I had spoken on the motion for second reading of the bill, not on the amendment. I do not think I made any remarks on the amendment but I will abide by your ruling if you say I did. Personally, I feel I participated in the debate on second reading but not on the amendment.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker, I should like very much to get an answer to the question I just asked you, as to whether or not I spoke on the amendment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the hon. member will refer to Hansard of August 6, on page 6491, he will find that he spoke for nine minutes.

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a few very brief remarks to make on this bill so that we may have time to pass it, if hon. members opposite are willing to show their goodwill.

I also wish to point out that the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Bélanger) wanted to speak a second time in order to continue the filibuster against this bill.

I also wish to point out to the house that the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) virulently denounced the Conservative filibuster on interim supply while he took the floor on four occasions himself during the discussion of those estimates.

Mr. Speaker, one wonders how sincere are those people? One wonders whether they are not playing the fool?

Mr. Bélanger: Mr. Speaker, a while ago you called the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Mather) to order when he was speaking about British Columbia.

I suggest that the hon. member for Lotbinière is wandering far away from the subject before us, since he is dealing with the behaviour of the members in the house, and I would ask you to call him to order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is right; the hon. member for Lotbinière knows that he must limit his remarks to the principle of the bill now before us.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to say that I regret the filibustering tactics of our friends opposite, their attitude since they have been sitting in this house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[Text]

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Leboe: We are not going to have the question at this very moment. Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill I should like to mention one or two matters which I think are mighty important in connection with banking. The bill we have before us relates particularly to the fact that when we have what is known as a tight money policy we find this policy is instituted primarily because there are inflationary tendencies within certain areas of Canada. The areas which are considered inflationary or as having inflationary tendencies are lumped together with those places in Canada which actually have a deficiency in the money supply.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

An act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1965.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock p.m. are as follows:

1. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan), shipping, reported lack of service to Caribbean.

[Translation]

And the second question: the hon. member for St. Mary, labour conditions—increase in unemployment in the province of Quebec.

[Text]

The house will now revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: It is the understanding of the Chair that vote No. 1 of the Department of External Affairs stands and that we are to proceed with the Department of the Secretary of State. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

1. Departmental administration, $363,600.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the estimates of the department and the agencies for which I am responsible presents unusual problems because of the reorganization which has taken place since the main estimates were tabled. The department itself has been divided into two main sections headed by two deputy ministers. The deputy registrar general is now responsible for all matters which used to be under the Department of the Secretary of State, with the exception of the translation bureau but including the administration of the Patent, Copyright and Trade Marks Acts, for which the Minister of Justice is now responsible.

With regard to that section of the department which is still under my responsibility, I have nothing in particular to report to the committee except to say that a substantial revision of the Companies Act is now being considered in the other place and will soon be ready, I hope, for study and examination by the House of Commons. The under secretary of state is responsible for the translation bureau and the national museum, which has been transferred from the department of northern affairs to my department. He advises me also on questions of administration and financial policy affecting the various agencies reporting to me. I will enumerate those agencies later on.

[Translation]

At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words concerning the bureau for translations. In that service, the work load has tremendously increased these last few years. I think that the development of government activities, the extension of parliamentary works and the increase in the number of royal commissions, account in great part for this situation.

The bilingualism policy adopted by the government is another important incidental factor. The simultaneous interpretation branch was also literally snowed under. Under such conditions, it is no wonder that the quality of the work has fallen down, in certain cases, in spite of the dedication of the staff to whom I must pay tribute. We are taking various steps to remedy that situation. The salaries have been increased and an office was set up in Montreal to make recruitment easier. We hope to be able to add at least 50 new employees to the staff during the next few months. In order to promote recruitment, special courses are offered to those who would like to become translators or interpreters but who do not have all the required qualifications. The purpose is not only to increase the staff, but production must be improved and also the quality of services, and that is why we intend to proceed with a reorganization where it is desirable in the bureau for translations.

As a first step, we are now setting up a terminology centre under the direction of Mr. Pierre Daviault who is leaving his position as superintendent of the bureau of translations. We are very happy to take advantage in this way of the long experience acquired by Mr. Daviault in the field of recruiting, at a time when scientific techniques change so quickly and the translation of specialized vocabularies causes difficulties. The main purpose of this new centre will be to keep up with the evolution of specialized terminology, by consulting appropriate publications and keeping in contact with similar organizations existing in other countries and on the international level as well.

It will establish a terminology filing system, as well as a catalogue and a library of technical reference works. It will also publish occasionally glossaries of which the public will be able to take advantage, in accordance with a recommendation of the Glassco commission.

In this way the terminology centre will be in a position to render a great many services. It will save time for translators; it will help to improve the quality of translations and standardize the technical vocabulary in Canada, in both official languages.

In short, valuable improvements have been made recently within the bureau for translations. Other reforms are initiated and I shall report on them next year.

In closing that part of my remarks I want to say that the government intends to make of the bureau for translations a fully efficient agency, because it is an essential part of our bilingualism program.

[Text]

I now come to the agencies for which I am responsible to parliament. Members of the committee will remember that my predecessor, the present Minister of Transport, was responsible for the following agencies: The civil service commission, the chief electoral officer, the B.B.G., the C.B.C., the national film board, the national gallery, the archives and the national library. All those agencies still report to the Secretary of State. In addition I continue to be responsible for the centennial commission and the economic council, as I was as president of the privy council. The Department of Public Printing and Stationery now reports to me instead of to the Minister of Defence Production. Finally, the Canada Council reports to me and not to the Prime Minister as it used to do.

I am quite sure that all members of the committee will agree that it would become quite bothersome if I were to make separate statements on each individual agency. Therefore I propose to make only three general statements covering them all and outlining the main programs and plans which concern them individually. Such a progress report will, I think, give a much better idea of what government and its agencies are trying to do in those fields, and will provide to the members of the committee some kind of general framework which will put them in a much better position to appreciate what is being done or contemplated for the immediate future. I hasten to say that this approach is not intended in any way to restrict hon. members' right to discuss as long as they wish each individual item of those estimates.

In this first statement I intend to refer briefly to two different agencies which are quite unrelated to each other, the economic council and the civil service commission. When the estimates of my department, those of these two agencies and of the chief electoral officer, have been approved, I propose at the proper occasion to make two other general statements, one on the cultural policy of the government and on the so-called cultural or information agencies, the other on centennial preparations and the centennial commission.

The economic council of Canada held its first meeting on January 14 and 15, 1964, in Ottawa. The government is very proud to have succeeded in securing the services of Dr. John Deutsch, Louis Couillard and Arthur Smith to act respectively as chairman, vice chairman and full time director of the council. We also feel that the other 25 members of the council represent very well all the major components of the private sector of our economy. In addition I am satisfied that the council has succeeded in getting an efficient and devoted staff.

All the members of the committee who are interested in the activities of the council have already, I am sure, carefully read its annual report which was tabled on July 15. I do not have very much to add to the information contained in that report. In its first year of activities the council has concentrated its attention on the development of its internal organization, the building up of a solid research base and the establishment of liaison arrangements with similar provincial agencies and the main private sectors of the economy.

The highest priority in this program of work has been assigned to the preparation of the first of its annual reviews of Canada's medium and long term prospects and problems. This review will deal with the tasks and goals of the Canadian economy for the next five years up until 1970. It will be published in December.

Work is also under way on a number of other projects and studies. Working committees on economic growth and problems of adjustment, on labour management relations, on productivity and on industrial research and technology have been established to facilitate the development of this work. The council is sponsoring a national conference on labour management relations to be held in Ottawa next week. This conference will mark a new approach in the promotion of labour management consultation and will be based on research studies which are being specifically prepared by leading experts. In addition, the council is sponsoring a number of special studies by outside experts. All this work and analysis will provide not only the basis of advice to the government but also valuable information to the private sectors of the economy which will help them to make their own decisions and forward plans.

The council's initial investigation and information of advice, have been given an unprecedented degree of independence. The bringing to bear of an informed, independent appraisal of the medium and long range implications of government policy may be one of the most useful consequences of the establishment of the council. This independence will not be weakened or destroyed by any action of this government.

No problem area which bears on Canada's economic future is beyond the scope of the council's inquiry. How it examines these problems is entirely within its competence. There is a provision in the act for the government formally to seek the advice of the council on specific problems or government policies having long run economic implications. In deference to the work load undertaken by the council in its initial year of operations, the government has not yet sought advice from the council on specific policies. The council's first annual review will provide a useful, over-all perspective within which future references by the government could be made.

The council has held meetings with the provincial economic and productivity councils and expects to meet again with these bodies after the publication of its first annual review. The chairman of the council has assured me that on the basis of the review every effort will be directed at developing effective and practical means of consultation with the appropriate provincial agencies in regard to all matters of common concern.

The council has met six times so far this year, and there have been numerous meetings of the various committees. The diligence with which the council, under the active chairmanship of Dr. John Deutsch, has applied itself to the task set for it, is to be commended. This is obviously a working council. The fruits of that labour will shortly be available to parliament and the Canadian public in the form of the first annual review. The government looks forward with confidence and high expectations to this first substantive publication of the council. This document and the subsequent recommendations will carry the weight of expert analysis and the collective wisdom of a body whose members, in their own right, are leaders in the private sector of the economy.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

Thus we feel that we have a good piece of legislation and a good, dynamic council which will soon be in a position to make an essential contribution, through its research, its projections and recommendations, to the development of economic planning in Canada.

In presenting the estimates for the current fiscal year, the civil service commission wishes to report to the committee on a number of activities which should be of particular interest, either because they represent significant changes in traditional programs or are innovations designed to solve new problems encountered in providing staff and services for the departments and agencies of the civil service.

The commission has established a new salary administration plan, and a systematic appraisal program for senior officers in the civil service. It is also constructing a manpower inventory of managerial and professional resources. This inventory will be kept up to date and will provide a ready and quick means, consistent with the merit principle, for meeting the needs of all departments and agencies, at the senior levels. It is hoped that a purposeful career development program can be evolved for senior officers to ensure that there is a reservoir of competent managerial talent, available to the public service sufficient to meet the increasingly demanding requirements which rapidly changing socio-economic conditions will create.

Following a preliminary analysis of requirements for senior managerial staff, it was concluded that a much more significant development program is required for senior officers than the one-month course given annually over the past several years. The commission instituted this year a four-month senior course in public administration held in residence at Carleton Place. Some 30 officers, carefully selected from departmental nominations, were admitted to the course last spring. This course was assessed as being extremely valuable to the participating departments, and the commission has now established this program as an annual activity in response to the demands of the senior officials in government departments throughout the public service.

As a result of recommendations made by the preparatory committee on collective bargaining, the government concluded that a substantial change in the civil service classification system would be required as prerequisite to the introduction of collective bargaining and arbitration. On the request of the government, the commission has undertaken a classification revision program intended to produce class structures based, in the main, on occupational grouping designed to apply horizontally throughout the civil service. The bureau of classification revision has been established to undertake this project. Another unit, a classification branch, has been established to meet the day-to-day requirements in relation to the present classification system; this unit will work on a diminishing scale, as the new classification system is put into effect.

With the advent of collective bargaining, the commission has been giving careful consideration to its future role in staffing the civil service. The commission, like industry and commerce, is faced with problems in recruitment created by the increasing demand for more highly trained technical and professional staff, not to mention managerial staff. Early in 1965 the commission hopes to be in a position with staff and facilities to compete effectively with other institutions, both public and private, for a fair share of available manpower resources. The commission is convinced that unless it takes an aggressive attitude in this competitive market the service will be at a serious disadvantage in meeting its commitments to the public over the next five to ten years.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, at the end of September 1963, the treasury board authorized the staff and appropriations required for the launching, early in 1964, of a central program for the teaching of the two official languages to public servants.

The commission then proceeded to the appointment of a co-ordinator and an advisory committee, the renting of premises, the installation of a language laboratory and the hiring of four teachers.

The first stage of the program was completed during the first semester of 1964, when three courses in French and one in English, the length of which varied from ten weeks in the case of part-time courses to four full-time courses, were given to 42 civil servants designated by the different departments and grouped on the basis of scientific tests.

After taking into consideration the past experience, the program was developed further and strengthened during the summer of 1964.

Before it opened in September the school was provided with an additional laboratory, the number of classrooms was increased to 10, and the personnel to eight teachers and two supervisors.

It is anticipated that in January 1965 the total staff will include 20 full time and ten part time teachers.

During the second phase of the program the school will thus be able to accommodate, during a 12-month period, approximately 700 students who will attend courses of various lengths.

The commission is basing its program on some very solid facts, one of which is that, in selecting teachers, establishing facilities and choosing programs, the commission must measure up to the standards required in this highly specialized area of teaching a second language to adults, according to the resources available in our country at this moment for this purpose.

There must be a small number of students in each classroom, because it appears that a class of eight to ten students, instead of 15 as had previously been figured, offers the best possibilities of profitable exchanges between teacher and students.

It is also important to note that no single formula can be applied universally and that the program, as a whole, must offer a diversity of courses which can benefit various classes of students.

Therefore, a complete training from the elementary and intermediate levels will produce a meagre success if it is not on a full time basis, or at least of a half-day duration, with all the equipment required during an initial phase of intensive training lasting as much as four months. This would be followed by a second phase of a duration of several months, with a less intensive on-the-job training.

That is why courses of a half-day duration will be given only, in general, to more advanced students or as an extension of the intensive training.

They will also be offered to those employees whose work only requires a very limited knowledge of both languages, as well as to senior officials who have a great ability to learn, but who really cannot stay away from their duties. If such courses were ever made available to all civil servants, it would rather be with a view to sustaining the general interest, pending the establishment of entirely satisfactory facilities.

The commission is convinced that in order to be useful, a training program must be supported by supplementary arrangements designed to provide graduates with a real opportunity to make good use of and to improve their newly acquired knowledge. Those arrangements will include personal incentive programs to be applied at home, but also opportunities for work under bilingual conditions.

The commission will be pleased to lend a hand to such departments as wish to help in setting up such conditions. In the meantime, it is imperative that, during the training stages, each group be composed of students who have approximately the same education and aptitudes for learning.

Consequently, it is necessary to group, under a single and vast training program, the greatest possible number of students, in order to provide the required number of homogeneous classes. That is why applications for registration should be pooled, and dealt with as much as possible from a co-ordinating centre staffed with travelling teachers as well as resident teachers, rather than through a series of independent departmental programs, which would be less efficient and more costly.

A word, now, about some of the practical measures taken by the commission in the matter of selection of bilingual personnel to meet the requirements. Apart from competitions for positions where a knowledge of both languages is a necessary requirement, it has now become the practice to allow extra marks for the knowledge of both languages in the case of competitions set up to fill positions where this knowledge would be useful. However, this practice continues to allow candidates with a knowledge of only one of our two official languages, to become eligible for a position. On the other hand, since bilingualism is part and parcel of the merit principle, not only with regard to some particular positions but in the areas where there is a general shortage, the knowledge of both languages is required in the case of some competitions to recruit more than one employee. This is being done with the deliberate intention to increase the number of bilingual employees, in areas where there is a shortage of them.

All examinations have now been analysed, especially those which are used to recruit university graduates, in order to ensure that they are in conformity with the intelligence and general knowledge tests and that they are not based on learning peculiar to a particular system of culture or teaching. The commission, however, keeps in close contact with teaching and training institutions, in order to be able to assess accurately and fairly the various kinds of levels of training which exist throughout the country.

Finally, steps were taken to ensure that examining boards are composed of members who can hold a complete interview in that of the two official languages which the candidate has chosen, and who can also assess his education, his experience and his possibilities of success.

[Text]

I want to make it clear, however, as I have already said on several occasions, that we do not intend to impose our general program of bilingualism on the civil service. We believe that it cannot be successful without the sincere and full co-operation of the civil servants and their associations. That is why we intend to consult with the staff associations before implementing important phases of our major undertaking. Above all, we do not want to impinge upon existing rights or to create new sources of discrimination while attempting to eliminate existing unfairness.

A great number of civil servants have already understood their new challenge and in many cases they have taken special training courses on their own initiative and at their own expense. Thus we are quite sure that the civil servants will accept a government program of bilingualism, not reluctantly and as a concession but as an opportunity for their own cultural enrichment, which will enable them to better serve all Canadians.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, as I understand it, the minister's plan is to have us, if we are going to make any remarks, make them on the agencies of his department that have been covered. For something like the C.B.C. or the national film board, which he will cover later, he would request that we touch on those matters later after he makes an introductory statement. Some of my colleagues want to make some remarks about the translation system. I wanted to place several questions on the record and perhaps the minister could answer them later.

I am very interested in knowing whether there is going to be any relationship in timing and discussion among the Department of Finance on its preparing a white paper in relationship to the budget, the Department of Trade and Commerce in the preparing of the document that it puts forward every year on private and public investment in Canada, and the major publication, I take it to be—it is an annual publication—of the Canada economic council. The reason I am interested in this matter is to discover what kind of liaison or relationship has developed in this particular field, which I think is a delicate one. We would like to assume, in one way, that the economic council is operating on its own. It seems to me it has the personnel, the staff and the independence the minister talked of; but there is also the problem of which I am sure the government must be aware, and it would certainly be exploited in this chamber if there was a great discrepancy in the analyses and the projections. I would assume that this would be solved in the main by the fact that the economic council would be projecting into the future much more than these other agencies have done. Yet I think it is quite apparent that every time we get a budget it is the projection out of the white paper which is the analysis of current conditions, and the public and private investment in Canada also stands in the same way. I would appreciate it if the minister could fill us in a bit on how these major publishing efforts, two by government departments and one by a new agency, are going to be dovetailed.

The next question I wanted to raise is this. I did not get the early part of the minister's remarks in French, but I wondered whether he made any distinction in connection with the problem that I have heard about from some civil servants beyond Ottawa. I refer to the relative disadvantage of the outside service to the service inside, or at Ottawa, in relation to this whole question of biculturalism and training. I suppose it is very apparent that most senior civil servants, in particular, would be willing to improve their prospects by taking courses of training; but it is also apparent that anyone who is in the west is going to have much less chance to use, in practice, socially or any other way, his other language, particularly if it is the French language.

I am just wondering what plan the government has to meet this particular problem. I have had it put to me by people who are, for example, in charge of offices in Winnipeg and the lakehead and who are in the years when one could expect further promotion—perhaps promotion to Ottawa—that they are at an obvious disadvantage. I would be interested if the minister could tell us anything about plans to compensate for the disadvantage from which the outside service suffers.

The other question I want to raise—and I do not believe the minister touched on it at all—is the problem relating to the Companies Act and the fact that so many companies are behind in the annual reports required by the Companies Act. I know that before the committee of the other place the gentleman who is in charge of Companies Act registrations and the bureau in the minister's department gave evidence to the effect, it seemed to me, that the Companies Act requirements, in so far as the posting of information and keeping it up to date is concerned, was observed more in the breach than in actuality. This is a matter that has interested me for some time. I would like to know what practical steps are being taken to correct this situation, how well it is coming along, whether it is being met by some future streamlining of the department, or whether there is an attempt to get more personnel and deal with it in that particular way.

The other point I wanted to put to the minister by way of a question was to ask him about the planning function within the ministry itself. I think this is a fair question to raise since the minister is responsible for the economic council. One of the matters which confuses those of us who are in opposition is that we will read a speech which we can appreciate by, say, the Minister of Forestry dealing with economic planning or ARDA and its future. Then we will read addresses given by the Minister of Industry which indicate that he is also involved in the whole question of economic planning, the direction of investment and the development of incentives. We take for granted that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce are also operating in this field. Consequently some of us tend to feel that there may be a profusion of responsibilities in the whole area of economic planning and direction. We welcome the new agency, but what is the actual setup within the ministry to deal with this question?

I ask this question particularly because for several years there have been comments in business circles to the effect that businessmen would prefer some minister who has over-all responsibility in this matter. It seems to me that since the government gave the Minister of Forestry the particular powers which he has and developed the Department of Industry, on the surface at least there has tended to be some fragmentation.

I think it is worth while making the political observation that the Prime Minister is not filling in the gap so far as the public and this house are concerned. I think it is a fair comment to say that the present Prime Minister in general economic affairs and economic planning has not been thus preoccupied either in the house or in the speeches which he gives across the country. There may be reasons for this, of course, but it does lead us to ask the question whether there is an inner cabinet which deals with economic matters. For example, how does it function, is there any scale of priority and what is the relationship of this group with agencies such as, for example, the Bank of Canada? It may be that bringing this matter before the minister will be fruitless because many of us are tending to forget that he is an economist and see him rather as some—I hate to use the word "cultural" figure because I am afraid that Canadians who think of culture do not think of economists. I think that is a fair comment. I think the minister might be candid enough, since he has some relationship with the economic council, to enlighten us somewhat on this particular subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I never thought that one day I would agree with the Secretary of State on some points. As a matter of fact, we rather knew him in the province of Quebec as what is called a conventional economist, that is, a little behind the times, in old economic systems.

I think that the Prime Minister succeeded in doing with the Secretary of State what others had failed to do. The Prime Minister has found him a job where he is much at home and well qualified, providing that he stays out of the economic field. It will be remembered that at times, the Secretary of State had somewhat queer, out of date and even obsolete theories, but since he has been Secretary of State, in view of the program he has set out, and of the achievements of his department, I must say that he deserves congratulations because at last he has found a field of endeavour which he understands, that is bilingualism and culture. I hasten to say that this is not to the disadvantage of the minister, quite the contrary, because if we consider the scale of values, in its application to man, cultural values come before economic values. Now, having been appointed as Secretary of State, he climbed a rung and found a field where he could distinguish himself.

Mr. Choquette: A little longer and he will understand what Social Credit is about.

Mr. Grégoire: If he ever does, I hope he will lend us a hand, because we will need all our resources to get the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) to understand it.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State mentioned that since he has assumed this high post and especially these last few years, a tremendous need for developing and increasing the facilities and possibilities of translation, whether written or simultaneous has come to the fore. It is a fact that a recruiting and training section and terminology centres are imperative. It is also a fact that for a long time, here in parliament, bilingualism was not always honoured, and that was the case even when there were bilingual members in the house. There were almost no efforts to have this translation service developed.

Many members of the house agree with me that what contributed most in calling the attention of parliament to bilingualism in the civil service, where its need was felt, was the presence in this house of a group of 26 Social Credit members from the province of Quebec. They are the ones who emphasized the French fact.

Mr. Lamontagne: You arrived at the same time.

Mr. Grégoire: I am not against this acknowledgement, because once our group sounded the clarion call, some members of parliament, such as the Secretary of State, implemented what we requested, even one year before the Secretary of State was elected to this house.

Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the role played here by our group since 1962. At that time, there was practically no question of simultaneous interpretation or bilingualism in the committees, and yet today there is an increasing tendency to bilingualism.

There is no doubt that the program submitted to us today by the Secretary of State deserves our commendation. The Secretary of State looked after first things first. It is obvious that if we want translators and interpreters, a terminology must first be created.

Until all those who are engaged in translation or interpretation may acquire this terminology, which will be developed through the publishing of dictionaries, as was mentioned by the Secretary of State, translation or interpretation will continue to play a secondary role.

But with a real terminology centre within the translation and interpretation sections, then our language will develop in its true clarity and precision.

I also appreciated the statement of the Secretary of State concerning the French courses given those who must learn that language, and the English courses to those who will benefit by learning the English language. There are now modern methods, and I believe the Secretary of State has used them. In fact, these modern methods enable an individual who knows practically nothing of another language to speak it in an understandable way in a very short time. If these language laboratories and modern methods are used in these courses, I am convinced that the efforts will be crowned with success.

The minister mentioned staff recruiting also. In that field, recruitment now constitutes an important factor. For instance, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) tells us that the Canada Year Book, which is quite an important and valuable book, not only for hon. members but also for a great many businessmen, industrialists or tradesmen in Canada, has been published in French two and a half or even three months—in fact it was in June and the English version had been published in January—that is nearly five months after the English version, then one has to admit that the bureau of translations is short of translators.

Moreover, when we see that the French version of the government telephone directory was distributed about six months after the English version, then, unless this can be explained otherwise, we have to conclude that there is a shortage of translators.

Mr. Choquette: The reason is that some people do not pay their telephone bills.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I think this is the second time the hon. member for Lotbinière takes this attitude. However, he was probably one of the first to come and tell us: "Our party is in office; we can say nothing; would you ask the government to do something in that field."

I will even say that—

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, that is untrue.

Mr. Grégoire: In fact, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lotbinière came to my office and complained that some of his colleagues from Toronto or Montreal could make direct long distance calls free of charge, and that in his office he could not avail himself of the same services as his colleagues.

The Chairman: Order. I would suggest to the hon. member for Lapointe to pursue the remarks he was making with such eloquence before the interjections.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I must say it is a fact, notwithstanding the rest, for we have realized long ago that the hon. member for Lotbinière likes to speak and that it is to our advantage to let him speak.

And as the hon. member for Roberval says—

The Chairman: I do not believe the attitude of some other member is the subject of the debate at the present time, and I would ask the hon. member for Lapointe to co-operate with the Chair and his colleagues and to revert to the estimates before us.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am ready to co-operate with you, but when interjections come from the other side of the house, you turn toward us to call us to order. If once in a while you called to order the young greenhorns who are interrupting us constantly, I believe your admonitions would be heeded.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, you called us to order on three occasions this evening, when the interruptions came from the other side of the house.

The Chairman: I am calling to order the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Grégoire: I deserved to be called to order, but at least I said what I wanted to say.

Mr. Chairman, mention is made of the terminology centre and other means that might help bilingualism throughout the country. It will be done through this terminology centre and by means of more intensive recruiting, especially in schools specialized in those fields.

Even though we commend the Secretary of State, it must be recognized all the same that what he is submitting to us at present is only a program he intends to establish. We will be looking forward to the results of the program to appreciate its worth. Once again, we must congratulate the minister for the program which he set forth and its efficiency will be judged by its application.

In connection with translation, I would like to point out the example of Belgium to the Secretary of State. It is known that Belgium is a bilingual country where Flemish and Walloon are spoken. I had the opportunity to meet members of the Belgian legislature and to discuss with them their translation system as well as the publication of reports, votes and proceedings or the official report of the Belgian legislature. I have been impressed by one point in particular, namely that in Belgium all the proceedings, all the minutes and all the reports are published in only one booklet. Texts in both languages are printed in the same booklet in two different columns opposite one another. On one side you have the version in one language and on the other you find it in the other language.

I asked a Belgian member of parliament the reason why the publication of reports, speeches, laws, etc. was made in both languages in the same booklet, and I was told that in publishing bilingual reports in only one booklet or section of a publication, reports and records of the debates had unavoidably to be published simultaneously in both languages.

In addition, I was told that any reference in one language to a certain page of Hansard or of the Votes and Proceedings is sure to be found on the same page, in the other language, because the original and the translation are printed side by side. Since the Secretary of State wishes to improve the bureau for translations, he might consider this so as to hasten the publication of the French version of the committees' minutes and proceedings.

Let us take, for instance, the proceedings of Senate or house committees. Very often the French edition is published two to three weeks and sometimes one month after the English version.

It would be much more convenient if the two versions were published simultaneously, since that would enable us to compare both versions, because errors of translation and interpretation do occur.

Sometimes a speech is given in French and, when translated into English, it no longer has the same meaning. It should also be possible to compare other works, for all those who may wish to do so or at least are interested in learning both languages. Then, having the two versions side by side, they could become more bilingual. I think the system used in Belgium, for the publication of all committee proceedings and all speeches made in the national assembly, could be adopted in this country.

Mr. Chairman, once again, I should like to refer to the translation or interpretation system and, incidentally, to the bilingual stenographers also, about which I have a special comment to make, if the matter comes under the Secretary of State.

Mr. Chairman, I notice that the Secretary of State nods his head indicating that it does not come under him. Perhaps I could come back to that when we discuss the Speaker's estimates.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of State also referred to the Canada economic council. I listened to his remarks with interest and what struck me is that after a year of existence, the Canada economic council is now preparing a review of long and medium term projects of economic development and that it is also involved in the development of consultation facilities.

If after one year of existence, the Canada economic council is preparing a review of legislation on long and medium term economic expansion, I feel that the job that was entrusted to it will never be carried out, because when that review of projects is over and when the time comes to implement them, the economic development will have evolved so much that they will have to start another review.

Therefore, what is needed now under the present circumstances, is not long and medium term programs, but the fulfilment of the possibilities of the country and an economic advisory council which will act, not by drafting programs but by looking into the possibilities of development that exist in this country.

It is on the basis of Canada's natural resources and physical possibilities that the economic advisory council must operate, rather than on the basis of long term programs, for in this day and age evolution is so rapid, progress so advanced that if we do not keep up with the times, we will never succeed through long term planning, in catching up with progress, for we will constantly be in the process of preparing plans and programs which will never be implemented.

Since the end of the war, we heard about policies and projects planning. But, when a project has been planned and is ready for implementation, a commission of inquiry or a committee is appointed to adapt this policy planned five or six years previously.

I feel that the economic council should concentrate on the adaptation of our economic, financial, monetary and production system to our times, rather than on the planning of projects for a distant future.

Mr. Chairman, this economic council can be of tremendous service if it acts upon existing data, this country's capabilities, and not upon projections into a rather distant future, because at that time, progress will have developed to such an extent as to require a complete review of the said policy.

In conclusion, I should like to tell the Secretary of State that his speech on bilingualism within parliament and the civil service can only meet with our approval, at least in its main lines, and we hope that he will try his best so that this program may be carried out completely.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I thought that this debate included all the estimates, but if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) wants to speak, I will gladly yield to him.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you very much, you are most kind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: I have just a brief general comment I want to make, Mr. Chairman, and then I want to refer to one aspect of a matter about which the Secretary of State spoke in his opening remarks. My general comment arises from the interest there was in the country, during the last election campaign, about the prospect of the Liberals, if they came to power, going in for economic planning. We have been watching for that ever since the government took office. We have found ourselves wondering which minister it was who was going to head up economic planning and do something about it.

The Department of Industry was set up, and we thought perhaps the minister of that department was to be our economic planner. We looked in vain in that direction. Some people thought it was the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but he is not the economic planner. Neither is the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Forestry makes speeches on economic planning outside the house, as do some others. It appears now, at last, we have found the head of economic planning in this government, namely the Secretary of State. I noticed the hon. member for Port Arthur was a little concerned as to which of the minister's aspects were going to come out on top, his cultural side or his economic side. It may be that we have in the Secretary of State Canada's C. P. Snow. I suppose I should find some way of putting that into French, but I will leave that to the translation bureau that comes under the minister's department.

At any rate, I hope that this minister will not disappoint us the way others have done, by just giving us a certain amount of talk about economic planning. If I may say so, I thought there was a good deal of sense in some of the things he said in his brief remarks tonight. I certainly hope that the work of the economic council of Canada, and the other agencies to which the minister referred, will be pushed ahead. I know the minister from days long since gone by. I believe his basic philosophy is sound. I just hope he will find some opportunity of putting that philosophy into practice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I said there was one aspect of a matter about which the minister spoke which I wanted to ask him a question or two. I refer to the translation bureau which comes under the Secretary of State. I noted with interest what he told us about establishing a terminology centre and I also noted with interest the indication that it is hoped at least 50 new employees will be added to the translation bureau in the next little while. I certainly hope this latter aim will be achieved. Other members have spoken about the significance of all this in relation to the program for bilingualism. I should like to look at it from the standpoint of the problem that some of the employees of this department have to face.

I am thinking particularly of our own translators who are in these booths at the foot of this chamber and who are having to translate what we say from one language to the other all the time the house is in session. As the Secretary of State knows, I am sure, those persons are employees of his department and not employees of the House of Commons. This means, therefore, that they may be assigned to work that is being done here in the House of Commons, but they are called upon also to work in a good many other places. Accordingly if at the same time the House of Commons is sitting the other place happens to be sitting as well, and if there is a peace keeping conference or a conference on mentally retarded children—

Mr. Lamontagne: You are speaking of federal-provincial conferences.

Mr. Knowles: Some of us have been wondering just where this peace keeping conference could do the most good. Yes, perhaps it may be at the federal-provincial level, but there are times when peace keeping ought to be brought into the floor of the House of Commons. There may be times when the Liberal party or the Conservative party could use it within its own ranks.

The point I should like to make, Mr. Chairman, is that it seems inevitable that when a group of employees can be called upon to work in any one of a dozen different places, without any planner like the Secretary of State planning these various conferences so that they do not overlap each other, the problem created for the employees is impossible. The Secretary of State may say that this problem will be solved when these 50 new employees are taken on by the translation bureau. This may be so. However, I suspect that concurrent with the employment of these 50 new employees in the translation bureau—and I take it this means increasing both the number of interpreters and the number of translators; I am using "translators" to refer to those who translate the written word into the other language and "interpreters" to refer to those in the booths who interpret orally for us—the amount of work to be done will grow and probably in the end the strain on these employees will be just as heavy. In the light of all this there is a question to be faced as to whether the people who work for the House of Commons ought to be brought directly under the House of Commons itself.

It is true that this is an unusual year when measured by the length of the session. It is now in its 184th day, far beyond anything in the past, but the likelihood is that House of Commons sessions will continue to be rather lengthy. The likelihood is that committee work will grow, and in view of all this I suggest there is a case for the interpreters—maybe this applies to the translators as well—who work for the House of Commons to be employed by the House of Commons. At present they are employed by a department outside the house and are sent all over Ottawa, indeed anywhere away from Ottawa on assignments where the government requires interpreting done.

I would like to hear the Secretary of State comment on this problem this evening. If he does not agree with my suggestion, then will he tell us why interpreters who work for the house ought not to be in a separate section attached to and under the control of the house itself?

Before sitting down may I refer to another subject in this general field. As I have already said, I am interested in the announcement that a terminology centre is to be established, with the present director of the bureau of translations as its head. I am interested in the reasons which the minister gave for the establishment of such a centre, but could he tell us whether any research is being carried on by his department, the translation bureau or any other branch of government, into automatic or electronic translating devices? I speak now of translating rather than interpreting. In some parts of the world a great deal of research is being conducted into this sort of thing, and the day may come when by using such devices translations will be produced faster than they can be done now.

[Mr. Knowles.]

In conclusion I would like the minister to tell us what hopeful word he has for the people who are in the glassed in booths at the foot of the chamber who interpret our words as we speak.

Mr. Lloyd: I appreciate the hon. member's having brought this subject before the committee. Some of us take an interest in the working conditions of house staff, and those of us who do always notice the volume of hours which the interpreting staff have to devote to the performance of their duties in this chamber. I endorse the previous speaker's observations that there is a constant conflict between their work here and assignments outside the house to committees, boards and conferences.

I suggest there should be greater engagement of freelance interpreters for such outside work. This would relieve the tremendous stress and strain on the interpreting staff of the house who, if they had an opportunity to speak on their own behalf, would certainly tell us that their hours of work this session have been extremely difficult for them to handle. They have done so without complaint and they deserve our immediate and earnest consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few brief comments about the estimates of the Secretary of State.

First, I would like to congratulate the minister for the wonderful job he has done up to the present in the field of bilingualism, which is, we all agree, rather complicated and difficult. He endeavoured to increase the number of bilingual officials in parliament and in the various departments, by giving them the opportunity to study the other language of the country.

However, I feel I must make a few remarks on this matter in order to call his attention to a danger with which I am concerned.

When the various departments will give promotions in the coming months or years, when they will have to take into consideration the qualifications of the various candidates for those promotions, I feel that the people who will be in charge of this selection will need to be very careful not to consider as bilingual a person who, for all practical purposes, can understand or write only a few words of French.

However, if the intention is to play somewhat on words, and lead us to believe that in future there will be only bilingual civil servants when the Anglo-Saxon group has had an opportunity to learn a little French to meet the requirements of the various departments, in order to prevent the promotion of perfectly bilingual French Canadians, then I think that we will have fought in this house for nothing.

We noticed that in the past, English speaking civil servants, in the house and in other departments, were promoted over the heads of fully bilingual French speaking personnel, and following criticism made on several occasions the departments decided to teach French to their officials in order to avoid criticism henceforth in matters of promotions.

I believe that this had to be said, and the minister may be assured that we will always be on the alert and ready to defend the interests of those who could be so wronged. I may give him the assurance that each time we have the opportunity—and I hope the situation will not be repeated—we shall be ready to bring to the attention of the minister these cases which may occur.

The minister has reported on the activities of the economic council of Canada. Some weeks ago, I asked him when he expected to table a report on the activities of this agency which has already been in existence for a year. I was surprised by his silence in this regard.

On the other hand, I imagined that an agency working silently had perhaps a better chance to produce something positive, but when I see the work done by the Atlantic development board, I unfortunately cannot reach this conclusion—I was going to use the phrase "unfortunately I cannot reach the conclusion"—since the board which has not worked silently and was granted some funds, has already done a good job in the Atlantic provinces and invested some money in hydro-electric developments, and also in many other projects, in conjunction with the provinces concerned. We therefore have here an agency which, besides doing planning, sees to it that all imaginable possibilities are realized in the imediate future.

I wonder if, since we decided to create it, it would not have been preferable to grant more authority to this economic council, so it could show results more quickly. I am wondering how it has been operating during the last year. Did it consult the provincial authorities without whose co-operation no planning can be established, because the provincial governments own their natural resources. I think that it is a delusion to endeavour to attain some measure of success without considering the views of the different provincial governments. Did the members of this agency visit the areas of our country? Did they hear the representations of the agencies which are responsible for the economic development of the various regions in order to ascertain the research which was carried out in those various areas and avoid a duplication of work, expenses and energy?

It would be interesting to know the answers to all those questions because when they visit those regions, those gentlemen could realize the local possibilities and also the developments we can expect from them.

Within the Department of Industry, there is of course what is called a regional development agency. Does that agency achieve a concrete job? Has it the approval of the provincial authorities for such work? Does that agency of the Department of Industry come into conflict with the projects now under consideration by the economic council of Canada? Those are some more questions to which we would like to get answers.

In any case, the minister can be assured that we will wait, I should even say with impatience, for that first report of the economic council because it will indicate whether we made a mistake in setting it up and if we can hope that the work already carried out is liable to produce concrete achievements enabling us to form an opinion on the efficiency of the decision taken on that matter.

Of course, reference was made a while ago to the need of personnel in the translation offices and also in the French language reporters division. Having been myself on several committees, I was in a position to notice the progress made in those fields, but unfortunately, on many occasions, due to the fact that several committees sat at the same time, we sometimes had to do without the services of bilingual reporters. I think that even if the minister often said that he made real efforts to hire some, we are still wondering why it is that his efforts were not successful. It is clear that it is difficult to train such a qualified personnel in a relatively short period, but I think that the problem has been pointed out to the authorities for more than two years. In my opinion the time has come to present tangible achievements in this field.

As the minister dealt with only two particular points, I shall limit myself to them. There are other subjects under his jurisdiction and in which I am interested. I shall wait therefore till the right moment comes to discuss them.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I have only a few words to say with respect to the estimates of the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne.)

Like the previous speaker, I would like to congratulate the minister for promoting bilingualism in all the federal departments and I would also like to encourage him to do even more.

The main purpose of my intervention is to correct the impression that bilingualism started here in the house only after the arrival of the Social Credit members, a group which now calls itself the Ralliement Créditiste.

In 1957 when I was elected for the first time, my colleagues of the province of Quebec and myself endeavoured to increase the use of French on parliament hill. I for one made a list of the various signs appearing in numerous places inside the centre block as well as outside on the hill, and I asked the then responsible minister to make arrangements so that exclusively English signs be replaced by bilingual signs, which we can see today nearly everywhere.

Another example indicating the interest we took in this matter is the fact that the then minister of defence production, Hon. R. O'Hurley, was the first to publish in French the report of the Department of Defence Production.

He also appointed to a crown corporation a French speaking Canadian as president. He also took several other steps to spread the use of French in Ottawa.

In his statement the minister says that French courses and English courses were given to civil servants to enable them to familiarize themselves with either of the official languages of the country. I would like to know the number of civil servants who take full-time French or English courses.

I also ask the minister to be very explicit on the marks granted in civil service commission competitions to those who speak the two official languages of the country.

I should like him to tell us also, in the case of a vacant position in a community where French only, or vice-versa English only, is spoken, whether an application from a bilingual employee would be considered?

Before I conclude my remarks, I should like to remind the Secretary of State that during the election campaigns, the 1963 campaign especially, Liberal candidates in the province of Quebec promised a special bonus to bilingual employees. I should like to know whether this project is still in the minister's mind and if so, when does he expect to carry it out? Furthermore, if he does not intend to pay special bonus to bilingual employees, what are the reasons today for his change of policy?

[Text]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to hear that the Secretary of State is interested in the problem of making bilingualism available to many of the senior civil servants who otherwise would not have the opportunity of becoming bilingual. There are in Ottawa a great many senior civil servants who are very much afraid of the situation that has been created by this French-English problem. The bilingual atmosphere, for which perhaps members of the Ralliement Créditiste can take some credit, has spread to the degree that to be promoted within a department you must be bilingual.

As one who cannot speak French, I know that if an elevator operator is hired and he cannot speak one word in English, very soon he becomes bilingual. It is a fact that though he is not bilingual when hired, within a few weeks he will be bilingual or he is just not going to get by and will not know when it is dinner time, in some cases. Therefore he becomes bilingual. I have found this is very true with most of the bilingual jobs with which I have been in contact. You telephone the Department of Agriculture, for instance. I presume the people you talk to are bilingual. I have often talked to three or four people before I got one to whom I could put a question and get an answer. They are bilingual all right, but it certainly must be in another language; it is not English.

The point is that because of the geographic situation in Canada those bilingual people who are going to get these jobs have to come from an area where French is taught and is the native language. It is very easy to pick up a second language by association, but it is very difficult to learn a second language through study. For this reason I am very happy that the minister has decided that courses will be made available, so that the fact we want to have, in a federal sense, a bilingual nation will not mean that those who are not raised in the province of Quebec under the French educational system will be eliminated from obtaining all types of jobs.

We may say that this will not happen, that we are not going to discriminate; but

I wonder how often we discriminate in regard to many of the jobs posted for the civil service, particularly those jobs that call for bilingualism when bilingualism is not a necessity, an advantage or even to be desired. There are many, many jobs in this country where it is no advantage, unless it is for personal satisfaction, to be bilingual. We often hear civil servants in Ottawa saying, "Oh, I cannot be promoted", or "There is no point in my trying for that job". I know an engineer who experienced this difficulty a couple of weeks ago with regard to the Department of Industry. This man had held civil service jobs in the past and has three or four degrees. He said, "Well, look at the posters". We went through them all, the bilingual requirement was the main aspect of the qualifications required, and he had no opportunity to obtain one of these jobs. He certainly would have been ill advised to apply, because he is not bilingual. It seems to me that many of the jobs in the Department of Industry did not really require a person working in most parts of Canada to be bilingual.

I think it is also a fact that this is not a bilingual nation. I believe we in this house well understand the scope of bilingualism, its advantages and the fact that the federal government is pledged to allow the use of either official language and, much better, both official languages; but it is not necessary to have two official languages. This, of course, raises another problem. I receive a considerable amount of correspondence in French because a great many of my constituents are French and write to me in that language. While I have a small knowledge of that language, my translation is very bad and very often it becomes confused and I have difficulty with this correspondence. To be fair to the Secretary of State, my most recent translations are being done by his executive secretary, who was kind enough to offer his services because there is just no service provided in the department. I think this is a service that should be provided.

While we are thinking about the translation department and the simultaneous translators here and bringing them into the staff of the House of Commons, we should realize that there must be established a branch which will handle translation. I telephone the minister's department and talk to his translation branch. The official there is either very bilingual himself and does not understand the situation, or has an odd interpretation of what are government matters. If he thinks I am sending over correspondence just because I would like to have it translated, I have news for him. This is not the purpose; it is government business that comes to me as a representative of government. I believe it is the responsibility of somebody to provide this type of translation service for members of parliament, because there is no consideration of having to be bilingual and in fact you do not have to be able to read and write to be a member of parliament—although sometimes it helps. It is not really necessary to be bilingual; but I believe your constituents—and I am very serious about this—if they write to you in either of the official languages, have a right to expect an answer in the language in which they write. But this is not possible because of the unavailability of a translation service.

The minister will have to provide us with the same type of schools that he is willing to provide for the senior civil servants, or he will have to provide us with a translation service that will translate this correspondence for us. I have gone to the messenger service, to the simultaneous interpreters here, and to the protective staff; I have cornered pretty nearly everyone who speaks both our official languages. I am very happy to say that they are most obliging people and will translate a letter for me. But when you have a thick sheaf of papers they begin to wonder whether they should undertake the job, and in most cases they do not. As members of parliament I think we have an obligation to our constituents, and if we have only one French speaking person in the riding we should be in the position where we can reply to him in his own language. This can only be done if we have a translation service.

I think we have to draw the line somewhere; I do not think we are going to be able to re-educate all the people in Canada. I am not opposed to that, and I am not really opposed to our making this a bilingual nation; but I do not think we are going to do it by the back door. We are not going to do it by forcing the civil service to be bilingual, without our having enough courage to decide to institute a national education system in this country that will provide French and English tuition to all the people of Canada.

If we offer a job requiring bilingualism we are eliminating applications on the part of people from nine of the ten provinces for that job. I think that French Canadians in the federal field are being very unreasonable in asking that everything be translated into French and that all the vacancy postings in the civil service be also put in French. I say that because this means that only people from Quebec are able to take advantage of any civil service job.

I might say that the four or five years I spent in high school learning the French language would not give me any bilingual qualification in any shape or form—in the same way as I learned Latin and then tried to talk to Italians; that was just about as silly. The minister has a very big department with surveys taking place, and so on. I do not think our national education is in such a bad way and the minister says he believes we can progress. But if he is not prepared to do what I suggest, it seems to me that we will have to be very careful—and I hope the minister will say whether he is willing to exercise this kind of care—to see that civil service job postings are not loaded in favour of bilingual candidates when bilingualism is not a requirement for the position concerned. There are some civil servants in the gallery now who are bilingual and others who are not. I think every one of those postings which is slanted in favour of bilingual candidates is directed toward a particular person who is in mind for the job. If it cannot be open the posting might just as well not be put up at all. So we will either have to be very careful about using this bilingualism weapon in the civil service or we are going to have to go much further than that and provide equal opportunity for all Canadians.

I know some will say they would not accept that or that it cannot be done. I see several French Canadian members of parliament shaking their heads, indicating they are not in favour of that. All they are really saying is: We want an advantage over all other Canadians. They are not saying they want equality. They are saying: Give us a damned big advantage which we want to hang on to.

An hon. Member: That is not so.

Mr. Peters: Someone says no. With the exception of a person from my area, or Timmins, Sudbury and perhaps a few other ridings in eastern Ontario, a person from Ontario would have no possibility on coming out of high school of having any French to enable him to speak intelligently with a French Canadian. He could not pass any type of examination in the French language. Are these people not good enough to be in the civil service? What about the people in Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Nova Scotia or Newfoundland? Are they not going to be able to qualify for positions in the civil service? That is what it amounts to if this practice is used indiscriminately. I think the minister should give consideration to this matter.

I would also make a plea that the translation branch and other branches for which we in the House of Commons have assumed responsibilities and over which the Speaker has some limited jurisdiction be transferred to a special branch. One of these days we are not going to have any oral translation at all. If hon. members would check they would find that on many days just two people are running the House of Commons simultaneous translation system all day long. Where are the others? Perhaps one will be in Montreal, two or three at a committee meeting somewhere, another out of town. They are greatly understaffed. The international regulations of their union will not allow them to carry on this type of operation for very long. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, if we had 50 we would only be bringing their number up to strength. Some extension must be made in the near future. I would think that the amount of translation being done in the committees branch now is four to five times as much as when I first came to parliament. I think that is also true with the federal-provincial conferences which are taking place these days; a simultaneous translation system is provided there. Therefore I suggest these people should be given some protection.

I should just like once again to commend the minister on the job he has undertaken in the retraining of senior civil servants, because I think that is important. It is something from which some benefit can flow. If the type of inequality to which I have referred is watched and the government is willing to provide bilingual training where necessary, this will lessen many of the fears of those who find they have reached a dead end street, particularly in Ottawa, as far as promotion is concerned as a result of the emphasis which is being placed on bilingualism today. I do not know whether we are smart enough or young enough to meet the other requirements, but I should like to see members of parliament given an opportunity of attending classes similar to those attended by civil servants. In my own particular case there is a small segment of my riding the people of which speak French only, and it would be of great advantage if we members of parliament were given the rudiments of the language, although it is a fact that the simultaneous translation system has eliminated to quite an extent the previous motivation for learning the second language.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words following the speech made by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). When he said that in some departments he had to contact three or four officials before he found anyone who spoke English, I thought he had addressed himself to the government of the province of Quebec.

Amongst other things, he claimed that certain high officials and technicians of the Department of Industry were reluctant to seek promotions because they are not bilingual. I should like to point out to him that if there is a department in Ottawa which is not bilingual, it is surely the Department of Industry. Indeed, I think that only one out of 13 high officials is bilingual in that department. At least, the person in question has a French name. I suppose that, once again, the hon. member has no grounds to complain.

I should also like to say that if the hon. member feels that French Canadians are discriminatory when they seek to have their language recognized, he must admit that very little has been done in the past hundred years about the problem of the French language. If the consideration given to the question now is slightly annoying to some members, they must understand that the present emphasis is due to the fact that precious little was done about the recognition of French during all those years.

The present situation is quite surprising for them, but they must not be worried. If, in a few months or a few years from now, the question creates general interest—that is the great difference between the past and the present—it will be less obvious and requests such as those which are made today will pass unnoticed.

I should also like to say a word about the civil service commission. However, my remarks will not deal with the question of French, since others have made the usual authoritative representations in that respect a while ago. Consequently, there is no need for me to add anything to what they said.

However, apart from the fact that the Laurendeau-Dunton commission will certainly find out problems coming under the civil service commission in the fields of French language and bilingualism, I think it would be desirable also in certain cases to inquire into the civil service commission itself.

I know that this commission is not under political control and that its employees are all competent and render unusual services to the country. However, in certain cases, uncommon as they may be, we noticed minor irregularities and discriminations in the advertising of some competitions requiring certain qualifications, which were already known by a few, of course.

Nevertheless, I feel it would be a good thing if the minister would become interested in that problem and ask qualified persons, outside the civil service commission and completely independent in that field, to make a special investigation.

I am personally aware, for having inquired myself from certain government agencies, that it was realized that—unknowingly no doubt—there were certain discriminations, not necessarily concerning languages, but rather proficiency, residence of the candidate, his record, and finally for different reasons, it seemed to me that a little discrimination may occur in some cases.

I feel that many civil servants would be pleased to learn of an unbiased inquiry, in order to appraise, first of all, the duties and also the classification and promotional methods affecting civil servants.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, may I take only a few minutes to correct a remark made by a Liberal member, under the item now under discussion. I refer to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) who took the liberty to make remarks about telephone bills which were not paid by members of the Ralliement Créditiste.

Just for the information of the house, I must say to the hon. member for Lotbinière that I can afford to pay my bill much more than he could himself. The hon. member for Lotbinière has no right to interfere in a discussion in order to criticize regulations or measures passed by parliament as a whole or by the committee on parliamentary procedure.

Members of the Ralliement Créditiste who refuse to pay their bills to the Bell Telephone Company of Canada adhere to a measure passed by parliament and also to the report carried unanimously by the committee on parliamentary procedure.

I would not have missed this opportunity to call to order an hon. member who attempts to play petty politics when he is not even able himself to meet his obligations while we are in a position to do so very easily ourselves without his help.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, during the next few minutes I would like, as some of my colleagues have done, to comment on bilingualism in the civil service, in various federal departments and crown corporations.

It has been urged not very long ago that bilingualism be enforced in Canada. I would like to ask especially the ministers to reply when possible in French to any letter written in French. Very recently I wrote in French to a minister and I received a reply in English.

If the good intentions expressed this evening by the Secretary of State are to be put into practice, federal ministers should start by setting an example.

We should also like to remind the house that in Canada, as everybody knows, French Canadians make up about 30 per cent of the total population. Now, it would be interesting to learn—not to raise the cry of discrimination, but just to find out—what is the percentage of French Canadians, at present, among those holding jobs in the public administration. The thing is that, as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) pointed out, it may be easier for French Canadians to be perfectly or simply bilingual. It would be interesting, then, to find out if, with this greater aptitude, French Canadians hold a proportion of jobs in keeping with the percentage of this country's French Canadian population.

I would also like to recall to the attention of the minister, whose estimates we are considering tonight, that last summer several delegations toured the national gallery and some other places coming under his department; on such occasions, we could meet only one bilingual employee able to answer in the language of the delegations' members.

I would therefore ask the minister concerned to kindly put into practice, as soon as possible, the good intentions he has shown us tonight. It is excellent to mean well, but we are expecting still a lot of realizations in this field.

These last years only, that is for two years now, much has been said in Canada on bilingualism. And while, during those two years progress was made in that direction, the accomplishments should at least be put into practice, not in obliging all Anglo-Saxon Canadians to learn French, but in showing respect, by using its own language, to an important section of the Canadian population, that is the French Canadian population, in order that the latter be treated fairly, and in its dealings with the departments and the various crown companies, receive replies in its own language.

Mr. Chairman, I would be happy if the minister, one year from now, could outline the accomplishments of his department in that field.

Mr. Grégoire: May I call it ten o'clock?

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether we could continue for a while. I should like to make a few comments on the remarks that have been made with regard to the translation services. If we could pass the estimates of the department, the civil service commission and the chief electoral officer I would be quite willing to delay the few remarks I should like to make on the economic council to a later time, if the committee does not want to sit beyond 10.15.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, we still had a few comments to make on that. Would we still have the opportunity to continue with the department's estimates afterwards?

Mr. Lamontagne: On what item?

Mr. Grégoire: Precisely on the estimates of the bureau for translations.

An hon. Member: And of the C.B.C.

Mr. Lamontagne: I would not mind at all. But I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if we could at least approve the estimates of the Secretary of State Department, as well as those of the chief electoral officer and the civil service commission, we could then do without the presence of those gentlemen. After that, it would give me great pleasure to hear the interesting comments of the hon. member for Lapointe on some other occasion.

[Text]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, I think what the minister is asking for is a bit of a tall order. I am sure we would be happy to sit for five or six minutes to hear anything he might like to say in reply to anything that has been said tonight, but I think that to ask that items be passed is perhaps a little too much. Perhaps we might not see the clock for five or six minutes and let the minister talk.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say we were quite prepared to pass the estimates as the minister has suggested, but of course there has been a filibuster by the Creditistes tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we have a past master in the art of "filibustering" in the person of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), it is obvious that we cannot be right.

[Text]

Mr. Lamontagne: I should like to say a few words about some of the remarks which have been made tonight. First of all, I want to go back to what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said about interpreters. I agree fully with him that the interpreters, especially in the last year or so, have worked under very difficult conditions. I said in my opening statement that we were now reviewing the whole situation of the translation bureau, and for the time being at least I am certainly including the interpreters as a very important part of that bureau. This does not mean there will not be any change in the near future. I think it would be very helpful, Mr. Chairman, if we were allowed another few months to review the situation of the translation bureau in order to be able to provide the house with the best service possible, and these very devoted civil servants with the best working conditions possible.

So far as automatic translation devices are concerned, the hon. member may be quite sure that we are looking into all possible means of dealing with this difficult problem of translation in order to find the most effective solution for the needs of the government and parliament.

[Translation]

As far as the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) is concerned, I would like to tell him that my statement tonight is but a very partial report on the program on bilingualism we are considering. Last December I made a statement on these programs in general and that statement answered the questions raised by the hon. member. As soon as decisions are reached in this connection, I will be pleased to submit a new report to the committee for I do not believe that this is the last time my estimates will come up for consideration. I will then be pleased to submit to the house a new report which I am sure will show that the present government does not intend to disown the promises it made to its supporters.

[Text]

To conclude, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say three things to the hon. member for Timiskaming. First of all, if we have a recess I am quite sure that he will be welcome at the school. Second, as I said in my opening statement we, as a government, have a program for increasing bilingualism in the whole civil service, but we do not want to impose that program on the civil servants. Finally, I think the hon. member should only begin to worry when French Canadians have more than their proper share of jobs in the civil service.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote No. 1 carry?

Item agreed to.

10. Translation bureau, $1,994,000.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute until we find this item.

Mr. Peters: This was not agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, can we call it ten o'clock and continue tomorrow consideration of item 1?

An hon. Member: It has been carried.

[Text]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the co-operation of the hon. member. As he knows, the estimates of the Department of National Defence will be called tomorrow at the request of hon. members. If at all possible I would like to get a few estimates passed tonight, unless of course hon. members have serious questions to raise.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, we have some important questions to ask the minister with regard to the C.B.C.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, I believe that the hon. member was not in the house when I made a statement tonight to the effect that the C.B.C. estimates are not before the committee at this time but that they would be later.

I am convinced that the hon. member will be free then to comment as much as he likes about the C.B.C., and other government cultural agencies.

[Text]

The Chairman: Shall vote 15 carry?

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Crouse: Filibuster.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that item 15 carry and that be considered a good night's work.

Mr. Crouse: The N.D.P. is delaying the committee.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask if the business as announced for Friday holds?

Mr. MacNaught: Yes. Tomorrow we will consider the estimates of the Department of National Defence and if they should be concluded we will take up the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Churchill: Not a hope.

Mr. Knowles: And does the business for Monday hold?

Mr. MacNaught: On Monday we will consider the resolution dealing with the Canada pension plan, and on Tuesday redistribution.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

SHIPPING—REPORTED LACK OF SERVICE TO CARIBBEAN AREA

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question was addressed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and arose from a statement by a Canadian commercial counsellor in the central American area to the effect that Canadian exporters were missing the boat because of the lack of adequate shipping between Canada, the West Indies and the central Carribean area. I could not agree more with what Mr. Lemieux said.

I asked the minister whether the government would consider taking steps to encourage the expansion of shipping to that area so that more frequent sailings could lead to the development of our trade with the West Indies and Central American areas. Knowledge of and interest in these respective areas must precede the development of trade. I think that is generally conceded. In addition there must be frequent sailings, because an importer anywhere in those areas needs to know how he can get the goods he needs quickly, and if there are frequent sailings he can get them quickly.

[Mr. Crouse.]

In the general context of my remarks I also include the necessity for good air freight cargo service to and from the Caribbean area. We in the maritime provinces, and I think also in the province of Quebec, have long realized the importance of the British West Indies to Canada, and the historic trading relations within certain limits and certain products. I have always felt that I have found here in Ottawa that the rest of Canada have their heads deep in the sand with regard to the potential of the West Indies area to Canada. Here is an area, with notable exceptions, with a British tradition, an area which is come into independence and maturity, an area which inevitably will be nothing more than an appendage to the United States economy, unless we in Canada are at long last prepared to take the hand of friendship which has been proffered so often to us by those people, and to develop our commercial contacts with the West Indies.

What we must do is have some form of economic union, get as large a portion as possible of the West Indies into the Canadian dollar sphere and out of the sterling bloc, so that we can trade with them and send our winter vacationists there without affecting our balance of payments. It is in this connection that the mutual usefulness of the West Indies and Canada does exist. Mr. Lemieux does a service to Canada in pointing out the need for more frequent sailings. The Department of Trade and Commerce spends money and does a great deal of research to develop trade. I want to say that here is an area where the department should seriously consider providing some form of subsidy to private shipping to encourage more regular runs to that area. If this were done for four or five years, trade would have grown to the point when a subsidy would no longer be necessary. It is the old story of what comes first, the chicken or the egg. The shipping has to be there before the trade can grow. In that period of time, if it is to be made profitable for private enterprise, there must be assistance from the government. It is in the national interest. It helps our trade to grow and helps to improve our relationship with this important area, one which is all the more important because there has recently been a federation of these so-called outer seven, St. Kitts, Barbados and five others.

This is a country which will be looking for independence after 1965 and which will be looking to Canada for assistance in the development of national trade. I hope we will be prepared to meet them at that time. The prime minister of the Bahamas said to me last year that he found Canada had never shown much interest in the Bahamas in the past. I hope this will not continue. I know that in Britain Mr. Gordon Walker, as well as his predecessor in the Conservative government Mr. Duncan Sandys, and Mr. Nigel Birch have expressed again and again their desire that Canada should be willing to participate on a tripartite basis in the assistance and in the administration which is given to that area by Britain as it becomes more independent. I think that in this direction lies a great future for Canada. We must not lose our opportunity to develop a type of economic union with the only area which remains as a potential warm country, not tropical, but all the year round warm country, with which we can have some form of economic union as it develops.

Mr. Knowles: What about confederation?

Mr. Regan: I know that without a doubt much can be done. Exporters in the Nova Scotia area do a good job of selling goods down there. They have to know the markets and the market is rather limited, but if exporters take the trouble to learn the market, if the department will help to provide shipping, it could be done.

I have noticed in the 1963 report of the Auditor General that on the books of the assets of this country are still some $400,000 resulting from the winding up of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, which went out of existence as an active corporation in 1958. What could be more appropriate than using that money, as it comes back into the treasury, as part of the subsidy for the development of more new shipping connections with the West Indies, which is a much greater market for trade now than it was at that time. I consider this would be of great economic importance to the eastern part of Canada and indeed to Canada as a whole, and I think something should be done about it.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I join with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) in emphasizing the importance to Canada of improving our trade relationships with the West Indies, and like him I look forward to the time when there will be some federation, at least, of those islands. I had the great pleasure at Easter time of visiting Barbados and spending an hour or so with the prime minister, Mr. Barrow, when we talked about the problems that face him in the future.

The particular question that the hon. gentleman raised is as a result of some articles appearing in "Foreign Trade", a publication of the Department of Trade and Commerce, of October 31, 1964, which is devoted almost entirely to Canada's trade with Central America and Panama. I think this indicates —and I hope the hon. gentleman will accept it as such—the great interest my department is taking in the formation of trade with that area. In the course of one article in this publication Mr. Lemieux, who is the commercial counsellor in Guatemala said:

> One serious difficulty in increasing Canadian sales is the lack of adequate shipping services, especially on the Caribbean-Atlantic coast. That problem is even more acute during the Canadian winter when exports usually have to be routed at greater cost via ports like New York.

This lack of shipping of course is not general with respect to the whole area. The shipping services provided by the Canada-Jamaica Line to Guatemala and El Salvador are adequate, and so of course are the services to Panama. Problems arise in connection with our route to Nicaragua, Honduras and Costa Rica, and their trade is not sufficient to establish or sustain a scheduled cargo liner service from eastern Canadian ports. In consequence, some of the shipments have to be routed through New York and it is very difficult to develop a satisfactory volume of trade. I would just like to say to the hon. gentleman that his suggestions will be looked at very carefully. We have been very reluctant to use financial assistance for the purpose of subsidizing shipping services; but we do recognize that there is some sort of a chicken and egg relationship and we shall certainly take his proposals into very serious consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—QUEBEC—REPORTED INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Georges Valade (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, during the question period, I asked the Acting Prime Minister to confirm or deny the figures concerning unemployment in the Montreal region.

The minister said that the figures I put forward were inaccurate. He denied the figures I quoted from a Montreal newspaper and which were issued, more particularly by the regional manager of the unemployment insurance commission office in Montreal.

I am also amazed, Mr. Speaker, to notice that while we are discussing such a serious problem which concerns every individual, every Canadian taxpayer affected by this plague of unemployment, this government does not seem interested. I notice that at the present time not one minister is in the house to give us information as to the exact situation of unemployment affecting the Montreal area.

I am not surprised to see that those ministers are not in the house to give us some information on the election promises they made when they sat in opposition, namely that if the Liberal party came to office, it would set up a bureau of statistics so that hon. members and members of the unemployment insurance commission could be made aware of the exact situation of employment. At that time it was said that the system used by the unemployment insurance commission and the dominion bureau of statistics provided inaccurate figures.

After two years of Liberal administration we are still waiting for that election promise to be carried out so that hon. members will know the exact situation in all regions affected by unemployment.

As I said, I am amazed to see that no minister is in his seat to confirm that increase in the unemployment affecting the province of Quebec and particularly the Montreal area or at least to give us some detailed information.

An English language newspaper of Montreal specified that the number of unemployed in the province of Quebec has increased by 27 per cent between April and September 1964.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the government authorities should immediately take an interest in those statistics and tell us what they intend to do in order to stem unemployment in the province of Quebec which is especially affected by that situation.

I have here the pamphlet which my Liberal opponent circulated in my riding in the last election campaign. It says that the Liberal party is the only one which can solve unemployment by a program for the expansion of our industrial production. It says also that the Liberal government is the only one who will bring about full employment.

After two years under the Liberal regime we are far from full employment, when we consider that almost 40,000 taxpayers in the Montreal area are unemployed.

Not long ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), under the pressure of a few members of the splinter parties including the N.D.P., was upset by the fact that prisoners, especially at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, were kept in small cells lacking elementary sanitary facilities.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if it is desirable to get more sanitary premises for prisoners, I feel that it is much more human for this government to get jobs for the unemployed who are law-abiding citizens of this country.

There are unemployed in the Montreal area and in other parts of Canada, who live in slums and old tenements. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice does not have so much regard for the families affected by unemployment who comprise honest people and law-abiding citizens of our country. The government ignores those people who ask only one thing, to earn an honest living.

Our present government is not interested in the unemployment which prevails in the Montreal district and in the province of Quebec.

Some statistics show, Mr. Speaker, that 2,000 persons were employed this year in the building industry in the metropolitan area.

I will point out that if some 2,000 persons were employed, it is due to the construction work required by the world fair which was of course initiated under the Conservative party. But without this wonderful achievement I am wondering what the employment situation would be in the province of Quebec.

In my opinion the Minister of Industry should admit that the province of Quebec and the whole of the city of Montreal constitute a depressed area. I think this would be more in conformity with the policy being preached by the Liberal party.

But the present government would not dare take the chance of taking this step because, in so doing, it would admit its utter failure with regard to employment in this country.

I am absolutely appalled by the lack of interest and concern shown the unemployed and the unemployment situation in the metropolitan area.

There are 21 electoral districts in the city of Montreal. Of these, one is Conservative, the others, Liberal. What astounds me is that no member for the city of Montreal rises, here, in the house, as it is his duty to do, to ask the government to intervene in this slump in the metropolitan region and to demand that the government take drastic measures to remedy the critical unemployment situation.

The situation scares us because we ask ourselves what will become of our families this winter when there are already so many unemployed at a time which is favourable to construction?

I ask the government to deny the figures I have given, or else to take the necessary steps to improve this unfortunate situation.

[Text]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the only statistics appearing in the article to which the hon. member referred, a copy of which I must say I have been unable to obtain, for which the national employment service takes any responsibility are those for the Montreal metropolitan area. In the metropolitan area there were 41,812 registrations, which of course are always higher than the number of unemployed, as of October 30, 1963, and 38,868 on October 30, 1964, or a reduction of 2,944 for that month. Any other figures quoted are the responsibility of the Gazette, a usually reliable paper, especially of late. However, the sweeping figures quoted are simply not in accordance with the facts.

According to the labour force summary for September supplied by the Department of Labour and d.b.s., the latest figure available shows a substantial decrease in unemployment in the Quebec region over last year. On September 21 last year there were 108,000 unemployed, while on September 21 this year there were no more than 84,000 unemployed, a decrease of 24,000. From August to September of this year there was a decrease of 16,000 in the unemployed in the Quebec region. The most recent unemployment figure available for all of Canada stands at 3.1 per cent of the labour force, the lowest in eight years.

I think it can be said that we have reached a new low in unemployment and in fact it was reported recently that the premier of Ontario was seeking to import many thousands of people from the Orient to work in the labour force of that province. While I am not sure what the premier of Quebec is doing in Europe, it could be he is looking for stonemasons to build the penitentiary to which the hon. member has referred. But, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member seems to be just as careless with facts as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) seems to have been in the last few days.

Mr. Valade: Is that the full employment you are talking about—40,000 unemployed?

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 6, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT OF FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and ask whether the government has recently received representations from the government of France, or from General de Gaulle, relating to a new form or direction for the NATO alliance. I ask the question because of an article in today's issue of Le Devoir reporting an alleged statement made by Mr. Pompidou, the French premier, that in line with recent events in the Soviet union and China, NATO's strategic concept must be completely revamped. Has the Canadian government had any discussions in this regard?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman has raised a matter of considerable importance. There have been no direct communications from the government of France on this subject, but the attitude the government of France takes toward the military organization of NATO has been the subject of considerable discussion between Canada and France and between the government of France and the other members of NATO.

The publicly stated position of the president of France was referred to by the French foreign minister two days ago in the statement made with regard to the m.l.f. and its relation to NATO. I may say that one of the reasons I asked Mr. Paul-Henri Spaak, the foreign minister of Belgium, to come to Ottawa was in regard to this problem. Today I am having discussions with Mr. Lange, the foreign minister of Norway. Our discussions will have to do with some aspects of this situation.

I would simply like to say that NATO represents for Canada a very essential element of our foreign and military policy. We regard the participation of France in NATO as one of the most important components in the integrity and unity of that organization. We hope there will be no development on the part of any member of the organization that would in any way result in less interest in NATO or a withdrawal from it. I can assure my right hon. friend this whole question is being carefully examined.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister on the necessity of maintaining a strong and effective NATO organization and not permitting the cement which joins the various nations to become weakened in any way. However, the minister made a statement, referring to the attitude that France is taking toward NATO, that I think should be amplified. What are the implications of that statement? Does it in any way convey a decision on the part of France, or a fear that France may separate itself from this organization so necessary to the preservation of western defence?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is well known, Mr. Speaker, that the government of France has taken a position with regard to the integration of forces in NATO. Its view has been stated on many occasions. It is also known that the government of France, through its foreign minister, has recently confirmed its views about m.l.f., the multilateral nuclear force proposal which has been put forward by the United States. Beyond this I cannot go without interfering with discussions which are now under way.

No intimation has been given by the government of France as to the position it would take if its views did not prevail. I expressed the opinion strongly a moment ago, and I confirm it, that it would be a matter of the greatest regret if the government of France were to take any position, or be caused to take any position, which in our judgment would render less strong the integrity of NATO, particularly at this time in world affairs.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask whether the views of the government of France with respect to the m.l.f. differ very greatly from those of the Canadian government? Am I right in understanding that the Canadian government is still refusing to commit itself to participation in the multilateral force?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the Prime Minister stated on several occasions that it was not the intention of the Canadian government to participate in the multilateral force.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE OF CONVICTED MURDERER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In his absence perhaps I could address it to the Prime Minister. It refers to the action of the governor general in council in commuting the sentence on Kingsley Lloyd Meeker from one of death to life imprisonment. As one who is opposed to capital punishment I do not raise any objection to this action. I am perturbed, however, about reports to the effect that this man could be paroled within ten years. Since he was found guilty of a particularly heinous crime I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether there is any provision in the order for commutation which would make it impossible for this man to be released unless there were adequate assurance he would no longer be a menace to the public safety.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, there is no such reference in the order of commutation, but consideration is being given to certain representations which have been made to the government with regard to this matter.

Mr. Douglas: Will the government be letting the house and the public know what decision it reaches in this regard before the matter is finalized?

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I am interested in the statement made by the Prime Minister. Is it not customary when a commutation order is made in circumstances such as these to include therein a provision that the nature of the crime committed and the general disposition of the convicted murderer make it necessary that no action be taken at any time in the future to effect the remission of the sentence and the discharge of the prisoner?

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate the point made by the right hon. gentleman. This is one of the matters we are looking into.

[Mr. Douglas.]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS OF MANIWAKI BAND RESPECTING JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Has the minister received confirmation from the Maniwaki Algonquin chief that he did not want his group, which comes under federal jurisdiction, to change to provincial jurisdiction?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Not as far as I know, Mr. Speaker. However, I could check with the department to see if the matter came up.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In this context with its connotation perhaps the phrase "white paper" is not the correct one to use, but I should like to ask the minister whether he would prepare a document of some sort setting out in as much detail as possible the proposals emanating from the dominion-provincial conference on Indian affairs for presentation to the house, so the house and the native Indian people in particular will know what is the government thinking on all aspects of the Indian affairs problem, both as the dominion and the provincial governments are involved?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the suggestion of the hon. member and tell him what I think about it later on.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED STATEMENTS RESPECTING COMPETENCE OF STAFF

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Does he intend to order an investigation concerning the charges laid against the C.B.C. by Mrs. Jean Desprez, who has been employed by this corporation for the last 28 years? According to those charges, the C.B.C. would be harbouring rubbish and deadwood, incompetent, useless and good-for-nothing employees. Could the Secretary of State investigate this matter and endeavour to improve the standards of the C.B.C.?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I had the occasion to hear the two simultaneous monologues which were presented over the French network of the C.B.C. I am convinced that the C.B.C. authorities are investigating the facts or the alleged facts which were mentioned in that broadcast.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Does he refuse to order an investigation into the facts mentioned, or, in view of those serious charges, does he intend to order such an investigation and see to it that it be carried out?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the C.B.C. will promptly carry out an investigation. I would also point out to the hon. member for Lapointe that the committee on broadcasting is presently investigating problems concerning broadcasting, including the administration methods of the C.B.C.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST THAT PENDING LEGISLATION BE CONSIDERED BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the effect that Bill No. C-126 may have on the continuing operation of a large section of the Canadian mining industry, will the minister now consider sending this bill to the committee on industrial relations so that all interested parties from the mining industry, as well as other industries, can be heard?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand how this bill could have any general effect on the mining industry in Canada.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister not realize that the large mines at Flin Flon, Manitoba, come under the dominion labour code, and that all mining in the Northwest Territories also comes under the dominion labour code?

[Later:]

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. Will the minister inquire into the effect that Bill No. C-126 will have on the mining industry and then consider sending this bill to the committee on industrial relations?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have already considered the possible effect on the mining industry. That industry usually comes under provincial jurisdiction in all provinces of Canada, with the exception of the uranium mines, which have been declared to be to the general advantage of Canada. Therefore this industry comes under the bill.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, would the minister now be able to assure the house that the hours of work provision provided in the bill will not be applicable to country elevator operators?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to deal with these questions when the bill returns for discussion and is dealt with in the committee of the whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour, since the transport industry comes under joint jurisdiction, federal and provincial. Did the minister think of seeking the opinion of the federal legal advisers on the constitutionality of Bill No. C-126?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this is another question which we can deal with in the committee of the whole.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has stated that only the uranium mines come under federal labour jurisdiction. I have pointed out to him that all the base metal mines at Flin Flon, Manitoba, come under the dominion labour regulations. It is my belief that the mines in the Northwest Territories also come under the dominion labour code.

Mr. Nielsen: Don't forget the Yukon.

Mr. MacEachen: This is another question which can be dealt with in the committee of the whole. I think it was agreed the last time this was raised that it was irregular to deal with questions concerning a matter which had been listed for consideration by the house at a later date.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question?

Is the Minister of Labour considering referring this bill to the committee on industrial relations, in order to enable the members to question legal advisers on the constitutionality of this legislation, which we cannot do in committee of the whole?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons has already referred this bill to a committee, namely the committee of the whole house.

URANIUM

CALLING OF NEW CONTRACT TENDERS FOLLOWING FORECAST OF SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Because of the announcement in yesterday's newspapers, the second such statement in a few weeks, by Mr. Gilchrist, president of the crown corporation, Eldorado Mining and Refining, that he foresees a shortage of uranium, would the government consider the calling of new contract tenders for uranium?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, as Eldorado Mining and Refining comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I would refer this question to him.

[Later:]

Mr. Webb: Mr. Speaker, my question a few minutes ago was directed to the Minister of Industry because in the statement made by the government it was said that the Department of Industry would be responsible for the people of Bancroft. That is the reason I directed the question to the Minister of Industry. I will now direct it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Because of the recent statement, the second one in a very few weeks, made by Mr. Gilchrist, president of the crown company Eldorado, that he foresees a shortage of uranium, would the government consider calling for new tenders for uranium?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Gilchrist was speaking about the general uranium situation. It is his opinion there will be a shortage in the future. It is not the government's intention to buy any more uranium at the present time.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE OF AMENDMENT FORMULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. In the light of the publication of a statement promising a white paper on the question of constitutional amendment, will the house be enabled to make a detailed examination of this white paper and secure a variety of views on this vitally important question by means of a parliamentary committee that could look into this matter? I think a statement on this question was promised some time ago. I would like to know whether we are to have a parliamentary committee to look into this subject.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, members of the house will certainly have an opportunity to express their views on this very important question. The exact procedure to be adopted in this regard is, as I have said, under consideration and a statement will be made very shortly. There are reasons, which I need not go into, why it has not been possible to make it before now, but I assure my hon. friend that we hope to make that statement next week.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

TRAINING OF WEST GERMAN FORCES IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Webster (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Is it true that members of the West German armed forces will be trained in Canada this winter? If so, how many men will be involved and where will they be stationed?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the tests which were planned to be held in Canada this winter of certain equipment under cold weather conditions have been postponed due to the timing in the series of tests being held. Therefore they will not be held as previously planned.

IMMIGRATION

REPORTED REDUCTION IN CANADIAN WORKERS ALLOWED INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Could the minister confirm or explain the fact that lately the American consulate has decided to reduce by 90 per cent the number of Canadians allowed to cross into the United States in order to work?

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if that question were put on the order paper, I could provide more details.

THE SENATE

SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF FORMER EXTERNAL AFFAIRS MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister, and I do so with the hope that he personally places a different connotation on the word "consideration" than that which he attributes to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I should like to ask whether, in view of the fact that during the entire tenure of office of the previous administration no opportunity was afforded for an appointment to the Senate from the province of British Columbia, the Prime Minister has considered or will consider offering an appointment to the Senate to Hon. Howard Green.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting suggestion and certainly should be given consideration along with similar consideration in respect of the many other persons from British Columbia qualified for the Senate. It may well be, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Green has ambitions to return to another house of parliament.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF FOREIGN MINISTER OF NORWAY

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the presence in the gallery of the foreign minister of Norway, Mr. Halvard Lange, one of the strongest and most constructive supporters of the Atlantic alliance over the years, and a man whom I think all parliamentarians would be delighted to honour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

1. Departmental administration, including grants to military associations, institutes and other organizations as detailed in the estimates and authority, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, for total commitments of $2,289,221,625 for the purposes of votes 1, 5, 10, 15, 20, 25, 30, 35, 40, 42, 45 and 50 of this department regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $799,648,500 will come due for payment in future years) and authority to make recoverable advances under any of the said votes and, notwithstanding the Financial Administration Act, to spend revenue received during the year in respect of assistance rendered to the United Nations, any party of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or any provincial or municipal government, $3,917,825.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that during the months that have passed since last year's estimates were up for consideration by the house in December there have been numerous occasions when defence matters have been discussed in parliament, I wish to preface my remarks today by saying that I will attempt not to duplicate the information already submitted in previous debates.

In addition to the debates in the house, the special committee on defence was re-established in May on this year and has had the opportunity to study many important subjects relating to defence policy generally. On behalf of the government I should like to express our appreciation for the conscientious work of the members of the committee. Certainly the recommendations contained in the report submitted to the house on October 1 have received careful study and consideration by my colleague the associate minister and myself, and by officials of the department.

Debates in the House of Commons include the one on the establishment of the United Nations force in Cyprus in March; the one in May prior to the establishment of the special committee on defence; the one relating to the amendment of the National Defence Act incorporated in Bill No. C-90 in May and later at the end of June; and finally the discussion which followed the acceptance of the motion of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to adjourn the ordinary business of the house in order to discuss the Cyprus situation on August 10.

In addition, in March parliament and the Canadian people were furnished with a white paper on defence which outlined the defence policy of the present government. Since the purpose of the white paper was to project defence policy into the years ahead, I am sure the committee will agree that this paper should be the basis of the discussions we are now commencing in respect to the estimates of the Department of National Defence for the year 1964-65.

This year, as set out in the blue book, the government is asking for the approval by this committee of estimated expenditures of $1,525,000,000. This figure is a reduction of some $109 million from the estimate of $1,634,000,000 for 1963-64. Of necessity the estimates we are now considering were prepared prior to the completion of the white paper, but they do reflect to a considerable extent the studies which were carried out within the department and which were referred to in my remarks last December.

Hon. members will, I know, be interested in the progress that has been made over the year, and in particular in the steps which have been taken to implement announcement policy. Before going on to this, however, I would like to make a brief reference to the strategic situation now existing.

The real balance of power in the world has not changed materially since the white paper on defence was tabled. There have been developments, however, of some significance. There has been a change in leadership in the Soviet union. Early reports do not indicate any major change in Soviet foreign policy, and there have been what appear to be reassuring statements to this effect. It is too soon to determine for certain, however, that there will be no change in the direction established by the Khrushchev administration, and some time will be required to permit an adequate assessment. During this time of uncertainty it would be prudent for NATO forces to remain alert and for NATO governments to be ready to respond to any genuine gestures offering a prospect of easing world tensions.

Communist China has now succeeded in exploding its first nuclear device, a possibility which was forecast in the white paper. Although this test came as no particular surprise, it does show that the Chinese have sufficient technical knowledge to permit them to develop a nuclear arsenal. The immediate effect of this explosion is to increase Chinese military prestige so as to overawe their Asian neighbours. It was indicated in the white paper that it will be some years before they would have any substantial long range delivery capability even if they were to divert a consideration proportion of their resources to this end. However, the long term consequences are important and should not be minimized.

An important development during the year was the events which led to conflict on the island of Cyprus, posing as they do a threat to international peace and to the security of the eastern Mediterranean flank of NATO. The circumstances leading to this have been fully dealt with by my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I should like to make reference to the outstanding part played by the Canadian armed forces in implementing the decision taken by the Canadian government and by parliament. I do not wish to repeat what has already been said in the debate in August, but perhaps a brief summary might give some indication of our demonstrated capability.

On the day the Canadian government approved the dispatch to Cyprus Canadian personnel, an advance party of 26 left Trenton. The actual airlifting of troops was started on March 15 and was completed by March 22. H.M.C.S. Bonaventure left Halifax on March 18 and arrived off Cyprus on the 30th, carrying vehicles with their drivers and some 92 tons of cargo. On April 10, in response to a request by the secretary general of the United Nations, some 156 additional personnel were sent to Cyprus to provide a brigade headquarters for the United Nations force. Finally on August 13, again in response to a request from the United Nations, Canada sent an anti-tank platoon.

Over the months that the United Nations force has been in operation in Cyprus, the Canadian element of that force has performed in a manner of which all Canadians can be proud. I was fortunate to be able to visit Cyprus in June, to have had the opportunity to meet at first hand our troops there and to be briefed by Canadian officers in the field on what exactly Canadians were being called upon to do. I was extremely impressed and extremely proud of our men.

The situation in Cyprus has been fraught with difficulty but, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs has informed the house, within the last few weeks there has been a period of comparative quiet, and I myself believe that the presence of the United Nations force, of which Canadian personnel form a very substantial part, has been one of the most significant factors leading to the improved conditions. Certainly the government, in agreeing to extend Canada's participation for a further three months, put great dependence on this fact. The six month rotation has been completed with the same smoothness and efficiency that was evidenced last March, the whole operation being carried out in nine days.

Conflict, and the possibility of conflict, continues in many parts of the world; in South Viet Nam, on the border between Indonesia and Malaysia, in Cyprus, in Yemen, in the Congo, etc. While Canada is not directly involved in all these areas, they are all areas of concern to us as they affect the peace and stability of the world situation.

I would now like to discuss operational readiness and operational capability. A year ago none of the squadrons of the air division in Europe were operational in the strike and reconnaissance roles undertaken by Canada in 1959. In the intervening months the operational status has changed dramatically. The necessary agreements have been reached to permit the storage of the special ammunition for the strike role, and the six squadrons of CF-104's stationed in Germany are now operational. The two reconnaissance squadrons stationed at Marville in France have undergone intensive operational training for some months and are expected to reach full aircrew establishment in early 1965.

In accordance with the commitment given by the government, decisions have been taken which will permit all aircraft in the air division to have an alternate non-nuclear support role capability. Contrary to one or two articles which have appeared in the newspapers, the modifications required to permit these airplanes to carry conventional armaments are not great. We anticipate that it will be possible to proceed in an orderly fashion to give the aircraft and the aircrews this dual capability.

In the past year the operational capability of the brigade group stationed in Germany has been improved by the addition of 12 Centurion tanks to the armoured regiment and the formation of an anti-tank company which is being issued with a new anti-tank guided missile now being received from contract. Selected personnel from Canada and the brigade group have attended anti-tank guided missile instructor courses, and a missile controller course for operators was conducted in the brigade this summer. Graduates of this course are manning the anti-tank weapon systems of the Royal 22nd regiment company now in Germany.

As hon. members know, the brigade group has included an Honest John artillery battery since early 1962. Until this summer, however, the battery was unarmed. Recently, following the signing of the necessary agreements, the battery has become operational.

For several years it has been obvious that the brigade group suffered one notable deficiency in equipment, that is the absence of armoured personnel carriers. The decision taken last year to acquire the M-113 armoured personnel carrier has resulted in initial deliveries, with production quantities to be available early in the new year. By midsummer the total complement for the brigade group should be available for Europe. The availability of armoured personnel carriers will result in a marked qualitative improvement in the operational capability of the brigade group.

Mr. Churchill: May I interrupt with a question? The minister says that by midsummer the complete complement will be available. How many?

Mr. Hellyer: I believe something in excess of 400 is the approximate number required.

Another important addition will be the provision of a transport helicopter platoon. Following the delivery of heavy transport cargo helicopters now under contract and the training of crews to operational standards, the platoon will be moved to Europe to provide logistic and tactical air mobility.

To increase the fire power of the brigade group, two 105 mm. batteries of artillery are being replaced with two 155 mm. batteries.

To increase the transport capability of the Royal Canadian Air Force the decision was taken some months ago to augment the inventory of C130E Hercules aircraft. An order was placed for 16 C130E Hercules planes and the first of these will be delivered shortly, the balance to follow in the period between now and August of next year. The C130E is a remarkably good aircraft which can operate from unimproved airstrips, and its short landing and take-off characteristics are ideal for the support of the Canadian army in mobile operations.

There has been a steady improvement in the fighting efficiency and modernization of our antisubmarine ships. Two new destroyer escorts have been added to the fleet. H.M.C.S. Nipigon has been commissioned and H.M.C.S. Annapolis will be coming into service in December. These two ships are fitted with both variable depth sonar and full facilities for operating large antisubmarine helicopters. Trials of the Canadian developed "haul down" gear to enable these helicopters to operate effectively in rough weather are proceeding satisfactorily.

Concurrently the conversion of the seven St. Laurent class destroyer escorts has been proceeding. This conversion brings these escorts up to full Nipigon standards. Two ships are already fully converted and back in service and the third, the Ottawa, is about to be recommissioned. H.M.C.S. Assiniboine, the first ship converted, has been making excellent progress in trials operating the latest antisubmarine helicopter, the CHSS-2 Sea King, from her own flight deck and hangar. This combination gives every promise of being completely successful and, if this is so, the combination of operating a destroyer escort with its own antisubmarine helicopter as a single weapons system will increase by several times the effective surveillance which can be furnished by our antisubmarine fleet.

The first of three new submarines of the Oberon class, the Ojibwa, was launched last February, and in June the keel was laid for the second, the Onondaga. The acquisition of these submarines will not only increase our operational capability but will also be invaluable for training purposes.

Development of the hydrofoil as a potential antisubmarine vehicle is continuing. Along with the development of a prototype ocean going craft is the development of its associated weapons system. We wish to determine the feasibility and effectiveness of a high speed hydrofoil antisubmarine vessel in conjunction with other naval forces. The design being developed is based on a concept by the defence research board which is unique and different from those being developed in other countries. The weapons system for the hydrofoil will include variable depth sonar and homing torpedoes. The target date for completion of the construction of the prototype is mid-1966. Any plans for operational use of the hydrofoil will have to await evaluation of the seagoing trials.

It is interesting to note that the British government is concentrating on the development of hovercraft ships in the same role. This will permit concurrent development of two entirely different concepts in the two countries, with full information in respect of developments being made available to the other. By concentrating its efforts on one of the two concepts each country will be making the best use of its resources, and will at the same time have access to the benefits of new knowledge derived from each. There is a full exchange of technical information in respect of these craft among the United States, Canada and Britain.

Some months ago a study was undertaken in the Department of National Defence to determine the best combination of ships and weapons systems for the antisubmarine role. This study was completed on schedule and is now being studied by the integrated defence staff. We anticipate that it will be possible to take some decisions and indicate our initial requirements for new ships within a few weeks.

Over the past several years Canada has worked in close co-operation with the United States in respect of air defence of the North American continent. The white paper pointed out certain fundamental questions which will have to be answered before it is possible to determine what role will be required in air defence in the years ahead. In particular, the deployment or non-deployment of an anti-intercontinental ballistic missile system will have a direct bearing on future plans. Until this major decision is taken there are many questions which must remain unanswered.

In the present strategic situation it is considered worth while to maintain fully operational anti-bomber defences. In this connection Canada has increased, and continues to increase, the capability of its contribution to the anti-bomber defences. The arming of the two Bomarc missile squadrons has doubled the number of vehicles available in this role. We have reduced the number of interceptor squadrons from five to three in order to reduce overhead and increase efficiency, but the acquisition of the MB1G missile expected in the new year will increase the effective operational capability of our interceptor forces by a significant order of magnitude.

Mr. Churchill: Is that a nuclear missile?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes. Canada has been playing and will continue to play its full part in the collective security of the North American continent.

In this regard it is perhaps advisable to lay at rest the newspaper speculation that the NORAD agreement would not be renewed. This report was without any foundation whatever. From a strategic standpoint the security of the North American continent is indivisible; therefore the NORAD agreement, or a similar arrangement, is a continuing requirement. The Canadian government has no intention of withdrawing from full partnership in co-operation with the United States in the collective security of the continent.

As part of our program to increase the operational readiness of our forces and to ensure maximum co-operation both within the services and with our allies, we have participated and will be participating in a number of major exercises. Some examples of these exercises that have been held so far this year are as follows. In February, units of the army and the R.C.A.F. carried out an airborne, air transported exercise to test plans for regional defence operations. In another, the Royal Canadian Navy, R.C.A.F. and army tested the embarkation, transportation and logistic support of a company group of 3 CIBG ready force. The most recent one was Yeoman, in which the 3 CIBG ready force was moved by sea to Argentia, Newfoundland from Saint John, New Brunswick and Halifax, Nova Scotia. H.M.C.S. Provider and nine escorts as well as R.C.A.F. aircraft from air transport command and maritime air command participated along with United States naval personnel stationed at Argentia.

An international exercise was conducted in February and March in an area off Ceylon which included naval forces from Canada and was designed to exercise combined commonwealth forces in the conduct of war operations and to advance standards of efficiency in weapons. Other countries participating in this exercise were Britain, Australia, India, Malaysia and New Zealand. Another exercise in April included units of the R.C.N. and maritime air command along with units from the United States, Britain and the Netherlands to further the development and improve the tactics, doctrine, command and control arrangements for antisubmarine warfare barrier operations. In September, Slamex was an exercise in combined antisubmarine warfare operations to evaluate the effectiveness of available Canadian and U.S. forces in coordinated defensive operations against missile launching submarines off the east coast of this continent.

Joint Canada-U.S. exercises are continually taking place to test the effectiveness of our air defences here, while in Europe both the 4th brigade group and the air division have joined with the land and air forces of our NATO allies in training manoeuvres to ensure their maximum effectiveness.

For the immediate future, further exercises are planned which will provide cold weather winter warfare training at Fort Wainwright and, in conjunction with the United States, units of the army and air transport command will conduct cold weather operations in Alaska. Also, in December an exercise will be held in Newfoundland to gain experience in securing an air force base against ground attack with units from all three services and the U.S.A.F. co-operating. These are only a few of the many national and international exercises in which the armed forces are participating, either here at home, in Europe, or in other areas where conditions are conducive to furthering the capability of the armed forces to be prepared for any eventuality.

I have spoken at some length about our contribution to NATO and to NORAD, since the major part of our defence effort is concentrated in those areas in so far as manpower and expenditures are concerned. However, our military contribution to the United Nations peace forces, as hon. members know, plays an important part in international stability and has a not inconsiderable impact on the defence budget.

Looking in isolation at the various United Nations operations to which Canada makes a contribution does not give a true picture of our involvement in this important area. Quite apart from the Congo, from which the United Nations force was withdrawn this summer and to which Canada supplied an important element of specially trained personnel, at the present time we have 17 Canadian officers forming part of the United Nations truce supervisory organization between Israel on the one hand and the United Arab Republic, Lebanon, Jordan and Syria on the other. Over 800 army personnel and some 100 R.C.A.F. personnel are stationed in the Gaza strip to guard against border violations between Israel and the United Arab Republic. In Cyprus we have about 1,200 Canadians. Twelve Canadian officers and five other ranks form part of the United Nations military observer group whose role is to supervise the terms of the cease fire agreement between India, Pakistan and Kashmir, and some 47 officers and 35 other ranks are part of the international supervisory commissions comprising members from Canada, India and Poland in Laos and Viet Nam.

In so far as the newly independent countries are concerned, Canadian armed forces personnel are providing training assistance to Ghana and Nigeria, while training in Canada is being given to a number of service personnel from other commonwealth countries. Military survey teams have been sent to Tanganyika and Malaysia to determine the military training and equipment assistance Canada might appropriately give them, having regard to our other military and financial commitments.

As indicated in the white paper, it was decided that the best method of ensuring the rapid and effective integration of Canada's armed forces would be to start at the top. This is the procedure being followed. Bill C-90, amending the National Defence Act, was passed by parliament after due deliberation and came into effect on August 1, 1964. On that day the positions of Chairman, chiefs of staff committee, and the chiefs of the individual services were abolished and the new organization established. The new organization consists of the chief of the defence staff, the vice chief of defence staff, the assistant chief of defence staff, and four functional chiefs—operational readiness, personnel, logistics and engineering, and comptroller general.

Since the bill was proclaimed the reorganization has been developing stage by stage. The first stage being considered is the complete integration of Canadian forces headquarters. This process has now reached the higher levels and will continue until all the positions required for the new integrated headquarters have been filled. The target figure for savings at Canadian force headquarters is approximately one third throughout all ranks, and will be possible as a result of the formation of an integrated staff and the elimination of duplication and triplication. It is anticipated that the new integrated headquarters will be largely organized on the reduced scale within a year. Some special problems pertaining to the logistics and engineering branch exist, however, and progress in this area in making the planned reductions may not be as rapid as in other branches.

Throughout the integration process new methods are being developed and new policies established. We are attempting to take the best from the several systems previously in operation and to apply them as a whole. In the case of logistics, for example, this will mean extending the automated system presently in use by the air force throughout the three services.

Now that the integration of the Canadian forces headquarters is well under way, preliminary thought is being given to the integration of commands. It is anticipated that within a few months it will be possible to evolve a careful long range plan which will permit considerable financial savings while at the same time maintaining and, hopefully, even improving the efficiency of units. Stage three will involve the integration of schools and other facilities. This will follow naturally and logically from stage two. While it is difficult to predict the time cycle required for the whole process, it is anticipated that the major elements of integration can take place, and the most important savings effected, within three years.

The special service force is being formed by modifying an existing Canadian army brigade group to provide a light mobile force smaller than our brigade groups assigned to NATO. The force is to be air transportable, with some of its equipment air droppable. The force will consist of a headquarters and three infantry battalions, light artillery, engineer and signals elements and other ancillary and support units as required to enable the force to carry out its various operational commitments. For instance, a reconnaissance squadron from the newly formed reconnaissance regiment might be assigned to this force. Similarly, if it requires heavier weapons such as tanks or anti-tank guns, these will be provided from our other conventional units. Should the force require an airborne capability, a parachute element will be assigned to it.

A number of major equipment items implicit in the white paper have been under serious study for some time. As I indicated earlier, I hope to be able to announce within a few weeks a substantial part of our shipbuilding program for the next few years. The same applies to aircraft. We have been giving detailed study to our requirements for tactical aircraft in a close ground support role, and it is hoped that a decision can be made in this respect, too, within a reasonable length of time. Also under consideration is the possibility of acquiring self propelled artillery, and reconnaissance and other vehicles for the army.

In summation I would like to say that notwithstanding the reduction in expenditures, we will have achieved within two years a significant qualitative improvement and operational capability of our armed forces. Further qualitative improvements will take place as new equipment becomes available and new tactics are developed. We are at the same time involved in an historic reorganization which will put us in the forefront of developments in the field of military organization.

We fully appreciate the problems that are inherent in any such reorganization. No improvements can be effected, whether they be the installation of new streets or lights or water systems, without some temporary inconvenience and dislocation. The same problem applies in respect to the integration of our forces. In order to effect permanent and worth-while improvements, temporary inconvenience and dislocation is inevitable. We are deeply grateful for the patient understanding of those who have been affected, and we will do our utmost to minimize the problems that we will create for others during this transitional period.

Mr. Churchill: Not a word about the militia; a shocking omission.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to the minister's statement and certain points he has mentioned. Perhaps the hon. member for Rosedale would tend to matters of justice and to what he is reading, and we will get on with the discussion here rather than have him make sotto voce remarks from his seat.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, I am interested to have the hon. member acknowledge that what he is going to say is not worth listening to and that I should read. I will take his advice.

Mr. Lambert: The minister has referred to the white paper. With the passage of time I have not revised my opinion with respect to the white paper, in that I feel it has been greatly overestimated and there has been a great deal of ballyhoo in regard to it. It has not materially changed from white papers in the past, and I think we have made our views known in this regard. There was a great deal of ballyhoo with regard to estimated savings, or what were thought to be savings or projected savings to be savings, but nowhere is there any concrete evidence as to these savings. I think we will have to depend upon experience to see whether there actually was not a real flim-flam in this regard.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, I think it would be instructive to read the last October 7 report of the meeting of the Canadian air industry in Quebec city. The following is attributed to the air chief marshal, who is reported as having said:

> —the proposed integrated armed forces will provide savings for defence spending, but a speedy decision was difficult to make while the forces were working out the many problems of intergrating forces management.

He did say that he expects a saving but that this cannot be expected immediately. In the early stages, certainly, one cannot anticipate these savings of which the minister spoke and about which there was the usual publicity surrounding the issuing of this white paper. I am sure the minister, in retrospect, will agree that there was a great deal of optimism but that the actual carrying out or the implementation of some of these plans will indicate that the so-called savings are just not there. I think it was wrong too, to say there would be savings, if it was the minister's intention, as I think it was, to devote the moneys that he could take from one sector for use in another. These are not savings; this is a reallocation of funds and a redirection of spending.

There is no quarrel with the basic principles involved in this; but to talk about savings and say they were going to save perhaps a billion dollars over ten years is a lot of nonsense, unless the minister intends to reduce the role of the armed services. He tackled one portion of the over-all defence expenditures which was nothing new to his advisers; it was information that was available and was being acted on by the previous administration. It is a problem that has occurred not only in this country but in all countries, in that really the housekeeping costs were getting out of line; and not only a little out of line. They were built into the system. The minister has tackled this problem by trying to bring about integration. We will see whether that is going to work out in so far as a saving or a making of funds available for other expenditures is concerned.

I noted the remarks the minister made with regard to the progress of unification of command. I call it unification of command; I do not call it integration, because I do not think it is yet integration. It is purely unification of command. This is a desirable step all the way along. Obviously there are going to be some difficulties in this connection. Again I think a great fanfare, shall we say, was made in regard to an idea; then how to work it out came later. Already we learn of some reservations in this respect. Earlier this year the minister was indefinite about a great many things; now he tells us that it is possible that, in the main, integration or so-called integration, or unification of command, will take place within three years, and that in so far as Canadian forces headquarters is concerned, with the exception of logistics and engineering, by late next fall.

A year after August 1, 1964 or shortly thereafter, it is anticipated that the Canadian forces headquarters will be reorganized.

I am not going to say any more about this matter at the present time. We had a complete examination of it earlier this year. Again I am going to make the reservations that I made at that time. I would like to see, in the performance of this reorganization, just what has happened to the civilian counterparts in the minister's office, the alternative that was offered by the opposition with regard to the reorganization in order to eliminate some of the very real difficulties regarding the chain of command as it now exists.

The minister did say something about the replacement of ships for the navy. Well, it is still delightfully vague as to when the decision may be made. The minister will agree, I think, that over the past few months he has been very pleasant and very non-committal when he has been asked by members of the opposition when a certain decision was going to be taken. He has said it would be in a few days, shortly, or in due course; all those nice, imprecise terms. But the minister used to—if I may use a very slang phrase—blow his stack, when he sat in the opposition, if these expressions were used by his predecessors in office. I remember that his indignation used to be something to behold, but he certainly learned the lesson far better than his teachers as to imprecision and this delightful vagueness in so far as telling the house what is being planned is concerned.

Mr. Churchill: It is because of lack of knowledge.

Mr. Lambert: I think today the same thing applies with regard to the ships and what he has told us with regard to the decisions taken by him in connection with the Assiniboine and the Nipigon, as well as the Sea King helicopters were also decisions taken much earlier. The conversion of the St. Laurent class of destroyer escorts was an earlier decision. The purchase of the three submarines was also an earlier decision. The only way the minister or this administration can claim that some of these decisions may be theirs is by saying that on assuming office they suspended everything and then decided to reconfirm the decisions.

One thing they have not done, and I think it is very serious. Two years ago the hon. member for Calgary North, when minister of defence, announced a program respecting general purpose frigates. On assuming office the new minister suspended that decision, and then after several months decided not to go ahead with them. But there has been no announcement whatever as to whether there are to be any ships to replace the general purpose frigates, whether there will be a modification of the proposed general purpose frigates, or what there will be. There is that delightfully vague suggestion concerning ships. Is this suggestion along the line attributed to the associate minister the other day, that there should be ships with great troop carrying capacity; that the transport ability of the navy would be increased? If these remarks were attributed, rightly or wrongly, to the associate minister there may be some validity in the point of view that the navy requires some type of ships which will provide a greater troop carrying capacity in a combined role. I remember the minister's notorious speech in which a bold new military policy was announced. That was the one which sort of spluttered but did not get off the ground. That was a famous occasion which the minister will remember to his dying day.

Mr. Hellyer: It got off the ground too soon.

Mr. Lambert: It was a damp squib in any event. There was in that statement of policy an item in connection with greater transportability of men and equipment by the navy.

We have not heard too much about the minister's thoughts in this regard. I think that today he could have taken the house into his confidence in connection with what he conceives to be the strategy and tactical use of our Canadian armed forces, particularly the army. In addition, we have not heard about the proposed reorganization of army commands. True enough, the minister said that he is looking at this, but in the interval are our brigades marking time?

I can do nothing but underline the absolute urgency of arriving at a decision regarding replacement ships for the navy. Certainly the defence committee is of the opinion that the decision must be made soon. The committee was made aware, both by the minister's advisers and by the senior officials of those forces with which the navy is co-operating in the north Atlantic, that unless we get some of these replacement ships laid down soon there is going to be a gap by 1970, when the obsolescence of our present ships will place many of them in the category of very limited use.

It must be remembered that the minister's advisers in this regard were primarily the same men who advised the hon. member for Calgary North and the previous administration on a ship replacement program. They foresaw over two years ago that these ships would have to be replaced, yet two years later we are still in suspense. It is obvious that there is going to be a gap, unless of course their role is going to be changed; but we have heard nothing in that regard. Therefore, assuming their role will remain as it is now, I suggest to the minister that it is high time that the qualitative and quantitative capacity of our navy be decided upon as of now. Not only is it important to our defence capability, but I am sure the minister understands that this question is seriously affecting the morale of the men in the navy, and that there is a limit to their patience in this regard.

The same comments apply to replacement aircraft. There seems to be a sort of self generated hysteria building up in connection with this matter, and I am wondering just how much of this has been sponsored by certain circles in connection with an aircraft to replace the CF-104. One article in this connection which appeared recently was entitled "The Phantom aircraft industry". Then there was a most extraordinary communiqué put out I know not by whom, but presumably by someone on behalf of the minister, on the eve of the conference of Canadian air industries, in which the air industry was told to mind its P's and Q's. As I say, I do not know who was the spokesman but certainly it appeared to be someone in authority.

The following week, namely the week of October 7, the chief of the Canadian defence staff reportedly said in Quebec city that the air defence order is still being worked out. As far as the defence committee is concerned, if the minister feels that some of his opinions should not be made public and wants to come before that committee in camera, I think the defence committee is quite a responsible body which has in the past been able to sit in camera and treat the information placed before it as confidential and for its benefit only.

According to some stories which have appeared in the press there is a tug of war going on in the defence department. There are protagonists of a very fancy and sophisticated aircraft, the McDonnell Phantom fighter, known as a $2.5 million, eight ton bomb carrier. At least that is how it is headed up.

I have also received reports concerning a number of other aircraft, or what one might term potential candidates. No doubt history is repeating itself and there is no dearth of potential candidates. I have referred to the Phantom II. I understand one other candidate is the Northrop Freedom Fighter, which is reportedly less expensive, being in the neighbourhood of $600,000 per copy. There is also the Grumman Intruder, referred to in one press report as an extraordinary ground support aircraft at an extraordinary cost, $4 million per copy. Even that cost is nothing compared to what the Arrow was going to cost. There is also the Douglas Sky Hawk, the Thunderchief and the Lougheed CL-90, which is presumably akin to the CF-104 or the model on which that aircraft was based.

Mr. Chairman, there are two aspects to the philosophy of such a choice. We must consider the glamourous side, shall we say, of the former air force. We cannot call it the air force any more because it has been taken into this integrated force, or so some people believe. In this regard one must consider the Phantom II which is reportely to be a very slick, complex aircraft. As I indicated some days ago, some individuals have suggested that an informal agreement has been reached and all that is required now is an agreement among Britain, the United States and Canada for the manufacture of airframes in Canada, some 250 I believe. The aircraft would have a British engine, which could be substituted for an engine of United States manufacture. This is all speculation, and, undoubtedly, there is uncertainty in this regard. However, the source of this report is usually reasonable and authoritative. Where there is smoke there is usually a certain amount of fire.

Mr. Chairman, it may well be that this proposition is being examined carefully. The Phantom II is reputed to be a very fast aircraft with a speed of something like 1,600 miles per hour, with a 900 mile range and an eight ton bomb carrying capacity. I think one must also consider the Northrop Freedom Fighter, which is described as a $700,000 grass field jet. It is a much more versatile aircraft for the tactical role. I understand the Phantom II requires a runway of some 5,000 feet. In any event, there are two conflicting philosophies in this regard. One is that we need a more or less workaday jeep type aircraft, and the other is that we must have an aircraft which is in the Cadillac class.

Mr. Chairman, I point out these facts because there seems to be some indication that the minister and his advisers are considering the continuation of a tactical role for at least a good segment of our air force. We should like to know the official philosophy in regard to the utilization of our air component with our ground forces. Is the use of our air component concentrated on transportability? There are varying views in this regard. We could use our air component in such a way as to make sure our ground troops are transported to certain areas, making them highly mobile. In that event their equipment and logistics supplies would be readily transportable. This use of our forces would fit into the Canadian peace keeping role to be utilized at any place in the world where it was required. In contrast to that role is the use of a substantial part of our air component as an air arm combined with ground forces.

There are two very different principles involved and, of course, very different consequences. A tactical air arm would require tactical aircraft with necessarily shorter ranges. If we are going to use that type of aircraft in conjunction with our forces stationed some distance from Canada one must be concerned about getting the short range aircraft to a place within the limit of their range from our forces.

As I have said, I do not intend to go into detail in relation to the consequences of this philosophy, as time does not permit, but I point out these facts as fundamental differrences in respect of the potential role of the air component of Canada's defence forces. Certainly a judgment decision will have to be reached, and we should like to know the thoughts of the minister in this regard. A decision in respect of replacement aircraft in this particular range is forecast in the minister's remarks. He says he hopes to be able to arrive at a decision concerning tactical aircraft, perhaps not within a few weeks but in the near future. The two week period had reference to the shipbuilding program. In any event "the near future" is a relative term. The officials involved certainly are considering the situation.

Other remarks have been attributed to the minister to the effect that he will reply to the aircraft industry but that his decision may well be a year away, and that the industry should not push or rush him. We should have some clarification in this regard. I am pleased to note that steps are being taken toward the use of the C-130. I always felt that we were a little hesitant in buying only four of these aircraft, but there were several factors involved. Perhaps for another reason the limited purchase of this aircraft proved useful in that it has been shown that these aircraft can really deliver the goods without the necessity of obtaining an expensive air fleet. The hesitancy in this regard has resulted in the continued use of C-119's to the point where one wondered how they could still fly.

I should like to hear from the minister about the modified version of the Caribou, now called the Buffalo. What does the Canadian Department of National Defence envisage in respect of this development? Is this to be a Canadian development encouraged chiefly by the United States? I think we must realize that in so far as the Buffalo is concerned, it was not developed as a result of Canadian encouragement. It was ultimately brought into production in its refined state—or an improvement upon the Caribou—as a result of encouragement from a source other than Canadian. I was sorry that we were unable to see our way clear to follow the original concept of the Caribou and the Bobcat in a more closely related role. In any event, I am sure that we have been taught a lesson by our mistakes and I trust we will not repeat them.

The minister should make reference in his reply to a replacement for the Penhold air base. After all, Penhold was supposed to be the chief centre for advanced jet training. This plan was knocked on the head rather unceremoniously and I think improperly. True enough, the minister felt bound by certain decisions reached within the Department of Transport, but these decisions have sufficient against them to render them somewhat suspect. In any event, there it is; the minister has announced that the Penhold air base is to be closed. What is to be its replacement, we have not heard. I think there should be some indication of what the plan is in so far as training command is concerned. Is this going to await some uncertain date in the future when everything is going to be reorganized?

Now, I did hear in passing that the minister's introductory statement made no reference to the militia. I too regret that he failed to mention this. True enough he made his statement to the defence committee, but I think the militia merited as much mention publicly as did the Cyprus force. I agree with the minister that our force on Cyprus has performed very well under very trying and frustrating circumstances. I think we must give them full marks in that regard. Mind you, I cannot approve of the circumstances under which they had to perform their duties.

I think, too, the minister will agree that the organization of our peace keeping force in these international groups leaves something to be desired. I am hoping that the conference this week will be able to iron out a lot of these difficulties. These people who have been to Cyprus, and who have come back, will readily testify that such peace keeping forces have far too many chiefs and not enough men. At every level we seem to require equivalent officers from each participating nation. I believe experience will lead us to the point where these peace keeping forces can be organized on the basis of efficiency and not prestige.

With regard to the militia, I should like to read into the record paragraphs 70 and 72 of the defence committee report:

> There was considerable discussion in the committee concerning the numbers required to fulfil these roles.

The reference there is to the roles the government indicated for the militia.

> The government has indicated a requirement of 30,000 effective militiamen as follows:
> (a) reinforcement of field forces, 7,000-8,000 officers and men; special units for NATO commitments, 1,000 officers and men;
> (b) training forces to support the field force, 18,000 officers and men;
> (c) internal security, 2,500 officers and men;
> (d) national survival installations, 1,500 officers and men, for a total of approximately 30,000 officers and men.

Then the committee's remarks follow:

> Your committee cannot confirm or refute this estimate except to note that the potential requirement for internal security appears to be seriously underestimated. Your committee also recognizes the fact that those requirements will change in the future, and that regular periodic reviews should be made.

Then I quote paragraph 72:

> The government has announced that the present strength of the militia is to be cut, for budgetary reasons, from approximately 45,000 all ranks to approximately 30,000. To achieve the requirement of 30,000 referred to in paragraph 70, this would mean an approximately 100 per cent efficiency rate. Your committee considers this to be unrealistic—

I can assure the minister, without disclosing what went on in the committee, that this was an almost unanimous view.

> —and would agree with the contention of the conference of defence associations, that in order to achieve the 30,000 effectives, the militia enrolment, even taking into account an increased efficiency, would have to be considerably higher. It must therefore be recognized that, after the militia is cut to 30,000 all ranks, it will be unable to fulfil its proposed roles.

Well, of course, we had to—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lachance): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I have to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Lambert: May I have another five minutes?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lachance): Does the committee give its consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert: I wish to thank hon. members for their courtesy in allowing me to have a few more minutes to complete my remarks. We did have a bit of a comic opera performance with regard to this matter this summer. It was announced that the 30,000 figure was going to be the end result. The minister's associate indicated that he would have to agree with the contention in the committee and the conference of defence associations that undoubtedly enrolment would have to be somewhat higher. He was not precise because one could not precisely indicate what that higher figure might be, but certainly it would be higher than 30,000. However, on a subsequent appearance the associate minister indicated that there was a hard line adopted, and 30,000 was going to be it.

Then we had the minister come before us the other day and say that the 30,000 figure still held but there would be an establishment of some 41,000. In response to questioning in the committee the minister agreed that in the implementation of this proposal it would be possible to get up to a figure of 41,000 if everybody enlisted up to the top and if they could get the money, which is another consideration, but he thought 30,000 would be the practical figure.

I believe he will agree with me that if he wants to get 30,000 men out of the militia, as set out in paragraph 70 of the defence committee report—those figures were taken straight from the ministerial statement in this regard, so there is no hocus-pocus or glossing over of the figures by the committee—he will not get 30,000 out of a 30,000 enrolment. Something has got to give. Perhaps the minister might be a little more frank with the committee and tell us just how many men he thinks he is going to get out of a militia force of 30,000.

I am going to leave to some of my colleagues the discussion of what may be the effects of the militia reorganization. However, there is one last point I should like to make, Mr. Chairman, at this stage of my remarks.

I do not claim originality for this idea, but I think it should be put to the minister, perhaps not so much to the minister as to some of his colleagues. As was indicated the other day, as a result of this reorganization of the militia, the reserves and the regular force, certain national defence properties are going to be surplus. What properties will become surplus is not yet determined. We know what happens when these properties are declared surplus; they are turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation for sale. The proceeds of the sale are then credited to the consolidated revenue fund.

I know that in my own city of Edmonton there may be several hundred thousand dollars worth of property that will go on the market, and it should. There are a number of lots there that are producing nothing but the best weed crop possible. They are surrounded by a fence and posted with signs saying "No Admittance, Department of National Defence". Neither is there admittance for a weed cutter. I am sure the situation is paralleled in a number of other cities, and that there is property worth hundreds of thousands of dollars which could be disposed of by the department.

Admittedly the minister is short of funds for the purchase of new equipment. If, by reason of the Financial Administration Act, it is impossible to take the funds realized from the sale of these properties and return them to the department for the purchase of new equipment, then I suggest an agreement should be reached with the minister's colleagues that he be provided with an extra credit in lieu of the amount realized. This makes sense, because in effect he would be disposing of properties that were purchased by his department.

This idea is not original but it is a commendable one, and I think the minister's colleagues should see the wisdom in it. I am sure the minister himself advocates this, and it can be pointed out that it is a one shot proposition because he will not be able to continue to find properties that can be sold.

I may have some other remarks to make depending on the minister's answers to questions raised, but for the moment that is all I have to say.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, it has been my practice, when leading off for my party in discussing item 1 of departmental estimates, not to prepare a statement but to rely on my own knowledge and understanding in the belief that it was only proper to await the minister's statement. I am sorry that in doing so today I made a mistake, because I found the minister's statement very frustrating, most disappointing and shocking—shocking in that through his evasion and rationalization he has not given the policy points of view to which we believe we are entitled.

The minister completely evaded two points. I am certain members of the committee recall statements made by leaders of the Liberal party during the last election campaign, and commitments made in this chamber, that the government would enter into negotiations to remove Canada from a nuclear role. The minister shakes his head.

Mr. Hellyer: Would you mind giving the quotations?

Mr. Winch: If you check the political statements made during the campaign, and if you also check Hansard, you will see the Liberal party promised to fulfil the commitments which it maintained the Conservative government had made and, having lived up to those commitments, was going to enter into negotiations to get us out of a nuclear role. You will find that on page after page of Hansard.

Mr. Hellyer: Read it.

Mr. Winch: You will find it there, but today the minister made no statement on the policy position of the government with respect to nuclear weapons and nuclear warheads. I believe we should have had some indication from him as to the policy of the government with regard to the role of Canada's armed forces in the use of nuclear weapons.

A second matter which the minister omitted to mention—and I hope he will not shake his head at this too—was that the government undertook to renegotiate the position of Canada within NATO. That was not only a campaign promise but is also to be found in Hansard, and the minister made no mention of it today. I know he made certain statements about NATO, but he did not go into the fundamental principle and philosophy of Canada's role within the NATO structure.

Up until now I have always supported Canada's contribution to NATO, but surely the time has arrived when the minister should tell us in detail what he has in mind for the future. If memory serves me correctly 1969 is the year for the re-establishment of NATO as a collective military alliance, and tied in with this question of NATO itself is the other question of how long Canada is to continue maintaining thousands of its troops, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, in the European theatre. V-E day was the day the surrender was signed in Berlin. That was may 8, 1945. We are now in November of 1964. Have our operations in Europe in the interval been considered as peace keeping? Was there any thought in the mind of the government when the surrender was signed in 1945 that in 1964 a small country of 19 million people would still be supporting occupation forces in Europe at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars?

I think this is a reasonable and logical question to ask, and one with regard to which we should have some information. We are entitled to have the views of the Minister of National Defence on this matter. I should be grateful, too, if the minister would indicate how he intends to implement the policy set out on page 15 of the white paper, the policy on peace keeping, in the light of what is contained on page 24 where priorities are outlined.

The white paper was interesting enough, but basically it deals in generalities. Even where it is detailed, how are the aims set out in the white paper to be accomplished having regard to the availability of Canadian forces and funds? Beyond this, bearing in mind the money available, what kind of efficiency are we to expect in our armed services? We are at peace, thank heavens, but it is amazing how much money Canada can spend through the Department of National Defence while the country is at peace. If my recollection is accurate, between 1949 and the end of 1963 the Department of National Defence spent $22½ billion on our armed services. And what is their efficiency? Now is the time to bring this question out into the open.

I had the honour of being leader of the opposition in British Columbia while Canada was at war. As leader of the opposition I had the privilege, along with the premier of British Columbia and the G.O.C. western command, of knowing what was going on. But because of public relations psychology I could never make known what I knew then, namely, some passenger ships with naval personnel on board carried guns made of wood. This was when Japan was in the war. I knew this, but I could not say so because we were at war and it would not have been advisable. But we are at peace now, and we should be able to discuss the efficiency of our forces. I heard nothing from the minister about this aspect of our defence situation.

I had hoped to hear about that naval exercise off Bermuda when three Canadian destroyers took part in combined operations with the United States navy Atlantic command. Members of the special committee on defence set up by this House of Commons were aboard the three Canadian destroyers taking part in this actual, factual exercise. There were three destroyers in line. I happened to be one of those on the first destroyer in line. What armament did those destroyers carry? They had a mortar for use against submarines, and they had only one piece of armament equipment for everything else, a 3 inch—70 guns for use against attacking forces or attacking planes. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that this was a prearranged exercise; it had been on the books for a long time. The department knew members of the defence committee would be present, so I imagine everything was ice cream and perfect.

What happened? In the beautiful, calm waters off Bermuda, when the drone plane flew over, the only armament available for use against an attacking force would function to the extent of only about 50 per cent. One of the guns aboard the destroyer I was on would not fire. We had that experience. The gun on the second destroyer would not fire at all on two runs. Aboard the third they were luckier. Remember, this was shooting at a drone plane; and the only armament carried would not function to more than 50 per cent of capacity. Would the minister say these ships are ready for war if it ever occurs? We were told these guns were the most intricate and complicated in the world, but they are the only guns provided, and this is the situation.

Surely we have a responsibility as well as a right to ask the minister now what is being done in this regard. Is the armament being changed? I understand there is an arrangement with Britain for skilled men to come over here to assist us with our submarine program. Does the minister not think there should be a similar arrangement for technical assistance in connection with these guns? Or should there be a change of armament? Remember this is the only armament those destroyers possess apart from the mortars which are only for use against submarines. Now we are at peace I think we should be absolutely honest, and that we are entitled to expect honesty from the minister.

May I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

Supply—National Defence

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, when the committee recessed at one o'clock I was speaking about the fantastic expenditures of the Department of National Defence amounting, as I pointed out, to $22½ billion since 1949, and my own experience as a member of the defence committee in finding out the inefficiency of some armaments, despite these expenditures. If time permitted I would have liked to have the opportunity of enlarging on that phase of my remarks, because I think to a considerable degree it applies to the armaments, and in particular the mobility of our forces at home and abroad. However, in view of the fact that you were kind enough, Mr. Chairman, when I spoke to you a moment ago, to let me know that I now have 13½ minutes left, I would like to proceed from that phase of my remarks on item 1 of the estimates of the Department of National Defence to another matter which I mentioned at the opening of my remarks relative to our position regarding NATO, and in particular to what I maintain was the lack of responsibility by the Minister of National Defence in not outlining to this house what we should have had, and had the right to expect, namely an explanation of his policy statement which is to be found on page 15 of the white paper on defence, correlated with the priorities as outlined on page 24 of the white paper.

During my very brief remarks before the luncheon adjournment with regard to NATO I rather gathered from the expression on the face of the Minister of National Defence that he thought I might have been a little out of line. May I draw to the attention of this committee a press release covering the text of a speech made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Atlantic treaty association at Ottawa on September 15, 1964. On page 4 of the press release we find the Secretary of State for External Affairs saying this:

> As far as the alliance itself is concerned, there is still a long way to go toward completion of the review of NATO defence policy which ministers required at the Ottawa meeting in May, 1963. While I would not wish to overstress the problems of the alliance in that regard, I cannot escape the feeling that the long term effects of not achieving some agreement in the fields of strategy, military integration, nuclear control, command structure and cost sharing are bound to detract from our effectiveness as an alliance in using the forces we have at our disposal. I believe that the time has come to face these problems and honestly to deal with them with the requisite boldness and imagination. In particular I believe that they point to the need for some re-thinking first with regard to a greater sharing in the military direction of the alliance, and second, in regard to the relationship between the civilian and military arms of the alliance.

Mr. Chairman, you will remember that when I spoke before the luncheon adjournment I expressed my regret that the Minister of National Defence had not given us any basic point of view or policy outline with regard to what I said then was a re-thinking of our position in NATO and its operations. That is why this afternoon, because I believed my memory was correct, I looked into my files; I was almost certain that a similar expression had been used by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his speech on September 15. Members of this House of Commons are not children; they have responsibilities—big ones—and one concerns the relationship of our country to others, and the defence of our country. But for some reason or other there was an evasion of rationalization and no attempt whatsoever by the Minister of National Defence, in his introduction with regard to item No. 1 of these estimates, to take this house or the people into his confidence, into the government's confidence, on the major issues that face our country and others. Nor was there an attempt to give us an explanation as to how in his view, believing as he must in the general principles of peace keeping as outlined on page 15 of the white paper, we could follow the priorities set out on page 24 without a massive increase in defence expenditure or a cut down in other fields.

In the few remaining moments I want to speak on the cutting down in other fields. As I said this morning the surrender treaty was signed in Europe in 1945. Today we are still spending hundreds of millions of dollars, and have thousands of troops. For how long is this going to go on? Is it peace keeping? I would also like to be able to quote all of the observations on page 15, but may I just very briefly draw attention to this paragraph, which I presume reflects the views of the Minister of National Defence:

> Canada's own experience in this field points to the need for a high degree of versatility in preparing for possible United Nations service. In the past, requests from the secretary general for assistance have been for specialists of various kinds, mainly from the Canadian army and the R.C.A.F.—
> The success of United Nations peace keeping operations may depend on the speed with which they can be established on the ground. Once there, they may be required to exercise authority with limited personnel in broad areas. Thus, there is a need for mobility as regards deployment, method of operation and logistic support. In most situations which can be foreseen, there is likely to be a need for highly mobile forces for ground observation, air surveillance, rapid transportation and reliable communications. These are among the United Nations requirements which Canadian forces have helped to meet in the past.

As I read the white paper, emphasis is to be placed on peace keeping and greater aid through the medium of the United Nations. That is why there is the requirement in the priorities listed on page 24 that:

On the basis of this assessment, major expenditures in the next few years will be designed to: (a) re-equip the army as a mobile force; (b) provide an adequate air and sea lift for its immediate deployment in an emergency; (c) acquire tactical aircraft; (d) maintain a relatively constant improvement of maritime antisubmarine capability.

I believe with regard to (d) that the minister is doing an excellent job. With regard to (a), (b) and (c) heavy financial requirements will be necessary to meet these objectives.

I honour the Minister of National Defence for the approach he has made toward integrating the forces. That is an experiment which is being watched around the world. I think he is to be commended for the courage he has shown in some of the new approaches which are being made. At the same time, sir, I think that he did a disservice to the members of this house by not stating whether or not these savings which he hopes to accomplish can or will meet what he states in the white paper to be his objectives. In not giving us that information he failed to give the complete picture regarding our continued operation on the present basis within the commitments of NATO and particularly in connection with NORAD.

I was most interested in what he had to say about the two Bomarc installations in Canada, one in Ontario and one in Quebec. I noted his remarks to the effect that the interceptors at Comox are going to have nuclear warheads. I say it is time we had some honesty both from the minister and from this government. Up till now we have had only what I maintain is dishonesty in certain matters of policy. Is the minister actually telling this committee that in the event of an attack on the North American continent the enemy would give warning of the approach of manned bombers so as to give the United States time to get its I.C.B.M.'s on their way? And on the other side of the picture—I know this will not happen but I put it hypothetically—if the United States ever attacked the U.S.S.R., do you think that it would send its manned bombers and give the Russians time to get their I.C.B.M.'s on their way to North America? Of course not.

That being the case—and surely that is logical and reasonable—what is the basis for Canada spending money as it is today on Bomarc bases and nuclear warheads for interceptors? What is the basis for the millions which Canada is spending now on NORAD, with this change in technological warfare and the staff which is available? In the past it has been necessary for one purpose—to see that the strategic air command of the United States was kept up in the air. But surely that is not the position today in the event of war. Fifty per cent of the strength of the strategic air command of the United States is up in the air all the time as it is; but it can only meet manned bombers. Surely it is time we had an explanation from the minister of the necessity for spending millions of dollars and utilizing Canadian personnel on Bomarc stations, nuclear warheads, interceptors and NORAD, all of which would be of use only in the event of attack by manned bombers. I might add, although this has no connection with NORAD, that this month saw the completion of four stations outside of Canada to detect the launching of an I.C.B.M. anywhere in the world.

I am down to my last 30 seconds, Mr. Chairman, and I do not want to take additional time. Perhaps I will have an opportunity later to speak again, but may I conclude my remarks by saying what I said at the outset. There was no reference to matters of policy or matters of viewpoint and no indication of the government's understanding of the objectives given in the statement made by the Minister of National Defence. Such being the case the minister has shown disrespect for and disregard of the members of this committee and the responsibilities each and every one of us has as a member of this House of Commons. Before we are through with these estimates I hope we will have a clear exposition by the minister, and that he will take all of us into his and the government's confidence.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to draw to the attention of the house a situation which I deplore at the present time. Today, the house is taking up the estimates of the Department of National Defence, which represent 25 per cent of Canada's national budget; and even though the matter is a rather touchy one, and one that is discussed at length during electoral campaigns here and there across the country, very few members of the house are interested in discussing it when it comes up for debate in the house.

I think that the absence of the members of the defence committee from the house is particularly unfortunate. The 24 members who have been chosen by the House of Commons and by the various parties to scrutinize the national defence problem in this country as well as the financial impact of national defence are surely of all the members of this parliament the ones who should deem it their duty to be here today.

This being said, must we come to the conclusion that the defence committee have no more work to do once they have completed their study outside the house, and that their members ought not take part in the discussions that can go on in this house? I hope not.

This committee did a good job by allowing several members to examine thoroughly the very complex problem of defence. And the house could thus avoid momentarily the discussions on national defence which we have known in the past.

During the first session I sat in this house, in 1962, I remember that almost every day questions were being placed on the order paper concerning national defence. I remember that long discussions and debates occurred on this question. At least, since the committee on national defence was formed to examine this matter, those discussions calmed down in the house. Sometimes several weeks go by without the Minister of National Defence having to answer any questions from members of the opposition.

We have at least attained that objective. But, in my opinion, when the estimates of the Department of National Defence are examined in the house, it is the duty of every member, Conservative and others, to attend the debate, because this matter affects a very important area, not only at the economic but also at the social level; many Canadians are thereby affected directly: those in the armed forces, and indirectly, their dependents. And I could also add all the taxpayers who foot the bill at the end of the year.

In his statement the minister outlined the general policy which the cabinet intends to apply concerning defence. Of course, he did not have much information for us, members of the committee, except that there are still many questions unanswered, including the one raised a while ago by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch).

I think that the Minister of National Defence did not give us exactly what we had a right to expect.

When he talks about maintaining NORAD agreements for the defence of the North American continent, with the United States, does he mean to maintain them exactly on the basis which has prevailed since 1957? Will he renegotiate the agreements when they come to an end?

I think that we are all in agreement in this house—and all Canadians will support the suggestion—that we must maintain our contribution to the defence of the North American continent. But I think it is proper for Canadians to wonder on what basis it will be.

We are all aware, because it was repeated many times, that our present system of defence is simply out of date and obsolete. Therefore, when we talk about the defence of the North American continent what are we talking about exactly? Before setting up defence policies it would be a good thing to know exactly what threat we have to face. Are we facing an invasion by some foreign force on the continent? Are we facing an air force attack? Or is there a danger for Canada to be destroyed by remote controlled nuclear head missiles?

I believe that it is easy to determine what type of war or attack could take place against Canada.

It is quite unlikely that we would be faced with an invasion of land forces, since, for more than 300 years now, no sizeable enemy has ever set foot on our Canadian soil, with the exception of small raids by the American people at the beginning of the last century.

It is unrealistic, in my opinion, to maintain some of our present defence items when we all agree that they would be inefficient against the only threat really conceivable.

We have Bomarc bases. Now, we all know that these bases do not represent actually any kind of protection. Yet, we continue to maintain them, perhaps, to please our allies across the border. We maintain squadrons of Voodoos equipped with nuclear missiles.

Have we fully realized the extent of the threat that is hanging over us? There again I very much doubt it, because in the light of all the information we have been able to get in the committee on defence, it is more obvious every day that an attack would not be launched against our continent by long-range bombers.

Therefore, once again we are clearly behind the times.

I know that the minister has discarded two squadrons and reduced that force of Voodoo aircraft to three squadrons only. Of course, that was a step in the right direction, but that does not solve the problem at all, because I think the whole problem is based on the following question: What will the next war be like and what will be its pattern?

In co-operation with the Americans, we have developed a radar system which had to be discarded as soon as, if not before, it was completed, because several radar stations, all across the country, were closed during the last year. I am a little amazed to notice that we closed radar stations and that actually, we are building some others. It is quite difficult to reconcile those rather extreme positions.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) was obviously referring to the promises made by the Liberal party during the last election campaign when he mentioned that, after coming to power, this government was supposed to renegotiate the agreements signed with the U.S.A. by its predecessor with respect to North American defence and also Canada's role within NATO.

What has the government done in the two years it has been in power? Has it renegotiated anything? Of course, it will argue that the agreements in question have not yet expired but, in my opinion, one does not have to wait until agreements have expired to renegotiate them. The government must decide what policy it will follow when those agreements come to an end.

While I am on the subject of NATO and of Canada's role within the alliance, I might say that I had the privilege of visiting our bases in Europe. Like the other members of the defence committee, I was in a position to realize the importance of Canada's presence on the old continent, but I must say that that importance is more psychological than military because, 20 years after the war, our presence there is more or less necessary, in my opinion. I am not advocating Canada's full withdrawal from NATO, but I feel that we should be active in all organizations. What should be our role? It should be adapted to our capabilities and to actual needs. In the last year we have undertaken, as Canadians, to build up a much more mobile military force which could be put at the disposal of the United Nations. I think this is a good thing, even if it may present certain negative aspects.

I believe that our sense of responsibility compels us to take that course but, personally, if I consider the part we are called to play in NATO and our intention to increase our contribution to the United Nations, I feel it would be logical to conclude that we should reduce our NATO expenses in proportion to the intended increase in United Nations contribution, since these two organizations complete one another, to a certain extent. In my opinion, it is rather difficult to justify a double expense for the same purpose.

Considering that European nations such as France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, England and Italy regained an economic stability and a power which cannot be doubted and which are clearly superior to ours, I think it is logical for Canada to reduce its contribution to NATO and, like the great majority of Canadians, I would be pleased to see a reduction in our armed forces within NATO.

Considering our commitments, I think Canada should get ready, when these commitments are fulfilled to withdraw the major part of its military forces in Europe, leaving a nucleus of officers charged with co-ordinating the work of the soldiers in Europe and with keeping the military forces in Canada and Canadian authorities aware of any development which might occur on the European continent.

The minister spoke about the CF-104 supersonic aircraft stationed in Europe. We have all had to decide, for some time, not to renew these aircraft. If we consider the role assigned to such aircraft, I believe that the decision not to replace them is logical, and that it is also logical to conclude that our participation in the air forces of NATO should be abandoned upon the expiry of our commitments. France, Britain, Germany and Italy are sufficiently strong now to replace the few squadrons we still have left on that continent.

I believe that there is a point here that we must consider, a rather important point which is raised by our presence in Europe. It is the human aspect of the matter. It is the sacrifice required from those thousands of Canadians in Europe who have to live away from their family, their parents, their environment, their country. Several have their family with them but this is not the case for the majority. I feel there is a human problem there. In my opinion, it is illogical, in the circumstances, to maintain in Europe a force which, for all practical purposes, cannot be justified.

There is also another aspect to consider: the expenditures which contribute to increase to a certain point our trade monetary deficit with the other countries. Canada's balance of trade is unfavourable, and it is obvious that all expenses made in other countries by Canadians increase this deficit. Even though we ship the majority of equipment and provisions for our troops in Europe, it remains that these people spend a lot of money in those countries and that the Canadian treasury must pay to keep them there.

We are all in favour of a greater role for Canada in peace keeping operations. I think the action taken by our country during the Cyprus crisis proves our willingness to solve that problem even in other parts of the world.

I believe the experience of Canada in Cyprus will serve in other circumstances. Personally, I think Canada has reason to be proud of its contribution in that part of the world.

I should like to say a few words about our navy. It seems to me that, for the past few years, our navy has been somewhat neglected, with the result that, today, we are faced with a rather sad situation, and by that I mean that we now have a navy whose definitely obsolete equipment is not suited to the tasks we intend to assign to it. There is no doubt that before purchasing equipment for our navy, we should determine what part we mean it to play.

At present, following all those discussions, the committee is aware that the military role of the Canadian navy is extremely limited. Our coast line is quite extensive and we Canadians cannot expect our present navy to be able to guard and keep watch efficiently over all our shores.

It would therefore be impractical to consider such a possibility. We must also ask ourselves if, should a conflict occur, it would be fought at sea. We have all recognized that, in case of war, the battle is not very likely to take place at sea. A little of it at first, perhaps, but for such a short while that our ships would hardly have time to weigh anchor. This raises the question of whether a navy is justified for the defence of our country.

The defence committee decided that the only role our navy could play would be to destroy submarines. It is quite clear that our navy could play an important part in the detection of submarines, but I feel there is all the difference in the world between detecting a submarine and preventing it from attacking.

In fact, if we compare the features of a submarine with those of a surface ship, namely speed, depth and period of immersion, mobility, armaments, I am of the opinion that the submarine has more advantages than the surface ship.

Moreover, I think that if we had to face a war in which atomic submarines would play a part, our surface ships would be definitely in an inferior situation and we would suffer heavy losses, notwithstanding the few gains we might achieve.

Does that mean that we must give up any role in that field? Of course, I do not believe so, but we must try to limit ourselves to probabilities and possibilities, and in my opinion, the submarine detection system seems better when it is operated by airplanes and their radar systems.

If we take into consideration the fact that a destroyer may cost $10, $15 and even $20 million, according to its shape and class, and that an Argus or Neptune airplane may cost half a million, a million or $2 million; in short, if we consider the work that one may do as compared with the other, I feel that we may easily conclude that for the amounts of money available in this field, it is definitely better to increase the number of aircraft for air patrol, rather than increase the number of destroyers. It would be easier for the enemy to destroy a surface destroyer than a flying aircraft.

On the other hand, if we consider the possibility of patrolling a wide area, again the aircraft has definite advantages over the destroyer.

It has been argued that an aircraft has limited means to destroy the enemy. I think that it is true, but under the circumstances, it must also be admitted that the destroyer has also very limited means to destroy a submarine.

There is also another aspect which must be considered. When an atomic submarine is given the order to take part in a conflict, it is most probable that its only warning will be a guided missile with nuclear warhead. I feel that it is illogical to think that we can prevent a submarine from firing its missiles; even if we know its location, those destructive missiles will be ready to be fired when orders are given and even if it is destroyed afterwards, I do not think that this will make much difference in the results.

There is also something else to be considered. The purpose of a submarine is to destroy populated and industrial centres of our continent. It would surely not attack a ship because such prey is not worthwhile. If it attacks anything, it will surely be highly populated cities, administrative and industrial centres of the continent. What will be the use then of destroyers, even on the surface, if we no longer have administrative centres in Canada, if the population is partly destroyed?

At that time, our ships will have to remain at sea, unable to return to their home ports, since they will have been destroyed.

It is therefore illogical to recommend increased expenses in the naval service. However, I must recognize that the personnel of our armed forces is very well disciplined and trained, and that we can be proud of them. But I wonder whether to experience such pride, we should spend $1 billion, $1½ billion or $1¾ billion a year, to maintain those fine sporting clubs and to allow those young men to indulge their taste for adventure at sea? Should we spend yearly $200 or $300 million to provide them with toys with which they may play?

I believe this is a question we should ask ourselves. If the navy plays a necessary role, if there is need for it, in brief, if the threat to our security is real, then, there can be no question of money. Should our country be threatened, the point is not to ask ourselves what we can do, but what we must do. But at this time, we are unable to establish exactly the magnitude of this threat, and even less how we can face it.

Mr. Chairman, the expenditures of the Department of National Defence at present account for about one quarter of the national budget. I believe drastic cuts will have to be made, for its present spending is in no way commensurate with the aims sought.

Other questions obviously have to be considered in connection with the curtailment of the national defence budget, and I know that the minister himself has been severely criticized for some cuts in some particular fields.

The military establishment has been brought down to 10,000, and the minister was criticized for this action. He closed down radar stations, military bases all over the country, and for that too he was sharply criticized. Economic consequences on our economy of military expenditures will have, of course, to be considered.

Committee members have received reports about studies they had requested, precisely with regard to the economic implications of military expenditures on the country and also to the economic consequences in case of world disarmament.

We know that throughout the world countries are now studying the possible economic implications of an international agreement on total disarmament. I feel that this is a matter the study of which will be most interesting, and, so far as I am concerned, I feel sure that the members of the committee will devote much of their time to its study; for it is a problem that must be faced, considering the criticism which resulted from the cuts in military personnel and expenditures in certain sections of the country.

We all hope that military expenditures will be reduced, provided it does not affect us personally. However, I feel we should be more realistic and recognize that, if certain cuts can be made in military expenditures, we must also find ways of spending money in other fields which will be more productive and will contribute to increase the value of our country as a whole.

It is, of course, very easy to criticize, but it is much more difficult to achieve something. I know that the Minister of National Defence is conscious not only of the problem as such, but of its magnitude; as far as I am concerned, and like all the other members indeed, I shall support any suggestion tending to the reduction of military expenditures, in accordance with our abilities, while maintaining the part we should logically play in the free world's defence.

[Text]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to speak today on behalf of the Ralliement Créditiste on the estimates of the Department of National Defence, but I have changed my mind. I wish to deal with an aspect of the matter different from what we have heard so far this afternoon. I hope you will permit me at this time, Mr. Chairman, to pay homage to those of our fellow men who fought for this country, especially those who were called by the Department of National Defence when things were dark both in Canada and across the world. I am referring to our veterans, those who made the supreme sacrifice of their lives, in the service of this country. I notice the minister is wearing a poppy today. I am sure he calls to mind various poems and writings which arose out of those days of turmoil. Indeed one of these poems comes to my mind now—the one of John McCrae which contains these familiar words:

In Flanders fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses row on row.

I realize this has only an indirect connection with the estimates which are before us. But were it not for the Department of National Defence I imagine there would not be a Department of Veterans Affairs. This is the aspect to which I wish to devote some time this afternoon.

We have been talking about 25 pages of expenditure. We have been talking about figures, acceptances, transformation, integration, and so on. But we have not heard very much about the moral aspect of this whole question, something which cannot be evaluated in the book of expenditures, something which cannot be divided into subsections. It is a quality one is born with; it is the understanding and the comprehension we should have among ourselves and which nations should have among themselves. We shall be celebrating Remembrance day very soon, a time that affords a good opportunity to remember what has gone by. However, I do not think we should remember our veterans only on one special occasion. I am asking the minister as well as all those in his department and all those in this Canadian parliament that we should bear them in mind throughout the year.

The decisions which the minister has to take are, I am sure, not taken lightly. But we often forget the human side of the whole picture. We may discuss the steps which should be taken to promote the greater efficiency of our armed forces, but let us not forget one thing—if there is a war, if there is turmoil, somebody is responsible for it. It was not in the divine plan that nations should be forever quarrelling with each other; that is not in accordance with the natural law. Wars and conflicts are caused by some organization somewhere which does not agree with the principles being followed by another organization. If today there is a state of crisis between Turkey and Greece, this situation came about as a result of their legislation, as a result of their ways of living, which in turn resulted in strain, misunderstanding and, finally, bloodshed. This is not something new, but perhaps if we appreciate it more fully we may take a different attitude toward the whole of our military set-up. We buy, we plan, we produce and we build to defend ourselves against an enemy; to defend ourselves against an attack from a nation which may not agree with our views. Or else we try to help out our neighbours, as we are doing in Cyprus.

[Mr. Langlois.]

But when will we arm ourselves to fight at home? There is a fight to be fought here, too; a fight which is not carried on with cannon or atomic bombs. In this country as well as abroad I think the best war which can be fought is the war against misery, against incomprehension, against the lack of understanding which exists among nations. It is the fight against misery and poverty in our own country. If we were to abolish many of these sore spots we might save ourselves a great many of the 25 pages we are now considering in the estimates book. The evils I have just mentioned are, basically, the reasons why nations rise up against each other. Something is missing at home.

It would be the same in Canada if the situation which prevails here now were aggravated. I am talking about hunger, about misery, about social insecurity. These were the conditions which prevailed in Germany before the last world war; these were the conditions which prevailed in Cuba. And until we arm ourselves to fight this general enemy we shall have this issue to face; we shall always need arms to defend ourselves, not only against other nations but even against our own people. Legislation flows from this building and we are responsible for it. We in this parliament as well as those in other parliaments across the world are the guiding lights of the nations. Decisions are taken in parliament by human beings, by responsible men. I believe we have too often forgotten those enemies which are not fought with guns or with ammunition. This is the direction in which we need to concentrate our efforts, here at home, and right now. I think possibly that the government understands this, but it is not making a strong enough effort.

The minister had a great deal of information to give the house today. He gave us many details, but they were all related to the same picture, a material picture. I know that the generals, the wing commanders and so on have their needs. They will speak to the minister about them. But they are willing accomplices; they have a job to do and they will ask for the equipment to do that job. I ask this question, though: To what extent is their job necessary? A picture has to be complete, but if it does not fit on the wall it is out of place, no matter what kind of picture it is. It is the whole room one has to look at, not just the picture. Right now I am thinking of the affairs of this nation as a whole. I am wondering whether the minister of defence would cut down his budget—

An hon. Member: To $1.

Mr. Langlois: I do not know about $1, but at least from 25 pages to 15 pages. I think he would do so if there were less stress or tension in the world today. We ourselves have a part in building that tension. We are all individuals in this world, each having individual liberty and each wanting to keep it.

This is why we are fighting for it all the time; but sometimes we forget to use the right methods to go about it. We wait too long and then we have to take up arms to defend our liberties, or to get them back if they have been taken from us. It often happens that somebody oversteps his rights, and when that happens he is necessarily stepping on somebody else's rights. In this area we have a great job to do, not only in Canada and America but across the world. We belong to the Atlantic treaty organization, to NORAD, to the United Nations and other world-wide organizations. I think we had an example not too long ago of how race, colour, religion, nationality, social stature, and so on, need not enter into this question. I refer to the Olympic games that were held in Tokyo. The athletes there came from every nation in the world, including Russia; but there was something that struck me and most of our Canadian sports commentators over there, and this was the link, the understanding among these people.

I will tell you one thing, sir. There was no suggestion of declaring an international war at those Olympic games. They had something in common; they had a common interest; they understood each other. This is the direction in which the United Nations, NATO and NORAD should be moving now. They should be cutting down on arming themselves with nuclear weapons and trying to beat the enemy in manufacturing nuclear weapons. They should get out and try the other course; that is, beating the enemy at giving more information and helping nations to understand each other as much as possible. In that way we would at least be trying to achieve real peace, not by fear but by understanding and comprehension.

The army is needed, and so is the air force and the navy; but not in order to fight wars or defend our own skins. We need them for other things. We need organized forces like these for the purposes of which I spoke previously when the minister presented his white paper. I refer to having an organized, mobile army at home in order that we may use it when needed in order to fight conflagration, floods or any kind of emergency that may arise. In that way our forces could help this nation not only in time of war but in peacetime, and they would not have to be shining buttons all the time. It is all right to have discipline; it is all right to have well dressed officers; it is all right to look sharp. I go along with that, but as well as a smart appearance we must deal with urgent needs in this country and in the world. Canada is playing a role in Cyprus today, a peace role. But if we had moved in in time to give these people the opportunity to think about what was happening before they engaged in a quarrel, as they did, and perhaps if we had done our job three years ago in regard to that island, and the United Nations had worked in that way to greater advantage, we would not have Canadian troops standing between the Turks and the Greeks over there. It is all right to be the referee in a matter like this, but I like the rules to be laid down before anything starts.

This is the part I wanted to talk about today, a part that we often forget in this house; in fact, I have not heard it mentioned too often. I do not want hon. members to suppose that I am giving a moral lecture, because I am not. That is not the attitude I am taking and I do not want hon. members to take that point of view. I am putting this forward as something that everyone in this house should be conscious of with regard to national defence or any other activity. It is this. When we do something, we should be doing it for the welfare of the nation. When I talk about the nation I am talking about industry, about companies, about families, about municipalities, about school boards, and about every single individual in this nation; and the nation shall be itself a proud, strong nation as long as the individual stands up proudly and strongly himself. This is very much like the apple cart; the apple cart is worth a lot so long as the apples in it are not rotten. If we do not take time to correct a situation when it begins, soon we will have everybody feeling the effects of some little, cock-eyed idea of a person or group of persons; and these things sometimes cause a national calamity and crisis. We have to guide the nation, to tell the nation what to do. But we have to do it ourselves. We have to tell ourselves what to do and when to do it. That is one thing we should not forget.

I am saying to you, sir, and to the Minister of National Defence that we have a war to fight all right—but not with arms, at the moment. We have wars to fight across the world today. One of the greatest wars is fighting communism. Does the minister expect to fight communism with an atomic bomb? Does he expect to kill with an atomic bomb the idea that communism is better than the free, democratic world in which we live? He does not believe that for one single moment; nobody does. But what are we doing? We are arming ourselves in case somebody from the other side decides to take over this part of the world. But we sit and wait; we do not want to be an aggressor. I know why: It is because deep down in our hearts we know we will not attain any kind of goal by trying to destroy the eastern bloc with arms of any kind. The eastern bloc idea is for communism to creep throughout the world by one method, and it is going to creep into Canada if we let things go that far. They try to spread communism through our own social security, through our own misery at home, through hunger and misunderstanding. This is when they come in with the magic formula. This is how they got into some of the satellite countries of Russia. This is how communism got into Russia itself. This is how it is creeping now into the countries of South America where hunger prevails.

In this connection I would refer to statistics of the last world war. These are not my statistics; our dominion bureau of statistics can give them to you. They were produced by an international bureau of statistics, I imagine, although I do not know where they were picked up from. All I look at are the the figures they give me. They took long enough picking them up, so I am not going back to find out where they came from. With regard to the last world war, more people died in one day from hunger during the world crisis than during the worst week of the war. We fought the war but we forgot to fight this monster that was with us during the last world crisis. There are still signs and pangs of it here today. We sent our Canadian troops over to defend this nation, and they did it proudly. But they wanted to defend something else; they did not want only to defend us from the enemy, or prevent the enemy coming over here. They fought hoping that this country would continue to progress; that this country would be able to give three meals a day to the people living in it. They fought for these ideals, just as Americans did for America and as the English did for England.

I think the Minister of National Defence, who is primarily concerned with this business of warfare, should give some thought to this. I am sure he has already, but I would ask him to extend his thinking and meditation in this way. If he does I assure him he will have the best army which ever existed either on this continent or anywhere else, on the day we stop thinking in terms of who is stronger in the military field, and start thinking about who is stronger in understanding human beings.

We sometimes forget here the principles with which we were born. Until these principles are restored to their right place, no matter what kind of army or nuclear forces exist they will not be strong enough to appease the uprisings which occur across the world. More and more these uprisings, both in the past as well as today, are caused by hunger and social insecurity, and in many cases by regulations imposed by governments. There is enough in this world for everyone to live on, and it is up to us to distribute these goods to each and every one.

Someone has said that war contributes only to the well-being of those who manufacture or purchase war materials, and I agree with that. As a result of the last world war we were left billions of dollars in debt. A lot of Canadians were literally slaughtered, as was the growing youth of other nations. Who profited from the war? A few more millionaires came into being, but that is all; everybody else is still paying for it. Sometimes we forget that during the ten years preceding the war we needed to look down to each individual's needs and problems of the moment. We have a little insecurity in our own country at the present time. We hear talk of extremism on one side or the other, and of separatism. But if we looked at the heart of the problem we would see we had forgotten something. If this parliament has also forgotten, let it say "Mea culpa" and try and correct the situation as soon as possible.

In my own province there is an area where there is social insecurity now—the closing of a mine with consequent unemployment. Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that these people are worried about how many bombs we have or how many nuclear arms there are on NATO soil? They are more worried about whether they are going to eat tomorrow morning. If they are left in that state we will not be worrying for long about NATO; we will be worrying about the guys who come up to Ottawa and perhaps cause more turmoil than we already have. This is because of the social insecurity there is at home and the economic gaps in the system which fail to provide the people with the basic requirements, such as a home, security for their children and for their families. That is what they want. I think the government should look at this problem more closely.

I go along with the minister in reducing his defence budget. I congratulate him for this, although he has not reduced many of his activities. However, I hope he reduces his expenses a little more. He has integrated the forces. Let us hope they are all united in one group and that he will direct them to fight for this common problem across the world, the problem of hunger and misery. It is there, do not worry. Two thirds of the people in the world today go to bed at night starving, so something must be wrong. I think it is the responsibility of the government to discover what is wrong, to correct the mistake and to try to bring about a real peace both in our nation and in other nations.

I have referred to this particular aspect today, which has been left aside to a certain extent in view of the fact that Remembrance day is approaching and has brought back to me memories of the things for which our brothers fought, and possibly that has inspired me to talk on this particular aspect of national defence, our responsibility to this nation and to the world. If the minister has not got any, I have many books I would gladly lend him written by independent authors, writers, businessmen, leaders and nation leaders across the world, past and present, all of them dealing exactly with this subject. So far many governments have turned a deaf ear to this sort of plea, and thus caused international crises, calamities and wars. I think it is the responsibility of the government at least to open its ears and to listen to what nations and the people in them have to say; because when one listens to the social worker, the labourer, the civil servant at the bottom of the ladder, the farmers and their children, the housewife, and so on, and hears their grievances, he can be pretty sure that he has reached the heart of the nation. That is where the strength of a nation lies. That is where the best national defence you could ever hope for lies. Destroy it and you have not even got a country to defend.

That is where I should like the Minister of National Defence to concentrate his efforts, along with those of his colleagues in the cabinet, and give peace of mind first of all to the people who need it, to the people who want it and to the people who are yelling and begging for it. When you do this you will find you have the best national army you could ever want for a country, and it would be the best example we could give to the world to show that we can attain peace economically at home, and by the same means internationally, because the same thing would result if this were done in other countries as well as Canada.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, my first general criticism of the minister and the government with regard to defence could be summed up in the phrase that theirs is a record of big talk and small performance. The minister's publicity machine has been working overtime ever since he took office, and as a result the general public has been given the impression that great financial savings were being made and that great things were being accomplished in the way of increasing the efficiency of our defence forces, while in actual fact expenditures have increased rather than decreased and our general defence situation has steadily been weakened.

I object on general principles, and I object as far as defence matters are concerned in particular, to this kind of propaganda which gives the people of Canada a false picture of what is going on in matters of defence. It is the sort of thing which I hope the minister will stop. The Canadian people have been led to believe, as a result of statement after statement about savings to be made, that the minister was cutting down the cost of defence and thus making money available for other government purposes; or, perhaps of more interest to them, for making tax cuts.

The last speaker at one point complimented the minister for cutting down defence expenditure. That member is a member of the defence committee but he does not seem to realize that instead of defence expenditures being cut down they have actually been increased. This fact is indicated by a press release which came out only last week, on October 28. A Canadian press article by Dave McIntosh states in part as follows:

> Defence spending in the 1963-64 fiscal year rose to its highest point in the last seven years, officials have disclosed.
> Despite slashes in some navy and R.C.A.F. equipment programs, defence expenditures in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1964, amounted to $1,683,471,003, the biggest outlay on defence since the $1,759,426,000 spent in 1956-57 when the Liberal government was last in office.

This is a fact of which the general public has not the slightest inkling. I know as a result of some letters I have received and conversations I have had with several individuals that the facts contained in this article struck them as a great shock. The situation as disclosed by this article was exactly opposite to what they had been led to believe by statements made by the minister about the general situation. They thought the reverse situation was true, and there would be quite a saving which could be applied in the form of tax cuts, or for some other purpose.

The article then continues as follows:

> The Liberals, who again assumed power in April, 1963, have promised to reduce expenditures on defence department housekeeping—military personnel costs and operations and maintenance—and increase spending on new weapons in equipment. But in the last fiscal year the trend was in the opposite direction. Military personnel costs rose—

Apparently equipment costs remained almost the same as they were, although they did rise slightly. The article then continues:

> The defence budget for the current 1964-65 fiscal year is $1,526,000,000.

As I have said, more than seven months of the year have passed.

> It calls for a cut of nearly $250,000,000 in personnel, operations and maintenance costs to $1,126,000,000, a figure which many officials now say they doubt will be achieved.

I do not think there is a doubt in the world that this will not be achieved. The reductions in strength which have taken place up to date, and seven months of this year have gone by, make it an impossibility that the estimates now before us for consideration will be sufficient to cover these costs. I do not think there is any question but that we will be faced later on with supplementary estimates, which when taken into consideration will show an increase in these costs. This article in the last sentence states:

> The original 1963-64 defence estimate approved by parliament was $1,590,006,537. Actual defence expenditures were $93,464,466 higher.

The estimates for 1963-64 were prepared when I was minister, submitted to and received the approval of treasury board. However, the expenditures were made almost entirely during a period when the present minister was in office. He was the person responsible for this increase of some $90 million odd in the expenditures over what we had planned to spend for military purposes last year.

While this increase in expenditures was taking place, as I have said I will demonstrate by what I have to say in the next few minutes, our general military posture was steadily weakening, or decreasing. Before going on to some of those other matters I should like to state that I am pleased that the white paper and the minister's statement have made it clear that our general defence policy of the past seven, eight or ten years is to be continued. That is, our strong support of NATO, NORAD and the United Nations will continue to be the basis of our defence policy.

The speakers who immediately preceded me, and who sit in the left hand corner of this chamber, have cast considerable doubt on the value of NATO and have advocated in some cases that we should put an end to our NATO expenditures and apparently leave our defence in the hands of the gods. What they do not seem to realize is that no country at the present time can look after its security except through an adherence to a system of alliances. No country, particularly one such as Canada, has adequate resources to look after its own defence entirely alone. The only way in which we can obtain a reasonable amount of protection and security is by combining with like-minded nations, pooling our resources with theirs, from a military point of view, and obtaining the maximum amount of security at a minimum cost. However, we cannot expect other countries of NATO or of the western world to protect us if we are not prepared to pay something for that protection. The idea that we should get a free ride in this regard is one which is not worthy of us as Canadians, and one which is completely irresponsible and pays no attention to what is the general situation in the world today.

There is no doubt that we must continue in our support of these three great alliances, and if we expect them to continue to be effective we must play our reasonable part, and by "reasonable part" I refer to one which is related to our population resources.

In actual fact this is one of our difficulties at the present time. The proportion of our manpower which we devote to military purposes to play our part in these alliances, particularly in the case of NATO, is considerably smaller than that of most of the other members. The proportion of our gross national product which we devote to military purposes for the support of NATO has been steadily decreasing year after year for quite a number of years. The proportion of our actual government expenses devoted to military purposes has been decreasing. Our position in NATO relative to our allies has been getting worse all the time, rather than the reverse.

The main question to be asked is whether we should not really be increasing the proportion of our resources which we devote to these purposes in order to play our fair part in the defence of the entire west. One of the things I think we must also realize, but which is not realized by quite a number of people, is that our adherence to these alliances determines to a very considerable extent the size and the organization of our defence forces. We have assumed certain responsibilities to NATO, to NORAD and to the United Nations, and in order to meet those responsibilities we have provided and must continue to provide certain types of military forces. Everyone in the house I am sure is familiar with what those are, and I will not go into detail.

I should also like to note that I was pleased to hear the minister state this morning that the nuclear armament has now been supplied for the Bomarc, for some of the 104's, and for the Honest John battery, and that the armament for the 101 aircraft for the defence of Canada is expected to be supplied some time in the new year. This was one of the chief election pledges of the present government. I have been extremely surprised that they have been so slow in implementing it. I find it extremely difficult to understand why it has taken them a year and a half to implement this decision, and yet the 101's are not equipped with nuclear weapons. I believe this is an example of the slowness of the government in getting things done. Having taken the main decision to acquire nuclear weapons for weapons systems which were already in existence, I think the government has been deficient in the lack of speed they have shown in accomplishing that purpose.

Now, this is one case in which the general position of the defence force has been improved. However, in other directions we have been steadily falling behind so far as our commitments to NATO are concerned. I think the minister and most other members of the house are well aware of the fact that we are steadily and rapidly falling behind in the number of naval vessels which we have available or will have available in the years ahead to meet our responsibilities for our own local coastal defence and our commitments to NATO. This is a matter which has been of considerable concern to me because of the time lag between the institution of a naval building program and the time you actually get these ships into service. This time lag in the past has always run between four and five years. I think it is very doubtful whether there will be any improvement in the future. The present government scrapped the general purpose frigate program which had been started, but has substituted nothing for it. The minister did say today that he hoped to be able to make an announcement in a few weeks about some naval rebuilding program. However, there will be a considerable time lag during which we will be deficient in meeting our naval responsibilities.

The same things applies so far as the Canadian air division in Europe is concerned. We had agreed to provide an air division of eight squadrons of CF-104's equipped for the strike-reconnaissance role, which meant nuclear equipment. This government has equipped six of those squadrons with nuclear weapons. The other two squadrons have been converted to the reconnaissance role and are going to be armed with some type of unknown or unspecified conventional weapons. What this means, in effect, is that the actual striking power of the air division has been reduced about 25 per cent, a very material reduction in our obligations to NATO so far as air power is concerned. It is all very well for the minister and his government to talk about meeting our commitments to NATO and other people, and they have to some extent met them as they said they would in regard to supplying some nuclear weapons for the weapons systems we have in Europe, but they have considerably reduced what we had agreed to provide. They are failing in this regard.

Another thing upon which I should like to comment is the closing down of a large number of military installations. Undoubtedly —I think nobody would argue this—this process really weakens our actual and potential military strength. I am quite prepared to agree that in some cases the closing down of these installations was justified in order to save money for expenditures in other lines. However, what I do object to is misrepresenting the situation by saying that the closing down of these military operations has actually improved our military situation. This is what the minister is constantly doing. I feel the minister should quite frankly lay the cards on the table and say, we have closed this installation, that one or the other, in order to save money for some other purpose because the total amount of money we have is limited. I think it is completely wrong to try to pretend that while you are doing this you are increasing your military effectiveness when, as a matter of fact, you are actually decreasing it.

The reorganization of national defence headquarters is a matter upon which I spoke at considerable length when the bill providing the legal basis for that was before us. I do not propose to repeat what I said at that time except to say that, in my opinion, some basic mistakes were made. I refer particularly to the introduction of what has been called the supremo concept, having a single military adviser on whom the minister has to depend for all his military advice. I think the history of military organization in western Europe has shown clearly that this is not as good a system as the one we had, whereby you had a chief of staff for each service. I believe our future experience will show that this is the case.

I should like to say of course, and I think no one realizes it better than I do, that some reorganization was required at national defence headquarters. Parkinson's law had been at work there for many years, and certainly a reorganization was required. The present minister may recall that as long ago as when I was before in opposition, I used to be pointing out that this was a necessity, and pointing to some of the overgrown staffs, branches and what not. I might say that while I was minister I started on this process, as the minister is aware, by setting up a ministerial manpower commission whose job it was to survey the entire personnel set-up of national defence headquarters and to recommend how that could be reduced or reorganized. I have no doubt that perhaps a considerable amount of the work of that commission has proven useful in the reorganization which is going on there now. So far as the reorganization of national defence headquarters is concerned, I quite agree some reorganization was required. I do express reservations as to the way in which the reorganization is being carried out so far as some phases of it are concerned.

In so far as this matter of integration of the services is concerned, it has been quite apparent ever since the minister made his first statement in regard to the matter that there was no plan in existence so far as integration below national defence headquarters was concerned. This long delay in issuing a statement on what will happen below the level of national headquarters in Ottawa has given rise to a great deal of uncertainty on the part of serving personnel. There is nothing which produces decline of morale more rapidly than uncertainty, and it is extremely unfortunate there has been such a long delay, with still no prospect of a statement being made.

This morning the minister said that stage two, the next step, would be integration of commands. However, he gave no indication what the term "integration of commands" means. If he has any plan with regard to it, then surely this is the place and now is the time to make it known, so that members of the committee may have an opportunity to express their opinions on it.

Neither has the defence committee been told what is to be done below the level of national defence headquarters. If there is any plan dealing with integration below the Ottawa level the time is long past when it should have been disclosed to hon. members.

From some of the statements made in recent months by the minister and the associate minister, I gather that what seemed to be the minister's original idea of rolling all the services into one bale or one pot, if it may be described that way, has now been seen to be an impractical and impossible proposition. You just cannot move a man from an army job to a naval or air force job, and I hope the minister now has firmly in his mind the fact that fighting units cannot be disturbed very much. They have to remain pretty well as they are. It is just an impossibility to switch an infantry officer to fly a jet plane, or anything else along that line.

I would like to hear what is planned concerning integration of the administrative services. There is no doubt this is the area in which integration can be carried forward with resultant considerable savings and, I would hope, an improvement in efficiency. I would urge the minister to make a statement on this matter.

Once more this morning the minister tried to give the impression, when speaking on equipment, that these were all new programs which he and the present government had instituted, and that the improvement which would result from them would be entirely due to this government. In actual fact in all cases they were programs which were instituted whilst the Conservative government was in office.

Dealing first with armoured personnel carriers, the minister is well aware that we had a program to produce these in Canada, but unfortunately it did not proceed as rapidly as everyone hoped it would. He scrapped that program and purchased armoured personnel carriers from the United States, and I have no quarrel with that. In fact I am glad the personnel carriers will be delivered soon.

Heavy helicopters for the army were ordered and were in the course of production long before the minister assumed office, and the fact is that they are just now coming into service. The same situation applies to the anti-tank missile.

So far as the navy is concerned, the program to equip destroyer escorts with variable depth sonar was well under way before I ceased to be minister of national defence. Similarly, plans for the Oberon class submarine were advanced to the stage where they were just waiting for a final arrangement between the British government and ourselves which would involve the British buying some equipment from us. Research on a hydrofoil vessel and the production of a prototype had also been launched. There is nothing new in any of these things. We purchased four of the Hercules aircraft to see how they would work out, and if satisfactory said we would purchase more. They did prove satisfactory and now the program is proceeding.

I was glad to hear the minister say that the NORAD agreement will be renewed, thus setting at rest rumours which have been current in newspaper articles that it would not be renewed. I thoroughly agree with him that it is essential for us to play our part in this agreement for the joint defence of the North American continent.

The minister also said today that he hoped within a few weeks to be able to announce a shipbuilding program. Last week the associate minister made a statement which seemed to indicate that what is planned is some type of troop carrying vessel. If they are planning to build naval vessels which would have the primary function of transporting army personnel I hope that plan will not be proceeded with, because there could be no greater waste of naval funds than to build ships of that kind. Ordinary merchant vessels are available in large numbers and can always be secured in order to transport personnel whenever such a requirement arises.

Basically our navy has primarily been an antisubmarine navy, and its continuance in that role is confirmed by statements in the white paper. Therefore I hope the type of ship to be built will contribute toward that role, or if the role is to be changed we should be told so at this time instead of waiting until an announcement is made on the type of ship to be built, a type that might not contribute much to naval effectiveness even though it would provide some work for our shipyards.

If what the associate minister had in mind was a type of naval aircraft carrier which could be adopted for carrying personnel, tanks and other equipment, and which could be used for various task force purposes, then this means a departure in the general policy which has been pursued so far as the navy is concerned, and we should be given an opportunity of discussing that.

I would like to say something about the reserve forces but I see my time is practically at an end, so I shall resume my chair and come back to that matter later.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): My remarks on these estimates will be brief. It is not my intention to be repetitive, and therefore I shall not attempt to deal with subjects already dealt with by the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Edmonton West. However, I do want to ask the minister for a further explanation of his observations with regard to the integration program. I should like him to give, once and for all, a definition of what he means by integration. I should like him to say how far the program of integration is to go within the definition he gives. He did say that the unification of headquarters was in progress, that stage two would be the integration of commands and stage three the integration of schools. As I recall it, he stopped at that point. Are we to assume that this is the total picture, or are there to be stages four, five, six, and seven and so on which he did not mention, but which nevertheless he has in mind? If he does have further stages in mind, what are these stages? I believe the members of the various services are not completely sure what the future policy may be in this regard.

The minister mentioned savings which might accrue as a result of integration but, as has already been said, the term "savings" in this context is inaccurate. What the minister may have in mind is a direction of defence spending along different channels, with increased accent on certain types of expenditure and a reduction in other fields. I have no quarrel with this as long as it can be justified. But something which has been completely omitted from the minister's remarks is a reference to the cost of this reorganization. It is well and good to give the picture on one side of the coin only, but we must also have an idea of what this reorganization is costing in terms of extra expense having to do with the premature retirement of personnel, and so on. More important still is the cost in terms of the effort which is being expended at the present time on this reorganization and I should like to have some estimate of this cost if one has been made. I presume that at the present time a large number of personnel of all ranks are devoting a large part of their time, if not all of their time, to the solution of the problems caused by reorganization itself. This has to be placed on one side of the balance against the gains which are visualized on the other, because it is only net savings in which we are interested. If we were starting from scratch to set up a department of national defence and defence services, one system might have a considerable advantage over another. But it does not necessarily follow that there is any advantage in changing from one system to another. It is like remodelling the floor plan of a house; the cost may be greater than the advantages, or at least the cost has to be subtracted from the advantages gained.

The minister could not be expected to cover all the aspects of defence in the limited time available to him, but he omitted to mention in his remarks what progress has been made in the study which a special committee on antisubmarine warfare has been conducting. I may not have called the committee by its correct name, but I have a special interest in this subject; the committee is conducting a study of the proper mix of aircraft and naval units for the most effective conduct of antisubmarine warfare and coastal defence.

Mr. Hellyer: I referred to that in my statement.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Only briefly; but I should like to have a fuller statement as to what changes in policy are contemplated as a result of this study. If there are changes involved I should also like to know whether the minister is in a position to spell them out accurately and in detail, and perhaps he would tell us at what point they will come into effect.

I intend to say a word now about a recent announcement of decisions by the department of defence with regard to the closing down of reserve units. As is generally known, committees were appointed, one for the air force, one for the navy and one for the army, to study the position of the reserve units in all three categories. In most cases the department accepted the recommendations of these committees though, of course, not in all cases.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

I think it is unfortunate that the department did not see fit to accept the recommendation of the Hendy committee that H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte, which happens to be in my constituency, should be continued. I am perhaps being parochial up to a point, but I say this because of wider interests. I think it is an unfortunate anomaly that our small province of Prince Edward Island should be the only province in Canada without any naval presence whatever, as will be the case when this unit is closed.

The unit has been in existence for about 40 years. It has an excellent record, and in this connection I might say that all the reserve units in Prince Edward Island have always received magnificent support from the general population. As a matter of fact, on a per capita basis, compared with the country as a whole the number of people who have over the years entered the militia and the other reserve units is about three times as great as the national average. I admit at once of course that there are areas in Canada where the opportunity to join the reserve forces is not as great. However, this particular reserve force had a magnificent record during the last war. I cannot quote this as an accurate figure but I believe more than 150 naval officers who had been members of the Queen Charlotte before world war II or in the early days of world war II served in the Canadian navy during that war. This is a magnificent contribution to the war effort to come from such a small unit as this, and I believe it is unfortunate that the unit has been done away with.

I have an uneasy feeling that when the Hendy committee was appointed to deal with this subject the public was told that it had been appointed to give advice to the department as to how the money spent on these units could be used to the best advantage so that as many as possible should be kept in existence. However, the fact seems to be that the committee was actually formed so as to give these reserve navy units a decent burial, as it were. To continue the analogy, the people who thought they were being called in as medical advisers found that their duties were actually those of pallbearers. In the Hendy report I find this statement on page 27:

> While no official decision on this will be reached until—

He is speaking of the naval reserve divisions:

> —the report of the militia commission is completed it is certainly obvious that the militia are looking forward to the acquisition and use of the buildings which the naval divisions have been directed to surrender.

Yet the government was trying to create the impression that no final decision had yet been taken and these reports were being asked for in good faith. The Hendy committee had this to say about H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte, and I will quote briefly:

> This division located in a provincial capital and on salt water would be expected to have naval facilities established in emergency. The division is admirably located overlooking the harbour with communication facilities. It is not, however, using its building anywhere near to maximum use for defence purposes. . . .It is believed the militia also wish to acquire this building and it would seem that some space sharing arrangement is feasible here as in other centres. This will, of course, have to await findings of the militia commission. As the division will not be closed until December first of this year, it would seem that there would be no problem in entering into consultation and making concrete proposals at a later date, but it is certainly the committee's recommendation that every effort be made to retain this division because of its particular situation although a complement probably not more than 15 officers, 50 men and 10 Wrens is indicated and this should be borne in mind in determining the utilization and allocation of costs between the various users.

However, when the commission on the reorganization of the army reported, the report indicated that it contemplated having all the militia units that were to survive in Charlottetown housed in H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte. I can only draw two conclusions from this: Either the army reorganization committee knew beforehand that the government was going to close down Queen Charlotte and therefore it was available to them, or there is still room in H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte for the naval reserve unit as well as a militia unit. If that is the case, the justification for closing down H.M.C.S. Queen Charlotte is reduced. The explanation that was given the other day in committee seemed to be that this was just a question of mind-reading; one did not happen to know what the other was doing and it was a case of serendipity and just happened this way. This, in my mind, does not quite wash. I do not want to say any more about that, Mr. Chairman. I have lodged my statement of non-approval of what has been done in this connection, and I believe I am not alone in this respect, because this view is shared not only by the people who are interested in the naval reserve as such but by the general population of Prince Edward Island. With regard to the militia reorganization, I have no particular quarrel with the reorganization as it affects my own constituency or Prince Edward Island generally. I think it was recognized that these are on the whole excellent units and there was a minimum of reduction in the establishment there. I want to express my appreciation of that fact.

However, in the wider view I think it is unfortunate—the minister may wonder why I have any particular interest in this, but I did live in Vancouver for a year on one occasion—that the recommendation of the militia commission with regard to the Irish Fusiliers in Vancouver was not accepted. I say this because, perhaps only by coincidence, the Irish regiment in Toronto is also one of the units which got the chop, and I believe there are two other cases of units which have an historic association with some particular groups of citizens or people of some particular racial origin, at least technically. I think it is unfortunate that two of the Irish units in Canada should be wiped out at the same time. It is true that they have only nominally been disbanded. What has happened to them is that they have been transferred to the supplementary order of battle, which is a polite way of saying that they are going to be sort of embalmed to give the impression that they are still alive—the same idea as Lenin's tomb in Moscow, or something of this sort.

As far as I can read this, it has no significance whatsoever except that these units will probably be represented by some dead files in a filing cabinet somewhere in headquarters and perhaps they will have the honour of having their colours deposited in a church somewhere, and their silverware and this sort of thing may still be retained in the armouries they originally occupied. But as far as I can see, as units it is just a figure of speech to say they have been transferred to the supplementary order of battle. They just do not exist—unless it means that if at some future date there should be an expansion of the militia, these units would have priority with regard to being revived. If that is the case, it makes a little bit of sense and there is some shred of consolation for the people who are particularly interested in them.

I would like the minister to clarify that small point. I would have hoped there would be a little more awareness of the fact that these reserve units have a special meaning to the civilian population who have served in them from time to time. This may be brushed aside as foolish sentiment; but it is well to remember that the greatest military exploits of all time and the finest units in all armies of all time had this bit of sentiment, which meant the difference between being just a good, efficient unit and a superb one. That is all I have to say at the moment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there will not be time for me to complete my remarks today in just the 20 minutes remaining, but I can make a start on them. I echo the disappointment my colleagues have mentioned in regard to the statement made by the minister today. My seatmate, the hon. member for Queens, was just too charitable; he said it was unfortunate that the minister did not have more time to complete his statement. On the introduction of estimates the committee has never refused an extension of time to ministers making statements with regard to their departments; so the minister was not limited to 30 minutes. In fact, he should have gone on, and the committee would have welcomed a complete, comprehensive statement with regard to the policy of the Department of National Defence, with regard to the efficiency of the forces at the present time, with regard to our commitments overseas and with regard to the most recent announcement concerning the reorganization of the Canadian militia.

I said at the conclusion of his remarks that it was a shocking omission not to say something today about the proposed reorganization of the Canadian militia, and I will deal with that on the next occasion these estimates come before us. Because to omit any reference today, when the minister's estimates are before the committee for the first time in this calendar year, to the Canadian militia, who received a very severe blow within the last week, is inexcusable. There was not one word of thanks from the Minister of National Defence to the militia, who have served this country from its origin and who are serving the country at the present time. No ray of hope was given to those who are in doubt today as to what may be their future. That is an attitude on the part of the Minister of National Defence that cannot be excused, and I hope that some of my colleagues will deal at length with that subject in the future.

When the former minister of national defence, the hon. member for Calgary North, was speaking a few minutes ago he drew attention to the sham surrounding the present Minister of National Defence and his department. He mentioned the fact—we have drawn attention to this matter before but I reiterate it—that we have had a great press personal relations build-up of an incompetent Minister of National Defence. We have had statements on the radio and on television and press stories about what this man was to do. But what have been the accomplishments in the year and a half in which this minister has been in office? There has been a great ballyhoo across the country about the savings which were going to be made. As the hon. member for Calgary North pointed out, the expenditure in the last fiscal year was the highest for seven years. What saving has been effected in the fiscal year 1963-64? What saving is going to be effected in the fiscal year 1964-65? The estimates placed before us —the main estimates plus a supplementary estimate—indicate that on the basis of the very large figures for the preceding fiscal year there will be a saving of $100 million odd. I suggest that by the time further supplementary estimates have reached us, either this month, next month or in January, February or March, there will be an even higher expenditure in the Department of National Defence than in the last fiscal year.

How is the minister to live up to his promises unless there is more money available? This pretence that he is saving money by chopping off militia units, closing down establishments, retiring officers of long service on three months' notice and reducing the total strength of our forces represents no effective saving which has been shown to us today; it is only a transfer of expenditure from one area to another.

The minister told us a year and a half ago when explaining this matter to us in the house—he repeated it when we had the white paper in front of us and then when we had the bill setting up his supremo—that unless something were done immediately the amount of money available for replacement of equipment for the navy, army and air force would not be forthcoming but that all the money would be utilized to pay the personnel who are in the services plus the housekeeping charges. We are fully aware of that; there was to be a decrease in the amount of money available for equipment. But the minister has tried to mislead the Canadian people to the extent that he was going to make such savings on housekeeping, on streamlining the forces and increasing efficiency—these are some of his own words—that he would have money available for equipment.

About a year and a half ago he reported in one of these magnificent press releases that he was entering upon a 60 day period of decision during which he was going to place orders for equipment for the navy, the army and the air force. He is still fiddling around with this. Where are these orders for new equipment for the services? Except for certain transport planes and for armoured personnel carriers and anti-tank weapons there has been none. What about the navy? What are we going to do about the air force, with the long range policy which is planned for it? In wartime we used to have a branch of the army known as the camouflage branch. The minister should be colonel in chief of a reactivated camouflage branch of the Department of National Defence, because I say that this matter has been camouflaged. He has pretended to the Canadian people that enormous savings were being made without decrease in efficiency, when this has not in fact resulted. I question very much, as did the hon. member for Calgary North, whether the efficiency of our fighting forces has been maintained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me indicate some of the deception to which we have been subjected over these last two years. It is just about two years since the Minister of National Defence and the present Prime Minister were talking in this house about defence policy and what they were going to do when they got into office. All you have to do, Mr. Chairman, is to look back to the session of 1962-63, where you will find some of the statements made by these gentlemen at that time. I wonder whether the Minister of National Defence thinks as much of his vaunted Bomarcs now as he did two years ago. Two years ago, or almost two years ago—February 4, 1963—he said, as reported at page 3429 of Hansard:

> Mr. McNamara has not much more faith in it than I have.

That was in speaking of the Bomarc. Almost two years ago he had no faith in the Bomarcs. Now he has equipped them with nuclear weapons. What faith has he got in them at the present time? They are sitting ducks for the first missile to attack this continent in the event of nuclear war. I asked the minister several questions during the course of the last two or three months about the arming of our forces. I asked him whether nuclear missiles had been provided for the Honest John battery in Europe; whether the 104 air division over there had nuclear missiles; whether the Voodoo planes in Canada had nuclear missiles. All these things were going to be attended to. They told us that these matters should have been done by February, 1963. They said we were not living up to our commitments and that these missiles and nuclear devices were to be supplied. To the questions which I asked the minister, his reply in the summer was that they had not been supplied or that he did not know whether they had. It is only recently that he has informed us that the Honest John battery in Europe may now be provided with nuclear missiles. Why were they not provided when this minister took office in April, 1963? If we were in default, and those are the words he used in February, 1963, the present government stayed in default until just a few weeks ago.

What about the nuclear weapons for the 104's in Europe? Have nuclear weapons been supplied to that great air division? I asked the minister that question some time ago and his explanation was that the air division was operative. He did not say it had nuclear missiles. I wanted to know whether the aircraft of that division were on alert stations with nuclear weapons attached to the aircraft. He just said the air division was operative. Perhaps he will answer that question now. Are nuclear weapons available for our air squadron in Germany? Are some of the aircraft sitting at action alert with nuclear bombs attached to their fuselages? The minister does not answer my questions. All we are told is that the air division is operative.

I asked him a question about the two squadrons in France which are not armed with nuclear weapons or with conventional weapons. His answer was that the photographic equipment used by those squadrons constituted armament. I do not know what sort of a missile or bullet could be fired from a camera, but that was his answer. He said we were in default in respect of our alleged commitments, when speaking in this house in February, 1963. He had been over to Europe and was talking about the nuclear equipment of the air division and said, as reported at page 3427 of Hansard:

> We were also told that the first squadron was intended to go on target on May 1, 1963 and that in order to go on target a bilateral agreement would have to be signed with the United States by November 1—

That was November 1, 1962. Then he continued as follows:

> —NATO headquarters in Europe puts a very high priority on that particular project. The infrastructure, as it is called, the runway extensions and the ammunition depots to contain these weapons were being built under top NATO priority. It was being considered by the supreme commander and his associates to be an urgent matter because it was recognized that Canada, at the time we were there in November, was in default.

That reference is also November, 1962.

The minister then went on to state:

> Well, if we were in default then we are that much more in default at the present time.

The minister made those statements on February 4, 1963. I state to the minister that we were in worse default from the time he took office in April, 1963 until just a few weeks ago than at any time when we had the responsibility for our NATO commitments.

The present minister retired the Sabre jets from the air division in Europe before the 104's had been completely delivered, ready for operations, and before missiles were provided. For almost one year the air division in Europe could not even fire a peanut; it had no weapons at all. That is not the proper action of a responsible minister of defence. We have yet to receive the requested information in this regard.

I have mentioned this situation before, but what I say very frequently does not get the same attention given to statements of the Minister of National Defence and the minister of external affairs. I remember very well that in November and December of 1962, as well as January, 1963, great pictures and stories appeared in the newspapers with headings such as "Honest John Battery in Europe Unarmed"; "104 Aircraft in Europe Unarmed"; "Voodoo Planes in Canada Unarmed".

Canada's defence situation was indicated to the Canadian people as being absolutely incomplete, yet for a space of almost one year the air division in Europe, presently equipped with 104 aircraft, had no weapons to discharge. Did any of you see in the newspapers of this country, the weekly and other magazines, stories about the unarmed air division in Europe?

What about the Voodoo aircraft in Canada? They have not been armed yet with the nuclear missiles about which this minister complained so much when he was sitting on this side of the house. These aircraft were to be equipped immediately for the protection of Canada. In the event there was an air attack we would be caught without missiles on the Bomarc and our Voodoos would not be able to intercept because they were not armed with the required missiles. A period of 18 months has elapsed since this minister took office, yet the Voodoos are still unarmed so far as nuclear missiles are concerned, which he said were so essential to the protection of Canada.

[Mr. Churchill.]

What is the situation in Toronto and Montreal, where the newspapers which carried those headings about unprotected cities were published? The stories suggested that the cities were unprotected because the Conservative government failed to arm the Voodoos with nuclear missiles. Those cities have been unprotected since and are unprotected at this moment.

It being five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, this is perhaps a good time to resume my seat.

Progress reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to a consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING DUTIES OF SPEAKER AFTER DISSOLUTION

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex South) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-62, to amend the House of Commons Act (Speaker on dissolution).

He said: Mr. Speaker, after having come into this house as a member of the opposition in 1962, and then after having come back into the house after the election in 1963 as a member of the government party—

Mr. Winch: Does that make a difference?

Mr. Whelan: It does in this party—I was amazed to find out how this institution we call parliament was run. One of the things that amazed me was the power of the Speaker. It is a constitutional principle of our form of government that a Speaker of the house lives and dies with the house. This principle is incorporated in section 44 of the British North America Act which provides:

> The House of Commons on its first assembling after a general election shall proceed with all practicable speed to elect one of its members to be Speaker.

In these few words, there are three constitutional conventions which are as follows:

1. There can be no Speaker during a dissolution and this vacancy continues until the newly elected House of Commons first assembles;

2. The house, when it first assembles after a general election, cannot exercise any of its rights, prerogatives, privileges, jurisdictions and duties which are normally in the trusteeship of the Speaker except one, the right to elect the Speaker;

3. The Speakership dies when the house is dissolved because the Speaker must be a member, and when the house dissolves there are no members.

Except by amending our constitution, we cannot depart from the principle that there is no Speaker of the house during a dissolution of parliament. This is so because section 18 of the British North America Act provides:

> The privileges, immunities, and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and by the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as are from time to time defined by act of the parliament of Canada, but so that any act of the parliament of Canada defining such privileges, immunities, and powers shall not confer any privileges, immunities, or powers, exceeding those at the passing of such act held, enjoyed, and exercised by the commons house of parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof.

When we refer to the constitutional position in the United Kingdom, which we cannot exceed, we find that in 1704 the house of lords and the house of commons jointly agreed as follows:

> That neither house of parliament have power, by any vote or declaration, to create to themselves new privileges, not warranted by the known laws and customs of parliament.

In the light of these authorities, it is not constitutional for our Speaker to continue as Speaker during dissolution. The constitutional position of the Speaker is recognized in section 15 of the House of Commons Act. This section provides:

> The person who fills the office of Speaker at the time of any dissolution of parliament shall, for the purpose of the following provisions of this act, be deemed to be the Speaker until a Speaker is chosen by the new parliament.

The person who is designated in this manner is authorized to prepare and sign the house estimates and to deal with misconduct or unfitness of employees. It is obvious that these powers are only the barest minimum necessary to keep the internal economy of the house functioning. It is obvious also that the person so designated is deemed to be Speaker only for the purpose of status in signing the estimates prepared by the Clerk of the House and Sergeant-at-Arms. The power of disciplining employees is that held by any deputy minister of a department, in this case the Clerk of the House.

There are other statutes which name the Speaker and in which it is not clear whether, constitutionally, they can apply to the Speaker during a dissolution. For example, I cite section 10 of the House of Commons Act respecting a vacancy after a general election; the Controverted Elections Act, the Library of Parliament Act, and others.

In 1936 the question of the status of a Speaker, so-called, during a dissolution was referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections. The reference was moved by Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King on March 23, 1936, in the following terms:

> That the standing committee on privileges and elections be instructed to inquire into, study and report on, the usages, customs and practices respecting the status of the Speaker of the House of Commons during the period of time which may elapse between any dissolution of the House of Commons and the assembly of a new parliament, and in particular the rights, prerogatives, privileges, jurisdiction and duties ordinarily and customarily exercised by the Speaker under such circumstances in previous years in Canada;
> And, also, the status of clerks, officers, messengers or other persons attendant on the House of Commons, distinguishing between such persons as are permanent officers and such as are temporary and those whose duties are of a sessional character;
> And the right and proper procedure to be adopted with respect to the retention or dismissal of any such employees;
> And that the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day, as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and members of the house.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this reference was made to the standing committee on privileges and elections as a result of the action of the Speaker in dismissing some employees before a new Speaker had been appointed. One of the main reasons for drafting this bill was, as I said, some of the things I learned after coming back into parliament in 1963. Before the session opened that year I was in my office in the west block and, to my amazement, I heard some strange noises in the hall. I wondered who was making these noises. These noises were made by a former minister of the crown and the former Speaker, which I thought was rather strange at the time. The Speaker was checking on the offices, who was in them, how long they had been in these offices, and so on. I asked him what he was doing, and he said he was still the Speaker of the house and still had these powers. I wondered at that time how a person could be appointed a minister of the crown and still be the Speaker of the house, a position that is held in high regard and beyond patronage and political influence. I wondered how a person could be the Speaker, then a minister of the crown, and then go back to being the Speaker. This is why I feel that when the house is dissolved this responsibility should go to the Clerk of the House in whom we have the utmost confidence, and we actually state he has this authority now. I urge the house to adopt this bill so that we will not again have this type of operation during dissolution of parliament.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this is rather an odd bill and I hope I will not be considered a little too equivocal in regard to it. I think it is a good idea to bring it forward, but I certainly do not agree with the hon. member and I think a lot of the premises on which he has founded his arguments fall to the ground.

For the purposes of historical accuracy I might inform him that the reference to the committee of the duties of the Speaker did not come about as a result of the actions of the Speaker who was then carrying on, but as a result of the actions of the man who ultimately was to become Speaker, he having moved into the House of Commons a week or ten days before being elected to office and summarily fired some 129 people who were on the staff.

I can also tell the hon. gentleman that if he reads enough of the 1935 Hansard he will find that on the occasion of the election of the Speaker both the prime minister, Mr. King, and the leader of the opposition, Mr. Bennett, gave some very good definitions and descriptions of the office of Speaker, and I would commend them to the hon. member for his edification. It is a matter of historical record that the election of the Speaker of the day was unopposed, on a recorded vote, on condition that the matter be referred to a committee. May I also say that though the election was recorded on division, something which is rather strange, the persons involved were restored to the staff and some of them are still members of the staff.

I think it was unfortunate that the continuing Speaker of the day did not stand by the authority that was granted to him by the act because there would not have been all that difficulty or, shall we say, degradation of the office by another man who had been a member of the house for a considerable length of time and who decided he was going to wield a very heavy patronage axe. Therefore if the hon. member is using the incident of 1935 in order to buttress his arguments, the complete contrary is the result.

I would suggest that one of the strongest arguments is that this is one of those areas in which there should be no vacuum. Again, however, I quarrel with the language of the bill because the hon. member limits it to the Senate and the House of Commons Act, and the requirements of the Financial Administration Act must be taken into account. The Speaker is the only person authorized to sign the estimates and confirm certain appointments to the staff.

There is nothing incongruous in the Speaker's continuing in office. After all, a minister continues in office even though he ceases to be a member. So far as the house is concerned the Speaker is in the equivalent position of a minister, and there is nothing that says a minister must be a member of the house, although he cannot take his seat in it unless he be a member.

The hon. member may not be aware that in 1962 the Speaker of the house, the former member for St. Paul's, was defeated in the election, yet he administered the affairs of the house until the very day that I was elected Speaker. Thank goodness he did. I do not know if the hon. member some day aspires to that office, but may I assure him that having the counsel and advice of a continuing Speaker in office is of the greatest importance to a new Speaker.

Another incident that the hon. gentleman has missed occurred in 1953 when Mr. Speaker Macdonald, on dissolution of parliament, was appointed to the other place and appointed solicitor general, yet he continued as Speaker and carried out the functions of that office. May I also inform the hon. gentleman that the position I found myself in, in 1963, was referred for opinion to the law officers of the crown and it was found to be perfectly regular with no disability on my part. As a matter of fact, parliament having been dissolved there was nothing to prevent my taking the position of a minister of the crown without resigning the position of Speaker, because the position had fallen vacant, saving and excepting for the purposes of section 15 and also the requirements of the Financial Administration Act. Certainly the affairs of the house had to be administered by a member, and the person who carries out those functions is a member of the house.

Mr. Olson: Not during dissolution.

Mr. Lambert: He is a member of the house. He is the man who is carrying on. This is not something that existed only in 1963. It existed in 1962, in 1957, in 1953 and in 1949. In 1945, Mr. Speaker Glen went into the ministry and in 1949, when parliament resumed, Mr. Speaker Fauteux took his seat as an ordinary member until he was appointed to the office of lieutenant governor a matter of a few months after returning to parliament. But he did act in that period between the dissolution of parliament and the election of Mr. Speaker Macdonald in 1949 or early in 1950.

I have no precise knowledge of what happens in the United Kingdom but I would be the most surprised man in the world if there the clerk were to become speaker pro tem. At no time do we consider an administrator or a deputy minister as eligible to take on the duties of a minister, certainly, within the statutes which parliament has determined. He may, of course, make certain decisions, but under the terms of the Financial Administration Act he would have no power to sign documents, which can only be signed by a minister or an acting minister. This is why we have acting ministers—so that there may be someone who can act at ministerial level. Again, with the Clerk of the House in the chair, I feel that when we come to the election of a Speaker there is a neat point about rulings at that time. The Clerk of the House simply presides in a silent way during the election of Mr. Speaker. He is not the presiding officer of this house. All he does is to read out the letter summoning hon. members to the bar of the other house to attend upon the deputy of His Excellency in order that they may receive instructions from him to elect themselves a Speaker. Then the Clerk of the House is merely in the position of indicating to hon. members that they may have the floor if they wish to propose candidates for the office. Beyond that, the Clerk has no power in this house. He is not in a position to make any decision affecting the members and I would say that in my opinion we would be placing the Clerk of the House as such in a most invidious position were he elevated to a position of authority and protocol as far as the Speakership is concerned.

As I say, there have been other proposals from time to time that there should be a permanent Speaker of this house—that he should be a kind of supra-official, not a member of the house. That is in the same category. But if we stick to the principle that Mr. Speaker should be a member of this house, then I put it to hon. members that it is the Speaker who was in the chair at the time of the dissolution of parliament who should continue to fill the office until a new Speaker has been elected by the house.

As far as the ministry is concerned, again, for the purposes of the Financial Administration Act, if unfortunately there should be a decease or a resignation, a vacation of office for some such reason, then an acting minister takes over, not a deputy minister. I put it to hon. members that this practice should continue and I think it is far better for the administration of the affairs of this country that Mr. Speaker who occupied the chair at the time of dissolution should continue to discharge the duties of that office which it is necessary for him to discharge. With all due respect to the Clerk of the House, he is not Mr. Speaker, and therefore Mr. Speaker should continue in office until he is replaced.

After all, there is always a possibility that Mr. Speaker will be re-elected. This happens usually if the administration continues. There is nothing to bar him even if there is a change, though we know of the practical difficulties which may arise. It does happen. In 1957-58 it would have been ludicrous to have Mr. Speaker Michener stand down for all purposes and then come back immediately the new parliament was re-opened in May, 1958 to be re-elected. The same applied to Mr. Speaker Lemieux who carried on for more than one parliament.

So, with the greatest of respect to the hon. member who has put forward this idea, I think that for a multitude of reasons it would be preferable on balance to continue the present arrangement. Since the burden of showing the desirability of change is upon the hon. member who is proposing a change to the house, I suggest the hon. member has failed to discharge that burden, the reasons he has advanced being insufficient.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) by the introduction of this bill has focused our attention upon a problem. However, I do not feel that the terms of his bill solve that problem and I think there are manifest reasons why the bill in its present form should not be passed by the house.

At the same time I do not suggest that we simply talk the matter out. It seems to me this is a subject which might well be considered—I mean the subject itself, not the hon. member's precise proposal—and at the end of my remarks I intend to move an appropriate amendment. As a matter of fact, hon. members who know the composition of the special committee on procedure and organization will not be surprised if I say that my good friend from Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) knows of the amendment I am about to move and is prepared to be named as its seconder. I may say at this very moment that the purpose of the amendment I shall move will be to refer the subject matter of this bill to the special committee on procedure and organization, which has already indicated in a report to the house that the question of the Speakership is among the items on its agenda.

I suggested that the hon. member is perfectly right in pointing out that this is a problem. As he has told us, under the terms of the British North America Act a person cannot be Speaker of the House of Commons with all the rights and privileges which pertain to that office when there is no House of Commons of which he can be a member. But he has also pointed out that the functions which Mr. Speaker carries on after dissolution and before a new Speaker is elected are not the functions of Mr. Speaker in this chamber; they are the administrative functions set out in the House of Commons Act, in the Financial Administration Act, and so on. Nevertheless there is a bit of a problem that it would seem wise for us to look at.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is unfair for me to say, basing my remarks on what the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) himself said, that there seems to be some feeling on his part that things were not handled quite properly during the period of time when the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) was, if I may say it affectionately, a lame duck Speaker. The hon. member knows what I mean by that. I refer to the period of time when he was no longer Mr. Speaker of the house but was administratively the Speaker. If the bill is being introduced on the basis of some kind of a grudge over what happened, I do not think this is a very good basis on which to ask us to change an important piece of legislation. Therefore, if there is something to look at, let us look at it in a more calm light than is suggested by this basis.

I also think there is something in what the hon. member for Edmonton West said about this bill in so far as it refers to the Clerk of the House of Commons. I wonder if it is fair to the Clerk, in view of the responsibility that he carries as the permanent head of the administration—the deputy minister, as it were—to ask him to assume for a certain period of time what would amount to a position of minister. Certainly I would want some opportunity to discuss this with the present Clerk before we impose such a duty on him. As the hon. member for Edmonton West said, there is some relationship between the situation here, where we have a Speaker and a Clerk, and the departments of government, where we have a minister and a deputy minister. No one would suggest that in the absence of a minister for any reason whatsoever, the deputy minister should become the minister. Is it not, therefore, a bit strange to suggest that the deputy head of the House of Commons administration should become the head for that period of time?

Mr. Winch: It would make it political, too.

Mr. Knowles: It would also involve the Clerk, as my hon. friend from Vancouver East suggests to me, in decisions which, whether it is correct or not so to designate them, are sometimes thought to be political. The administrative things that the person acting as Speaker has to attend to after an election, between an election and the first meeting of parliament, even such matters as the allocation of rooms, secretarial staff, seating arrangements in the House of Commons and appointments, can certainly seem to have political connections.

I know that I had to deal with Mr. Speaker Michener on the question of seating arrangements after the 1962 election. I had to deal with Mr. Speaker Michener—at least, I tried to deal with him—on the question of our trying to create a vacancy so that our leader could come into the house. I had to deal with Mr. Speaker Lambert after the 1963 election on one or two of those same issues. Actually, I did not get satisfaction from either of those two Speakers, but that is beside the point. The issues I was raising then were admittedly political in character.

Mr. Lambert: You did not get all you wanted.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Edmonton West says I did not get all that I wanted. That is a fair comment. But I think it would have been most unfair for me to have to place these matters before a permanent official such as the Clerk of the House; in other words, to present him with issues which would in effect be political in character. Therefore I believe there is a lot in this question that has to be looked into.

Also, as the hon. member for Edmonton West has pointed out, there is discussion in the country about the possibility of our achieving something in the nature of a permanent Speakership. I am afraid that phrase is a bit of a misnomer. If we ever achieve it, it will not actually be permanent, but what we may achieve some day is a tradition whereby a Speaker continues from one parliament to the next, and I hope such a tradition may some day be established. Twice in our history, in the case of Mr. Speaker Lemieux and in the case of Mr. Speaker Michener, the Speaker did get elected to the chair in a second parliament.

It seems to me this is not the time to try to disturb the present statute by seeking to pass a bill like this during the course of this one private members' hour. As I have already pointed out, the fact is that the subject of the speakership is on the agenda of the special committee on procedure and organization. It is not a secret; this agenda was given to the House of Commons in the first report made to the house by that special committee and it is listed there in black and white. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we should not prejudge this issue by a decision made here at this time, but rather that we should refer this question and all its various angles and aspects to that committee. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson):

That Bill No. C-62 be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the special committee on procedure and organization.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I want to make it clear now that I had no personal grudge against the former Speaker of this house. I said there was noise outside my room. He never bothered me in my office. There would have been a lot more noise if he had. But I could not for the life of me see how a minister of the crown could go back to being Speaker, because as far as I can see there is no way we can get away from the fact that he would not be neutral to the extent that the Speaker should be.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since this is not a point of order, perhaps the hon. member could make his remarks by speaking to my motion.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in seconding this motion to refer the subject matter of this bill to the special committee on procedure and organization. I want to say at the outset that, although I see some merit in the bill that has been presented to the house this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan), it does not in my view take care of the entire problem and, as has been said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), it seems perhaps unfair to expect the house to deal with this matter in one hour and delve into all the details of the problems and the possible solutions without having the matter referred to a committee where we can call witnesses for advice.

I think Bill No. C-62 does, in its intentions, tidy up some anomalies perhaps in the official position of Speaker during dissolution, and certainly we should be concerned about it. I should say, also, that some consideration is being given to taking care of the anomalies that we have and the contradictions in the law. For example, the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) quite properly pointed out that under the British North America Act the House of Commons shall appoint or elect one of its members to be the Speaker. There is a contradiction here. All of us know that as of dissolution there are no members of the House of Commons. Therefore if the Speaker must be a member of the house there appears to be some contradiction.

It has been argued that ministers of the crown carry on after dissolution; but it has also been pointed out that ministers of the crown do not have to be members of the House of Commons. Therefore I do not believe that this parallel takes care of the situation. I do not believe in many other respects that there are differences between the position of Speaker, so far as one administering what may be termed the legislative branch of government, and that of a minister of a department, although they are not quite the same.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) contended that he checked with the law officers of the crown during that period between dissolution and the next session of parliament to make sure that he did in fact have the authority to carry on the duties of Speaker. However, I think the reason the law officers gave him that opinion was that there was nothing else for them to do. There is no other provision to provide for the carrying on as head of the legislative branch of parliament during such a period.

I do want to be very brief, Mr. Speaker, in regard to this bill. I think there is some merit in transferring this authority to the Clerk of the House of Commons during dissolution of parliament. At the same time I see some problems arising therefrom, because if you read the bill carefully you will find it provides that:

The Clerk of the House of Commons at the time of any dissolution of parliament shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to be the Speaker until a Speaker is chosen by the new parliament.

I believe there may be some validity to the argument that the Clerk of the House should carry on some of the administrative duties of the Speaker, but I think those duties should be considerably restricted and by no means amount to the total authority of a Speaker during dissolution.

This brings up the thought, of course, which many of us have held for a long time, namely that there be a permanent Speaker. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) stated, and I agree, that no member of parliament has ever advocated that a Speaker should continue to hold office on a permanent basis without being re-elected from one parliament to another. This bill specifically deals with that period between parliaments; it does not deal with the period between sessions of the same parliament. So that even if this house did take action to elect a permanent Speaker for an entire parliament, it would still not take care of the period from the date of dissolution of one parliament to the assembly of a new parliament.

I do not want to take up any more time because other hon. members want to speak to this bill, particularly in view of the fact that an amendment has been moved to send its subject matter to a committee. But I do urge all hon. members to support the sending of the subject matter of this bill to a committee because, after all, the committee on procedure and organization has under consideration the Speakership of this house. It is well known to members of the house that there have been some changes in the administrative staff under Mr. Speaker during the past few months. I do not think we should consider those changes as being a complete revision of the administrative staff set-up of this house and which is under the Speaker. This is another of those anomalies which needs to be tidied up, and certainly this should be done before any committee considers the matter and witnesses are called before it.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have before the house an amendment to the House of Commons Act to change the status of the Speaker of the House of Commons in order to confer some of the responsibilities which he now exercises upon the Clerk of the House. I may say that in my view this is a very sound proposition and well worth consideration. I say that because of the circumstances which occurred after the end of the election in 1963 and in view of some of the incidents which arose at that time.

Other hon. members have pointed out to the house the responsibilities which rest upon the Speaker when the house is not in session and even when there is no parliament in existence. He has the responsibility of surveying in an administrative way the functioning of the house. He also has other very important responsibilities. However, I suggest in this connection, as in all other connections affecting the Speaker's duties, that we should bear in mind that the prime requisite of his duties is that he be impartial.

Perhaps the duty of a Speaker has never been better expressed than in the following quotation from Hon. Ernest Lapointe, which is quoted in an article by James H. Aitchison of Dalhousie University entitled "The Speakership of the Canadian House of Commons". He said:

> "Impartiality on the part of the Speaker is the supreme law of his office. It is essential that every member should have the conviction that when our colleague ascends the throne of the Speaker he ceases to be the man of the party and becomes the man of the whole house."

That is the end of the quotation from Hon. Ernest Lapointe. Mr. Aitchison continues:

> When Lapointe moved the election (for the second time) of Lemieux to the Speaker's chair he formulated in these words the prime requirement of the Speakership of the popular branch of the legislature of a parliamentary democracy patterned on the classical British model.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, the Speaker is placed under a duty to abstain from partisan political action not only in fact but to make it apparent to all, and particularly to his fellow members of parliament, that he has no part in party politics. He is in fact like Caesar's wife: Not only must he be pure but he must be above suspicion.

The particular incident from which I understand this amendment arises relates to the activities of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) when he was still occupying the position of Speaker following the election in April 1963. The hon. member made some reference to the fact that at that time he was exercising those duties; he also made some reference to the fact that he was exercising them even though, during the interval after he was elected Speaker of the House, he accepted a position as minister of the crown. So that while he was under the solemn trust to the members of the House of Commons as their Speaker he accepted an appointment as a minister of the outgoing government and participated actively in a campaign against those members of the House of Commons to whom he owed the duty of impartiality.

The Speaker is in an anomalous position when elections are called because he must be re-elected to the house. However, I would point out that while he may be under an obligation to regain election in his own constituency he certainly is under no obligation to carry on an active campaign on behalf of the government in office as a whole.

It is my opinion, Mr. Speaker—and I put it forward respectfully to the house—that this was a serious thrust at a fundamental democratic right in this country. Perhaps criticism of this particular action has not been put better than by a native Albertan, a distinguished academic from the hon. member's own province, Mr. Denis Smith, a former lecturer in political science at York University, now at Trent University, in an article which he wrote appearing in the Canadian Forum for April 1963. He refers in particular to the state of the Speakership at that time and says:

> The election of Mr. Michener was auspicious; his unanimous re-election to the chair in the 24th parliament suggested that the prime minister—

The reference in that case is to the hon. member for Prince Albert, the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

> —and the whole membership of the house, had learned the lesson of the pipe line debate. But from then on, while Mr. Michener dignified the Speakership, the prime minister—

Again I would remind the house that that is the Leader of the Opposition.

> —progressively allowed political interest to cloud his conception of an independent Speaker. The office of Deputy Speaker was used, as the Speakership had once been used, as a test for prospective ministers. The prime minister did not always defer to the Chair, as parliamentary practice and the prime minister's own conscience should have demanded. Finally, after the defeat of Mr. Michener and the accession to the chair of Mr. Lambert in the last parliament, Mr. Diefenbaker gave up entirely his belief in an independent Speaker. In his desperate search for ministers after the cabinet crisis, he turned to Mr. Lambert, and by implication made the Chair once more a stepping-stone to political office.

We have in question here, Mr. Speaker, not so much the question of whether or not it is desirable for the Clerk of the House to exercise these duties, and my personal opinion is that the present Clerk of this house as an experienced former member of this house is well qualified in the operation of the administrative duties of this house, but the question of conflict of interest which faced the hon. member for Edmonton West when he was in that particular position.

It is my suggestion that the best way in which we can remove that conflict is by taking the responsibility for these administrative duties away from the Speaker when he is in this kind of half life—in the position of perhaps not having been re-elected or, if re-elected, not having been selected again as Speaker of the house.

Mr. Speaker, the kind of measure which the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) has put forward is the kind of measure which should commend itself to the house so that that kind of conflict of interest or breach of the impartiality which is expected of the Speaker will not occur again.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, I am not attempting to justify myself. The point I am making is in respect of the office I occupied. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice should take that statement from Professor Denis Smith's article, whose father is the distinguished chief justice of the province of Alberta, in context with the fact that Mr. Smith is primarily interested in the establishment of a continuing Speakership. That is the thread of his article.

The hon. member for Rosedale, of course, failed to mention Mr. Speaker Macdonald, Mr. Speaker Glen and Mr. Speaker Fauteux, all of whom were my predecessors in office.

Mr. Winch: Why did he not mention René Beaudoin who was in office in 1959?

Mr. Lambert: There has been no change in the position. Mr. Speaker Macdonald was solicitor general at the time he was carrying on these duties. These duties must be carried on.

Perhaps the hon. gentleman will indicate to me just where, in theory, there is impartiality on the part of the Speaker in the British house between dissolution and re-election. At this very time I dare say Hon. Sir Harry Hylton-Foster has not campaigned, but it is certainly a fact that a Speaker is going to campaign in the light of what the situation is at the present time. If the hon. member would guarantee that Mr. Speaker in office at the time of dissolution shall not be re-elected, then perhaps he would have a stronger point.

The fact that Mr. Speaker engages in a political campaign during the election campaign while at the same time coming into this house and carrying on with the administrative duties of his office surely does not indicate that he will not exercise impartiality. I have not heard anyone suggest that there has not been impartiality in this regard. If anyone thinks that to be the case, let him have the courage to stand up and make the charge. I do not think any of my predecessors in office would hesitate to put their records before the house, and I certainly am not afraid to do so.

I do not know whether the hon. member is aware of the ambit of the work of the special committee on procedure, which already has indicated that the powers, perquisites, duties and responsibilities of the office of Mr. Speaker shall be the subject of a continuing study by this committee. I am a member of that committee and I can assure you that this matter is being studied. As a matter of fact, one of the individuals who is making a study of the office of Mr. Speaker is Professor Denis Smith. He is preparing a memorandum, at the request of the committee, to assist the committee in this regard.

The hon. member for Rosedale was trying to make the point that there was something political in this question, and he picked out perhaps the only part of the article, out of context I may say, so that he could make these political points. His effort falls miserably in this regard, and I do not think anyone will take him seriously.

Mr. Winch: He certainly does not know history.

Mr. Lambert: As far as history of the office is concerned, I would suggest to the hon. member that he read Mr. Philip Laundy's book "Office of the Speaker". I commend that book also to other members of this house.

Mr. Macdonald: I will lend that book to the hon. member. I have it here.

Mr. Lambert: I have read it several times. Undoubtedly the hon. member got his lead to Professor Smith's article from a footnote in Mr. Laundy's book.

Mr. Macdonald: It is a pity you could not understand it.

Mr. Lambert: I commend that book to the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan).

In so far as the subject matter now being referred to the committee, I am quite happy, and I will resume my seat so that can be done.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour for consideration of private members' business has expired.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Before you leave the chair, is it the wish of the house that this private members' bill retain its position?

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I presume the business for Monday will be as previously outlined.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 9, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT ON LEGISLATION TO BE CONSIDERED

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. leader—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The right hon. leader of the government wishes to make a short announcement.

In accord with the understanding reached at the party leaders' meeting this morning I wish to announce merely that after three separate discussions and in spite of our best efforts, we were unable to agree on a program or timetable of work for the rest of the session.

Speaking on behalf of the government I should inform the house, as I promised to do, that the government considers the following matters should be dealt with before Christmas, and I give them not necessarily in order of time priority. First, estimates; redistribution bill; report of the flag committee; the labour standards bill and the pensions bill.

The order of business proposed for this week has already, I think, been given to the house. Today, as the house knows, we will be dealing with the pensions resolution, and tomorrow and the rest of the week—on Wednesday the house will not be sitting—redistribution and estimates. It should be possible, I believe, to deal with the matters I have mentioned in a month or so. If we do better than that and there is additional time before Christmas, there are other measures on the order paper which could be brought forward. I also have to make the customary and necessary reservation that any program of work is always subject to change due to any emergency developing.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there are one or two references I intend to make in reply to what the right hon. leader of the government has said represents the situation. We were together on three occasions, and I think it only proper that I should say at once that in so far as the objective is concerned as set forth by him, regarding what might be done before Christmas, I think each and every one of the matters referred to is necessary, and there is no reason why redistribution, the pension bill and those matters to which he referred other than the flag should not receive immediate attention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the flag question is concerned, I did not intend to go into that matter until I got the helping hand or the helping voice of some hon. gentlemen opposite. Certainly our attitude throughout was one of opposition to the three maple leaves.

Mr. Matheson: The royal badge.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We took our stand. Those sitting opposite said we were wrong; then when the committee met the Liberal members all agreed that we were right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We were unable to agree with the suggestion that we should apply to ourselves a self imposed closure, but my own feeling is this. In so far as the flag debate is concerned, this represents the views of my caucus, the caucus of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I think quite a number wish to express themselves on this matter. That does not mean they will be repeating themselves more than once, but they have their views to express and they do not intend to have imposed on them anything in the nature of a closure, other than, of course, if the government chooses in its wisdom to bring about that measure; and we will come to that matter if it arises.

We do feel, however, that in order to expedite the business of the house Canadians as a whole would expect us in this house to vote on the question of whether there should be a plebiscite. A resolution was before the house; it was amended, and two subamendments were moved. One of the subamendments was dealt with on September 1. In so far as the subamendment that still stands is concerned, and the amendment, we would like these voted on. As far as the Conservative party is concerned, Her Majesty's loyal opposition—

Mr. Matheson: Not very loyal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —there would be no debate on that question at all. I do not know whether that interruption came from the putative father of confederation, but if it did all I can say is this; that it was he who said that the three maple leaves flag was in the tradition of the country and represented everything, and then he swallowed himself on it in committee.

In so far as our desire for a plebiscite is concerned, we do not want to debate the amendment or the subamendment, and to expedite matters I give the undertaking that if the government will give an opportunity for a vote on the amendment and subamendment we will vote on those amendments without any further discussion on our part. In so far as the resolution as it stands is concerned, we would then give our consent and approval to its immediate removal from the order paper. In other words, we want to give Canadians an opportunity of knowing what is the attitude of the House of Commons on the subject of the plebiscite, which according to a private television poll, a very large poll, has the support of 64 per cent of the Canadian people. I refer, of course, to Telepoll. We would then proceed with the recommendation of the committee and deal with it, not in a spirit of obstruction by any means—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was not obstruction before, Mr. Speaker, because what we said turned out to be the view of all the Liberal members of the committee. I am sure that we, as all members of the house, will do our part to the end that these matters will be decided in time in a reasonable and fair manner, so that we may get on with the calling of the next session by the government.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the members of this party regret that we have not been able to work out a satisfactory timetable for the business of the house for the balance of this session. However, I should like to stress two things which as far as this party is concerned are well known. We are desirous of accomplishing two things, and I place them in their order of importance.

First of all, we are desirous that a limited legislative program be completed before the end of this session. We would place as the essential items in that program the Canada pension plan, the labour standards act, the redistribution bill and the estimates. We think those matters ought to have top priority.

Second, we are interested in having the report of the flag committee disposed of. Indications are that there is very wide support in this house for that report, including support from members of all political parties in the house. I am told that at one time on a vote all 14 members of the committee voted in favour of a single maple leaf flag. However, it is not my intention to discuss the flag question at the moment but simply to say that we are quite anxious to see the flag question disposed of. But we are not prepared to pay as the price for disposing of the flag question the sidetracking of any of the legislative items which I have mentioned.

For that reason I do hope that the items which the Prime Minister read out are not necessarily to be taken in the order in which he read them. We would hope that redistribution, the labour code and the Canada pension plan can be disposed of before we deal with the report of the committee on the flag. I see no reason why we cannot dispose of all the items, including the flag question, but I do make a special appeal to the government not to allow the debate on the flag committee report to prevent us passing the other more vital and important items. I also hope that when the flag question comes up, even though we have not been able to agree on a limitation of time we will have the co-operation of the official opposition in disposing of it with the greatest possible dispatch.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, if every party in this house had shown good faith in determining the legislative program to be passed before the end of the session, we could have reached an understanding and settled the problems which face us at this moment.

After attending a meeting, I believe that it was especially good faith which was lacking on the part of the official opposition. Only a few items remain to be discussed before the end of the session. This year we have already beaten the record for the length of any session. We discussed the flag issue for more than 22 days, and it still seems to be the stumbling block. In my opinion, this is a lesson for the Canadian people, because if the 265 members in this house cannot come to an agreement, how can we expect any agreement in Canada on the most important problems?

Mr. Speaker, I say that bad faith in some quarters prevented us from coming to an agreement and that will happen again in this house as well as throughout the country.

For instance, again today at noon following the very sensible statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) challenged the government with regard to the imposition of closure. Such a stand is an obvious proof of bad faith because the government has not talked about closure yet.

When the leader of the official opposition states that 30 members of his party want to talk on that matter, that means of course 15 hours of debate or roughly three sitting days.

I feel that things should be settled once and for all because the four other parties were ready to agree to the suggestion that the bills dealing with the pension plan and redistribution as well as the labour code be adopted first. If it had been possible to come to an agreement on the consideration of the estimates, we could have ended this session and passed all the items which have yet to be considered.

I believe that it would have been very easy to come to an agreement, and if we did not reach one I think that all those party leaders' meetings should stop as long as good faith is not the basis for discussion between the leaders of the political parties in this house.

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, certain questions of substance have been raised and certain questions have been addressed to the government about the procedure that might be followed. I can deal with them immediately so as to clear up the points that have been raised.

In so far as the proposal made by the right hon. gentleman is concerned, that we should deal with the amendment and subamendment to the resolution on the flag, which was previously before the house, before we deal with the report of the flag committee, as I have already stated we are quite agreeable to that providing there is a time limit on the debate on the subject of the flag committee report.

So far as the proposal of the leader of the New Democratic party is concerned, that the pension bill be given very high priority, even before the flag discussion, with the understanding that there would be a time limit on that discussion we are very glad to accept that proposal, as I announced at the all party meeting.

UNITED NATIONS

COMMUNIQUÉ ON OTTAWA MEETING ON STAND-BY UNITS FOR PEACE FORCE

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house I should like to table a communiqué, both in English and in French, issued following the conference on United Nations peace keeping operations, which took place in Ottawa from November 2 to November 6, and ask that it be made an appendix to today's proceedings.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree that the communiqué shall be made an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of communiqué above referred to, see appendix.]

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (for Mr. Asselin, Notre Dame de Grâce) moved that the third report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on Thursday, November 5, 1964, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACEWAN—DISCLOSURES TO PRESS RESPECTING NEW INDUSTRIES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question of privilege which affects all members of the house and particularly the people of the province of Nova Scotia and the constituency I represent. It has reference to a press report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of last Saturday, November 7, dealing with a statement by Premier Robert Stanfield. The report reads in part as follows:

> Premier Robert Stanfield yesterday scored what he termed "federal authorities" and "federal sources" for premature disclosure to the press of secret negotiations that have been going on concerning three industries interested in settling in the province.

Reference is made to a proposed car plant for the Sydney area of Cape Breton, a recording machine manufacturing company for Halifax, namely the Clairtone company, and a pulp and paper mill for Pictou county. The premier went on to point out that negotiations had been going on between the provincial government and these companies, and that disclosures had been made to the press by what he referred to as federal authorities and federal sources in Ottawa. The article goes on to report him as saying:

"Yesterday when I read the federal disclosure regarding Clairtone I understood for the first time the depth of Angus L. Macdonald's exasperation with Ottawa."

I hope it will not be repeated. My question of privilege is that when questions were asked of certain ministers during debate in the house with regard to industries which had signified their intention to settle in designated areas, those questions were not answered because we were told it might prejudice the negotiations. Apparently these ministers have now seen fit to allow some of their officials, referred to by the premier as "federal authorities" and "federal sources", to disclose this information, thereby making it possible that the negotiations will break down and these industries will be lost to the province of Nova Scotia.

I therefore submit to the Prime Minister that this practice should be stopped, that it should not take place again in the future, and that these federal officials and sources should wait until negotiations are fully completed and the province is assured of these industries. I point out particularly that it has been stated that the Scott Paper Company proposes to settle in the county I represent, a county of high unemployment for many years. This is an excellent opportunity, and I hope that industry will not be lost to the good people of that historic county.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the first point I want to make is that this is, of course, a very fraudulent question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. MacEachen: —because it is based upon a political speech made by the premier of Nova Scotia at the annual meeting of the provincial party for the purpose of restoring the sagging spirits of the party members.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have the floor.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the minister should know that the word "fraudulent" is improper and must be withdrawn.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I used the words "fraudulent question of privilege", and I think those words were at one time used by a former Speaker of the house. I shall be glad to draw that to the attention of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask for your ruling on that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman does not even know the rules when he rises during a question of privilege.

Mr. MacEachen: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I had the floor on a question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Pictou.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I happen to have the floor at the moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the use of the word "fraudulent" is a little strong, but I think feelings were strong at the time. I do not see that any particular damage or harm has been suffered at that moment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, you have ruled the word "fraudulent" is not unparliamentary, and that is all I wanted to know. I want to say that that word, on the basis of all the previous records of the house, is not permissible, but whatever Your Honour rules will be accepted.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was not ruling on the question of privilege because there was no motion proposed. Therefore there is no question before the house at the moment. On the use of the word "fraudulent", I shall have to consult the authorities and make up my own mind.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the statements made by Premier Stanfield were, of course, vague and general, and quoted federal authorities and federal officials. I challenge Premier Stanfield to produce cases or instances of either ministers or officials of government departments making statements or being responsible for leaks about these proposed developments in the province of Nova Scotia. If cases are cited they can be taken seriously by the house and the government, but until that time they are completely unsupported.

I believe that in the next day or so it will be possible to demonstrate the exact source of these leaks, much to the embarrassment of my hon. friends across the way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman went quite beyond his rights, but we will be very interested in finding out whether the leaks to the Toronto Star regarding Banks came from his side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

QUESTIONS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES HIGHWAY DEVELOPMENT GRANT

Question No. 1,623—Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton):

In connection with a recent announcement of a grant of $10,000,000 for highways by the Atlantic development board, to be expended in the Atlantic provinces (a) what are the details showing locations of highways to be improved and estimated expenditure at each location (b) is any portion of expenditure to be matched by any provincial government?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I have been advised by the Atlantic development board that the detailed arrangements have been worked out with the governments of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as to the use of their share of the $10,000,000 grant for highways from the Atlantic development fund. The share assigned by the board in each case is $3,000,000. In Newfoundland and Nova Scotia the provinces are paying 50 per cent of the cost of specific sections of highways, while in New Brunswick the proportion will be 75 per cent federal and 25 per cent provincial, which will inevitably result in a shorter mileage in that province than the other two. The proportion of cost to be borne by each province was, under the policy, negotiated with each province separately. However, final agreements have not yet been signed. As soon as this has taken place the details of locations and estimated expenditures at each location will be made available. Discussions are still proceeding with the government of Prince Edward Island as to the use of that province's share, which is $1,000,000.

STUDY OF CAUSEWAY, LABRADOR-NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 1,893—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. Have surveys been made, by employees of the federal government or by independent oceanographers, in the strait of Belle Isle, with a view to studying the possibility of constructing a causeway nine miles long in a body of water 150 feet deep between Labrador and Newfoundland?

2. If so, what were the conclusions of such surveys with respect to preventing cold water currents from penetrating into the gulf of St. Lawrence and adversely affecting the weather in the maritimes and the province of Quebec?

3. If no surveys have yet been undertaken will consideration be given to ascertaining the pros and cons of a project which could be undertaken by the federal government to connect Newfoundland to the continent through the extension of the trans-Canada highway, the construction of a railway line by the C.N.R. and the installation of electric transmission cables?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. No survey has been conducted for this specific purpose; however, surveys have been made by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to assess seasonal temperature and salinity conditions, to forecast ice freeze-up and breakup, and to study the movement of water through the strait.

2. The results of these studies to this date indicate that the flow of water through Belle Isle strait varies in direction and speed across the strait, and fluctuates in time in response to meteorological changes. These variations in time and space are such that there is no clear evidence that on the average there is any substantial cooling of the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence because of the net flow through Belle Isle strait.

3. A survey of this magnitude would require decisions by the government as a whole.

*APPLICATION OF FEED GRAIN POLICY TO NORTHWESTERN ONTARIO

Question No. 1,941—Mr. Fisher:

1. Before the Minister of Forestry announced the "interim policy on feed grains" in July, was any consideration given to any benefits this policy would have for farmers in northwestern Ontario, i.e., between Nipigon and the Rainy river, Dryden, and Kenora regions and, if so, what are these benefits?

2. If no consideration was given to such benefits, for what reasons?

3. Was any consideration given to providing freight assistance for feed grains transported from Manitoba by truck to northwestern Ontario points and, if not, what explanation is there, in detail, for not going forward with such an arrangement as policy, particularly in view of this geographical juxtaposition, contrasted with the isolation of northwestern Ontario from normal eastern distribution points?

4. What steps did the government take to explain to farmers in northwestern Ontario how the new interim policy would affect them, including the dates of any press releases, their contents, and any information that went forward to truck shippers who transport in and through northwestern Ontario?

5. If no steps have been taken, for what reasons were they not taken?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): 1. For eastern Canada the feed grain policy applies to transportation from Fort William/Port Arthur to points east thereof. Transportation charges west of Fort William/Port Arthur are not assisted under the policy as such charges are reflected in correspondingly lower prices at the various assembly points in the west.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by 1.

WHYCOCOMAGH INDIAN RESERVE WATER SUPPLY

Question No. 2,070—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Has the domestic water supply at the Whycocomagh Indian reservation been condemned by health authorities?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No. There are four good wells on the Whycocomagh reserve with properly installed hand pumps set on concrete blocks. Officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare tested the water from these four wells in mid August of this year and found it suitable for domestic drinking water. However, the water from three of these wells does have a turbid appearance and the Indian residents have refused to use it, and insist on getting their supply from surface wells, springs and brooks.

Samples from these sources have been tested and have been found to have a high coliform count. The superintendent of the Indian agency has been advised of this situation and requested to instruct the residents of the reserve that all water from surface wells, springs and brooks should be boiled for 10 minutes before being used for drinking purposes.

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): A request was received from the township of Richmond, B.C., to lease building No. 77 (recreation hall) at the former R.C.A.F. station, Sea island, B.C.

The Department of Transport is dealing directly with the township of Richmond in the matter.

EFFECTS OF CONSUMPTION OF FLUORIDATED WATER

Question No. 2,193—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Has the government conducted or supported research into the effects on human physiology of the consumption of fluoridated water for periods of 20 years or more and, if so, what have been the findings of each such study?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Department of National Health and Welfare, in its studies over the past 16 years, primarily investigated the dental effects of water fluoridation. However, no ill effects of a systemic nature attributable to the presence of fluoride in water supply has been reported by the health authorities or by the practising physicians in the fluoridated cities studied by this department. The physiological aspects of fluoridation have of course received a great deal of careful scrutiny in the world scientific literature.

Question No. 2,201—Mr. Korchinski:

1. What industries has the Department of Industry assisted in establishing in Saskatchewan since it was first set up?
2. How many employees are there in the department?

Questions

3. What is the salary range for employees within the department?

4. How much has been spent on research or developing industries in Saskatchewan since the department was established?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): 1. The Department of Industry does not attempt to duplicate the industrial promotion activities of either the provinces or the municipalities. However, representatives of the department have been working with provincial officials and industry representatives in support of various projects in Saskatchewan to encourage the expansion and improved competitiveness of a number of industries, including food processing and manufacturing of wood products. In addition, officials of the area development agency have been working with provincial officials and industry representatives on various regional projects of interest to Saskatchewan.

2. Three hundred twenty eight (Oct. 29/64).

3. $2,280—$23,000.

4. The day to day duties of departmental officers include a wide variety of activities and it is impractical to keep detailed accounts allocating their time to each of these tasks. Therefore, statistics are not available on the costs of specific activities such as research or consultations with government officials and representatives of industries in individual provinces.

*BILINGUAL CAP AND UNIFORM FLASHES, CUSTOMS SERVICE

Question No. 2,227—Mr. Pigeon:

Is the Minister of National Revenue considering the possibility of having bilingual wording on cap and uniform flashes for Canadian customs officers and, if not, for what reasons?

[Text]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): The official badge worn by uniformed customs officers is bilingual. It is in the form of a gold coloured metal shield bearing a crown, the words "Canada", "Customs—Excise", "Douanes—Accise", and an identification number. Consideration is presently being given to a new uniform cap which will not embody any wording except "Canada". Customs uniforms do not bear flashes.

4. Ontario, 11.26 per cent; Quebec, 10.29 per cent.

2. This information is not yet available.

1. What were the values and quantities of rice imports into Canada for each of the last ten years by country of origin?

2. What has been the value of all grains exported by Canada to China for each of the last ten years?

2. On what date in 1964 did the shipping season end at the port of Churchill?

6. What was the total amount of grain shipped during the entire season of 1964 and 1963?

Return tabled.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I ask that my question No. 1,550 be dropped, so that it can be rephrased and thus more readily answered.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and question withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

HAL BANKS—REPORTED CONTRIBUTIONS TO CAMPAIGN FUNDS OF LIBERAL MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, following the expression of views by the Toronto Star regarding Mr. Hal Chamberlain Banks and certain contributions that he made to some Liberal members of the house, I ask the Prime Minister whether this report has come to his attention and whether an examination has been made of the records in the Department of Labour in this respect. Possibly the Prime Minister would speak up and clear up this matter immediately.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to speak up on this interesting matter at the invitation of my right hon. friend, and to remind him there is a motion on the order paper for the production of papers, which I hope will be dealt with on Wednesday. In fact there is no reason why it should not be dealt with on Wednesday; and if there are papers dealing with this matter that can be tabled at once, this can be done so that my right hon. friend's understandable curiosity about what appeared in the Toronto Star will be satisfied.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I knew the Prime Minister would feel that way toward the article in the Toronto Star, and I am sure the hon. members who were delighted to receive these fortuitous payments will be equally anxious that the fullest information be given to the house.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Prime Minister supplementary to that asked by the Leader of the Opposition. With respect to moneys received by Liberal members from Mr. Banks, could the Prime Minister, in order to avoid a motion to adjourn the house to discuss this most urgent and important matter, assure the house that Thursday or Friday will be set aside to debate the estimates of the Department of Justice?

Mr. Pearson: Certainly not. I welcome the hon. member back to the house, but if he wishes to make a motion of that kind, that is his responsibility.

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF STATEMENT RESPECTING MEMBER FOR WINNIPEG SOUTH CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister like to take this opportunity of withdrawing the false charge he made in his recent Hamilton speech, that I made a speech in Edmonton and used words to the effect that the Tories would bring the government to heel on interim supply?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, but I will be pleased to get the report as it appeared in the newspaper in question and read exactly what the hon. member said as reported in that newspaper. If my hon. friend had given me notice I would have had it before me now.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister consider that he is now casting doubt on the accuracy of the report of an experienced member of the press gallery, Mr. Victor Mackie, who has seen the transcript of the Prime Minister's speech and was present when he delivered it?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, but I do happen to have the quotation from the Edmonton Journal of October 3 as it appeared in an article written by Mr. J. R. Walker of the Southam news services, who was reporting on no doubt a very interesting speech made by the hon. member in Edmonton on that or the previous day. This is what Mr. Walker has to say:

> Conservative house leader Gordon Churchill said in an interview Thursday that "no decision has been made" on how the party would handle interim supply, but he admitted that the possibilities of holding it up until the government came to heel on the flag question had crossed party minds.
> "I can foresee a crisis in November", he said. "But then we have had crises before in this session and they have backed down."

Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to back down on this one, or come to heel.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN—IMPLEMENTATION OF PENSION PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour regarding the one day strike by longshoremen in the province of Quebec, who claim that the shipping federation has refused to honour the implementation of the pension plan recommended by Judge Lippe. I want to ask the minister whether his department is doing anything about this, particularly in view of the fact that the men went back to work because they accepted Judge Lippe's report in good faith. I also ask the minister what action he is taking to see that the shipping federation honours its part of the bargain entered into at that time.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have had a meeting with representatives of the longshoremen which I interrupted to come into the house. I hope to meet them again later in the day, or to be in touch with them, with the prospect in mind of making a proposal that might be a basis for resuming discussions between the parties.

The dispute centres on pension and retirement funds affecting five ports in Canada and the action taken by the trustees with respect to the Lippe report. It is a complicated question, too extensive, I think, to be gone into on orders of the day.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister if he has had any discussions with representatives of the shipping federation to ascertain whether they are prepared to re-examine the somewhat arbitrary position they seem to have taken in repudiating their earlier agreement to carry out this part of the recommendations of Judge Lippe?

Mr. MacEachen: I did have a telephone call from the secretary of the shipping federation advising me of his intention to send me a telegram containing certain proposals. I expected I would have received these proposals before I came into the house. When I do receive that telegram I hope to be able to consider it in relation to the representations made by the longshoremen, with a proposal for a possible meeting.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour.

Could the minister tell the house whether this one day strike on the part of the longshoremen in the St. Lawrence harbours is legal?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: I have not received legal advice on this question up to the present time. Presumably if I had I would not be permitted under the rules to answer that question, because it is a legal question.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour a supplementary question?

As the latter stated that the leaders of the longshoremen's union of Montreal harbour which, if I am not mistaken, is represented by Mr. Asselin and Mr. Tremblay who are now in his office to discuss the pension plan, could the minister also ask those two union leaders whether they would allow an inquiry into the administration of this fund, as asked by a group of Montreal longshoremen, whom I brought to his office about two weeks ago, and who wanted an investigation on the management of that pension plan?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: I will be glad to draw the views of the hon. member for Lapointe to the attention of the delegation later today.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I direct another supplementary question to the minister? At the same time, could the Minister of Labour ask those two trade unionists whether they could not accept among their membership the few dockers who were ousted from their union because they wanted to become members of another union?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: That question also will be noted.

AVAILABILITY OF WORKING PAPERS OF LABOUR-MANAGEMENT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the Secretary of State. I should like to ask the minister whether the background papers prepared for the current labour-management conference, which is being sponsored by the economic council of Canada, are available for distribution to the members of the house for our information and, I hope, edification.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I am happy to say that the working papers are available on request to the economic council. I should also like to add that the conference reports which will be published as soon as possible after the seminar will contain these working papers, and the published reports will be made available to all hon. members.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED COMMUNIST INFILTRATION OF FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice a question? Could he inform the house of the results of his discussion with the Quebec minister of justice, Mr. Wagner, concerning Mr. Arsenault's charges relating to the presence of communists and communistic activities within the C.B.C.?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in view of my talks with the attorney general of the province of Quebec, I am now in a position to tell the house that the R.C.M.P. is making an investigation to obtain from provincial authorities, and from any person who may have made statements on that matter, all the information that might be made available to the authorities.

[Text]

REPORTED STATEMENTS RESPECTING COMPETENCE OF STAFF

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. I should like to ask him whether the C.B.C. has sought information from Mrs. Jean Desprez in order to know who were those C.B.C. employees who are rubbish and deadwood, incompetent and good for nothing, as she recently stated, during a t.v. program, and whether the Secretary of State has obtained the results of such an investigation?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I brought the hon. member's request to the attention of the C.B.C. authorities but I have not yet received an answer.

[Text]

PUBLICITY ON NEWS BROADCASTS FOR POLITICAL MEETINGS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that last Saturday the Quebec city local station of the C.B.C., on the occasion of the regional news broadcast at 11 p.m., took the liberty to advertise a public meeting of the R.I.N. under the chairmanship of Mr. Bourgault in Quebec city, and in view of the fact that it was the first time that the C.B.C. advertised the meeting of a political party, would the Secretary of State inquire whether that is a new policy of the C.B.C. and whether the other parties, the Liberal party, the Conservative party and the Créditistes, will now be able, like the R.I.N., to have their public meetings advertised on the C.B.C. news?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

UNITED NATIONS

REPORTED U.S. DECISION TO STOP TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE AID

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Does the Canadian government intend to support the reported United States decision to stop all her aid to the principal technical assistance programs of the United Nations in an alleged attempt to solve the serious problem of the organization's constitutional and fiscal integrity?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sure the hon. member for Oxford would not expect me on behalf of the government to say we intended to support a reported decision. We would wish to make sure, first of all, whether the government of the United States has in fact reached such a decision. If it has, and after we have had an opportunity to examine the report, then we will make up our minds as to the course Canada should follow.

Mr. Nesbitt: Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us, then, whether there has been any consultation with the United States government concerning the possibility of the United States withholding aid to the United Nations technical assistance programs?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As of this date, no, sir.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

BIRD, MAN.—TRANSFER OF RADAR SITE TO PROVINCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. Can the minister say when the government intends to complete the order in council which I understand is necessary to turn over the buildings and property of the abandoned mid-Canada radar site at Bird, Manitoba, to the province? If it has been completed, perhaps the hon. gentleman will so inform us.

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Simpson: I believe the minister was ready to answer. This is a matter to which great urgency is attached; it is necessary to get the buildings off the site very shortly.

Mr. Speaker: I am not in a position to judge the urgency. Certainly it is only right to accept the statement made by the hon. member. Is the minister able to answer the question?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): It is my understanding that the order in council has been signed.

PIPE LINES

REPORTED INTENTION OF TRANS-CANADA COMPANY TO BUILD LINE THROUGH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to ask the Minister of Transport whether he or his officials had any discussion with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines before the company announced that it planned to build a gas pipe line to eastern Canada through the United States.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): It was a complete surprise to me, sir.

Mr. Fisher: Could the minister at least inform the house whether it would be necessary for this company to obtain an act of parliament or a private bill before being able to proceed with this particular project.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is, of course, a legal question to which I would hate to give an offhand answer. But I dare say an answer could be procured, and I will draw the question to the attention of my deskmate, the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if the minister could at the same time give an indication of the government's policy in connection with such a project, in view of debates many years ago which he will remember, debates which bear upon this project and the location of oil pipe lines of a similar kind.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that this is not an oil pipe line. I also have grave doubt as to whether this is a matter which properly comes within my administrative jurisdiction at all. But I will consider what the hon. member has suggested and see whether some appropriate reply cannot be made.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CONSULTATION WITH ATTORNEYS GENERAL RESPECTING PAROLE APPLICATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is addressed to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister confirm to the house that he has entered into an agreement with the attorney general of Quebec as a result of which the attorney general of that province will have the right to review all Quebec parole files? If so, has he received any similar requests from the attorneys general of other provinces, and what have been his replies or what agreement has been reached?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): The hon. member's question probably stems from a report in one of the Toronto daily papers. I may say that I had a discussion of a general nature in the course of a meeting which took place between the attorney general of Quebec and myself last Thursday on the occasion of an address which I delivered in Montreal. It is more than probable that the words in the statement which may have been made subsequently by the attorney general of Quebec in relation to the administration of the parole system have been misreported, because I am completely conscious and aware, and I am sure Mr. Wagner is also aware, that under the National Parole Act neither the commission nor the government may undertake to submit the decisions of the national parole boards to the approval or the veto of any outside authority.

Furthermore, I am aware that the question as to who ought to be consulted by the national parole board and when such consultation ought to take place is one of internal policy for the chairman and the members of the national parole board themselves. If, for instance, the parole board were of the opinion that it would be advisable to obtain the views of the attorney general of a province in a case where the public safety is involved, that practice would be up to the parole board itself to adopt, and not up to the government.

Anyhow, I could not have made any such undertaking as has been reported, because before our discussions Mr. Wagner and myself had told newspapermen that we would probably not be in a position to make a joint statement to them after our meeting because in that most informal meeting we were not permitted, and it would not have been appropriate for us, to bind our respective governments.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rhéaume: Ask him to analyse the answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lambert: Would the minister advise the house whether there has been any agreement of the parole board to consult the provinces? Is this now understood, namely that such consultation should be a matter of practice?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I just said there has been no agreement made by myself to the effect that the attorneys general would be, as a matter of course, intervening for the purpose of accepting or refusing the decisions of the national parole board. I may also add that there has been no formal undertaking made one way or the other, because I repeat that any matter such as who should be consulted, and when, is a matter of policy for the members and the chairman of the national parole board to decide upon. The National Parole Board Act gives them exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the matters placed before them, except as—

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière.

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

In the course of a speech made last Thursday evening in Montreal, before the Canadian criminology society, the hon. Minister of Justice said:

> Isolated reforms, dispensed with an eye-dropper, are useless; what we need is a truly grand charter of penitentiaries—a clear, systematic and over-all program.

Did the hon. minister mean, by these words, a complete and far-reaching revision of the present system of release of prisoners, and if so, will an appropriate legislative measure be submitted to the house during the present session, as well as the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has given me advance notice of his question.

However, I think it should have been put on the order paper.

I should like to say for the time being that since our penal system has gone through the first two stages of its evolution, the moment has come to establish an all-inclusive and integrated policy in the field of penology. Obviously, I shall be making recommendations to my colleagues in the course of this session. As I said, though, the two committees I mentioned will have to meet and submit a report before any final policy is worked out. If the question of rehabilitation can be taken up right now, I feel immediate steps should be taken and that they should take into account the rehabilitation of prisoners as much as possible. I am considering the immediate introduction of amendments such as the disposal of penitentiaries like the one at St. Vincent de Paul.

[Text]

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Minister of Justice could tell the house how soon the committees he has mentioned both in the house and elsewhere, namely on justice and penal reform, will be established.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I said to the house, and I have repeated, that in my view the establishment of the parliamentary committee ought to be effected within a matter of days. As far as the other committee is concerned, of course the question of the fineness of the terms of reference will have to be settled, and it should be a matter of weeks.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—COMMUTATION OF SENTENCE OF CONVICTED MURDERER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister about this matter the other day, and I realize he has not had very much time to look into it. It has to do with one James Meeker, who recently had his sentence commuted. I am not going into that question because the matter of the exercise of mercy in no way can be brought before the house, but I ask the Prime Minister this question. In view of the fact that two psychiatrists testified that Meeker would probably repeat his offences if he were set free, namely rape, torture and murder, and that his impulses are without concern for the effect on others and he is incapable of learning from experience, will the government not order that this man shall not be freed at any time, and that indeed in his case a life sentence shall be just that, in the interests of society and for the protection of others?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I told my right hon. friend, I think it was on Friday, that we were considering this matter in relation to this particular case and probably in a wider relationship as well. I discussed the matter with the Minister of Justice this morning, and I hope he will be able to make a statement either tomorrow or at the latest the next day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you.

POSSIBLE ACTION RESPECTING ONTARIO SUPREME COURT JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the Minister of Justice that he said he would make a statement to the house on the propriety of the continuance on the bench of Mr. Justice Landreville. Is he yet able to make a statement with respect to this matter?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, for reasons which I will be pleased to discuss with my hon. friend I must say that I will not be in a position to make such a statement this week. However, I said I would make one, and I will do so on the first available occasion.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

REPORTED REPLACEMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Could the minister tell us whether someone has been appointed to replace Mr. Robert Choquette as associate president of the centennial commission and if so, whether it is Mr. Lorenzo Paré of L'Action, as it is rumoured?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, nobody has yet been appointed to replace Mr. Robert Choquette who is leaving in a fortnight.

AGRICULTURE

REPORTED LOSSES ON CATTLE—STEPS TO IMPROVE POSITION OF EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the fact that this year the over-all loss to farmers with regard to feeder cattle has amounted to $14 per head, representing the lowest price since 1962? Has the minister any explanation to give the house for this grave situation that has developed in the industry since he assumed office as Minister of Agriculture?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is probably time that some of these wild accusations were corrected.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hays: The average market prices for steers at Toronto during the month of October for 1964 and 1963 were as follows: choice steers were $23.70 in 1964 and $24.81 in 1963; good were $22.43 in 1964 and $23.76 in 1963. The particular kind that my hon. friend speaks of, medium and common, were as follows: medium were $20.64 in 1964 and $21.44 in 1963, or less than a cent a hundredweight less; common steers were $16.83 in 1964 and last year they were $17, or 17 cents per hundredweight less.

I might also add that this year the amount of beef consumed in Canada has been about 9 per cent more than last year. The figure is 27 per cent more than in the previous six years from 1957 to 1962. I do not think the stocker market is a good one. We all realize this, but at the moment we are on an export basis. We are consuming more beef in Canada than ever before in our history, and if it were not for our buoyant economy today, and had it been like it was in 1960, 1961 and 1962, we would be in great trouble.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have grave doubt that the question was in order at all. It seems to me it should have been put on the order paper; it was not that pressing or urgent. I do hope hon. members will not start to debate this problem.

Mr. Winkler: I have a question I should like to put to the Minister of Agriculture, and it is this. In light of what the minister has said—I might add that this is the same question I put last week, and I am glad the minister is here today so that I can put it in his presence—has he any immediate statement to make on steps to be taken which may alleviate the depressed position in which the farmers of eastern Canada find themselves?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, I did invite the hon. member up to my office so that I could explain these matters to him. In so far as milk is concerned the price is almost 30 cents or 40 cents a hundred higher than it was when the previous government was in power. We have been able to get rid of all the butter they were storing and could not sell. So far as agriculture is concerned it will reach $3.5 billion this year, which is the highest on record. It is a great deal higher than it was a year ago, and many times higher than it was in the years 1956 to 1962.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I must say I am not satisfied with that reply, and wish to debate it further at ten o'clock this evening.

QUEBEC—PROVISION OF FEED GRAIN STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister of Forestry, who is responsible for feed grain at present.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Agriculture stated that the previous government did nothing for the eastern farmers, would the Minister of Forestry tell us when eastern farmers will be in a position to take advantage of the storehouses which were supposed to be built and of a feed grain agency?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I think that if the hon. member took part more frequently in the meetings of the agriculture committee he would see that the matter is under active consideration.

Mr. Langlois: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Since I am only one person, I can only be in one place at a time.

Now, because the present government had set up a flag committee I had to attend its sittings.

[Later:]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I revert to the question I asked earlier, as I did not receive a satisfactory reply. This time, however, I am directing it to the Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to provide feed grain warehouses in eastern Canada before the ground freezes over this fall?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is also a question for the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I have been asking this question for a year and I am still waiting for an answer. I think the minister could at least give an indication of what the department is going to do, if they are going to do anything this fall, so that eastern farmers will know exactly what is what.

[Text]

FEEDER CATTLE—REQUEST FOR PRICE PROTECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, November 5, I addressed a question to the Acting Prime Minister which he said he would take as notice and see that it was answered later. Perhaps I could pose the question to the Prime Minister today. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the federal government is going to move into the market to protect the level of prices on feeder cattle in western Canada?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into that matter with the Minister of Agriculture.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FEDERAL GRANT TO CONVENTION OF NURSES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Having heard that the minister granted recently a subsidy for a nurses convention which took place in Niagara Falls, I should like to know whether it is customary for the Department of National Health and Welfare to grant subsidies for such conventions?

[Text]

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. This was a request from the government of Ontario under the health grants program. The grant was made in the ordinary way, it being regarded as a worthy project.

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TO COMBAT AIR POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport, notice of which I have sent him. In view of reported statements by officials of the meteorological branch of the Department of Transport to the effect that air pollution is a threat to the future of mankind, will the minister indicate what action is being taken by the department to alleviate this problem?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid this is far too large a question to be answered on the orders of the day.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RETURN OF RAILWAY STOCK CARS TO WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any action has been taken to speed up the return of livestock cars from eastern to western Canada so the feeder and stocker cattle coming into the market places there can be shipped out to overcome this congested situation which has developed in some market places.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think this question was asked the other day of the Minister of Forestry. We are taking a look at this, and if there is anything we can do we will certainly direct the matter to the attention of the carriers.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING POWERS OF PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice based on a speech made by Mr. Lucien Saulnier, chairman of the executive committee of the city of Montreal, to the Kiwanis club of Victoria, British Columbia, on November 3 last, in which he stated categorically that Quebec must "assume many powers which are essential to the normal development of the community, including social security legislation, radio and television, immigration and participation in drawing up external trade policies"; and also that "provincial states which so desire should be able to assume external jurisdiction in those areas which are theirs at home". Would the minister comment on this? Does he agree with it—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order under our standing orders.

Mr. Baldwin: With respect, Mr. Speaker, this is the type of question asked of the minister in respect to the penal institutions, and it is following up the same matter of provincial powers. I submit penal institutions are a matter not as important as the question I am now posing to the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The subject matter raised by the hon. member is of intense interest, I admit, but I do not think it is in order to ask that type of question at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: May I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to an article in the last issue of the Financial Post which gives the views of a number of constitutional authorities, deans and professors of law, the great majority of whom oppose the proposed formula for amending the constitution recently agreed upon? In view of these opinions does the Prime Minister not consider that this matter should be referred to a parliamentary committee with power to summon witnesses and to discuss this most important issue before the formula is endorsed by parliament?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be a statement in a day or two on the procedure to be followed in this matter. Perhaps the article to which my hon. friend has referred, which is a very interesting one, can be considered, but in the meantime it might be referred to Mr. Fulton for his comments.

METHOD OF DETERMINING FEDERAL EXPENDITURES IN QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a rather important question to the Minister of Finance.

Since the report of the Minister of Finance on federal expenditures in each of the provinces and on the federal revenue accruing from every province was published last Saturday, could the Minister of Finance tell us whether the amount of $915,301,000 assigned on an equal per capita basis to the province of Quebec, or almost 50 per cent of federal expenditures in the province of Quebec, has actually been paid to the province of Quebec in 1961?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that this question, important as it is, is one for the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I would still like to point out that this report was published recently by the Minister of Finance in reply to a question put on the orders of the day.

It is precisely because it is a reply to a question on the order paper, but a reply which is neither clear nor precise, that I take advantage of the period allotted to oral questions today in an attempt to obtain precisions in regard to the reply given by the Minister of Finance.

Under the circumstances, I believe the hon. Minister of Finance should be asked to answer my question.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I still think the hon. member will obtain more enlightenment by putting his question on for discussion at ten o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I request that this matter be discussed at ten o'clock this evening.

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with great respect, I would much prefer to answer the question now if I may have your approval to do so.

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact this is obviously not my day, would the minister answer.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, all I want to say is this. The answer which was given to a question that became an order for return is very lengthy, preceded by ten pages of closely typed explanations as to how this complicated and complex tabulation was prepared. I might say that it has taken many members of the Department of Finance some five months to complete this tabulation, at a considerable cost to the country. I would be glad to supply my hon. friend with a complete copy of this statement. I think if he will read the ten pages carefully he will find the answer to his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

After having studied the report he speaks about, precisely because fuller particulars are required, can he tell us—this would not take too much time to answer—whether the $915,301,000 allocated on an even basis, per capita, were actually paid in the province of Quebec as mentioned in the report?

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, as explained in the supporting memoranda there are categories of expenditures including, for example, expenditures on defence, which are made for the benefit or for the security of all Canadians everywhere. It is impossible to allocate expenditures of that kind accurately or fairly on a provincial basis; therefore they were allocated in this tabulation on a per capita basis.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, may I put a further supplementary question to the minister? In view of the fact that the interest of one billion dollars paid each year by the Canadian government on its debt is included in that amount, can the minister tell us whether this amount of interest on the debt, which often goes 60 years back, is still paid to the United States or to other countries to the benefit of all Canadian citizens and whether that is included in this amount of $915 million?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: It certainly is, Mr. Speaker. If we were to repudiate our obligations of this kind I think it would certainly react to the detriment of all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are beginning a debate, and this is precisely what I was trying to prevent a few minutes ago. May I suggest ten o'clock if the hon. member wishes any more information.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, which I will take only a minute to state. I would like to mention that I never suggested any debt repudiation, as the Minister of Finance hinted in his last statement.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance which I assure you is not calculated to arouse further debate. In view of the very interesting and important information in the document to which he has referred, would he undertake to have it reproduced in sufficient quantity so that it could be made available to members generally?

Mr. Gordon: I would be very glad to, Mr. Speaker.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS

NEW BRUNSWICK—REQUEST FOR INCREASED EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of northern affairs. In view of his statement in Halifax that he is doubling the expenditures for historic sites there, will the minister say whether the same will be announced for Saint John and, if so, when?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, we shall do the best with what money we have available.

Mr. Bell: In view of the controversy there has been in this regard would the minister take this matter under consideration, particularly having in mind that we in New Brunswick think we have just as much history and just as much right to the same type of treatment that Nova Scotia is getting?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is entitled to this view from my department, that in light of the fact that we are arriving at our confederation centennial a great number of locations in all parts of the country are doing their best to draw the attention of the historic sites and monuments board to items of particular interest. The board met here two weeks ago and had a great number of submissions before it, and I think public opinion would support us at this time in setting aside more funds for these particular purposes than heretofore. Therefore we intend to apply to parliament for more money in this regard, and I think it will be forthcoming.

Mr. Bell: May I say to the minister that if Saint John is included I will be glad to support that application.

PENITENTIARIES

ST. PIE DE BAGOT, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Can he tell us if the penitentiary of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot is among those he talked about last week and if its construction will begin soon?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, an answer has already been given in the house to the first part of that question.

The last part of the question dealing with the construction of a penitentiary was allowed to stand.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Here it is. I would like to know if that institution will be built within two years, as stated by the minister last week. Yes or no?

Mr. Favreau: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REPORTED INTENTION TO INCLUDE FARM LABOUR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, whom I welcome back after his recent speech to the U.F.A. meeting in Alberta which opened with the admission that the last Liberal government deserved to be kicked out when it was. During the course of that speech the hon. gentleman said he was preparing legislation or giving consideration to a system whereby farm employees would be compensated during periods of unemployment or illness. Would the minister say whether the government now intends to bring farm labourers under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the first question I should like to say that perhaps I should have gone on to suggest that the previous government also needed to be brought down in so far as agricultural policies were concerned, because they did nothing for the eastern farmers.

In relation to the other question, we will have some very interesting legislation coming forward in the first part of next year which will be introduced in the usual way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, will that interesting legislation include a method of placing farm labourers under the Unemployment Insurance Act in the way which was indicated in his speech?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that in view of the time that has elapsed this afternoon, unless there are some very urgent questions we get on with the business before the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the suggestion, but when a minister makes a statement of policy outside the house we have the right in this house to ask what that policy is that has been announced.

PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRIBUTORY PROGRAM

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure, to be known as the Canada pension plan, to establish in Canada a comprehensive program of retirement pensions payable to contributors; to provide for the payment of supplementary benefits, including benefits for the widows and orphans of contributors and benefits to contributors who become disabled; to provide for the co-ordination of pensions payable under the Old Age Security Act with benefits payable under the Canada pension plan and for the payment of adjusted pensions under the Old Age Security Act beginning at any age from 65 years; to provide for the adjustment of pensions and other benefits in line with increases in earnings and the cost of living; to provide that funds arising from the operation of the Canada pension plan shall be invested in securities of the provinces, provincially guaranteed securities of provincial crown agents, and securities of Canada; and to provide further that all expenditures under the Canada pension plan, including costs of administration, shall be financed from contributions by employees and employers and from contributions by persons in respect of self-employed earnings.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Chairman, it is perhaps unfortunate that in dealing with this matter today the committee will only have a total of some four hours. However, since we are proceeding under the new rules and hon. members are restricted to 20 minute speeches, it is hoped that a great many members will be able to participate.

Earlier this year, Mr. Chairman, we had an opportunity to discuss a resolution similar to that now before the committee which preceded Bill No. C-75. However, the resolution which is before the committee today goes much further than the earlier version and introduces a social insurance measure of much wider scope. This more comprehensive program has been made possible by a number of developments, many of which hon. members are aware of, which have taken place in the past several months.

It will be recalled that the earlier resolution dealt mainly with a contributory old age insurance program and that as well contained certain amendments to the Old Age Security Act to provide for the payment of adjusted pensions beginning at any age from 65 years onward. The resolution now before us provides in addition for the payment of supplementary benefits for widows and orphans of contributors, and benefits to contributors who become disabled. This, of course, represents an important new dimension in the Canada pension plan.

I should like to recite some of the history in regard to this matter in order to freshen the recollection of members of the committee. Soon after Bill No. C-75 was presented earlier in this calendar year, during this session of the house, the government of the province of Quebec exposed the details of its own proposed pension plan. When these details were exposed it was clear that the Canada pension plan as incorporated in Bill No. C-75 and the proposed Quebec legislation were much closer in detail than had been anticipated at one time. Many of the features of the Quebec plan as revealed at Quebec city attracted favourable comment from provincial representatives who were there. Clearly there was a common goal that there should be a national contributory plan, and as a result of that consensus a series of negotiations were then undertaken to reach that common goal.

As I mentioned, one of the features found most attractive in the Quebec plan was the provision of supplementary benefits mentioned as desirable by government speakers from the beginning but which were not incorporated in Bill No. C-75 for reasons of which hon. members are aware. However, at Quebec city and subsequently all provincial representatives agreed that these features would have to be included in a truly comprehensive scheme.

Hon. members of this committee know full well that under the British North America Act, federal jurisdiction in this area is confined to pensions for the aged, and it was quite clear that if we wished to be able to add benefits of this kind to a comprehensive national scheme we would have to have an amendment to the constitution. Indeed, the previous government had at one time sought approval for such an amendment.

Not very long after that, agreement was reached on the phraseology of an amendment to be presented. This resolution was presented to the house by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, was approved, transmitted to Westminster, and in due course passed there. That amendment meant that the jurisdiction which was provided under section 94A of the B.N.A. Act was extended in order to cover supplementary benefits as well as old age pensions.

Before going into a closer examination of some of the provisions in the bill I would like to draw hon. members' attention to a new and important development. It will be recalled that in the earlier bill, Bill No. C-75, there was provision to base pensions on current earnings levels. That approach has been retained in the new bill and, in addition, provision has been made for an upward adjustment of benefits if living costs rise.

Throughout, one of the criticisms made of the earlier bill was that it failed to provide for our elderly citizens already in receipt of pensions. Indeed, the Canada pension plan, as opposed to the amendments to the Old Age Security Act, which are also incorporated in the bill, following September last year was never intended to provide anything for those now in pension. It will be recalled that the original intent was that there be a $10 supplementary payment made to one million odd old age pensioners from the proceeds of the Canada pension plan. When it was made clear by the province of Quebec in August of 1963 that it would produce its own plan, legislation was introduced and passed with the approval of all hon. members, to increase pensions to $75 a month, without waiting to go on with the Canada pension plan.

Since that time a number of representations have been made to the government, not the least being remarks made by interested hon. members in this chamber. Therefore we have provided under the new Canada pension plan, in addition to the $10 increase which was granted just over a year ago, that all future old age security pensions will be pegged to the cost of living index and will increase automatically if living costs increase.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Miss LaMarsh: This is a new departure in old age security. It is in response to the oft heard cry of those in receipt of pensions that they are unable to keep up with their own expenses if the cost of living rises as they have to depend on intermittent pension payments which may be raised at any time or may be held down to a certain level for some years. We hope, and I know this feeling will be shared by members in all corners of the chamber, that this will provide not only a greater measure of security but will also protect the real value of the pension dollar for Canada's million-odd pensioners.

The Canada pension plan as described in this resolution provides, as I said, for supplementary benefits and this makes it a truly comprehensive social insurance measure. Up until this time we have in Canada used the social assistance approach as the principal means of aiding survivors and disabled persons. As hon. members know, since world war I there has been provided in the provinces the kind of legislation known as mothers' allowances to help out widows who have dependant children. In recent years the federal and provincial governments have cooperated to provide assistance as well to the disabled. But these are welfare programs based on a test of need or means.

This plan, the Canada pension plan, is one which provides help as of right rather than on a need or a means test, for those who suffer the loss of a loved breadwinner or those who find themselves disabled and unable to carry on work. I think hon. members will agree this is a giant step forward in Canada's social security program.

These disability benefits under the Canada pension plan will provide help in family crises when it is most needed. When the head of a family dies and leaves his widow with young children, she will be provided with a pension to help her through those difficult years. A widow 35 years old or over, even though she has no dependant children, as hon. members know, often finds it difficult to re-enter the labour force and obtain work. There is provision for a pension for her; and the older she is and thus the less likely to be self-supporting, the greater her need and therefore the higher is her pension. Nor have the orphans of contributors been forgotten. They will be entitled to draw a benefit, generally until they join the work force.

Then in addition—and this is a new feature —upon the death of any contributor a payment will be made to his estate, whether or not there is a survivor's benefit payable.

For those who become disabled there is at least the comfort of knowing that a pension will be payable, on a temporary or on a permanent basis as needed. This pension is also available to a disabled widow or widower.

While one basic change in the program now to be considered is the fact that it is broader in scope by the provision of these supplementary benefits, the other important development is that the program in fact will be truly national in its application, whether administered by the federal government or by a provincial government. The plan will operate uniformly across the country, and rights to benefit under it will be completely portable from sea to sea. As such we have every reason to believe that it will prove an important instrument in reinforcing our national unity as Canadians.

In a country such as ours which has such a high degree of mobility of manpower, the desirability of one common approach to pension legislation is readily apparent. This was one of the key points stressed during the negotiations already referred to, particularly by the head of the government of Ontario.

Through the long months of federal-provincial discussions leading to the bill which this resolution precedes, most of the best features of the proposed Quebec plan and of the Canada pension plan have been incorporated into this new program, along with a number of suggestions put forward by the other provinces and by various groups in their representations to the federal government.

One of the important changes from Bill No. C-75 is the extension of coverage of the self-employed on a compulsory rather than voluntary basis. Last year submissions were made to the Canadian government by a number of bodies, including the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which made its submission on February 26. At that time that body asked that farmers be covered on a compulsory basis. Several of the provincial premiers at the meetings which we have had also indicated concern that farmers and fishermen, ordinarily at the lower end of the earnings scale in many provinces, would not be adequately protected if coverage were left as entirely voluntary. The Quebec report favoured the approach of involuntary coverage, and that is the one followed in the old age and survivors' insurance program in the United States.

It will be clear that good arguments can be advanced for either approach, but on balance it appears in Canada there is a much broader support for the approach now incorporated in the new Canada pension plan. It is apparent that in this and in many other aspects of the program there will, of course, be honest differences as to whether one approach or course is better than another. But a great effort has been made to develop a program which will receive general acceptance by Canadians, knowing that in any plan which is as complex and attempts to be as comprehensive as this one there will be some reservations on one point or another.

There is another change. The level of benefits provided for retirement is higher in the new bill than under Bill No. C-75. This was indicated in the white paper which hon. members have had a chance to study since August, and it will be noted when they see the new bill. This higher level of benefits has resulted from an adjustment of the maximum pensionable earnings and of the percentage of those earnings which was used to calculate the amount of the retirement benefit. This means that a maximum monthly retirement benefit of $104.17 is now proposed. This, combined with a maximum old age security payment of $75 a month, will make the over-all maximum pension $179.17 at age 70. I hope this increase in benefit will commend itself to all hon. members. Some will say it is too low; others will say it is too high. However, we have balanced as carefully as we could all of the factors involved—Canadian wage levels, our economy, the cost of living and so forth—and on balance we decided that this represents the most reasonable benefit provision. The figure I quoted is, of course, the maximum and it is perfectly true that many people will receive somewhat less, depending, naturally, on the amount of contribution they have made in the course of their working lives.

For the average contributor, there is another change. The new program now envisaged being a richer one, there is a somewhat higher rate of contribution required. This higher rate of contribution will make it possible not only to finance the more generous retirement benefit, and the new survivors' and disability benefits, but will also result in higher investment reserves. These reserves will be made available for investment in obligations of provincial governments or of any agent of Her Majesty in the right of a province if that is guaranteed by the province. There will be interest on these reserves which are utilized by the provinces and this interest will go to the credit of the Canada pension plan and help finance it. These funds, moreover, will be very helpful to the provinces in the development of their social capital for such purposes as schools, roads, sewers, and hydroelectric projects, as well as for such developments as may desired in the provinces in the field of health and welfare, all in accordance with the scale of priorities of the provinces themselves.

The proposed legislation will also deal with the question of safeguards to the provinces, and restraints in relation to future changes in the Canada pension plan. If the federal legislation dealt with a matter exclusively within federal jurisdiction, such provisions would not have been included. In fact, however, as hon. members know, parliament's power to legislate pensions is subject to the limitation that it must not affect present or future provincial laws. This gives to the provinces a legitimate day to day interest in the Canada pension plan, now, as well as in the future.

Special attention has been given to fulfilling the need for the closest possible co-ordination between the Quebec plan and the Canada pension plan. Suppose, for instance, a contributor has been paying into the plan in Quebec while he lived and worked there, and that he later went to live and work in another province where he paid into the Canada pension plan. From which authority will he draw his payments when he retires? When his pension becomes payable, under an agreement we have worked out with the Quebec authorities, he will receive one cheque to cover his total benefits; it will not matter to him where he worked—whether he stayed in one place all his life or whether he moved across the country. The act will determine which of the two jurisdictions will pay the pension and there will, of course, be provision for reimbursement from one to the other. It will be obvious that arrangements of this kind are essential for the highest possible co-ordination between the two plans, and this has resulted in a bill containing 125 clauses, a bill which is long and extremely complex.

When the bill goes to the joint parliamentary committee which it is proposed to establish, members of this committee will have before them, in addition to the white paper and the bill, actuarial and economic studies of the Canada pension plan for their information. When hon. members have a chance to see the bill this evening and when the public as a whole becomes familiar with the provisions of the new pension plan I feel sure the measures will receive a warm response—certainly it will be warmer in some places than in others—from almost all in the country.

It seems to me we are taking today a most important stride toward social security in our country, a stride of which all Canadians may be justly proud. It is one which is intended to provide not only an opportunity for the individual to help save for his own future dignity but also to help him provide for those who are normally dependant upon him. I hope it will do much to bring not only members of the House of Commons together, members of this committee and of the special committee, but that it will do much to bring together all Canadians working under one plan to provide for their own and one another's security.

Mr. Monteith: When she rose to make her statement to the committee, the minister I noticed received very warm applause. I was pleased this was the case because I knew she would need this encouragement after so many previous ill-fated efforts.

I believe the hon. lady indicated that the supplementary payments to which she referred had been urged on previous occasions by her own supporters. My recollection is that speakers from the government side of the house mentioned those supplementary payments only very occasionally in the course of previous debates; that it was, actually, opposition speakers who pressed for a recognition of the need in this regard.

I was very pleased to hear the minister's statement concerning a cost of living index adjustment to present recipients of old age security payments. This is a matter about which we have been greatly concerned in the past—something which was completely ignored in previous efforts.

I wish, now, to reiterate the stand I took on March 17 last when I stated that the party to which I belong is in favour of a Canada pension plan. Let there be no misunderstanding. The Progressive Conservative party—the government in power at that time—started this whole program rolling back in 1958. We have always stood for this type of guarantee, for this type of guarantee against fear for our older citizens as old age creeps on. At least the government has seen fit to bring in a plan which includes many of the additional benefits we have always advocated.

I ask, first of all: Why is this resolution before us? I believe that on a previous occasion—I do not recall whether it was in reply to a question by myself or not—the minister indicated that there were preliminary administrative costs which were being borne out of the general revenue prior to the actual inception of the plan? Am I right in that supposition? In other words, all the administrative expenses having to do with the Canada pension plan, present and future, are being met out of contributions. If that is the case I do not see why this resolution is before us at all—there is no expenditure involved by the government—unless it is to justify what might be considered another tax. I do not see any other reason for it.

I understood the minister to say that the committee is not going to be set up until after the bill receives second reading. I would plead with the minister to reconsider this course. I really and honestly believe that a proper consideration, examination and study of representations from people across Canada should be made on the Canada pension plan and on the bill which is coming forward, which I understand contains 125 sections, and that to achieve this it would be much wiser to send this bill to committee before it receives second reading. If we go through second reading the government becomes committed to certain clauses which may, in the long run, if this matter is sent to committee, be proven ineffective; it might be proven that the bill would be better off without them. I know the minister will say that if this is the decision of the committee she will be very happy to give consideration to possible changes. I think that right from the first time a pension plan was put before us on July 18, 1963, there were indications both from the Prime Minister and the minister that they would study recommendations made, and so on; but I think good faith would be proven if this bill went to the special committee before it actually received second reading and the government's position became hardened and more difficult of adjustment. I would like to ask the minister —she may reply now or at any time—whether she proposes to have this committee set up and operating before Christmas.

The minister gave some of the history of the Canada pension plan. I believe the history she gave started with the conference in Quebec and I would like to give a little of the previous history. We all recall that on July 18, 1963, the first version was brought before us, and we also recall the very political approach taken by the minister at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Partisan.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, a very partisan approach. She has been much more reasonable and humble today. In fact, she was also much more reasonable and humble on March 17 last. I am sure she learned her lesson.

An hon. Member: She is mellowing with age.

Mr. Monteith: Maybe it is that she is mellowing with age, or office. However, Mr. Chairman, I would like to recall one or two phases of the plan that was put before us at that time. We recall that there was no funding in that particular plan. At the moment there is a complete reversal. It did include a possible $10 increase in old age security at some time in the future, but the minister was not sure just when that would be. We recall that later that day the right hon. Leader of the Opposition moved an amendment after having pointed out the election promises of the Liberal party prior to the April 8 election and the fact that they were not being fulfilled. One of those election promises was an immediate increase in old age security of $10 per month. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition moved that amendment, and of course we came to the end of the day and nothing was done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Every Liberal member voted against it.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, I understand that every Liberal member voted against that amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Against that increase.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, they voted against the recipients of old age security receiving this increase. There was a level of $4,000 maximum income. The blind, disabled and those receiving old age assistance were completely ignored at that time; and there was no opting out by provinces. There was issued a white paper giving a supplementary outline of the scheme presented to us. I could mention what I believe were some excellent advances made by the previous government in the health and welfare field, including the start of the actual Canada pension plan which we are seeing here today; however, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to do that because my time is limited.

I would, however, continuing the historical angle of this plan, mention that when we came back on September 30, 1963, the government had not prepared the business for the session. This matter first came before us on July 18, 1963, and due to our insistence it was subsequently finally agreed that an amendment be brought forward for an increase of $10 per month in old age security. However, at that time the blind, disabled and those receiving old age assistance were still excluded from the increase. We were certainly in favour of this increase and we voted for it. But what was the price to the taxpayer? The government had in their election literature indicated that this was going to be financed out of the contributions to the Canada pension plan; but instead of that the taxpayers across Canada today are paying something over $100 million extra in taxes.

I mentioned earlier that the minister was very humble on March 17. That day the resolution preceding Bill No. C-75 was passed and the bill was given first reading. Then, as the minister mentioned, the Quebec conference took place and Quebec unveiled their plan. Apparently after the conference was over there was some really high pressured wheeling and dealing going on for a period of days at least; I understand there were several meetings. Then eventually a compromise was announced as between the Quebec plan and the government's plan. On April 20, 1964, the Prime Minister tabled letters to the provinces asking for consent to amend the British North America Act, and this was eventually received. Now we have the third version before us. On March 17 last I asked the minister whether those were to be the minister's last confident words on this pension plan. I did so because of the boastful but completely incompetent presentation which she had brought forward on July 18. Events certainly proved me to be correct in asking her at that time. I am sure she thought they were her last words, but events proved otherwise.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Two revisions since.

Mr. Monteith: I hope the future holds for this plan the very best of everything. We want to see it in committee and we want to get it there fast.

I have read, Mr. Chairman, all the material available, and in particular the white paper. I should like to ask the minister, because I do not doubt that this question will be raised later in the debate, whether she has given proper consideration to any conflict with the Hall health report and the extra cost involved in this pension plan. I do not suggest that she has to answer but I am wondering, had she received the Hall report concerning health services before having embarked on the pension plan, which one she would have chosen. Or would she have chosen both? Certainly it would be to the advantage of all Canadians to choose both; but at the same time I suppose the Minister of Finance has put some brakes on the minister, and I also expect that the finance officials will be before the committee when it is set up.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in referring to the white paper may I say that the necessary amendment to section 94A of the British North America Act has certainly made this a worth-while plan in comparison with the plans put before us before. You will recall that the government of which the Leader of the Opposition had the honour to be the head had attempted to get this particular amendment passed, but had not been able to do so. However, under this new plan widows under 65 years of age and their dependants, and the disabled, are going to receive benefits which were not possible previously. There is a section entitled "Main features of the pensions" on page 7 of the white paper. These provisions can hardly be recognized from the previous efforts. With regard to timing, retirement pensions will begin in January 1967. This is, of course, a year later than had previously been anticipated by the minister and promised on July 18, 1963.

There is one point which disturbs me, Mr. Chairman, and it is this. I am not prepared at the moment to say that this is not the correct thing to do, although surely study in committee will clear the point up somewhat. The self-employed will be compulsorily included in the plan. This means that an average of 3.6 per cent of all earnings by self-employed workers will be paid into this plan—not 1.8 per cent as with employed persons, but 3.6 per cent. I think this is going to be found quite a drain on the capacities of various self-employed people and I think it is a matter which will have to be looked at. With regard to adjustments for increases in the cost of living, as I said earlier we were very pleased to see that the minister has included a cost of living adjustment for those receiving old age security. This was a woeful omission from previous presentations.

However, there is one class of person who I think should be considered in this matter. I heard a young fellow of 18 years say the other day, Mr. Chairman: "I am going to pay into this pension plan for 52 years and not get one cent more out of it than the person who has been paying into it for ten years". I know there is a cost of living adjustment and so on, but that is the fact and I think our young people will look at this.

Then there is a section headed "Adjustment for earnings after retirement". It indicates that pensions can be reduced if a person has earned income of over $900 a year, no matter from what source it may come. For example, a person might retire from a job and then become self-employed after the age of 70 and make $900 a year. He will therefore have his pension reduced.

I see my time is up. May I say there are many changes for which we have asked earlier affecting disability pensions, widows under 65 years of age, disabled persons and so on. I should like to know how many provinces are actually committed to the scheme.

There is one other section I should like to mention in relation to other retirement plans. This whole section rather blandly assumes that integrating existing private pension plans with the Canada pension plan will not be a great problem. I suggest that it is in this area that most of our immediate headaches are going to arise. I suggest that consideration should be given to allowing public plans, such as the civil service superannuation plan and those private plans which are of exceptional standard, to remain out of the Canada pension plan. My purpose in suggesting this is because we do not want to see any individual's pension or pension arrangements suffer as a result of this legislation.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, we welcome the introduction of this resolution and we are prepared to welcome the bill which will be introduced at the end of this day's sitting. I confess that it gets a bit difficult to express one's welcome with the same warmth after he has done it two or three times already; but despite the tarnish that time may have put upon the proposed Canada pension plan it is still true that we are launching upon a piece of legislation which is extremely important in terms of improving the lot of all of the people of this country.

Some of the things one might say on this occasion need not be said because they were said on July 18 of last year or March 17 of this year. Therefore, perhaps the minister can take as read the fact that we are glad to have this plan back again. We are glad to have the improvements which were indicated in the white paper which was tabled in August, and we are glad to hear of the two or three additional improvements that the minister announced today.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the thing that needs most to be said at this time should be directed not just to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but to the government as a whole. What is most needed is that this legislation get passed at this session, and it has a long way to go. Thanks to the new rule under which we are operating, the debate at this stage can last only for this day. But the bill still has to go through second reading, to the special committee which is to be appointed, and it then has to come back to the committee of the whole house, and then go through the third reading stage. We are already away over time in this session, and no one knows how long it is going to last.

I am still relying on the undertaking that the Minister of Justice gave on July 6, at which time he was the government house leader. He made it clear that the government would see to it that the completion of the legislative process with respect to the Canada pension plan would be effected before the end of the present session. It was for that reason the leader of this party, earlier this afternoon, urged that second reading of the Canada pension plan be given priority above the motions for concurrence in the reports of the special committee on the flag. I suggest to the government that if it puts the flag debate—which may last for a number of days—

An hon. Member: Or weeks.

Mr. Knowles: —or weeks, someone suggests—ahead of second reading of the Canada pension plan, that might result in the Canada pension plan not getting to the special committee until well on in December. When one considers the delays that can take place there he must realize that we may find ourselves at the end of yet another session without this legislation on the statute books. Therefore, I urge not only upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but upon all members of the government, that top priority be given to getting this legislation through, and that means calling the bill for second reading soon.

I am afraid the hon. member for Perth has not assisted the minister in this regard by suggesting that the bill be sent to the special committee before second reading. After all, there is in our rules standing order 77, which requires that all bills be read a second time before they are committed. That being the case, we must complete the second reading stage first. We have to agree to the bill in principle before it goes to a committee. The government can co-operate in this regard by bringing on second reading stage at an early date, and we as members of the house can co-operate by limiting our debate at that stage to two or three days—surely that is enough—so we can get it to the special committee.

We have indicated on previous occasions that there are many things about this legislation that are good. It is not necessary for me to go into all the details, but I think it is not inappropriate for me to mention two or three of them at this time. What I like most of all about the Canada pension plan—about the two stage plan which we are now developing for Canadians in their years of retirement—is that we are trying to reach a position where we are providing pensions that are adequate.

Long ago we accepted the responsibility of government to do something about old age. A decade or more ago we accepted the principle of universality. Now we are trying to do something to bring pensions up to the level of adequacy. I do not suggest that the levels which will be achieved by combining the Canada pension plan, at its best, with old age security, at its present level, are really the last words in adequacy, but at least we are talking about pensions of quite a different order from that which seemed to be accepted a few years or decades ago. I hope that, having accepted the principle that retirement security should be on the basis of adequacy, we will go on improving that basis, finding ways and means of raising the levels of our pensions so that all Canadians can look forward to a retirement in decency and dignity.

I am also pleased that this legislation has been broadened in scope from what it was in its first two versions. Particular provision has been made for survivors benefits and benefits to persons who are disabled. It is good to include that sort of thing in pension legislation. Because of those things that are in this legislation, and because they are good, as I say, I trust there will be no slips, legislative or otherwise—no action on the part of the government to bring other legislation forward, and no obstruction on the part of members generally—to delay the enactment of this plan. Let us see to it that we get this good legislation through.

Despite the fact that the legislation is, as I have said, welcome and good legislation, there are two or three things about it which are not completely satisfactory from our point of view. However, these are not reasons for holding up the legislation. Even good legislation, once it is established, can be improved later on, and I believe that is what will happen to our old age pension legislation generally.

One of the things I think is a weakness in this plan is that it is neither a pay-as-you-go plan nor a funded plan. It is something in between those two concepts of old age pensions. For my part, it is too close to the latter.

Another thing I feel is a weakness in this plan is that, in so far as it does aim at the provision of a fairly substantial fund for public investment or development, there are two flaws. In the first place we are in effect taxing people at the lower end of the income scale to provide such an investment fund. A portion of what people will pay as premiums into Canada pension plan will go into the investment fund. Investment funds controlled and administered by a public authority are good and we should have them, but something of the order of the Canada development corporation would have been a better way of doing this.

It is also true that this plan envisages the control and the planning of the investment fund to be entirely in provincial hands, and this is its second flaw. We feel that in the interests of unity and of building a strong nation, and in the interests of living and economic standards being at their best across this country, there should be more federal direction of the investment of public funds.

Another point I think is going to have to be worked on, to some extent, is the one to which the hon. member for Perth referred just before he resumed his seat, and that is the whole question of the relationship of the Canada pension plan to other plans. My concern is not the concern that the hon. member for Perth expressed. He wanted an opting out provision in respect of certain plans. I think that rather than that, a great deal more has to be done in terms of making clear the relationship which exists between this plan and other plans.

I know that the white paper tries to deal with this. The only paragraph in the white paper where capital letters are used to emphasize a word is a paragraph under the section dealing with the relationship to other plans in which it says that the funds of other plans "will NOT" be taken over by the Canada pension plan. That is a good use of capital letters, but it is still true that many people are being misled and some of them quite deliberately.

I know that certain organizations that have a vested interest in their plans or certain companies that do not want to improve the pension plans of their employees are spreading the notion that somehow or other the government, through the Canada pension plan, is going to take over their reserve funds and actually weaken their pension position. I have had people write me to tell me they can now retire at 60 or 62 under their plan and who want to know whether the situation is going to be worse, whether they are now going to have to work until 65 because of the Canada pension plan. That of course is false.

Maybe what I am asking for is a much better job of public relations, but I think it is more than that. I think it is a case of making it crystal clear what the relationship is between the Canada pension plan and the other plans. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that this will turn out to be one of the principal advantages of our sending this measure to a special committee. I assume that everybody and his uncle will appear before that committee, including many of the companies, corporations and organizations that have these plans, and maybe as we have these people before that committee we can make this particular relationship clear.

I want to say a word, Mr. Chairman, about the welcome announcement that the minister made in her statement today to the effect that the bill we will get by tonight will provide that once the bill becomes law pensions paid under old age security will, including those now being paid, be subject to an increase in relation to the increase in the cost of living index. This is welcome news, and the applause the minister got when she made this announcement was well deserved. I hope that before the day is out we can get some details as to what will be the percentage of increase in the pension for a percentage point increase in the cost of living index. Will it be a percentage increase or will it be a flat dollar increase? At any rate, let it be taken as a fact that we welcome this improvement.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me say as strongly as I can to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and to the government as a whole that they must not think they have done the last job they need to do with regard to old age security because they have provided for this increase in relation to the cost of living index. The whole story of pensions over the years is one not just of raising pensions according to the increase in the cost of living index but of trying as a decent society to do the decent thing for our old people.

We have recognized that we have also had to increase pensions because of the increase in the standard of living, because of increased productivity. It is not good enough to say to people who are drawing $75 a month today that ten years from now their pensions will be $75 a month plus a percentage for the increase in the cost of living. In the meantime our productivity will have increased, our gross national product will have increased, the standard of living of Canadians will have increased, and those people will deserve to share in the increase. I say to the minister, I say to the government and to whatever government may follow the present government, that you have not finished with old age security because you have arrived at $75 a month plus certain percentage increases. You are going to have to go beyond that, and the contention I have been making that we should aim at $100 a month for old age security by our centennial year, 1967, I suggest still stands.

I say again that we welcome this announcement. The only thing that could be wrong with it is that it might lull some people into the notion that we have now fixed up old age security for all time. This is not so. The minister has been in this field long enough now to know that that really is not the case. Not only is it insufficient to provide for these percentage increases so far as the future is concerned, but it is still true that unless something more than this is done for the people who are now 70 years of age and over and who are today drawing $75 a month there is really nothing in it for them. To tell us about the $10 that was given last year is old history by now. In the meantime the cost of living has gone up, in the meantime our productivity has increased and in the meantime other people have had their pensions improved. We have go to do something for people already on pensions as well as making things better for those who will do not too badly when this concept of a two stage pension plan is in full operation.

We also welcome the statement of the minister about the money that a person may have in the fund being available as a payment to his estate, and it may be that when we get the bill there will be two or three other improvements in it compared with what we had in the white paper that was distributed in August. All told, Mr. Chairman, we are making progress. I thought it was a good measure that was placed before us on July 18, 1963. I thought it was a better measure that we had on March 17, 1964, and it is a better measure still that we are now getting on the 9th of November, 1964. But, Mr. Chairman, at the risk of being a pessimist, may I point out that the original plan of July, 1963, envisaged people starting to draw pensions under the Canada pension plan on January 1, 1966. The present plan at its best envisages people starting to draw pensions on July 1, 1967. Already since this government has been in power senior citizens have lost one year of what they might have got and many others are having to take a reduction of 10 per cent or more from what they might have got because of that loss of one year.

I come back, therefore, to what I said when I first rose. I see that my time is up, Mr. Chairman, and I am ready to sit down. Whether it is the government's responsibility because it brings the flag before us before second reading of this bill, or whether it is the opposition's responsibility because it takes too long and does not let the bill get to the special committee, any such delay could soon compound itself into the kind of delay which will result in another year being cut off the pensions that our people could get under this legislation. If we agree that the legislation has been improved, and I do, if we agree that this is a good piece of legislation, and I certainly agree, then let us get on with it and get it on the statute books as fast as we can.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, upon undertaking the study of the resolution which introduces a pension plan on a national scale, it is well to realize that this measure will probably be the most important the present parliament will be called upon to study, for probably many years to come. It is important, due to the fact that it will bear directly on the income and the savings of the vast majority, not to say more simply of the whole nation, particularly of all Canadian workers.

As I come from Quebec, it might be well for me to mention that my province has decided to adopt a similar plan which its government will manage itself, in co-operation with the national plan.

One might be inclined to think that the representatives of the province of Quebec in this house should refrain from discussing the federal plan.

But I think that this is not so, since residents of the province of Quebec just as those of other provinces have to move sometimes in order either to go and work in other provinces or simply to stay there but change employment.

If, therefore, I deemed it advisable to participate in this debate in order to give you my personal views as well as those of our group, I may say, at the very outset, that like the majority of Canadians, we welcome quite optimistically this project.

To mention a single proof that this project has the support of the Canadian people, I might say that Telepoll made public a survey which it had undertaken across Canada on the appeal that such a project might have for Canadians. According to the data compiled at that time, it seems that 72 per cent of Canadians preferred a federal pension program to a private or provincial pension scheme.

I think it is a clear indication of Canadian public opinion in this regard.

We may question the manner in which investigations were made when we consider that the bill will affect each individual and, in view of its scope, a most vital element: his savings and his financial administration.

I wonder why we did not think of holding a referendum in this respect, as some were suggesting in the case of the national flag. It is not that I want a referendum to decide on a pension plan, far from it, but since the pension plan will affect each and every individual in the country, we must give such a plan serious consideration and listen to representations which will be made by every organization in the country, so that we may be sure to know the prevailing opinion of the Canadian people.

Of course, we may find that by this bill we will once again be encroaching upon the freedom of the individual; however, the purpose of the bill is to help retired citizens.

How much will the plan cost and what effects will it have on the economy?

Press reports published since the plan was introduced show that some groups are against it. Of course, those groups are no doubt against it for personal reasons only; they know that the plan will affect them and that they may lose certain financial benefits they have been enjoying since the introduction of private pension plans.

I know it will be rather difficult to judge accurately the implications of such a hoarding of funds by the governments to finance the pension plan in question. But I sometimes wonder whether, during the first years of application of this plan, we will not have to undergo financial difficulties in this country, with regard to the development of our industries.

Up to now private companies, which were the only ones concerned in that field, have been accumulating large amounts for some years. These amounts were used for the industrial development of the country in a great proportion. Companies having pension plans for their employees placed the money collected with trust or insurance companies which, in return, granted loans to the industries in order to enable them to develop.

The workers who are not contributing to any pension plan but who will be called upon to do so tomorrow, will experience, in a certain way, a reduction of the savings they used to deposit in the caisses populaires or in the banks or that they used to purchase private enterprise bonds.

I think that during the first years of implementation of this plan, our industries will have to look to other sources to finance their development and, during that period I think that we shall witness an increase in unemployment in Canada.

In the various studies made on that matter and in the reports I have, such a result is anticipated.

In 1960, private companies covered some two million workers.

The proposed plan will cover over six million workers. Of course, the sources to be drained into those pension funds, whether they be provincial or national funds, will be used to re-finance other government projects.

We are told that a great part of those funds will be re-loaned to provinces for their own requirements. In what fields will the provinces be able to invest those amounts? In the social field, or in public development? Very well. But will the provincial governments be in a position to withdraw from the public bonds market? As far as I am concerned, I do not think so, because their needs are continually increasing and knowing that they have at their disposal this new source of credit, they will certainly make full use of it.

Consequently, we will face strong competition on the public market to get the required money for industrial development. The consequences will certainly be numerous and very serious.

We have here the results of a study which was initiated at the request of the Quebec provincial government with respect to the implications of this proposed pension plan. In their report the economists say that it will make practically impossible the task of some small industries which now can barely make ends meet, because any increase in their production practically means bankruptcy for them. That will also bring about an increase in production costs, that is, an increase in the price of the finished product.

Again, Canadian producers will be in an unfavourable position to compete with the production of other countries. On the other hand, the result will be to encourage industries to turn to automation earlier in order to eliminate as many workers as possible in their plants, with a view to counterbalancing the increase in production costs. That will result in a taxation increase in various fields.

It will be very difficult to compensate over a short period the drawbacks which small and sometimes even large industries will have to suffer following the implementation of this pension plan.

According to the study by William and Mercer Ltd., which is recognized as one of the most important actuary firms in Canada, the creation of pension funds necessarily opens the door to inflation. Unfortunately, in their election campaign the political parties will try to outbid each other. One will promise more than the other in order to draw the votes of the electorate. Then the benefits will increase and we shall have, like in the United States, a 7 per cent charge, which it is intended to increase soon to 9 per cent, in order to finance a $65 monthly pension.

Just like in Sweden, which is a country regularly cited as an example and where the rate of contributions levied upon salaries has more than tripled during a short period in order to enable it to finance the cost of its pension plan, we shall see our own rates increasing sharply.

It is clear that we must help the aged to live decently, but on the other hand we must take into consideration the requirements of the younger generation to face its numerous and costly responsibilities. It is not at 60 that a man needs all his income, but rather between the ages of 21 and 50, at which time family responsibilities are onerous. I feel that, by imposing this contribution, we are simply adding to his burden which, I hope, he will be in a position to bear. Still, it will be necessary to explain to the young people, this generation of 20 to 35 or 40 years of age, the advantages of the system for, at this point, they see nothing except what they will have to pay, and as expenses tend to accumulate constantly, in my opinion we will have a hard time to convince them of the value of this plan.

We must also examine the problem from another angle. Will companies find it as easy to take in employees who frequently move from one plant to another, in view of the cost of administering that pension plan?

For instance, since Quebec will have its own plan, will not workers from Quebec wanting to work in Ontario or in another province for an indefinite period see the objections increase? Will employers in Ontario or another province not find it more difficult to hire people coming from another province? Will that not create or encourage to a certain extent discrimination against workers from this or that province?

These are all the points which will have to be considered.

Many people are wondering what is going to happen to the amounts already invested in private companies? What assurance will they have that they will not go bankrupt now that they are losing that income? None, actually. What assurance will they have that those company pension funds will not be nationalized by governments? There again, absolutely none. Time alone will tell.

I believe that at the present time many questions are being raised among the workers. Will private companies be able to provide pension plans which will supplement those proposed at present by governments? This is again an area where clarification is in order.

I shall limit myself to these few remarks at this stage and since it was agreed that the bill will be before the house later this evening, we shall then probably be in a better position to appreciate its implications.

In conclusion, however, I should like to quote the following recommendations submitted in a brief by the chamber of commerce of the province of Quebec:

> The result of this pension plan will be to give rise to certain problems with regard to the liquid assets used at present by companies to finance their development. In addition, this situation might delay the economic development and affect the creation of new jobs.

In my opinion, that is one aspect of the bill which should be given careful consideration, because our economy is already quite weak and we should be most wary in that field. Indeed, we need social security but what we need even more, what Canadian citizens want before anything else is the right to employment, that is the assurance of being able to find work from the age of 21 approximately until retirement. If we do provide them with that opportunity, I am sure most Canadians will be, to a great extent, able to look after their own needs—and ensure their own security. At any rate, we will wait until the bill is introduced before making more detailed comments.

Mr. Perron: Mr. Chairman, the proposed resolution which is submitted to us this afternoon has a wide scope, because social security, today, deals with one of the most important problems facing any government.

Since they entered parliament the Créditistes from all provinces have always led the way in favour of a healthy social security system.

The members of the Ralliement Créditiste have often and justly claimed for the aged an income which would allow them to live according to the means which the natural resources and industry of Canada can offer.

Mr. Chairman, mere desires, mere wishes, mere recommendations or paternalism can no longer be the sources of social security.

Today, the right to social security is universally recognized since December, 1948 when the universal declaration of human rights was proclaimed by the general assembly of the United Nations.

The first paragraph of article 25 of that declaration reads as follows:

> "Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the health and well-being of himself and of his family, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and necessary social services, and the right to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control".

In the April, 1950 issue of a monthly bulletin published by the confederation of Christian syndicates of Belgium, the following question was raised: "What is social security?" And the following answer was given:

> According to modern concepts, social security means the payment to workers of a replacement income when normal income resulting from work is lacking and in addition a supplementary income intended to achieve a satisfactory balance of family responsibilities.

The bulletin explains in this way the scope of the replacement income:

> When a worker cannot be self-dependent, because of sickness, old age or for any other reason, he is granted a replacement income.

A replacement income: such is the meaning and scope of the resolution now under discussion.

By the way, I would like to make a remark with respect to the difference with what was said from the social view point during the last election campaign. A pension plan was mentioned then, but now old age assistance is spoken of, which is more in keeping with the existing needs; social assistance was also mentioned in the various provinces of the country.

Today, this is all being replaced by an old age and social insurance plan. What will be the limit of the government's responsibility? A bureaucracy required by the administration of private savings? Care will be taken to provide social security under a social insurance plan. That is not necessarily something close to the concept of the Christian workers confederation of Belgium, about a replacement revenue.

A replacement revenue, when a man loses his job, also includes an income when he suffers seasonal or permanent unemployment. That also means to face automation which is developing more and more in the modern world, and help to widows must also be included in the social insurance plan we are advocating today, as well as assistance to disabled and other people.

At this stage, I should like to quote another report presented to the President of the United States, Mr. Johnson, on April 6, 1964. Here is a quotation from that report.

> As a first step, it is vital to recognize that traditional relationships between employment and revenue are discarded. The economy of wealth can provide for all citizens comfort and economic security whether they are engaged or not in so-called labour. The wealth produced by machinery rather than by human labour remains just the same a wealth. Consequently, we recommend that society, through government and appropriate legal measures, clearly undertakes to provide every individual and every family with a sufficient income which shall be recognized as a right.

That was a recommendation of a recognition of rights through legislation in accordance with the needs or the wealth. Also:

> Such recognition which we consider as essential to the social, political and economic order of the nation, we also consider as the only policy through which one quarter of the nation now being dispossessed or on the point of being dispossessed because of the lack of employment, can be associated with an economy of wealth. Such undeniable right to an income will replace all the patchwork of the present social measures, from family allowances to direct relief, in order to assure that no citizen in the United States will remain in the present stagnation.

That was the recommendation of a committee specially commissioned to look into the problems of society and the economic and political implications in the United States. That committee was made up of experts, actuaries, sociologists, presidents of private firms, thinkers, financiers. Those were the recommendations they had made in the light of those facts during their study of the basic legislation dealing with well-planned social security.

In the bill which will be introduced tonight, and which contains 125 sections, I find glaring discrepancies between the government's way of thinking or that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) a year ago and today. At that time she said she was not in favour of a cumulative fund which would be administered by public officials. I wish to quote here the very words spoken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and reported in an editorial published in Le Devoir on September 28, 1963 Here is what she said then in Toronto:

> And then, I am far from convinced that it is desirable for a government to dispose of such investment funds. This would be withdrawing too much money from the hands of individuals. The power of a government with so much money would be frightening. By controlling investment capital, the government would be in a position to control business. We would then be threatened with a kind of national socialism, as practised in nazi Germany; free enterprise would soon be stifled.

Those were the words of the hon. minister on September 28, 1963. She feared the accumulation of funds under a plan such as that of the province of Quebec. Today, the hon. minister, in her preamble, advises that in view of transformations made in federal-provincial relations with regard to the almost marvelous plan, so to speak, which some experts of the province of Quebec submitted at the time of the conference, the federal government has changed its plan entirely. In fact, it has changed its old age pension into a social welfare scheme which even required amendments to the constitution, under section 94A, so as to enable the federal government to apply it in the other provinces with their consent.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize, as the minister admitted a little over a year ago, that is, in September 1963, that it is to be feared that too great a concentration of powers, representing private savings, in the hands of the state, could surely lead certain governments to go against the interest or the normal and legitimate aspirations of individuals. Such concentration of discretionary powers mentioned by the minister when she referred to national-socialism in Germany at the end of the last war might very well also, in a few years from now—in five, ten or 15 years—when some other government than the present Liberal government or a Conservative government would be in power, or some other government than the Liberal government in the province of Quebec, enable some dictator to direct the country's policy according to priorities established in government circles, thanks to capital accruing from personal and compulsory savings, priorities quite contrary to the aspirations of the people who will have provided the state with the necessary funds.

Therefore we are against this contributory pension principle, because we believe in social security in line with the tremendous resources of our country and with its production potential.

Nobody in the ten provinces, has any doubt about the possibility in the year 2002 of providing with his daily bread at age 65 a person now 30 years old, whether he contributes or not to this pension fund, because nobody has any doubt about the tremendous production capacity that our industry, and therefore our country, will then have reached, thanks to the ingenious work of Canadians and to constantly developing technology in the field of productivity.

I understand that the minister says that most governments will probably welcome this decision with pleasure and joy, since the pension plan meets with the needs and aspirations of the Canadian people.

I would say it meets much more the needs of governments which have to resort to indirect taxation nowadays to get the money they urgently need because of a system under which a government must levy taxes or go into debt. As a matter of fact, under the guise of social security, our system forces governments to reconsider programs which just deprive Canadian taxpayers of part of their social security.

Mr. Chairman, a contributory pension scheme is nothing more than the nationalization of private savings. The government intends to make the plan compulsory for anyone who earns $600 or more when a family absolutely needs a minimum income of $4,000 to survive.

An income of $600 or more will be taxed under the pretext of ensuring in the year 2002 the social security of a family man who is 30 today. This pretence is a growing administrative burden in the field of social security and represents, when all is said and done, a burden for the small wage earner.

This burden may, of course, as the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard) pointed out, fall back upon private enterprise. Indeed, the latter will feel its effects, and more particularly the small businessman, because their sources of revenue will be dried up, and they will have to turn to the state or to the public fund when in need of money. As I pointed out earlier, such danger leads to totalitarianism.

According to the contents of the resolution, the funds accumulated by private savings will have to be invested in government bonds, in public administration according to the needs of social development.

Why always entertain the belief that private savings or capital are to be used to improve social capital? Government bureaucracy serves to drain off savings in order to strengthen the state power.

While a resolution is submitted presumably to help the individual, the family, the orphan, the widow, the aged worker, more and more discretionary powers are given in the field of financing the private enterprise.

In its April 29, 1964 issue, Le Soleil gives a serious warning to those who preach this pension plan or a social insurance system. At this stage I would like to quote an extract from this editorial:

> No contribution of 3 or 4 per cent is levied on the salaries of workers, independent or not, of small and large wage earners and of employers to finance a pension fund supposedly generous, without that affecting small enterprises which must already lay out money for unemployment insurance, workmen's compensation, round table committees and other services, including the levying of taxes, etc. Consideration must be given naturally to the social aspect of a program approved in principle by everyone but which must be developed and applied with caution. Services (all social) must be paid for and the person with money can secure such services more easily than the one who has not.
> The small enterprises will be more affected than the large ones by the new pension plan. The well established and more automated industries have already set up an annuity plan for their employees, while many small enterprises have been able to stay away from them for different reasons. For them, the contributions to a pension fund will represent an additional expense.
> Now, a rise in the cost of their products could greatly affect small businesses and even destroy some of them, and that would increase unemployment at least for some time.
>
> The introduction of a national pension plan can, just as if taxes were raised, affect certain vulnerable industries, such as clothing, lumber, leather and the shoe industries and small manufactures. Contributions to the pension fund will affect, at least at first, revenues of small businesses which cannot increase the price of their goods as readily as big industries. In the long run, the increase in cost will be transferred to consumers, workers, everybody, through higher prices. As far as private pension funds are concerned, we may assume that they will not improve and that many of them will probably be integrated in the retirement fund.
> Before the new retirement plan designed to further protect older persons, widows and disabled persons is put into force, we would be well advised to make a thorough study of the plan in order to remove its negative elements. It should not affect other means of saving money, private retirement funds or life insurance. We should always take a second look at all the implications involved in any large scale project, especially when it concerns the welfare of the people and our economic independence. If we lay more emphasis on the public rather than the private sector, we might sap the source of energy and vitality of our economy. That should be borne in mind when considering the various opinions of experts on the industrial consequences of a retirement fund.

That is the opinion, Mr. Chairman, not of a person engaged in politics, but of the editorial writer of one of the ten most important dailies in Canada.

Once this social insurance plan is established, there is no way out, because we establish there in the field of social security, what has been established in the field of labour security, a plan called unemployment insurance or subsidies paid by the state when there is a depletion of funds and increase in the contribution—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Foy: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I was very surprised at the remarks made by the hon. member for Perth, the very ungallant remarks, regarding our minister's age.

Mr. Monteith: I am sorry.

Miss LaMarsh: I am sorry too.

Mr. Foy: I want to say that I admire greatly the minister's determination and strength, despite the opposition encountered, in bringing this very intricate bill to completion.

Mr. Knowles: Completion?

Mr. Foy: I should like to direct my remarks to an area of old age security on which, by virtue of my experience as a life underwriter or, more specifically, as a life insurance salesman, I feel qualified to speak. I feel I am in a good position to know just how the average Canadian feels about all phases of security. I am familiar with his hopes and fears, his dreams and ambitions.

Mr. Chairman, a man in his early productive years is concerned with the care, maintenance and education of his children. He is also concerned with adequate provision for his family in the event of the loss of his income through death or disability. The inescapable demands of the present must take precedence over the requirements of things that might happen tomorrow. It is not surprising therefore that far too many of our citizens reach old age, or the age of 65 in dire financial straits.

[Mr. Perron.]

The life of a man has been prolonged far beyond the traditional three score years and ten, and yet we have not achieved a realistic solution to the problem, up until now, of sustaining him through these extra years of longevity. It was for the purpose of removing these inconsistencies that this government proposed the Canada pension plan. It is also the considered judgment of government actuaries and economists, who have been studying the proposed plan for months, and even years, that the Canada pension plan will not produce any adverse effects upon existing private plans. The ten year transitional period will give ample opportunity for integrating the Canada pension plan with existing private plans. The responsible parties to each one of the private plans will be free to decide (a) where contributions are relatively high, that the over-all contribution should not be increased. The adjustment is very simple. The existing private plan contribution rate would be reduced equal to the contribution required under the federal plan, and the benefits would be adjusted accordingly. Further, the responsible parties would be free to decide, (b), that the private plan may remain unchanged, if desired, and the benefits would then be enhanced by the benefits from the Canada pension plan; or to decide, (c), that the private plan benefits may be used to provide level combined benefits for early retirement, say at age 65 or perhaps even at 60; or to decide, (d), which is more important, that reserves built up by private pension plans shall not be disturbed or taken over by the Canada pension plan. The same applies to any rights to benefits already acquired under private plans, and integration will not be compulsory.

In the final analysis, Mr. Chairman, it will guarantee the hopes and aspirations of all Canadian people by assuring them of happiness, contentment without fear, and adequate security in their retirement years. Surely old age should have certain compensations for what has been lost—peace and comfort, freedom from worry and financial independence should be among them.

The Canada pension plan is not the total answer to old age or to retirement, but it is a foundation upon which our citizens can build as they themselves deem fit, and they will build additions with the help of alert life insurance companies.

When a firm decides to instal a retirement plan for its employees, the group between 50 and 65 years of age are not able to benefit to a sufficient extent because they cannot contribute enough in the space of time left to them to provide for an adequate pension. There are those who will say that Mac, Harold and Waldo will really cash in because they will collect their pensions by only having to contribute for a few years. Yet, when hospitalization was introduced there were patients already in hospital who received benefits. There were people who went into hospitals the day the legislation became law. Those people had contributed nothing in the way of payments, yet they benefited. Was this wrong? In the case of the unemployment insurance plan there were those who became unemployed soon after the plan came into force and were not denied benefits.

This legislation will guarantee Canadians two of those freedoms declared in the Atlantic charter—freedom from fear and freedom from want. We have the means and the method of providing for all, from the very commencement of this plan.

It is a recognized fact that thousands of Canadians continue to work long past the age when they should, and not because they want to but because they have to. They have to cling to their jobs as their sole source of income, without which they would sink into debt and into the depths of despair. They are on a treadmill and cannot get off, so they cling to their jobs. Younger men coming into the work force must wait for job openings which are not in existence, because the lack of proper pensions forces the older worker to answer the whistle long past the day when he should have been allowed to take a well earned rest by retiring. The Canada pension plan will eliminate the day when a man is forced to stay at his job until he drops. Legislation which eliminates situations such as this is good legislation.

Through the development of the Canada pension plan the government will have a source of development capital that could work wonders for Canada in the next ten, 20 or 25 years. Projects now on the drafting boards gathering dust, because of the lack of funds, will become a reality. This will in turn provide further employment across the nation, and further employment will mean growth in the fund.

As to the details of the pension plan itself, they are now well known. The benefits are not grandiose. A single man retiring at age 70 will receive up to $179 per month. A married couple will receive up to $254 per month. These figures of course include the present old age security.

After 1970 a substantial number of pensions will be available at age 65. Pension for widows and dependant children, including the orphans' benefits, and pensions for the disabled will be of great benefit to all Canadians.

I was most delighted to learn from the minister's remarks that in future the Old Age Security Act will allow people to apply late, which many of them do, and be able to collect back payments up to 12 months, and also about the change involving the automatic adjustment of pensions after 1967. I believe this is a move toward modern thinking. The pensions of the aged will increase from $75 per month, upwards, with changes in the cost of living index. I am particularly pleased about this because in the future elder citizens will not be harassed at elections. Future increases in their monthly cheques will be automatic according to the formula.

A man earning $5,000 a year or more will receive the maximum pension payable under the plan and this money will allow him to retain the dignity he deserves in his sunset years. He will not be forced to sell his home and move into a more humble dwelling. He will not have to curtail his eating and other things as some elderly Canadians must do now. He will not look threadbare to his neighbours. He will not have to do any of these things. This is as it should be, for a man who has worked most of the days of his life should be allowed to retire and retain his dignity. I cannot stress too strongly the sentiments I hear expressed in my riding with reference to this bill. The people there let me know at every opportunity that they favour this legislation, and they favour it now.

Pensions today must be portable, Mr. Chairman, for a great number of Canada's working people. Automation and major construction projects are the real factors which necessitate portable pensions. All major construction projects do not take place in one spot, nor is all building done by one construction firm. A man must be free to move from project to project, from employer to employer, if Canada is to benefit from his skills through the growth of the gross national product. I believe this is why major construction firms, to single them out as an example, cannot provide adequate retirement plans. Their workers change to a large degree with each job. A portable pension is the only answer for these workers. No other will do. Because they work here and there, today building the St. Lawrence seaway, tomorrow the Saskatchewan dam and then moving on to the Columbia river project, they must carry their retirement plans with them.

It should be noted that construction workers do not work the year round every year. They, like so many others, have their excellent years and their bad years. Therefore I believe it is fitting that the retirement benefits will be based on average earnings over a lifetime, with adjustments being made for the lean years and the overly good years.

Construction workers are just one segment of the working force of Canada that must face the problems arising out of being highly mobile men. Automation too is going to change the picture and location of many in the labour force of this nation. As more and more jobs become automated the need for skilled technicians to move in and get a project started is going to increase. These technicians are going to be a highly skilled mobile training force and their number will grow. They will need portable pensions.

I should like to digress for a moment to point out that the city of Sarnia in my riding is regarded as the most highly automated city in Canada. As the major petroleum and chemical industries located there automated, men were gradually processed out of jobs. I do not mean to imply that they were fired, to be replaced by machines. They continued on the job but as they reached retirement age they were pensioned off and quite handsomely too. The point I am making is that the city of Sarnia has automated and the phasing out of the labour force was handled without any major dislocation.

But as the process of automation is speeded up, so will be the phasing out of older workers and in some cases they will not be as fortunate as the people in my riding who worked for firms that provided pensions. They will find themselves out of a job with no visible means of support. They will swell the unemployment rolls. They will become the ancient mariners of our land, stopping passers-by to tell their tale of woe.

The Canada pension plan could forestall this by assuring them of an adequate income. They would not have to seek full time employment. Their many skills would be available to fill the gaps where part time help is needed. I think it is only right that this bill should contain provisions enabling a retired person to take on a part time job if he or she feels it is worth while. None of us likes to feel he is not needed. We all like to feel we are required and that we are useful and can do something meaningful. The legislation under debate here recognizes this fact, with its provisions to allow a retired person to continue to contribute his skills to a limit which he himself can determine.

For all these reasons, for the dignity of old age, for the reward of a lifetime of toil, to enable the generation even now moving into the work field to find employment, to help ease the transition to automation, to make all Canada a market for a man's skills, to create capital for the further development of our resources but, above all, Mr. Chairman, because we all know we have a duty in conscience to care for the aged and the elderly, I urge upon the house the necessity for the speedy passage of this legislation.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock p.m. this day are as follows:

The hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale (Mr. Rapp), re feeder cattle prices; the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler), re the depressed position of eastern farmers.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to compliment the minister on finally getting this compulsory, contributory pension plan before us. I am sure it has been a trying period for her in being held back so much in her attempts to bring forth this major piece of legislation. I should like to tell her I enjoyed listening to her this afternoon, and may I say her reasonable, quiet approach became her.

I was also pleased to listen to my close personal friend, the hon. member for Lambton West, who painted a beautiful picture of this plan, and I compliment him on a worthy presentation. Now I know why he was so successful in his previous business. I am in agreement with much of what he said, but in my opinion there are certain areas of this matter which should be examined under a bright light.

We all share the hope that this plan is more realistic, more palatable and a little more down to earth than were the previous ones. The white paper gives us a brief outline of the plan but of course it is couched in the language of a well prepared sales brochure. In other words, it does not give too much actual detail but concentrates on glowing, descriptive features of the plan. I look forward to seeing the actual bill and to examining it very soon.

I was delighted to learn of our flat rate pension scheme being tied in with the cost of living index, but in my discussion of the resolution tonight I would like to examine it in the light of priorities. What should we do first? What are the social requirement priorities of Canada at present? What is the most important social action at this time? Is it on pensions? Is it on health or education?

The royal commission on health services has pointed out that by 1971 we will be spending $466 million annually on health services, and in addition that we will need $400 million for expansion of and additions to medical schools. In the light of this I propose to discuss what priorities should be undertaken.

So far as I am concerned the role of the federal government in social security should be to provide a floor for universal retirement, to provide a level below which no Canadian is forced or allowed to go. In this connection I pay tribute to our flat rate plan. It is expensive in its cost but it is cheap to administer. It is not related to status in life but is universally available.

I suggest improvements could be made in it. So far as old age security is concerned I believe our most effective step at this time would be to update the present plan, and as the minister mentioned this is being done to a certain degree. I believe it should be modernized, modified and overhauled. I believe the qualifying age should be reduced from 70 to 65 years, but the plan should be administered on an actuarial basis. I even go so far as to suggest that at normal retirement age of 65, when a husband proves he has withdrawn from the work force, his wife should receive her pension, and her pension could be easily adjusted to take into account any great disparity in age.

Quite a case can be made for the proposition that the older a person is the larger his pension should be. A bigger flat rate pension should be provided for those aged 80, and 85 years, because in many instances older people have had to spend their savings for extra help in the home and extra doctors' bills. In many cases the needs of people in this age group are greater than the needs of people aged 70 or 75 who may be able to look after themselves better.

I would favour a pension commission or board completely removed from politics, a board set up to administer the flat rate pension related to average earnings or, as the minister has already announced, related to the cost of living index.

There are great variations of conditions between the vast areas of this great country and in my opinion local conditions can best be met by local or regional governments. Therefore I propose that a modernization of our flat rate pension plan be considered first. I do not think I am completely alone in this view. For seven years the Canadian welfare council has said that other social schemes have priority. I do not say this is necessarily correct, but let us discuss this question openly and find out. We have only so much by way of resources to dispose of, and the setting up of a list of priorities should, I believe, be considered. I submit that the real order of priority in this country would probably be: education, medicare, and then pensions.

I personally favour a pay as you go scheme, a plan which does not build up huge funds to be administered by politicians. These pension funds are trust funds; I might even go as far as to say they are sacred trust funds, and they should never be under the control of politicians. Look at the list of investments for which these funds may be used. The provinces have the right to use these moneys and if they do not need them the remainder can be invested in dominion government securities. I deplore this method of looking after trust funds. I pay tribute to our life insurance companies and insurance companies generally for having done such a good job in this regard. I would prefer that trained, highly skilled investment experts removed from political considerations should have control over the investment features of any pension fund in which I was involved.

I am also concerned about the very high cost of administration which this plan will necessitate. The career of every citizen from the age of 18 to the age of 70 will have to be followed in the minutest detail. It will be a repetition of the experience of the business community—the Department of Industry at the front door and the department of inland revenue at the back door. Just look at how the numbers of civil servants have increased in recent years. I submit that the benefits flowing from this plan are not commensurate with the cost and will not make up for the ill effects of the disruption of existing plans. As I see it, the plan subsidizes those who are in least need; its greatest benefits accrue to those who need them least. A welfare plan should take care of those who really need assistance. I think the people should be told the truth. All that a pension plan is, is money —money for future delivery. The government has no magic formula for administering pension funds better than anyone else. As far as I can see there is no economy which can be effected by federal administration as opposed to existing facilities. The only thing a government can do is to make it compulsory for everybody to belong.

According to the white paper, this plan provides nothing for people who are now over 70, though many of these people really need additional help. Further, it provides little for those who are over the age of 65. Finally, it does not look to me like much of a bargain for those who are 25 or under, because they will be paying for many years and getting no more out of the plan than a man who is 55 years of age.

I further suggest that those who need pensions most, as a class, are those who are engaged in seasonal pursuits—trappers, fishermen, construction workers, and so on. Taking into account their limited incomes, this plan offers little real benefit to them. Farmers and the self-employed are, I submit, being penalized. It is true that farmers can participate, as can other groups of self-employed people, but they must pay the whole shot. Groups of employees in industry pay approximately one half of the contribution made in respect of them; the employer pays approximately the same amount. This is, in truth, a payroll tax. The extra cost of doing business, the extra cost of production brought about as a result of the employer contribution must in large measure be passed along to the consumer. So I submit the farm people and the self-employed who constitute a large segment of the economy of this country will be paying their full share, plus a bonus to the others in the form of higher prices for goods and services. I think this is unfair. I am not alone in this belief, because a former minister of transport, appearing before the joint committee, had this to say about the same question:

> I think it is pretty clear that a tax on wages and salaries would have a very direct effect on cost of production. I would think if there were a payroll tax, paid by the employer, the tendency would be for it to be passed on in prices almost immediately.

Rest assured, this is a payroll tax. I suggest the self-employed and the farm people would be much better off under a modernized, up to date flat rate plan. This I submit would go a long way toward alleviating hardship in the depressed areas.

[Mr. McCutcheon.]

On the basis of irregular earnings the pension, as I mentioned a few moments ago, amounts to little or nothing. On the whole it provides for those who are not in dire need. Let us consider one or two other points. In industry, contributory pensions have been a matter for union bargaining. Several union leaders have already stated that they would not consider the integration of existing plans with this new, compulsory Canada pension plan. I foresee labour-management disputes which will put an additional burden on business and on the economy in general. Some of our provincial governments are now concerned with legislation covering the portability of pensions within and between provinces. This is a matter which comes under provincial jurisdiction. If such arrangements are made, what excuse is there for imposing this scheme on a company which can prove that it has a plan equal to, or better than, the one proposed by the government? In 1950 the type of plan now put forward was turned down and the committee advocated a flat rate plan. Conditions change, I know, but by and large the same situation prevails today as prevailed then.

I deplore the fact that there is no factual actuarial report presented with this white paper—just an anonymous opinion that the economy can take the cost. It assumes a pension plan standing by itself and I submit the cost of the plan must be considered in toto, together with all the other costs of government. I quote Mr. John B. Meyer of the Montreal Gazette who on August 14, 1964 asked:

> Can we really afford the claim upon income represented by the pension plan on top of present and future claims, particularly that represented by the recommendation of the royal commission on health services? This should be the starting point for any examination of the plan. It is ignored completely in the white paper.

Again, may I say a contributory compulsory plan is definitely worthy of consideration. I do not feel it is all bad; I think it can be overhauled and made to work. But I submit that, as usual, this government has given it the wrong priority. I suggest that a more appropriate priority would be to update and modernize our present plan, remove it from politics and then consider education, medicare and a contributory, compulsory pension plan, in that order.

[Translation]

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, today there is a tendency in this house and elsewhere, to mention at every turn "the government's capitulating to the provinces" and, more particularly " to Quebec", as there is—I am sorry to say, on the other hand frequent talk of "Quebec's yielding to Ottawa" in some Quebec groups.

These detestable expressions of "yielding", or "capitulating" will, I hope, not be used in respect of the pension plan which the Minister of National Health and Welfare introduced this afternoon.

If there is to be any talk of "capitulation", it will be, I hope, to common sense, a yielding to the need of compromise which should necessarily govern the solution of political problems and to the new spirit which marks federal-provincial relations at this time.

Mr. Chairman, how did we arrive at the present situation? How did we come to the pension plan such as it is today?

At the time where inevitably, fortunately and dangerously also was developing the technique of opting out and contracting out a new technique appeared, which I could called the contracting in formula, an agreement between the central government and one or several provinces upon the passing of similar legislation.

In order to remind you of these facts, Mr. Chairman, in July 1963 the central government initiated a pension scheme; it was certainly its right. Some provinces indicated their interest in moving into the same legislative field; it was also their right. Then complex and lengthy negotiations started; all the Cassandras of the country uttered a unanimous opinion: confederation is in danger; it is even already dead, assassinated, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) would say.

After months of work during which politicians and federal and provincial officials did their best, a compromise was reached on a pension plan. In this atmosphere of optimism, a constitutional amendment was approved providing for benefits to survivors and disabled persons.

The provinces have two alternatives: they may either have their own plan or they may accept that of the central government. Essential parts of both plans are identical.

In short, those are the facts, Mr. Chairman. The proposed plan is a national plan, with all the benefits that this involves. It is a national plan without being exclusively a federal plan. It is national because it can be either a federal or a provincial plan; provinces can choose the federal plan or have their own provincial plan if they so wish.

For those who would be tempted in this debate to speak of concessions to provinces, to Quebec particularly, I would like first of all to reaffirm the priority rights of the provinces in the field of pension plans and, in the second place, indicate improvements to the federal plan following its merger, so to speak, with the Quebec plan.

For the others, that is those who would be tempted to say that this is a Quebec concession to Ottawa, I would like to mention the improvements made to the Quebec plan resulting from the merger with the original federal plan.

First, the constitutional aspect: as I said earlier, both the federal and provincial governments were perfectly entitled to introduce their own pension plan.

Section 94A, arising out of the amendment of 1951, and amended in 1964, reads as follows:

> The parliament of Canada may from time to time make laws in relation to old age pension in Canada, but no law made by the parliament of Canada in relation to old age pensions shall affect the operation of any law present or future—

I emphasize: present or future.

> —of a provincial legislature in relation to old age pensions.

Because of that 1951 amendment the legislation on old age pensions had become a joint field like agriculture and immigration.

However, while in these two latter fields, section 95 grants a priority, a "paramountcy" to central legislation, section 94A recognizes the paramountcy of the provincial legislation, not only for the existing law, but for any future provincial law.

As soon as the provincial legislation is affected in relation to pension plans, the federal government must withdraw. This is provided by the constitution.

Therefore, I think it was impossible to have federal and provincial plans, both being government comprehensive plans.

I conclude and I think that this conclusion must be kept in mind during this debate: the federal government was not free to do as it pleases as regards pension plans. It had, and it has to agree with the provinces. It had and it has to do so in order to give the pension plan all the desirable scope, stability and efficiency.

An agreement was therefore achieved through the constructive will of the central government and through the good will of the provinces and of Quebec particularly.

The minister will be accused—it was done already this afternoon—of having attacked, of having retreated, having amended, having altered. This afternoon, the Leader of the Opposition grumbled: Two revisions, two revisions.

The minister would have been accused of the opposite if an agreement had not been reached.

It would have been said then that she had lacked flexibility. It would have been said then that she was in favour of centralization.

The people will take all that into consideration and that is why they will not take away from the Minister of National Health and Welfare the popularity she now enjoys.

What has been the influence of the Quebec plan on the evolution of the final federal plan, a summary of which was given to us this afternoon? You understand that it would be necessary here to compare the two original plans, the Quebec plan and the final federal plan. I do not have enough time and I will limit myself to a few points.

First, in addition to remaining a social security plan, the present plan also becomes a source of capital. It has often been said that for the people of Quebec who want to have a hand in their own economic development, capitalization was essential, and I think we must congratulate the federal government and the other provinces for having understood that. I feel that the other provinces will also benefit from this change.

Second, "coverage", that is the number of assessable persons, has also grown. Such exceptions as the dependent workers, originally considered, have been set aside. Participation of self-employed workers, optional in the original plan, now becomes compulsory, as it is in the Quebec plan. Revenue will obviously be increased, as will the benefits. Had self-employed workers been free to join the plan or not, only those with fairly high income would have done so and the social security aspect would have suffered therefrom.

Third, the assessable income is set at a minimum of $600 and a maximum of $5,000. You will remember that the original federal plan foresaw from zero to $4,500, while the Quebec plan provided for $1,000 to $6,000. The compromise of $600 will have for effect, we must say, to benefit the less fortunate people, since a person who, for instance, is paying benefits or contributions on $1,400 will receive an annuity based on $2,000, since the exemption will not be deducted for the calculation of benefits.

Fourth, the contribution rate has been increased. In the first federal plan it was 2 per cent at the beginning. It must be pointed out also that it increased up to 4 per cent for salaried people and up to 3 per cent in the case of self-employed workers. Under the provincial plan, the basis was 4 per cent indefinitely. Under the present plan, the basis is 3.6 per cent of the contributive revenue of the self-employed worker. It is 1.8 per cent for the employee, and 1.8 per cent for the employer in the case of dependent workers.

But take heed. Because of the basic exemption of $600, the rate is, in fact, less than 3.6 per cent. Especially, the rate is a progressive one. It is very low for the small wage earner, i.e., 1.4 per cent in the case of an employee earning $2,000; the rate increasing as the earnings increase. I think the social security aspect will greatly benefit from it. As far as the economic aspect is concerned, it is also worth while, because the small employer will pay less than large industries, their employees receiving ordinarily smaller salaries than those employed in larger industries.

Fifth, the expected retirement benefits of 20 per cent are raised to 25 per cent and will be adjusted, as in the Quebec plan, according to a formula which is a compromise in itself. Its advantage is obvious.

Sixth, the original federal plan could not, in the absence of a constitutional amendment, provide for payments to "non-old" survivors. With regard to the transfer of the pension to the disabled, to the widow, to the orphan, as far as death benefits are concerned, the final plan follows—improving on it at times—the Quebec plan.

Once again, I must say that undoubtedly, without the compromise arrived at, the provinces, especially the province of Quebec, would not have approved the constitutional amendment obtained last summer. I feel that must be recalled.

Seventh, an adjustment formula concerning the minimum and maximum of the assessable income and the benefits themselves is added to the original federal plan, taking into consideration the cost of living to begin with and later on the index of salaries.

That formula is itself a compromise, but the idea to adjust benefits comes, I have been told, from the Quebec plan. The idea is of undeniable value since its result is to maintain the purchasing power of the pension, in periods of inflation, obviously.

Finally, a last improvement: the administration of the plan is improved; all sorts of compromises concerning, for instance, the appeal procedure, the inclusion of federal and provincial civil servants, have also been secured. Is that convincing enough? I believe so. The federal plan benefits from its association with the Quebec plan. I would like to add also that the Quebec plan gains a lot from its association with the federal plan.

First of all, the date when benefits will be available is moved ahead, the transitory period is reduced from 20 to 10 years. Thus the services rendered the country by the persons who have now reached somewhat advanced maturity can be recognized.

Second, the amount of exemption is reduced to $600 from $1,000. This will allow participation to this pension plan by a greater number of those in the low-income bracket.

Third, benefits to the disabled, which were reserved for persons of 60 years of age or more in the Quebec plan, will not be available, after five years of contributions, to anyone 23 years old or more.

Once again, and I now conclude to allow the member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau) to be recognized, this is a compromise. In a compromise each party loses a little, but each also gains more.

Both the federal and the provincial plans are better than before April 1964. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) admitted that fact only a few hours ago.

And above all, Mr. Chairman, the whole of Canada is better off after the events I just mentioned. First, we have at last a pension plan. Then—and I think it is important—I feel that a new technique has been invented in the field of federal-provincial relations, which I called a while ago "contracting in," namely the agreement of the federal government and the provinces in order to pass together identical legislation.

Finally, this pension plan, which is another great achievement in the realm of cooperative federalism, proves once more the maturity of Canadian political leaders.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Chairman, there is hardly a person in this house who does not approve of a pension plan which will support those who need that support in old age, or in the cases of need that precedes old age. This being so one wonders why there was so much opposition to the plans previously suggested. The minister says that there are important new dimensions in the plan now. We are glad to hear this. It is hardly necessary to repeat that the opposition originally was not to the basic principles of a pension but to the failure properly to implement these principles in the first two schemes. Now that this scheme has been hammered out by the opposition and been refined in the furnace of controversy, it begins to be a good plan. However, I think there are certain warnings that still need to be given and certain facts that it would be well for the people of this country to know and understand.

The basic principle of the plan is indicated in this quotation which I take from the government's white paper of August 1964, page 7:

> Adequate levels of pensions cannot be realistically achieved, in a country like Canada, simply by increasing the flat-rate pension. Living costs vary greatly between town and country, and between different regions of Canada. What people need, if either retirement or the death or disablement of the head of the family removes their regular income, is related in part to the level of earnings to which they have been accustomed.
> The Canada pension plan will therefore provide a retirement pension related to the earnings on which people have contributed. The scale of this pension will rise during a ten year transitional period to a level of 25 per cent of these earnings.

This is a good principle and one, I am sure, with which we all agree. However, we should not be carried away by this statement. It leaves the impression that a retiree will get 25 per cent of his earnings when he retires. This is only true with certain important qualifications. Some get more and some get less.

In fact, those whose earnings are below $5,000 yearly will at the end of the transitional period of ten years, and if the person retiring is 70 years of age, be paid 25 per cent of earnings on the earnings related pension, and on that alone. They will as well receive a further $75 a month from the old age security pension. A man then who earns $200 monthly would receive $50 earnings related pension plus $75 old age security pension, a total of $125 a month. This is 62 per cent of his previous monthly wage, and it is not a bit too much. The man earning $5,000 a year gets $416.67 monthly wage. His earnings related pension would be $104.17 monthly plus the old age security pension of $75, a total of $179.17. This is only 43 per cent of his previous monthly wage. The man earning $10,000 a year gets $833.34 monthly wage. His earnings related pension and old age security pension are the same as the man earning $5,000 a year, or again a total of $179.17. This is only 21½ per cent of his previous monthly wage.

Thus this earnings related pension and the old age security pension are providing, as a little further calculation will show, at incomes below $8,600, a pension which is 25 per cent or better of earnings prior to retirement. This is little enough since many pension plans strive to provide 70 per cent to a certain arbitrary maximum, at earnings based on that figure of $8,600. This pension then provides a pension which in many cases is below 25 per cent of earned income.

However, since this is a minimum plan, this is not surprising, and I do not think we should criticize it on that basis. It was not my purpose to do so, but I think these facts should be brought out. In fact it is a good thing that a pension scheme should pay higher percentages to low income groups so that these people may have enough money with which to live in reasonable comfort. It is necessary for those who are now in other pension schemes to keep these variable percentages in mind when considering what course they should follow with their present schemes in relation to the Canada pension plan.

For many years I was much concerned with the pension scheme for my profession in the province of Saskatchewan. When that scheme was introduced it was a good scheme related to earnings, but the depression of the 1930's almost wrecked it and had to be drastically revised on other principles in 1942. With the rising cost of living and rising salaries after 1945 there were years of struggle to have major increases introduced into the scheme. In 1957 major increases were obtained, but as the cost of living and salaries continued to increase another major redrafting was done in 1963 and the pension plan went back to the principle of relation to income. I mention this only to emphasize that thinking in the pension field changes, with the hope that a flexible attitude will be taken by the government when the bill is referred to committee for detailed study, and also the hope that the government will willingly accept the necessary revisions that are almost certain to come out of that study.

I mention it as well for another reason, and I think a very important one. There are a great many very good pension schemes in operation in this country. They have been hammered out through the years with much debate, and not always good humoured debate, until today they tend to do what they set out to do—protect the employees they cover and provide adequate pensions. The costs to the employees and employers are quite appreciable, and are distinctly noticeable in the reductions they produce in the salary cheques of the employees covered, as anyone who has been covered by such a plan and who has had deductions made from his salary cheque will realize.

The Canada pension plan is going to upset all the carefully planned arrangements these schemes have evolved and tested throughout the years, and I think it is going to be a great deal more difficult to talk to the government than it was to talk to the employer, when modifications were desirable. I hope that by providing pensions for those who were not covered before, the Canada pension plan is not going to upset these plans. I am very suspicious about this because we hear that the federal civil servants and provincial civil servants are not going to be covered by the Canada pension plan. At least that is what the Calgary Herald of October 20 stated, and I should like to quote from that newspaper as follows:

> When the federal government first broached the idea of a Canada pension plan, it emphasized that that it would be a universal scheme to which all Canadians would be required to contribute.
> Yet, at the very outset, an exception was conceded—federal civil servants would remain outside the federal scheme, and their own plan would remain in effect.
> Now, it has been revealed that provincial civil servants will be able to opt out of the plan as well. This seems most unsatisfactory. By what right should only provincial and federal civil servants be permitted to opt out and carry on with their own schemes? If this has to be a universal, compulsory plan, there is no justification for giving favoured treatment to any section of the Canadian public...there are many other Canadians who are not public servants who also have been contributing for many years to private and company schemes which are far superior to that which Ottawa is determined to foist on the nation.

The minister said today that the act is to be "truly national in its provisions" and that it "will operate uniformly across the country". These are strange statements indeed, if the newspaper is correct. Are these people then not to be in the plan? If they are not, then why are they not? Is it because they know that their own plans are better? What then about all the private plans that are good, are they to opt out completely, as the civil servants are allowed to do? If they are not able to do this then why, if civil servants can, are others not allowed to do the same? What about the broad base needed to carry the plan? I hope that in the negotiations carried on with the administrators of these plans the government will not be dictatorial and arrogant. Perhaps I am unduly pessimistic, but if I am, this government has only itself to blame. Its mistakes have been legion and its arrogances obvious. If the government is to continue this attitude, they may find that the Canada pension plan is not the vote catcher they think it is.

The self-employed and the small businessman, in which group I include the farmers of my constituency, are going to have trouble with this scheme. The self-employed has to make the employer's contribution of 1.8 per cent, and also the employee's contribution of 1.8 per cent, so he will be paying 3.6 per cent for coverage for himself under the plan. He is going to notice this, just as the salary pensioner is going to notice his increased payments. Most self-employed create an estate which they expect will maintain them when they retire. Creation of that estate will be more difficult, due to this loss of income to the pension fund. It may be argued that the businessman or farmer will get it back as pension. This is true, but will the government make that money produce for the farmer as well as he would make it produce for himself? We all know it will not. The government will probably just sit on it or put it into bonds, which is nice and safe but not very productive, especially for the small businessman.

And are we sure that the rate will not be increased? My experience with pension plans suggests that it will need to be increased and the experience of the United States with a very similar plan resulted in the rate there having to be increased. I will never forget how I listened with amazement when the minister told us in August, 1963 what the benefits of the then Canada pension plan would be and what the rates to pay for those benefits would be. We all know what has happened to the benefits and rates, the one down and the other up. In the Canada pension plan they now seem reasonable but if any pension plan is to continue to fulfil its function of adequately supporting the pensioner with some relation to income its benefits and its rates will have to rise as the country goes forward.

There is a cost of living clause built into the Canada pension plan now, which will help. Then the minister tells us today that a cost of living provision will be attached to the old age pension too, and so it should be. But I am as certain as a man can be that the rates will need to be raised if we are going to get better benefits, and we will need better benefits in time. Yet the minister says that there are restraints in the present plan to prevent changes in the rates and benefits. This seems to forecast a battle. However, if the rates do rise the farmer and the businessman as well as the employee are the people who are going to feel the increases.

These are the comments I should like to make at this time. I am all in favour of a good pension scheme and so is my party. They had a study under way when defeated in 1963. My party showed its concern for the pensioner, with the assistance of the other opposition groups, by forcing the government to meet its promise to pay $75 a month to the old age pensioners. This government had tied that increase to the Canada pension plan. The old age pensioners would still be waiting for it and would have been $120 poorer today if the government had carried out its intentions.

Mr. Cashin: Mr. Chairman, it is a distinct honour for me to participate in this historic debate today. We know that for the past decade or so this country has been noticeably unimaginative in its attitude toward social security. Since universal old age pensions were introduced in 1952 we have had only one major piece of social security legislation introduced in the House of Commons, namely the hospital insurance legislation introduced some years ago.

During this period successive governments did increase the benefits, of course, available under existing programs but this required neither great courage nor imagination. However, there was little evidence, and there has been little evidence up until now of an evolution of a sound philosophy of social security. The nineteenth century attitude which from time to time prevails in criticizing social security has left a legacy of myths about social security and the welfare state which are not only erroneous but, it would seem, have restricted governments in the past from taking a more imaginative and realistic approach toward the social and economic problems of modern society.

The lack of a sound, balanced approach to social security is admittedly complicated by the federal nature of our society. It is this very set of circumstances which has in the past and will in the future present some severe tests to the federal government. The present administration is to be congratulated for surmounting some of the difficulties inherent in our federal system which complicate the problem of attaining national standards in pensions and in other fields.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the achievement of bringing forth a national contributory pension plan which is truly portable is a testimonial not only to the progressive spirit of the present administration but also to its ability to cope with the problems of a federal state. This is all the more remarkable when we note that this was brought about by a government in a minority position in the House of Commons and at a time when there is a great deal of controversy centered around the House of Commons and around confederation itself.

In the past decade Canada had two governments which enjoyed overwhelming majorities in the House of Commons. Yet neither of these administrations took this very fundamental forward step of providing this very basic part of Canada's social security system, a step forward, Mr. Chairman, which more than any other is in my opinion a realization of the need for a sound philosophy of social security. In the past year or so the matter of a Canada pension plan has been discussed at four federal-provincial conferences. In view of the constitutional division of powers it was impossible for the federal government to proceed as completely as it now has in this field. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, what we have seen over the past year has been co-operative federalism at work. Because of the sound and reasonable approach taken by this administration to the matter of federal-provincial relations we now will have a national pension plan which provides for portability between all provinces, and we also have the necessary constitutional amendment to provide for supplementary pensions for widows, orphans and disabled contributors. Therefore this government has not only introduced a great social security measure but in doing so it has brought Canadians of all origins closer together by crossing what seemed a year ago to be insurmountable obstacles. It is a great tribute to this administration's ability to cope with the difficulties inherent in our present political environment. It is also a great rebuke to those purveyors of pessimism and proponents of instant wisdom who have severely criticized our democratic institutions.

That these are times of controversy no one will deny. It seems to me, however, that in times of great change one hears all too much of the negative side of things. It is perhaps easier to succumb to fear than to summon the courage to cope with the situation. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, we pay far too much attention to the prophets of doom.

The events of the past year which led to the introduction of today's resolution can only confirm our conviction that the present administration is providing us with calm and reasonable leadership that refuses to be deterred from its course by extremism from any quarter. It represents a great triumph for moderation over extremism and gives one confidence that men and women of reason can, with patience and understanding, arrive at a common consensus. It is a great lesson in the art of government.

The white paper on pensions tabled in August gives us a good indication of the scope and the magnitude of this legislation. There are two significant features which represent an improvement over the original plan and which were achieved through negotiations with the provinces over the past year. These negotiations, as I have said, are a vivid example of co-operative federalism at work. First of all, this is now a truly national plan which provides for complete portability from province to province. This is an important step in providing greater mobility within the labour force. Workers must be free to move from job to job anywhere in Canada. Now they will be able to change jobs without losing their accumulated pension rights.

In our increasingly technical society change comes rapidly. It is not enough that we provide trade and technical schools for the training and retraining of workers; we must also ensure that change of employment will not jeopardize the security of the workers. The labour force should not be penalized by the changing nature of industry which requires a great mobility of the working force. A man ought to be free to change from job to job, to change from trade to trade, to change from area to area without severely risking his future security.

A compulsory, national pension plan which is completely portable is a significant step in insuring greater mobility of the work force. Of course, we realize other measures will have to be adopted at various levels in order to give a greater mobility to the labour force. The supply of skilled labour will require greater flexibility than hitherto has been the case, and in this age of technological change, as new skills come into demand, there will have to be qualified men and women to fill the jobs that will be vacant. This mobility not only means mobility from one area to another but it also implies workers having to change their types of work as older skills become obsolete. A proper environment must be developed in which the working man will be able to cope with these changes and reap the benefits from technological change along with the rest of society.

The second major accomplishment of co-operative federalism which is prominent in this plan is the inclusion of supplementary pensions for widows, orphans and disabled contributors. This is a field which, prior to the recent constitutional amendment, was enjoyed entirely by the provinces. The white paper points out that those under the age of 65 who will be eligible for supplementary pension will also draw a flat rate of $25 a month because these people will not, of course, be eligible for old age security. However, I think it is important to note that these supplementary pensions would be small if, in the early years of the plan, they were subject to the same ten year build-up as retirement pensions, and the government is to be commended on not including this ten years build-up as a provision applying to supplementary pensions. In a sense, therefore, supplementary benefit pensions are more generous, especially for those in the lower income brackets, than the new retirement pensions. This approach is justified because of the special need of widows, orphans and disabled contributors, and is certainly warranted on both humanitarian and economic grounds.

This plan at best can provide only minimum levels of retirement benefits. Because of the nature of their circumstances, widows, orphans and disabled contributors will not be in the same position to provide for themselves as well as able-bodied members of the work force can. These reasons justify the special way the government has approached this particular category. The approach is also justified because for the first time we will be making an attempt to have national standards in the case of widows, orphans and disabled contributors.

In the past great anomalies existed within the framework of our social security laws, and the greatest anomaly has been in this particular area because it is exclusively provincial and some provinces do not have the same resources as others to take care of orphans, widows and disabled contributors. This is particularly true of the Atlantic region, and therefore I think I can say the people of that region are very grateful the government has shown the wisdom of including these supplementary pensions. They are also grateful that this was able to be accomplished during the past year because, with the continuation of the existing approach undertaken by the respective provinces, this can lead to a more enlightened approach than has hitherto been undertaken with respect to this neglected group.

A number of members have commented on the inclusion of the self-employed in the plan. I would like to point out to them, and in particular to the hon. member for Perth who seemed to be taking issue with this, that they are overlooking the fact that an abnormally high number of the self-employed are in the low income group. This is particularly true in the Atlantic provinces. For example, in Newfoundland some 20,000 people are employed in the fishing industry, the biggest single employer in the province, and the vast majority of them are self-employed. It is significant to note that, according to the white paper, the way the plan is to be administered will mean a more generous treatment of the low income group.

This is only as it ought to be because it is good economics. The people in the low income group have a greater struggle to meet the basic expenditures required to provide bare subsistence, and therefore they do not have great resources to provide for their retirement years.

There is another reason why it is a good thing to include self-employed people. There are so many of them in the lower income group, and I would hope this legislation will not be held out as the end-all and be-all of any administration's approach to the problems of the people in that group. I hope there will be a vigorous attempt made to create an environment in which these people, particularly those in the Atlantic provinces, can work to move into higher income groups. It would be a mistake to exclude them from this pension plan because we are hopeful that in the not too distant future the earned income of the average fisherman, logger and farmer in eastern Canada will be considerably higher than it is now.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre also dealt with the position of the people in the low income group. I did not completely understand what he said but I rather got the impression that he was ignoring the fact that there is something of a transfer of income in the present administration's approach to the inclusion of people in the low income group. This is a significant step forward to the realization of the goal of equal opportunities for all Canadians.

The benefits to be provided under this plan will be of great significance to all the people of Canada because the government of Canada is in fact providing a service which otherwise would not be provided. In the 1960's we talk about our great industrial progress, yet two thirds of our work force are without adequate pensions. It is obvious to all but the most narrow-minded nineteenth century thinker that this is the only way and the best way to go about helping to provide security in old age. This is especially true in the case of those people who will benefit from the supplementary pensions because, as I mentioned earlier, this is a group which has been passed over in the past.

Though we talk about $75 a month being inadequate for people aged 70 years, this is a fortune compared with what is paid to some widows in parts of the country. If we have a sound philosophy on social security these anomalies can be ironed out, and I believe the introduction of this pension plan is the most significant step taken by any government in the realization of the need for such a philosophy.

As I said earlier, the one third we hear so much talk about, the one third who live on a bare subsistence level, cannot purchase for themselves through private insurance companies the pension plans that would provide them with some security in their old age. The benefits that they may be able to buy for themselves at present are not as great as we would like them to be, simply because of the fact that these people are in the low income group. I believe we cherish the hope, however, that after 30 years of acceptance of the government's role in the economy we shall reach a point where there will not be many people living at mere subsistance levels in this country. By including these people in the plan now, at a time when they do not have the resources to join private plans, we shall, as their incomes rise in the years ahead, have provided them with an opportunity to prepare for their years of retirement.

This pension plan is significant for many reasons, but the one I have tried to talk about is the mobility it will give to the Canadian labour force. It will not solve completely the problems caused by lack of mobility, but it is a step forward.

A second feature of the plan which appeals to me and to the people of Newfoundland is the inclusion of supplementary benefits. What this government has attempted to do in the Canada pension plan is consistent with what Abraham Lincoln had to say 100 years ago about the role of government:

> The legitimate object of government is to do for a community of people whatever they need to have done but cannot do at all or cannot do so well for themselves in their separate and individual capacities.

I think this succinctly explains what the government is seeking to do in bringing forward this pension plan. I do congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare on her achievement, one which must be all the sweeter in view of the bitterness which surrounds so many of the other things we do in this House of Commons.

Mr. Enns: There have been so many excellent contributions to the debate this afternoon that many of the points I wish to raise have already been covered, and covered well. There have been some references to the reasoned and reasonable statement made by the minister when she introduced this measure and made her initial statement in the house, and I am not at all surprised when I remember that within the last seven days she has visited the keystone province of Canada; the moderating atmosphere of Manitoba may have had something to do with the moderation of her statement this afternoon. She mentioned that there may be honest differences over various facets of the pension plan. I am glad she does recognize that there are different ways of looking at this question and different ways of viewing the needs of the people who will be involved. I am impressed by the gigantic scope of this scheme. When this plan was introduced initially, I believe the minister told us it was the most far-reaching legislation to have been placed before the house for many decades. This being so I feel we should be cautious and careful in our approach; we should seek to devise the kind of plan which is the best we can muster.

I am pleased to note that in the house today there has been no rancour, but rather an atmosphere of unity in recognizing the need for a Canada pension plan. The hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska spoke of the ways in which this plan illustrated the new phrase "co-operative federalism" we hear so often. The very fact that this is an example of an area where a province could actually opt out, as the phrase is, yet still be part of a national plan is perhaps a particularly good illustration of co-operative federalism. The only feature I am worried about in this connection is standards. The speaker who preceded me said this was a grand national plan, and that it would be raising standards in all the provinces. However, if the other provinces choose to invoke the privilege of opting out of a national program, is there machinery in this plan which would ensure that there will still be the national standards at which we have aimed in devising this scheme?

In my general endorsation of this plan I wish to inject some words of caution. I do so, not for the sake of making carping criticism but because I think we need to look very carefully at the effect this plan would have on our people and on our economy in general. I know that in Manitoba our premier, Mr. Duff Roblin, has spoken of the crisis of priorities. The hon. member for Lambton-Kent has already touched on this question of priorities. I feel justified in making further reference to it, however, because of the fact that the federal system under which this country operates makes it possible for both federal and provincial governments to impose taxes in the same tax areas. Personal income tax, for example, is a legitimate field for taxation by provincial governments as well as by the federal government and the same is true of corporation income taxes. In other areas, there is a separation—I refer to provincial sales taxes, for example, and on the other hand to excise taxes, which are purely a federal concern. But whatever the method of taxation used may be, the tax is always levied on the same resources—the only wealth generating power in the nation, namely the taxpayers.

It should be stated frankly that the combined taxation forces of the provincial governments and the federal government already take almost 25 per cent of the gross national product and I think common sense begs that we should look carefully at just where we are going. Are we getting the best value for our dollar? I share the anxiety of previous speakers over these expenditures. I think the Canada pension plan is a grand design. It is part of a further mosaic in our whole social security design. Earlier I spoke of the need for pulling together the various social security measures we already have and which have grown up piecemeal to deal with various areas of need, disability, old age, and so on. Here we have another piece added to the mosaic in the form of the Canada pension plan.

I am still hopeful that somehow we shall evolve a plan which will make one large social security parcel, whether we call it that or not, designed to meet the needs of people in all the various categories. The plan as introduced goes part of the way. It deals with benefits to survivors, to disabled people and to orphans and in this sense it is a great step forward, not just a piecemeal measure but an encompassing measure. It will certainly cost a great deal of money. If we are to demand revenue to meet this kind of expenditure from the public purse, I must say I share Premier Roblin's concern about priorities and I sometimes wonder whether we have placed the demand in the proper area. For my part I feel that expenditure on our younger citizens pays by far the greatest dividend, and expenditure on the young must, naturally, be aimed at improving education. I know this is a field which is not within the federal sphere. But we are witnessing increasing examples of education being interfered with as a result of the mobility of our population. As they travel from one province to another families must adapt themselves to changes in educational programs. Families of members of parliament are among those who encounter this difficulty. All of us run up against this vast problem of different standards in education. I think if we devised some way of channelling the spiralling costs of education in proper perspective with other demands on public money, this would certainly serve us well in the apportioning of public expenditures, which we seem to have to do in every session.

A pension makes reference to the fact that there is an incentive to keep persons employed; that is, if you keep on working until you are 70 years of age, your pension benefits will be larger than if you choose to retire and take your pension at age 65. This is somewhat at variance with what automation does to the labour force, because surely all the indications are for earlier retirement and fewer opportunities for employment for the older individual. This is just one area of contradiction that I point out. I do not think this is necessarily a fault of the plan, but this will be one of the things we will have to fit into the scheme as automation takes its unending course, which course we cannot alter.

The fact that the lowest income group, those persons not earning $600 per year, is not covered may be an area of concern. I have no suggestion to offer as to how these people can be included; but we ask ourselves, is it fair to eliminate a group here, even if they wish to participate in benefiting from this plan? Perhaps it will still be possible to do this when we are considering the bill at the clause by clause stage; but it seems there will be a significant number of individuals who will not be able to become part of this scheme, even if they elect to do so.

There will be one very obvious defect which other hon. members have already pointed out. That is the fact that those persons who are at the present time 70 years of age will of course not be helped at all, and those persons of 55 years of age and over will not be able to benefit to the maximum degree from the scheme because of the diminishing returns if they have not worked the full ten years. On the other hand there will be windfalls to those persons who began contributing exactly or approximately ten years before their retirement. This windfall will be in the nature of receiving benefits far in excess of the amounts they have contributed. For example, very roughly I suppose a person who retires ten years from the date the plan comes into effect will have contributed an average of perhaps $900 toward the plan, but he will benefit to the extent of $1,250 for every year he lives. So this is an obvious windfall to those persons who are in the fortunate age group of about 50 or 55 at the time this plan comes into effect.

It has already been pointed out that younger persons will have contributed for as long as 52 years and will still only receive the same benefits. These are difficulties which perhaps cannot be solved in the plan, so there will be greater equity; but none the less, rather than saying we must have something that will fit everyone, it just will not be possible to develop a general scheme to fit everyone, and perhaps we will have to accept the plan with these difficulties. I believe another area of greater concern will be the problem of integrating private plans. I am sure that many, many workers are worried about how this plan will affect their present superannuation plans or schemes. I can see no way in which iron-clad rules can be developed to fit the integration of the private plan in the Canada pension plan, and it seems to me to become a large problem of examining and adapting each private scheme to the Canada pension plan. This in itself will prove an added difficulty.

Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make a brief reference to a comment the Porter royal commission on banking has made about the plan. Certainly this is a thoughtful study to which I am making reference. They make the comparison of the Canada pension plan, attempting to provide benefits far greater than the American social security measures even though our national per capita income is something like 30 per cent below the American per capita income. Mention is made of the fact that the average contribution will be something like 3 per cent, perhaps 3.6 per cent for those in the higher income groups and the self-employed. But we must not forget the fact that we are already paying 4 per cent on our old age security tax; so actually when we speak of drawing a pension of $179, it will be paid for by having levied on us a tax of not 3.6 per cent but generally 3 per cent, for a total tax of 7 per cent. This comes quite close to the current cost of the American plan, and it is threatening to go higher. I am just wondering, in view of the fact that we are hoping to benefit more than the American social security measure with paying 7 per cent, whether we will not also be faced with an increasing levy on this 3 per cent plus 4 per cent. These are just some of the reservations that come to mind about this scheme. Generally I must endorse it and say that it is a very welcome measure. I am, with other members, looking forward to seeing the details of the bill and to this end hope that before long it will be referred to the joint committee to which the minister has already made reference.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that a very great deal has been made of the fact that we are now entering into the No. 3 version of the Canada pension plan. The hon. member for Perth made reference to some previous, ill-fated efforts, it seemed to me in an attempt to show that this government had no clear idea what we were trying to achieve. Therefore I would like to review some of the events that led up to introduction of the present plan. The hon. member for Perth also mentioned action taken by the previous administration. I noticed he was very brief in his references to that previous action; as a matter of fact, he seemed to skip over it very hurriedly, and I can certainly understand that.

First, Mr. Chairman, while we realize this is a field of joint federal-provincial jurisdiction, no contributory, portable pension legislation had been proposed by any jurisdiction up to the general election of 1962 and 1963. While the Liberal party and the New Democratic party campaigned extensively on such a platform, no objections were heard at that time from any of the provincial governments. On July 18, 1963, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare outlined in this house what hon. members opposite like to refer to as the first version, we had had at that time the introduction of the Ontario pension plan, which in fact was a plan which regulated private plans in those companies that had 15 or more employees. No one has tried, seriously at least, to argue that the Ontario plan was a solution to the problem, and in fact I think one could say its objectives rather complement the objectives that the present Canada pension plan embodies.

What were the essential features of the July proposals of the minister? The plan was compulsory for employees. It was voluntary for the self-employed. It provided for portability of pensions anywhere in Canada—as universal a coverage as was administratively possible. It provided for a relatively short maturity period of ten years in an attempt to make some provision for the middle aged and older workers. It provided for a level of benefits varying from between 20 to 30 per cent of earnings, dependant on the retirement age. If we consider the average retirement age at 67½, the benefits proposed were 25 per cent. These rose to 30 per cent at age 70. The maximum pension at age 70 was to be $100 a month plus the $75 flat rate old age security.

The contributions were to be applied to the national average of earnings and were initially to be 1 per cent from the employee and 1 per cent from the employer. These contributions were also to be used to finance the $10 increase in the old age security program. They were also designed to make the plan essentially a pay as you go scheme. We had further protection against inflation by relating benefits to the average level of earnings at the time of retirement. We also had some provision for retirement at age 65 although at a reduced level of benefits. This applied both to the flat rate and to the contributory schemes.

There was also some provision made for survivor benefits after age 65, and the minister at that time offered full co-operation to the provinces—in fact, invited the co-operation of the provinces—in extending this to widows and orphans allowances, as well as disability benefits under the plan.

We all recall, Mr. Chairman, the initial storm that these proposals raised, mainly amongst individuals in the insurance industry. A number of arguments were made to the effect that the plan was too generous, that there would be an interference with the capital formation of our economy, and so on. In addition to this, last September the government of Quebec announced that they were going to set up their own plan and would not participate in the federal scheme. Premier Robarts of Ontario also indicated that he was not too satisfied with the plan, but it seemed to me that his objections took a somewhat different tone. It was my own impression that his objections sounded remarkably like those which emanated from the insurance industry. Other provinces also raised a number of questions, but it became apparent that, with Quebec out, Ontario was essential to the plan. These two provinces represented two thirds of the population in the country and their exclusion would mean violation of one of the fundamental principles of a contributory national portable plan.

Therefore, because of the provinces, and primarily because of Ontario, the pension plan was modified. In an attempt to meet the criticisms particularly of Ontario, the level of benefits was reduced to 20 per cent of earnings at age 70. This was to answer the charges of extravagance and to leave additional room for private plans. The second change was that although the contributions remained at 1 per cent plus 1 per cent, the income ceiling was raised to $4,500. This was frozen, however, for five years in an attempt to facilitate the integration of private plans. Because the $10 increase in old age security had been separated and was to be financed out of other revenues, partial funding was possible. An estimated $2.5 billion was anticipated in the initial ten year period, 50 per cent of which was to be invested in provincial securities. In spite of considerable pressure the maturity period was maintained at ten years, which was a very important feature of the plan.

This was the mark II version, if you will, which was introduced in March 1964, and which was to be the basis of discussion at the federal-provincial conference in April of this year. It was at that conference that the Quebec government revealed the outline of what became known as the Quebec plan. Hon. gentlemen opposite refer to somersaults and retreats. Certainly Premier Robarts of Ontario made in my opinion one of the most spectacular somersaults in recent times. After one look at the Quebec plan's benefits, and more particularly at the funding, he suddenly forgot his basic objection to our original plan and came out for a plan which was in many respects more generous than the original, that had a higher level of contributions and was therefore harder to integrate with existing schemes, and a plan which interfered far more with the flow of savings into private institutions, a fact which he had been very concerned about a few months previously.

I should like to quote from an article by Bruce Macdonald which appeared in the Globe and Mail of April 14 last concerning this change of attitude on the part of the Ontario government. He said:

> For many months, Premier Robarts pressed to have the Canada pension plan scaled down to a more modest program. Primarily as a result of his adamant stand, the federal government agreed earlier this year to trim the size of benefits and to modify the rate at which the scheme would go into effect.

Canada Pension Plan

Having put legislation before parliament providing for a more modest scheme than originally envisaged, Ottawa now finds the Ontario leader seriously suggesting the possibility that his government will follow Quebec's lead in establishing a provincial pension program that is larger in almost every way.

Then he goes on to quote from a statement by Premier Robarts, as follows:

"One of our main concerns throughout has been the impact of the Canada pension plan on existing private pension plans in this province and the adverse effect on the formation of investment capital upon which the growth of our economy so greatly depends", the premier declared—

"In view of the need for stimulating the growth of private investment capital in Canada, a careful assessment should be made to determine whether the Canada pension plan will swell or diminish the springs of investment capital which are essential for our development", he said.

These were some of the remarks which we were hearing from the government of Ontario up until the federal-provincial conference. I do not want to appear to be involving Premier Robarts on a change of principles. As a matter of fact I should like to commend him. I welcome the change and I think it was very commendable of him to admit error, perhaps, than to stick to a position for the sake of consistency. One essential that Premier Robarts did hold out for from the beginning was a national plan, and for that I think he has many marks due to him.

We had reached therefore in April a point where both Ontario and Quebec were going to set up their own pension schemes, and one of the fundamental requirements, that of portability, was virtually being abandoned as far as nation-wide portability was concerned. It was with these considerations, in mind that our Prime Minister took the initiative in reaching a compromise between our plan, that is the mark II, and the Quebec plan. It must be recalled that these were the only plans which had been produced. Therefore charges that more than one province must be consulted in these matters, such as we have heard recently, are not valid in my opinion.

The hon. member for Perth also referred to "wheeling and dealing" between the federal government and the government of Quebec. I should just like to point out that those were the two plans, or the outlines of the plans, which we had before us at that time, and certainly the negotiations to standardize these had to take place between those two governments. The result of these negotiations, it seemed to me, was a plan which was acceptable to the Ontario government as well as the other provincial governments, and this is the plan which the minister of health outlined today.

[Mr. Moreau.]

There are those who would argue that these negotiations should have been carried out before the introduction of any plan. I am convinced, Mr. Chairman, that such a process would have been a very lengthy one indeed, and I feel the course which was followed has produced quicker results and has revealed that this government was prepared to negotiate differences of opinions and to accept changes consistent with the principles originally laid out.

What were these principles which have consistently been adhered to? They are as follows:

1. Nation-wide portability and universal coverage as far as administratively practicable.

2. That the pensions apply up to an average level of earnings.

3. That they be in combination with the O.A.S. flat rates and provide modestly adequate pensions for those who cannot make other provision for their retirement.

4. That they leave scope for further provision for those who can and wish to make their own provision.

5. That they have a moderately short maturity period to include middle aged and older workers.

6. That they be available at age 65.

7. That they provide security in real terms by relating pensions to earnings levels at time of retirement. The minister has announced today that the principle will also be extended to the old age security added bonus.

8. That they provide safeguards so that the benefits cannot be expanded without proper regard to future costs.

In my opinion the present plan meets all of those requirements and indeed bears a striking similarity to the original plan. The level of benefits is back to 25 per cent of earnings and the maximum pension is $104 as against $100, mainly due to the change in the earnings levels to which we are going to apply contributions. The maturity period remains at ten years and the benefits are available at 65.

The essential difference is the initial level of contributions during the first ten years, which has been raised from 1 per cent plus 1 per cent to 1.8 per cent plus 1.8 per cent on earnings between $600 and $5,000. The rate of contributions on the entire income will average out to approximately 1½ per cent plus 1½ per cent. This change in the initial rate allows for a much greater degree of funding than in the original plan, and it also allows for the inclusion of widows and orphans allowances, survivor and disability benefits. These additions were aimed at in the original plan, but could not be included without provincial agreement and a constitutional amendment.

There are those who will criticize this plan as another give-away scheme, or as being too generous. I should like them to weigh the consequences of doing nothing in this pension field. Governments of Canada in recent years have been exposed to considerable pressure for continuing to increase old age security flat rate pensions. While I certainly endorse any increases that have been made, we must realize that retired couples living in some parts of Canada are not faced with the same living costs, particularly in respect of rents, as others living in some of our more urbanized centres. Therefore, it seems to me essential that we obtain a wage related plan as quickly as possible, so that pensions can be related to the average income of a region.

We now have a plan which I believe meets all our requirements and which will allow Canadians to look toward retirement with confidence and security. I hope that this parliament can overcome our past differences and difficulties and give this far reaching piece of legislation speedy passage and clear sailing through this house.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes left before the conclusion of this debate I should like to make one or two points. A great number of questions that have arisen in our minds have been covered by various hon. members of this committee during the past few hours, and I certainly do not intend to repeat them.

In this party we do feel that the Canada pension plan, and all the details of what is going to be the plan, to be presented to parliament after this resolution stage is passed, in many respects has moved a long way from the original intention; that of having what one may call a universal portable pension plan for Canadians. I note there is a lack of reference to the Canada pension plan as being a portable pension plan. About two years ago the great concern expressed in this house was in respect of pensions being portable, particularly as between industries. There seems now to be a completely new concept of what a Canada pension plan should be.

During those days there was great concern because of the movement of workers from one industry to another, and from one area to another, because of automation and other factors. We are now discussing a Canada pension plan which really has nothing to do with portability from one job to another, and from one area to another.

Mr. Chairman, that being the situation, there are many questions which have arisen in the minds of hon. members which have yet to be answered. In spite of the fact the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been asked on a number of occasions whether or not the province of Ontario has agreed to participate, we are still not aware of the situation. We know that there have been indications that provision will be made for any province to opt out and set up individual plans. On October 22 I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether or not all the provinces with the exception of Quebec had indicated either to her or to the government that they were prepared to participate. She did not give a straightforward answer. She said that all the provinces were represented at the last meeting at which this matter was discussed and that there was no indication from any province of non-participation. I reminded the minister that that was not the question I had asked, and that I had asked her if any province had indicated it was not willing to participate—other than the province of Quebec, which we know is not going to participate. Again she hedged by saying a number of things; she did not answer the question that was asked.

I think we have now reached a stage, by the introduction of this resolution preceding the bill, when we as members of this House of Commons have a right to a forthright answer as to whether or not the province of Ontario is going to participate in this plan. The reason I say that is that the province of Quebec is, not participating, and if the province of Ontario decides not to participate the plan cannot be considered as being national in scope.

By and large I am in favour of having laws passed by the federal government applicable to all Canadians in all parts of Canada. We realize of course that the amendments which were sought to the British North America Act, so that a pension plan could be brought in, require endorsation by all provinces. One of the conditions of agreeing to seek that kind of an amendment was that the provinces would have the right to opt out, if they so chose. It seems to me if we are going to have the two most populous provinces, Ontario and Quebec, representing something in the neighbourhood of 12 million of the 19 million people, not participating, this House of Commons is wasting its time in dealing with a so-called national pension plan. I say that because if that happens we will have approximately only one third of the population covered by the plan. Perhaps the federal government has been negotiating with the province of Ontario to find out what their position is going to be. Perhaps the federal government has been seeking an indication from them whether or not they are going to participate. In any event, now that we have reached the stage that the resolution has been introduced in this house I think we have a right to know.

There are a number of reasons why I say this. If the province of Ontario is not going to participate I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that there will be other provinces in addition to Ontario and Quebec which will have very serious reservations about being included in this plan, rather than setting up their own. There is more than one reason for that. One is that we will have lost the national coverage feature. A second is that no answers have been given to the provinces as to how the Canada pension plan is going to be reconciled, for example, with the public service pension plans that some of the provinces are now operating. If there is to be no clearcut reconciliation between these public service plans and the so-called Canada pension plan, then certainly some of these other provinces might just as well set up their own pension plans because they will be in the business of operating and administering a pension plan anyway.

The undesirable feature of belonging to the so-called Canada pension plan and having to operate these other pension plans is that the provinces would then be subjected to the responsibility of administering a plan with regard to which the legislation and the regulations would be under the control of another body than their own legislatures. So it becomes very obvious that, unless there is a clear statement very soon that, first of all, Ontario is going to participate and, second, that there is going to be a reconciliation with some of these other plans that provincial governments are obliged to administer now, many of the desirable features are lost and some of the inherent complexities are perhaps too great for the effort required.

I am going to conclude my remarks now with the hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will rise in her place in the next few minutes, take the members of the committee into her confidence and tell them whether or not the province of Ontario is going to participate, and also whether or not there is going to be a general plan with regulations attached to it so that it will be possible for these other public service pension plans to be reconciled with this plan, in order that the provinces will not be in the awkward position of having to operate their own pension plans and also having to do those things necessary to carry out a law enacted in another place.

[Mr. Olson.]

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Miss LaMarsh thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the said bill be read the second time? Next sitting of the house?

Mr. Knowles: Tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Next sitting of the house.

DISCHARGE OF BILL ON ORDER PAPER

On the order:

Second reading of Bill C-75, an act to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions in Canada payable to contributors and survivors—The Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, now the bill concerning the Canada pension plan has received first reading it will be seen that the existing order No. 13 on today's order paper, second reading of Bill No. C-75, an act to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and so on, is no longer of great interest to the house—

Mr. Monteith: That is the understatement of the year.

Mr. McIlraith: —and I would ask for unanimous consent for that order to be dropped.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is it agreed that order No. 13 be dropped?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged.

AMENDMENT OF MOTION TO APPOINT JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the new order in substitution for the order just dropped and referring to the bill which has now been given first reading will be on the order paper tomorrow. In item No. 17 on today's order paper, the resolution to set up a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider the bill, the reference is to the former bill which was introduced some time ago and has now been dropped. I would ask the permission of the house to make a change in the first paragraph of the item so that instead of "Bill C-75" it will now read:

—Bill C-136 to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

That is merely substituting the new number for the number of the earlier bill and substituting the exact terminology on the face of the new bill for the terminology that was on the face of the former bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Does the house agree that order No. 17 as it now appears on the order paper be changed to read: "That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to consider Bill C-136 to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors"?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader to tell us what we will be taking up tomorrow and, if possible, on Thursday and Friday?

Mr. Knowles: Did we pass that resolution?

Mr. McIlraith: Not the resolution to set up the committee. I have been asked not to bring it forward for passing tonight.

Mr. Knowles: Why not?

Mr. McIlraith: In any event there is plenty of time to have the committee set up by the time we get second reading.

Mr. Knowles: That is just what I am afraid of.

Mr. McIlraith: I do not think any such suggestion is in order. In any event, the business for tomorrow will be the redistribution bill. While it is true I indicated to the house leaders of the other parties that when that was finished tomorrow we would proceed with the hours of labour bill, in view of the expectation that the redistribution bill will take the greater part of the day I wonder whether we could not proceed with the C.N.R. financing bill, which is order No. 51 on today's order paper. Possibly if that is finished we could take order No. 32, the second reading of Bill No. S-10, to provide for the establishment of harbour commissions, and then order No. 68, second reading of Bill No. S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company. Those are three small bills and I think that arrangement would probably be more agreeable to the house.

Mr. Starr: Is the house leader in a position to give some indication what we may be doing on Thursday and Friday?

Mr. McIlraith: It is the present intention to proceed with estimates on Thursday and Friday. We would propose starting on Thursday with the estimates of those agencies for which the Secretary of State is answerable to the house, namely the C.B.C. and other agencies. I reserve the right to change the order of business on Thursday if there are any new developments tomorrow.

Mr. Grégoire: I wonder if the house leader could also indicate the results of the two by-elections held today?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

AGRICULTURE—REPORTED LOSSES ON CATTLE

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, today during the question period when I directed a question to the Minister of Agriculture asking him to inform the house of the reason why returns to feed lot farmers for feeder cattle have been lower this year than since 1962, he gave me as an answer the prices for choice dry feed cattle instead of for feeder lot cattle, which was incorrect and not based on my question at all.

I take as my authority the information contained in the magazine, Canadian Cattlemen in its November, 1964 issue. In it there is a table headed "Estimated Returns from Feeding" which gives the comparison prices for the years 1960-61, 1961-62, 1962-63 and 1963-64. From the last column in this table for the year 1963-64 it is seen that the return to the farmer, after all expenses counted, was a loss of $14.08 per head. This is based on a 700 pound feeder steer which the farmer buys in the fall and on a 1,000 pound steer which he markets in the winter or spring.

In 1960-61 his profit was $28.63 at a time when the cost of the feeder steer was $196 and when he could sell it for $225. In 1962-63 the farmer lost 0.24 cents but in the previous year, 1961-62, his profit was $23.84.

When the Minister of Agriculture contradicts these tables presented by the Canadian Cattlemen magazine he either does not want to admit that farmers during the last two years, since he became Minister of Agriculture, have sustained severe losses in the cattle market—and this applies also to chickens and turkeys—or he is not familiar with what is going on in these markets. Perhaps he figures that the farmers cannot calculate for themselves when they sustain losses or when they make profits. He should pay more attention to what is going on in these markets and should help bring about a situation in which the farmer can make some profit out of his farming enterprise.

That is all I have to say at the present time, but I am sure it will not be long before I have something else to discuss with the Minister of Agriculture.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I wonder sometimes where hon. members opposite get some of the information they try to peddle in here. The facts are available to anyone, even to members of the opposition who are really interested in facts and not partisan fancies.

Earlier today the hon. member claimed that feeder cattle have been selling for $14 per head lower than last year. I quoted him the actual market figures which showed that there was less than a cent a point difference between this year's prices and last year's prices. I do not want to suggest that everything is perfect in the beef business today: I would like the hon. member to show me any business anywhere, where everything is perfect.

I have a few facts which indicate beyond any argument that our beef business, like virtually every other business in Canada lately, is enjoying one of the best years in a long time, certainly better than any year between 1957 and 1963. In the first half of 1964 our gross national product was 8 per cent higher than in the first half of 1963. The index of industrial production for the first seven months was 9 per cent higher. All of this has contributed to a 13 per cent reduction in unemployment during the first nine months of this year. Agriculture and the beef business have enjoyed the benefits of this unprecedented prosperity along with other sections of our national economy. It now appears likely that Canadians will use over one and one quarter billion pounds of beef this year. This is about 9 per cent more than last year and 27 per cent more than during the six years from 1957 to 1962. We have achieved this in spite of obstacles which even the miracle men of the Diefenbaker administration would have had trouble overcoming.

This has been achieved despite the fact our cattle population was 4 per cent higher than in 1963; despite the fact our feeder cattle exports for the first nine months were only 20,000 head compared to 54,000 head during the same period in 1963, and despite the fact our imports of beef were almost double our exports. These are the facts, and I think it is dangerously close to being irresponsible to try to paint a picture of disaster for our beef producers when this is simply not the case. I can think of nothing that would bring trouble to our beef industry faster, in fact, than if our producers should take this kind of wild statement seriously. Fortunately they know better.

But I do not want to suggest that the government is not concerned about the beef industry today. We are well aware that because of the present large beef population in the United States our prices are once more being influenced by the price for Canadian beef on the American export market. Because of the health of our economy, for the first time in many years our beef prices earlier this year were higher than the American price. Our beef market has now returned more nearly to normal. Export prices once more are tending to determine the price on our domestic market.

I can assure hon. members that the government is very much aware of the situation and that it has every intention of taking steps to keep our beef industry in a healthy condition should the situation deteriorate. But a lot of loose talk is not going to help one bit.

Mr. Rapp: Tell that to the marines, not to members of parliament.

AGRICULTURE—STEPS TO IMPROVE POSITION OF EASTERN FARMERS

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): I was very interested in hearing the minister's prepared statement, particularly as he began by saying he wondered where we were getting "the sort of stuff we were peddling". I only have to remind him that a week ago or a little longer—as a matter of fact it was on October 27—I put on record a letter from a beef producer in my constituency. This letter I think supports in no uncertain terms the point of view put forward by my hon. friend.

The minister made a very definite statement out west about what he intended to do about this. He said a lot about the new agriculture policy he intended to bring in. But today, in the question period, the only people he mentioned were the milk producers. Well, we know they are doing all right. But how many farmers can get milk contracts? Very few.

The minister says things are much better now than they were between 1957 and 1962. That seems strange. This is in the Toronto Star of October 30, 1964. The minister said:

I think the last Liberal government had forgotten the farmers during its declining years—

Then he said:

I'll even go further—I think that on the basis of its record with our farmers—

If I may paraphrase it, Mr. Speaker, he thought our policy was a very good policy. Those are the minister's own words. But that is not why I rose this evening. The minister referred to my hon. friend's statement as being vile; he used that very word. Let me quote from the d.b.s. figures published by its agricultural division, where it is stated that six out of nine provinces—and mostly eastern, of course—were all lower in income at the end of 1963; and I understand the situation has deteriorated this year. If that is an improvement, he is going to have to show me where the improvement is—and if I am peddling trash he had better get in touch with d.b.s. and make that statement to them.

I have been responsible for raising the question of turkeys in this house on many occasions. I had the turkey producers at my home this past week end, and they told me that if the minister and the government do not take some action by the middle of November, their market to make anything whatsoever this year is lost—that is in connection with the importation of turkeys from the United States—because, as the minister will know better than I, around the middle of this month the freezer stocks are put on the market for the year-end business that is apt to accrue to these turkey producers. I will read their statement into the record. The minister has these publications; there is no question about that. In their summing up the Canadian turkey federation had this to say to the minister:

Due to the hardship being experienced right now by many of our growers due to the unprofitable market, we strongly urge the implementation of some measure—

Anything; they will grasp at any straw:

—as above or within the scope of the government, to bring immediate market improvement during the balance of the fast approaching main marketing season of 1964.

Then the last sentence reads:

Otherwise, later help developed from the foregoing recommendations may be too late to save many of our growers.

They said the same thing in a previous petition to the government. Surely the minister is well aware of what the situation is, and we are not exaggerating it; we only want to bring to his attention that it is deteriorating and the income of the eastern farmers is declining. I went on to say in a previous statement—I do not know whether the minister was here—that ever since his party has been in office the income of the eastern producers has been going down, down, down. I said it at that time and I meant it. I have this letter here. I do not want to read it again, but there is no question about the situation; the income of this farmer is down in every phase of his operation. The figures are here and the minister can read them if he wants to do so. This is caused by the increase in price of the things the man has to buy, compared with the profit he makes, which is diminishing. He concludes by saying:

With prices like this and the high cost of labour, machinery, taxes (etc.), which you know as much about as I do, how in the world is the farmer going to exist?

This man is a very good, knowledgeable farmer; he belongs to all the organizations that can assist him—and he is complaining bitterly about the lack of government action to support the eastern producers. If the minister is not convinced he should go directly into the rural areas of eastern Canada and western Ontario, where my constituency in fact is, and they will tell him. If he does not know this, there is no sense talking to him any longer.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to start with I am a little tired of all the doom crying we keep hearing from the opposition about the plight of the eastern farmer. If the Tories are really as seriously concerned as they try to make out, why did they not do something for eastern farmers? After all, they had six years and the biggest majority in history. We have only had about 18 months to work on these problems, but in going through the record I find it would be impossible to do justice to what has already been achieved by the present government, in the limited time at my disposal.

In the dairy industry, for example, our policies have reduced the exorbitantly expensive surplus of butter to normal supply levels. The skim milk market has been stabilized and producers prices have been pushed to near record levels. We are having the highest production of cheese in eastern Canada that there has been in 15 years and more of this than ever before is quality cheese. We managed to get a 20 per cent increase in the American quota on Canadian cheese exports. As the president of the national dairy council, Mr. J. M. Hartwick, said recently, "The dairy industry is enjoying the strongest sales position in many years."

Yet while our dairy farmers' incomes have increased we have reduced the cost of the dairy stabilization program. For the first six months of this year returns to eastern farmers from dairy products were $10 million higher than for the first six months of last year. Here are the figures for the dairy products for the first six months in 1963 and in 1964:

	1963 $ Million	1964 $ Million
Prince Edward Island	1.6	2.2
Nova Scotia	5.7	5.8
New Brunswick	5.1	5.4
Quebec	72.6	74.6
Ontario	93.4	100.4

It is widely recognized that one of the big problems in eastern agriculture arises from the fact that many of our farms are too small to be economic. The government has recognized this pressing need for our eastern farmers to expand their operations by greatly increasing the credit facilities our farmers need for this expansion. We have doubled the amount available from the Farm Credit Corporation. We have doubled the amount available under the Farm Improvement Loans Act. And we have introduced a totally new form of farm credit under the Farm Machinery Syndicates Act, an unsubsidized program that makes it possible for farmers in every part of Canada to reduce their machinery costs by two thirds or more. It is the direct responsibility of provincial governments to provide farmers with crop insurance. But we have done everything we could by providing crop reinsurance, or disaster protection, for the provinces, to encourage provincial governments to provide this important income stabilizer for farmers in all parts of the country.

We have heard a lot from opposition benches about the need to do something about eastern feed grain. The previous government had six years and did nothing. But within three months of taking office the present government introduced a policy of supporting winter storage costs which has stabilized both the supply and the price of western feed grain used by eastern producers. I could go on but my time is running out.

What disturbs me most about the distortion and misrepresentation which we hear so often about our eastern agricultural problems is that this sort of approach can only make the problems of eastern farmers worse. This can only confuse eastern farmers and mislead them into thinking their problems are one thing when they are really something else. This may very well make the problems worse than they are by convincing the farmers that they are worse off than they are. Any suggestion that eastern farmers are at a disadvantage as compared to western farmers just does not hold water when you look at the facts. Farmers in Ontario and Quebec are from 1,500 to 2,500 miles closer to the main markets of Toronto and Montreal, which gives the eastern farmer a natural advantage. Farm machinery prices are lower in the east than the west. For example the freight rate on a ten-foot heavy duty cultivator from Brantford is something like $50 to Regina, $55 to Swift Current but only $18 to Montreal. I think discussion and criticism of government policies in this house can be very helpful in letting the people know what is going on. But it should be informed and factual discussion, not misleading partisan wrangling which can only confuse the people.

Mr. Winkler: Now tell us about the turkeys.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.21 p.m.

APPENDIX

COMMUNIQUÉ FOLLOWING OTTAWA MEETING ON PEACE KEEPING OPERATIONS

A meeting of military experts to consider the technical aspects of United Nations peace keeping operations took place in Ottawa from November 2-6 inclusive at the invitation of the government of Canada. Commodore R. W. Murdoch of Canada acted as chairman. Representatives from the following countries attended: Brazil, Colombia, Denmark, Finland, Ghana, India, Iran, Ireland, Italy, Liberia, Malaysia, Morocco, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Sweden, Tunisia, United Arab Republic. Major-General Indar Rikhye, military adviser to the secretary general of the United Nations, attended the meeting as an observer.

Three working groups were established. Group 1, under the chairmanship of General Kittani, Morocco, (vice chairman Major General Kaldager, Norway) studied the questions of composition, command, control and liaison, training and operational problems. Group 2, under the chairmanship of Major General Ankrah, Ghana, (vice chairman Colonel Amati, Italy) studied questions relating to environmental operating information and logistic support. Group 3, under the chairmanship of Mr. B. C. Mishra, India, (vice chairman Mr. O. Bierring, Denmark), studied personnel administration, public relations, accounting procedures, and legal problems.

The chairmen of the working groups reported to the delegates on the work of their groups at the final plenary session, following which there was discussion of some of the points made in the reports.

The meeting did not attempt to reach formal conclusions on the items discussed. However, delegates hoped that the exchange of views, both written and oral, would contribute to the effectiveness of such national forces as might be made available to the United Nations in the future and had therefore served the general purpose of strengthening the capacity of participating nations to support the United Nations to engage in peace keeping operations.

The meeting expressed its gratitude to the government of Canada for its invaluable assistance in the operation of the meeting.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 10, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—PEGGING OF OLD AGE SECURITY PENSIONS TO COST OF LIVING INDEX

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting not only all the members of this house but more than a million Canadians. It may be that my point of privilege is due to a misprint in a document which I have in my hand. If so that can be corrected without delay. On the other hand, if what I have in my hand is correct I think other steps should be taken. Yesterday in the course of her remarks to this house the Minister of National Health and Welfare used these words:

> —all future old age security pensions will be pegged to the cost of living index and will increase automatically if living costs increase.

Later she said:

> —this will provide not only a greater measure of security but will also protect the real value of the pension dollar for Canada's million-odd pensioners.

We were given no details, but what the minister said was spoken in the present tense. When we got the bill last night after the debate was over we learned that the possible increase due to this adjustment cannot be received by any person drawing old age security until 1968, and that the possible amount of increase in 1968 is 75 cents.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Knowles: It might be $1.50; it might be nothing; probably it will be 75 cents. I submit, from looking at the bill, that this could well be a misprint. If so I trust it will be corrected. If not I trust that the Liberal party, which found out that six bucks was not good enough in 1957, will not try six bits in 1968.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on the particular point I should hasten to say to the chamber that this is not a misprint; that the address I made yesterday was on the resolution preceding Bill No. C-136, and this was known by all hon. members to be the case. All the remarks I made at that time have reference to that particular bill. Since last August it has been known by the members of this chamber and members of the public that the initial coming into effect of the bill was not anticipated to be until January 1, 1966. Within the bill there is provision for commencement, on a number of dates subsequent to that date, of benefits which will accrue to contributors and survivors; that also in the bill is indicated the initial tying to an index figure, something to take into account the increases, if any, which take place over a certain period of time which are then calculated for a two year period. There was no attempt to mislead the chamber or the public at large; that the amendments to the old age security act which are incorporated as part of Bill C-136 would come into effect at any point of time earlier than the main provisions of the Canada pension plan.

In so far as my hon. friend's suggestion that the original increase would be 75 cents or $1.50, it should be noted that use of an index is a departure, and it is the first time an index has been used for any payment in this country. My hon. friend and his party, as well as other hon. members opposite, enthusiastically accepted this last night, and indeed have heretofore urged such an inclusion in government legislation. My hon. friend now sounds as if he is unhappy that one of the matters which he himself has urged has been adopted by the government.

It should not be forgotten that the index which is to be attached to the old age security payments is to bring them into line with the index which is attached to pension payments under the Canada pension plan proper. Nothing in the proposed old age security amendments deals with the base rate of $75 a month which this government introduced a year ago and which was unanimously approved by the house. Nor is anything in this bill intended to exclude any future action by any parliament with respect to that base.

This is a very major, very far reaching and sweeping change in social legislation in this country, Mr. Speaker, and indeed commences in a responsible way by tying the plan to the index at the time at which it comes into operation. I suppose my hon. friend in the flush of yesterday's by-election victory, which he should regard really as a victory against the Conservative party and not otherwise, now seeks to make political capital out of something which he has generously, and I think sincerely, long since accepted as a really major step forward. I would ask my hon. friend and all hon. members of the house to bear in mind that in the usual spirit of Canadian fiscal responsibility we are beginning this experiment in a relatively modest manner.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, for obvious reasons I will not attempt to debate this matter at this point.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles: But, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the Minister of National Health and Welfare made one statement concerning me which is not correct. I have not been an advocate of pegging the old age pension to the cost of living index. I have been an advocate of raising the absolute amount.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre apparently had a copy of the bill to which we gave first reading last night, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if she will undertake to make sure that the other members of the house are supplied with copies before the day is out?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I had about 100 copies here last night, and I assume those have gone somewhere. I believed each member would have received one this morning, but some members tell me they did not get them. I have just checked and I am told it was not possible to print more than the original 100 until a number was given to the bill, and by virtue of its length it is not likely members will have copies before Thursday.

There are 100-odd copies in existence, but I apologize to the house because the rest will not be available before Thursday morning in either language.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question, would the minister give consideration to having this cost of living bonus for old age security pensioners brought in by amendments to the old age security legislation so it could become effective immediately and could be based on the cost of living as of October, 1963, when the last increase was granted? It seems to me this would be a much more rational approach to the whole problem rather than having to wait until the Canada pension plan becomes effective.

Miss LaMarsh: Well, Mr. Speaker, the last 20-odd clauses of the Canada pension plan bill are an amendment to the Old Age Security Act, and as this bill has received first reading it is further advanced than any other legislation which could possibly be introduced.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Veterans Affairs was able, after consultation, to amend his announcement, would the minister have similar consultation to see if she cannot get this bonus amended and back dated?

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, my colleague did not amend his announcement. He simply did not disclose in the first part the effective date, but he did so subsequently in response to a question.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INCREASES IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on October 30 I informed the house that there would be an announcement of government proposals to increase pensions and war veterans allowances. In conformity with that statement I am now able to make the following announcement.

There will be brought before the house at the earliest opportunity a supplementary estimate that will enable an across the board increase in disability pensions payable under the Pension Act of approximately 10 per cent, and a similar increase to pensions awarded to widows and dependent children. I am sure the house will agree that this increase in pension rates is warranted.

I am pleased to announce that the supplementary estimates will include an amount which will permit an increase in the attendance allowance from the present maximum of $1,800 a year to a maximum $3,000 a year. There will also be increases in the allowances such as for wear and tear of clothing, which are also authorized by the Pension Act under certain circumstances. It is estimated that the additional annual cost of these pension increases, based on the present number of pensioners, will be about $17 million, and the annual cost of increasing the attendance allowance will be some $500,000.

The other important matter to which I wish to refer is the proposal of the government to increase war veterans allowances. In reaching a decision on the appropriate amount of these increases we have taken into consideration the recommendations that have been made by veterans organizations. It is proposed to increase the maximum monthly rate of war veterans allowances for a single person to $94 and for a person paid at the married rate to $161 a month, with corresponding adjustments in the rates paid to orphans.

In considering appropriate adjustments in the maximum income ceilings under the War Veterans Allowance Act we have also considered the recommendations received from organized veterans. We have decided that any adjustments in the ceilings should remove the anomaly that at present exists with respect to the ceiling applicable to veterans and widows below age 70 and the ceiling above age 70, where the recipient is in receipt of an old age security pension. At present a recipient over that age is in effect allowed a ceiling, if payment is at the single rate, of $240 a year higher than if he or she were under age 70 and, if payment is at the married rate and the husband and wife are both over age 70, the difference is $480 a year.

In order to provide a ceiling in accordance with the recommendations we have received, and to remove this anomaly, but nevertheless ensure that every recipient will enjoy some increase, including the proposed disability pension increase, we are proposing that the annual income ceilings be raised to $1,596 for a single recipient and to $2,664 where the recipient is paid at the married rate.

I should also mention that corresponding increases in rates and changes in income ceilings will apply as well to those who are in receipt of allowances under the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. These increases and changes under both acts will also be accomplished by means of a supplementary estimate. It is estimated that these proposed increases in rates and the ceiling adjustments under the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act will result in an additional expenditure of about $16,250,000 a year.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, this statement will be welcomed by members of the house as an indication of the recognition that the welfare of Canada's veterans is of responsible concern to all of us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a much delayed announcement on the part of the minister with regard to a proposed increase in disability pensions and war veterans allowances.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: It has taken the minister and the government a year and a half to come to this decision, although representations were made to them frequently over the period to get busy and do something for the veterans.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do something?

Mr. Churchill: Somebody says why didn't we do it. We gave two increases with regard to pensions and war veterans allowances, each to the extent of 20 per cent, making a total 40 per cent increase in these pensions and allowances. This is only a 10 per cent increase. What puzzles me is why the minister did not have this ready when the standing committee on veterans affairs was examining the estimates of his department. Why did he not have this ready when his estimates were before the house a few days ago? We were put off and delayed, but now his statement reads that a supplementary estimate will be brought before the house at the earliest opportunity.

What is the earliest opportunity? It is right now. Why does the minister not say when this will be brought forward? Does this mean next January or February, or now in the month of November? This is what should have been said in his statement, not this ambiguous phrase "at the earliest opportunity."

On many occasions we have indicated our interest in such an increase for war veterans, and we are certainly glad that the government has finally moved in this direction. However, I am sorry it has taken it so long simply to make this announcement without setting an actual date when the increase will come into effect. If the supplementary estimate is brought before us this week we will pass it this week and thus let the veterans have their cheques before Christmas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Veterans Pensions Increase

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying, "Once bitten, twice shy". Therefore I am not going to hasten to welcome the government's announcement until we know when the government proposes to implement it. Are these increases going to be effective on January 1 or December 1? When will they be effective?

The minister says he is going to bring in a supplementary estimate to cover the increases. So far as this party is concerned, if the minister will bring in that estimate we will undertake to see it is passed, so far as we are able, the same day it is introduced. There ought to be some date mentioned in this statement. There is no reason why the increases should not be payable at the end of November, but this announcement without any supplementary estimates accompanying it leads us to suspect that there may be further delaying tactics. Therefore we would like a great deal more information.

If I could have the minister's attention I would like to ask him when this additional payment in both veterans pensions and allowances will become effective, and when does he intend to bring down the supplementary estimate? If we had that information the house would be more satisfied, and certainly the veterans and the widows who will benefit from this increase would also be more satisfied.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this party may I say we welcome the announcement that there is to be some upward revision in war veterans allowances and disability pensions, but we are concerned about the fact that the effective date was omitted from the statement the minister has just made.

Without going into a lot of detail on whether or not this is a satisfactory increase I simply say we welcome the fact that there is to be one and that it has been announced at this time, despite the fact that the minister has been promising it for something like 18 months. Again may I say we would be very interested in knowing what will be the anticipated effective date.

Mr. Teillet: If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I can indicate to the house the date of the introduction of the supplementary estimate, but I can assure the house that the recommendation in it will be to make these rates effective as of September 1, 1964.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Churchill.]

Mr. Peters: That is a pretty sloppy announcement, if you are just making it now.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I preferred waiting for the answer of the Minister of Veterans Affairs before making remarks on this question, on behalf of our group, after the objections which were raised by the spokesmen of certain opposition parties.

We were happy to hear the minister state that this increase would be retroactive to September 1, 1964.

Under the circumstances, we must congratulate the government for announcing increases in favour of veterans. However, I wish to add that the veterans must really benefit from those increases. At the present time many veterans are applying for pensions. They are examined by Department of Veterans Affairs' physicians or in hospitals maintained by the department, they are granted a very low rate of invalidity, and thus, despite the increases they will receive, their pensions will still remain very low.

On the other hand, if veterans are examined in other hospitals than those maintained by the department, by physicians holding the same qualifications as those of the department, then their rate of invalidity is higher than the one which was determined by the Department of Veterans Affairs' physicians or hospitals.

In fact, a physician who is a member of the War Veterans Allowance Board told me that the laboratory material used in the Chicoutimi hospital was not sufficiently modern, while we know very well that the Chicoutimi hospital is one of the most modern in Canada.

I would like to point out to the minister and his officials, and more particularly to those who determine the rate of invalidity of veterans, that it is not sufficient to allow increases to veterans, but that one must also be fair toward them.

They must accept the advice and recommendations of Canadian hospitals and doctors, so that the veterans may get decent and honourable pensions. They should at least be permitted to benefit from the increases announced today, and no attempt should be made to reduce the amount they are receiving by reducing the percentage of disability, as it is regularly done at the present time.

[Text]

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and arises out of the statement he made today regarding amendments to veterans legislation. Will the minister consider assisting that forgotten and neglected section of our society, the needy widows of deceased veterans who were drawing pensions and were classified as less than 50 per cent disabled? These widows receive nothing from the government, and are destitute.

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I advise my hon. friend that there are a number of further amendments in process of preparation, amendments which will require the introduction of bills, and we decided to go ahead with the increases announced today rather than wait for these others which will be introduced in due course in the normal way. The reason for proceeding in this fashion is to make the new rates quickly effective.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the minister, he has not given an answer to my question. May I have this debated at ten o'clock this evening?

LABOUR RELATIONS

RELATIONSHIP OF S.I.U. TO LIBERAL PARTY —MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at what I consider to be the invitation of the Prime Minister yesterday with respect to making a motion to adjourn the house under standing order 26, I do so now in the light of the evident failure of the government to take the responsibility that is properly theirs by placing before the house the whole of the affairs surrounding the activities of the trustees of the maritime union; surrounding the circumstances of the departure from Canada of Mr. Banks and the failure of the government law agencies of Canada to locate him; the circumstances surrounding allegations made in national press articles which implicate Liberal members of parliament and the Liberal government as a whole, implications which if they are well founded may well cause the seats that those members are holding to be occupied improperly. I believe, under the provisions of the Canada Elections Act, that if offences have been committed of the nature implied in these articles, then the seats of these members today are void.

The tentacles of Mr. Banks and the S.I.U. seem to be involving ever more Liberal members of parliament. The most recent one, and the case which I think underlines the need for an urgent and immediate study of this problem by the government, is that of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) who was implicated by name and by riding in a news broadcast this morning. Since lunch time that hon. member has given an interview to Vancouver radio station CKNW and admitted that he had in fact received help from the S.I.U. This was following a story yesterday by CKNW reporter Ed Murphy. He is the first Liberal member who has had the courage to come forward and admit his complicity. This in itself emphasizes the need for a detailed and immediate investigation into such situations.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams)—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grafftey: Why the nervous laughter?

Mr. Nielsen: Members opposite are obviously taking this matter very lightly. They are trying to cover up their sins. But I wonder who they expected to second the motion?

An hon. Member: Nobody.

Mr. Nielsen: I ask leave, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River to move the adjournment of this house in accordance with standing order 26 in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, namely:

That it is imperative in the public interest and in the interest of the maintenance of law and order in Canada to proceed forthwith into a full inquiry of the influence exercised by Hal Banks and/or the seafarers international union over the Liberal government and into the activities of the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions particularly in the light of recent statements in the press that

1. "Certain people in the government made a deal with Hal Banks to get him out of Canada". (Toronto Star, October 2, 1964)

2. The questionable allowance by former minister of citizenship and immigration, Hon. Walter Harris of an appeal by Hal Banks against a deportation order made June 30, 1964. (Toronto Star, October 2, 1964).

3. The payment of moneys by Hal Banks and/or the seafarers international union to Liberal candidates and/or Liberal members of this house and the acceptance of such moneys by Liberal candidates who subsequently sat or are sitting as Liberal members of this house. (Toronto Star, November 6, 1964).

And in the light of the continued obvious reluctance and refusal of the government to allow these and all matters affecting the relationship of the government with Hal Banks and the seafarers international union to be exposed to the scrutiny and judgment of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Woolliams: May I, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pearson: Are you going to permit intervention in this discussion by the hon. member before you take cognizance of this motion, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Under the new rules of the house as given to me it is my duty to ask for comments from a few members who may wish to speak to this motion, as to whether the house should be adjourned under standing order 26. After I have had the advantage of listening to a few arguments both for and against, it will be my duty to reach a decision.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The hon. member who moved this motion was permitted to go into great detail as to the substance of his alleged charges. I can understand the hon. member raising the question of the S.I.U. today because today, of all days, for them it is any port in a storm.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What about the union candidate?

Mr. Pearson: Of course the motion has no urgency attached to it, and it is doubtful whether it has any importance. But if hon. gentlemen opposite wish to take it seriously and have a discussion and really go into this matter, I suggest we call motion No. 82 at once and pass it without debate. Then we shall have the opportunity to call the trustees as witnesses before the committee and the whole question can be gone into. This would be the best test of the good faith of members opposite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I think the only problem the Chair might have concerns the question of urgency; and "urgency" means urgency of debate. It is a question whether we should postpone the usual business of the house and discuss something urgent or not.

I have heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs, when he used to sit on this side of the house, quote Beauchesne on occasions such as this. It might be refreshing to quote from one of the English authorities. I have here Erskine May's treatise on the law, privileges, proceedings and usage of parliament. The following appears on page 300 in reference to standing order 9 of the British house, which is the same as our standing order 26:

> Under special restrictions laid down in standing order No. 9, a motion for the adjournment of the house may be moved by a private member "for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance". The rule is designed to give the discussion of some recently occurring matter of emergency precedence over the program of business arranged for the sitting.

Why is there urgency of debate in connection with this matter? The last time such a motion was moved—today, of course, we have new facts and it is a brand new motion—the Secretary of State for External Affairs was acting prime minister and he promised us that the estimates of the Department of Justice would be brought in on the following Thursday. I am not being critical of the hon. gentleman personally, but they came in on Wednesday after a long question period, with the result that we were denied the privilege of discussing this topic adequately. This was the reason you gave in the course of your judgment setting the motion aside; that we would have the estimates before us on Thursday. Instead we got them on another day, on Wednesday. We have called upon the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and others in the government asking that the trustees for the S.I.U. be brought before a committee, but we were never given a real answer in this regard.

This is a further reason why there is urgency attached to debate. I say to the Minister of Justice there is a definite erosion of the rule of law. There is a breakdown of the whole moral fibre of the government as far as this matter is concerned, and on this ground I say there is urgency, that there is an emergency, and that this question should be discussed. I think it is more important than the question of redistribution, more important than the flag; because if the rule of law is eroded the fundamental principle of democracy is eroded.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give this motion very careful consideration and to rule in the affirmative.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Before I comment on the question of urgency, let me say this. I assume the Prime Minister has made a serious offer with regard to motion No. 82. I believe, by virtue of his position as leader of the government, he has the opportunity to have this motion moved if the house gives unanimous consent. We are certainly prepared to give that consent.

There is a qualification which I would make. I took it from the Prime Minister's statement that he thought this whole matter of political contributions could be aired in this committee. I suggest the terms of reference would not allow this to be done, nor would it seem to me a very fruitful field for a parliamentary committee to get into.

As to the question of urgency of debate as it relates to the contributions to Liberal candidates which have recently been revealed, we feel in our party that this is a problem for the government and a problem for parliament. In so far as the facts are concerned, I would say that almost everyone in our group has been aware of this information for some months, and it hardly seems to us that there is the kind of urgency that our friends on the right are putting forward.

We would like to suggest, therefore, that there is not urgency of debate in regard to this matter; although having said that, we feel there is still a problem—and, we think, a moral problem—for all of us in politics in the revelations with regard to these contributions.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house and for your consideration before making a decision is whether there is urgency of debate respecting the matters that have been raised in the motion moved by the hon. member for Yukon. It seems to me it would be a very useful exercise for a committee of this House of Commons to consider the whole matter of the disclosure of election campaign funds, and I would certainly support that kind of exercise undertaken by a committee of the house. Whether we should single out alleged wrongdoing or misfeasance by accepting this motion, and leave all the other matters out, is another question.

I think, too, we will have to take into consideration that there has already been at least one, and I think more than one, day of debate in this house on the estimates of the Department of Justice, when all the matters that are now included in the motion before the house could have been debated. Whether this matter had been drawn to the attention of the mover and seconder of the motion at that time, I am not sure; but I do believe that all these alleged acts about which hon. members now seem to think there is urgency of debate were in fact known prior to those days when there was debate in this house on those estimates. Therefore in so far as urgency of debate on this particular day is concerned, I really do not accept that as a valid argument. We know, for example, that citation 100 of Beauchesne, paragraph 2, says:

> The "definite matter of urgent public importance", for the discussion of which the adjournment of the house may be moved under standing order 26, must be so pressing that public interest will suffer if it is not given immediate attention.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if that argument is valid today certainly it must also have been valid on those days when the estimates of the Department of Justice were called; and I do not believe that the allegations now made in the motion were aired at that time. I would like to say, in addition, that in so far as this party is concerned, we would like to take into consideration the suggestion of the Prime Minister in asking for unanimous consent to debate item No. 82 on the order paper, when all these matters could be raised. As far as we are concerned we do not see that there is urgency of debate on this particular day with regard to the allegations made.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, as far as the adjournment of our business is concerned, the subject of this motion should be important and urgent.

Is the subject important? It certainly is. However, not to the extent of foregoing a whole day's discussion of other bills in order to deal with it. The importance of the debate should be related to the general source of the money made available to the old political parties rather than to the amounts allotted to individual contenders for parliament.

To my mind, it is more important to investigate the source of election funds, not only with regard to the Liberal, but also to the Conservative party, because we might discover some interesting facts on that side too. It might be in order also to find out where the New Democratic party gets its funds because it is said that the labour unions support that party financially and the members of those labour unions might be surprised to find out that they can afford to give large amounts to the Canadian socialists.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, our election funds come from the hat passed at election rallies.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Grégoire: Now, Mr. Speaker, is such a debate urgent? In my opinion, a debate becomes urgent when those who want to discuss a matter have all the facts. Well, we do not have the facts, all we have is a statement to the effect that some hon. members allegedly received $6,000 from a labour union and that other labour unions allegedly gave other amounts to other people. But we still do not know the names, nor do we know the facts. This is why I believe the Prime Minister's suggestion to refer this matter to the committee on industrial relations, under order No. 82, would be a generally acceptable solution.

However, I believe there is an even better solution. Yesterday, in reply to a question put by the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister stated that Wednesday, that is tomorrow, we would have the opportunity of discussing a motion for the production of papers; but since the house will not sit tomorrow, and thus debate on the production of these documents will be delayed for eight days, would the Prime Minister be willing to request unanimous consent of the house to vote immediately and without debate on the production of these documents? The members would then have all the documents before them immediately, which would facilitate matters.

Since members of the house are involved, a third method would be to refer everything to the privileges and elections committee, inasmuch as they are being charged with having accepted $1,000 from the S.I.U., and it is because of this electoral contribution that they are now trying to protect Hal Banks. Therefore, the third solution, which would be preferable to a debate on a matter of urgent public importance, would be to refer the matter to the committee on privileges and elections.

Those are three methods which would be preferable to the motion of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I feel that it is now the duty of the Prime Minister to take the initiative and decide which one of these three solutions should apply to the problem facing us at the present time.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to decide whether the motion as presented by the hon. member for Yukon under standing order 26 should be accepted. It is alleged that there is urgency in this matter. It seems to me that mention in the newspapers during the last few days, weeks or even months does not make a matter that much more urgent. It is not made more urgent just because it is mentioned in the newspapers. I do not see that there is that urgency which demands that the business of the house be set aside and this matter be debated at this time. My opinion is confirmed even more if one takes into account item No. 82 on the order paper at the present time, which in any event should certainly provide an occasion for airing this matter if that is the intention.

It seems to me this matter is more in the nature of a question of privilege, but under standing order 26(6) (e) the motion must not raise a question of privilege. Therefore in my opinion it is faulty on that ground. I must come to the conclusion that there is no real urgency in this question and that opportunity to debate the question in an effective way will be provided in due course. Therefore, with regret, I cannot accept the motion.

Mr. Nielsen: May I rise on a question affecting the order of business of the house. Since the Prime Minister has made the offer and since all parties appear to be in agreement, can the house now be asked by unanimous consent to proceed—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member is raising a question or asking a question at this time he is completely out of order; he must know that.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the offer made by the Prime Minister and the apparent unanimous agreement of the house in this respect, will the Prime Minister request His Honour to revert to motions or adopt other procedure which would allow the house to proceed forthwith with motion No. 82 on the order paper in order to permit discussion of this whole matter?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the house agrees unanimously that motion No. 82 should be called now and that it should be passed without debate so the standing committee on industrial relations are empowered to hear the board of trustees, I would be very glad to bring it forward. But I would not bring it forward to have it used by the opposition as an excuse to spend the rest of the day talking about their allegations and charges at the expense of important legislation.

Mr. Nielsen: A further supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister personally inquire into the admission of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard with respect to the so-called allegations?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to discuss that matter with my hon. friend. I would also be very glad to discuss with my hon. friend who raised the question the matter of campaign funds in his constituency.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the house will not be sitting tomorrow, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister mentioned yesterday that notices of motions for production of papers which are on the order paper would be dealt with on Wednesday, would the Prime Minister now consider approving the production of papers asked for in motion No. 186 today?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that would, of course, be completely out of order. I regret that when I mentioned this matter yesterday I did forget that tomorrow the house will not be sitting. However, this matter will come up a week from tomorrow and can be dealt with then. As it concerns a matter which has been under consideration now for a couple of years, perhaps one week's delay will not be fatal.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider that there are other motions under that heading which might be a little more urgent than this red herring which is being dragged across the trail now.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I do agree with that.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—SPEECH BY FOREIGN AFFAIRS MINISTER RESPECTING UNITY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding a speech delivered to the public relations society in Montreal yesterday and the strong warnings the minister gave against those who would impair—and I quote—the "integrity or unity of NATO". Were his warnings and threats, if I could so interpret them, directed against General de Gaulle, or whom did he have in mind when he made the strictures in question?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I stated last Friday in answer to a question by the right hon. gentleman, there have been some discussions to the effect that because of differences that have arisen nations, or a particular nation, might take a position which would cause a reconsideration of their position in the alliance. I made no reference to any particular country, and I feel that because of discussions which are going on it is better that the question be left in that way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister this question. Has General de Gaulle or the government of the republic of France given any indication that it has in mind withdrawal from NATO? Otherwise for what reason was the speech made?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we have had discussions here last week and there were good reasons for the observation which was made. Since yesterday the prime minister of France, M. Pompidou, has made a statement to the general effect that it was not the intention of France to withdraw from NATO.

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, in the light of the indicated crisis in the United Nations as between the United States and the Soviet union over the payment of dues to the United Nations, and in view of the reported crises over membership in NATO, the Kennedy round of talks and the common market, would the Prime Minister consider setting aside one day, or preferably two days, next week for the early discussion of the estimates of the Department of External Affairs so the house can have the benefit of the government's views on these very serious crises which beggar description of Canada's own domestic problems?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it will be possible shortly to call once again the estimates of the Department of External Affairs, and perhaps at that time these very important matters could be considered instead of the presence in Africa of the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question. I am sure the Prime Minister is fully aware that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was willing the other day to discuss the change in Soviet leadership and the explosion of a nuclear bomb by the Chinese rather than these other problems. Therefore does he not think he is merely drawing a red herring across the trail?

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING STATUS OF QUEBEC HOUSE IN PARIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Premier Lesage of Quebec informed the federal government that he will be making representations to either General de Gaulle, or other members or officials of the French government relating to the status of Quebec house in France? If so, can the minister inform the house of the nature of the representations Premier Lesage will be making?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any representations in this particular context. That, of course, would be a matter between the government of France and the government of Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: May I ask a supplementary question. Has Premier Lesage informed the minister that he will be making some representations to the French government relating to the status of Quebec house in France?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We have made representations ourselves, and we are carrying on consultations with regard to this matter.

Mr. Grafftey: May I rephrase my question. Has Premier Lesage told the minister that he too will be making further representations? This is a simple question that I ask.

Mr. Monteith: You will never get a simple answer.

VISIT TO CANADA BY U.K. PRIME MINISTER —SUBJECTS TO BE DISCUSSED

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the welcome announcement of the visit of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to Canada, will the Prime Minister say if there has been any decision about the subjects to be discussed, and in particular will the question come up regarding the recommendation by the Canadian government that the surcharges should be withdrawn at the earliest possible date? Have any representations to that effect been made to the British government as yet, and if so, what has been their reaction thereto?

[Mr. Lambert.]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I was hoping to announce to the house today, in somewhat more detail than was in the press statement, that the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom would be visiting Ottawa on December 9. This statement was issued at once because we understood a statement had been issued in Washington and in London. Meanwhile we are trying to ascertain exactly how long he will be here and what will be the opportunity for talks with him. At the moment our information is that he will be here only in the late afternoon and evening and will be returning to London the next morning.

I can give the house at the moment no information on the nature of the talks we will have, since we just completed arrangements this morning for his arrival.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not seen the announcement in question, but does this mean that the Prime Minister is going to visit Washington before he comes to Ottawa? Usually it has been the other way around. Second, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would answer my question regarding the surcharges? What representations have been made.

Mr. Pearson: In answer to the first question, the United Kingdom Prime Minister will be coming to Ottawa on this visit after he has visited Washington. It will be very interesting for the government to get from him at first hand the nature of the talks he has had with the United States government.

In reply to the second question, we are in touch with the United Kingdom government on the matter of surcharges, or their emergency economic measures, and have made clear to them our hope that these will be of a temporary character.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON ELECTION EXPENSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statements which have been made with reference to contributions by trade unions to various political parties and their candidates, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would give consideration to extending the terms of reference of the commission which is being set up to look into the question of election expenses, to give them the necessary authority to look into the sources of all campaign funds of all political parties in Canada over the past five or ten years.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to do that. I have not before me the terms of reference, but I do recall that those terms refer to "related subjects", and perhaps they are wide enough at present to deal with this matter. However, I will be glad to look into the matter.

LACK OF FRENCH SPEAKING OPERATORS ON LONG DISTANCE CALLS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I had a question to put to the Minister of Public Works, but in his absence, I will direct it to the Prime Minister. It has to do with two or three complaints I received quite recently, that is today at 11.15 a.m., to the effect that when we make long distance calls in parliament, it is impossible to find French speaking operators, or they refuse to speak French.

Would the Prime Minister check this fact and correct the situation as soon as possible?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will be glad to look into it, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STATEMENT ON GRANTING OF PAROLE IN COMMUTED DEATH SENTENCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I deal with a question which was raised yesterday and previously, and make a statement about parole in the cases of commuted death sentences both in regard to what is known as the Meeker case and in the wider context of such cases generally.

I can now inform the house that the government proposes to take steps for the enactment of a regulation under the Parole Act which will have the effect of providing that every person who is serving a sentence of imprisonment, to which a sentence of death has been commuted, shall in no case be released on parole without the prior approval of the governor in council. This will have the effect of giving general application to the restriction which, under section 656 of the Criminal Code, may now be imposed on a case to case basis.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question arising out of that statement. Does the Prime Minister not think that is putting a heavy responsibility directly on the executive?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that responsibility is now already put on the executive when it passes an order in council commuting a death sentence.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know it is not quite proper to mention this, but observations were made by the Prime Minister which went quite beyond what would have been proper under the circumstances. Does the Prime Minister not think this is a matter which should be looked into more carefully in order to assure the Canadian people that those who are dangerous and will continue to be so are not released, and that the action taken in the Meeker case will not be carried forward to cover all cases? I think the Prime Minister will agree there is nothing heavier than the responsibility which rests on the governor in council in murder cases. Making the rules so wide in order to cover a case which has attracted national attention I think is going pretty far.

I wonder whether he would reconsider that, because he is going a very long way beyond anything that has been contemplated before, and I am saying this in a spirit of helpfulness because I know of the difficulties.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate what the right hon. gentleman has said, but I do not think, in view of the circumstances surrounding these cases and the seriousness of the matter involved—nothing could be more serious, or impose greater responsibility on the executive, as my right hon. friend is aware—we are going further than is desirable in the regulation which I have just mentioned. I assure my right hon. friend that we have spent a good many days since the development of this situation, and have had a great many consultations, in order to convince ourselves that this is the proper step to take under the circumstances.

LABOUR RELATIONS

STRIKE OF LONGSHOREMEN—FREEDOM TO JOIN UNION OF CHOICE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Could he report on the meeting he had yesterday with the presidents of the International Longshoremen's Union of Montreal, Messrs. Asselin and Tremblay, and could he tell us whether they have agreed to reinstate in their ranks those who had been expelled because they wanted to join another union?

Could he tell us also whether the presidents of the International Longshoremen's Union have agreed to respect in the future the freedom of workers to belong to the trade union of their choice?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the main question we discussed yesterday, which was an urgent question, was related to the resumption of operations at the three river ports. As a result of arrangements entered into with the longshoremen, work has resumed today. I hope it will be possible through the offices of the Department of Labour to set up meetings between the shipping federation and the longshoremen to settle the problem that occasioned this walk-out. As I promised yesterday in reply to the questions addressed to me by the hon. member for Lapointe, I drew his questions and comments to the attention of the delegation who were present in the gallery, and I asked them whether they had heard the questions and comments of the hon. member. That delegation assured me that they had listened to the questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Did the minister get a favourable reply from the union leaders, the labour leaders, respecting the employees who were ousted from their union? Did he exert pressure on the chairmen of the union so that those workers might be taken back into the fold?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I did not make representations to the union officers with respect to a matter which is dealt with under the constitution of the union and for which there are several recourses, as I understand the situation, open to the members affected. I explained this in the house some weeks ago. I felt that I had gone as far as it was appropriate for me to go in drawing those representations to the attention of that delegation.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour, asking him whether he has received any assurance from the shipping federation that it is prepared to change its attitude in respect of negotiating the pension plan which was recommended by Judge Lippe?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I addressed messages yesterday to the president of the shipping federation of Canada, and to Mr. Gleason of the international longshoremen, suggesting that a meeting be held at an early date to discuss these questions. It is my expectation that the shipping federation, in accordance with the proposals they advanced yesterday, will be ready to undertake in good faith negotiations or discussions in respect of these questions.

Mr. Douglas: Will there be any conciliation officers of the Department of Labour present at these discussions?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have asked Mr. Poirier and Mr. McRae, both officers in Montreal, to assist in these discussions.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Did the representatives of the international longshoremen's union agree to have an inquiry made into the administration of the pension fund of the Montreal longshoremen in order to satisfy those who have been calling for such an inquiry for a long time?

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to take this question as notice and attempt to reply later.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This matter has been under discussion for two or three days, and properly speaking is a question that should be placed on the order paper in order to obtain a complete answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to set the record straight, I would say that is exactly the question I directed to the Minister of Labour yesterday, when the leaders of the union were in his office.

Yesterday he answered me that he would ask these labour leaders to have an inquiry made into the administration of the pension fund. Now, the next day, that is today, he is telling me that he will take this question as notice and that he will answer it later, although he had the opportunity of looking into these facts yesterday.

[Text]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I regret if I misunderstood the question asked by the hon. member. I assured him yesterday that I would draw his observations and representations to the attention of the delegation, and I carried out that undertaking yesterday. I drew his observation and representations to the attention of the longshoremen and representatives who were in my office.

IMMIGRATION

WOLFGANG SCHILBACH—INQUIRY AS TO STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he will give consideration to investigating the immigrant status in Canada of Wolfgang Schilbach, at one time of 974 Bathurst street in Toronto, and now publicized as the personal bodyguard of one John Ross Taylor of Gooderham, Ontario.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

[Text]

PRIVILEGE

MR. MOREAU—INACCURATE "HANSARD" REPORT OF SPEECH BY LEADER OF OPPOSITION

Mr. M. J. Moreau (York-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all members of this house. I should like to draw your attention to page 9877 of Hansard for Monday, October 9, and quote what the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is reported as having said:

> I think quite a number wish to express themselves on this matter.

Mr. Speaker, it is my recollection that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition used the figure 30, and said that 30 members wished to express themselves on this matter. In support of that recollection I should like to quote from page 9879 of Hansard for the same day where the hon. member for Lapointe, who rose immediately afterward, is reported as having said:

> When the leader of the official opposition states that 30 members of his party want to talk on that matter—

My recollection is further confirmed by an article in the Toronto Globe and Mail of this morning. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, in some way to correct the record so that it reads accurately, in view of the fact that the official record is not accurate.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I made no change in word, line or expression. I left what was recorded as said yesterday, as I do so often, unchanged and unrevised. If any portion of what I said was not heard by the Hansard reporter, who after all is the final arbiter, then I can only ascribe it to the fact that the noise and din opposite prevented the Hansard reporter from hearing everything I said.

This is the first time anyone has suggested that a challenge should be made of Hansard. I have always followed the course of not changing materially any matter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Don't start me in that direction or I will recall $100 million that disappeared during the course of a debate. Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that the Hansard reporter has been challenged for not having reported everything.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, with regard to that question of privilege, I notice that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition is not denying categorically that he has said "30 members" instead of "quite a number". I should like to ask the Leader of the Opposition, in view of what I stated later, namely:

[Text]

> —the leader of the official opposition states that 30 members of his party want to talk on that matter—

I would like to submit to the Leader of the Opposition that my sentence then has no sense.

Mr. Monteith: That is nothing new.

Mr. Grégoire: But if he said, as I understood him to say "30 members" and not "quite a number," then my sentence has sense.

When I said the Leader of the Opposition stated that 30 members of his party wanted to talk on that matter I believed he really had said it. I do not accuse him of having changed Hansard. Maybe he did not touch it at all, but if he can remember what he said I think it would be only fair and honest for him to state today what he said yesterday.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has raised a very novel argument. He says that unless Hansard is now changed and the report given by the reporter altered, what he said was nonsense and therefore should not be in Hansard. If his argument were carried to a logical conclusion, there have been cases when I believe the statement he now makes would have a sound basis in fact.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition is trying to interpret what I have said. I did not say this has no sense, that 30 members of his party want to talk on that matter, because I know 65 out of his 95 members do not want to follow the Leader of the Opposition in the flag debate. That makes sense, and those who do not make sense in this house are those 30 Tories who want to follow the Leader of the Opposition. I congratulate the other 65 who do not want to follow him in the flag issue.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I rise on that same question of privilege. The hon. member for Lapointe talks about sense but what he has just said is complete nonsense.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, if it is nonsense—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely we have all enjoyed ourselves sufficiently on this important matter.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

CELEBRATION OF 150TH ANNIVERSARY OF BIRTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State of which I have given him notice. Noting that the city of Kingston, in co-operation with other groups, is planning a commemorative dinner on the 150th anniversary of the birth of Sir John A. Macdonald, can the minister advise what preparations the government is making for national celebration of this historic event?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): All I can say at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is that a small interdepartmental committee has been appointed but we have not yet received its report or recommendations.

WATER RESOURCES

GRAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Could he tell the house whether he had any discussion with the Quebec minister of natural resources or any of his officials concerning the development of the Harricana river and whether the Grand canal project was also discussed?

[Text]

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

ANNOUNCEMENT OF CONFERENCE FOR SOUTHERN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. Some weeks ago he stated that he would be calling a housing conference for southern Ontario in November. In view of the importance of such a meeting and the need for preparations I wonder whether he has set the date and, if so, can he tell us it?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answer has already been given at an earlier sitting. I also tried to speak to the hon. member, when we found that of necessity we had to change the date. There was no hotel accommodation available, and the dates suggested were not satisfactory to many of the municipalities concerned, and the meeting will now be held in Toronto, on December 16 and 17. An invitation will be sent to the hon. member and to all the other members from the parts of Ontario included in the Toronto conference.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Chapdelaine (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Now that English Canada has shown in no uncertain terms that it disapproved of the policy of the Leader of the Opposition on the flag issue, at yesterday's by-elections, particularly in Waterloo South, does the Prime Minister intend to place the flag issue immediately before the house in order that we may, once and for all, settle that problem which is undermining the confidence of the people in our parliament?

[Text]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

PROPOSED RATE INCREASES ON NEWSPAPERS AND PERIODICALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Is it still the intention of the Postmaster General to proceed with resolution No. 12, which appears on the order paper and has been there since April 30, relating to the increase in certain rates on periodicals and newspapers?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, there is no change in the government's intention to proceed with this legislation. Unfortunately there are other matters with a higher priority on the list. The Post Office Department would like to see the changes made, but we must recognize there are other items with higher priority.

Mr. Ricard: May I ask a supplementary question. Is it the intention of the minister to proceed as soon as possible?

Mr. Nicholson: It depends on the priority, but certainly we will proceed as quickly and as expeditiously as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the assurance he gave two weeks ago today, that within a fortnight he would give an answer to those who saw the government with regard to increasing the pensions of retired civil servants. Has that answer been given, and can we be told the terms of the answer?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The letter is going out this afternoon. I signed it this morning, but I cannot disclose its contents until those who are concerned have received it.

AGRICULTURE

POULTRY—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MAINTAIN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the government going to give some consideration to the serious situation that now faces the poultry industry? I have a bill from one of my constituents who sold 59 fowl weighing 228 pounds for $13.35. Surely something should be done at once about this situation.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to discuss this serious situation with the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Nasserden: My supplementary question is, how long does the Prime Minister think the Minister of Agriculture can get away with sloughing off this problem by saying the problem does not exist?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND VOLUME OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the widespread interest in the subject across the country, can the minister inform the house when volume 2 of the report of the royal commission on health services may be tabled?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I have received no information on this, although I have heard from time to time that the document is completed and in the process of translation. My office has not yet been informed that it has been signed, and I have not yet checked with the Prime Minister whether he has had any word of its completion.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION OF PETITCODIAC CAUSEWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): May I pose a question for the Minister of Fisheries in connection with the multimillion dollar Petitcodiac causeway construction which the minister just announced a while ago. Will an opportunity be given to different groups to make representations regarding the location, and when does he expect construction will begin?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): This is a matter that has to be dealt with by the government of the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Bell: In view of the fact that the minister made this announcement, and evidently took credit for it, and in view of the fact that we would have a large participation in it, does he not think the federal government has a responsibility to answer those questions I pose?

Mr. Robichaud: I was pleased to announce that the federal government was prepared to participate under the maritime marshland reclamation scheme.

Mr. Bell: Does the minister not think the federal government has some responsibility, and will he give an assurance that this is not another pre-election promise that will turn out to be a corpse a few days afterward?

Mr. Robichaud: It is an accomplished fact, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

OTTAWA—CHANGE IN NAME OF PERFORMING ARTS CENTRE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if it was his decision that resulted in a change in the name of the national centre for the performing arts, which has now become the Canadian centre for the performing arts? If so, what significance can we read into this change in the name?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I can say that there is no real meaning to this. There has been no official name selected as yet for this centre.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 20, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Pearson)—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 6—Appointment of chairman.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on October 20 it had reverted to a consideration of clause 6, with an amendment thereto by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The other outstanding clauses are 7, 8, 9, 12 and 13.

Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment to clause 6?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word or two before we vote on this amendment, if that is the desire of the committee. I know it is not strictly in order but perhaps you would permit me, Mr. Chairman, to say that I was very much impressed by the progress which has been made during my absence—wondering, perhaps, whether I should not have stayed away longer—

Mr. Churchill: You have taken the words out of my mouth.

Mr. Pickersgill: My colleague the Minister of Labour seemed to do so well the other day when this measure was before the committee. But I am hoping that the spirit induced by the hon. gentleman will carry over to our proceedings this afternoon. I think hon. members will recall that at the time we suspended discussion on clause 6 of the bill last April there had developed what might really be regarded as the only serious difference which has yet arisen with regard to this legislation. I should like to recall to hon. members in all quarters of the committee the spirit in which this legislation was approached. I think here I can speak for the government, although in most respects it is clearly understood that once the principle of this bill was adopted, there were no whips on it and every hon. member as far as this side of the house was concerned was considered in every way free, just as was the case the last time a similar measure was before the house, to vote in any way he pleased without any concern because the position of the government was not en jeu then, and is not now. This is a matter for the house, one in which all of us have an equal responsibility. I am, therefore, very conscious of the fact that I can speak only for myself except in one respect: I think I can say it is the view of the government that because of the far reaching, revolutionary character of this legislation it is preferable that it be accomplished by a consensus rather than by sharp differences and votes.

It is true, as the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre pointed out, the last day when I was present in this committee when we previously discussed this matter, that there was a division over the question as to whether there should be one commission for the whole country or ten commissions. But there was no acrimony attached to the debate on that matter and there was the readiest acceptance of the view that once a reasonable discussion had taken place the question should be decided by the majority of votes in the committee. I hope this will be the spirit in the committee today. I did indicate during the last few days of April when this subject was being discussed that I personally was more inclined—"more disposed" was the phrase I used—to support the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre than I was to support the original provision in the bill. At the risk of repetition I should like to put on record again the words I used on that occasion, words which will be found at page 2320 of Hansard. I said then:

> If the house decided to accept the bill in its present form I would not waste any tears on the amendment. In fact, I would have a certain amount of satisfaction, but I really do believe we would have a better act with this amendment. Because all those in the country are not Liberals and Conservatives—

Perhaps I can say that today without dissent, at any rate from one corner of the house.

> —because all those in the country perhaps have not got the same highminded view of the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister as those of us in the house have, I think there would be a greater degree of general confidence in the commissions if we were to accept the amendment that has been proposed than if we were to take the bill in its present form. For that reason I am disposed to support the amendment.

Since that time I have not changed my view. But I cannot ignore the fact that the amendment of the hon. gentleman did arouse very strong antagonism in one part of the committee. I did not myself think that the antagonism was justified, but this is a free country and a free assembly. It was a fact. During the past four or five weeks while unable to be here to take part in the work of the house I have been pondering other possible ways of dealing with this matter. I wish to emphasize what I said on second reading and what I have said at every stage —that while we produced the best bill we were able to draft, we were prepared to accept from any quarter of the house any suggestion for improvement. That still goes. By "improvement" I do not just mean something which is academically better. I use the term to include something which is more generally acceptable to the whole house as long as it meets the basic requirements of the legislation.

I was somewhat impressed by having recalled to my mind the suggestion made in a bill introduced by Senator Power when he was in this house many years ago. It was not proceeded with because of the war, but in that bill there was a provision for the Speaker to make these appointments after consultation with certain hon. members in the house. I have been rather impressed by both parts of this suggestion and while I was elsewhere and not otherwise occupied I prepared two draft amendments about which I should like to say something—I have some copies, and when I get to them I will be glad to pass them around to hon. members so that they can read them. I am not going to move them now. I could not do so, in any case, because there is an amendment before the committee now. But so that we can take a general look at the whole question, before doing that—

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he pass them around now and let us look at them. Don't keep them secret.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have not the capacity of the right hon. gentleman for holding the attention of an audience; I would prefer not to make a distraction available. I would rather have hon. members listen to what I have to say until I get to that point. I know I need the assistance of the right hon. gentleman in making my speeches much more than he is in need of assistance from me, but I would really prefer to make my own.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thought the hon. gentleman wanted co-operation, and we were giving him co-operation. I was trying to secure it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The right hon. gentleman is correct. But I do not spell "co-operation" "d-i-c-t-a-t-i-o-n". I hope the right hon. gentleman will not take the view that unless we agree with him there is no co-operation in the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A statement like that is quite in keeping with what we expect from the hon. gentleman. We have tried to practise co-operation. He claimed a moment ago that this was the desire. A moment ago I made the suggestion in the best of good spirits, but the hon. gentleman is continuing the attitude he has taken previously with regard to the C.B.C.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think the right hon. gentleman is quite right. I think I have behaved quite badly, and I apologize.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would answer a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Woolliams: He said, "the Speaker, in consultation with certain members". I wonder whether he would now outline the members he has in mind. That would come to grips with the subject immediately.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, Mr. Chairman. I hope the hon. gentleman will not think this is offensive—

Mr. Woolliams: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: —but I would prefer to deal with this matter in the way that I think will make clear what I am hoping to make clear about a rather complicated subject. In other words, it is perhaps almost out of order for me to be doing what I am doing now, because we are really supposed to be discussing nothing but the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It is perhaps almost a discourtesy to him, for which I should perhaps apologize, to be suggesting that it ought to be supplanted with something else. But I would like first of all to say a little more about the hon. gentleman's own amendment. There was one objection to it which was made by hon. members in certain quarters of the house and which I thought had some substance. That was, that apart from the representation commissioner, all three members of the commissions would be appointed by the same person. It is true that there were limitations on the kind of persons who could be appointed, but notwithstanding that fact, that is perhaps rather a concentration of power in the hands of one man, even though that man is the chief justice of the province.

Therefore it seemed to me that if we could find some other way to diffuse this power of appointment in some way that would be acceptable to the whole house, it ought to be done. One of the suggestions that I am going to put forward is that if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was willing to withdraw his amendment, or if his motion should not be accepted by the committee when it is voted upon, we should then accept an amendment which would substitute appointment by His Honour the Speaker for the appointment by the leaders of the two major parties in the house. In support of that I could quote a number of—

Mr. Knowles: From categories, or just anybody?

Mr. Pickersgill: My own view is that of course that would be a possibility; but I would think that after the debate we have had, in the light of all the experience, which is bound to be followed to some degree, in other commonwealth countries, and in view of the difficulty that the hon. gentleman himself recognized in his amendment, namely that these categories of persons referred to are not civil servants of the federal state but are provincial civil servants or persons in other categories whom we cannot order, it might be much better to trust His Honour the Speaker to do the sensible thing, and not to put any strings upon him except the obvious string that these appointments must be made from persons resident in the province.

In the course of the debate hon. gentlemen made a number of points. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings said, as reported at page 2291 of Hansard:

> We have a Prime Minister who is an officer of the house and a Leader of the Opposition who is also an officer of the house, and they are the only ones in this category. I agree that whoever occupied the office of prime minister or leader of the opposition would exercise the authority given to them under this provision in a manner which would be entirely creditable both to themselves and to parliament—

I think that will always be true. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, as recorded at page 2298 of Hansard, said this:

> I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should correct his stand on this. What is required in this country is respect for parliament, and that carries with it respect for the leaders of these two great parties.

The hon. member said a little later on:

> Obviously some people in the left hand corner of the chamber have no respect for the leader of the Liberal party or the leader of the Conservative party, but there are millions of people in the country who have, while their supporters are not very numerous.

Mr. Knowles: It has changed since then.

Mr. Pickersgill: One could make some comments on that. The hon. member for Edmonton West said:

> I would say to the Minister of Justice that in discussing the qualifications, capabilities or impartiality of the Prime Minister or the Leader of the Opposition, one must not consider the personalities of the right hon. gentlemen who are now occupying those positions. If you do this, you may be merely legislating for the next five years.

Then he went on to suggest that the amendment of the hon. gentleman was an implied reflection on the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition acting in a responsible manner as officers of the house and a reflection that they would not do a proper job. I could quote several other hon. members. There is a quotation of the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary as reported at page 2307 of Hansard—I am not going to read it —and several other hon. gentlemen opposite. The gist of all this is the same, namely that we should have confidence that whoever is the prime minister, whoever is the leader of the government, whoever is the leader of the opposition, would make proper appointments. I believe this would be true. But I also share a good deal of the feelings of hon. gentlemen in the other corner of the house who do not support either of these hon. gentlemen and who have pointed out, quite properly I think, that both the occupants of these offices are now, and as long as we have free government will continue to be, politicians.

If, however, hon. gentlemen opposite really believe what they said—and I do not say they do not; I believe they do—about the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition acting in this capacity, surely all of us in every quarter of the house would at all times be ready to trust the one officer of this house elected by us all, who is called the Speaker of the House of Commons because he is our voice when we go to the other place, the man who speaks for us, who has a duty to be impartial, who has that duty imposed upon him and who—I might remind hon. gentlemen—is the chairman of all four commissions in the United Kingdom. So it does seem to me that this would be an even better method of resolving the problem than any that has yet been suggested.

I would hope that this solution—which commends itself very much to me, I may say, as a good solution and one that would stand the test of time—might commend itself to all hon. members in every quarter of the house. I think there is one thing we can be sure of; that there would never be any criticism outside this chamber of the appointments that would be made by the presiding officer of this chamber. The only place where there could possibly be any criticism arise would be within our own ranks—and I would hope there would be none here. For that reason I am suggesting that if there was a consensus —I do not say universal approval, because you hardly ever get that in an assembly like this—on the part of hon. members that this would be a good solution, I would be very glad, if the hon. member's amendment should not carry, to put this forward as an amendment in the hope that it would carry. I am sure all hon. members will respect my feelings in this when I say that I would not wish it to be put forward unless there were a reasonable assurance that it would commend itself to the committee generally. I do not think we should do that in those circumstances, having regard to the office of the Speaker; and unless we are generally prepared to support this amendment I would not wish to put it forward at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, the minister mentioned a moment ago a suggestion from Hon. C. G. Power. What was that suggestion? I think the hon. gentleman was getting away from it.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps this would be an appropriate time to deal with it and perhaps the best way to deal with it would be to refer to it directly, just as did the hon. member for York-Sunbury some time ago.

Mr. Knowles: I think it was the hon. member for Royal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it was the hon. member for Royal; I thought of Fredericton and got just a little confused. The suggestion was that there should be two assessors for each province, one of whom should be appointed on the recommendation of the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons and the other on the recommendation of the leader for the time being holding the majority in the House of Commons. That was the suggestion made in this particular bill. There was also another suggestion in an earlier bill that there should be two members, one appointed by the leader of the government and one by the leader of the opposition after consultation with the leaders of other parties in the house. They were the suggestions.

This brings me to the other alternative which also occurred to me.

Mr. Woolliams: Before you get into that would you just answer this question. The minister did say that the Speaker in consultation with other members would make the appointment. Before the hon. gentleman leaves that phase of it, what has he in mind by consultation with other members?

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not have in mind that the amendment would contain anything about consultation with anyone. I said, as is the case in the United Kingdom and elsewhere, I understand, that there would in fact be consultation, but that I did not think we should attempt to prescribe consultation in the legislation. I think we should leave to the judgment of the Speaker what he should do about this matter, knowing that he will exercise his judgment in a sensible and practical manner.

The alternative suggestion which I had put forward was this, that we should leave the present bill as it is so far as the appointment of the commissions go.

Mr. Thomas: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: But I suggested we provide —and I hope the hon. gentleman will continue to say "Hear, hear"—that the leaders of other recognized parties in the house should have the right to appoint witnesses or assessors to be present at all the meetings of the commissions. Personally, I do not like this nearly as much but I am trying to think of every possible way in which we can do this so that it will at any rate definitely be open and aboveboard.

I recognize the force of the arguments used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others associated with him, by the hon. member for Fraser Valley and by some other hon. members earlier in this debate. They, too, represent in this house large bodies of electors, and it is only natural that they should feel that the heads of other political parties should not have a power of appointment which, even if it did not give them any advantage, would seem to exclude other hon. members who were equally elected to this house by the people of Canada.

If the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is not acceptable, I would hope that one or other of the amendments or a variant of them will be acceptable. Personally, I think that if we really mean what we have said on second reading the neatest, the simplest and the fairest method to remove these appointments completely from the partisan arena would be to accept the suggestion that these two appointments be made by the Speaker. It seems to me there could be no criticism of that by anybody in any quarter. If we trust the Speaker to preside over our deliberations, to preserve impartiality and to do all these things which he takes an oath to do, we can surely trust him to discharge this function and to discharge it fairly. To me that would be the best way. However, I recognize the difficulty that we cannot do it—at least I do not think we can—if a large section of the house does not agree to it, because that would be a reflection on His Honour the Speaker before he even got started. I may say that I had heard, of course, of this suggestion and was aware of the practice in other jurisdictions, but that is what to some extent deterred me from suggesting that it be put in the bill in the first instance.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be desirable to have some discussion of these possible alternatives before we come to a vote on the hon. member's motion, and I think I should now take my seat.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, before the minister sits down would he entertain this question. In view of the fact that he has put forward two alternatives in addition to what we have already had and he has suggested that we should now have some discussion, I have always felt that discussion should take place after we have done some thinking. Would the hon. minister who is piloting the bill through be prepared to let us set this matter aside now for a short period so that we can get together as a group and see what we think of it? I think that is reasonable. It seems to me that the first thing is to do some thinking and analysing and then have some discussion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have read in the public print somewhere some suggestions to the effect that discussions behind closed doors are not altogether desirable all the time, although that was in another context entirely unrelated to parliament. It seems to me that the proper place for debate is right here. I have copies of both these suggestions and some general principles are involved. For one thing, it is not really very difficult to grasp one of the amendments; it is simplicity and clarity itself. The other one, which I admit I do not like so much but which would be satisfactory I think, is somewhat more complicated, but not very much because it preserves essentially what is in the present bill and simply makes the additional provision for what are called in the draft amendment "assessors". In any event I have a few copies of both these documents, and if they could be passed around so that hon. gentlemen can look at them perhaps we might have some discussion at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I should like to follow up the suggestion

I made by way of a question. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and who is piloting the bill through said that he did not think it desirable that we should sit down and analyse this matter behind closed doors. I think these propositions have some merit. They may be good propositions. Perhaps both of them are good. But surely the thing to do—and with his intellect I am sure the hon. gentleman will appreciate this—is to expose ourselves to the documents in question and analyse them to see whether they are good, and perhaps shorten this debate. I am not trying to get into an argument this afternoon by any means, but sometimes we are accused of filibustering this bill. Surely this is an opportunity to sit down and analyse this as a party. This is, after all, the official opposition. We want to speak as such, and as Conservatives.

Mr. Chairman, I see that the minister is busy with something else at the present moment. This is a very important question and I wish he would listen to what I have to say. This is the suggestion I am making. Perhaps he could set this aside and we could go on with some other business of the house, so that perhaps within 30 minutes or an hour tomorrow we could come to some agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: We are not sitting tomorrow.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right, we have a holiday tomorrow and I have overlooked that fact. This item of legislation has been set aside since April. While it is true the minister has been in the hospital, it has been left in abeyance since it was set aside. Surely if it was all right to do that, my request that we set it aside for the purpose of analysing it is a reasonable one. The hon. minister has stated that he is not a lawyer, but I have often thought that he comes to grips with many problems as a lawyer might do, and I am sure he will appreciate that a lawyer would never defend an individual, or act for the plaintiff or defendant in a civil action, without briefing his case. You have put forward two propositions. Surely we should have time to analyse the situation, otherwise you will be encouraging talk rather than thought.

I thought the Minister of National Health and Welfare made a remark. I do not intend to reply or become involved in an argument with her, but it seems whenever I say something I do become involved in an argument with her and she then becomes annoyed with me. I do not like her to be annoyed with me. I do not like any lady to be annoyed with me.

The minister has been talking about reasonable things. Surely it is reasonable to suggest that we set this aside for a short period of time and go on with another piece of legislation. If the government is caught without having anything for us to consider this afternoon, that may be a source of embarrassment, but I suggest there are many other items that could be considered between now and eight o'clock, or ten o'clock, giving us the opportunity of looking into this matter and, analysing it so that we can come back and say that point A is good but point B is bad. Let us have the opportunity of preparing ourselves. You have hit us with a brand new argument, and a brand new disposition. This is quite a revelation and I am rather surprised. I am impressed by what the hon. member has said this afternoon and am inclined to go along with him, provided we have time to analyse the situation. Otherwise I am afraid I must be suspicious of the whole thing.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, at this moment I should just like to say a few words about the procedure that we might follow. First of all may I make it clear that we are prepared to make our comments on the various proposals immediately. I think there is some validity, however, to the request made by the hon. member for Bow River. If there is to be a postponement of this discussion, it might not be inappropriate to have at least an initial statement as to where we stand on these matters. I suggest there are several clauses which are standing, and if I took down the list correctly, the clauses yet to be dealt with are clauses 6, 7, 8, 9, 12 and 13. I realize that the two most difficult ones are clauses 6 and 13, but perhaps we could go on with our consideration of clauses 7, 8, 9 and 12. I am not suggesting that we spend all our time until six o'clock dealing with those clauses, but they might well take some time. Following our consideration of those clauses perhaps we could deal with another piece of legislation.

As I have suggested, we in this party would like to make a brief statement about our view on the matter. I do not want to prejudge the possibility of a further discussion by individuals, but I am not in favour of negotiation behind closed doors.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact I was about to say that I do not think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bow River is at all unreasonable. If it is the desire of the committee to rise now and report progress we will take everyone by surprise, and I suppose the government is not supposed to do this, but there are several measures on the order paper that we would desperately like to complete. Two or three of them are in respect of things which come within my department, such as the harbours board bill and the Canada Shipping Act. This legislation does have to be completed. We must also put through legislation in respect of the annual financing of the C.N.R.

Mr. Chairman, I have just attempted to get in touch with the Department of Finance to find out whether there is someone immediately available to go on with that measure. It is such a routine measure I cannot see any great difficulty involved.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What measure is that?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am referring to the annual measure for financing the C.N.R. This is something we must get done before this session can conclude, and it would be very helpful to the government to have this done.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested that it would be preferable to receive a brief statement in respect of the measure presently under discussion before putting it aside. I think it would be preferable to put it aside right away, have the consultation required, in one way or another, enabling hon. members to think over the position they want to take. If that is the wish of the committee generally I certainly would not be opposed to it, as long as hon. members opposite do not object to going ahead with some of the other items on the order paper of a non-contentious nature.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister, in regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, whether we could go ahead with some of the other clauses to be considered, leaving clauses 6 and 13 aside?

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that some of the clauses might be inter-related, and therefore, should be considered together. Perhaps we can go ahead with our consideration of something else at this time, and set our consideration regarding this measure aside until perhaps eight o'clock, at which time we will know whether or not we can make progress. With the hope that an agreement can be reached I think it would be advisable to follow that course.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thought someone would put a table in front of me as an indication that I might receive advice, but unfortunately that has not happened. I am very hesitant, in the company of so many learned gentlemen, being unlearned myself, to talk about these clauses without some assistance. I was afraid some hon. members would suggest that there are some ancillary conditions, such as has been suggested by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. Clause 12 does not fall within that category, but stands on its own feet. We might consider that clause at this time, but I think it would be neater if we agree to set this measure aside for consideration later.

Before doing that, Mr. Chairman, and this is highly irregular, perhaps we could have some kind of an understanding as to what measure we will next consider. Unfortunately the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance has not yet arrived. Perhaps we could agree to second reading of the harbours bill. I do not think it is contentious.

Mr. Churchill: That would be agreeable.

Mr. Pickersgill: If that meets with the general approval of this committee I am prepared to move that we rise and report progress.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, before we do that perhaps we could arrive at one other point of agreement. I am willing to withdraw my suggestion about an initial statement, but I am advising the minister that he must have a better argument before we come back to this, but can we also fix the time when we will come back to it—for instance eight o'clock this evening?

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like the committee to consider this measure this evening, if the time left between now and eight o'clock is sufficient for hon. members to consider their positions. If not, perhaps we can agree that this will be the first item of business on Thursday.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I do not think we should set this measure aside for a longer period of time than from now until eight o'clock. The first suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River was that he needed half an hour to consider it.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to get into an argument with the hon. gentleman, but what I did say was that we needed some time to consider our positions.

Mr. Douglas: Perhaps hon. members could consider these clauses in the three or more hours between now and eight o'clock. If we do not get on with it this evening, we will be dealing with estimates on Thursday and Friday.

Mr. Pickersgill: We would only take estimates on Thursday if this is completed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am trying to speak in a spirit of co-operation. This is a most important matter and we are trying to leave our political considerations at the door. I would like to study these various suggestions and I think this would save a great deal of time. We would know exactly where we were on Thursday, but if we started in tonight I am afraid we would run through until ten o'clock.

I have not seen these suggestions before and am most anxious to assure that we produce something that will be generally accepted. No harm will be suffered by anyone in allowing this to go to Thursday and I would hope that could be agreed to by everyone.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if that is the general consensus. The government feels we should get on with this legislation and get it passed. The right hon. gentleman suggests we would make as much progress on Thursday as we would this evening and Thursday but he cannot speak for the house any more than I can. However, if that is his opinion we shall have to take it into serious consideration.

Mr. Knowles: We felt it would be better to proceed at eight o'clock but we are prepared to have it deferred until Thursday provided it is the first item of business on Thursday.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite clearly understood. I may say I have put forward two new suggestions and have had some discussion on them with one or two hon. gentlemen, but there has been no formal consultation.

The parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance is present and he tells me he is ready to go ahead with the resolution regarding the C.N.R. financing, and perhaps we could agree to take that. Then, as soon as it is completed we could take the harbour legislation and then the bill regarding Newfoundland, which is merely a formal matter that has to be dealt with. After that there is the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Knowles: What about the Canada labour code?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand the Minister of Labour cannot be here this evening. I expected to be here this evening and it would be a great relief to me if we could get all this legislation out of the way.

Mr. Churchill: You might take on some of the items for the Minister of Labour, who did very well for you in your absence.

Mr. Knowles: I happen to be one of the favoured few who received copies of these two drafts, and since we are deferring this until Thursday arrangements should be made for all hon. members to get copies. I do not suggest we should have them incorporated in Hansard, but they could be duplicated.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there are enough copies for any members who are really interested, and I shall endeavour to have them circulated right away. I take it there is no objection in any quarter to going ahead with the program I have suggested.

Mr. Prittie: I would like a little more notice before the harbours bill is debated. This is a poor way to handle things.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand the President of the Privy Council gave notice of it last night as one of the items which would be taken if redistribution were completed, and therefore I believe the government has fulfilled all requirements.

Mr. Winch: I do not remember the Canada Shipping Act being mentioned and I would like at least one day's notice of it.

Mr. Pickersgill: As there will be three other items preceding it I think it is unlikely we will reach it today. In fact there may be one or two other items of a non-contentious nature that we could clear off the order paper and so give hon. gentlemen in the other place something to do.

Progress reported.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION FOR CAPITAL EXPENDITURES, ISSUE OF SECURITIES, ETC.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to make capital expenditures and to supply the financial requirements of affiliated companies in the year 1964, not exceeding $155,000,000, and to make certain capital expenditures and enter into certain contracts prior to July 1, 1965; to provide for the financial requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines in an amount not exceeding $5,000,000, either by means of loans from Her Majesty to the National company or by means of issues of securities of the National company, authorized and guaranteed as to interest and principal by

Her Majesty, the cash proceeds by either method to be used only for the financial requirements of Trans-Canada Air Lines, the capital needs of the National company itself being met entirely through the sale of preferred stock to Her Majesty and from reserves for depreciation and debt discount; to authorize Her Majesty to continue to purchase until December 31, 1965, Canadian National Company 4 per cent preferred stock in an annual amount not exceeding 3 per cent of the gross revenues of the company; to extend until December 31, 1965, the moratorium on interest on the loan of $100,000,000 to the company authorized by the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act of 1952; to authorize Her Majesty to make loans to the Canadian National Railway Company and Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet deficiencies in operating revenues to June 30, 1965, any such loans to be repaid from revenues of the railway company and Trans-Canada Air Lines or, if revenues prove insufficient, by subsequent deficit appropriation by parliament; and to raise the limit on the Canadian National Railway Company's authority to refund matured, maturing and callable securities from the present level of $480,000,000 to $680,000,000.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. Pennell: Mr. Chairman, the more experienced members of the committee will immediately recognize that this resolution is the one which usually precedes the introduction of the Canadian National Railways financing and guarantee bill. I may say that both as to form and substance the resolution is in keeping with the practice followed annually since 1952, with the exception of 1962 and 1963. As hon. members know, in those two years the annual financing and guarantee bills were combined into one bill late last year, but we are now returning to the practice of former years.

The bill which is foreshadowed by this resolution divides itself into seven main purposes and I shall attempt, with the indulgence of the committee, to explain those purposes briefly.

The first is to authorize capital expenditures by the C.N.R. in an amount not exceeding $155 million during the 1964 calendar year. As I understand it, this level of expenditure will run about the same as that incurred in recent years. There will be certain technical provisions within the bill authorizing payments not exceeding $72 million coming due between January 1 and July 1 1965, for capital expenditures incurred prior to 1965, and authorizing the C.N.R. to enter into contracts in an amount not exceeding $36 million for capital expenditures for the period January 1, 1965 and July 1, 1965.

The second main purpose of the bill will be to provide for the continued purchase by the Minister of Finance of the C.N.R.'s 4 per cent preferred stock through to the end of the calendar year 1965. The 1962-63 financing and guarantee act extended to December 31, 1964, the expiry date of the authority granted by the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1952, for the purchase of such stock up to a limit of 3 per cent of the gross revenue of the railway. In future years this provision and the other provisions of this annual bill might be affected by general railways legislation and a recapitalization of the C.N.R. While these matters are pending the bill recommends that the expiry date of this provision be extended to the end of 1965.

The third purpose of the bill is to extend until 1965 the moratorium on interest on the government loan of $100 million to the railway company authorized by the capital revision act, 1952.

The fourth purpose of the bill is a provision to increase to $680 million the limitation in the Canadian National Railways Refunding Act, 1955, placed on the authority to refund maturing or matured securities of the railway company. The limit at present is $480 million and it is desirable to increase this limit in order to give the railway company the authority to refund 5½ per cent Canadian National railway bonds maturing on December 15, 1964. These bonds, I might add, were exchangeable at the option of the holders on or before June 15, 1964, into an equal par value of 5½ per cent bonds due December 15, 1971. Of these bonds, $190,445,000 were converted, leaving $8,555,000 still outstanding which are due to mature on December 15, of this year.

The last Financing and Guarantee Act extended the Canadian National's debt refunding limit by $250 million in view of the maturity of a like amount of Canadian National bonds on February 1, 1963. This issue was, in fact, refunded by a direct government loan to the Canadian National rather than by a bond issue by the Canadian National. I understand that there are no plans for a C.N.R. bond issue this year. However, it is considered desirable to have the added refunding authority equivalent to both C.N.R. issues in the event that debt management considerations ever pointed again to the advisability of C.N.R. bond issues.

The fifth purpose of the act will be to provide for the interim financing of Trans-Canada Air Lines during the first six months of the calendar year 1965 in an amount not exceeding $5 million.

Mr. Lambert: What body is Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Pennell: The hon. member for Edmonton West raises an interesting point when he asks me, what body is Trans-Canada Air Lines. I stand subject to correction, but in the interest of precision I felt I ought to refer to it as Trans-Canada Air Lines because I understand it will not become officially Air Canada until the first of the year. However, I stand to be corrected on this. In the meantime, the hon. member for Edmonton West may check the record, I am indebted to him for doing so because if I am wrong I welcome a correction.

The sixth purpose of the bill is, as in previous years, to provide authority for the government to make temporary loans to Canadian National Railways and Trans-Canada Air Lines to meet deficiencies in operating revenues up to June 30, 1965. Any such loan is repaid later from the revenues of Canadian National and Trans-Canada Air Lines or if these prove insufficient, then the loans are written off through parliamentary appropriation.

I come to the seventh, and final purpose of the bill, which is to provide for the appointment of the firm of Touche, Ross, Bailey and Smart, of the cities of Toronto and Montreal, chartered accountants, as auditors of the Canadian National for the calendar year 1965. I think, for the interest of members, I should add that last year there was a provision authorizing the auditors by a separate act, and this is just returning to the custom that had persisted for many years prior to that date.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that outlines briefly the main purposes of the resolution now engaging the attention of the committee.

Mr. Lambert: I want to thank the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Chairman, for his explanation. It is necessarily brief so far as the resolution is concerned, but perhaps when we get to the bill we will be given more details. I am particularly concerned with the phraseology, "certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National". I think we should get an indication if there is a departure from a certain program that Canadian National Railways have undertaken. I feel the committee is entitled to know the nature of this capital spending program and what would be the type of complex it intends to enter into prior to July 1, 1965. An additional consideration is this $5 million for Trans-Canada Air Lines, or Air Canada. I am not going to indulge in a legal dissertation on the name because perhaps the corporation is riding two horses at the moment. However I think we should know why it requires this $5 million.

One matter of concern, and perhaps the parliamentary secretary can tell us this, is whether, in the light of the proposed amendments to the Railway Act before the house at the moment, there have been any discussions or possible decisions regarding the refinancing of the whole Canadian National Railways debt structure? We are now getting up into the astronomical figure of $680 million as the limit for refinancing. I know it may be premature to discuss this question, but I think our attention has been drawn to what has been advocated by the railway management for some time, that is that the position of the Canadian National in relation to its debt structure should be subjected to a practical examination to ascertain whether or not it should be completely overhauled, and the railway given a chance to operate on the basis of current operations without having the albatross of these great losses of past years around its neck, which are related to the time when the system was welded together from a number of bankrupt lines. It is true that we have had this condition existing for 45 years, since Canadian National was organized. There must come before parliament a realistic appraisal of Canadian National Railways financial structure in order to eliminate this past debt.

Now, with regard to the appointment of auditors, that was gone into at some length last time. I do not suppose it really warrants anything being said on this occasion. I believe the auditors who have been appointed are competent people and that they were competent at all times. The less said at this time about what happened last year, the better. Unfortunately, I believe it left a nasty taste in the mouths of a lot of people, and I suppose was a matter of political retribution. We look forward to seeing the bill. Perhaps at that time the parliamentary secretary will be in a position to give more detail about some of the things that are sketched in in rather general terms in the resolution.

Mr. Fisher: The measure before us is a routine one and there is no intention on my part of taking up a great deal of time or raising a variety of subjects. I would point out that the debate on this particular matter in previous years has on occasions been perfunctory and very brief, though at other times it has ranged widely, depending on the currency of interest in certain topics related to the Canadian National Railways and the C.P.R.

The parliamentary secretary indicated to us that the whole question of debt reorganization is still up in the air. I think ministers of transport in governments since 1962 have been, I will not say less than candid, but less than informative about the attitude and intentions of the administration in this regard. I know the Minister of Transport was in the railway committee when this issue was raised last summer, and he gave a general indication that the government was considering favourably the proposals which had been put forward. He may recall that I put on the record of that committee some very strong criticisms by the C.P.R. and some of the trucking associations of the proposal for refinancing put forward by Canadian National. In doing so I had no intention of supporting this criticism. It was done, rather, to elicit from the president of the C.N.R., Mr. Gordon, a public rebuttal, if you will, of the C.P.R. charges. The C.P.R. feels of course that in any financing of the C.N., and any refinancing in particular, its main competitor is being given a tremendous advantage.

It has been my contention that whatever his merits in some areas as president of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Donald Gordon has failed in the financial sphere of railway management. I have made this point before, but I will bring it up again. When the royal commission on transportation made its recommendations in the early '50's, Mr. Gordon was convinced that with the refinancing of the C.N.R. the railway would very soon be in a surplus position and would never have to worry again about the size of its debt structure, or about the repayment of those debts and the meeting of its other obligations from year to year. The position of the C.N.R. did improve and there were a couple of years when the railway did show a surplus; in one year it was a big one; in another it was not so big. The other cry was that the whole railway had to be rehabilitated; there had to be central traffic control and new equipment of all kinds.

It was in those years of the middle '50's that the annual bill which came before us began to escalate. It is almost fantastic, when you begin to consider it in detail, the massive capital expenditure by Canadian National since 1954. Mr. Gordon was wrong in his opinion that the refinancing which followed the report of the royal commission on transportation in 1950 would put the C.N.R. in a viable economic position vis-à-vis its competitors. He was wrong again when he argued that the rehabilitation of the physical structure of the C.N.R. and the use of the most modern transportation methods would put the railway into a viable economic position and enable it to carry its debt.

Despite an increase in productivity, despite the decreasing cost of moving freight a ton mile which has resulted from all this tremendous expenditure, the position of the C.N.R. has really not improved. And so, after being wrong twice, Mr. Gordon comes up with his third major proposition since he became president of the C.N.R., namely that the debt structure should be completely reorganized. Figures have been mentioned running all the way from $690 million to $850 million. He has been most thorough in the proposition he has put forward. He elaborated it fully and clearly as long ago as 1961. He did so with particular thoroughness in 1962 and there were repetitions in 1963 and 1964. With all the discredit one may wish to place on the House of Commons, and the hesitation which a government may feel about trying to get a complicated measure such as this before parliament, this is a very bad show on the part of the administrators in the Department of Finance and the Department of Transport, and on the part of ministers over the last three or four years. It is a reflection upon them that it has taken so long for this debt reorganization to be handled and dealt with. In a sense, the kind of measure we have here would never have been necessary, or necessary in this particular form, if action had been taken on this more fundamental question.

I think it is our duty as members of the opposition to carp about this state of affairs, to criticize, to suggest that if Mr. Gordon has a case for debt reorganization, surely he has made it and made it again and again in the course of the last few years. I am very interested in this because the subject of debt reorganization fits into a much wider context. Recently there was a brouhaha in connection with run-throughs on the Canadian National. All across the country there was editorial criticism. Writers of editorials talked about "getting in the way of efficiency" on the part of the C.N.R. Well, if objection to a run-through affecting tiny little places like Nakina and Wainwright is getting in the way of efficiency, what about holding up of a question involving between $600 million and $850 million by the Departments of Finance and Transport?

How are those of us in politics who are aware that the C.N.R. is a crown agency to react when we seem to be dealing on the level of $10,000 or $50,000 saved here or there in the name of efficiency while, at the same time, we have this kind of ball-up? And I think it is one, when the highest paid head of our largest government agency makes a serious and detailed proposition repeatedly, within the general context of tremendous change in the industry, change which affects the workers; within the context of other changes promulgated by the Railway Act which has been placed before us, which would alter the whole structure of freight rates in this country, something which would change the sacred cow and its ramifications in western Canada, which would lead to a massive abandonment program and which carries within it subsidies amounting to more than $1 billion in ten years. Nothing is done to deal with those important recommendations. Once again we come up with the traditional bill and we do not have the story before us relative to this question of the debt reorganization of the C.N.R.

I am not trying to put this out of focus or to distort it. But this is a very serious thing. I have heard all this nonsense—I like to call it garbage—about the MacPherson commission taking an over-all look at the railway picture. Damn it all, Mr. Chairman; it did not. There were a number of things it was specifically excluded from looking at, and it was not an over-all look at the transportation picture or an over-all look at all the railway problems.

I am not quarrelling with many of the recommendations, particularly the recommendation that a national transport council should be created. I think it attempted to prescribe, in the main, for the problems that the railways face; but it did not go into this whole question of the debt reorganization of Canadian National Railways; it did not go into the relationship of Canadian National Railways to the government or to the House of Commons. This bill, and the way these measures sort of march in in part and are delayed and held up, is an indication to me that we very, very badly need a good minister of transport. Maybe we have got one; I don't know. Maybe the present minister is the one we need. But surely we need a minister of transport who could get on top of all these matters, somehow get them into the House of Commons in some correlation and get them through in a complete legislative program—if you want, a session devoted to transportation problems. But it seems to me we peck here and pick there and get a little bit, and always it seems we are behind, in legislative terms, as to what the railways, the shippers and everybody else seem to want and need out in the country.

This is true not only for the railways but it is true for air. You know, Mr. Chairman, the fandango we have had over air transport policy in the last while, including colourful little gallops across the television screen with the present Minister of Transport, and charges here and charges there. One minute we feel T.C.A. and C.P.A. might amalgamate and the next minute we are getting balloons, I suppose, lifting with suggestions that no, it is a new kind of co-operation; and lately we have had the balloon that really in the air transport field the private carrier and private enterprise seem to be the answer. All I can say is that there is a considerable element of confusion, particularly in policy terms. This is not a major bill. We support it. In many ways we are not capable of arguing a great deal against it; but that is largely where it stands.

I have one suggestion to make, Mr. Chairman, that is not relevant to the bill but is directed to the Minister of Transport and the representatives of the Department of Finance. It is that in future, if we have to have more bills of this kind, they be sent to the public accounts committee where we would have the advice and guidance of the Auditor General. It is quite apparent that the Auditor General has views in this regard. I do not know how far he would like his arm to reach in assisting parliamentarians, but I have certainly had the impression from his comments about the C.B.C. and other crown agencies that he feels—and I certainly have felt, as a member of the committee at the times I have been a member of it—that the committee and the Auditor General together can do a good job in taking a look at these financial requirements of great agencies: I think this bill in particular is one that could go to the public accounts committee, be handled there very quickly and come back with more intelligent treatment, analysis, comment and recommendations than we can provide in this chamber, with the way the bill moves through it.

The last point I wanted to make in connection with the bill relates to the position of Air Canada as it seems to be involved in the C.N.R., with the C.N.R. as the financing agency. It is a very minor point, but it seems to me it is about time, in terms of the maturity of Air Canada as a company and because of its financial abilities, and that at least in the foreseeable future it seems to have a revenue possibility that is excellent, the government considered allowing it to make its own financial arrangements completely by itself, rather than operating through Canadian National Railways. I know that at the present time this is just a service that is offered by Canadian National Railways and there are no strings to this; but it seems to me that in the interests of clearness, even if it is just to stop the annual question in our parliamentary committee that examines the C.N.R. and T.C.A.—which indicates the confusion of all members of parliament about this—we might achieve something by making that separation.

There is one point about Canadian National Railways and all other crown agencies of this kind that has always bothered me, and I know the Minister of Transport has spoken about it a number of times. I refer to the boundary line between administration and policy, and the whole question of what rights or responsibilities fall upon the House of Commons and its members with regard to the crown agencies. The difficulty we have is to ascertain where administration stops and policy begins; there is a grey area here. The minister reports for Canadian National Railways and reports to Canadian National Railways when issues are raised in the house. The railway reports to him when it has certain matters to raise aside from the financing. Yet we are never very sure what the position of the House of Commons itself is with regard to this question. I can underline this point by the fact that it does not seem to matter, when we review the annual report of the C.N.R., whether any report comes back to the house from the committee with any recommendations. It just seems to be a routine that we go through, which recognizes that there should be provided some sort of a talk forum where we can probe the president of Canadian National Railways; but it suggests to me that we actually have no real power to make recommendations with regard to policy; that all we can do, in a sense, is advance ideas and we really cannot put forward policy recommendations.

I would suggest that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport between them —particularly in connection with very large expenditures such as are covered in this bill and those they bring forward regularly—might consider this problem and see if they cannot provide us with a clear indication as to the rights of the House of Commons, or parliament, if you want, as an institution to examine, scrutinize and recommend in connection with these two very important agencies, C.N.R. and T.C.A. I hope the bill has a speedy passage today, Mr. Chairman, and I hope that at least one or two of my comments may have found some response or echo with the Minister of Transport. As I say, it is not his bill; but some of us are living in hopes that he may be that good Minister of Transport that we have dreamed about.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, every year a bill is introduced to authorize the Canadian National Railways to make certain capital expenditures allowing them to provide for some financial needs. The amount for the year 1964 is $155 million. As the year 1964 is almost ended, even though the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) asks us to accept this expenditure for 1964, I believe that the greater part of this amount has already been spent and that we are only called upon to approve it in principle.

On the other hand, the farmers throughout this country will not even receive the sum of $80 million in subsidies. None the less, we know that agriculture constitutes an urgent problem. I quote those figures in order to point out that the federal government should spend the money of Canadian taxpayers more judiciously.

We are not told why those $155 million are needed. Naturally, only the total amount is mentioned; but I am somewhat concerned about the fact that this amount of money is handed over to the Canadian National Railways which can spend it in any way it chooses, while we know that for some years the C.N.R. has been invading a field of operations for which it was not intended in Canada. Let us examine more specifically its intrusion in the field of trucking.

There is in Canada a very well organized industry, which carries on business efficiently, gives work to thousands and even tens of thousands of Canadian citizens who pay income tax, which allows Ottawa to collect substantial amounts in company profits; it is the trucking industry. The Canadian National Railways, and not the "truckers", were intended to weld the various sections of the country. The C.N.R. has in the last few years gone into the trucking business, while private industry was well able to give adequate service in this field.

It is thanks to government income taxes, the citizens' income taxes and also taxes levied on trucking concerns, that the C.N.R. has started to compete with the trucking industry. Taxes collected from the trucking industry are handed over to the C.N.R., which uses that money to compete with the trucking industry which was operating to the satisfaction of all.

Out of the funds which we are now asked to vote, what amount will be used by the C.N.R. to purchase trucks and to set up truck routes throughout Canada, in other words, to compete with the Canadian trucking industry?

It would certainly be interesting to know that, because if we are asked to vote millions of dollars to enable the C.N.R. to compete with private enterprise, the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance might as well know that we cannot go along with that. However, if the Canadian National Railways intend to use those funds to improve other services they operate exclusively, then it will be more acceptable.

The C.N.R. have a deficit of approximately $60 million a year and in addition, they get an additional amount of about $86 million during the year in the form of subsidies and grants of all kinds. But since subsidies are being paid to the C.N.R. for the transportation of feed grain under the pretext of enabling farmers to pay less, why not pay the same subsidies to the trucking industry? As a matter of fact, for instance, a farmer of the Saguenay-Lake St. John district who wants to buy feed grain will have to get it in Montreal in order to take advantage of the grants paid to the C.N.R. to reduce his cost price, because there are no trains running between Montreal and Lake St. John, and the trucks serving this run do not get similar subsidies. Then, the farmer will pay more for his feed grain because subsidies are only granted to assist one and not all transport companies.

I should like to submit to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) who proposes resolutions to approve C.N.R. expenditures, that the C.N.R. has an important role to play, that of linking together the various parts of the country. This is very important. The C.N.R. could be a determining factor in the economic development of our country but it would not be desirable that every action be taken to the prejudice of private enterprise or other segments of our economy, as is the case today, for instance, against the trucking industry.

It is true that the Minister of Transport has not been at the head of that department for very long, but I think that he should delve more deeply into the matter when discussing the part the C.N.R. should play and its possible illogical competition with private enterprise in various fields.

This is what I heard the president of the C.N.R., Mr. Donald Gordon, say at a sessional railway committee meeting; "As president of the Canadian National Railways, whenever I am able to make a 5 per cent profit, I shall do so." That is an excellent aim, because this is a crown company for which he is trying to make as much profit as he can. He is working in the best interests of Canadian citizens as a whole. On the other hand, it must be said that this should not be done at the expense of other areas of our economy, because it does not make sense to improve one field to the detriment of another.

It is the responsibility of the Department of Transport to make sure that improvements in certain sectors are not made to the prejudice of others, but that as much co-operation is given to each of them.

That is not what is happening today. The Canadian National Railways compete strongly with the trucking industry as well as with the hotels and travel agencies, etc.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister should ask the directors of the Canadian National Railways to stick as much as possible to the aims for which they were established and to stop meddling ceaselessly into fields over which they do not necessarily have jurisdiction.

The proposed resolution mentions also:

—and to raise the limit on the Canadian National Railway Company's authority to refund matured, maturing and callable securities from the present level of $480,000,000 to $680,000,000.

I am of the opinion that this is an indication of the refinancing of the debt of the Canadian National Railways of which Mr. Donald Gordon, the president of the company, told us about for quite a while.

In this connection, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) or the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Pennell) if, prior to going ahead with this refinancing, the whole matter will be referring to the railway committee.

Mr. Chairman, I think the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance did not hear my question as he was talking with the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette). I would draw the attention of the member for Lotbinière to the fact that this is no time to ask for patronage from the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance; he should let him listen to all the questions we are putting to him.

Canadian National Railways

Mr. Chairman, my question was this: Could the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance tell us if before undertaking the refinancing of the C.N.R. we will have an opportunity of discussing the refinancing procedure in the standing committee on railways, or any sessional committee, so that we may hear witnesses who are interested in this refinancing or affected by the effects it would entail?

We are being asked today to approve an increase in the C.N.R. appropriations when we know that the money, or at least a large part of it, has been spent and that C.N.R. deficits are met, in one way or another, by the government. Although this approval is only a technicality, an approval after the fait accompli, I would nevertheless ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance to tell the president of the C.N.R. that even if we are voting money in this way, without knowing why, we would still like to have some assurance that this money will not be spent on trucking facilities to compete with a private Canadian industry which is doing quite well.

Mr. Chairman, even if we allow the C.N.R. to increase by $200 million the maximum amount of securities due or to become due which it may redeem, we think the matter should nevertheless be referred to a committee before C.N.R. refinancing begins.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. McIlraith (for Mr. Gordon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-137, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain capital expenditures of the Canadian National Railways system for the period from the 1st day of January, 1964 to the 30th day of June, 1965, and to authorize the guarantee by Her Majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railways Company.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): When shall the said bill read a second time; now?

Mr. Grégoire: At the next sitting.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, is it the wish of hon. members that we go ahead with this?

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Grégoire: We have not seen the bill as yet.

Mr. Lambert: No, Mr. Speaker, we have not seen this bill.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the bill could be read a second time at the next sitting of the house or later this day, as the case may be.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Speaker, in this regard I should like to point out that there were certain questions raised at the resolution stage. I think the parliamentary secretary should answer these questions at the second reading stage. Since we do not have the bill it would be useless for us to go ahead at this stage.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am not asking hon. members to go ahead now, I am merely asking that second reading be ordered for the next sitting of the house or later this day, as the case may be.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, we are opposed to that suggestion in view of the fact that we have not seen the bill. We have not had any opportunity to consider the bill, and there are certain questions to be answered by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. I think second reading should be given at the next sitting of the house. We have completed two stages already today.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, obviously the hon. member does not understand the effect of the procedure I requested. He is saying the same thing I said. I asked that the bill be read a second time at the next sitting of the house or later this day, as the case may be. If it is agreeable to hon. members we might call it later today, but that probably will not be the case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Is it agreed that the bill be read a second time at the next sitting of the house or later this day, as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SHIPPING

REPEAL OF NEWFOUNDLAND ACTS RESPECTING HARBOURS AND PILOTAGE

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-40, to repeal certain acts of the province of Newfoundland respecting harbours and pilotage.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I might say that the only purpose of this bill is to carry out one of the terms of union. It was felt that certain Newfoundland statutes should be carried on for a period of time. That was provided for in the terms of union. It was felt that in due course they would be repealed. I think it would be much easier if we go into committee to explain one or two small details by way of answers to questions asked by hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Batten in the chair.

On clause 1—Repeal of the outport pilots and pilotage acts.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I think we should follow the procedures outlined in the amendments to the rules, that when a bill calls for merely a short title—I am sorry, I thought there was a short title.

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no short title; in fact it has no title at all.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport one question in this regard. I think I know the answer to my question but I should like to have it recorded. Has the province of Newfoundland agreed to all of these changes?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have done my best to ascertain that, and it is my understanding that there is no objection at all. When this legislation has been passed, as hon. members will see by reading the last clause, it will be brought into force by proclamation after consultation not only with the provincial authority, but with any individuals who must necessarily be consulted in order to make the transition. This bill simply makes the ordinary laws of Canada apply to Newfoundland, as they now apply to other provinces.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask one question for clarification. I freely admit that I have not gone into this matter very deeply. It is a matter that affects the minister more closely than perhaps it would someone from the west coast. I recall being on a committee a number of years ago which considered circumstances surrounding the certification of masters and other deck officers of ships in the coasting trade. One aspect of our discussion at that time had to do with the advisability of the length of the transitional period with which certain individuals might have to comply as a result of the application of the general laws of Canada.

As I recall it, the committee finally came to agreement and parliament later took the appropriate action. It continued under the general laws of Canada provision for certain differences in respect to certain qualifications and other matters covering those engaged in the coastal trade in Newfoundland.

I notice this bill makes particular reference to the pilotage authorities. I am wondering whether it will abolish any such arrangements or whether there may be any question of the desirability of the continuance, under special provision of the laws of parliament, of arrangements with respect to people acting in that capacity in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course certificates for masters and mates would come under the Canada Shipping Act, and not under this legislation which applies only to pilots.

Mr. Lambert: This may be merely a legal quibble, but could the minister tell us when the outports, pilots and pilotage act, being chapter 215 of the statutes of Newfoundland, was passed? This is not an act which was passed by the Newfoundland legislature since 1949. It is one which predates confederation.

Mr. Pickersgill: They have revised all their statutes since confederation and they had to re-enact, as we do when we revise our statutes, all those that were still in operation; and if they had not included this one in their revised statutes there would not be any law on this. This is a layman's interpretation but I think I am right. My hon. friend from St. John's West is here. He is a learned lawyer and will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Lambert: The purpose of my question was to make sure that we are not, by inadvertence, repealing an act of that legislature which was passed since confederation.

Mr. Cashin: Under term 18 of the union of Newfoundland with Canada those acts prior to confederation remained in force. Certain acts came under federal jurisdiction, and it was suggested in the other place that it may have been inappropriate for the provincial government to have re-enacted these statutes in 1952 because the authority in this field lies with this parliament and not with the provincial government.

Mr. Olson: Does this parliament have authority to repeal an act passed by the legislature of Newfoundland?

Mr. Pickersgill: This relates to the constitution, and it is quite clear that any provincial statute which falls within the ambit of section 91 of the B.N.A. Act could only be repealed by this parliament. We had an example last session when the Newfoundland Savings Bank Act had to be repealed. The bank was sold to one of the chartered banks and we were told that for some legal reasons the act had to be repealed. It could not be repealed by the provincial legislature, and since harbours and pilotage are matters which come exclusively within the jurisdiction of this parliament it is only this parliament which could alter such statutes.

OTTAWA TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY

IMPLEMENTATION OF AGREEMENT RESPECTING RAILWAY RELOCATION

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if the house will agree, I have asked my hon. friend, the member for Russell (Mr. Tardif) to speak on this bill because the terminal is to be located in his constituency. He has familiarized himself with the bill and I know he could give a better explanation than I.

Mr. Paul Tardif (Russell): Mr. Speaker, I wish I were as familiar with the bill to the extent the minister has given me credit. Not necessarily because of my efforts, but because it is logical that these improvements be placed in a proper setting, the new terminal will be located in my riding.

The purpose of the bill is to implement, with regard to the incorporation of a terminal railway company, the agreement for the relocation of railways in the Ottawa area dated October 17, 1963, between the national capital commission, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railway Company. I think it would be wise to give a few brief historic notes of how this came about.

The first commission that was appointed for the purpose of studying the railway problem in the capital city was established about 60 years ago when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was prime minister of Canada. At that time it was thought necessary to make plans to relocate the railways and to eliminate the circulation of railroads in and out of the centre of Ottawa, if the capital were to grow as it should. For that purpose a report was prepared by a commission in 1899. It was called the Ottawa improvement commission and, though it did not make a final plan it did make some recommendations that were incorporated in the last plan submitted to the national capital commission and the federal parliament. The plan I refer to is one involving the relocation of railway lines and their terminal.

In 1915 what is know as the Holt report was made, and confirmed what had originally been reported. Unfortunately the first world war stopped the implementation of this report and the plan was postponed for a period of about 20 years. At that time the national capital commission, which was interested in the development of a federal area, revised the plan because of the problem caused by the added traffic of railways in and out of the city, and again recommended to the federal government that the recommendations included in the original report be implemented. The railway and terminal facilities serving the city of Ottawa created many problems and at that time it was found that it would be logical to cure these things by implementing the report that had been made.

I know that hon. members who are here regularly, and who probably have been here longer this session than they have been before, realize that there are many problems created by the Ottawa river, the Rideau river, the Rideau canal and the fact that the city of Hull which is separated from the city of Ottawa uses these facilities provided by the central station. Not only do the comings and goings of trains in greater numbers create problems, but also depressed areas are created surrounding the tracks. About 1938 it was decided we should go about implementing this plan with greater speed. However, the second world war intervened and again delayed the implementation of the plan.

[Translation]

I hope members of parliament will understand, as I do, that even at this late date it is better to start immediately.

For this reason an agreement has been reached by the national capital commission, the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways so that the construction of the projected terminus may be started right away.

Specifications are ready. The ground is being prepared. Nothing, therefore, could prevent the carrying out of this program so that the necessary agreements may be signed by January 1, 1965.

[Text]

I know hon. members will realize it is imperative that this be done as quickly as possible if we are going to cure some of the problems that now exist and which should have been cured many years ago. These plans have been delayed because of wars and other happenings. The relocation plan is now progressing. The Canadian Pacific and Canadian National Railways are going to be shareholders in this new terminal. It is planned that this terminal will be situated about a quarter of a mile from Hurdman's bridge and about two miles from the parliament buildings. It is planned also to construct a route with four or six lanes, I am not sure which, from the new terminal to the Chateau Laurier or the centre of the city. If we are going to have the terminal constructed according to the schedule that has been decided upon, it is important that this bill be passed by the house. I would ask hon. members to do so now.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): The concern I have with the bill is really the objections that have been raised to it by the trucking interests. I do not know what substance there is in them, but I assume the minister or the hon. member for Russell have seen those objections and have a clear answer for us. I think the general assumption would be that this would be a non-contentious bill in that it is really a follow-up on the consultations for the creation of industry and transport and for the betterment of our national capital's appearance.

According to the truckers, if this new terminal company is given the powers which seem to be apparent in one of the clauses, the terminal company can initiate trucking and transfer services and provide total warehouse services. One can understand their concern. I think perhaps we can see this most clearly, not because the Canadian National is in the trucking business in various lines, not because the Canadian Pacific is in the trucking business in various lines, but because under this measure they are operating together in a terminal. The truckers feel that if this presages a co-operative move on the part of the two railways using the Ottawa terminal, with the very great rights given to them by this bill, then in effect the Ottawa operation, according to the truckers' interpretation, could become the centre of a completely new kind of trucking operation and terminal operation that has no precedent in Canada.

This is the only question I wanted to raise particularly with regard to the bill. It does seem to me there is a problem here that we might have to explore. We have heard from the minister that he intends to repeal, or he has introduced a bill that will repeal the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, which is a form of co-operative bill that was supposed to set up the framework for co-operation. Now, it seems, since we understand that repeal is coming, we have a bill that brings the two of them together in concert again in this Ottawa terminal. I just wondered whether any consideration was given at any time to putting the terminal company, in terms of management, directly into the hands of one company or the other.

The minister may wonder why I bring this up. Perhaps he will recall the situation in connection with the hotel Vancouver. Mr. Gordon himself has told us in committee about that co-operative operation and said that it did not work because the terms had altered with the years. Again, I should like to have some indication from the minister as to what consideration was given in drawing up this bill to possible difficulties between the two companies, and whether there had been any consideration given to perhaps making the Ottawa terminal railway company an offshoot of Canadian National with some regulations carried in the bill to give Canadian Pacific a place. This is one of the things I would be interested in hearing from the minister that we were not given by the hon. member for Russell—and I am not trying to be critical of him. The other thing about which I would like to hear from the minister relates to the disposal of the assets that already exist, and what relationship they may have to his new organization and to the government.

I hope these do not seem like pettifogging questions, but I thought they would be worth raising now, and then we could go into the individual clauses of the bill very quickly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if there would be a disposition to give second reading to the bill so we could study it in committee this evening? I am grateful to the hon. gentleman for raising these questions, but I would really need someone in front of me to assist me in dealing with them.

Mr. Lambert: I think I should like to say a few words on this bill. It is one of the bills about which I think I am right on my procedure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then, I imagine it is six o'clock, sir.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this day is as follows: The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox; veterans affairs—announcement of increase in pensions and allowances.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

OTTAWA TERMINAL RAILWAY COMPANY

IMPLEMENTATION OF AGREEMENT RESPECTING RAILWAY RELOCATION

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pickersgill for the second reading of Bill No. S-33, to incorporate the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): There are a couple of points I should like to make in connection with the bill before us at this stage. The first has some connection with a point which was made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). I refer to the powers which are granted to the company to provide terminal facilities.

The railways have been slipping into certain practices in terminals in various cities in Canada which have had a serious effect on local cartage companies. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the railways have got into the road transportation side of distribution to a considerable extent. Not only have they got into interprovincial, long range trucking but they also carry on local trucking operations. I am aware of instances where the railways have engaged in what might be called loss leader practices by offering to distribute goods arriving at terminals at rates which are much lower than the economic rates in effect through the local cartage companies. The railways are in a position to do this, because in their entire operations these cartage losses boil up into a general soup of losses against which are provided certain subsidies. True enough, the C.P.R. does not operate at a loss but it is able to offset losses connected with some of its terminal activities through subsidies which exist for freight rate equalization and so on.

I am wondering whether this bill will not encourage the practice to which I have just referred. Clause 10 of the bill gives authority for the provision of terminal facilities and there are any number of powers granted in this connection. I should like the minister to tell us whether it is the intention of the railway companies to engage in this practice of undercutting through the use of terminal facilities. The local cartage companies would be most surprised if they were suddenly to find that the Ottawa Railway Terminal Company had turned into one of their chief competitors to such an extent that they were losing a large proportion of their business.

After all, we should seek to ensure that local businesses are strong and flourishing. There is no point in granting large companies the power to engage in certain activities just for the satisfaction of putting local enterprises out of business. I know there is a very arguable case for the railways endeavouring to run an efficient operation. We all say three cheers to that. But what is the over-all price we shall be asked to pay to create this efficient framework, this efficient operation? The purchase price may be somewhat too high.

This is the main observation I have to make. Perhaps as we go along, as we get to clause 10, we can get some further information.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): There are one or two points I wish to make. First we should like to know how much this relocation of the terminal in Ottawa will cost the federal government, and ultimately the taxpayers of Canada. This question has been asked before, and I presume the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) is prepared to answer it.

I do not really have any objection to the setting up of this Ottawa Terminal Railway Company for the purpose of relocating the railway terminal, in other words moving it from the downtown area to a location somewhere in the constituency of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Tardif). But if the House of Commons decides this is a desirable action to take, the government should be prepared to offer at least some kind of co-operation to those other cities in Canada which want to do exactly the same thing. I know that the city of Calgary has been attempting to enter into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway to move its terminal from the downtown area to the outskirts of the city, thereby making available for commercial and industrial exploitation a very large area which is now being used for switch yards, freight terminals and so on.

I think the three prairie provinces, which are now handicapped because of the provisions of the statute of 1881 exempting the railways from paying taxes on their main lines, are entitled to equal consideration when they wish to proceed with this kind of redevelopment within their city limits. After all, the provisions of this bill, if you read the memorandum of understanding made between the national capital commission, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railway Company, require under clause 22 of the memorandum of understanding:

> The commission will pay all costs and expenses incurred by the National Railways, Pacific Railway and Terminal Railway
> (a) in development and preparation of plans, specifications, deeds, surveys, descriptions, applications and agreements;

The commission will also be required to pay all the costs in effecting the transfers of land referred to in this memorandum, including registration fees, land transfer taxes and municipal taxes that have been paid for any period after the land has been vacated or operations thereon abandoned by the railway, whichever is the earlier. The national commission is also required to pay all the costs in carrying out any other work that the railway companies may be required to do as a result of this memorandum or that the commission may lawfully require the railway companies to perform. We know that the national capital commission gets most, if not all, of its funds from the federal government, and it certainly seems to me that because the federal parliament is now disposed to paying huge sums of money—we do not know exactly how much it would cost, but I presume it would cost several millions of dollars to relocate the railway terminal in Ottawa to, if I may put it this way, dress up the city and make the downtown area more attractive, perhaps to have a more efficient and attractive railway terminal some place away from the downtown area in Ottawa—the federal government should also be disposed to taking the kind of action that would be necessary in order that some of the cities in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta may also do this.

We know that because of this statute of 1881 the railways have acquired certain lands that are classified as main lines within the downtown area of cities in these three provinces, which gives the C.P.R., and I presume also the C.N.R., a very strong bargaining position in effecting any transfers of land with the end result of enhancing downtown areas. I do not want to speak for very long on this matter but, as is well known to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), to the government and particularly, I might say, to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon), the premiers of the three western provinces have made representations to the Minister of Finance and to the government to have this statute of 1881 repealed so they can be on equal ground, if you want to call it that, and can bargain from a position equal to that of the railways. We know there has not been any action taken by the government to give effect to the representations that have been made. As a matter of fact the premiers of the three western provinces have made at least one, and I think more than one, trip to Ottawa to meet with the government and lay their case before them; and so far no action has been taken.

It seems to me that to be fair these three provinces ought to have some action taken by the federal government to remove this discriminatory statute that does in fact exempt the main line of the railways in only those three provinces; because after all, in all the other parts of Canada railways do have to pay taxes on their main lines. I believe that if we are prepared to spend several millions of dollars to remove this terminal from the downtown area in Ottawa to some place on the outskirts, we ought at least to ask the government to take the necessary action so that those three western provinces may also proceed in their negotiations with the railway company, and do exactly the same thing in some of the cities where there has been an expressed desire to enhance the downtown area by moving out the railway terminal and some of the side tracks that are there. When we get to the committee stage, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask some more questions along this line, but I raise these points now so that the minister may prepare himself to answer some of them.

Ottawa Terminal Railway Company

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I know there are reasons why the station in Ottawa should be moved out into the country, and perhaps not the best one is the fact that the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Tardif) represents the new location of that station. But I wonder if we have really weighed the reasons for moving this station and whether it is to the advantage of members of parliament, people who deal with the government of the nation, or even the people of Ottawa themselves. We all know that people going to Montreal today—and I am told that most members are well aware of this; maybe they will not say anything—very seldom fly to that city. It takes longer to go to the airport here and from the airport at the other end than it does to get on the train a block from the parliament buildings and arrive downtown in the heart of Montreal. People coming into this national capital can come in one of three ways. If they wish to fly, they land at Uplands airport, a number of miles out of town, and find themselves, after a long, very rough taxi ride, in the downtown area. Those that come by car of course have many ways in which to get into what is a confused city for tourists; but they eventually find their way downtown to where they wish to do business, particularly those interested in the government aspect of this city. But those who come by train do not have any trouble in getting to the downtown part of Ottawa and usually—and fortunately, compared with most other cities—are able to leave the station and be in the downtown section or this area in a short period of time.

I am well aware that Charlotte Whitton wants to use this little area down here for a theatre; she has said so on numerous occasions. But I really could not care less what she wants to do with it. I, as a traveller coming into Ottawa for many, many years, have always been very happy with the fact that the railroad went downtown; that it was in the major section of the city, and I have always considered this to be a big advantage to anyone coming into Ottawa to do government business. It is not difficult to explain to people how to get to the parliament buildings if they arrive by train, because when one walks out of the station he can see them. I am quite well aware that we are going to have a new edifice out on Industrial avenue, but to get to Industrial avenue means a long bus ride or, if one is coming to the city, a very confused trip by taxi or other means to get downtown to the business section.

I would be opposed to the railway moving the station out of this area. In my opinion they have some responsibility to the public that travels on the railroad, although there has certainly been less regard for the travelling public over the last few years than there has been to other revenue inducing parts of their enterprise. I am doubly surprised at this bill and I think I have support across the country in violently opposing a move to make the Canadian public pay for closing down the station in the downtown section of Ottawa, where it has been located since it was constructed, and relocating it out in the country. I cannot think of anything more silly than having one of our major transportation connection lines moved from a very advantageous position as far as the seat of the national parliament is concerned—it is only about a block away—to some place a great many miles out in the country. There is no point in talking about the roads which will connect it to the city because anyone who has driven on the roads in that area knows that a small car almost disappears during the course of the journey.

I am sure very little consideration has been given to the wishes of the Canadian public in this matter, particularly those of the public who travel by rail. If hon. members refer to the memorandum attached to the bill they will find the commission felt that in the interest of the national capital commission development plan it was advisable to relocate the station. I have discussed this matter with several members of the national capital commission when I have attended certain functions and have been able to raise the matter, and they just laugh and say there is nothing anyone can do about it. And I think that is true. I do not think there is a thing in the world that I can do about this and I do not think there is anything the Minister of Transport can do about it either. I think this move has been in contemplation for some time and probably it will come to pass. However, I do suggest that those who in their wisdom many years ago brought the railroads into the heart of the city were providing a service to the travelling public which we are not giving consideration to now.

I realize that the railway could not care less about its passengers. Anyone who has travelled on the C.N.R. finds that the accommodation is lousy. He will find that sometimes there is no one on the train who can tell why the train is running six or seven hours late, which happens periodically. It is matters like this which illustrate that the convenience of the travelling public is not given any consideration. However, let me just say that personally I am violently opposed to the relocation of the station from where it is now to somewhere out in the country. I would think that every hon. member of this house would have a hole in his head to vote for something which is not in his interest, is not in the interest of his constituents who may be using this facility, and no hon. member should be stupid enough to provide the money to make such a transfer.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, to adopt some well worn words, I did not intend to take part in this debate. But since the opportunity has arisen I do want to take a few minutes to express my views on this particular bill.

I have found myself wondering during the past two or three years whether this plan to relocate the union station away from the central part of Ottawa is a good and sound plan in its present context. I think there is no doubt that ten or 15 years ago, when railway trains were hauled by steam engines which were generally considered to be dirty for a downtown section of any city, because of the coal dust and other deposits they blew into the air, and with their noisy whistles disturbing people in the downtown section, there was a very good argument for relocating a railway station somewhere else than the centre of a city. However, there has been quite a change since then. Diesels are now used 100 per cent on all railways which use this station. These diesels are quiet and they are clean, so I think that the objection based on that particular approach, if there ever was one, has now disappeared. I wonder whether second thoughts might have been given to the situation which existed five or ten years ago when the plan was originally formulated.

The second matter I want to raise is this. It is a fact that the present location of the station is very convenient for the travelling public, not only for those who handle freight and express but for passengers who come into the city and find themselves immediately in the downtown section. I should not be surprised if not very many years hence we were wishing we had this station right down in the centre part of the city of Ottawa. There is everything to be said for keeping it where it is, although objection might be taken to the appearance of the station. Frankly I do not see where relocation of the railway tracks will be of any benefit. At present they run along a natural break in the landscape, just by the canal to a large extent. There does not seem to be any logical reason for this change, except the fact that a larger and probably more desirable complex of buildings could be constructed further out.

When this plan was first proposed some years ago, somewhere around the time I first came here, I saw the plan which had been prepared by the national capital commission. At that time it looked like a good thing to get this dirty railway station and all the railway trains out of the downtown section. But those who travel by air know that it is becoming more and more inconvenient to get to airports and similar facilities on the outskirts of cities.

I am not going to go as far as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and vote against this bill. I am not an Ottawan, except to the extent that one becomes more or less a citizen of Ottawa after being here for a few years. Nevertheless I do express some very serious doubts about the necessity for establishing a whole new complex in a location which will require us to make use of buses, taxis and other less convenient methods of transport in order to reach it. I am not talking so much about the welfare of members of parliament here, because I do not think that those of us who are here should concern ourselves about this slight amount of inconvenience. However, this city is the focal point of the travels of a good many people in diplomatic service, industry, and commerce of all kinds, and I think we should do something to make it less inconvenient for them when they are called upon to use the station. Therefore I express this very slight protest at this entire situation.

I assume that serious consideration has been given to this proposal. Also there may be other factors of which I am not aware. But I think that if the present building were put in good shape we would be no worse off because we have railway tracks running alongside the canal than we would be by having a road, which I do not think would be any more convenient.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words about this bill. This seems to be another step on the part of the railroad industry to, in one way or another, reduce services to the public at an increased cost, without any real benefit to the transportation system. By accepting figures presented by railroad officials we are in the position of not knowing their goals, or even the direction in which they are moving.

Mr. Speaker, the various acts in respect of railway operations would lead us to believe that railway companies are established to provide services. That is apparently their main and ultimate aim. Officials of the C.N.R., in particular, have said on many occasions that they believe the only profit making part of their operations is the moving of bulk cargoes. When the situation reaches the point where that is the actual fact, I am sure these same officials will tell us that even that side of their operations is no longer profitable.

The ultimate result of the measure now under discussion will be the transporting of fewer and fewer passengers from and to the terminal facilities in Ottawa. I suggest that is the apparent present day trend throughout the country. It has appeared to the general public for a number of years that the aim of railway companies is to cut down on costs, and to effect increased savings, with the inevitable result of a lessening in the number of services provided. This move has led to proportionate reductions in revenue. At the same time the railway companies decrease their costs, services and general expenditures, they increase their capital outlays.

In relation to the present measure before us, the terminal is being moved from the centre of the city, causing a complete rerouting of present line facilities, and creating increased capital costs and decreased services, with the net result of a decrease in passenger revenue. I should like to know where this trend is likely to end. We as legislators must ask ourselves this kind of question. I do not have a bone to pick in respect of railway services provided here in Ottawa, but my contention is that this measure is just one more example of what railway companies have been doing during the past five, six and even ten years.

What do the officials of railway companies expect to accomplish by expending a great deal of money for rerouting present lines, and relocating terminals? Is the provision of a new decentralized elaborate rail transportation terminal going to increase passenger travel and passenger revenue? Will the measure now before us bring about a new agreement as to the use of the Ottawa terminal by the two railway systems now servicing Ottawa? Will the two railway systems be able to economize as a result of the adoption of this measure?

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Mr. Speaker, the only logical answer to the questions I have posed is that this measure will accomplish none of these things. It may enhance the city of Ottawa in an aesthetic way. It will undoubtedly cause the removal of some unsightly track locations in the downtown area. Surely these unsightly locations could be improved without the necessity of a huge capital expenditure to move the passenger terminal from the centre of the city. Surely the same result could be obtained by a different and less costly method.

We have been told that the C.N.R. passenger traffic, particularly, and we assume this is at least partially true of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is decreasing, yet we are proposing under this measure to establish a railway terminal company which will be allowed to spend a huge sum on capital acquisition for the handling of passenger traffic to and from Ottawa. This is a small measure, but in view of these facts I think it should be considered seriously. It should be considered in light of the general trend on the part of transportation companies to cut down on service facilities in order to effect certain economies.

Mr. Speaker, many royal commissions have studied the question of railway operating costs. I do not intend to discuss this subject in depth at this stage, as it is very complicated and involves formulae in respect of costing maintenance and per mile passenger operations. The present measure is a perfect example of another means by which the railway companies generally feel they can cut down on costs. By moving their terminals to outlying areas I suggest they will lose revenue as the result of the loss of passenger travel because of the inconvenience and loss of service.

This result has been apparent time and time again in the case of highway construction on the fringe of towns and cities, and the decentralization of air terminals. One can visit almost any part of Canada and observe the construction of highways and airport terminals in areas some distance removed from the centre of cities. These decentralization operations are in time accompanied by a general move of other services from the centre of cities. In the case now under consideration I suggest it is only a matter of time before the new terminal is surrounded by housing and industrial developments. Time and time again we observe the construction of highways at the edge of small towns and cities, only to observe within a very few years that they are again bordered and surrounded by communities which have moved from original downtown locations. I suggest in the present case within a short period of time the new Ottawa terminal will be encompassed by a heavy build-up of homes and industries.

The officials of the railways may believe that they are accomplishing something by this present measure, but I suggest they will accomplish very little as a result of the expenditure of this large amount of money, and I support my contention by the words of the officials of the company concerned. They tell us their passenger revenues are decreasing. Do they expect to increase passenger revenue by increasing the inconvenience to passengers and decreasing services?

Mr. Speaker, I have very little more to say about this measure, but I should like to point out as a warning that the present transitional trend on the part of railway companies, which is particularly apparent in the prairies, where rail line abandonments are being considered, will in one way or another cut down on services, thereby decreasing revenues generally to the point where it is no longer feasible to continue any attempt to provide these decreased services. I am wondering whether this situation is not once again evident in the case presently being considered.

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I shall only take a few minutes to present my views on this subject. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) made reference to exemptions from taxation in respect of certain railway properties at certain locations in Canada. He made reference to the fact that no uniform policy is followed. I think we are all aware of this. I cannot find the exact provision in the bill but I understand that this particular company will be paying municipal taxes to the municipalities in which these properties are located.

In the Atlantic provinces the railways only acknowledge a liability on a sort of voluntary grant basis equal to 50 per cent of the real property tax in the Atlantic region. They do so on the ground that the I.C.R. was a crown corporation and therefore enjoyed the protection of those provisions of the B.N.A. Act which exempt crown property from taxation. Here we have a railway company, a crown corporation, engaging in a venture with a private railway company, the Canadian Pacific, and jointly they will undertake certain developments. It is true that the national capital commission has certain responsibilities in the matter but the fact still remains that municipal taxation is a liability of this new company.

Ottawa Terminal Railway Company

Recently when the operations of Canadian National Railways were being reviewed by the railway committee I endeavoured to obtain from Mr. Donald Gordon, president and general manager of the C.N.R., an undertaking that they would supply us with a general statement of the different reasons across the nation for the differing kinds of municipal tax liabilities which they have undertaken to discharge and meet. The president of the company felt this was a matter that concerned the railway company and the municipalities involved and I believe he took the view that as a crown company he was in much the same position as a private company and should not be disclosing any helpful information to the railway committee with regard to this matter.

The result is that those of us who seek a correction of this inequality in municipal taxation, so far as the railways are concerned, are compelled to come to the house and seek assurances from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) that correction of this inequity will be undertaken under the provisions of Bill No. C-120 if not at this time under this bill. I should like to know whether it is a fact that the properties to be held under the provisions of this bill by the Ottawa Terminal Railway Company will in fact be liable to municipal taxation. If so, does this mean that the fundamental law under which the C.N.R. denies liability for taxation in the Atlantic provinces is to be changed?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa.

Mr. S. J. Enns (Portage-Neepawa): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks lest it be regarded that objections to location of the terminal are of a partisan nature. I for one endorse relocation because I feel that the present location, especially the appearance of the railway station, is deplorable for a capital city. The station is almost a barnlike structure and I should like to pose this question to members for their consideration. Do any passengers really live in the station? With the exception of those who want to go to the Chateau Laurier, almost everyone else has to travel somewhere by taxicab and so far as ingress and egress are concerned there is an almost impossible situation at rush periods when one train after another is arriving.

I feel that to rebuild the station in its present location would require the acquisition of a good deal of expensive property and it seems to me that it makes a good deal of sense to relocate the station in an area where there is other land available. I doubt that relocation will make the new terminal much more than a 10 minute ride from downtown or parliament hill.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, there is only one question that arises in my mind, namely what is going to happen to the pigeons? I wonder whether the pigeons down at the old station are Liberal pigeons.

Mr. McIlraith: They are liberal in some respects.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, as the house is well aware it was not anticipated that we would have this bill before us today, and I think all members realize it is a bill with a lot of interest and significance. As I recall, a number of years ago there was a good deal of discussion in the house in respect of the whole question of the suitable development of the national capital and in particular the heart of the capital area. I listened to quite a number of speeches at that time in which the idea was put forward that it would be desirable to eliminate from the area of the Rideau canal in the central part of the city what some people considered to be rather unsightly railway trackage. However, as far as I can recall this subject has not really had any great attention either in the present parliament or the one immediately preceding. I take it that in the meantime the national capital commission has proceeded with the development of certain plans and that one of the fruits of their planning is the proposal we have before us tonight.

Apparently these plans have now been brought to a formal conclusion as far as the capital commission and the railway companies are concerned, but I am wondering whether they have really kept pace with some of the developments that have been taking place in the interval. I assume that the original idea of eliminating the railways from the heart of the city and building a new terminal was developed at a time when we were still in the steam age so far as railway transportation was concerned. In addition, I would also assume that the large volume of freight and the necessary space required for freight car trackage were factors in the desire to take steps to beautify the central part of the city.

I was somewhat impressed by some of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), and as he was speaking something else came to my mind, namely the conditions that exist in relation to the new terminal development in the city of Montreal, where one can arrive comfortably by train in the heart of the city and have ready access to the places he may wish to visit either on business or on pleasure. Inasmuch as I have the feeling that the present members of the house have not really given any detailed consideration to this matter, I wonder whether it would not be desirable to have a thorough parliamentary review of this whole question before the bill receives final passage by the house. I think we realize it has been considered in the other place and that if we take action upon it here that will in effect be the end of the matter. There are, I think, a good many considerations involved about which this house should be satisfied before that kind of action is taken.

I do not know what the minister may have in mind with regard to the further stages in the consideration of this bill. It does seem to me, however, there would be no harm in this bill being given a proper consideration by the members of this particular house. I know this subject matter was given careful consideration by many members of previous parliaments over a considerable period of time. It is with that thought in mind that I should like to place before the house, for its consideration, a motion which would ensure that sort of review by members of this house.

I should like to move:

> That this bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before Your Honour formally puts that motion, I wonder if the hon. member would consider the possibilities of having the bill referred after second reading? I think the hon. gentleman knows that if his motion is carried, this kills the bill under our rules. I do not know if that is his objective. If it is, of course, the government would have to oppose this motion. We would have to ring the bells and have a division. I do not believe that is what the hon. gentleman really wants. I believe he just wants to have this bill reviewed. If there were any general disposition in the house to have it reviewed, as soon as second reading is given I would move to have it referred to the committee on railways, at which time officials could be called and examined.

If the hon. gentleman feels that he must persist in his motion then, because his motion is one of want of confidence in the government, we would have no choice but to oppose it. I suggest to him that he be satisfied to have it referred after second reading. Several questions have been raised, and I would be glad to have the bill go to the committee where the officials from the national capital commission can be properly examined, and I really believe that would satisfy everything the hon. gentleman has in mind.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if you would permit me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I understood that the hon. member had already spoken on the amendment and I presume the minister was speaking on the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, sir, I was really speaking to a point of order. I hope there will be indulgence to treat the matter that way so we will not get into a procedural difficulty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni also speak on the point of order.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder if, in doing so, I could speak to the point of order by putting a question to the minister? The point of order relates to whether or not I formally put my amendment before the house and forwarded it to Your Honour. The question of order relates also to the consideration of what is involved in the passage of second reading of a bill. It is, in essence, approval in principle. Now, a question arises immediately in my mind as to whether the minister would be prepared to have this bill go before a committee of the house, where witnesses could be called and where such a review as members might wish of the subject matter could be properly made, and if it should develop that it was the considered view of the committee that some of the features of the plan were outdated or not applicable or should be altered in such a way as to comply with the suggestions that have been made concerning access for passengers to the heart of the city, would the government be willing to give the proper weight to that view of the committee? If that were so, I might be prepared—

Mr. Pickersgill: I can assure the hon. gentleman that any reasonable proposal from the committee will be considered most seriously. There is no question about that. I do urge him not to press the suggested amendment because it is a motion of want of confidence in the government which we would have to resist. I do not believe that is what the hon. gentleman wants to accomplish at all. I believe the hon. gentleman wants to send this bill to a place where he can get information from people much more competent than I am to give information. If they cannot satisfy him, he can oppose certain features of the bill, with the knowledge of what the considerations are with respect to it. I can assure him the government is not hidebound about this matter at all.

Mr. Barnett: May I just say one thing more on the question of the point of order? I agree with the minister that this subject matter, so far as I know, never has been nor do I think it should be, a matter of want of confidence in the government. Generally it has been a non-partisan matter in the sense that we are concerned with the future of the capital of Canada. Perhaps on these grounds, with the kind of understanding the minister has given to us as to the approach which he and his colleagues would be prepared to take to committee consideration, I might be prepared not to press my amendment in its present form, on the understanding the minister will take the initiative in referring it to the committee.

Mr. Lambert: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I must say we would not support any such amendment. In fact, if the government wishes to maintain the bill in the house, we are quite satisfied. We are prepared to deal with the issues here. In so far as whether or not it goes to a committee, I may say frankly we are quite prepared to deal with it in the house as it now stands.

Mr. Pickersgill: I want to thank both hon. members. While I am speaking, perhaps the whips could confer and if I am told when second reading is over there is a general desire to have this bill go to a committee, there will be no question about it: It will go. I will make a motion to have it go.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, is the minister now closing the debate?

Mr. Pickersgill: I don't know, sir; I thought I was speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Well, I suggest that the procedure has been a bit irregular and I feel we should now attempt to make the procedure conform to the rules. If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Mr. Lambert: On the point of order, has the amendment been withdrawn?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My understanding is that the amendment has not been put formally. However, to clarify the situation I suggest that unanimous consent be given to the hon. member to withdraw the amendment to the extent that it had been put to the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I should like to deal with the points that have been raised by various hon. members. The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), raised points which I think could be discussed more properly when the bill is before the committee. Quite frankly, I should not like to attempt to answer them at this stage.

There is one point of a general character that I should like to make right now, particularly if the bill is to go to a committee. The powers that it is proposed to confer upon this terminal company, which is a company to be owned jointly by the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, are powers that these two railways have separately and which they can exercise separately, I am advised, even if they were not given to the terminal company. They would not give the terminal company any power to engage in any general trucking or other services, but only deliveries from the terminal.

I think this is the point. It was suggested in the other place, I believe, that this terminal company should not be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada in respect of these particular services. My department took the view that it was sensible that these things should not be separated—that you should not put delivery services under provincial jurisdiction and the rest of the terminal under federal jurisdiction. And we were able to convince the hon. gentlemen of the other place of the soundness of this view.

Those are the main points with which I should like to deal, now. The others would be better considered in committee where we could be more precise about them. As to the points raised by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) and by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd), it is true that in most parts of the country the Canadian Pacific and the C.N.R., in respect to those lines of theirs which were once privately owned, are taxable, except that the Canadian Pacific has a statutory exemption from certain kinds of taxes in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, conferred by this parliament, and I believe in parts of Manitoba, conferred by the legislation of that province. It is also true that the premiers of those three provinces came to Ottawa some time ago and made representations to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and myself seeking to have these privileges removed from the railways. We are giving the most earnest, I might almost say anguished, consideration to this particular matter at the present time and while this consideration is being given I do not think it would be very helpful for me to go beyond what I have said.

As for the question raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd), the government owned railways were the property of the crown and, as such, under the constitution were not taxable by any other taxation authority. The companies have made some ex gratia payments in place of taxes but I know there has been a good deal of dissatisfaction about this matter. I have no doubt whatever it will be reviewed when we come to deal with the big railway bill. Having said that, I do not think I should go beyond it because I am sure hon. members will agree that it is not really relevant to the measure before us, though I do not blame either of the two hon. members for taking advantage of this opportunity to raise the point.

Other speakers have given the benefit of their views on this bill, either pro or con. The hon. member for Portage-Neepawa (Mr. Enns) was pro. I am not sure which side the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) was on. The others were con. The station is, of course, to be moved to a new site in the area where my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Tardif) lives and which, he tells me, he can reach without any trouble in ten minutes, though it often takes 15 minutes to get from here to the station in a taxi. I know from experience that this more rapid movement is due to the Queensway, and even this will be much improved when the station is moved.

I think some of us have forgotten that the basic decision to move the railway was taken in a previous parliament and under a previous government. The decision was made and the house voted money for it over the years. Most of the tracks have been moved already and if we now decided that a wrong decision had been made we would have to reverse a process upon which parliament decided a long time ago. All this particular bill does is to establish a terminal company to carry out a decision made long ago by parliament. If we had not wanted that decision to be taken, we should have resisted it a long time back.

The first decisions in this connection were made before I was a member of the government, and that goes back 11 years. At that time I did not think much of the idea. But the decision was made and a great deal of money has since been spent to carry it out. This bill represents, if not a final stage, then at least one of the later stages in that process. If we were to be tempted at this late stage to reverse that early decision we would want to look very carefully at what the cost would be, and I doubt whether many members, when they were in possession of all the facts, would wish now to follow a different course.

The whole question of relocation could more properly be discussed on the estimates of the national capital commission, but I do not see, if this bill is to go to a committee, why there should not be some examination of it there, too. In fairness to the railways—I am not their apologist but I do think one should have some regard for the facts in these matters—let me point out that the railways did not want to move at all. A lot of persuasion, a lot of arm twisting had to be applied to both railways before the move was agreed upon. The railways were conscious of the point raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) that it was probably easier to get passengers if they were located in the middle of the town. It was the town planners of the governments of the day, both the St. Laurent government and the Diefenbaker government, and this parliament which decided the railways ought to do this. And it was quite a hard job to get them to do it.

Mr. McIlraith: And it took a long time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, it took a long time. Any idea that this bill is the result of some conspiracy on the part of the railways to get an advantage is just unhistorical, that is all. I think we should look at the facts as they are.

I do not think there is anything more I have to say about the main points raised. Any other points could be dealt with in committee of the whole or in the railway committee, if members would prefer to have this bill referred to that committee. Perhaps I could have some indication of what I should do.

Mr. Barnett: The minister referred to an estimate of the length of time the member for Russell (Mr. Tardif) says it takes him to go there by taxi—

Mr. Pickersgill: In his own car.

Mr. Barnett: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman can give us an assurance that the hon. member for Russell is prepared to pay our taxi fares between the House of Commons and the station.

Mr. Tardif: Just in case my hon. friend agrees to that, perhaps you would allow me, Mr. Speaker, to tell the minister that this is one thing I do not want to undertake.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a notion there will be a very good bus service.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Do I understand it is the desire of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that we should send this bill to a committee? If it is, he having withdrawn his amendment, I will make the necessary motion right now.

Mr. Barnett: That is my desire.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then I move:

That Bill No. S-33 be sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could say a word. I believe there was some consultation at six o'clock or just before six o'clock and there was an understanding among the various parties that because of the nature of Bill S-7 and because if I may say so, no discussion of principle is involved—it is one of those bills amending a lot of sections of the act—if I made a very brief statement we would give it second reading. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), who was consulted about it, agreed to this. It was also agreed that I would then move that it be sent to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, with a distinct understanding that when it came back here, if there was any desire for any general debate on clause 1, the government would not in any way seek to restrict any proper debate.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT

AMENDMENTS TO GIVE EFFECT TO INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-7, to amend the Canada Shipping Act.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement of the minister that this bill will be referred to a committee, I will not make the remarks which I was otherwise going to make. But I do want to say that I do not think this is an unprincipled bill; there are a number of very important principles involved. All I want to say is that in the bill are principles which were included in a bill introduced in a previous session, and those sections were withdrawn by the then minister because the marine engineers on both the western and eastern coasts had not had an opportunity of appearing before the committee and making their representations. Could we have the assurance from the minister that there will be a sufficient period of time in order that all those concerned on both coasts may have time to have their representations made here, and that they will be notified as to the date of the meeting of the committee?

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be very happy indeed, Mr. Speaker, to do that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

HARBOURS

LEGISLATIVE PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF HARBOUR COMMISSIONS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-10, to provide for the establishment of harbour commissions.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am going to do something that I do not think I have ever done before in the house, and I hope I will never do it again. I am going to follow my notes pretty closely in dealing with second reading of this bill, because I had rather expected that my colleague and parliamentary secretary would be doing it, and he had to be absent this evening. While I think I have a pretty fair idea of the contents of the bill itself, I would like to put a little historical material on the record which I perhaps would not get absolutely right if I did not follow the notes rather closely.

There are, as hon. members know, three kinds of harbours in this country. A number of our greatest harbours are under the national harbours board. There are a great number of harbours that are under the direct jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. In between these two categories there are a certain number of harbours which are governed by harbour commissions, which could only in the past and up to the present be set up by separate acts of parliament. There are 11 harbours administered by harbour commissioners, appointed under individual acts of the federal parliament. These are Port Alberni, Nanaimo, North Fraser, New Westminster, Winnipeg and St. Boniface, one of our greatest harbours—

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: —Lakehead, Windsor, Hamilton, Toronto, Oshawa and Belleville. The original legislation setting up the harbour commissions at Toronto, Hamilton, New Westminster, North Fraser, Winnipeg and St. Boniface dates from the period 1911 to 1914; the remainder were set up at various dates between 1947 and 1960. This latter group of acts follows a more or less standard form, but it has been found that even the more recent acts need to be revised if certain policies which it has now been considered desirable to follow—and I think there has been nothing partisan about this—are to be applied.

The harbour commissions carry out functions which are initially the responsibility of the federal government and substantial financial contributions are made by the Department of Public Works to these harbour commissions through construction of facilities and dredging. In the course of improving surveillance and control of these commission harbours, it has been found by the Department of Transport that the old legislation needed to be modernized to take into account the increased pace of development of the last few years. In the case of the older acts, this is partly due to changed circumstances and changes in the pattern of shipping practices and freight handling. Certain changes in administration policy are necessary as a result of ad hoc arrangements made in the past, different treatment in different parts of the country, and some confusion and misunderstanding which has arisen once in a while in the management of these harbours. A consistent policy has now been evolved, particularly in relation to the sharing of costs of works in proportion to the ability of an individual harbour commission to contribute to its own development.

The more recent acts prohibit the use of revenue for capital works, although the commissioners may borrow for this purpose with the approval of the governor in council. This makes awkward the carrying out of the policy for the sharing of the costs of capital works. The authority of a commission with respect to harbour development requires more precise definition. The award of annual "surplus profits" to municipalities under the early acts, and to the federal government under more recent acts, has been found to militate against the initiative and enthusiasm of the local commissioners which is so necessary to an effective harbour advancement and development. The ultimate goal of a harbour commission is complete financial independence with all administration, maintenance and construction being financed from harbour revenues.

For these reasons, it is proposed to enact a new standard act which would correct these flaws and which would permit the Department of Transport to exercise a reasonable degree of control over these commissions while maintaining as far as possible the advantage of local administration and local initiative for which these commissions are especially valuable. The bill provides for the creation of new harbour commissions by order in council which would also define the limits of the harbour and the authorities having power to appoint the members of a commission. Similarly existing harbour commissions listed in the schedule to this act could be brought under the standard act as circumstances warrant. This is the procedure now used to create or amend public harbours under the Canada Shipping Act.

It seems to me, sir, that this is the general explanation, but I should like to say a word about application. It is proposed initially to make this act applicable to new harbours but it is also considered that some of the existing harbour commissions will wish to come under the provisions of this standard act. I think, however, that entering into detail of that kind would be much more appropriate in the committee. I think I should make one general observation. I know hon. members are always somewhat reluctant to confer upon the governor in council the power to do things that in the past have been done by parliament; but I do really think this is one case where parliament can very well be relieved of a power which has often been shirked by governments in the past. Because these bills, being of a local nature, did not command priority and often got put off from year to year, these harbours were not developed as rapidly as they might have been had more speedy action been taken. The parliamentary control is completely maintained because the governor in council may not depart from the standard provisions; so that there is no power that can be given these harbour commissions which is not conferred by the act itself.

In addition, I may say that very exhaustive examination was given this bill in the committee in the other place. I appeared there and I think the representatives of all the harbour commissions interested also appeared and got a very good hearing. Several changes were made in the bill in the other place to meet the representations which were made, and to the best of my knowledge there is no feeling now on the part of any existing harbour commission that its position would be in any way affected adversely by the passage of the present bill.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, and because I would not like to get a state of constipation, if I may put it that way, in the railway committee, I would hope that we could deal with this bill in committee of the whole and dispose of it this evening.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, on the surface this bill does appear to be somewhat arbitrary in giving the government power to take over the operation of any of the 300 harbours which might be affected, with the exception of the three taken out during the course of the bill's consideration in the Senate—namely, Toronto, Hamilton and Winnipeg-St. Boniface. The bill also permits the taking over of those commissions which are set out in the schedule to the bill. However, in assuming control of these harbours, if the government sees fit to take control, they also bear a certain amount of cost as well. Therefore it is fair to assume that the government will not rush in unnecessarily to take control of various harbours where the expenditure of money is involved.

There was a very long discussion of this particular bill in the Senate. In fact, the same bill was before the other place in the previous session as bill S-38, but never left the other place in the last session, after the exhaustive discussion which resulted in the harbour of the city of Toronto being excluded. The former bill died at prorogation of the last session.

Under the new bill now before us the harbours at Hamilton and Winnipeg-St. Boniface are also excluded. As the minister said, exhaustive consideration was given the bill in committee in the other place. That is true not only of Bill S-10 but also of the previous bill S-38. All the municipalities which wished to appear and all the harbour commissions had full opportunity to go through the provisions of this bill. Therefore, in spite of this initial reservation that perhaps there is too much arbitrary control, I think most of the objections to the principle and the detail have been settled and we will not oppose the passage of this bill.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, this bill, or at least one part of it, caused a bit of a sensation last year when to the surprise of most of us, while it was before the Senate telegrams and letters suddenly began to rain upon us complaining about the bill. I remember that I spent two mornings or afternoons sitting in the Senate committee listening to complaints from Hamilton and Oshawa, and to representations from my own area regarding the views of the lakehead municipalities. I think that these objections have been met. Certainly at the time I could not really see what these people were worrying about, including the representatives of Hamilton and Toronto, but I assume they managed to convince the government that they were in a special kind of situation which should keep them free of the powers resting with the government, in this particular case with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

There are two comments I want to make about the bill and about the harbour commissions. One concerns conflict of interest and political partisanship in relation to the commissioners themselves. The other is the matter of the revenues which a commission raises.

The conflict of interest is something which is extremely difficult to determine, but it does seem to me that it is something which needs to be kept very much in mind by the governor in council when making appointments. I want to give the minister an example. The Canadian National Railways, as the minister knows, is an agency to which he has some relationship, as well perhaps as having some power and influence over it. We had a situation where one of the government appointees to the commission at Port Arthur was an employee of the Canadian National Railways; at least that was my understanding. I am not saying there was anything wrong here, but there was only one commissioner there who did not have some interest in connection with the harbour. One was the head of the shipyards. Another was the head of an elevator company which was involved. Another was an employee of the Canadian National Railways, a very able engineer. Because of their backgrounds and, you might say skills, these men were excellent people from one point of view to have on the commission, but the suspicion was raised in more than my mind that it was rather unfair that these men should be there.

For example, there was a controversy at the lakehead over who should bear the cost of icebreaking in the slips and around the harbour. One of the solutions seems to have been worked out as the result of a visit by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp), representing the grain interests, and I think the matter has now been resolved. But one of the matters which caused a great deal of questioning and bitterness on the local scene was the fact if the lakehead harbour commission had become more deeply involved in financing and in paying for this particular form of icebreaking it would immediately have thrown suspicion on the representative of the grain trade who was on the commission, because naturally it was the grain trade who stood to benefit most.

I have tried to think of an amendment to the bill which would so limit the appointments, but it would be almost impossible to rule out the appointment of this sort of person. Yet this is a matter which must be kept very much in mind, particularly in terms of balance. From the experience on the lakehead scene, which I am sure is duplicated in other harbours which tend to have the same interest, I would say you are caught between the fact that such men do tend to have the most knowledge to bring to bear, but they also have the most interest in what is involved. It seems to me that a special onus is left on the government when making these appointments.

One of the other problems which arises in connection with appointments is the political affiliation or interest of the people who are appointed. The federal government cannot be sure as to what may be the politics of municipal appointees, but it is very obvious from experience both under a Conservative government and under a Liberal government that this is looked upon as some kind of minor reward or recognition for a party man. As a politician I have no objection to that on principle, but I would put it to the minister that this, along with the conflict of interest, adds to the view that people tend to look upon harbour commissions as a political agency of the government or as an arm of the government identified with the ruling party. If you are not in that party or the government you can take some comfort from this, because it is not a very pleasant situation for the Department of Transport to be in—that a local agency, with which it has such intimate connections, is looked upon as being a partisan group. Again, you cannot spirit it away with any kind of amendment.

I should like to put to the minister one of the things, judging by the situation at the lakehead and at several other communities of which I am aware, which would help matters considerably for the minister—although I suppose it is his deputy, with some kind of political connection, who ferrets out people for appointment. The minister should deliberately try to make sure that the people chosen are not those who have a glaring, open or marked reputation for being political partisans. I do not want to leave the impression that I think, because individuals support a party, or are particularly loyal to a party, this leaves them with a bar sinister, but the fact remains that a member of practically any other party can probably see these difficulties and dangers more clearly than anyone else.

This is the kind of an agency or commission we cannot get at as members of parliament, acting as either individuals in our constituencies or as members in the House of Commons. We have really no power of scrutiny. All we can do is sound off with criticisms. It is for that reason I think the whole practice with regard to appointments of harbours commissioners should be considered very seriously by the present minister and his deputy in an attempt to see whether they can establish, perhaps not any fixed rule, and certainly no regulations, but some sort of policy to take care of this conflict of interest in this partisan aspect. I do not know how possible such a thing is, but we know the present minister is not the least partisan of people, and I suppose his deputy, just as a result of the fact he has been at his job for so long, is both adept at and inured to compromise with a sort of a political reality, but I suggest to the minister that this might be at least an aspiration. I suggest that he examine this conflict of interest and this question of political appointment to see whether the difficulties that surround them can be circumvented by the appointment of people who have no conflict of interest and are not partisan.

The last topic I want to touch upon, Mr. Speaker, is the subject of revenues. Having read the lakehead harbours bill and this bill, I am not clear in my mind just how much freedom the local harbour commissions have to raise money. I do not know what is the pattern of their financing. Perhaps one thing we might gain by having this bill sent to a committee is some indication of the record of financing problems. I know there are financing problems and that the harbour commissions must obtain money. Since much of the money that has gone into harbours has come from the federal government, the federal government should have some control. I should like to know how much latitude exists for harbour commissions to make unilateral decisions, for example that they are going to raise the fees for the use of the harbours without previous consultations with the government. It seems to me that the actual situation which exists is that tacitly, despite the powers given by the bill, commissions tend to look for and accept the advice of the minister of transport.

Again because this is not spelled out clearly, it seems to me that there may be a certain hypocrisy in the bill, in that the great powers for raising money which exist in the general and particular powers are really not as strong or powerful as we may think when we pass the bill.

The question I should like to leave with the minister is, since this is an over-all bill bringing a number of harbour commissions in this country within a single framework, whether it would be possible out of this single pattern to establish some kind of annual publishing of the reports of these commissions in some detail so that we will have a picture of their operations. I happen to know that these commissions publish their own statements, but it seems to me there should be a common format indicating statistics of revenue, traffic and expenditures, with a budget for the coming year. This might be very useful and should in no way inconvenience the commissions in doing the jobs which the powers given to them by the bill would indicate they are doing. That is really the only substantial request I make to the minister. Would he consider whether it might not be possible to have some kind of publishing of a common nature carried out. This may involve an extra cost upon the Department of Transport through the queen's printer, but it seems to me it would be a most useful thing.

One of the difficulties in trying to analyse harbour needs in this country is that the report of the national harbours board gives specific data only for so many harbours, and then only general data in respect of all the rest. I think the minister will recognize that the dominion bureau of statistics does not really pick up the slack and give a ready picture of the kinds of traffic, a summary of the facilities and revenue, and a general plan of the capital expenditure for various harbours. This would be something hon. members would find useful. Certainly I would find this very useful, as it would enable me to follow from year to year what is taking place.

It seems to me there is always some question in our minds when we have three or four patterns of administration of similar facilities such as harbours. We have the national harbours board, and we are now going to have this schedule of harbours under this act. There are other ports which have harbour commissions but which will remain outside.

One of the questions repeatedly occurring has to do with a scale of expenditures, and the kind of facilities which should be provided. The minister may remember the controversy over who was going to pay for the provisions to extend the grain handling facilities at both the lakehead and Vancouver. One was under this kind of a commission and the other was under the national harbours board. The relationship of the government's role with respect to expenditures in this particular area has never really been settled clearly. I do not know where there is a more primary responsibility upon the government in relation to a harbour under the national harbours board than in respect of a harbour under this particular act, but certainly they are treated differently in relation to administration and financing, and their relations with the department are different.

I suppose we should really be asking whether it might not be practical to look forward to some future time when the national harbours board is the general administrator of all harbours. As long as there are three different kinds of harbours which handle a substantial amount of traffic there may always be the possibility of some kind of rationalization of the whole relationship of the federal government to them. I think the previous minister of transport deserves some congratulations for the fact that all the objections to this bill, which were many, disappeared a few months ago while he was still in charge of the department. I can only assume that since it took place under his regime he played some part in allaying the suspicions, and since we have not been congratulating him too much lately it might not be amiss to do so now.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a few remarks I should like to add to those made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) in connection with the bill. My first reaction was somewhat similar to that expressed earlier by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), namely that we should look rather carefully at the suggestion that we put into the hands of the governor in council powers which heretofore have been exercised only through an act of parliament. However, I was satisfied at least partially by the explanation of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), that one of the results of the passage of this measure might be to facilitate the establishment of harbour commissions where otherwise they might not be established.

I should like to say to the minister that one thing for which I am always on the lookout is the development of a government policy to provide for a more satisfactory method of administering smaller ports than in my view has heretofore been devised. If the passage of this bill will help to facilitate that kind of development I want to say here and now that I am all for it, although I do not actually see anything in the bill to indicate definitely that its provisions contain the kind of solution which I should like to see brought about in respect of the administration of many of the smaller harbours.

I have only one harbour in my constituency which is administered by a harbour commission, the harbour of Port Alberni. If I may say so, this is one of the more important harbours on the west coast of Canada. In fact, according to some claims I have seen recently it is British Columbia's second harbour from the point of view of tonnage shipped, although I believe that the harbour commission in the constituency of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) is inclined to challenge that claim.

Nevertheless, what I really want to say is that I have discussed the possible effect of the bill with the Port Alberni harbour commission and my understanding is that they are satisfied its terms will not adversely affect the operation of that harbour. There are one or two matters in connection with the provisions of the bill that I may wish to question when we get to the committee stage.

One of the advantages I have always felt arose out of the operation of harbour commissions established by an act of parliament, as has been the case up till now, was that out of their revenue surplus they did have certain funds, usually not too large in the cases that have come to my attention, which could be spent entirely at their own discretion. There have been certain advantages in this situation. I know that some works in the harbour of Port Alberni have been constructed in this way which might not have been constructed if they had required a vote out of public funds at the federal level. Nevertheless these works have added to the usefulness of the harbour.

I think I understood the minister correctly that in the future any harbour commission which is operating within the framework of this legislation will have no such surplus funds, because any such funds will automatically go into the consolidated revenue fund after certain operating expenses and so on have been taken care of. This particular aspect of the bill raises some questions in my mind which I may wish to pursue further in the committee stage.

If I may sum up, Mr. Speaker, I hope we are moving in a direction which will facilitate the more adequate administration of smaller harbours. In my experience they have largely been left out of the picture from the point of view of creating an efficient mechanism for local administration. The result has been that there have been many headaches for the administrative officers of the Department of Transport, inasmuch as these habours are in most cases isolated from any direct, day to day supervision by these officials.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Contents of proclamation establishing commission.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire about the thinking of the government in proposing that the number of members of a commission shall in all cases be not less than three and not more than five. There is nothing unusual in this proposal in itself but I raise the question because of the point I mentioned earlier when we were at the second reading stage with respect to the administration of smaller harbours. So far as the administration of smaller harbours is concerned, has any consideration been given to the possibility of setting up a modified form of harbour commission involving a single commissioner? There might not always be three suitable people available. Has the minister any comment?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I can make a very brief comment on that point. I think that a harbour that can be administered by one person should not have a harbour commission at all but should be in the third class of harbours I have mentioned. Unless a harbour is of sufficient importance and magnitude to warrant at least three persons being appointed, it does not seem to me there would be any advantage to be gained at all in removing it from the class of harbours which includes the great majority in Canada and which are administered directly by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Barnett: I will not quarrel with the minister on that point but I raise it because I think there is need for the development of a better mechanism for the administration of smaller harbours than I have seen up to the present time. I hope further consideration will be given to this matter.

Mr. Olson: I only wish to ask the minister if there is any intention on the part of the government to make these harbour commissions responsible for more harbours than the 11 he mentioned at the outset of the resolution stage?

Mr. Pickersgill: As a matter of fact, it was thought when we were waiting for action on this legislation, we might put the harbour at St. John's, Newfoundland under a harbour commission under this legislation. Then we had requests from the provincial government, the city of St. John's, the board of trade, the longshoremen and all interested parties in the harbour that it should be brought under the national harbours board. The government decided that since that seemed to be the general wish of the community, that should be done. I do not know of any other that is in immediate contemplation, but there are one or two that have made some approaches to us.

Clauses 5 to 8 inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 9—Jurisdiction within harbour.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, in connection with clauses 9, 10 and 11, but particularly 10, is it the intention that the government shall acquire the harbour facilities, that is the land, buildings and so forth, and transfer them to the commission or is it the intention that in most cases, the commission will merely administer the assets that are physically there?

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no question of anything being taken over. In the case of existing commissions, the commission does own works in the harbour. In the case of any new commissions that would be established, I would assume any federal works in the area would be turned over to the commission.

Mr. Aiken: Is it the intention to take over property from a municipal corporation which had previously been operating a harbour? If not, would the government have power of expropriation of municipal assets?

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand it has been the usual practice where there was property owned by a municipality in a harbour, when a harbour commission is set up the municipality puts its properties under the commission as does the federal government.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 10 to 12 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 13—Bylaws.

Mr. Fisher: I want to raise a question with the minister in connection with the powers, particularly under paragraph (h). The minister may recall that there have been some proceedings against ships for dumping waste oil and other refuse. I understand these proceedings have been taken under the Criminal Code, although the harbour authorities may have provided the information for the charge. I want to find out whether this power under paragraph (h), and under the authority to establish police, could be used more effectively than seems to be the situation at the present time in relation to the few examples we have seen where the scale of fines against these shipping masters and shipping companies that have been dumping oil have amounted more or less to a pat on the wrist.

I wonder if the minister could tell us if there has been enough experience with this kind of harbour commission, with the problem of policing, discipline and good conduct of harbours, to indicate that they should assume more of the powers this section would seem to give them? I know I am getting rather indefinite, but what I am really asking is, does the practice up to now indicate there should be a limitation upon the policing and, if you like, the punishment powers of the commission in the sense of the present reality as against what seems to be the sweeping powers that are given under this particular clause?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is the general rule that commissions which are set up under a statute can exercise only the powers the statute itself confers. A commission could not make criminal law—at least I defer to the lawyers here, but I would think this most unlikely. They could only create the kind of offences that relate to the specific powers given to them. This is one reason their bylaws would have to be examined by the governor in council, so the Department of Justice would have a chance to look at them and make sure they were not purporting to make bylaws which could not have any legal validity because they had not had conferred upon them the power necessary to make the bylaw.

[Mr. Aiken.]

Mr. Fisher: I appreciate that comment. We have had two matters locally in which the commission has been involved and, in the opinion of some people, regrettably not sufficiently involved; one was the question of oil and the other relates to the right of the harbour commission police to deal with duck shooting and the carrying of firearms in the harbour area. One of the consequences in terms of public opinion on the local scene that I encountered with each of these instances was that the harbour commission and its police were damned if they did and damned if they did not. They were damned by some people for interfering with the shooting of ducks, and they were damned by other people because they had not taken sufficiently strong action in connection with the release of waste oil.

The point I really wanted to make to the minister hinged on how much encouragement, despite the fact of perhaps because of the fact, the government retains the scrutiny of bylaws, will be given to harbour commissions to sort of police and, in that sense, punish, the people who commit these actions? I suppose in the context of what we are doing here, this is a fruitless question. I am quite prepared to allow the clause to pass, but I should like to remind the minister and his officials there is a problem here that I am sure will be cropping up again and again.

Mr. Pickersgill: It does crop up a great deal. There are some very difficult questions because, as the hon. gentleman knows, sometimes the dividing line between what is regarded as property and civil rights and what is regarded as shipping is not an easy one to draw. I have just taken two examples at random. I understand it is the desire, as much as possible, to encourage these harbour commissions to maintain good order in their harbours, to see that everything that is properly within their powers is done and to avoid things like pollution, the dumping of garbage or anything of that sort.

I wonder, sir, if you could avoid seeing the clock if that were the wish of hon. members, for a few minutes so that perhaps we might conclude this matter.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 14—Commission may borrow and issue debentures therefor.

Mr. Barnett: I should like to ask one or two questions in connection with clause 14.

They may be related to clauses 14 and 15 which have to do with the powers of the commission in connection with the expenditure of money for capital and operating purposes. One of the questions which occurs to me is whether the passage of this bill will alter the pattern that has existed in the past in relation to the policy of smaller harbour commissions to make arrangements for capital expenditures by appropriations from the Department of Public Works for the construction of certain works such as wharves, breakwaters and so on. Second, what would be the effect of the operation of these two clauses on the ability of the commissions to construct minor capital improvements within their harbours without having to go cap in hand to parliament for an appropriation, or having to borrow money under terms which would involve payment of interest?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think I can deal with those points very briefly. I should like to deal first of all with the points the hon. member raised on second reading; I am sure it might create a certain amount of misgiving if we were just to read the last three lines of clause 15. Perhaps I could deal with the relevant clauses together, as the hon. member did. It is not the intention of the governor in council to insist that any surplus which might be left over each year should be paid to the receiver general. Paragraph (b) of clause 15 (2) refers to the appropriation to the funded reserves of the commission of such amounts as may be approved; it is intended that these harbours should build up funds from their revenues and have them available for their own use. However, it is thought that if the funds become so large, and if they are based on capital works originally paid for by the taxpayers, the surplus, if it is to go to anyone, should go back to the exchequer which provided the capital in the first place. There is no thought whatever of trying to make large profits out of these harbours. As far as capital works are concerned, where revenue is sufficient the commissions are not restricted from carrying out capital works of their own; they do not need to come to us for permission. But many of these harbours are not self-supporting and are not likely to be. In these cases the Department of Public Works will share, with the harbour commission in providing the kind of works which would be provided in harbours of that kind if there were not a harbour commission.

Mr. Barnett: Let me be clear on this question of funded reserves. I took that expression to mean reserves to pay off the bonded indebtedness of the commission. But a commission could build up a reserve out of which it could undertake direct capital works made possible by accumulated surpluses.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is my understanding that that is also true. In fact it is for both purposes.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 15 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 19—Expropriation.

Mr. Aiken: There is just one question I wish to raise with regard to this clause. I may have a technical mind, but there seems to me to be a problem here in connection with expropriation. The assumption is that anyone is prepared to sell for a price. The clause says:

> A commission may...take or acquire lands... without the consent of the owner where it is unable to agree with the owner as to the price to be paid therefor—

The question which arises in my mind is this: Suppose the owner does not wish to sell at all, and there is no argument at all about the price. Would the clause be operative in these circumstances? It would seem that the words "as to the price to be paid" would be surplus. Someone might say merely "I will not sell", and there would be no power of expropriation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I understand that the provision of the Railway Act which is applied by reference here is that the expropriation would only be legal if the property expropriated was essential for the railway. A railway could not expropriate for any other purpose. Therefore, by analogy it would have to be clearly needed for the harbour before this power could be exercised; and of course in case of dispute the courts would decide wheher it really was needed. Moreover, if any such expropriation can of course only be done with the consent of the governor in council. I think the hon. gentleman knows that there is always likely to be pretty strong opposition in this house, which would be very likely to bring up the grievance of anyone who really felt aggrieved in this matter, and that the governor in council would not act lightly.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I do not think my point was understood. My point is that the power of expropriation that the commission has is limited by the words "as to the price to be paid therefor". As I say, what is the situation where someone says in effect, "I do not want to sell"? There is no power of expropriation in such a case. That is my point. If there is an argument about the price, the commission may expropriate. If there is no argument about the price, and if the man just says. "I am not going to sell," there is no power of expropriation. This is the point that is not made clear in the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could ask that this clause stand for a moment, in the hope of getting some legal advice from on high, while we go on with the other clauses. I have not any lawyers in front of me; I am not a lawyer, and I would not like to go very far in this field without advice. Perhaps we could stand clause 19.

The Chairman: Clause 19 stands.

Clauses 20 to 29 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 30—Procedure for bringing existing commission under act.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in respect of clause 30 I have been asked to have it made clear on the record whether or not the harbour commissions as listed in the schedule to the bill will remain free to continue under their present charters as established by the various acts of parliament unless there is agreement as to the provisions of both paragraphs (a) and (b) of subclause 2. In this connection I would think it appropriate that the minister, particularly because as I understand it in most, if not all cases a majority of the members of the harbour commissions are appointed by the government, should say whether or not it is the intention of the government to exert any influence upon the existing harbour commissions, either directly or indirectly, as to what action they should take to bring themselves under the terms of this bill; and, in reference to that section that has to do with municipalities, whether the government intends to make any representations, directly or otherwise, to the municipal authorities in connection with bringing existing harbour commissions within the framework of this bill.
