Mr. Pickersgill: I can say, first of all, that I gave an assurance to the committee of the other place—if it is permissible to say that—that there would be no pressure whatsoever brought on any of these harbour commissions. They have acts of parliament. Unless they see some advantage in coming under this legislation there is nothing we can do for them. I do not think there is anything we should try to do to coerce them in any way. We feel that it will be apparent that there are certain advantages to them in coming under this legislation, but that is for them to decide and not us. As for trying to influence municipalities either to establish harbour commissions or not establish them, I think that is something about which I have to be a little cautious in answering.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I did not ask the minister about influencing municipalities in order to establish new harbour commissions. I was referring to asking the municipalities to co-operate in establishing—

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, let me just say that that would be in an infringement of provincial rights which no Liberal government would contemplate.

Mr. Lambert: In the case of one of the listed harbour commissions appearing in the schedule, I hope it will not be a condition of the provision of certain capital installations through, say, the Department of Public Works that it would be necessary to pass the appropriate bylaws and come under the great controls.

Mr. Pickersgill: I really do not think there would be any particular advantage to the federal government in doing that, even if we had any thought of doing it. The only thing is that there might be in some of these other statutes—I have not gone over them carefully in comparison with this bill—certain things we could not do for them under their existing legislation which we could do for them under the present legislation. There might be some advantages there. However, I do not think we would hesitate to point that out to them. Otherwise it is not our desire to try and impose any uniformity at all. We think this legislation is rather better than any of the existing acts and rather better from the point of view of the commissions, but that is for them to decide.

Clause 31 agreed to.

Schedule agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we revert to clause 19?

On clause 19—Expropriation.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Chairman, I have had some discussion on clause 19 and I still have some reservations about the power of expropriation. However, the President of the Privy Council is satisfied that there will be no difficulty in expropriating whether the problem concerns price or whether it concerns the question of selling. Under those circumstances I will withdraw my objection, because it really concerned the limitation, as I saw it, of the power to expropriate. The government is satisfied that the clause is sufficient so I will not object further.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, would you allow me to break the rules to thank hon. gentlemen opposite for their consideration of me today. I do appreciate the chance to get through all these smaller bills as far as we have gone, and I am genuinely grateful.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we have clearly demonstrated today that this is a very co-operative house. Some people misinterpret what goes on in the House of Commons, but we have shown what can be done.

May we hear about the business for Thursday and Friday?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. On Thursday we will begin the redistribution bill, in accordance with the arrangements made this afternoon. At the conclusion of our consideration of that bill we will, for the remainder of Thursday and Friday, take up estimates. The estimates we propose to submit are first, the estimates of the Secretary of State, followed by the estimates of the Minister of Forestry, the estimates of the Minister of Public Works and the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of standing order 2, this house stands adjourned until Thursday next at two thirty o'clock p.m.

It being fifteen minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 12, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

TABLING OF REPORTS OF ACTUARIAL VALUATIONS

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, today I am tabling the reports of the quinquennial actuarial valuations required under sections 33 and 48 of the Public Service Superannuation Act.

The most important of these reports deals with the state of the superannuation account as of December 31, 1962 and shows that new deficiencies of $110,536,000 arose during the five year period ending on that day. The largest contributory factor was the deficiency arising from salary adjustments authorized in 1960 and again in 1962 for various classes of contributors. Subsequently the salary increases authorized in July, 1963 with effect from October 1, 1962 added another $22 million to this deficiency.

In accordance with the policy outlined in this house on March 6 of this year authority will be sought from parliament later in this fiscal year to write off to net debt the initial deficiency of $110,536,000 plus interest, and to charge the deficiencies arising from pay increases authorized during the fiscal years 1963-64 and 1964-65 against expenditures over a five year period commencing with this fiscal year. Thus one fifth of the deficit of $22 million plus interest and one fifth of the deficiencies arising from subsequent similar salary increases will be charged to expenditure during the fiscal year 1964-65.

The other two reports which I have tabled related to the death benefit accounts established under part II of the act. These reports show that a satisfactory contingency reserve is being built up.

BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REPRESENTATIONS AGAINST OBSCENE BROADCASTS

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-138, to amend the Broadcasting Act (broadcast tending to corrupt morals).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is described in considerable detail in the explanatory notes; but briefly put, this bill assembles the authority and powers already possessed by the board of broadcast governors together with existing regulations already laid down by the B.B.G. in such a way as to provide a means whereby the ordinary citizen or group of citizens is enabled to take action in respect to obscene broadcasts in much the same way as is now possible with respect to obscene literature.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING INCREASES IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister whether, having regard to the representations made yesterday by the dominion command of the Royal Canadian Legion and the criticism they advanced as to the smallness of the 10 per cent increase in disability pensions, it is the intention of the government to give reconsideration to this matter to the end that a fair and reasonable increase in disability pensions will be provided.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government feels that in the circumstances the action taken in regard to veterans pensions was fair and reasonable and does not intend to review that action, particularly as it is not able to draw the same conclusions from the facts that are available as the Legion delegation has drawn.

Mr. Speaker, the Legion people also recommended that the government take the same action in respect of Canadian veterans as it does for the civil service, by placing pensions and war veterans allowances under cyclical review every two years. I told the Legion delegation yesterday that I thought that was a reasonable request and that that kind of cyclical review will be taken every two years. That was misunderstood in some quarters as an indication that we would review the action just taken. That is not our intention.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Prime Minister for his answer. Would he say whether or not the government is now giving consideration to making provision for assistance to those who served such long imprisonment at Hong Kong?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may reply to that question. As I have indicated to the house, at the moment there is an inquiry under way. It is our thought that we should wait for that report before reaching any conclusion as to what should be done for the Hong Kong veterans. We hope that the report will not be too long in coming.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, can the minister give any indication as to when that report will be forthcoming? I know it is difficult to fix an exact date.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, I will make an inquiry in this regard and report my findings to the Leader of the Opposition.

[Later:]

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I wonder whether he would inform the house if he anticipates presenting legislation to the house before Christmas in regard to the elimination of the 365 day clause in the War Veterans Allowance Act, so these Canadian veterans can participate in the increase he has announced.

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that at the present time I am not in a position to give that undertaking. I would like to be able to do so, but I cannot guarantee it.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. I wonder whether he can inform the house if legislation will be introduced after Christmas 1964, so these veterans can participate in this announced increase?

Mr. Teillet: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can usefully add anything to what I have already said.

PUBLICATIONS

INTENTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a letter I received from Mr. Harold Cook, of Liberty magazine, indicating that attempts to republish Liberty magazine are floundering because of the continuing swing of advertising revenue to Time and Reader's Digest. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider issuing some kind of an interim statement which would clarify the government's position on this whole question of advertising in periodicals and on the recommendations of the royal commission on publications, in view of the long delay that has followed the appearance on the order paper of the original intention of the government.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take into consideration this whole matter of the possibility of making a statement pending action by the government on the matter now on the order paper.

GRAIN

WHEAT BOARD ORDER RESPECTING DAMP AND TOUGH GRADES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the Canadian wheat board. In view of the fact that the Canadian wheat board have now cancelled an order which allowed their agencies to take in damp and tough grain and remove it to the drying facilities at the lakehead and the west coast, and in view of the fact that there is still a large quantity of this damp and tough grain in certain areas of the prairies, I wonder whether he would take up this matter with the wheat board to see whether they can extend this practice at least until most of the tough and damp grain is taken to the drying facilities.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to discuss this matter with the wheat board.

PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—INCREASE IN ELEVATOR CAPACITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether there is, contrary apparently to the state of affairs in the defence department, any delay in announcing policy with respect to grain elevators?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is talking about the same grain elevator, the matter is still under consideration.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO LOANS TO BRITAIN BY OTHER COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Finance?

Since the Bank of Canada granted a loan to England in order to save the pound sterling, could he tell us whether other countries have done likewise? If so, what are those countries?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I said some time ago, a statement to this effect would come more appropriately from the British authorities than from myself. At some appropriate time however, I will be glad to give my hon. friend the details he asks for.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF HUNTING RIGHTS GRANTED BY TREATY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and in view of his absence perhaps his parliamentary secretary will bring it to the minister's attention. Owing to the increasing number of treaty Indians being required to stand trial for alleged hunting infractions, would the minister assure the house that the hunting rights granted our Indian people by treaty will be protected?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I shall take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR CONTINUANCE OF CERTAIN MILITIA UNITS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Associate Minister of National Defence?

In view of the fact that the Régiment de Joliette is one of the most famous and well-known regiments in Canada, does the government intend to reconsider its decision, maintain this regiment and prevent its disappearance?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member undoubtedly knows that in this matter the department benefited from the thorough study and recommendations of the Suttie commission which, in fact, was composed of militia officers. Before any final decision was taken the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Hellyer), the higher officials of the department and myself reviewed three or four times every militia unit in the country in order to ascertain that a right decision had been reached.

Under the circumstances I regret to say that, to my mind, it would serve no useful purpose to reconsider that decision.

[Text]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the answer given by the associate minister I would direct a question to the Prime Minister, and under the circumstances I hope I will get a favourable answer. Has he received a protest from the Northern Ireland associated clubs regarding the disbandment of the Irish Regiment of Canada and the Irish Fusiliers, thereby leaving no vestige of an Irish regiment in the militia across Canada? Knowing the Prime Minister's background, this is one time I expect I will receive favourable consideration for the request that the Irish have at least one regiment in their own name.

An hon. Member: What are you doing to the little people?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, just before luncheon I did receive the communication to which my hon. friend refers. It was from the association he mentioned and had an enormous maple leaf on the letterhead, and I have to add it was a green one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It also had a crown on it.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, a crown on a green maple leaf. I am sorry that the circumstances are not such as to enable me to take favourable action with regard to representations of this kind.

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): A supplementary question to the Associate Minister of National Defence. Does the answer he gave a few minutes ago also apply to the famous Hastings-Prince Edward regiment?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is anything I can add to what I have already said. A good deal of consideration has been given to each of the units. The Minister of National Defence, members of the department and I have looked at each of these cases at least three or four times and I do not think there is anything I can add.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Associate Minister of National Defence or the Minister of National Defence explain why the department failed to accept the recommendations of the Suttie commission, which reported favourably with regard to the maintenance on the active list of some of these regiments?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the reason that some of the recommendations were not upheld was very carefully explained in the committee on defence, and I do not think it would be appropriate for me to repeat at length now the arguments and factors which entered into the judgments and which were explained at that time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just give them in summary for a change.

PROVISION OF NUCLEAR MISSILES FOR R.C.A.F. IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence and ask him whether the reported delay of several months in the installation of nuclear warheads at Comox and certain other air force stations in Canada means that the government has under consideration plans to abandon bringing these nuclear weapons into Canada.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): There is no delay, Mr. Speaker; the projects are proceeding on schedule, and we expect the special ammunition to be delivered on schedule.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. When the minister says "on schedule", when will that be; because almost two years have elapsed since he promised to arm the Voodoos with nuclear missiles?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, there was some delay before the associate minister and myself had responsibility for the department. Since then we have managed to move along at a reasonable speed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Crab fashion.

Mr. Hellyer: We expect the special ammunition to be available in the new year.

Mr. Churchill: Toronto and Montreal still unprotected.

NATIONAL PARKS

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING ZONING AND BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has there been a change in the orders in council governing zoning and building requirements in our national parks? If so, would the minister kindly disclose why these changes have been made?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question requiring a long answer, and it should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Woolliams: May I put this question to the minister. Has there been any change made in this regard, and if so why?

Mr. Speaker: The question is considerably shorter, but it is still the same.

[Later:]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the minister prepared to table the changes in regulations in regard to Banff national park?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Well, Mr. Speaker, we have made a decision with respect to the policy dealing with buildings there. It has not been incorporated in an order in council but it has been disclosed to the advisory committee, and they are aware of the regulations that are being used at the present time.

Mr. Woolliams: As a further supplementary question, have there been regulations passed and is the minister prepared to table them?

I am advised by the council that the minister advised them regulations had been passed, and I ask whether he is prepared to table them?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. Woolliams: Surely the minister is prepared to answer such a reasonable question on such an important matter covering all the national parks in Canada. I ask him if he will table those regulations. Is it not correct that he has made regulations, as pointed up by the fact that Hawrelak is building another hotel?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows the rules.

Mr. Woolliams: I would like to debate this at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Bow River. Would the minister inform the house whether any recent changes have been made by order in council in national park regulations, specifically affecting the Bow river site in the Banff national park? Also, could he comment on the results of his recent meeting with the Banff advisory council on this important issue?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper, particularly since three questions have been asked on it this afternoon.

Mr. Woolliams: By that time the hotel will be built.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a matter of importance here. The minister is usually good when it comes to answering questions and I ask him, will he not table the regulations? Surely the various national parks and members from those areas have a right to see them. I suggest to him it is not parliamentarily very proper to refuse to table regulations, and I would ask him to do so.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to tabling the regulations.

Mr. Woolliams: Fine.

Mr. Laing: They have already been made known to all those in the parks. The people there are conversant with them, and the basis upon which we made a decision with respect to Bow River is well known to all the people within the park.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the minister has indicated that he is willing to table these regulations. Would he also table a copy or copies of the Oberlander report for the Jasper park development, which was unveiled recently at Jasper national park?

Mr. Laing: I will be very glad to do that, Mr. Speaker.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND READING OF BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has a decision been taken with regard to the second reading of the bill respecting the Canada pension plan? Will it be proceeded with next week?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The government business for next week will be announced, I hope, at the end of tomorrow's sitting.

AGRICULTURE

SEPARATE DEPARTMENT FOR EASTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Since he stated that the creation of a Department of Agriculture for eastern Canada also appeared on the government priority list, could he tell us whether this legislation will be brought before the house before the end of the present session?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a bill has been drafted in connection with this matter, as my hon. friend knows. I hope we will be able to get to it as quickly as possible. I doubt if we can get to it before Christmas, but that will depend on the progress we make.

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Inquiries of the Ministry

About two weeks ago the Minister of Agriculture advised us that he was getting ready to disclose to the Canadian people, or the farmers, his new policy with regard to the dairy industry.

Can the minister tell us if we can expect information about that new policy in the near future?

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I would be glad to make the announcement just as soon as we have one.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Isn't it born yet?

ELIGIBILITY OF SMALL BLOCKS UNDER P.F.A.A. REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Have there been any recent changes made in the regulations under the P.F.A. Act in regard to the eligibility of blocks of less than township size?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, there have not been.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Perhaps the Prime Minister, on more mature reflection, has been able to further consider the question I asked him on Tuesday with regard to the setting aside of two days in the immediate future for further discussion of the external affairs estimates in order that we may discuss problems facing Canada. I wonder if he is now in a position to tell us whether it is the government's intention to accede to this request.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): If we are on estimates next week, and that is a possibility to say the least, then I should think the Department of External Affairs could be brought forward next week and that would provide an opportunity for discussion.

CONGO—SAFETY OF CANADIAN CITIZENS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John).]

Is he in a position to provide the house with supplementary information about the Canadian victims of the distressing situation in Congo?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. Mr. Thompson went to Nairobi the day before yesterday; he had discussions there and he is to go back.

[Text]

QUEBEC—POSSIBLE CONSULAR EXCHANGE WITH FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Prince Edward-Lennox): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Are the Prime Minister and his government in accord and agreement with the latest reported separatist policy being put into effect by Premier Lesage of the province of Quebec, whereby he is now consulting with the great President de Gaulle with a view to setting up a consular exchange between that province and the republic of France?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any reports to the effect that a consulate is being set up by the government of Quebec are quite inaccurate.

WATER RESOURCES

ONTARIO—CONSERVATION WORKS ON CREDIT RIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I wanted to ask the minister of national resources whether his department has reached any conclusion yet on the Credit valley conservation scheme. If so, what is the nature of the decision? If there has not been any decision, when will we have one?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have reported to the house already that regrettably the benefit in respect of this scheme is largely recreational, as a matter of fact to the extent of 71 per cent. We have been studying the possibility of separating part of the works that relate to flood damage. I hope to be able to make an announcement next week.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

POSTAGE RATES ON CARDS IN UNSEALED ENVELOPES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. To answer inquiries I have received from constituents will the minister indicate whether postage on Christmas cards in unsealed envelopes has been increased to 3 cents?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the hon. member has asked this question. I would remind him and other members of the house of an announcement that was made by the Postmaster General in September, 1963 that as of April 1, 1964 the postal rate on cards would be raised from 2 cents to 3 cents. This does not apply to Christmas cards only but to Easter cards, Mother's day cards and Father's day cards, etc. It has been in effect since April 1; there has been no change in this state since then, nor is any change contemplated.

Mr. Pascoe: To avoid misunderstanding and postage due claims, will the minister take action to see that the increased rate is publicized before the Christmas mailing season begins, because at present there is a great deal of misunderstanding?

Mr. Nicholson: I can assure the hon. member that steps have already been taken toward that end. A special publicity campaign has already been launched.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

MEETING OF LABOUR MINISTER AND NOVA SCOTIA PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is it his intention to have the Minister of Labour confer with the premier of Nova Scotia during his visit to Halifax this week end, in the hope that whatever difficulties have arisen with regard to federal-provincial relations may be eliminated and a more harmonious relationship result?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister is in Nova Scotia at the moment, and I hope he will be able to set the premier straight on this matter.

Mr. Coates: As a supplementary question I would like to ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the Minister of Labour to meet with the premier. I think the people of Nova Scotia would like to see such a meeting take place.

Mr. Pearson: I am sure they would, and I am sure the minister will do everything he can to get the matter straightened up, if that requires a meeting with the premier. I shall get in touch with the minister right away.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF REPORT ON FEDERAL EXPENDITURES IN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Further to the report he tabled last Friday, on the break-up of federal government expenditures and revenue concerning the various provinces, and with a view to assisting the Canadians who are interested in analysing this very complicated report, can the minister tell us what figure, per capita, represents the 45 per cent portion of the national budget? Is it $150, or $175 per Canadian?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I have not the figure, Mr. Speaker. It would require some elementary division, which I am sure my hon. friend could do just as well as I.

STUDY OF ECONOMIC INTERDEPENDENCE OF PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Several weeks ago he told us that the report of the commission on the interdependence of the provinces would be ready in a couple of weeks. I wonder if it is ready, and when it will be available to the house.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, it is not ready. As soon as there is something to report, I will be very glad to do so.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT BY U.S. NAZI LEADER ON VISIT TO CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I wonder whether I could direct a question to the parliamentary secretary, and ask whether his attention has been drawn to the statement of George Lincoln Rockwell to the effect that he entered Canada quite openly, disclosed his passport and other identifying documents to the immigration officials, and in no way tried to gain entry by subterfuge. If this information has been drawn to his attention, will that be incorporated in the subject matter of the investigation being made into how this person got here?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the hon. member's question to the attention of the minister.

TORONTO—STATUS OF PERSONS CONCERNED WITH NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration of which I gave him notice this morning. Several weeks ago he told us that certain persons concerned in the I.T.U. strike in Toronto would be asked to leave the country. I should like to know whether they have left the country and, if not, why not?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice and draw it to the attention of the minister on his return.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is he now in a position to indicate to the house the terms of the reply he sent on Tuesday to those who were concerned about increases in pensions of retired civil servants, and were those terms favourable?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, replies have gone to the representatives of the federal superannuates national association, to the civil service federation of Canada and to the civil service association of Canada. These replies have now been received by them, so I think it is appropriate for me to announce in the house that the government has come to the conclusion—and this was embodied in the replies—after reviewing the principles involved and the facts cited, that any steps it should propose to parliament to alleviate difficulties faced by retired persons should be general in character and not confined to former employees of the government of Canada.

[Mr. Howard.]

The government believe, in the light of general action already taken and proposed to benefit all retired people in Canada—I am referring here, of course, among other things, to the old age security pension—that it would be unfair to the great majority of retired Canadians who have not worked for the government to make special provisions to benefit only former employees of the government of Canada. To do so would constitute, in a sense, a form of discrimination against the majority of other retired Canadians who cannot expect such treatment from the government as such, or generally from their former employers.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, because of the unsatisfactory nature of this reply I give notice of my intention to raise this question at ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING PRESS GALLERY ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question that arises from a current magazine story and later information I have received regarding a plea to the Prime Minister from delegates of the parliamentary press gallery for assistance in their determination to stay in their present quarters. I would like to ask the Prime Minister what response, if any, he has made to these importunities.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think any importunities were made. A delegation representing the press gallery did call on me, I think it was the day before yesterday. They told me about their difficulties, of which I already had some knowledge, and asked if I would discuss the situation with the Speaker who has, I think he will agree, the primary responsibility in this matter.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that subsidies for non-governmental work seem to be involved in this question, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider having this matter reviewed by the public accounts committee.

Mr. Pearson: I think at the moment I will confine my intervention to a talk with the Speaker on the matter.

AIRPORTS

MONCTON, N.B.—PROPOSED ENLARGEMENT OF TERMINAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. On October 22 I asked a question of the acting minister with regard to the airport facilities at Moncton. I wonder whether the Minister of Transport is now in a position to answer that question.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I did notice the question at the time, and I think when I first came back into the house I had a few notes on which to base a reply. The hon. member of course knows that a very considerable addition is being made to the terminal at Moncton, and so far as I know it is in every way adequate. But if there have been any recent representations I would like to inform myself fully before giving a definitive answer. I could perhaps do that on my estimates.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The problem is with regard to the space available to passengers. Apparently a large addition is being made but it is not one that will be of benefit to passengers because a restaurant is going to be constructed as well. Representations have been made to the minister to have the space available to passengers enlarged. I wonder whether he has given consideration to this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: I will certainly look at those representations, Mr. Speaker.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 10, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Pearson)—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 6—Appointment of chairman.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, on Tuesday the minister discussed clause 6, this clause having been set aside while the other clauses of the bill were discussed. On that occasion the minister put two propositions to the committee regarding a change to clause 6. Without going into detail my suggestion at that time, which was accepted by the minister—and I thank him for that—was that the debate be adjourned and the bill discussed again today so that in the interim we could discuss these two proposed changes to clause 6.

We have now had a discussion Mr. Chairman, and have come to a conclusion. It was the feeling of the group in this party who met that as far as we were concerned, although we preferred the terms and conditions of the bill as originally drawn and presented by the minister, in order to compromise and come to some sort of settlement so we could get this legislation through the house we should give serious thought and consideration to accepting one of the changes suggested by the minister.

One of the proposals was that two members of the commission be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. We believe this proposal has some merit, although as I say we would prefer to accept the original bill as drawn by the government and presented to parliament. Nevertheless sometimes consideration must be given to other people's viewpoints, and we have given such consideration to that suggestion.

In arriving at that conclusion I should like to summarize what has been our position in the past with reference to this redistribution bill. We received some criticism to the effect that there was delay on our part with reference to the passage of this particular piece of legislation. We felt that as a matter of principle the commission should be made up of personnel appointed by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition who would sit with the commissioner. It was then that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved his amendment, which was known—I think I can say this without slighting the hon. member—as the Knowles amendment. It was at that stage that we reached a deadlock on the bill.

Therefore, what was our position? First of all, our party's position was that we should have one commission for all Canada; that if there were to be ten commissions the bill should have been left as it was so the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition each in turn would appoint one member of the commissions. At that time the minister had this to say, and it might be well to review it because he did leave the gate open. As reported at page 741 of Hansard for March 10, 1964 he said:

After various other possibilities were considered the government finally agreed to put in the bill the suggestion that the chief justice of the province should nominate the chairman from a member of his court; that the leader of the government, the Prime Minister, should nominate one of the members of the commission; and that the Leader of the Opposition, who is an officer of parliament, should nominate the other. I say unreservedly that I have every confidence that no matter who occupies those offices, any person who becomes leader of the opposition in the parliament of our country or prime minister in the parliament of our country would take this responsibility seriously and make the kind of nominations that all of us would feel were appropriate under the circumstances. I do not hesitate to say that with respect to this provision or with respect to any other method which commends itself to the house or to a majority of the house and which seems likely to produce as fair and effective a result, the government will be quite prepared in committee to consider on its merits any amendments to this procedure.

To be fair to the minister, he did leave the door open at that time, and it was left open both for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and any other member of this committee. At that time the amendment was moved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we objected to the amendment on similar grounds to those outlined by the minister on Tuesday, namely that one person would be appointing three people. We also objected to it on the ground that those people were to be appointed from a certain group of people in a certain category. We contended that in some respects that could lead to discrimination. In fact it might mean that people with practical experience and knowledge of politics and who would then be referred to as politicians might be discriminated against.

Therefore we as a group feel that the solution to this problem is to accept one of the propositions which have been put forward by the minister, so we can get the bill approved by this house and the commissioners can get on with the job. The proposition is that the Speaker appoint two of the members of the commission. Let us take a look at this for a moment. The Speaker, as the minister said on Tuesday, is elected by the members of the House of Commons. He sits in a judicial capacity in the House of Commons. Certainly my experience has been—and there are many here who are my seniors—that the Speaker has always exercised his position judiciously, as I am sure would any Speaker given that responsibility by the house. Certainly I know we would have every confidence that the present Speaker would exercise his powers judiciously in this regard.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Therefore, after some consideration and serious thought, we would entertain a change to clause 6 of the bill so the two other members of the commission would be appointed by the Speaker. No doubt the Speaker would consult with the leader of the government and the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other parties in making his choice. But I repeat that we feel his choice will a judicious one having regard to the fact that we want to set up a commission which is as close to purity as we can get it so the question of redistribution is taken out of the field of politics.

This position we have taken is, of course, predicated on the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will withdraw his amendment. In order to get this bill through now and let the commissioners get on with the job of redistribution, which is a very big job, I trust the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will recognize that we have compromised our previous stand. We repeat that we would rather have had the bill in its original form. We dislike the bill as it would be amended by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and we are suggesting some compromise. It is not exactly what we would like, but it is the best we can do today in order to reach a compromise.

When I say a compromise, it is really a settlement. I looked up the meaning of the word "compromise", and the best definition I could find in the Oxford dictionary was that it means to meet half way or to reach a settlement. I think this is the best settlement of the dilemma in which we have been.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre seems to have been making other statements outside this house since this was discussed on Tuesday, and one can never be too sure of the position he might take. However, I sincerely trust that because of the compromise we are making he will also compromise his position. I should like to congratulate the minister for the compromise he has adopted. Since we have reached consideration of the clause of this bill having to do with these appointments, I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will realize that the only solution to be found to the problem lies in a withdrawal of his amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I should like very much to hear from the minister and from the member for Winnipeg North Centre as to what they think about the position we are adopting.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Bow River has pointed out that the members of this house have had 48 hours to consider the proposals which were placed before the house on Tuesday afternoon. The hon. member has said that the members of his group have considered those proposals. The same is true of us in this party. We have looked at both proposals offered by the Minister of Transport in the light of what we believe to be the desire of parliament regarding redistribution.

I shall spell out the reasons for our position, but I might as well not keep the member for Bow River or anyone else in suspense. We do not feel disposed to withdraw our amendment for the purpose of agreeing to either of the amendments proposed by the Minister of Transport. Perhaps it is not necessary to discuss, in more than a sentence or two, the second proposal made by the minister, because apparently the Progressive Conservatives are not interested in it either. May I say that the second proposal strikes us as being worse than the first one.

Mr. Chairman, the second proposal was that each individual provincial commission consist of four people with votes and three people with eyes and voices but without votes. These other three were to be appointed, one each by the leaders of the three other parties in the House of Commons. We feel that an arrangement of that kind would really turn this so-called impartial redistribution into a political dogfight, and if that proposal were put forward we would oppose it very strongly. However, it is not even being considered by the Progressive Conservatives, so we do not have to deal with it further.

Mr. Woolliams: We thought it would be unfair to you.

Mr. Knowles: We do not think it would be unfair to us, we think it would be unfair to the people of Canada, and we think it would be adverse to the principle we have already agreed to in this house.

We now come to the other proposal the Minister of Transport has made, which the hon. member for Bow River says his party is prepared to accept, namely that in the legislation the Speaker of the House of Commons be asked to name the other two members of each of the ten provincial commissions. The first comment I want to make is to the effect that I find the bit of logic which we have been handed rather difficult to understand.

The Minister of Transport used an expression the other day which the hon. member for Bow River has just repeated. Maybe they have consulted during the last 48 hours. At any rate, this is what the Minister of Transport said on Tuesday, as recorded at page 9954 of Hansard. I note the way Hansard is building up. It probably has reached 10,000 pages by now for the first time in Canadian history. At any rate this is what the minister said:

> It is true that there were limitations on the kind of persons who could be appointed, but notwithstanding that fact, that is perhaps rather a concentration of power in the hands of one man—

That was in reference to the chief justice, under the terms of my amendment, appointing three persons. That statement was made by the Minister of Transport and has now been made by the hon. member for Bow River. They have said it would be rather a concentration of power in the hands of one man to ask one man to make three appointments, but now the proposal is that we ask one man to make 20 appointments. The suggestion is that we ask the Speaker to appoint two members to each of the ten provincial commissions. Please tell me how the power to appoint three members is a concentration of power in the hands of one man and that you get away from that by giving to one man the power to appoint 20 persons.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. Would he not consider in fairness that each of these commissions has jurisdiction over matters in its own province? There are ten separate commissions to be set up, one for each province, which will have jurisdiction in reference to that province. In other words the commission set up for the province of Ontario will not be governing in the jurisdiction of the province of Alberta. Is that not fair?

Mr. Knowles: That is a typical attempt on the part of the hon. member for Bow River to answer a point, and is a complete non sequitur if ever there was one. Of course there are ten separate provincial commissions. What we are talking about is the basis of the argument made against our proposal, which was that the power of appointment, with which we are dealing in our consideration of clause 6, as suggested by our amendment, was being concentrated because one man was being given the power to appoint three people. Now the proposal is that one man be given the power to appoint 20 people. I suggest that that is logic in reverse.

Mr. Woolliams: It sounds pretty illogical to me.

Mr. Knowles: It certainly is, and I am glad I have convinced my hon. friend.

Mr. Woolliams: I was referring to your argument.

Mr. Knowles: An argument in this chamber during a debate of this kind is much like the argument about motherhood. No one criticizes motherhood. We have the name of Mr. Speaker put before us, and all our respect for the Chair and our confidence in the impartiality of the Speaker is brought into play. When I think of the number of times the hon. member for Bow River has not even accepted the judgment of Mr. Speaker, as he did today when his question was ruled out of order, it becomes rather strange that the hon. member feels the Speaker is such an impartial person he could make these appointments across the country.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I did not challenge the Speaker's ruling during the question period today just before orders of the day were called. The minister did not answer the question and according to the rules laid down by the hon. member, who has been so proud of the changes, I rose and said that I should like to have it debated at ten o'clock. That is not a challenge of a judicial decision of His Honour the Speaker, and certainly represents no disrespect for him. I think the hon. member should withdraw his remark, and if he has a sound argument let us get on with it.

Mr. Knowles: That is non sequitur No. 2, Mr. Chairman. Let us get back to the issue.

The argument is put forward that somehow or other by asking Mr. Speaker to make these appointments we would take this whole matter out of politics. Does any Speaker of the House of Commons know the personalities and situations of each of the ten provinces of this country? Is there any person who is likely to occupy the chair of this house who is in a position on his own to make these appointments? The answer is obviously in the negative. If this job is entrusted to the Speaker he is going to have to obtain advice and consult someone. I think the cat was let out of the bag by the hon. member for Bow River when he agreed to that suggestion and said his party understood that if this amendment were accepted the Speaker would consult the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and then, out of the kindness of his heart, he said the Speaker would probably consult the leaders of the other parties.

Mr. Woolliams: I put them all in the same category.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend and I are in agreement in that regard, but what he does not seem to realize is that by doing so we are keeping redistribution as a partisan and political affair. The whole purpose of the legislation before us—and the Minister of Transport said this was the only aspect of it on which the government would stand or fall—is that we are going to put redistribution beyond parliament, we are going to put it in the hands of an impartial commission, we are going to have these boundaries drawn objectively by people outside the parliamentary arena. But under the terms of the proposed amendment we are going to have two of the appointees to each of these commissions given their positions by Mr. Speaker on the basis of an understanding, stated in the House of Commons, that he will have consulted the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of the other parties. In other words we are making it quite clear that what we are going to get is appointments that are political in one sense or the other. Either they are political in that they are proposed by political persons, or they are political in the sense that they do not displease the political leaders of the various parties in the House of Commons.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask him a question. Does he know how these appointments are made in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Knowles: I had hoped that in this house we were going to move a step ahead.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does he know?

Mr. Knowles: Yes. In the United Kingdom they are made by order in council.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, they are not.

Mr. Knowles: If my hon. friend knows something about this that I do not know I would be glad if he would so advise me, but my general understanding of the practice in the United Kingdom is that they have not gone as far in the direction of impartiality as it was proposed to go in the bill brought in by the government here, and we welcomed the attempt of the government, supported by all parties in the house, really to go in for a non-political, impartial redistribution of the seats in the House of Commons.

I suggest that when you have people appointed in this way you are not going to achieve the high ideal that we started out with when the bill was introduced. I also submit that this puts a terrific load on Mr. Speaker himself. He has his hands full administering the staff and the affairs of the House of Commons. He has a full time job just occupying the chair and retaining that impartiality that goes with the occupancy of the chair in the House of Commons. To impose upon him now this very highly political chore of naming these people to these various commissions across the country is, I submit, unfair to him and out of line with the basic principles of this legislation.

The hon. member for Bow River quite properly has drawn attention to the willingness of his party to compromise, and I do not detract from that by one iota. For a long time his party seemed unwilling to agree to anything except clause 6 in its original form. He now says they are prepared to agree to clause 6 in the terms proposed by the Minister of Transport in one of the amendments. That is a change of position. If the Liberals had changed like that the Tories would call it a retreat but I will not do that.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. gentleman always wants to be fair. The Liberals have never taken a position on this bill except on one point, as the hon. gentleman fairly said before. We consider that every member should be guided by his own conscience in this matter, which is the equal responsibility of every member of this parliament. I hope the hon. gentleman will take my words sincerely and not ascribe positions that I have taken to anybody but myself.

Mr. Knowles: I have no quarrel with what the Minister of Transport has just said. In fact I want to endorse what he has said, to the effect that the only point in this whole matter that the government has regarded as sacred, if you will, or that the government has regarded as a point on which it would stand or fall, is on the basic proposition of redistribution being taken out of parliament and given to an independent body. My contention is that we are denying that basic principle if we set up that body on terms under which its independence is not as clear as it really could be.

I started to say that I recognize the element of compromise that has been indicated on the part of the official opposition, and I do not want members to think our position is an immovable one and that we insist on the terms of my amendment to clause 6 and nothing else. We too are prepared to negotiate, to find some middle ground if it is at all possible to do so. I was wondering whether over the 48 hour interval there might be some attempt at negotiation of the point, but there was none, at least so far as my experience is concerned in the last two days.

But I want to say to the government and the official opposition as well that if the objection to my amendment—and after all it is my amendment we are still officially discussing—is that it places this power of appointment in the hands of the chief justice of the province, which some people do not like, we would have no objection to changing the situs of that power of appointment. We would have no objection to substituting the Speaker for the chief justice in so far as making these appointments is concerned, but we do feel that the kind of advice, the guide lines, the directions that are contained in my amendment should be given to the Speaker as well.

We would suggest that either one of two things be tried as a means of arriving at a consensus among all five parties in the house. After all, the government is really in no better position to win the support of one party and lose the support of two or three others than it would have been if it had stayed where it was. I suggest that as a basis for arriving at a consensus among all five parties either one of two things might be done.

Mr. Leboe: Making a mountain out of a molehill.

Mr. Knowles: We had such fine support from the hon. member for Cariboo when this matter was up before, but apparently he has got tired of it. I suggest either one of two things, either that my amendment be amended by substituting the Speaker for the chief justice but leaving in the amendment the categories from which the Speaker would make the choices, or that the government should indicate that it will add words to its amendment so far as the power of appointment by the Speaker is concerned. The government's amendment could read that these appointments be made by Mr. Speaker provided, however, that the appointments or at least one of them be made from a certain class or category of persons.

As an offer to compromise, as an offer to find some basis on which we might all agree, I suggest that provision should be made in the proposal, whichever way it comes about, whether by way of amendment to my amendment or amendment to the government's amendment, for our proposal that one of these appointees, whether he is named by the chief justice or by the Speaker, should be the chief electoral officer of the province, the surveyor general, the recorder of vital statistics or a person of that kind.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear that we are prepared to withdraw our amendment if an alternative is put forward that is acceptable to all of us and in keeping with the basic principle of the bill, but if no such acceptable alternative is brought forward we would not, of course, be willing to withdraw our amendment. We feel it is in keeping with the basic principle of the bill itself, and that if the house does not want our amendment it will have to vote it down rather than expecting us to withdraw it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, taking into consideration the two alternative proposals by the Minister of Transport with regard to the previously moved amendment to clause 6, it becomes obvious that in trying to find perfection in the selection of the commissions we become involved immediately in different interpretations of perfection.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in looking over the two alternative proposals it seems to me that the one that returns to the appointment of some members of the commission by the leader of the government in the house and the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons is not essentially different from clause 6 in the original bill. I should say that we were not particularly happy with the idea of trying to set up what might be called a non-partisan redistribution commission and then turning around and allowing the leaders of the two major political parties in the country to appoint 50 per cent of the membership of these commissions. I think therefore, so far as we are concerned, we can almost disregard that particular proposal.

We come, then, to the second proposal that has been suggested. We think there is some merit in having the Speaker of this chamber appoint at least some of the members of these redistribution commissions. Certainly it is true, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, that the Speaker will be appointing 20 commissioners across the country. He will also, it is expected, seek advice from someone, but we do not disagree with that at all. What is more, we think he may even seek advice from some of the political parties in the country. There seems to have been an attempt to downgrade the advice that can be received from political organizations in the country in so far as redistribution is concerned. I suppose it is fair to say that each political party will certainly have to take into consideration its own interests in redistribution. At the same time, this would be offset by other parties making their representations as well.

I do not subscribe to this theory, if you want to call it such, that the advice that can come to these commissions from political parties would be all bad. I think even the practice we have had in the past, that has been deplored in some cases, has not been that bad. Certainly political organizations are keenly interested, and I might say some of the executive officers of the political organizations within a constituency probably have a better knowledge of some of the problems of organizing or setting up constituencies in the light of such considerations as natural boundaries, community of interest and so on, than any other groups in the country.

Overriding the consideration of finding a perfect formula for nominating the members of this commission, Mr. Chairman, is the fact that redistribution is long overdue. I believe perhaps the second alternative proposal is as close to perfection as we can reach at this time. I want to say this, too, whether we accept the original draft of clause 6 in Bill No. C-72 or the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or either of the two alternatives that have been presented to us within the last 48 hours. Overriding all that is the fact that we need to have redistribution. If we do not reach some kind of agreement soon we are going to have another election based on the 1951 census. In my opinion this would be a far greater disservice to the electorate in Canada than anything that could come about from any one of the four proposals that are before us. I feel that the limit imposed by clause 13, for example, whether it is 20 per cent, 25 per cent or even 33⅓ per cent, will be such that there will not be a great deal of discretion left to the commissioners in so far as the size of a constituency is concerned. Certainly there will be some discretion in the minor adjustment of borders, but at least the limit imposed by clause 13 does remove a great deal of the discretionary power redistribution commissions have had in the past.

Speaking directly to the change from the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to the new proposals, I would say that I do not accept the contention that the president or a similar officer or member of the faculty of a university would be any less partisan politically than the Speaker of this house. As a matter of fact I believe the Speaker would be considerably less partisan, if I may put it that way, than most of the members of these faculties. I feel that the question before us, therefore, at least the paramount question before us, is to accept one or the other of these four proposals and get on with setting up the redistribution commission so that it can be done, rather than squabbling over what might be called the minor details in seeking perfection.

An important idea, by the way, advanced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that the chief electoral officer of a province or perhaps the surveyor general of a province should be a member of the commission. There are a number of reasons for that, I think. First of all, for example, the chief electoral officer of a province of necessity would be very familiar with the topography, community of interests and so on because he has been involved in these things within the provincial jurisdiction. He would be a very useful member on the commission simply because of his knowledge of the province, regardless of what his politics might be. We would hope, of course, that he did not have any partisan political tendency that would guide his thinking.

The other reason that the chief electoral officer of the province would be a useful member of the commission is that he could probably give some guidance to the commission in so far as making the boundaries of a number of provincial constituencies coterminus with the boundaries of federal constituencies. This is a matter that has some merit because I know that, particularly in the first election following redistribution, there is a great deal of confusion along the boundaries of both federal and provincial constituencies. People get used to going to certain polling places. They get used to dealing with the old set-up, if you want to call it that, and it is a little difficult to educate them or to inform the electorate of the constituencies about the many changes that may have been made.

I am not going to speak any longer, Mr. Chairman. I think we would prefer to accept the alternative proposal which gives the Speaker of this house the power to name two of the members on the ten commissions. If anything could be done to give some guidance to the Speaker, along the lines that one of the men to be appointed should possibly be the chief electoral officer or the surveyor general of a province, that might be useful. But we are not prepared to hold up the adoption of clause 6, because we think redistribution, based on a more recent census than that of 1951, is a more important consideration than these minor details.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. gentlemen for indicating so clearly what their positions are. The hon. member for Bow River has indicated that those of his friends for whom he speaks—and I gather that is quite a considerable portion of his party—are willing to accept the first of the two alternative suggestions I made the other day. Of course I indicated clearly the other day that I thought this was a far better suggestion than the other.

Although I was rather impressed by some of the things said by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, I frankly think all four methods that are now before us in one form or another would result in perfectly satisfactory commissions. There has been a lot of unnecessary hairsplitting about these things, but I have never indicated any fundamental objection to any of them.

I sympathized with the views of members of parties other than the Conservative and Liberal parties when they felt there was some bias against them in choosing the leaders of the two major parties as appointors.

Mr. Knowles: On a point of order, surely the minister knows he is misstating the case. We never expressed concern that this was bias against us. We expressed the view that it was inconsistent with the idea of doing it on a non-political basis. If we thought there was a bias against us we would be accepting the fourth proposal, but we are not.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not in a mood to make much distinction in the matter. Whoever they might be, I do not believe the leader of the opposition and the prime minister would exercise this power in any other than the judicial way in which parliament intended it to be exercised. I would not have taken responsibility for putting that in the bill in the first place if I thought they would be activated by partisan considerations.

I did think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had found a way of designating the kind of people it would be desirable to have on these commissions, in the light of the Manitoba experience which is the only one we have had in Canada. I said I thought I was slightly in favour of that, but I never went beyond that; and I think the hon. gentlemen will agree that I said only that if I had to choose between the two I think his amendment had some slight advantage over the original bill. But I pointed out, and I repeat, that it enables three members of a four member commission to be appointed by one man.

I do not always agree with the hon. member for Bow River, but I believe he had much the better of the argument with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre about the concentration of power. The Speaker will be making two of these nominations.

Mr. Knowles: Two times ten is 20.

Mr. Pickersgill: But not on the same commission, as the hon. member for Bow River pointed out. There will be only two persons on each commission appointed by one appointor, and two others appointed in a different manner. That is certainly less concentration of power than to have three appointed by one person on each separate commission.

As for the tremendous difficulties and burden this will impose upon the Speaker, I think he can well bear them, considering the other burdens we place on him every day. I am totally unimpressed with that argument. Like the hon. member for Medicine Hat I believe the most important thing is to carry out our constitutional responsibility to make sure there is a redistribution which, as we all know, is long overdue. That is the overriding consideration.

This other rather complicated scheme I put forward also has a precedent in New Zealand, and I think it would not result in an unsatisfactory, unfair or partisan redistribution. I do not think any of them would, but of all four the one I like best is the one giving these appointments to the Speaker. I believe he will seek to appoint, wherever they are available—and this is all the hon. member's amendment would do—officers like the chief electoral officer of a province and the surveyor general of a province, someone who is technically competent; but we cannot force him to do so, and we cannot force these people to act. That is the original difficulty we had in this matter.

Therefore I am not much in favour of trying to put this condition into the amendment itself; but when the hon. member's amendment is disposed of and if the house does not accept it—I guess it will not—then if he wants to move a subamendment he can test the committee on this point. That is his right, and I think that would be the proper way to do it. Personally I feel that if we are going to give this task to His Honour the Speaker, we should give it to him, period. We should not seek to give it to him and then say, "We are just a little dubious about this and we think we ought to tell you how to do it."

Mr. Knowles: Has the minister forgotten the arguments he used in favour of my amendment when, if we were to give the job to the chief justices, he argued that we should give them guide lines?

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly; but I would remind the hon. gentleman that the chief justice of a province is not an officer of the parliament of Canada. He is not under our jurisdiction, and if there are any flagrant abuses of this power by His Honour the Speaker we have a remedy in our rules. It has been used only once or twice in our history, and I hope it will never be used for a long time again.

I am totally unimpressed with the suggestion that this would impose a terrible burden on the Speaker, or that there would be any difficulty, or that in any advice the Speaker should choose to take there would be any more suggestion of partisanship than in any other method of appointment which might possibly be devised. That is why I asked the hon. gentleman if he knew how appointments are made in the United Kingdom.

It might be useful to refresh hon. members' memories on that point. There are four commissions in the United Kingdom, one each for England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and the chairman of all four commissions is the Speaker of the House of Commons. I think it is true that his chairmanship is perhaps rather perfunctory but he has a voice and I suppose, being the chairman, he has the largest voice of all if he chooses to exercise it. The deputy chairman is a judge of the high court appointed by the lord chancellor.

There are two other members in the English commission, one appointed by the home secretary and the other by the minister of housing and local government. They are not even appointed by order in council; they are appointed by ministers. I do not think anyone in this house would want to trust ministers to make such appointments and at no time have I suggested that this be done, but that is what is done in England and there has never been any real suggestion I know of that the English commission was not as non-partisan as anything one could reasonably get. In Scotland the two ministerial appointments—there is a judge who is the deputy chairman—are made by the Secretary of Scotland. The situation is analogous for the other two commissions, and I think it would be wasting the time of the committee to go beyond that.

What we would be doing here, if we did not accept the hon. gentleman's amendment and instead accepted the one which I am now quite satisfied I would be justified in moving if the hon. gentleman's amendment is defeated, would be saying that the chairman of each commission shall be appointed by the chief justice of the province and, if there is any default, by the Chief Justice of Canada; that two other appointments apart from the representation commissioner would be made by the Speaker. We will be saying that we have enough confidence in whoever may be the Speaker of the House of Commons to feel that he will appoint the kind of people that it is the whole purpose of the legislation to have appointed; that is to say, persons who will be independent and objective in their judgment.

I have always thought, as I confessed on Tuesday, that this would be the best method, if it was acceptable to the house. The only fear I ever had about proposing it was that we might have a serious division in the house about it, which I would regret. But I do not think there was anything said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that would lead one to hesitate to make this motion and to take the sense of the house about it. The kind of objections he made were not the kind of objections which reflected in any way at all upon the Speaker or upon the office of Speaker, and I am sure he did not intend to make any such reflection.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, may I confirm that. My objections are objections in principle; not against the person or the office.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman's principles in this particular case are principles, if you like, but they are not principles to which I subscribe. I do think there is no person more likely to be completely independent in these matters than the Speaker of this house, whoever he may be; and I remind hon. members that there is the glare of publicity upon the actions of the Speaker of this house that there is not even upon the chief justice of a province. I am very glad indeed that hon. gentlemen immediately opposite are willing, in the spirit in which the hon. member for Bow River put it forward today, to say that, while for them this is second best they are willing to accept it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre obviously feels that his amendment is better than anything else and I think therefore it should be put to the house and we should vote on it. I may say, of course, that when only two possibilities appeared to be before us—that is, the original bill and the hon. gentleman's amendment—I was disposed to vote for it; but having found something that I think is better and on which I believe there is sufficient consensus in the house, I of course would not vote for his alternative.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Chairman, I will only take about two minutes of the time of the committee in connection with this amendment. I just wish to say that I think we are moving along and are making progress, which is something the people of Canada are looking forward to. I think we have been making a mountain out of a molehill as far as the power vested in these commissioners is concerned. The rules are set down in connection with the working of the commissions, the formula is very rigid and quite confining, and I do not think there should have been nearly as much discussion as we have had in connection with this matter. That has been my opinion right from the beginning. I believe these commissions could have been set up a long time ago.

I am particularly interested in the fact that there was a long delay in again bringing this matter before the house after its initial introduction. I think this was wrong. I believe that when the bill was before the house it should have been kept before the house. We should have been in the position to deal with it and get on with the job so these commissions could be set up and working. There will be other times when any amendments that are needed can be brought forward in the light of experience. This is not, I hope, our last session, although it is going to last a little longer than some of us thought would be the case to begin with.

There is one thing I should like to mention in connection with these long delays. If we are going to continue to be four or five years behind in having adjustments made to electoral boundaries, I think something should be put into the British North America Act and some changes should be made that would take into account other vital statistics being used in order to upgrade our position as far as the population is concerned. In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would just say that since we now have a degree of unanimity in the house, we are glad to be able to support any amendment that may be introduced which most members of the house will support.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I think the intention of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, echoed by the Minister of Transport and the hon. member for Cariboo, that an election based upon the 1951 census would be most unfair and injurious to the electorate carries with it, as they stated, the implication that we should therefore give passage to whatever measure might be presented to us, if it is presented in a reasonable way and if the arguments in favour of it appear on the surface to be reasonable. I think this is a somewhat misleading and somewhat false position to take.

It is correct that we are long overdue in carrying out the responsibilities that devolve upon parliament with regard to the question of redistribution following the decennial census, but I believe we should not let that consideration override the possibility that any bill which is before us is likely to be wrecked, adulterated or watered down from the original principle. I think this is likely to take place here.

Generally, Mr. Chairman, I am sure there is agreement that we want (1) to have a redistribution system as soon as possible in order that redistribution can take place, and (2) we want that system to be non-political. These two principles are correct, but they should not blind us to some of the other features which might be bad in attempting to put them into effect. I believe this might be the case here, with these compromise proposals that are being presented and argued. It is my understanding that there was a large degree of the spirit of co-operation among all the parties in this chamber up until Tuesday of this week, when the Minister of Transport placed the two alternate proposals on Hansard, but that since that time—I have consulted with the people in the New Democratic party who participate in these all-party meetings—there has not been any sort of discussion or consultation as has usually been the case in matters such as this. At least there has been no sort of consultation or discussion to which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre was invited or in which he participated. I am not objecting to that in any way, and I am sure he is not objecting either, but it does seem passing strange that all of a sudden there is agreement from those who previously raised the most stringent objections to the manner of proceeding as proposed in the bill introduced by the government.

I assume that what has taken place—I am not objecting to this, of course—is that there has been some behind the scenes consultation between the government and the official opposition in an attempt to reach a meeting of minds on what previously had been an impasse. As I say, I do not object to that, but if it did occur I think the fact should be placed on record so that the house and the general public will know that such arrangement did exist and that the Minister of Transport is not completely taken by surprise at the position of the official opposition. In fact I think he let the cat out of the bag when he virtually anticipated what the vote of this committee might be on the amendment before us if and when it did take place, which indicates that there was this prior consultation in an attempt to reach a meeting of minds. In fact, I would put the suggestion forward that such a meeting did take place, and in the absence of any denial of my suggestion I think we can accept as a fact that there was a behind the scenes meeting on the proposals now put before us.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. gentleman is making certain insinuations I think I should make it clear that there has been no greater degree of consultation with anyone in the official opposition than there has been with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Howard: Well, Mr. Chairman, we are not talking about degrees of consultation, whatever that vague term might mean. We are talking about consultation and discussion as such. I am not going to argue the point; if that is the way the government wants to operate then that is its own business. But in the light of the alternate suggestions which the Minister of Transport has put forward and the alacrity with which one of them has been accepted by the official opposition, it does lead one to look a little deeper into what is being proposed here, what is likely to be the effect of such a proposal, and what are to be the mechanics by which Mr. Speaker appoints these two members of the redistribution commissions.

I should like to read, if I may, a few comments made by the Minister of Transport, as recorded at page 9954 of Hansard for November 10 last. He said:

—it might be better to trust His Honour the Speaker to do the sensible thing, and not to put any strings upon him except the obvious string that these appointments must be made from persons resident in the province.

This point was touched on by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I hope the inference is not drawn from this that because one may object to this procedure outlined in the proposal he is thereby not trusting Mr. Speaker; the minister's words are:

—it might be much better to trust His Honour the Speaker—

So if we do object to this it should in no way be interpreted as implying any degree of mistrust of the integrity or honour of the individual who may at any given time hold the position of Mr. Speaker.

There are some very revealing things in the statement of the Minister of Transport of November 10 which I think disclose in essence why he proposed the alternatives and why he was favourable to one of them. It equally discloses why the official opposition jumped at the opportunity to endorse one of the proposals.

Mr. Pickersgill: It was a pretty slow jump.

Mr. Howard: The reasoning behind this, of course, is that if the proposal by the Minister of Transport is finally accepted it will in essence, even though it does not say so in the bill, be identical to that which was contained in the bill itself; namely that there would be political partisanship and activity in the selection of the commissioners, which is the one thing we are trying to avoid. That is the one principle in the bill on which everyone was agreed—that the redistribution of seats in Canada should take place in a completely non-partisan atmosphere. I submit that the proposals put forward by the Minister of Transport run contrary to this principle, and in effect attempt to drag Mr. Speaker into the political arena as well, which is even worse.

The Minister of Transport in his remarks the other day went on to quote the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings as follows:

We have a Prime Minister who is an officer of the house and a Leader of the Opposition who is also an officer of the house, and they are the only ones in this category. I agree that whoever occupied the office of prime minister or leader of the opposition would exercise the authority given to them under this provision in a manner which would be entirely creditable both to themselves and to parliament—

I am reading the entire quotation, Mr. Chairman, because I do not want the minister or the committee to think that I am selecting something out of context.

The minister then goes on to quote the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre as follows:

I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre should correct his stand on this. What is required in this country is respect for parliament—

No one will disagree with that.

—and that carries with it respect for the leaders of these two great parties.

Then the minister went on to quote the hon. member Edmonton West and another member of the Conservative party, each of whom in his reasoning and argument was supporting the provision in the bill that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition should participate in the selection of two of the commissioners.

I think it is obvious from those quotations, and it is obvious from the speed with which the official opposition endorsed one of the proposals of the Minister of Transport—in fact, the hon. member for Bow River let it slip earlier this afternoon, if that is properly what he did, when he said that undoubtedly Mr. Speaker would consult with the leaders of the government party and the opposition party in the selection of these two commissioners—

Mr. Pickersgill: And also the other leaders.

Mr. Howard: I do not know from the movement of the minister's head whether he is agreeing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was pointing out to the hon. gentleman that that was not all that the hon. member for Bow River said. As I heard him—I see he is here now so he can speak for himself—he said he assumed that the Speaker would consult the leaders of all groups in the house; and I think there would be nothing improper at all in his doing so, as long as he exercised his own judgment and did these things properly. That is what happens of course in the United Kingdom. There are consultations, which means that there is that assurance. The hon. gentleman has been trying to read into words which I used the other day meanings which were never intended and which are not there. All I ever meant by consultation was that there would not only be the assurance that the appointments would be appointments of independent and objective persons but that they would be the kind of appointments which would commend themselves to everyone as being such. Some degree of consultation to make sure of that seems to me to be only ordinary common sense.

Mr. Howard: I have listened to the speeches of the Minister of Transport in this house on a number of occasions and know him well enough to know that it is possible to read almost anything into what he says; and invariably that is the case. So, regardless of the bland statement that he now makes, I say to that statement: rubbish. What was initially intended when the government introduced the bill was that there would be—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. gentleman now is breaking the rules of the house. He is one of the most experienced and skilful parliamentarians in the house, and we all acknowledge that fact, but nobody knows better than he that he has no right to attribute motives to other hon. members. I have stated what I meant, and what I meant is what the words say. I had no thought at any time that there would be any kind of bargaining so that there would be one appointment of a Tory and one appointment of a Grit, or anything of that sort. All I ever thought consultation would be used for was to make sure that the kind of individual appointed would be completely without a partisan character. If I thought anything other than that would happen I would be opposed to this proposal.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the highly flattering remarks of the minister have comcompletely disarmed me. However, it is an undeniable fact, and should be obvious to anyone, that in its original form subclause 2 of clause 6 proposes that the two members of the commissions, other than the chairman and representation commissioner, would be appointed, one by the leader of the government in the House of Commons and one by the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons. When the minister now says that he never at any time intended anything other than that these appointments would be nonpolitical and non-partisan, I again say rubbish. The minister did say that which I have indicated, and that is what is said in the bill now before us. What could be more clear than that one of the two members of the commission, other than the chairman, shall be appointed by the leader of the government and one by the leader of the opposition? That is what the bill says, and if the minister is trying to suggest that that does not imply, or perhaps even more than imply, a desire for political appointment to this commission, then I do not know what it does imply.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, once again I rise on a question of privilege. I have all the copies of Hansard in front of me and I could easily look up what I did say during second reading of this bill. It was quoted earlier today by one hon. member opposite. What I said was, and I repeated it again today, that if these functions were carried out by the prime minister and the leader of the opposition, whoever they might be, I believe they would carry them out in the spirit in which this parliament asked them to do so, and they would not make political or partisan appointments. That is my belief. If the hon. member thinks that just because a man happens to be the leader of a party, it is impossible for him to act in an independent and objective manner, having been given a trust, he has a lower opinion of human nature than I have.

Mr. Grégoire: You are very naïve when you think that.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for the Minister of Transport to become insulting in his remarks, but if that is what he believes, good luck to him. He can go right ahead believing that.

The fact of the matter is that it says in the bill that two members shall be appointed by the two leaders. We are not here, Mr. Chairman, being called upon to legislate as the result of the faith and belief of the Minister of Transport. God forbid our ever doing that. We are legislating in the Queen's english, and nothing is more clear than that by the provisions of this bill one member shall be appointed by the leader of the government in the House of Commons and one shall be appointed by the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons.

Mr. Chairman, we know from past practice that leaders of governments in the House of Commons engage in politics and partisanships whenever there is an occasion to do so. I do not place the present Prime Minister above that position. One need only look at the recent appointment to the Senate to obtain some indication of that haven for retired-work-horses.

Mr. Woolliams: What about Mr. Coldwell's appointment?

Mr. Howard: I did not know that Mr. Coldwell was appointed to the Senate.

Mr. Pickersgill: He was appointed to the privy council, which is an even more honourable appointment.

Mr. Knowles: That will get you in trouble with the Senate.

Mr. Howard: Perhaps if the hon. member for Bow River and his party had considered following their program of reform of the Senate after they were elected in 1957, we might have a different situation today, but even his great leader was unable to get away from the desire to partake in political activity in making political appointments. I am not so naïve that I could believe the Minister of Transport when he says that no prime minister is going to make political appointments if the occasion to do so arose. I believe that he might be enticed into doing that sort of thing.

The fact of the matter is that the original presentation of this bill, which was in the name of the Prime Minister, admittedly, and not in the name of the Minister of Transport, provided for appointments to be made by the prime minister and the leader of the opposition. Perhaps if the bill had been under the sponsorship of the Minister of Transport we would now have a completely different proposal without this obvious attempt at partisanship.

Regardless of how often the Minister of Transport says that he did not mean there should be partisanship, or that he does not believe in that sort of thing, the proposal made by the Minister of Transport, in respect of the mechanism by which one of these commissioners would be appointed, would lead us in the direction again of political partisanship in the selection of the members of these commissions, through influence brought to bear on whomever happened to occupy the position of Mr. Speaker. I do not say that in a derogatory way, but so long as the office of Mr. Speaker is a political office, and not a permanent non-partisan one, which I am sure we would all like to see, this possibility would remain.

My second point in argument against the proposal of the Minister of Transport is that it is regrettable that Mr. Speaker should be dragged into the political activities of this nation even more than he has been dragged in at the moment. Every government in recent times has expressed the feeling, shared I think by all members of this house, or at least of this party, that Mr. Speaker should be a non-partisan individual. I think we are all in favour of the sort of semi-colonial attitude, that whatever is done in the United Kingdom should be done here, namely that we should have a Speaker who in fact occupies an honoured position for a long period of time, and that his office should be removed from political activity not only on a day to day basis but as well during political campaigning. The fact of the matter is that this is not the case. I do not know how far away the time is, and perhaps the sooner the better, but Mr. Macnaughton, our present Speaker, will be running as a candidate in his own constituency. Presumably there will be, as there has been in the past, candidates of other political parties running against him. As has happened to previous Speakers, he will find himself embroiled in political controversy, perhaps emanating from the bill we are considering at this time. Perhaps his riding will be redistributed; such has happened in the past. In fact I have heard the Leader of the Opposition say that the terrible Liberals have wiped his seat out from under him time after time.

Mr. Woolliams: You are talking about his riding.

Mr. Howard: When I used the word "seat" I knew what I was referring to, but whether or not the hon. member for Bow River did is another question. The Speaker will be involved and embroiled in political activity and controversy in a partisan way, and I assume he will still be a Liberal candidate in the next election. What we say we want to have happen is to have the Speaker set apart from political partisanship. We do not even like the fact that at election time he has to run under a party label, with candidates of the other parties running against the Speaker, because we want to preserve his position on a non-political and non-partisan basis in order to guarantee, if it needs to be guaranteed, that the rules of the house will be enforced in an impartial and non-political way.

But instead of moving in the direction of placing Mr. Speaker in an even more non-partisan position because of the office he holds it is now proposed that we should move in the direction of bringing him into politics by dragging him into consultation with political leaders in order to select the members of the redistribution commission which we want to be non-political. I think this is regrettable.

It is for these reasons that I say we should not rush madly into endorsing one or other of the proposals which are before us at least by way of suggestion, if not in a formal way. We should not do so merely because we happen to have a strong desire to pass a redistribution bill in order that redistribution may be made on the basis of the 1961 census before the next election takes place. Incidentally, while we are on the subject of elections, we could very well have an election on our hands within the next few months. Everyone tells me this is quite possible and that it is probable that such an election would be conducted on the basis of the 1951 rather than the 1961 census. I am sure the minister will know more about that than I do because of his closer consultation with individuals in the office of the chief electoral officer, as well as his knowledge of other matters. Be that as it may, for the reasons I have outlined I submit we do not want to be seduced into endorsing either of the proposals now before us merely because there is a desire to hurry and pass the bill. Hurrying to get the bill through is commendable in itself, but in trying to do so we must not destroy the main principle, the establishment of redistribution commissions on a non-political and non-partisan basis.

In my opinion the proposal of the Minister of Transport that Mr. Speaker should make these appointments makes the bill even worse than it was in its original form. In its original form political partisanship was at least out in the open where everyone could see it and we could expect certain things to take place. Now it will be hidden behind the scenes. In addition, we are attempting to drag Mr. Speaker into the political arena and partisan activities to a far greater extent than he is at the moment, and in the process we are likely to degrade even further the office of Speaker, when what we want to do is to elevate it.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made some alternative suggestions to the proposal of the Minister of Transport. I submit they should be looked at very carefully. I do not think we should rush helter-skelter into picking one or other of the amendments which have been suggested. In another 20 or 25 minutes we will reach private members' hour starting at five o'clock, which is followed by the supper recess. I suggest it should be possible during this interval for the leaders of the parties or their spokesmen to get together and consult on this matter and see whether or not they cannot work out some generally acceptable compromise amendment. In the light of the variety of things that have been said I submit that is a far better way to approach the matter than to follow the suggestion of the Minister of Transport that we should have a vote right away on the amendment which has been before the committee for some months, when he will then proceed to move another amendment which just came to our attention a couple of days ago and about which, as the Minister of Transport has said, there has been no consultation with anybody.

I think we should put the consultative process to work, provide an opportunity for the various parties to consult and maybe by eight o'clock they will be able to arrive at a workable, worth-while amendment. If there is unanimity with regard to such an amendment, the possibility of political partisanship will be even further removed. I think this is the principal objective we all want to achieve, the carrying out of redistribution on a strictly non-political basis because we have had too much of political interference in the past.

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Chairman, we are now on the sixth day of debate on this particular clause. It seems to me we have heard all the arguments, or certainly sufficient argument to make up our minds on these points. I have intended for some time to support the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and that is still my intention. It seemed to me that in the past the official opposition did not want this amendmen to come to a vote, but today we see the New Democratic party, which proposed the amendment, determined that it will not come to a vote. I would hope we could get on with the matter.

Mr. Howard: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member for York-Scarborough does not want to be unfair and misinterpret what has been said. I for one never said that we did not want the amendment to come to a vote. All I said was that we should not rush, because the matter can be discussed during the supper hour.

Mr. Moreau: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that those people who are suggesting that we should get on with the nation's business might very well agree to do so.

Mr. Scott: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, as a constituent of the hon. member for York-Scarborough I want to voice my objection to his imputing motives of that kind to our group. He is in danger of losing my vote in the next election as a result of the motives he is imputing to us. We are trying to air our views on the question. We are not trying to prevent a vote at all.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that the member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau) cannot claim that we did not devote to this matter before us all the time required, because during those six days of debate we did not yet say one word relevant to it. However, when stupidity such as this amendment occurs, then we should not be told that we talked long enough, because we wish to say a few things on this subject.

It is proposed that the Speaker appoint the members of the electoral boundaries commission. Was he asked if he would accept those duties? That is something different. On the other hand, if closure is to be imposed—

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I suggested that we vote on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and when the time comes to discuss other motions, the necessary time should be granted.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, concerning the point of order, I must say that it is not the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who submitted that text.

Why are we presented with this text before voting on another amendment? Instead of voting on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, we were asked to vote on a rather stupid suggestion by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). I have it in my hands. Where does it come from? We are asked to vote on this matter without discussing it. This is a round about way of proceeding. Endeavouring to have the Conservative party defeat the Liberal party is a stupid thing, because both think alike and work together to the prejudice of the Canadian people.

How can the Speaker of the house know the residents of Prince Edward Island or British Columbia whom he will appoint as commissioners? What will happen then? It is simple; the Speaker will seek advice, and from whom? From the old Liberal party. It is easy to see that there is collusion between the two old parties at the present time. Their agreement is quite obvious. They said to themselves: each of us will suggest one man to the Speaker. So, there is an agreement between the old parties. In what do they differ? Both, when in power say the same thing, and again, when in opposition, say the same thing.

But in this particular business, I am supposed to believe that there is no agreement between the two old parties. Let me tell you this: accept that, and you will see everything else adopted, because there is an agreement, a tacit agreement. And we should accept that without a word? The hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Moreau) did not consider the matter very long before asking us to end our discussion.

Mr. Moreau: I simply asked for a vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I am in favour of the amendment moved by that hon. member and I should like to express my opinion by my vote.

Mr. Grégoire: If you are asking for a vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, did you conclude an agreement with the Conservatives on that matter? That is another way of suggesting: let us vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and afterwards, we will manage to have it passed by the Conservatives. Of course, it was necessary for the Conservatives and us, also, to have a copy. Now, we all have a copy. That is an understanding. You want to vote on this amendment, very well, but give us at least an opportunity to discuss it.

Let us suppose that Mr. Speaker does accept that job, and appoints redistribution commissioners and then, if we are not satisfied with the work done, who should we blame? Mr. Speaker? Then, would the hon. member for Lapointe be entitled to rise while the Speaker is in the chair to tell him: "Mr. Speaker, I am blaming you for having appointed the commissioners who played petty politics in our ridings." Would I have the right to do so? At that time the standing orders will be amended.

If the Speaker appoints political partisans, people who were not recommended by the leaders of the old line parties and who do not do their job properly, or carry it out in a partisan way, will I have the right to blame the Speaker and tell him: "You are all wet." If a member of parliament said such a thing in the house, he would soon be evicted.

Why impose upon the Speaker such a part? Let us assume that the present Speaker had appointed some commissioners who had not done their work properly, and that when the time came to appoint a new Speaker the Prime Minister would say: "I move that Mr. So-and-so be appointed as Speaker," at that time I am quite sure he would not receive unanimous consent from the members. On the other hand, if the Speaker begins a session without unanimous consent, what kind of session shall we have? Have you ever thought of that?

Would the Speaker be the only party responsible for such appointments? Will he be responsible to the house? Would we have the right to direct any question to him after he has appointed any commissioners? These are the questions to which we have not received, as yet, any answer. Moreover, does the Speaker accept such a duty?

I have the utmost confidence in our present Speaker. I feel he is fair, unbiased and sincere. If I were told that the present incumbent would always be Speaker, I would be sure that he would be impartial and that his appointments would not be made on a political basis. But will it always be the same Speaker? Indeed, would he agree to take on that job? I would be most surprised if he did. Before approving this, let us ask the Speaker if he would accept that task.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask you a question. If you were Speaker of the house, would you accept such a responsibility? Mr. Chairman, you who are Deputy Speaker, would you take that risk since the proposal mentions:

Any person holding the office of Speaker.

Would you accept making those appointments at the risk of my criticizing you later in the house? In my opinion, you should answer the question since you might be called upon to fill that position under the amendment which reads as follows:

The Speaker of the House of Commons or any person holding the office of Speaker.

You are such a person, Mr. Chairman. I am asking you the question. Are you ready to answer?

The Chairman: The hon. member knows full well that the chairman of the committee is not allowed to take part in the debate.

Mr. Grégoire: I am not asking you to participate in the debate. Since you are liable to be affected by the amendment, I am merely asking you to assist the committee because, before making an appointment, one should find out whether the appointee will accept.

Have you ever seen a senator named by the Prime Minister refusing his appointment? Certainly not. Why? Because the person was asked for his assent before being appointed to the Senate. So, if you are qualified to fulfil the duties somebody will ask you, before your appointment, if you accept the position. Nobody is asking you to take part in the debate and, moreover, I am convinced that if you want a delay hon. members will grant it to you so that you can answer a question.

I would ask the same thing of the Minister of Transport who sponsors this bill. Did he ask the Speaker whether he was willing to accept this duty?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: If the hon. member would like me to answer now, I will. I am quite sure that His Honour the Speaker, as would any Speaker, would accept any obligation which the house in its wisdom saw fit to impose upon him, so long as it did not impair his judgment. Of course if it did, he would have only one recourse. We have given many decisions to the Speaker by decision of the house in the past. I have not any doubt whatever that if it is the will of the house the Speaker will, as he undertook when he became Speaker, carry it out.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: And if the Speaker refuses, will you appeal his decision? Will you request a vote in this house to force the Speaker to agree?

Is the Minister of Transport telling me that he pledges his word that the Speaker will agree? That is another question which I would like to have answered. Does the Minister of Transport pledge his word now, officially and in the name of the Speaker of the house, that the Speaker will accept?

Can the minister answer that?

Mr. Chairman, I can see that the minister is not willing to answer. I will put my question a third time. Is the Minister of Transport ready to pledge his word, officially and in the name of the Speaker, that the Speaker will accept the duties which we want to entrust to him?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: The simple answer to that is that we are not referring to the present incumbent. We are making legislation that will be in force until it is changed. As the Speaker himself points out on many occasions, he is the servant of the house. He is a faithful servant of the house and I am sure he will do anything that the house in its wisdom entrusts him to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I would like to put two more questions to the Minister of Transport. If the Speaker does not agree or is not willing to accept the new responsibilities which we would like to place on him, does it mean that the Speaker has ceased to be a wise servant of the House of Commons, and that the government would have to replace the Speaker if, for personal reasons or in anticipation of what will take place, he does not want to accept this new office? Will the government then appoint a new Speaker?

Would the minister answer that question?

[Text]

Mr. Pickersgill: No, I do not think I would like to reply to that question. There is a good principle about replying to hypothetical questions, and I think we should stick to actualities.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, this is not a hypothetical question. On the contrary, it is a distinct possibility, because I believe that the Speaker—as I know him—seeing that there is strong opposition from several members, and from at least two political parties, will realize that there are objections in certain parts of the house, and I am convinced that he will refuse to accept an office involving him directly in electoral and political partisanship.

After listening to the speeches delivered by members of the New Democratic party, and understanding the attitude of the members of the Créditistes on this matter, then, the Speaker refuse, ask the chairman of the involve him directly in politics and elections.

He also takes the risk of being blamed by members in connection with the appointments he will have to make, though he will not be personally responsible for the work done by the persons appointed.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that, before submitting his amendment the Minister of Transport should ask the Speaker of the house whether he accepts the office and, should the Speaker refuse, ask the Chairman of the committees (Mr. Lamoureux) whether he is willing to accept it.

Another point which I mentioned a while ago and would like to enlarge upon is this one. Let us suppose the acting Speaker, now chairman of the committee, should become responsible for appointing two members of the commission. I wonder if, in that event, he would feel very much at ease in appointing two members from Newfoundland to the commission. I also wonder if he would feel very much at ease in appointing two individuals from British Columbia or Alberta, individuals who would also become members of the electoral boundaries commissions.

I do believe the chairman will admit in his heart of hearts that such a duty should not be assigned to the Speaker of the house or to the Deputy Speaker.

What would he say if the Speaker knew nobody in the other provinces? Let us suppose he did not know anybody capable of performing this duty in another province. What will happen then? From whom will the Speaker seek advice? The Prime Minister? If the Prime Minister makes both recommendations, they will be political recommendations.

On the other hand, if he tells the Prime Minister: In all fairness, I shall also consult with the Leader of the Opposition, what will happen? They will still be political appointments.

If, by any chance, the Speaker were not as fair, honest and efficient as our present Speaker or the Deputy Speaker, who are beyond reproach and well deserve the confidence of the house, what would happen?

If, in five or six years from now, the Conservative party should go back to power and appoint a Speaker who would wish to use this legislation to indulge in political partisanship, what would happen then?

Mr. Chairman, you will agree that it would become dangerous if the Speaker should be replaced and that instead of consulting with qualified people, his successor should take advice from political organizers.

Still on the same subject, Mr. Chairman, appointments are being made at the present time. Appointments of electoral officers in the constituencies, of returning officers, those are political appointments. Can it be said that in the 265 constituencies in Canada electoral officers and returning officers have all been appointed on the basis of their competence or could it be that some of them have been appointed because they were former members of parliament or staunch Liberals or Conservatives?

Are we to believe that an electoral officer appointed by a political party is going to name qualified persons as returning officers when we know that some of them cannot even read or write? Why are those returning officers appointed there? Because through political patronage, they seek to get as many votes as possible; we know that from time to time they try to call in a man from a large family so as to get all the votes in that family in favour of the Liberal candidate, since a Liberal has appointed him there.

The same thing is likely to happen respecting those political appointments if the Speaker is not always as honest and competent as the one who occupies the chair at the present time.

And if the Speaker had to make political appointments, might not the Prime Minister have this point in mind when appointing a Speaker, and think: "I must have a Speaker who will make appointments that can be sanctioned or approved". When thinking about appointing a Speaker for the house, the Prime Minister, and designated within a po- and so, we shall just have to give him our list of names, and he will appoint those people on the electoral boundaries commission".

Mr. Speaker's being appointed by the Prime Minister, and designated within a political party is no reason for the Minister of Transport's forgetting it. If he did not think of it, I can hardly believe it, because I trusted him to be more intelligent.

Mr. Chairman, to help the committee carry on the study of the defects of the Minister of Transport's proposal, I hope that the latter, after having realized the technical and other flaws of his proposal, will try to improve it and suggest some method which will, at least, get redistribution out of politics.

Mr. Chairman, I should call it five o'clock.

[Text]

The Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair so that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper namely, notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I glean from discussions I have had with some hon. members that they would be agreeable to waiving private members' hour today and proceeding with public business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, if we were to proceed with the debate on redistribution between now and six o'clock I think it would be difficult for the party leaders to consult about the various proposals we have been discussing. To allow for that kind of consultation I think we should proceed with the business set down for this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would have a suggestion to make.

The Minister of Transport would perhaps agree to put aside clause 6 until after the six o'clock adjournment when we could consider less contentious clauses.

At that time the Minister of Transport would have had all the time between five and six o'clock, and also between six and eight o'clock, not necessarily for consultation with the leaders of other parties, but also to ask the Speaker if he would accept to fill such duties and, thereafter consult with the leaders of the different parties in order to find another solution. We could perhaps reach an agreement on these points and continue with the measure concerning redistribution.

[Text]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Apparently there is not unanimous agreement.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the eloquent appeal we heard last night about getting on with the public business I wonder if hon. gentlemen in the New Democratic party would not consider going on with public business during the next hour.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the items set down for discussion at five o'clock are equally important, and they are public business.

Mr. McIlraith: No, they are private members' business. They are not public business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers).

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

FEDERAL EXPENDITURES BY PROVINCES

The house resumed from Thursday, October 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Grégoire:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the report prepared by officials of the Department of Finance concerning federal expenditures in each of the provinces of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, before taking the vote—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has already taken part in the debate and cannot speak a second time.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I believe that the standing order does at least allow me to reply to the main arguments that may have been put forward, or to give further details—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. Order. The hon. member cannot speak a second time on the points that were raised during the debate.

[Text]

Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the issue involved in the production of papers in these circumstances is a very fundamental one concerning the relationship of the civil service to this house. The question involved is a very difficult and technical one in terms of explanation and understanding. Last Saturday the press printed copies of an order for return filed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in reply to questions originally raised by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). We are dealing essentially with the same subject matter. The whole question of the return of taxes by provinces and federal expenditures by provinces is one that certain members of this house have distorted, and distorted I would submit for their own partisan, political advantage. They have not served the cause of national unity by this procedure. Last week in this house there was a debate brought on, I believe, by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) in which the Minister of Finance took part, who pointed out that the reply which was filed, a careful reply summarizing the results of research in the department, consisted of ten pages of explanation of a very fine, technical nature. This did not prevent hon. members attempting to obtain an oversimplification of the returns, asking questions concerning the technical procedures and whether or not such and such an inference could be drawn.

The problem here, Mr. Speaker, is the question of the production of what are really the working papers of civil servants. I had the privilege and honour to serve as a research officer in the research and statistics division, in this case for national health and welfare, for some nine years. In the course of that time I participated in a number of projects which had as their purpose the preparation of answers for the minister in the house or deriving information which was used for programming within the department. It was frequently the case that when a first, initial draft of a study was prepared it had to be examined by senior officers within the division, examined very carefully, edited and checked. It would be a gross disservice to any department of government, to any research officer, to compel the premature, public disclosure of documents which are incomplete in themselves and which do not represent the standard of scholarship and of final preparation of material which is the mark of integrity of the civil service.

What the hon. member seeks to secure by this resolution is the publication of a series of premature, early drafts of reports which are incomplete, likely to be misinterpreted and which would do no service to Canadian unity. I do not believe it would serve the house or Canada to have this kind of material placed before the house in the form in which the hon. member who moved the motion presumably intends. I know there have been references to this matter in the press. There was a reference some weeks ago in Le Devoir, a front page story of a study in the Department of Finance, which presumed to make certain findings. We have now seen the final results as a result of screening, editing and polishing; and I use "polishing" in the sense of correcting inaccuracies or the exploring of areas of the subject matter which call for more careful attention. The results of that study have been filed and placed before this house. What can be the purpose of the mover of this motion in proceeding with it, in the face of the answers that were given by the Department of Finance to questions of an exactly similar nature posed by the hon. member for Three Rivers?

I think all members of this house should ponder the fundamental principle involved here. Are they going to, if they vote for such a motion—which I hope they will not—establish the principle that there should be no confidentiality of early drafts, of early reports of research officers in different branches of government? It would destroy scholarship within the research divisions of those men and women who serve this country and serve it well, who serve it with distinction and who are recognized in their professional capacity, if they did not have the right to work at their material, produce preliminary drafts, rework the preliminary drafts and stay with this material until they came to the conclusions and the results which they felt in their conscience and integrity they were prepared to support.

A parallel in regard to any form of research can readily be brought to mind. Someone doing laboratory research, who does experiments and makes certain initial findings which suggest certain hypotheses, does not publish these results right away. He tests them; he sets them up against repeated observation and experiment before the results are placed, as contributions to knowledge, in the public record. The acceptance of a motion of this nature would destroy the integrity of research operations in the federal civil service and would have very serious repercussions in terms of morale, in terms of the operations of government departments and in terms of the government itself of this country. I know that the mover of the motion thinks he can gain certain advantage by consistently pursuing a question which has been the subject of a great deal of ill informed speculation. There is the question in terms of federal expenditures. The hon. member who questioned the Minister of Finance the other day raised the matter of interest on the national debt. The question was asked, how was this distributed by provinces, and the assumption was that this would be done on a per capita basis. The mover of the motion then asked, "What would happen in the case of payments, in regard to the federal debt, of persons who reside outside Canada? What allowances are made?" Again this illustrates the very difficult and involved technical preparations that must be part of any such study, not only on the expenditures side but on the revenue side.

The Minister of Finance indicated, in response to questions asked in the early stages of debate on this motion, that revenues which are raised in any particular part of the country cannot be ascribed at first glance simply to the place from which they are reported. Sales taxes paid by a manufacturing concern are in fact paid in many different parts of the country; customs duties levied at one port cannot be properly ascribed to any one province without a careful examination of the nature of the goods on which duty has been paid.

The problem of distribution involves a very difficult study of the whole question of the incidence of taxation. There are no simple or easy answers to this, Mr. Speaker. The answers which have been given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) are the best which can be provided. Presumably they are not good enough for the mover of the motion; he wants answers which will suit his own purposes. I am reminded of the old story about the facts: that if they do not suit the theory then so much the worse for the facts. We have given the facts to the hon. member in the most careful, polished and complete form in which they can be presented with academic integrity, and I use that phrase to this house in its very best sense. There can be no useful purpose served by the mover of the motion's seeking to go beyond the presentation which has been made and seeking to explore through compelling disclosure of early drafts, working papers and incomplete statements a matter as explosive, as difficult and as emotional as this one.

These are days, Mr. Speaker, when perhaps greater strains are laid on our confederate structure than have been laid for many decades. There is an onus on all of us to be responsible in our public statements and to be responsible in this house. We should not lightly without good reason question such a matter as a formal statement by the Minister of Finance disclosing the origins of taxes and the destination of expenditures by provinces, such as that prepared in the way this return has been prepared. We raise much greater questions of national unity if we seek to go beyond the best professional competence and judgment of the officials of the department who have been responsible for the preparation of the order for return and the material contained in it.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that we have no choice but to say that this is not the kind of motion which should be accepted by this house. It is wrong because it seeks to compel premature disclosure of information which is not complete in itself. It is wrong because it would challenge the very integrity of those in the public service who are entrusted with research and investigation operations in various government departments. It is wrong because it seeks to give a distorted and very dangerous interpretation, within the present context of our confederation, of what one area gives and receives compared to what another area gives and receives. It is wrong because it seeks in the course of a public debate to deal with matters of an intricate and technical nature involving the compilation and interpretation of statistical data which can only be collected by those, in justice to the persons concerned, who are trained to interpret and understand that data, data which should not be misused for any narrow political or partisan advantage.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and for many other reasons which can be advanced, I think it would be proper for the mover of the motion to say to the house at this time that this is not the procedure for seeking such information. The procedure for seeking such information is by putting questions on the order paper. The questions which have been placed on the order paper dealing with this matter have been answered. If there is a question concerning the nature and validity of the assumptions and the interpretation of the material, then the most satisfactory procedure is again to phrase additional questions dealing with the returns which have been filed. These questions can be stated precisely. They can be framed by the hon. member, if necessary by consulting with persons who are trained, to make sure that the proper points are raised, and the answers can be prepared and filed accordingly. This procedure is the orderly, responsible and I suggest the sensible way of dealing with this matter.

The alternative procedure would, in my submission, seek to compel the premature and I would suggest disturbing publication of incomplete, early, preliminary notes, preliminary findings and preliminary tables which are in many cases prepared by a junior officer who is assigned to the project, and subsequently reviewed by his senior in that particular section or division. Any procedure which distorts the research process by placing the civil servants involved in a position where their academic integrity and reputation would inevitably be jeopardized is one which I am sure on reflection will not commend itself to many members of this house.

I would strongly suggest to the very utmost of whatever persuasive powers I possess that the mover of the motion should withdraw it; that he should have recourse to the alternative of phrasing questions which can be put on the order paper and which can deal with any particular aspect of the problem which he feels has not properly or adequately been answered in the order for return which was tabled by the Minister of Finance in reply to the question posed by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer). Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the mover of the motion to withdraw it. I think the reasons for withdrawing it are compelling. Failing withdrawal I believe there is no alternative but for the members of this house to say that the principle involved here in moving this motion is repugnant to us, that we cannot accept it and that in all conscience we must vote against it should it come to a vote, which I sincerely hope the mover of the motion will refrain from asking.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Villeneuve has already participated in the debate and cannot speak a second time.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I pointed out that it was six o'clock but I did not think that my time was up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately, the hon. member did not ask to speak at the beginning of the time allotted to private members' business as listed on the order paper, and as his speech must be considered as having ended at six o'clock, I do not think that under the standing order he can be heard now.

Is the house ready for the question? If the hon. member for Lapointe takes the floor now he will thus close the debate.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I thought that at the beginning of this sitting I was speaking so as to close the debate, but I noticed that the Liberals, as usual, insisted in obstructing and delaying this discussion indefinitely. A certain member spoke for 20 minutes and said nothing, while I was prepared to close the debate around five o'clock in order that we could proceed as soon as possible with the other business of the house. This proves that the business of the house is not always delayed by the opposition, but often by the members of the party in office.

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that the arguments which were brought forward did not convince me in the least, except that some persons fear to produce figures.

The hon. member who has just spoken reminds me of the ostrich which hides its head in the sand and shows its rear when danger threatens. We must not be afraid to give figures, because only when we know exactly what is going on can we propose solutions, and when we make suggestions, then we can reach an agreement.

If facts are never revealed, if they are kept hidden, so that there are only complaints, warranted or not, so that the present system can continue without being amended, there will always be uneasiness and criticism.

We want the figures to be published.

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that since I presented my motion the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) has given us an answer to a question put on the order paper.

What surprised me is that according to the reply all the provinces got more from Ottawa than they paid into the federal treasury. If that is the case, how does one account for the difference? If each province gets more than it pays out, where does the money come from?

Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia get twice as much as they pay in; in the case of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, it is just about twice as much also British Columbia and Alberta get one and a half times what they give and Quebec and Ontario nearly 12 per cent more.

Where does the federal government get the money to give to the provinces more than it receives from them?

Would it be that it has started using the Bank of Canada? Is he multiplying money, to give more than he receives?

The Minister of Finance did not answer this question, but the answer is quite simple: if he ran into debt for that purpose, there was a deficit.

Mr. Turner: Correct.

Mr. Grégoire: I hear the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George say that it is correct.

If in order to give us an extra amount the Minister of Finance incurs a deficit, why then include the deficit in the figures he gave us? That is not very smart.

In other words, in the $915 million which is deemed to have been given to the province of Quebec at the rate of so much per capita, they cannot say why it is such an amount. No details have been given. It is known there is one billion dollars in regard to the debt interest, but it is neither the citizens of the province of Quebec nor those of Ontario who receive the interest on the debt. The interest is paid in a proportion of between 70 and 75 per cent to foreigners: Americans, English, Belgians, Swiss, French, Italians. That money does not find its way into our province.

We are told that the $915 million going back to the province of Quebec includes a part of defence expenditures totalling $1.5 billion. But we can hardly say that when we bought Voodoos, Bomarcs and nuclear arms in the United States, weapons that will never be used again, such expenditures were made in the interest of one province only, no.

And when the amount includes a deficit, because the money must come from somewhere, and we learned a moment ago that it did come from a deficit, that deficit is not passed on to the citizens of a province. However, interest must be paid on the deficit.

Therefore, the amount should not be based on what we receive but on what we pay.

The figures submitted by the Minister of Finance are misleading.

Why could we not be told how half or nearly half the total amount is redistributed?

[Mr. Grégoire.]

For instance, in the case of the Farm Credit Corporation the province of Quebec gets practically nothing. In the case of expenditures of the federal government in the field of transportation, for railway crossings or installation of traffic lights, for instance, Quebec gets 25 per cent. The same thing can be said about expenditures of the Department of Fisheries where Quebec only gets a very small percentage of the amount involved.

The estimates of the Department of Finance amount to $83 million, $46 million of which are going to the wheat board, that is to the three prairie provinces, while $10 million were spent on reforestation across the country but not a single penny in the province of Quebec.

But the Minister of Finance received reports and was faced with complications. Then the results were disastrous for his department because he noticed that there was a lack of balance in the country as a whole. At that time he made it a point to hide the true figures and statistics. He included them in a total of $915 million, saying: it is so much per capita, but there was no question of figuring out the debt in each province. It was said: it is so much per capita. That is less incriminating.

Mr. Speaker, we got only part of the report the Minister of Finance was supposed to give us. We did not get the whole thing. We feel that even if he let us have part of it, the Minister of Finance should now give us a breakdown of the $915 million remaining, which make up more than half the total.

The people of Canada must know the facts as well as the House of Commons. Nor will we be content with a partial reply; we want a full reply.

That is why we will ask a vote to be taken on that matter, and then we will see who, in this House of Commons, wants things out in broad daylight, and who, through their votes, will indicate that they prefer to hide the truth, to keep it under a bushel.

Mr. Caouette: Hide the financier.

Mr. Grégoire: Hide the financier, as the hon. member for Villeneuve says.

We will see, through the vote, who wants to play ostrich, to stick his head in the sand and his posterior in the air in times of danger, and who are those who do not fear to see the facts brought out in broad daylight.

This will help to arrive at a better computation of what has been badly calculated in the past.

This is the reason why we are asking for the production of that report in full.

Mr. Habel: It looks to me as if the separatists convinced you last night.

PRIVATE BILLS

LAURENTIDE BANK OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, October 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford for the second reading of Bill No. S-13, to incorporate Laurentide bank of Canada.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order No. 2, resuming debate on the motion of Mr. Basford for the second reading of Bill No. S-13, to incorporate Laurentide bank of Canada.

Mr. MacNaught: Stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the house to stand this measure?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: Getting on with the country's business.

Mr. Peters: —as the minister said, we are getting on with the country's business by establishing a number of banks. This matter is of considerable interest to me because I have been interested in the negotiations that have taken place in recent years between the banking institutions that we have, the number of banks that have been established and their relationship particularly to the small loans field. It has been of interest to me, Mr. Speaker, to learn that all the banks we now have, and they are not numerous in Canada, have been more interested in amalgamation than they have been in establishing a number of small regional banks.

I believe that this whole problem of banking should have been referred, as it is necessary by law to do every ten years, to the appropriate committee for discussion. There should have been a decision with regard to the policy to be followed under the Bank Act for the next ten years, before these bills were brought before parliament. You will recall that some of our major banks, banks which have been in operation many years, have amalgamated. The Imperial Bank of Canada, recently amalgamated with the Bank of Commerce to form the Imperial Bank of Commerce. This has been repeated by several of the other major banks. In fact there has been a tendency for banks to amalgamate and we are now faced with a new concept in the banking facilities of the nation, particularly in relation to the proposed Laurentide bank.

This is an institution which warrants a great deal of attention from members, particularly with regard to the reasons why it is proposed. It will be a rather unique bank, with a wholesale-retail operation. The bank will wholesale for its retail outlet, the Laurentide Trust and Finance Company. How will this work and how will it fit into the pattern we have established for banks in the national sphere?

This is a bank that will not need to deal in loans as do other banks, and it is interesting to note that the parent company recently bought a finance company which is in a dubious position and whose affairs are now before the courts.

We have not been able to examine fully this matter of vertical integration in the banking industry. There must be reasons why the old stalwart banks have found it necessary to amalgamate, and they have reached great size by doing so.

We have had very stable banking institutions in Canada. At times members of parliament have been distressed because of the policy taken by individual banks in relation to retail credit, but on the whole our banking institutions have been responsible, and have been subject to control, suggestion and direction by the government of the nation. Governments will continue to give such direction and for this reason it makes one wonder why we are now embarking on a new course which we have not previously allowed.

Several banks have been able to take advantage of the ceiling on small loans to charge interest rates greater than the 6 per cent which by law is allowed. They have been able to do this through such things as insurance, and devaluating the value placed on the collateral pledged with them. In many cases they have been able to boost interest rates to 12 per cent, 14 per cent and even higher; but these rates do not come within the ambit of those charged by finance companies, including the Laurentide Trust and Finance Company, because many of these charge interest rates as high as 30 and 40 per cent.

I do not believe it is in the national interest to charter a bank which will act only as a wholesale agency for its finance company. I would point out that bills to incorporate banks are completely different from other private bills which come before parliament, such as those dealing with divorce or the building of pipe lines. I believe a committee of both houses should be made aware of policy changes with respect to the Bank Act. As we know, by law it is necessary to review it every ten years, and it is shortly due for revision. I think any decision on the chartering of new banks should await policy decision with respect to this revision.

It is also interesting that this is a Senate bill. Many editorials have appeared in newspapers questioning the impartiality of members of the other house to decide on certain banking bills, when hon. members of that house themselves in many cases are members of the boards of directors of competing banks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock this day are as follows: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams); national parks—amendment of regulations respecting zoning and building; second, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles); public service—superannuated federal employees' request for increased pensions; third, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard); grain—Prince Rupert, B.C.—increase in elevator capacity.

The house will now revert to the business interrupted at five o'clock.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Pearson)—Mr. Lamoureux in the Chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. C-72.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to delay this matter because I might be accused of filibustering, and I see that my friends are already in agreement. But I would like to say a few words in reference to the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Skeena, and particularly that puritan element of his remarks. I think it has been proven this afternoon that where you have four or five parties it makes the work of parliament quite difficult. There is no doubt about it, there was an impasse as far as redistribution is concerned. I think I can perhaps take the blame for my party in this regard; I fought the amendment, what I call the Knowles amendment, and I fought it with all my heart because I thought it was wrong. Finally the government said, "Look; we will compromise". We then asked for an adjournment; we got that adjournment, and we had a meeting. We did compromise. We were ready and willing to accept the first proposal made by the Minister of Transport.

Then we find that immediately the shoe is on the other foot and it pinches, these puritans, these people who go on television and say, "We don't filibuster. We are the purest Canadians; vote for us in the next election. We would never think of filibustering; we are pure; we are the purest people there are. We would never think of delaying any legislation or opposing any compromise" —this is what the Leader of the New Democratic party has been saying—hold up this legislation. These people went all across this nation and said, "We are the party. Don't trust those old line parties that have governed Canada since confederation". But they are the people who must take the blame for this bill not being voted on at five o'clock, and they must face that fact.

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Woolliams: I knew they would cry, Mr. Chairman, because they hate to hear the truth. When you have four or five parties in parliament it makes our work very difficult. It has been proven today. I have said this at other times, and it has been proven correct. We talk about amending the rules. The fact is that you can amend the rules, and it does not matter whether we are talking about redistribution or anything else; parliament will never function properly, no matter what kind of rules we have, when you have four or five parties with different ideas. As soon as the shoe pinched and was on the other foot, we saw who filibustered this afternoon.

I want to see a vote on the subject; I want to see it tonight. I would like to get on with the nation's business, and I want everybody to know—and I hope the press write about it—that these puritans who went on television and said, "We don't filibuster. We don't talk for nothing", include the Howards and—

The Chairman: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member will recognize that for the last few minutes he has strayed quite a distance away from the subject matter now before us, which is an amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I was hoping that after a few introductory words the hon. member would come to the subject matter. I think he has perhaps gone beyond the point of no return now, and I would ask him to limit his further remarks to the question before the committee.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, may I make a comment, on a point of order, before we proceed any further. I would ask that Your Honour be lenient. The hon. member for Bow River is trying desperately to dig his party out of the grave, and we should cooperate with him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I am going to listen to your ruling, except that I would like to say one sentence, if I may, with reference to this matter. They talk about filibustering. What about the question of divorce in this House of Commons? What about the Ralliement Créditiste—and there is not one of them here tonight—and the bank bill?

The Chairman: Order, please. That was two sentences.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I think you are one of the most tolerant chairmen we have had in a long time. I want to see a vote on the subject.

An hon. Member: Then sit down.

Mr. Woolliams: I will sit down later, and when I do sit down I hope this filibuster is over, because when it is I will have served parliament. We took a strong position. We asked for an adjournment. We got one. We discussed this matter. We compromised. Compromise, as I said this afternoon, means settlement, or giving way a little each way. We have arrived at a settlement, and I hope we have a vote and get the matter ended now.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, just to help the filibuster along and help the hon. member for Bow River out, I would like to say a few words. We are discussing an amendment and have been discussing an amendment that is not before the house. We discussed this afternoon and are discussing this evening —although certainly this was not evident from the remarks just made—an amendment that really is not before us at the present time. The amendment before us is one moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Some hon. Members: North.

Mr. Peters: Winnipeg North Centre. It was moved by the hon. member some time ago; in fact in April of this year. Today the discussion—and the hon. member for Bow River just now certainly confirmed this—is on an amendment that was worked out in a back room between the two major parties in this house.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. I can tell him right now that there was no amendment worked out in a back room. With regard to the inference the hon. member is drawing, let us just review for a few minutes—this is in reference to the question of privilege—

Mr. Peters: Just stay on the point.

Mr. Woolliams: I will stay on the point. Don't ever worry about me. You never knew a point when you saw one. Let me finish, Mr. Chairman. We asked the minister if they would adjourn the matter, and if they would we would meet together. We met and we made a decision. We came back into the house, in the face of that meeting, and made our decision. We announced our decision. Therefore I would hope that the New Democratic party would stop drawing inferences from facts of which they have no knowledge.

Mr. Peters: Let me make it very plain, Mr. Chairman, that the "we" he is referring to is not the members of this house but probably two political parties in this house. Everyone has the amendment before them—

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: On another point of order, Mr. Chairman; when I say "we" I mean the Conservative party, and I would hope the member would stop imputing motives to me and the rest of the Conservatives.

Mr. Peters: I do not think I can impute any that probably could not be worn. The amendment before us I believe comes from the government and is going to be moved by the government. Therefore I assume that the meeting in the back room was comprised of these two political parties, and not the members of this house.

Mr. Woolliams: Were you absent the other day when the minister announced it in the house?

Mr. Peters: I have a copy of it.

Mr. Woolliams: Were you absent?

Mr. Peters: I am also of the opinion that this was not worked out in the house or in the normal manner; that it is by passing an amendment that has not been voted on yet, which is one that I think warrants consideration by members in open discussion in the house. I also hope that even the member for Bow River will give some consideration to the proposal. The proposal that has been made concerns a system that I understand is in operation in the province of Manitoba, in the provincial sphere, and has been quite acceptable in that province and has removed politics from the redistribution of seats there. It is very important, in my opinion, that politics be taken out of the redistribution of seats in Canada. It is important to every Canadian that we come as closely as possible to—

Mr. Woolliams: This is a filibuster.

Mr. Peters: —re-implementing one vote, one member representation, whereby each person has equal representation no matter from which part of the country he comes. I believe this is British justice.

In years gone by there has been a great deal of gerrymandering with regard to electoral boundaries. I believe this gerrymandering has occurred because of the kind of arrangements which have been made in back rooms by the two political parties which are suggesting another arrangement today. The only hope I have is that the Speaker of this house, who must be impartial if he is to receive the respect due him as first commoner of the nation, is not asked to do such a political job as making this decision. The question was asked this afternoon whether the Speaker would not have difficulty in choosing people in various parts of the country. I should have thought that under the old system one political party would have difficulty in choosing people, and in my opinion two political parties will have difficulty in agreeing on the persons who can and should be chosen to decide the electoral boundaries in this country.

The amendment before us tonight suggests that lists should be made from which the chief justices of the provinces would be able to choose the people who will assist the redistribution officer in selecting representatives from the provinces. Perhaps the amendment should state whom the lists should include. There may be an argument put forward that the chief electoral officer in each province should be represented. There may be some argument that some provinces may not have academically capable persons in provincial universities who would agree to representation on this basis. I think a lot of these considerations are superfluous anyway because the chief electoral officer has possibly already decided who are the best people for the job. I would suggest that there is no rush to get this bill passed at all if these people are already chosen and the boundaries pretty well defined, because there need only be a brief examination of each particular boundary, with its endorsement by the commissions. I believe these people are available and willing to act and that they have already been approached.

I also believe there is not much doubt about the fact that the man who has been chosen to head up the redistribution of the electoral seats in Canada is sincere in his desire to do it on a non-political basis and to make the representation as equal and as fair as possible in every part of Canada. I believe we do not need any back room agreements. We do not want to load upon the Speaker lists of persons who may be appointed by either one of the major political parties of this country. I believe that this parliament should make that decision by providing these lists so that we can get on with the job of redistribution in a truly non-political and non-partisan manner.

I suggest that rather than making these back door agreements and arrangements which perpetuate the system which has been adopted in the past to the detriment of everybody, and rather than making an arrangement which will force the Speaker to make appointments which may not be non-political and for which he may be criticized later, the committee would be well advised to consider the amendment before it now. Hon. members have had a chance to look at it for some months now and I hope they will give it favourable consideration, because in my opinion it will completely eliminate the gerrymandering system we have had in the past and will totally remove any political overtones which may have been previously intended.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, when Bill No. C-72 was introduced several months ago, we discussed ways and means of carrying out redistribution.

For instance, it was suggested that provinces familiar with geography and provincial organizations should be consulted regarding readjustment of boundaries. Clause 6 (2) concerning appointment of other members reads as follows:

> Of the two members of the commission other than the chairman and the representation commissioner, one shall be appointed by the leader of the government in the House of Commons and one shall be appointed by the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons, but in the event of failure to make any such appointment within the time provided therefore by this act, the appointment shall be made by the chairman.

Today the government is introducing the draft of a bill to replace clause 6(2) and it reads as follows:

> Appointment of other members: The two members of the commission, acting for a province, other than the chairman and the representation commissioner, shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons and selected among persons residing in that province and whom he judges competent...

That is the French word. Some may believe that it means "iodine", but apparently it is "idoine" (competent), to the effect that the Speaker of the House of Commons may choose the two members concerned in every province of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I believe sincerely that our provinces are more qualified to suggest the boundaries of new electoral ridings than any federal organization or any organization appointed by the federal government. After reading paragraph (1) of clause 6, which reads as follows:

> (1) The chairman of the commission for a province shall be appointed by the chief justice of the province from among the judges of the court over which he presides...

—or after consulting with the chief justice.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) just indicated that political interference in the appointment of members of redistribution commissions should be put beyond any political point of view.

I am in complete agreement. All judges of the superior court, anywhere in Canada, Mr. Chairman, without any exception, were appointed politically by the party in office. We all know that from experience. Those are not just wild suggestions or ill-considered words, but they are truly based on what we have seen, on what does exist, not only in one province, but in every province. And that is why I think we should call upon organizations which have nothing to do with politics, with the Liberal or the Conservative parties, and ask them to select the persons who will be appointed to the commission that will look after redistribution.

So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the Speaker of the house appointing two persons from among the residents of a province, but in regard to the province of Quebec, I wonder whether the Speaker himself is well aware of what is going on in that province, whether he is aware of all that is happening in our province.

I see that the Secretary of State (Mr. Lamontagne) is in his seat. He knows perfectly well that in Quebec, in our province, there are completely non-political organizations that could be commissioned to deal with the redistribution of those ridings.

When I spoke about redistribution a few months ago, Mr. Chairman, I said that I myself had gone to see the maps drawn by the chief electoral officer and I noted then that the population was taken into account for certain ridings, while for others, geographical matters were being considered.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact remains that if an electoral redistribution is to be effected throughout Canada, and more especially in the province of Quebec, I feel we must select fair-minded people without any political affiliation whatsoever, who will see to it that the province of Quebec is divided, organized or reorganized, following the federal redistribution, according to the wishes of that province. I do not think it is up to Ottawa to select the people who will decide upon readjustment of federal riding boundaries in the province of Quebec. Quebec is part of our confederation and is in Canada, of course, but each province should be free and have the opportunity to decide upon the representation it should have in the federal parliament.

Mr. Chairman, that is what I am suggesting, without any political bias or partisanship. We want adequate representation. We want a representation which will truly reflect the mentality, the spirit, the will, the intelligence and the aspirations of a province within confederation.

Mr. Chairman, if the Speaker of the house can select able men and women to preside over redistribution, I will be the first one to help him, but I think the government should see to it that each province may decide for itself; whether it is the small province of Prince Edward Island, the province of Newfoundland, British Columbia, Ontario, Manitoba or the province of Quebec, the main thing is to contact responsible people in those provinces so that we may finally reach an agreement on a national basis which will not only be respected by part of the country but by the whole Canadian nation, especially by all the provinces which are now constituting Canada as we know it.

Mr. Chairman, all we are suggesting is that appointees should not already be committed to some political organizations. We are asking for the appointment of impartial people who will see to it that boundaries of federal constituencies will be readjusted according to the hopes and the will of the Canadian people and the people residing in each Canadian province.

Those then are the remarks I wanted to make on the present resolution; namely, who should choose the members of the commission? The Speaker, the leader of the opposition, or the leader of the government? In the province of Quebec, the official opposition is not Conservative, for the Conservatives are fewer than we are. There are more Créditistes than there are Conservatives in the province of Quebec. Things being so, why not suggest the appointment of a delegate from the opposition which is represented by the Ralliement Créditiste in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Chairman, we do not ask to appoint these people; on the other hand, we do not want the leader of the official opposition in the house, or the leader of the government, to dictate to the province of Quebec the decision to be taken concerning the electoral redistribution in our province.

It is not results we are seeking; we want to be treated justly. The leader of the official opposition has nothing to do in our province at this time. The government can accept our suggestions, but on the other hand we can challenge those allegations that the government is introducing as an amendment to the elections act.

Mr. Chairman, I have said and repeated a little while ago that we do not want to interfere; we want justice not only for the province of Quebec, but for the whole of Canada.

If it is better for the Speaker to select the members of the commission, if he can give us the assurance that there will be no political interference in the appointment of the members of the said commission—these Mr. Chairman, are the comments I want to make on clause 6 of Bill No. C-72—we will not object to redistribution.

But we will object if we find that there is political interference at any level, in the discussion which is taking place at this time.

We do not want the people appointed by political parties to decide about redistribution.

We want genuine Canadians, just plain Canadians, to be duly and respectably represented in the House of Commons. This is our hope in the best interest of the future of Canadians.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few words to what has been said so far on this matter.

When Bill No. C-72 was introduced, at the beginning of this session, we reached the conclusion after a few hours of debate that clause 6 should be amended, because its wording indicated obviously—and directly—political partisanship in the appointment of persons who would be entrusted with the task of redistribution in Canada.

That is why, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) presented his amendment, we thought that it might be better for our group to support it, since it was in fact an improvement over the government's proposal.

But today we are faced with another amendment moved by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill) which I feel is equally acceptable, because it is clearly much better than the initial proposal made by the government. Some people here claim that it is possible to eliminate political partisanship entirely from that commission.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not fooling myself; I am convinced that, no matter how this commission goes about it, there will be, in one way or the other, some degree of political intervention. Let us not deceive ourselves about that. No matter how those people are appointed, since I do not think there is in Canada a single person that is not active in some way on the political level—everyone has opinions—they will certainly make their ideas and opinions felt one way or the other. Therefore, I do not think we can find in Canada people entirely free from political prejudice. In my opinion it would be useless to continue this discussion indefinitely and, as far as I am concerned, I shall limit my remarks on this point by saying that I will vote against the amendment moved by the members of the New Democratic party, and I support the resolution as it is now put before us, without, however, foregoing the right to consider any further amendment which could be brought to it during the present debate.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment as proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on April 16, 1964. Does the committee wish the chairman to read the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Read it.

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

The Chairman: Dispense.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas, 22; nays, 80.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether, without any explanation or anything else, I could now move:

That Bill C-72 be amended by striking out clause 6 thereof and substituting therefor the following:—

Since I think nearly all hon. members have "the following" perhaps I could dispense with reading it except to say there is an error in the last line of subclause 2. A word is omitted. After the word "among" there should be the word "such". I have inserted the word in my copy which I am sending to the Chair.

Mr. Thomas: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman; some members have not received copies of both of these amendments. Will the minister tell us which amendment we are dealing with?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman is perhaps right. I will read it.

Mr. Knowles: Could we not compromise and have it read either by the minister or by the chairman? We do not need it read twice.

Mr. Pickersgill: The chairman has a far better voice.

The Chairman: Perhaps it would be easier if the Chair were to read it. Mr. Pickersgill moves:

That Bill C-72 be amended by striking out clause 6 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

Appointment of chairman

6. (1) The chairman of the commission for a province shall be appointed by the chief justice of the province from among the judges of the court over which he presides or, after consultation with the chief justice of any other branch or division of that court or any other superior court in that province, from among the judges of that branch, division or other superior court, but in the event that there is no such judge able or free to act as chairman or where for any other reason no such appointment is made within the time provided therefor by this act, the Chief Justice of Canada or in the event of his absence or incapacity the senior puisne judge of the Supreme Court of Canada shall make the appointment from among such persons resident in that province as he deems suitable.

Appointment of other members

(2) The two members of the commission for a province other than the chairman and the representation commissioner shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons from among such persons resident in that province as he deems suitable.

Notice of appointment to be given

(3) Forthwith upon the making of any appointment as provided in this section, the person making the appointment shall notify the Secretary of State thereof.

References to chief justice and Speaker

(4) A reference in subsection (1) to the chief justice of a province includes a reference to the acting chief justice of the province or any person performing for the time being the duties of the chief justice thereof, and a reference in subsection (2) to the Speaker of the House of Commons includes a reference to any person performing for the time being the duties of the Speaker.

Mr. Knowles: I rise for the purpose of moving an amendment to the amendment, which reads as follows:

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end of subclause (2) to a comma, and by inserting immediately thereafter the following words:

"provided, however, that at least one of the persons appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons shall, if possible, be appointed from among such persons coming within the following class, that is to say: the chief electoral officer, the surveyor general or the registrar of vital statistics of the province, or the holder of any similar office in the province."

[Mr. Knowles.]

I do not believe it is necessary to argue at length for this amendment. Hon. members will realize what it seeks to do. It is still my view, as it was the view of the Minister of Transport and his colleagues when they sat on this side of the house in the parliament before the last, that parliament should know if not the actual persons, at least the kind of persons being put on a commission of this kind. It is my view also that we should not leave this all to the Speaker without giving him some guidelines to give him an indication of the kind of person parliament has in mind.

My earlier amendment, which has been turned down by the committee, suggested that there be two categories and that whoever made the appointments should pick the two members, one from one category and one from the other. The committee having turned down that proposition, like the hon. member for Bow River I am offering a compromise. I suggest that we lay out at least one type of person from whom the Speaker ought to make the choice. I have in the amendment used the words "if possible", for the obvious reason that these persons are not federal employees and hence, if the Speaker is not able to get the consent of the chief electoral officer of the province or such person to take on the assignment, the Speaker will need to have the right to pick someone else in that province whom he deems to be suitable.

As was pointed out this afternoon by the Minister of Transport, the whole idea that I have put forward is based on the very successful experience we have had in the province of Manitoba, where we have the only province-wide independent, impartial commission working in this field. In that province the commission consists of the chief electoral officer, the president of the university and the chief justice of the province. It has worked very well there. I think it would be good for us to suggest to the Speaker that if he is going to make these appointments parliament would like something along that line. I hope, therefore, it will not take as long to deal with this subamendment I am proposing on November 12 as it took to deal with the amendment I moved on April 16. I hope that the Minister of Transport, who took this position when he was in opposition and has said he thinks a method like this is a better one, will support the subamendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I commend the hon. gentleman for his brevity and I will try to make my observations equally brief. I must say, to start with, that I do believe the persons described in this subamendment are the kind of persons who, if they were available, would be the kind of persons who would be suitable for a commission. I would be swallowing myself if I did not say that, because I have said it over and over again, and that is the way the Manitoba commission is formed. I do think if all three appointments were to be made by the same person, namely the chief justice of a province, who as I pointed out earlier today once he is appointed is not under the jurisdiction of this parliament, it would be necessary for this parliament to indicate guidelines of this sort.

I do really believe, sir, that if we are going to accept the amendment that I have put forward and entrust to His Honour the Speaker, who is our servant and who is subject to this house and would of course be subject to censure by this house if he did anything wrong, that the Speaker, knowing what has been said about this matter and knowing as he does what we have said in all our debates, does not need this guideline. I do not believe the amendment would serve any useful purpose. I really feel so mildly about this, which is not altogether usual for me, that I do not believe it would do any great harm if the committeee accepted it. However I believe that, like a lot of things that are relatively harmless, it is also relatively useless.

For all of these reasons, I just do not think in these circumstances I will be the slightest degree inconsistent if I say, so far as I am concerned and I say this reluctantly of course, that I do not believe I can vote for the hon. gentleman's subamendment.

Mr. Howard: May I ask the minister if he would consider a mild Minister of Transport relatively harmless?

Mr. Pickersgill: That, I believe, is a very debatable question and I would be out of order if I debated it now.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, taking note of the subamendment just submitted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I think that it would change neither the motion nor the main proposition in any significant way.

Indeed, the hon. member pointed it out himself when he repeated two or three times the words "if possible".

At that time, it will be up to Mr. Speaker to decide whether it is possible or not.

A subamendment like this simply means that absolutely nothing will be changed in the original suggestion. The minister who just answered the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is perfectly right, in that we are not here to vote in favour of a subamendment which is neither fish nor fowl, and quite meaningless, but just says "if possible"—as it may, or may not, be so.

Under the circumstances, we shall vote against the subamendment, which means absolutely nothing and just tends to lengthen, or protract, the discussion.

[Text]

Mr. Olson: I want to say, first of all, that we still hold the same position we took this afternoon. We believe the important thing is to get the whole bill passed rather than quibble over these amendments. I do believe it would be useful, however, for the Speaker to consider the kind of people who hold the positions suggested in the subamendment. I believe the chief electoral officer of a province would be one of the most qualified persons you could find in a province to put on a commission. I believe the surveyor general also would fall into that category. I hope, whether this subamendment is accepted or not, the Speaker would carefully consider the gentlemen who hold these offices for nomination to the various commissions across the country.

As I say, whether or not it is carried, I hope he would take this into consideration. The amendment says, "if possible", as the hon. member for Villeneuve has pointed out. Therefore all it would require the Speaker to do is inquire whether or not one of these two men was available. That would set the groundwork for one appointment and, since it is not particularly binding because of these words "if possible," we would be prepared to support the subamendment.

Mr. Prittie: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that in order to get this thing through the government has given in, in very large measure, to the official opposition.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Prittie: Well, Mr. Chairman, these people who yell "question" are those who held up parliament for months. I would like to ask the minister if he or his advisers have given much thought to the procedure the Speaker would use in finding persons in each province to act on a commission. He cannot be acquainted with persons in all ten provinces. He must turn to someone for advice and I ask where this advice will come from?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before answering that question I would like to make one observation about what the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond said. His party, the Social Credit party and the Ralliement Créditiste all took some exception to the bill in its original form. If my amendment is adopted the bill will not remain in its original form and therefore I do not think it is quite fair for the hon. gentleman to say that the government is giving in to anyone.

We are doing what we said at the very beginning we would do. We said we would try to listen to any reasonable suggestion from any quarter and try to get a consensus that would give us as good a measure as possible. I have tried not to question the motives of members in any quarter and I hope mine will not be questioned either.

As to the method in which the Speaker would make these selections, I would point out that the Speaker is a grown adult. He is not a child; he has lived in the world for a long time. He will certainly be thoroughly familiar with these debates and I, like the hon. member for Medicine Hat, hope he will seriously consider persons such as are suggested in these categories here. I do not think anyone in the chamber thinks these persons are not suitable, but I am not prepared to go to the length of supporting a motion prescribing him to do so.

Mr. Churchill: May I say I am in agreement with the Minister of Transport. As a matter of fact during consideration of this bill there was no difficulty in processing it through second reading and committee stage until the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced his amendment to clause 6, as I recall it, on April 16. At that time we were prepared to complete the bill by that night, had it not been for the amendment introduced at that time.

Mr. Knowles: How long did you talk on that amendment?

Mr. Churchill: I have the record here. There were two days debate on it, and it was an unnecessary delay occasioned by him at that time, just as there is unnecessary delay right now. The burden of talk today has been carried by members of the New Democratic party and by the Créditistes, who constantly complain about delay in the house but who are now showing how delay is brought about by their chatter during most of today.

The subamendment attempts to limit the jurisdictional power given to the Speaker, and mentions persons such as the chief electoral officer, the surveyor general and the registrar of vital statistics in a province. May I point out that in the bill we give to the commission in each province the authority to employ such technical advisers and other staff as may be necessary. We have also indicated that the dominion statistician and the director of the surveys and mapping branch of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys shall perform that function if required. The persons mentioned in the subamendment are the type I think a provincial commission might wish to employ as technical advisers because of their special knowledge of the provinces they serve. Consequently I see no reason why any of them should be named as a member of a commission. Their knowledge, ability and experience could be made available as technical advisers, and in fact a provincial commission would likely be well advised to call on the services of persons like these.

On April 17 I drew attention to the experience in the United Kingdom where at one time they had the registrar general and the director general of ordnance surveys as members of the commission. This was changed and they were made technical experts or officers of the commission. Therefore I suggest that the subamendment might well be rejected because it does not exclude the persons mentioned from acting in some capacity as advisers to a provincial commission.

Mr. Pickersgill: Question.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment on the remarks just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. There is no question, as he has said, that he and his colleagues in the Tory party were prepared in April of this year to give passage to clause 6 which we are now being asked to amend, but their support for its passage was based on a purely selfish attitude of having a finger in the pie. They wanted to give political direction to the people who would be doing the redistributing, and that was the same attitude as the Prime Minister had when the bill was introduced in the first instance.

The bill originally proposed a definite assurance that the Leader of the Opposition would appoint one of the commissioners other than the chairman, and what else could one expect but that the Tory party, with its history of trying to direct everything from a partisan political point of view, would accept that proposition, just the same as the Liberal government thought it desirable to have the Prime Minister select one of the other commissioners.

It is not at all surprising that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre says he and his party were prepared to pass clause 6, but it is something for which he should not take any credit. He should not gloat too much over his desire in April to give speedy passage to this because it simply meant that he was prepared to have some sort of long, sticky, political finger in the appointment of the commissions in the various provinces.

It was that position which we argued against, because we said then, and we say now, that if you are going to try to establish a non-political or non-partisan redistribution commission, let us go all the way and make it non-partisan; let us not try to have it both ways. It did not surprise me a bit when the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre stated that which he just stated. He only surprised me by having the gall to state it as a peerless point of view, which it was not.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, according to the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill), the members of the New Democratic party and of the Ralliement Créditistes would be the ones who prevented the passing of that legislation, and who, so to speak, delayed the legislation.

I would like to make it clear that if there is one member in this house who delays passing of legislation by discussing just about anything, it is certainly the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre who wastes our precious time by his interventions, usually as serious as those he made a while ago.

While subsection 2 of clause 6 of Bill No. C-72 suggests that two members are to be appointed by the leader of the government and the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, I wonder whether the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has considered the way the Leader of the Opposition would choose a member in the province of Quebec.

Would he appoint the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), the member for Nicolet-Yamaska (Mr. Vincent), or the one for Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière (Mr. Paul)? Who would he propose for the province of Quebec?

Mr. Lambert: The law says no, on clause 8. Read your bill.

Mr. Caouette: The law says no. The law is not passed yet; then, it does not say anything for the time being.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is making much ado about the filibuster carried out by the New Democratic party, the Social Credit and the Ralliement Créditiste. Nevertheless, he is not saying that he is, himself, conducting a general filibuster for the whole of the legislation across the country. Therefore, the hon. member should be more consistent instead of blaming others; he should look in a mirror; he would recognize himself.

Why does he not bring forth something logical, instead of talking all kinds of nonsense as he did a few minutes ago.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready to vote on the subamendment?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question will be on the subamendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Does the committee wish the chairman to read the subamendment?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Amendment to the amendment (Mr. Knowles) negatived: Yeas, 20; nays, 84.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment to the amendment lost.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Chairman: The question is on the amendment moved by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether before this amendment carries we might not refer to it according to that grand old Yankee custom and call it the Pickersgill-Woolliams amendment?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Pickersgill) agreed to: Yeas, 92; nays, 11.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment carried. Shall the clause as amended carry?

Clause 6 as amended agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 12 agreed to.

On clause 13—Rules to be applied in preparing report.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Churchill: —I judge this is the last clause that is in front of us and it has to do with the tolerance figure. We spent some time discussing this earlier when the bill was before us for second reading.

We suggested a higher figure than the one which appears here. Some people suggested a lower figure. Others on the government side suggested something in between the two. I am wondering what is the general attitude on the part of the government tonight with regard to this. We have as a committee worked together on many of the clauses here and reached a consensus, as it is called, and I was wondering whether the Minister of Transport has any suggestion to make to us on this particular clause in order that there may be achieved here, as has been achieved with other clauses, an element of compromise between the varying points of view.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, so far as I myself am concerned I think it would make relatively little difference to the actual distribution which would take place whether the tolerance was 20 per cent or 25 per cent. Certainly I would not be prepared to support any figure higher than 25 per cent. I think we should face the fact, regardless of what is the actual tolerance, that if these commissions do their job conscientiously, they will try as far as possible to hew to the line. A tolerance is a tolerance. It is not meant to be a licence to go as far as possible away from what parliament wants. It is to meet hard situations that may arise. Without hard situations it could be done not by commissions at all but by I.B.M. machines, computers or something of that sort. That would be the fairest way of all to have redistribution, except that it would be utterly inhuman and would produce ridiculous results. It is to meet these human situations that there is a tolerance at all and that we depart from the strict rule of representation by population.

I do not think there is anyone in the committee who would argue that there should not be some tolerance; there is in every country where this kind of redistribution exists. It varies from one country to another, and the tendency over the years has been to make the figure smaller. But speaking for myself I would not in the least object if the general view was that it should remain at 20 per cent or if the general view was that it should be 25 per cent. As far as I am concerned I am quite prepared to support either position.

I think the best way of deciding this question is this. If someone wants to vary it he could move—I do not mind doing it myself and am quite prepared to do so if that is the general feeling—that the tolerance be 25 per cent. Then if the committee wants to turn that down they are free to do so. Each member may vote as he pleases. I know there are some hon. members who feel very strongly that it should not be higher than 20 per cent. Others have expressed the view that it should be 30 per cent. Of course if I move a motion I will vote for it, and if there is the general feeling that we should take the sense of the committee on this point—

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister moves an amendment, how does he come to the conclusion that there is a general feeling he should move it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman, who is more precise than I am, is right there. If there is any strong feeling in the committee that we should take the sense of the committee on this point I am quite prepared to make the motion and let the sense of the committee be taken.

Mr. Fisher: Why could the minister not let us find the sense of the committee on the 20 per cent?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am very familiar with these questions about "Have you stopped beating your wife?"; but if we vote on the 20 per cent and accept that figure there is no chance whatever of the 25 per cent even being considered. In order to let the committee decide whether or not it should be 25 per cent I think—

Mr. Knowles: I rise on a question of privilege. Throughout the debate in committee on this bill both when the Minister of Labour was piloting certain clauses through and since the Minister of Transport has been back on the job we have followed the practice of having a general discussion. We have even departed from the rules—and it has been a tough role for the chairman—by having proposals made and discussed before they were moved. We did this several times. Then after discussion something else has been put in.

Now the minister, who is the first member to speak to this clause—I am sorry; there was the brief comment from the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre—and before there has been any general discussion proposes to move an amendment to the bill. He has already said it does not matter to him whether the figure is 20 per cent or 25 per cent, but he also said that if he moves an amendment he will vote for it. I suggest that we are not treating this clause in the same manner as we have treated the others which have been the subject of contention in this committee. In fact it smacks of something which I do not like.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the hon. gentleman has a point and I would be glad to sit quietly and listen to four or five members express their views, and then make up my mind after that.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Bow River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, it is nice even to have the unanimous consent of the splinter parties. I can be quite brief on this tolerance clause. Let us think of some of the provinces which have a special tolerance. For example, the maritimes cannot have less members—and I am sure everyone agrees—than the number of senators from that area. Then we have the amendment to the British North America Act with which I dealt last April, I think it was—but anyway, a long time ago—where a province like Saskatchewan, if it lost a certain number of its members, would have less constituencies than provided for by the tolerance figure, even if the tolerance figure was zero.

There has been a lot of misunderstanding about the tolerance figure. If there is a tolerance of 10 per cent it does not mean that you would have 70,000 people plus 10 per cent. If the tolerance is 20 per cent it does not mean you would have 70,000 people plus 20 per cent. If you had a tolerance of 25 per cent it does not mean you would have 70,000 people in each constituency plus 25 per cent. All constituencies should consist of 70,000 people. It might be 72,000 now because the population of Canada has gone up since the last census. The figure could be zero; it could be 1 per cent. But a percentage is called for in the bill. Let us understand that a tolerance does not mean you will have a greater figure up to 25 per cent, 20 per cent or 10 per cent.

Mr. Fisher: Make it 100 per cent.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for Port Arthur said, make it 100 per cent. I think it was the hon. member for Port Arthur; I am not used to these big round figures. But if the hon. member is following me, if it is 100 per cent it does not mean a constituency will have 140,000 people. If the commissions do their work we will get as near as we can to having 70,000 people in each constituency, or 72,000, depending on the population increase.

However, there are certain problems. There are as many rotten boroughs—I use the word in its historical sense—in the city of Montreal and the city of Toronto as there are in the rural communities of western Canada, and certain problems arise where certain areas require a given tolerance. Certain provinces need a fairly high tolerance, although we hope the commissions will keep it down to the minimum. We hope the commissions will keep it down to a minimum of perhaps 1 or 2 per cent.

Surely we can compromise again and expedite the business of the house tonight. In my opinion we have expedited our business today by compromise in reference to redistribution, and I hope we can continue to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I am now prepared to move—

An hon. Member: Seconded by Mr. Pickersgill.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I can tell my friend that I did not draft this amendment. It was drafted by the hon. member for Edmonton West. In view of the fact it was drafted, following discussion at a meeting, it is in his writing, but if there is any question about it I will allow the hon. member for Skeena to have a look at it.

Mr. Howard: I am sure it would not convince me.

Mr. Woolliams: Nothing would convince you.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I always like to hear questions asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: I should just like the hon. member to clear up a point with reference to the meeting to which he referred. I think

I know the answer to this question, but I should like to have it on the record. What meeting does the hon. member have reference to?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, sometimes one has to drive points in with a hammer. I could repeat the story told by the leader of the party to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre belongs, but I do not intend to waste time. It seems that sometimes one has to say things four or five times to get them across to some people.

I have said today on several occasions that the Conservatives have met, as a result of what the Minister of Transport said in the House of Commons at the time we asked that this bill be put aside for consideration. We met and discussed the bill as a party. I hope the party to my left has also met to discuss this bill. We had a meeting this morning, as a result of which we agreed to certain compromises. We intended today to get down to business, and we have got down to business. I do not think anyone can criticize us in that regard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, in view of the exuberance shown by hon. members to my left I should like to state that when it comes to filibustering I cannot run a close second to the members of the New Democratic party. I remember the kind of filibustering they carried on in respect of divorce bills. I also remember the former member for Assiniboia, Mr. Hazen Argue, who was the best filibusterer ever to hit this House of Commons, but he was busted out as a result of an election.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to get sidetracked. I should like to move my amendment, which is as follows:

That subclause (b) of clause 13 be amended by deleting therefrom in lines 49 and 50 the word "twenty" and by substituting therefor the words "twenty five".

An hon. Member: Where is your seconder?

Mr. Moreau: Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment briefly about the amendment to subclause (b) of clause 13 as proposed by the hon. member for Bow River. I am not sure of the proper procedure to be followed regarding a subamendment, but I think the 25 per cent figure would be much more palatable, at least to me, if we could change subparagraph (i) of paragraph (b), clause 13, by substituting the word "or" in line 2 for a comma, and adding after the word "density" the words "or growth", so the paragraph would read:

—special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or growth of population of various regions of the province—

I think that would be much better, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nielsen: How about adding the word "diminution" as well?

Mr. Woolliams: What is the difference? It escapes me.

Mr. Moreau: The hon. member asks what the difference is. We are now working on the 1961 census figures. In my riding particularly, and I am sure in other areas where there has been a rapid increase in the population of communities, we are now dealing with far out-dated figures. I feel by the addition of the words "or growth", we would give the commissions enough latitude that they could take this factor into consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think a procedural point is involved in this suggestion. I wonder whether the hon. member would withhold his proposed subamendment until we deal with the amendment, and then perhaps put his suggestion forward in the form of another amendment. What he has suggested does not really constitute a subamendment because, although it proposes a change to the same clause, it deals with a completely separate item.

Mr. Moreau: I appreciate that fact, Mr. Chairman, but I think the two items are related, and if we add the words "or growth" that would make the tolerance aspect of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River much more acceptable.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, clause 13 clearly states the rules by which each commission for a province shall be governed. Clause 13 (a) reads as follows:

The division of the province into electoral districts and the description of the boundaries thereof shall proceed on the basis that the population of each electoral district in the province as a result thereof shall correspond as nearly as may be to the electoral quota for the province—

I had the good fortune of seeing the map prepared by the office of the chief electoral officer. In our area of northwestern Quebec, that is in the counties of Chapleau and Villeneuve—and I am not only concerned about my own riding here—emphasis has been laid on clause 13 (b) which reads as follows:

(b) The commission may be depart from the strict application of rule (a) in any case where
(i) special geographic considerations—

We explained that Chapleau county went up to James Bay and that in view of geographic considerations, we should divide the two counties, or even the three counties of Pontiac-Témiscamingue, Villeneuve and Chapleau, leaving Noranda in Villeneuve county, Rouyn in Pontiac-Témiscamingue county, adding Villeneuve to Amos, St. Marc de Figurie and Senneterre, and then leave in Chapleau county the northern part of the province where there are hardly any inhabitants except Indians, perhaps 1,500 to 2,000 at the most, which would not change much in the next ten years.

At present, changes are made in the ridings because it is said that population is no longer important and that geography is the basis of everything.

Then, I found that the proposed solution was perfectly unreasonable, namely to add to the Villeneuve riding the towns of Amos, St. Marc, Senneterre, Barraute, Belcourt, and make a Chapleau riding from the Ontario boundary, that is from La Reine, La Sarre, Malartic, Taschereau, then, turning above Amos, and following the railway line to Parent, and then going north to Chibougamau.

Those are geographic considerations where there is no population, where the towns and villages I just mentioned are taken away from Chapleau.

We cannot admit that. The Pontiac-Témiscamingue riding is all right as it is, the Villeneuve riding is all right as it is and the Chapleau riding is also well as it is, even if the territory of Chapleau is twice as large as that of Villeneuve and Pontiac-Témiscamingue, because there is no population. If we were to include in the Chapleau riding all the Baffin land, for instance, where there is not a living soul, what would that mean as far as the increase of total votes is concerned for Chapleau riding?

That is what we find illogical. Changes might be necessary in urban areas such as Montreal, where one riding has 150,000 to 200,000 voters, while a small riding, has only 25,000 or 30,000. Then, changes must be made; a redistribution is necessary, but not in rural ridings such as ours in the northern area.

In subparagraph (i) of paragraph (b) of clause 13, it is said that:

—special geographic considerations—

The bill says exactly what the chief electoral officer told me. The bill is right as the chief electoral officer was when he explained to me the situation in our area

(i) special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity or density of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable, or

(ii) any special community or diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the province appears to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable.

Mr. Chairman, which commission decided that? We read:

—appears to the commission.

But the commission has not been appointed yet. We are at clause 13 of the bill. There is no commission as yet and we are asked to approve a bill that a non-existent commission decided to introduce to the House of Commons.

Is there anything more stupid, more idiotic than that? Are we here to be laughed at?

Which commission has been appointed in the province of Quebec at the present time in order to work with the Ottawa organization, as far as the establishment of electoral boundaries is concerned in that province? Which Ontario commission now works with the Ottawa commission to establish the electoral districts in Ontario in the north, at Cochrane, or anywhere?

We are told:

The commission suggests.

Which commission? There is not even a commission and we are told in the bill that the commission suggests such and such principle or procedure.

Mr. Chairman, are we being taken for sidewalk superintendents in the House of Commons? Are we being taken for irresponsible people, or people who do not know where they are going?

Mr. Habel: Come now.

Mr. Caouette: I hear my very good friend, the hon. member from Cochrane say: Come now.

Well, which is the commission for the province of Quebec?

Mr. Habel: May I ask a question?

Mr. Caouette: With pleasure.

Mr. Habel: You voted for clause 6 which contains exactly the same words: "the commission", and when the bill is passed, the commission will be appointed and will act under the legislation passed by the house.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, in putting a question to me, the hon. member for Cochrane states positively that after clause 6 had been agreed to, the commission decided to submit to us clause 13—

Mr. Habel: It will be part of the bill.

Mr. Caouette: It does not exist.

Mr. Habel: It will.

Mr. Caouette: It does not exist, it is not mentioned, but in clause 13, we are told that the commission must establish the electoral boundaries on the basis of population on the one hand and of geographic considerations on the other hand.

Mr. Habel: It will decide.

Mr. Caouette: Who will decide? The commission or parliament?

Mr. Chairman, I continue reading subparagraph (ii):

—but in no case shall the population of any electoral district in the province as a result thereof depart from the electoral quota for that province to a greater extent than 20 per cent more or 20 per cent less.

The proposed amendment aims at increasing this margin from 20 per cent to 25 per cent. In my opinion, 25 per cent is more acceptable than 20 per cent. But even there, why should we consider on the one hand the population and on the other hand special geographic considerations to establish the size of a territory where there is nobody, where there are no voters, where there are no Canadians to be represented?

Such is the case in my area, Rouyn-Noranda, Villeneuve, and also Chapleau and Pontiac-Témiscamingue.

I do not think that a commission, either federal-provincial or just federal, could make an intelligent decision by taking into account geographic considerations only in our area.

If we take the population into consideration —and the chief electoral officer knows it— we do not need to change the boundaries of the ridings as they exist at present in the northwestern part of the province of Quebec nor, probably, those of the northeastern district of the province of Ontario. However, we should not be deceived or misled with geographical problems, when there is no population in those districts.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment raising from 20 to 25 per cent the electoral quota should be adopted. The Minister of Transport said a while ago that he had no objection to it and that he would even move that amendment or motion himself. If he is ready to do so, we are also ready to accept that a figure of 25 per cent be substituted for 20 per cent.

[Mr. Caouette.]

The only thing is that it is entirely inadmissible—and I wish to draw that fact to the attention of the minister and of those who are entrusted with the administration of the Canada Elections Act—that clause 13 should take the geographical factor into account. Members of parliament are elected by people, not by geography. The geographical map is of little importance. Let us bring the map up to date but it is the electors that count because we represent each and every one of them, not an area. Let us take them into consideration instead of geography as the government would have us do under clause 13 we are discussing at present.

[Text]

Mr. Fisher: I am rather bothered by the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve because he has taken an interpretation, it seems to me, with regard to the hinterland ridings that I cannot understand. It is my understanding that those of us who represent sparsely settled regions will stand to gain very much by the fact the tolerance is set at 25 per cent, and that this 25 per cent is almost certain to be operating as a minus factor rather than a plus factor. Whether it does or not, great changes are certain in the hinterland areas, much more so than almost any other part of the country including the large cities.

As I interpret this, it is actually to my advantage or to the advantage of the electors in my area if I support the 25 per cent tolerance rather than the 20 per cent. However, I intend to vote against the amendment. I would put it to the members in the house, particularly those who represent cities that, although the effect may be small, if you go along with the 25 per cent tolerance you just get that much farther away from the one man, one vote and one representative concept. I myself would support, even though again it is going to be more difficult to change some of these hinterland areas, a tolerance of 10 per cent. I just wanted to express the fact that I am going to vote against the amendment, and I know some of my colleagues will. I believe one or two of them would be prepared to have an even larger tolerance.

I wanted to refer to the point raised by the hon. member for York-Scarborough which had to do really with the idea of rate of growth.

Mr. Moreau: That is the way the amendment will read.

Mr. Fisher: I think it would be a good idea to have that point in this provision, for the reason that redistribution commissioners, in effect, will have an office going all the time. We know that office is already conscious of some of the transitions that are taking place. We would hope, since we are likely to have two redistributions within much less than a decade, that there will be some experienced personnel. For that reason, I think it would be quite valuable to have this rate of growth concept embodied in the provision.

One of the things that has bothered me about the approach of the minister tonight as I have understood it, not least about the general line that is going around about this question of tolerance, is the line that it really does not matter that much whether the tolerance is set at 35 per cent or 25 per cent; that it is at the discretion of the commissioner. It may be all very well to give them that discretion, but I suggest the larger we make the tolerance the more likely there is to be strong representation for more changes, and jockeying from people outside and inside the political arena. I believe, therefore, the government would be well advised to stick with 20 per cent. I hope there will be enough members in this house who support that idea to defeat the amendment that has been put forward by the official opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the hon. gentleman has mentioned me, perhaps I could explain my stand in one sentence. I would find the amendment much easier to vote for if the committee were also disposed to accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I do believe we have to consider the very rapid rate of growth. The hon. gentleman from York-Scarborough and I have been discussing this very point. He had to revise his amendment to put in the rate of growth because we do know that this suburban growth has been very rapid since the redistribution of 1951. It is a factor, and if there is to be anything like a fair redistribution the first time, some account must be taken of it.

I have said that I do not think there is much difference between 20 per cent and 25 per cent. I did not say 35 per cent. I think that would be quite ridiculous, and I could not support that at all. I would not be willing to support even 30 per cent. I think it is possible that 25 per cent might meet a few hard cases that would otherwise arise, and particularly if we were willing at the same time to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, that would meet the situation. I would, on balance, want to support the amendment.

Mr. Leboe: I will only take a minute, as usual. I should like to say that we, in this group, are quite prepared to support the amendment. I think it is a move in the right direction. As a matter of fact, I would have said that 25 per cent is about where it ought to be.

In so far as the amendment it is understood the hon. member for York-Scarborough is proposing is concerned, I would think that amendment would certainly be already in the mind of anybody who is going to make this assessment. For instance, it would seem to me that there are two places we will have to start with this orientation, and that is in the hard core of the city where there is not going to be any growth worth mentioning. There are places in cities where industrial areas are taking over and people are being moved out. There is therefore a trend away from an increase in population. Certainly, in these areas, the tolerance would be set to take account of not just the population that is possible within that tolerance. Then, when you come to areas of fast growth, naturally the converse would be true. In other words, you would set the smallest amount of population over a larger area. Of course, in a constituency that has a large land mass and a lighter population you can look forward to an increased growth, and rather rapidly in some cases. I suggest, therefore, that the 25 per cent tolerance we are discussing here would be about as close as one could come to that type of consideration in this committee.

Mr. Turner: I am just rising to speak briefly on this rate of growth situation introduced by the hon. member for York-Scarborough. I want to refer directly to the remarks made a moment ago by the hon. member for Cariboo. He referred to downtown constituencies. I want to suggest to the committee that there is a rate of growth problem in these constituencies as well and it arises from two factors. The first is large immigration. When people arrive and have spent five years in this country under status of landed immigrants they can qualify for Canadian citizenship. It is conceivable in some of those areas there will be a large rise in population and quite a dramatic increase in the number of voters available in these constituencies.

The second factor is that in certain of these downtown areas there are projects for urban renewal, housing projects and large high rise apartments. These projects are reviving some of these downtown areas. If this rate of growth concept is accepted, I suggest that when the commissioner considers it, he keep these factors in mind as well.

Mr. Barnett: I decided I would rise briefly on the suggestion raised originally by the hon. member for York-Scarborough, principally because when the minister referred to it he confined himself to urban areas. Of course, these are the areas in which the hon. member for York-Scarborough is interested. I should like to point out that this rate of growth factor is not confined to metropolitan urban areas. It could apply equally to rural industrial areas, particularly where large industries may be planted in the wilderness. I have in mind, for example, a suggestion in my own constituency under which an entirely new town of 5,000 people is going to come into being very shortly. Whether those estimates are a bit optimistic for the immediate future, I would not want to say offhand, but that is the kind of thing which can happen which would make the inclusion of this rate of growth factor quite valuable.

This is apart from the redistribution which lies immediately ahead of us. There is always likely to be some time lag in the actual carrying out of redistribution following a census, and in many areas the quota may be somewhat out of line. I am quite prepared to support this when it comes before us in the form of an amendment, but I would like to reiterate my own belief that 20 per cent is preferable to the amendment before us at the moment.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly in regard to this amendment. The suggestion put forward by the hon. member for York-Scarborough is quite in order, and I will support the 25 per cent figure. However, I recall the debate that took place some time ago in this chamber when we were speaking about growth rates, and I remember the hon. member for York-Scarborough speaking in an uncomplimentary way about some rural areas and the way in which they were represented.

I suggest that the Minister of Transport use his influence with his colleagues with respect to the decentralization of industries to areas where they would promote growth. This would be of great benefit to many rural areas, and we in the rural areas of Ontario would certainly like to have a measure of the growth rate about which the hon. member for York-Scarborough complains.

I know this does not lie within the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport but I believe he should use his influence in this matter. As you may recall, initially I supported a larger tolerance figure and I felt all along it would be a much better proposition for a commissioner to work on the larger tolerance.

I would ask the minister to take note of what I have said because we in the rural areas of Ontario are interested in these population changes, and in population growth provincially and municipally. The recent figures that have been issued show we have a reasonable right to consideration in this respect.

Mr. Howard: I support the ideas put forward by the hon. member for Port Arthur so far as the percentage tolerance is concerned. We have ridings which are somewhat similar geographically and which will be similarly affected by this proposal. Apart from that, I want to say how much I enjoyed the obviously unrehearsed show which went on earlier when this amendment was put before the committee. If it were not so awkward to accept this naked show of power displayed by the two old line parties, when they do not give a hoot whose toes they trample on when they want to put something into effect, it would be comic.

Mr. Woolliams: Try and be nice.

Mr. Howard: I am trying to be nice, Eldon, but it is difficult. We saw the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre crow for a little bit, and put forward the suggestion which was immediately grasped by the Minister of Transport, who picked up a prepared document from his desk, ready to put this preconceived plan into effect. But then he ran into a little difficulty—he should have realized he would anyway—and graciously withdrew. Then came the clincher from the hon. member for Bow River to help him out. Obviously it was a deal which had been worked out in advance. I suggest to the two old line parties that, in future, if they want to connive in this way they had better rehearse a little better.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is like the things said about me and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre by the hon. member for Bow River. They are both wrong.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, I regret it is nearly ten o'clock but I feel constrained to speak in support of the province of Saskatchewan, which will suffer the most seriously under this redistribution. I was prepared to ask for a greater tolerance than 25 per cent but I will accept the 25 per cent in certain instances. However, I think it should be more than 25 per cent in the case of some areas of Saskatchewan.

The Minister of Transport said he was in favour of limiting the tolerance to 20 per cent and then asked for our opinions. I have quite a lot to say on this, Mr. Chairman, but I note it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if we should extend the time tonight so that we might be able to finish the debate, as everybody seems in such agreement.

Mr. Howard: I do not see how we can proceed when it is ten o'clock. You gentlemen wanted to filibuster, and you will have to put up with this.

The Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that the chairman call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Howard: It is not the wish of the committee; it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Woolliams: We can extend the time by unanimous consent, and if the N.D.P. want to veto that consent then we know where they stand with reference to getting business through the house.

Mr. Howard: No matter how hard the hon. member digs he will not get himself out of the hole he got himself into.

The Chairman: Since the committee does not have the unanimous agreement required it is my duty to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader about the business for tomorrow and Monday.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with what I hope will be the completion of the bill we have been discussing tonight. When it is completed we will proceed with the estimates as indicated on Tuesday night in Hansard; that is, the estimates of the Secretary of State, followed by the estimates for which the Minister of Forestry is responsible, then the estimates of the Department of Public Works and the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL PARKS—AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING ZONING AND BUILDING

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, when I am through with what I have to say tonight it will prove that there has never been any marriage between myself and the Liberals, or if there was that it has now been dissolved by an act of divorce.

Mr. Peters: What about annulment?

Mr. Woolliams: I do not know anything about annulment; you might know something about that. I now want to deal with a question I put to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing). I asked him today whether there were any changes in orders in council in reference to the zoning of parks and a building permit. There are various areas zoned in the townsite of Banff for business, and certain sections are zoned as residential areas. I suggest to the minister that the Bow River project, which is going to be a three-storey hotel with a cocktail lounge, is being built in the best residential part of Banff townsite and in an area which has that beauty that makes building on it contrary to the terms and conditions of the National Parks Act. But the worst thing of all is that the minister said today these orders in council were not rescinded; they were only rescinded in regard to this particular project. I want to read to the minister something for which he has perhaps a great deal of respect, namely the words of Mackenzie King, when it comes to passing orders in council, particularly in secret. That is why I wanted them filed in the house. We noticed that the minister was most reluctant today to answer the questions. This is what Mackenzie King said in reference to these secret orders in council. This was the statement quoted by Senator Power who was then a member of parliament in this House of Commons. He was dealing with the law and he said, in brief, that the law should be known to every Canadian. This is what Mackenzie King said:

> Now let us come to another point, which I wish particularly to stress. I refer to the right set out in Magna Carta that no man shall be dispossessed of his rights without the lawful judgment of his peers under the law of the land; not the law as made by the governor in council, not the law as made by some unnamed and as yet unexisting body, but the law of the land as known to everyone. It is an essential principle of liberty and freedom that the law of the land should be known, that it should be so known that every man as he runs may read. The law should not be something which is to make its appearance in the Canada Gazette after some board or governor in council, not parliament, has passed a regulation; it is something that should appear in the statutes of the country.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, we have certain orders in council known to the council of Banff, an elected body, and the minister in order to give—and I suggest to him this is suspicious—certain people the right to build certain things in Banff, amended those laws unknown to parliament, unknown to the people of Canada and unknown to Banff, and refused today to table them until pressed by myself, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the former minister. I wish I had time in the seven minutes at my disposal, but I have not, to read from the minutes what the minister said at his meeting with the council of Banff. I have a copy of the minutes, which give word for word what took place between himself and the elected body of Banff. He said to that body, in brief, in Calgary recently, "You apologize to the Prime Minister and myself, because you asked for my resignation from the Prime Minister. If you don't apologize, I won't even listen to you. You mean nothing to me", I am going to read what he said to these people. This is what he said as reported at page 8 of these minutes, taken right at the meeting. I would say it was the most disgraceful performance of any minister in this country, to speak to an elected body in the manner in which he spoke to them. I cannot believe the minister was serious on that occasion; I can only think he must have lost his temper. Fancy speaking to an elected body in this manner:

Mr. Laing:—

This is what he said to an elected, democratic body in this country:

I want to tell you I am not particularly small on my own integrity.

We do not question the minister's integrity about this.

I think it is time that somebody dug their heels in against irresponsible talk such as this against people who offer themselves to public life and, by and large, are giving service to a higher calibre than the people they serve.

Then the president of the council, Mr. Roberge, said:

We are giving a service too, where we receive no recognition or pay, nothing. We are living with the problem and advising to the best of our ability.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Now, what did the minister say to the council? He said that they had better improve their manners before he would listen to them. That is not good enough for a minister of the crown in speaking to an elected body in Banff. I say that he blackmailed the council. Regardless of the kind of project we are talking about I say he had no right to go to a democratic organization and tell them to apologize and withdraw the wire which called for his resignation, and unless they did so he would not listen to them.

Worse than that, he bluffed them. He said he would give further consideration to this matter. He never gave any consideration to it. He learned from them that there was an order in council in this regard which said he could not do what he was doing. He broke the law by allowing these people to start building this project, and then he said to them: "Look, I have not rescinded this order in council which protects the liberties of these people; I only did this in connection with this project".

Then he wrote a letter—and what an arrogant letter it was—on November 4, 1964, and I only wish I had time tonight to read the terms of that letter. It is a disgrace for any minister to talk to a democratic organization in this way. I thought they had overstepped themselves in calling for the minister's resignation, but when I read carefully through the 24 pages here and discovered the things he said to that democratic organization I can only say I think they were right in calling for his resignation.

I am not saying that we need no development of the parks, but these people do have rights and the minister has run over those rights. I would say to him what Mackenzie King said in this House of Commons, that when you pass secret orders in council behind closed doors, unknown in this case to the elected council of Banff, you are running slipshod over the rights of the people of Canada. I want to hear the minister's explanation. He blackmailed them and I am suspicious of the kind of project which we have in Banff at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I almost admire the righteous indignation of the hon. member for Bow River. I am sure he followed the advice of the minister who once said that if you have a weak argument you should shout loudly. I will be glad to answer the hon. member regarding the actions of the advisory council of Banff, one of whose members had said there was obviously a pay-off here. I told these people that before I discussed anything with them they would have to retract that statement. I told them I was defending not myself, because I was not anxious about myself, but the great body of public servants in this country who are doing the best they can by the public. They retracted it. They also said they had wired the Prime Minister telling him they would withdraw their request for my resignation; I had asked for that too.

Then we got down to some discussions and I think we are working along pretty well. We are in the process of revising the regulations at Banff in accord with the Oberlander report. They are not yet published. There is no order in council yet covering them. But all the things we are doing and the regulations and actions we are taking are directly in conformity with the recommendations of the Oberlander report. We will have to make a number of other regulations, and the land use code which will be published will take care of the whole matter.

I am astonished that the hon. member should even mention Bow View lodge, because I have here a letter which he wrote to the owners of the Bow View lodge property on December 5, 1962, as follows:

> Messrs. Bassie, Kempo, Hochachka & Shewchuk... Re: Proposed motor hotel at the site of Bow View lodge, (lots 22A and 23A, Block A, plan Banff 1301 FW)
> We are having a meeting tomorrow morning with the minister, Mr. Dinsdale, to discuss Dr. Oberlander's report, and we should know within a few days the zones that are going to be accepted for the building of motels and hotels in Banff.
> Your application is before me and has been fully discussed. You can rest assured I am pressing for your interests.

Yet the hon. member stands up here tonight full of hot anger because of the fact I have now assisted his friends in doing that thing he promised to do in 1962. Accusations have been made that these people are from Edmonton and that they should not be allowed to carry on this development in Banff. The hon. member has made accusations that one of the people behind this is the mayor of Edmonton. I am satisfied that he is not remotely connected with it in any way, shape or form.

Mr. Woolliams: Have you checked through the registrations at the registrar's office in Edmonton?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Laing: I used every possible means of finding out who are the owners, and I am satisfied that he is not in any way connected.

Mr. Woolliams: The Banff council does not agree with you.

Mr. Laing: The Banff council and I are getting along very well, and I would not want that fine relationship hindered by the hon. member for Bow River. I hope from now on we will be able to get along very well.

If exception is taken to the fact that we have issued this licence without having an order in council, I might say again that this is old stuff, because when my hon. friend was sitting on this side of the house in 1960, the Spruce Grove motel in Banff had its building permit issued on May 3, 1960, and it was not until August 28, 1963 that we rectified the situation, approved the issuance of that permit and authorized it by order in council. Over three years elapsed between the time the permit was issued and the order in council passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. minister's time has expired.

PUBLIC SERVICE—SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on orders of the day this afternoon I asked the Prime Minister whether he could disclose the terms of his answer to those who saw the government two weeks ago concerning the need for an increase in the pensions of superannuated civil servants. The Prime Minister indicated briefly what those terms were, and press reports have spelled them out in more detail and indicate in fact that the government's answer to this very urgent appeal was no.

Mr. Speaker, I express on behalf of superannuated civil servants and widows of superannuated civil servants great disappointment that the government has again given this kind of an answer. Earlier during this session representations were made to the government. They were dealt with by the Minister of Finance, and after a period of time he gave a negative answer. As the weeks and months of this session have passed, further representations have been made. Finally two weeks ago Tuesday, I believe, representatives of two or three bodies speaking for superannuated civil servants met with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, and I believe one or two other ministers, and presented their case. They were assured that their case would be given consideration. Now again they have been told that this government can do nothing for them.

The arguments which are given are not new, and I suggest that they are no more valid today than they were when given on past occasions. The principal argument that the government seems to use again and again is that superannuated civil servants should not expect anything better than pensioned employees of other employers in the country. Surely if that argument carries any weight, then no one in the government service can expect better salaries or conditions than those found elsewhere in the country. Surely this argument is full of holes, and what the government ought to be doing is to be leading rather than dragging behind other employers.

The suggestion that other employers do not do this is also made from time to time. I find that an increasing number of employers, particularly municipal organizations, some of the provinces, as well as employers in other countries are recognizing that retired employees have a right to share in the increased productivity of the society or nation of which they have been a part. I suggest that this principle was in fact accepted by parliament in 1959 when it passed the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act. This of course was when a Conservative government was in power but the Liberals of that day did not oppose the measure. In other words, any suggestion that it is a sin or a crime to raise the pensions of former government employees was surely set aside by the action that parliament took on that occasion.

One of the other suggestions made by the Prime Minister, according to press reports, is that the government is doing things for older people generally and that superannuated civil servants must be satisfied to share in these general improvements. Apparently one of the improvements cited is that the old age security pension is going to have built into it a cost of living bonus. We now know what that means. It means that in 1968, if superannuated civil servants drawing the old age security pension are still alive, they stand a chance of getting an increase in their old age security pension of 75 cents a month or if the cost of living has gone up high enough they will get $1.50 a month but no more. When we talk about 1968 in relation to old people obviously many of them will be dead before that time comes.

I submit that the government is being callous and unfair to these former employees and that it is being unfair to the desire of Canadians as a whole to be decent to our employees. I submit that the government is completely wrong in its failure to give a lead of any kind. This very day the Prime Minister, in response to a question from the Leader of the Opposition with regard to veterans pensions, admitted that perhaps with respect to veterans pensions the time had come for a cyclical review of these pensions every two years. Indeed, even the cost of living bonus in the Canada pension plan and in the Old Age Security Act is an admission there is a case for these amounts to be reviewed and increased after pensions have been put in payment.

I submit that on all counts the government is being most unfair to its former employees, the superannuated civil servants, retired members of the services, of the mounted police and others, in continually saying no to these faithful former servants. This is supposed to be a question, Mr. Speaker, and obviously I have been making a statement expressing my disappointment at the announcement made by the Prime Minister today on orders of the day. I close with a question. What has the government got to say to give some hope, some encouragement, to these former employees?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in expressing himself suggested that the government was callous in its attitude toward this question. His criticism affords me the opportunity to remind him that no one has a more sincere regard and deeper concern for pensioners and other retired people in this country than the Prime Minister, and as head of the government he has translated that concern into constructive action on more than one occasion.

The Prime Minister, with real regret, was impelled to make the decision in regard to this matter which he announced to the house. We transmitted that decision in the form of a letter to Mr. Fred W. Whitehouse, national secretary-treasurer of the federal superannuates national association, in a letter similar in substance to Mr. F. T. Gough, national secretary-treasurer of the civil service association of Canada and in another letter to Mr. J. G. Dumouchel, first vice-president of the civil service federation of Canada. I stated that these letters are similar in substance although they vary somewhat in form. The variations are due to the fact that the associations submitted briefs that were different in some respects, and consequently they had to be answered in a slightly different manner. With the indulgence of the house I should like to read into the record the answer the Prime Minister sent to Mr. Whitehouse and which will also cover the replies to the officials of the other associations. The letter is dated November 10, 1964, and reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Whitehouse:

My colleagues and I have studied the brief which you left with me on October 27 when we had a discussion concerning your proposal to adjust the pensions paid to superannuated civil servants.

After reviewing the principles involved in your proposal as well as the facts which you have cited, we have come to the conclusion that any steps which the government should propose to parliament to alleviate difficulties faced by retired persons should be general in character and not confined to former employees of the government of Canada. I am sure that your association will recognize on reflection that there have been a number of general actions taken which have benefitted members of your association as well as other retired people in Canada; the main ones, of course, have been the increases in the old age security pensions. Already those over 70 will have received benefits increased by $240 per year per pensioner over the level that pertained at the time the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act was passed in 1958. In addition, there have been corresponding increases in old age assistance for those who require it between the ages of 65 and 70, as well as other measures—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, the parliamentary secretary's time has expired.

Mr. Pennell: May I ask the indulgence of the house, Mr. Speaker, to complete this letter? I believe it is of great interest to the members of the house.

Mr. Knowles: It is irregular, but perhaps he could be permitted to just put it on Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed? The rules under which we are operating after ten o'clock are rather strict, as all hon. members know. If we make exceptions at any time to go beyond either the seven minutes allowed to a questioner or the three minutes allotted to the member replying on behalf of the government, we may get into difficulty. The suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that the parliamentary secretary be allowed to include the balance of this letter as part of his speech.

Mr. Knowles: May I make an alternative suggestion? Could it be agreed that it be made an appendix to today's Hansard, that is the whole letter?

Mr. Pennell: I would be pleased to agree to the suggestion of the hon. member if I could just finish the sentence so it will appear in proper form in Hansard.

Mr. Knowles: It will be in Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of letter referred to above see appendix.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please; the hon. member for Skeena.

GRAIN—PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—INCREASE IN ELEVATOR CAPACITY

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I raised by way of question today, and have done so on many other days in the past, the subject of the grain elevator in the city of Prince Rupert, a terminal point on the Canadian National Railway. On each of the many occasions upon which I have asked the minister about prospects for doubling the capacity of that elevator he has said, either directly or in effect, that the matter is under consideration.

The elevator at Prince Rupert, by the admission of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) himself, is one of the most efficiently operated terminal elevators in Canada. It has a working capacity of about one million bushels. Grain handling ships today are of a size now that they can carry upwards from three quarters of a million bushels in one cargo. This leaves the elevator in a position of being unable to load more than one ship at a time. It would have to wait, after one ship is loaded, for an influx of grain by rail, then have the grain cleaned, processed and stored until the approximately three quarters of a million bushels capacity was reached again, which would be sufficient for another ship of similar size.

In recent years we have seen tremendously large sales of grain to other countries, notably to China and the Soviet union, which have resulted in the west coast ports being used to the maximum. They have also resulted in the city of Vancouver, as it were, getting the gravy. A further result was an announcement just a few months ago of a large increase in the capacity of one of the elevators in Vancouver, and as a consequence the city of Prince Rupert and the operation of the grain elevator there are being pushed more and more into the background.

Nearly every argument or reason that one can think of is in favour of doubling the capacity of the elevator there. Incidentally, it was built with this thought in mind in 1926, at a cost—and I am guessing—of between $1½ million and $2 million, so that its capacity could be doubled. On March 31 of this year we had a debate in this chamber about the Prince Rupert elevator and the minister answered me as follows:

> I am quite sympathetic to what the hon. member has said, and I am sorry that I cannot say tonight some of the things I should like to say. But I can say this, that all of the storage facilities which are controlled by the Canadian government in one way or another have been carefully discussed, and I hope in the not too distant future that we will be able to present something to the hon. member which will be satisfactory in so far as the Prince Rupert terminal is concerned.

That was at the end of March and now it is pretty near the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker, the people in Rupert have been waiting and living in hope since that day, and even before that day. Each time we pose the question to the minister the only answer we get is the same as we got today, namely that it is under consideration. It has even got to the point where the minister says this laughingly, as if it were a joke. But it is not a joke; it is a very serious matter.

Maybe it was appropriate that the minister made those comments on March 31, the eve of April Fool's day. Perhaps he had in mind perpetrating an April Fool's joke on the people of Rupert. I hope not, and I hope that he will soon finish his consideration. Surely it does not take months and months of dragged out consideration to come to a conclusion. I ask him to tell the people in Rupert whether the government is going to double the elevator capacity or not? This is the simple answer the people want. They think this consideration has gone on far too long. It is long past the time for action. They would like to see this take place, and so would I.

Mr. Bruce S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Skeena for his continuing interest in this question of the terminal elevator at Prince Rupert.

Mr. Howard: Action is what we want.

Mr. Beer: I also want to assure him that the Minister of Agriculture is interested in every aspect of agriculture, and not the least of his interest is in the provision of proper facilities for the handling of grain, including the terminal elevator at Prince Rupert.

The minister of course is justified in this interest in view of the fact that in 1963 we harvested the largest crop of wheat and grain in our history, amounting to some 725 million bushels, and of this total some 632 million bushels were sold for export. When you add to that the amount of grain used domestically, which amounted to another 155 million bushels, this indicates our total output for that year was more than the total amount harvested, which of course means we have eaten into our reserves.

The hon. member for Skeena will realize that by asking this type of question he is inquiring into what government policy might be, and I have no alternative but to reply that this matter has been given very thorough consideration and is being considered constantly, and when an announcement is possible it will be made by the minister in the house.

Mr. Howard: Thank you very much.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

APPENDIX

PUBLIC SERVICE—REPLY OF PRIME MINISTER TO FEDERAL SUPERANNUATES NATIONAL ASSOCIATION

Ottawa, November 10, 1964.

Mr. Fred W. Whitehouse,
National Secretary-Treasurer,
Federal Superannuates National Association,
2696 MacDonald Drive,
Victoria, B.C.

Dear Mr. Whitehouse:

My colleagues and I have studied the brief which you left with me on October 27 when we had a discussion concerning your proposal to adjust the pensions paid to superannuated civil servants.

After reviewing the principles involved in your proposal as well as the facts which you have cited, we have come to the conclusion that any steps which the government should propose to parliament to alleviate difficulties faced by retired persons should be general in character and not confined to former employees of the government of Canada. I am sure that your association will recognize on reflection that there have been a number of general actions taken which have benefitted members of your association as well as other retired people in Canada; the main ones, of course, have been the increases in the old age security pensions. Already those over 70 will have received benefits increased by $240 per year per pensioner over the level that pertained at the time the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act was passed in 1958. In addition, there have been corresponding increases in old age assistance for those who require it between the ages of 65 and 70, as well as other measures taken by the provinces to meet the situation of those in need. In addition to this, hospital insurance has become available to retired persons on a national basis since that time. Since retired people constitute a high-cost group under such insurance, the establishment of hospital insurance programs is of quite substantial help to them.

Under the provisions of the Canada pension plan bill which has just been made public the amount of the old age security pension available to all Canadians meeting the residence qualifications will be adjusted to take into account changes in the cost of living. Consequently, when this bill is enacted by parliament members of your association will be able to rely upon the real value of their old age security pension being maintained.

The government believes that it would be unfair to the great majority of retired Canadians who have not worked for the government to make special provision to protect the former employees of the government of Canada itself against increases in living costs. Pensions paid to former government employees under the Superannuation Act or under other similar acts must be looked upon basically as part of the remuneration received by these employees for the services they rendered when they were employed. They are not payments based upon need, nor should they be regarded as payments that are subject to increase on compassionate grounds. To make them such would be to favour this minority of retired people by comparison with the majority of other retired Canadians who cannot expect such treatment either from the government as such or from employers for whom they had worked in the past. In this sense, to accede to the requests of your association would constitute a form of discrimination against the majority.

It is with real regret that I send you a decision which I know will be disappointing to you and to the members of your association, but I feel it would be unfair to them to leave the situation uncertain once the government had reviewed the principles involved in your proposal and come to the reluctant conclusion that it could not accept them.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. Pearson.

NATIONAL PARKS

JASPER—TABLING OF REPORT ON URBAN DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table two copies of the report on the urban development plan for Jasper, Alberta.

WATER RESOURCES

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—REPORTED RADIOACTIVE POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister about a matter in which I am sure he has more than an academic interest. According to news reports this morning there has been extensive pollution of the waters in and around Elliot lake, and I am wondering whether this matter has been a subject of study by the branch of the government of Canada which has the responsibility for dealing with radioactivity, or is this a matter which is entirely in the hands of the water resources commission of the province? What report has the government received in this regard?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter to which my hon. friend refers is, of course, one under provincial jurisdiction; but as soon as I read the report and, indeed, as soon as I heard about this possibility last night I got in touch with the officials of the federal government concerned and we are examining what can be done to co-operate with the provincial government if such co-operation is required.

But, Mr. Speaker, I should like to call your attention to the headline of the story that appeared this morning: "Elliot Lake Contaminated by Radioactive Mine Waste". I regret that headline greatly, because it is misleading and can do very serious damage, as can the story itself if it is misinterpreted, to a community which has already suffered a great deal of misfortune and whose people are struggling to establish a new future for the community. I say this because the waters involved—the story itself shows this and that the headline is misleading—are not Elliot lake at all, that being the lake on which the community is situated, but Quirke lake and the Serpent river watershed; and Quirke lake is not connected with Elliot lake at all.

So while the matter must be taken seriously and investigated because of the story, I would hope it could be made clear that Elliot lake as such is not involved. I would also call attention to the statement of the premier of Ontario in commenting on this matter yesterday to the effect that he was satisfied there was no danger. However, I myself am getting in touch with Mr. Robarts personally to make sure the matter is looked into.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the mining and sale of uranium is controlled by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, and in view of the fact that Atomic Energy of Canada Limited has most of the knowledge with reference to the disposal of uranium waste, does the Prime Minister not think the federal government has some responsibility for making sure that this waste is properly disposed of? Second, may I ask the Prime Minister if there are any other cases across Canada that have been kept under wraps, as this one apparently has been for some two years?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the statement that this matter has been kept under wraps in any wrong sense at all. I have admitted, of course, that the federal government has a responsibility in these matters, but as I have said the jurisdiction is primarily provincial. I accept that responsibility, naturally, and I am in touch with the atomic energy authorities and we will be in touch with the provincial government. What I am anxious to remove is the wrong impression conveyed by the headline that Elliot lake itself is involved in any way, shape or form, because it is not connected with the lake where the radioactive material has been deposited. I would also point out that while there were 11 uranium mines in operation in this area some time ago, which undoubtedly constituted a problem and one that was recognized at the time, there is only one mine in operation now.

Mr. Douglas: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am concerned not only about Elliot lake but as to what extent this condition may be prevalent across Canada. Is it the intention of the government to work out with the provincial governments adequate supervision of the disposal of waste from the processing of uranium?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I have already stated that as soon as I heard of the report I made inquiries. As a result of those inquiries I hope to be able to make a full statement at the earliest possible date. I appreciate the importance of this matter and that the fears of my hon. friend and others must be removed. Perhaps the statement I will be able to make will in itself help to remove some of those fears that have arisen in regard to this matter.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the Prime Minister consider conveying, on behalf of the members of the house, congratulations to the public health officer who pursued his investigation of this matter against the reported objections of the mine management involved?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, it would be quite wrong to do that until I have got all the information, because the only information we have now is the story in the newspaper which is being investigated.

[Mr. Douglas.]

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES ON COST OF LIVING TIE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): In the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare perhaps I could direct my question to the Prime Minister. Can he advise the house whether any of the provinces were consulted prior to the announcement by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the general pension scheme would be tied to the cost of living index? Further, was any consideration given to the effect this would have on the general welfare programs across the country?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Not to my knowledge. Matters concerning old age security are exclusively within the jurisdiction of the federal government, and just as the raising of the old age security pension by $10 last year was done by the federal government, so this particular change was within the responsibility of the federal government. I doubt if there was consultation or if consultation would be required, unless we had the same kind of consultation with the provinces when they took action on those matters which are within their jurisdiction.

[Later:]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in connection with the question asked by the hon. member for Edmonton West, which the Prime Minister answered. This deals with the subject of old age pensions and the statement made by Premier Robarts. Do I understand from the right hon. gentleman's answer that the government now takes the position that the federal government has exclusive jurisdiction over matters of old age security and pensions?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Speaker. I think my answer was quite clear. In matters of this kind, where the federal government has to take responsibility for making a decision, that responsibility is not always discharged only after consultation with the provinces. Otherwise the decisions might be delayed for a long time, because consultation with one province would necessitate consultation with all provinces. That does not mean there is not always continuous consultation with the provinces on economic matters, including pension matters.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): I should like to direct a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the government has decided to meet with the medical representatives regarding the Hall commission report, will they announce a date for a conference with the provinces?

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I will be happy to take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the minister in order that there can be a reply at the beginning of the week.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LESSARD—REPLY OF AGRICULTURE MINISTER RESPECTING DAIRY POLICY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to draw the attention of the house to an answer given to me yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) after the question I put to him on this new policy with regard to the dairy industry.

As recorded on page 9996 of Hansard, he answered as follows:

[Text]

I would be glad to make the announcement just as soon as we have one.

This is a clear implication that there is no policy as such, but the French version does not say the same thing at all.

[Translation]

Whereas the answer is as follows, as reported on page 10184 of the French edition of Hansard:

Je ferai volontiers l'annonce en question dès que nous y serons autorisés.

There is a marked difference here. I wanted to point this out to the house in order that the correction might be made in Hansard. I do not suggest that the minister changed anything, since the English version is precisely what was said in the house. I believe the mistake was made when the text was translated from English into French, since the minister did reply that he had no policy at present with regard to the dairy industry.

[Text]

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I am prepared to accept the French version, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—STATUS OF PERSONS CONCERNED WITH NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he has an answer as yet to the question I posed yesterday regarding the I.T.U. strike in Toronto.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the persons concerned were requested to leave Canada after the minister's statement on October 26. The majority have left and the persons remaining, three in number, have been allowed until the end of this week to effect departure. In the event of their failure to leave by that time the provision of the Immigration Act respecting special inquiries and deportation if necessary will be invoked.

REFUSAL OF ENTRY TO UNITED STATES AUTHOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question of which I have given him notice. It relates to a story in the Toronto Telegram of Wednesday entitled "U.S. author thrown out of Canada". The article alleges a great deal of authoritarian conduct on the part of immigration authorities in rejecting this visitor because of a conviction which he had 25 years ago. In view of his threat to go on United States television programs and make quite an issue out of this, I wonder whether the minister could make a statement to the house giving us some facts about the matter.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the facts in the case of Mr. Sands are as follows. He applied for temporary admission to Canada at the international airport, Malton, in the evening of November 10 in order to be interviewed for a C.B.C. program and in connection with the promotion in Canada of his autobiography.

No advance arrangements had been made with the Canadian immigration authorities. The questions regarding his appearance on television in the United States and his authorship of a book were designed to establish his identity. Mr. Sands admitted that he had been convicted of a crime and had served a prison sentence in the United States. This placed him within the category of persons prohibited by statute from admission to Canada. His deportation was ordered on those grounds.

Mr. Sands was informed of his right to enter an appeal against the order for deportation but declined to do so. He asked to be allowed to return to the United States that evening if possible; ordinarily he would have been accommodated in a hotel near the airport overnight and departure would have been made the next day. The C.B.C. and his publisher in Toronto were aware of the circumstances, and he was visited by the latter's representative. By no means was he held incommunicado. A flight to Cleveland was available later in the evening, and he elected to return to the United States on that flight. Should any request be received from Mr. Sands for admission to Canada the department would be prepared to consider making special arrangements for his temporary entry under a minister's permit.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON TERRORIST ACTIVITIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Did he receive a report from the R.C.M.P. concerning the dynamiting of the automobile of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, and can he tell the house if the said report establishes a link between this criminal and the one who dynamited a railway line in my riding with a view to making an attempt on the life of the former prime minister who is now the leader of the official opposition?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received any report on this matter, but inasmuch as additional facts have been brought to my attention I shall inquire further into this affair.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question in a humorous vein.

[Mr. Badanai.]

Does the Minister of Justice intend to order the R.C.M.P. to guard the residence, the automobile and the family of the member for Villeneuve, who is an avowed monarchist?

[Text]

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REPORT ON POLICE ACTIVITIES DURING ROYAL VISIT TO QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the minister has yet received a report from the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. regarding the activities of the police in general in Quebec city on the occasion of Her Majesty's visit? Some time ago the minister indicated that he expected such a report. Has he received it, and does he intend to make it public?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): I have not yet received such a report, and when it is received a decision on whether to make it public will be made at that time.

DISCIPLINARY MEASURES RESPECTING APPLICATION OF FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. The minister will recall that on July 17, 21, 24 and 27 I put certain questions to him with respect to the trial, conviction and appeal of two mounted police officers in Montreal with respect to the misuse of government funds. I understand that the appeal has now been dismissed, and I wish to ask whether the minister can inform the house if he has received any recommendation from the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. on the dismissal of these two officers, and whether that recommendation has been acted upon?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there are two disciplinary cases in respect of which I am still receiving representations and which therefore are still presently before me for consideration. All steps are being taken which are necessarily inherent in a full consideration of such cases, and it would be quite inappropriate for me to say anything more about the matter at the present time. At the proper stage I shall make an appropriate announcement about it.

Mr. Nielsen: As a supplementary question, since news reports would seem to indicate that the two officers concerned are Chief Superintendent Belec and Sub Inspector Poitras, and since these news reports seem to carry a good many other details about the case, could the minister give the same type of information to the house, in particular whether he has received a recommendation from the commissioner urging the dismissal of the two officers concerned? If so, when was that report received and has it yet been acted upon?

Mr. Favreau: With respect to the merits of the matter, I must stand by the answer I have just given. With respect to the news reports to which the hon. member for Yukon has referred, if he cares to send them to me I should consider it my duty to look into the matter.

[Later:]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a further question to the Minister of Justice. The minister will recall that last night in his office I did discuss with him this matter of the previous question I asked. Is it still his intention to report fully to the house with respect to all the circumstances surrounding the trial, conviction, appeal and dismissal of the two R.C.M.P. officers concerned?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I should think this supplementary question is fully covered by the answer I have given. When the hon. member reads my answer he will notice I said that at the appropriate time I would make a statement on the matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION TO GENERAL DE GAULLE TO VISIT CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Can he tell the house whether the invitation of General de Gaulle to Canada, as expressed by the premier of the province of Quebec, represents the views of the Canadian government?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen a report of the invitation in question, but if it was made by the premier of the province of Quebec I am sure all Canadians would be very glad if President de Gaulle were able to accept it. As a matter of fact, when I was in Paris some months ago in January, I extended the same invitation myself.

CYPRUS—RATES OF PAY OF PEACE KEEPING TROOPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of reports of concern and some dissatisfaction with the difference in rates of pay between our Canadian troops in Cyprus and those paid by the United Nations, who are reported to be paid almost three times as much as the Canadian troops, has Canada made any representations to the United Nations in this regard in view of the fact that Canada does pay its contributions to the United Nations and then sees United Nations troops paid three times as much as our own troops, who are self-sufficient?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is a complicated question which I do not think lends itself to reply on orders of the day. When my estimates are up I will be glad to deal with it.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN PROPOSAL FOR SOLUTION OF FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Could he inform us officially of the proposal Canada advanced at the United Nations in an attempt to resolve the non-payment of dues or assessments problem that exists, and would he also advise the house of the reaction to that proposal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the initiative taken by the Canadian representatives at the United Nations yesterday had to do with an announcement by the government of the United States that until such time as the financial problem in the United Nations was resolved it would not agree to pledge its contribution, which represents 40 per cent of the total amount, to the United Nations voluntary assistance programs.

The government of Canada has indicated to the government of the United States that it did not take the same view of the relationship between this conference and the defaulting position of certain members of the United Nations. We suggested therefore that the conference be postponed so that further consideration could be given to the whole question. However, it was not possible to obtain general agreement, and the meeting is taking place on Monday next.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Can the minister advise us whether what took place yesterday was the only Canadian initiative toward resolving the financial problems of the United Nations, or may we look for another?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Any idea which the Canadian government may have as to how this problem may be resolved is, of course, a matter for negotiation. Such negotiations are now under way. The problem yesterday had to do with the request by the secretary general for commitments by contributors to the voluntary assistance programs of the United Nations.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN SUBSIDY ON WOODEN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What action does the minister intend to take on the proposals set forth in the brief from the maritime lumber board requesting that subsidy payments toward the capital construction costs of wooden vessels be increased to equal those paid in respect of the construction of steel vessels?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I intend to see that the proposal is very fully considered.

PIPE LINES

REPORTED INTENTION OF TRANS-CANADA COMPANY TO BUILD LINE THROUGH U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him whether the government has considered a policy attitude with regard to the intention announced by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to construct a line from western to eastern Canada through the United States.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, as the hon. gentleman knows, has declared its intention to apply to the national energy board in Canada and to the appropriate authorities in the United States for the necessary authority to construct this line. This is the proper procedure, and I do not think it would be proper for me to express an opinion on the merits of the case at the present time.

Mr. Fisher: Would the minister indicate whether the government is considering the question from the viewpoint that the Canadian line at the present time is running to capacity, and there is certainly much doubt and questioning in parts of Canada through which the present line runs about the intention to build through the United States.

Mr. Sharp: The national energy board is charged by parliament with the responsibility for hearing applications of this kind and for making its recommendations, and I do not think it would be appropriate for me to say more than that at the present time.

NATIONAL PARKS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING ZONING AND BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): My question is directed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Yesterday the hon. gentleman agreed, I believe, to table certain orders in council or regulations rescinding orders in council governing parts of Banff park. Has he filed or tabled those documents today in the house?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I thought I had convinced the hon. gentleman last night that no order in council has been passed. I told him also that decisions which have been taken with respect to permits granted there have been strictly in accordance with the recommendations of the Oberlander report and that action would be validated by order in council later.

Mr. Woolliams: In other words the minister said there were licences or permits issued but there is no law permitting those same licences to be issued.

Mr. Laing: We have no intention of waiting for three years as the previous government did in this respect.

Mr. Woolliams: That is no answer.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO DEAL WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Considering that the figures released yesterday by the dominion bureau of statistics show that unemployment increased considerably during the month of October, have the Prime Minister and his cabinet decided to take concrete steps to check this situation which could become serious next winter?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): The rise to which the hon. member refers has been made public, but I would point out that though unemployment in October represented 3.7 per cent of the labour force as compared with 3.1 per cent in September, the figure in October one year ago was 3.9 per cent, and it was considerably higher in the years before that. While we regret, of course, any rise in unemployment, measures are being taken every day by the government to ensure that maximum employment is created.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance.

Since the minister held the 11 per cent tax on building materials which he established last year responsible for the improvement of economic conditions in Canada, does he intend to propose other measures of what nature to reduce unemployment?

[Text]

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will undoubtedly have read the report and the reasons for this unfortunate increase in unemployment in the month of October, so he will know that it was largely due to lay-offs in the automobile industry occasioned by labour disputes, difficulties and disruptions in the United States.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance who has just drawn the attention of the house to a report which had already been published, to the effect that the rise in unemployment was due to a strike in the automobile industry, that is at General Motors in the United States.

Now a strike is on at the Ford Motor Company. May we expect another wave of unemployment in the automobile industry as a result of the strike at the Ford Motor Company in the United States and, in this connection, will the minister decide to take necessary steps to show that the Canadian automobile industries are really Canadian and independent?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, it is very easy to make a broad generalization of that kind, but if the hon. member has anything specific in mind which he would like to suggest to me in order to accomplish that objective, I would be very glad to see him afterward.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. A few moments ago he mentioned measures which the government is taking to overcome unemployment. I wonder whether he could inform the house of the nature of some of those measures.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if I inform the house of some I should inform the house of all, and that would take the rest of the morning.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): All I ask is for one or two.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister mentioned that he would make a statement concerning steps to be taken by the government to alleviate unemployment and that it would take all morning to make that statement, could the right hon. Prime Minister tell us when he will be making that statement and when will those steps be taken?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Every time I make a speech I give an indication of what is being done, as do my colleagues. At present I am heavily engaged in preparing a report for my own information on all the measures which have been taken by the government concerning unemployment. I would be very glad to send a copy of that to my hon. friend.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if there might not have been a failure in the interpretation system, but that is not an answer to the question I put to the Prime Minister.

I asked him when he would announce what steps he intends to take, not the ones which have been taken already, with a view to remedying the unemployment situation?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, if I misinterpreted my hon. friend's question. Any new measures, of course, will be matters of government policy and will be announced as we go along.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: May I put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister?

Could the Prime Minister be a bit more specific? I feel that his statement is rather vague, while the increase in unemployment is far from being vague, in fact it is a concrete thing, and I feel—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I had grave doubts that the original question was in order, but with a view to getting on with our business the Prime Minister did reply. I do not think it is reasonable at this time to expect any further illumination.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RETURN OF RAILWAY STOCK CARS TO WESTERN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, last Monday the Minister of Agriculture undertook to make representations to the railway companies to see whether there was anything which could be done to expedite the return of livestock cars to the market places in western Canada. I should like to ask him now what was the response from the railway companies to his request, and also whether there are now sufficient cars in the market places of western Canada to move feeder livestock as they come in.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to give the hon. member a report, but I have not yet seen the report since the inquiry was made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR MEETING RESPECTING HASTINGS-PRINCE EDWARD REGIMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. A. Webb (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, and ask whether he would be willing to arrange an early meeting with a committee representing the Hastings-Prince Edward regiment.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I would entertain a suggestion for a possible meeting, but in all fairness to my hon. friend I would discourage him from arranging such a meeting if it is to take place on the basis that there would be a change in the decisions which have been announced.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport relating to the Atlantic development board. In view of the fact that the $100 million fund made available to that board is being rapidly depleted, can the minister inform the house when we can expect a statement from the government as to the future of this very important board?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that would be a very good subject for discussion when my estimates come up for consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

GALLERY OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Public Works, but in his absence perhaps I should direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the impending visit of Prime Minister Wilson, will the minister ensure that the gallery of British prime ministers in the sixth floor corridor is brought up to date before that event?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we must always keep up to date on this matter of prime ministerial pictures if we possibly can. I had notice of this question, for which I thank the hon. member, and I can inform him that I have consulted His Honour the Speaker, who has informed me that the two pictures in question are under order and expected to be received shortly.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

The house resumed, from Thursday, November 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith—Mr. Pickersgill (for Mr. Pearson)—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose last evening we were considering clause 13 and the amendment proposed thereto by the hon. member for Bow River.

On clause 13—Rules to be applied in preparing report.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, when I rose last night just before the ten o'clock adjournment I did so because I considered that the last debatable clause of Bill No. C-72 was going through the committee stage too quickly. There are problems raised by this whole bill which should be brought out as fully as possible before the bill is finally passed.

I indicated last evening that I wanted to make several brief remarks on clause 13. Had I been granted a few extra minutes last night I am sure I could have completed my remarks, which are of interest to all rural constituencies and of particular concern to the province of Saskatchewan. I intended to speak earlier during our consideration of clause 12 in regard to the threatened loss of four federal seats.

Under clause 12 the number of representative members for a province in the House of Commons is subject and according to provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act and the rules therein. In this clause 12 of the bill there is no provision for special consideration for special areas.

The Chairman: I should like to remind the hon. member that clause 12 of the bill has been passed by the committee and we are now considering clause 13.

Mr. Pascoe: I understand that, Mr. Chairman. I was just suggesting that there was no mention in clause 12 of the bill about special consideration for special areas, and that is why I am making my remarks on clause 13 where there is provision for special consideration. I realize that the tolerance referred to in this section has regard to the population totals in particular constituencies, and I should like to base my remarks on this phase of the situation.

I consider the arguments which I intend to use about tolerances for individual constituencies are also applicable to provincial representation, and I should like to make one reference in this regard to the fact that we are considering constitutional changes. Under the proposed formula the provinces will have to be consulted about the number of seats in the House of Commons allocated to them. Because of that fact there should not be any drastic changes made now in respect of provincial representation.

To get back to a consideration of clause 13, the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River suggests a tolerance of 25 per cent in the electoral quota for constituencies in the provinces. I am prepared to support the amendment in its general application, providing the commissions in particular provinces have the recognized right to exceed this tolerance in special cases as mentioned in paragraphs (i) and (ii) of subclause (b) of clause 13. These two paragraphs relate to special geographic considerations and special community interests. It is in this regard that I wished to speak last evening, because there should not be an absolute tolerance limit of 25 per cent in respect of every special geographic consideration or special community interest. In other words, I cannot subscribe to the wording of clause 13 which says that in no case shall the allowable tolerance be more than 25 per cent. There must be special consideration in special cases.

Mr. Chairman, now that we have more time available than was available last night I intend to speak at greater length. I should like to answer some of the questions posed by previous speakers to the effect that there should be a great deal more representation of cities in the next parliament with less representation of rural areas. I do not speak for Saskatchewan alone, but for all rural areas of Canada. An editorial which appeared in the Financial Post of April 31, 1963 must also be answered. Part of the editorial stated:

> At the best of times, because of an old custom that has no rational defence, Canada's rural voters have too many M.P.'s, its urban voters too few. By tradition, two persons living in the country have about the same political power as three in the city.

The editorial also commented on the 1952 redistribution which it said "gives the agricultural and small town minority roughly the same weight as the industrial majority". These are the kind of arguments we have been hearing from city interests, the contention being that representation in parliament should be strictly on a population basis.

The hon. member for Danforth, in an earlier speech advocating strict adherence to population figures in constituency redistribution, said:

There should be the lowest possible variation in population figures in order to abolish finally the rural tyranny that has dominated this parliament for decades.

I realize, of course, that he was speaking for urban constituents just as I am asking for equitable treatment for rural constituents. As others have pointed out large cities have other effective means of representation in addition to representation in parliament. Each city has a mayor and council, an active chamber of commerce, a labour council and professional associations to help look after its citizens. City residents have somewhat uniform interests and problems and, as I said earlier, they live in a compact community and can present their views by means of small or large delegations or meetings.

Rural residents have diverse interests, and they are scattered over large areas. They do not have the same contact with or representation by chambers of commerce or other citizens' groups. It is more difficult for them to meet with their member of parliament or for him to contact them. In this connection I should like to refer to the 1964-65 statement of policy by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, page 69. With regard to the redistribution of federal constituencies, paragraph 291 of their statement of policy reads in part as follows:

There should be factors other than population used in determining equitable representation.

That is the point I am trying to emphasize here. I contend that the agricultural and small town portion of our population should have roughly the same weight in parliament as the urban population. There are others in the house who support this view, including the Liberal member for Renfrew South, who spoke out against his own party's apparent indifference to fair rural representation. I should like to quote a couple of his statements in this regard. As found on page 859 of Hansard for March 12, 1964 he said:

Might I point out, Mr. Speaker, that representation by population is one of those pat cliches which makes a nice sound.

He went on to say:

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that merely to cry representation by population without recognizing the factors extant in our constitution, and without taking a very careful look at geographical, social and economic conditions as they exist in Canada today, is but a hollow, empty and futile cry.

He also said:

I suggest that the tolerance clause will merely give a wider latitude, a greater discretion to those gentlemen who form the commission to do those things that are best, in the interests of providing the best possible representation in the various areas of Canada.

I agree with the hon. member for Renfrew South. Clearly defined regions or sections of Canada with common interests should have a fair share of spokesmen in parliament. This may be straying from the question of constituency tolerances, Mr. Chairman, but I think western Canada should have representation in parliament equal to Ontario or Quebec. With regard to the question of city and country representation there was a statement by an earlier speaker that he had one of those tightly knit city constituencies. That statement outlines very clearly why there is need to work out some form of equitable adjustment in the population formula as between compact urban constituencies and huge rural ridings.

I have a map here, Mr. Chairman. I cannot file it, but it shows the distribution of population according to the last census. It indicates that the population is concentrated particularly in two very small areas of the whole of Canada. The point I am trying to make on this question of tolerance is that there should be some better system of providing equitable representation in the house. Population should not be the only basis for redistribution.

As I said earlier, I am speaking in general terms for all areas of Canada, not just for Saskatchewan. But I want to point out again that the arguments I am using for special tolerances and special consideration for rural ridings apply equally as forcefully to predominantly rural provinces. In the 1952 redistribution bill there was a special provision that the province of Saskatchewan should only lose a certain percentage of its representation. There are senatorial floors for New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and I think there should be some way of making the tolerances in section 13 apply to areas. I believe the Minister of Transport recognized this himself at an earlier stage in the discussion of the bill when he proposed four commissions, one for Ontario, one for Quebec, one for the maritimes and one for the western provinces.

In the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of December 11, 1963 there is this statement:

> It seems inevitable that future parliaments will be dominated by members from heavily populated urban centres and the voice of the farmer will be lost in the tall grass.

I contend again, Mr. Chairman, that the voices of the farmers and of the residents of towns and villages must not be lost. Parliament should make it very clear, by definitely established rules and regulations for redistribution, that rural ridings must receive fair consideration. In an article in Weekend Magazine for November 29, 1963 Robert McKeown stated:

> Much more is involved here than simply drawing squares on the map to equalize the population of the ridings. The commissioners will have to take into consideration a number of racial, religious, geographic and other factors in deciding where to put the boundary lines. Parliament will have to give the commission strict instructions on these matters if it is to avoid stirring up hornets' nests of opposition.

Again on the question of tolerances I should like to refer to an editorial in the Family Herald of September 26, 1963, which reads in part as follows:

> The legislation to initiate redistribution of Canada's electoral ridings will widen the rift between rural and urban representation, as has no other similar legislation in this country's history. As in 1952 when a city-bound population movement had already begun to take its toll of rural seats, Saskatchewan will again be the focal point of this conflict. But unlike 1952 the problem of a declining rural population, as opposed to an exploding city population, will make itself felt not only in the allocation of seats among the provinces, but also in the shift of seats within provinces. The combination of these two forces will seriously affect the farm vote.

I have taken the time of this committee, Mr. Chairman, by the indirect method of referring to tolerances for individual constituencies, to emphasize the special considerations that should be given to provincial representation as a whole while amendments in this regard may be coming forward under constitutional changes. We should try to maintain the status quo to as great a degree as possible until provincial representation has been decided by the dominion-provincial constitutional conference.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready to vote on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bow River?

Amendment (Mr. Woolliams) agreed to: Yeas, 60; nays, 11.

Mr. Moreau: I have a further amendment to clause 13, Mr. Chairman, to which I referred briefly last night. The principle I should like to introduce into the bill is the relative rate of growth of a constituency. I do not feel this should be interpreted as necessarily a rural-urban issue. I think, primarily, what I should like to aim at would be perhaps a city riding as against a suburban riding that is growing very rapidly while the centre of the city is shrinking in population. I feel that particularly in a riding like York-Scarborough, and there are many of this type in Canada, the 1961 census figures are already very much out of date. I realize it is very difficult to forecast the projected growth, but by the time redistribution is completed the population of these ridings would exceed the tolerance that we have in mind when we use the 1961 census figures.

I do not want to get into a long debate on how we determine the rate of growth. I should like to feel that we can rely on the discretion of the commissioners to apply common sense in a situation of this sort. I feel that if we had the principle indicated in this clause of the bill the commissioners could then use their common sense in applying it to the 1961 census figures in a riding like York-Scarborough. It might be that in these suburban type ridings they would use the tolerance on the down side to accommodate a situation which already exists or is certainly going to exist within the next year or two.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I move:

> That clause 13 be amended by striking out lines 34 and 35 on page 4 and substituting therefor:
> "special geographic considerations including in particular the sparsity-density or relative rate of growth."

The Chairman: Is the committee prepared to vote on the amendment?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, members of this party have already indicated that we are in support of this principle and I think this amendment will meet the views of the house generally. It strikes me, however, that the commissioners might like to know just what we mean. I appreciate the point made by the hon. member for York-Scarborough when he said he did not want to get into too much detail, but when the phrase "relative rate of growth" is used, what basis does one have in mind?

Perhaps I might shorten my remarks by putting what I have in mind in the form of a question, either to the member for York-Scarborough or perhaps, if he does not mind, to the minister. Does not the minister think, even if we do not write the complicated details into the statute, that there ought to be something in Hansard so the commissioners will know what parliament has in mind? Is it the rate of growth between 1951 and 1961, for which the official figures are available? Is it the rate of growth between 1961 and now or some other date, the figures for which are not official? What direction is it we are giving to the commissioners?

Mr. Moreau: I appreciate the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think we can get into considerable controversy on what figures we are going to use. I suggest that one official and regularly available figure would be the interim census every five years. This may be used as a measure of growth and would be projected from 1956 to 1961, for instance, which would be a factor. This is an official census taken by the federal government, and I feel it could be very valuable.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might say a word. I indicated last night that I would support the hon. member's motion if he made it, and indeed that it would make it much easier for me to support the 25 per cent tolerance. I would remind hon. members of the committee that the hard, governing fact is the 25 per cent tolerance which the committee has just adopted.

These special geographic considerations are merely indications to the commissions of what was in the minds of hon. members here. "Sparsity" and "density" are just as relative terms as "rate of growth". They are the kind of things found in the preamble to a bill. They are an indication of the kind of considerations that ought to be taken into account in using the tolerance, and that is all.

The tolerance is the only hard rule in this clause. No matter what the rate of growth might be, the commissions cannot go above or below the 25 per cent tolerance. If I were a commissioner this would indicate to me that in a constituency which seems to have a relatively static population and looks as though it would continue to have that, I could not make any particular allowance unless it was such a huge constituency that because of the tremendous area covered there should be a tolerance on the low side so far as population is concerned.

As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out, the rate of growth is not purely urban growth around metropolitan areas. Some of the fastest growing constituencies are like his and the constituency of my hon. friend the member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador where, because of the phenomenal growth of the woods industry in recent years, there has been a large increase in population and the appearance of whole new towns. These are practical considerations that I imagine would influence the commissioners, but this cannot be regarded as anything more. "Considerations" is the main word, and I suspect commissions would take these into account even if this were not included in the bill.

I also suspect they would take into account sparsity and density, but so far as the legal effect of this is concerned I do not believe it would make any difference if we just said the tolerance was to be 25 per cent and added nothing more, because that is the only mandatory part. That is the only part on which a commission can break the law if it creates a constituency larger than 25 per cent above or 25 per cent below the norm.

Mr. Barnett: To make sure my understanding of this point is the same as the minister's may I point out that you might have a situation where, according to the official census figures, the population of a constituency is shown to be 10 per cent below the norm, whereas in actual fact at the time of redistribution its population is 10 per cent above the norm.

Mr. Pickersgill: I can only say that if I were a commissioner that is the kind of consideration I would take into account.

Mr. Woolliams: Although I cannot think of any at the moment, I take it that if there were other circumstances than those outlined a commission could look at them also?

Mr. Pickersgill: I can think of one very special consideration. I tend to think about the place where I was brought up, Manitoba, which has four corners. There is one constituency all across the north but there are three areas where the tolerance would almost certainly become a factor. How big a factor I do not know, but two of the southern corners are also sparsely populated areas and the constituencies cannot run into Saskatchewan, northern Ontario or the Northwest Territories, at least not until Manitoba annexes the latter and apparently it is not seeking to emulate some other provinces.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the minister and the hon. member for York-Scarborough have considered that under clause 25 and other clauses where we provide for members of parliament making protests to the House of Commons about reports and decisions, we almost force the group of members of parliament who will protest to base their objections on a referral back to clause 13 in order to justify them. Probably I am anticipating more trouble than is likely to ensue but it seems to me, particularly at the first shot, that it will be fairly easy to get one third of the members from a province to make some objections.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. gentleman recalls the amendment passed the other evening. I think he is basing his contention on the original bill and not on the amendment.

Mr. Fisher: I am still for the amendment, but it would be fairly easy to get ten members to object. The present amendment gives one more reasons for making objections. Ordinarily whatever we may say about what becomes the law does not really matter a damn. We have encountered that many times, particularly with reference to sections of the Railway Act. One can go back and read the debates and note what members thought those sections meant, but by the time the courts got through interpreting them they did not come out the same way at all. This is an unusual statute in that it is going to give members of parliament the possibility of practising delaying tactics and interpretation tactics. Has the minister considered what this amendment dealing with the rate of growth can lead to? It is really nebulous, and almost any member of parliament could hinge an argument on it and thus raise an objection. Given the fact that objections are likely to be certain, this is a small point, but the minister should consider it.

Dealing with this clause and the bill generally may I say I gathered, particularly from listening to the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, that some members and some of the people who are commenting on redistribution have not yet grasped the enormity of it all. There is just not going to be the same pattern in Canada again.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he not expedite the passage of the bill by saving that part of his speech for his next article after we have adopted this clause?

Mr. Fisher: If I ever thought the minister would deign to read the article, I might consider it.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh, they are reading them.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps they are, but I do not flatter myself. It is like rocking a boat in a lake without producing any ripples.

Mr. Knowles: After the fine commercial the minister gave you—

Mr. Fisher: Well, the minister is good at giving himself and the Liberal party commercials.

Mr. Woolliams: His estimates come up next.

Mr. Fisher: Whose estimates come up next?

An hon. Member: The C.B.C.

Mr. Fisher: I should not have these distractions. There is not a constituency in Canada, except for Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland, which will not be much changed; and I expect that anything we do here will only add to the complication. My hon. friend sitting next to me said he was looking at this density matter, and that some constituencies were more dense than others.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Was he thinking of Port Arthur?

Mr. Fisher: No, he was thinking of Newfoundland. I merely wish to suggest to the minister that by this amendment, which I still intend to vote for, we may be creating a complication which will be remembered in a year or so when the protests against the new boundaries are mounting in this chamber.

Mr. Harkness: I am glad to see this amendment introduced. When I spoke on this bill some months ago in the earlier stage of its consideration I expressed the view that some account should be taken of population growth, that is the growth which had actually taken place since the census on which the redistribution was based.

There is no doubt in my mind that the absence of such a consideration at the time of the last redistribution in 1952 is one of the main reasons we have such an inequitable position at the present time as far as the suburban areas of our cities are concerned. Had any consideration been given to the known growth factor in those years we should not be confronted with the problem of these enormous constituencies such as York-Scarborough. I believe that in many ways this is one of the most important provisions which could be written into the act in order to secure an equitable redistribution, and I am glad to see it impressed upon the minds of the commissioners as one of the factors to which consideration should be given in the determination of what the boundaries shall be.

Mr. Knowles: I have only a brief word to say. I wish mainly to thank the hon. member for York-Scarborough for giving his answer, at any rate, to the question I posed earlier. It seems to me that the Minister of Transport cannot write off these subclauses. My hon. friend from Port Arthur has made the point that the commissioners will in effect, have to justify any departures they may make by referring to the guide lines given to them by parliament. If we are giving them another guide line, namely the rate of population growth, we should surely be as clear as possible about our intentions. I will settle for not putting the detail into the statute, but the commissioners may well ask the question, what did parliament mean by this relative term "rate of growth"?

The hon. member for York-Scarborough answered the question when he said "You compare official sets of figures". I think it is good to have that on the record in Hansard; that this should be done not on the basis of guesswork but on the basis of official sets of figures. On that understanding I am prepared, as is everybody else, I believe, to support the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Macquarrie: There is another matter which arises with reference to clause 13. It has to do with the question of dual ridings of which there are two now in Canada; at one time there were a number of them.

It is noteworthy that down through the years the dual constituencies of Queens and Halifax have been retained. It is obvious that there were reasons, reasons considered good and sufficient, for the retention of these constituencies, whether they were sociological, historical or geographical. In Prince Edward Island at one time the reasoning was mathematical. One of the reasons our province was reluctant or, indeed, unwilling to enter confederation was the opposition put forward to its demand to be represented by six members. Sir John A. Macdonald asked why the province wanted six members. Why not five? The answer was "We must have six because we have three counties, and you cannot divide three into five". So, with exceptions only for very brief intervals, a dual constituency has been retained there.

It is not for me to prejudge whether there should be a dual riding retained in Prince Edward Island or in Halifax. But I am inclined to think that in the one I know best, in such a small province where the population is large but not dense, there will be no great gain from changing the well known boundaries of the constituencies. I do not want to prejudge the issue and I do not think this house should do so, or trammel the commission in its work. Perhaps the commissions, when set up, may decide it is unwise to have dual ridings in Prince Edward Island and Halifax. They could conceivably reach the conclusion that a better pattern of representation would follow from the establishment of a dual riding somewhere else in the country. But this is a matter for the commissions to look into. We expect good work from good commissions, and I believe it would be a mistake for this legislation to train its guns on two of the existing constituencies, to say that two of the constituencies must be altered and that the commissions shall have no choice, no scope at all to consider whether all the good and sufficient reasons which prompted the retention of these ridings still apply.

I would therefore ask—and surely this is not a controversial matter—that we reserve for the commissions the right to decide whether the existing dual ridings be retained or whether in fact the pattern of representation might be improved by establishing others. Perhaps the commissions will end by abolishing them all; perhaps they will not. But I would think it unfortunate if at this stage we were to legislate two existing ridings out of existence, and I wonder if this could not be prevented.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could say a word about this matter. Since the hon. member for Halifax is unable to be in the chamber himself today, he made very strong representations to me along the lines of those the hon. member for Queens has just made to us.

I have been giving a lot of thought to this question and, like one of the questions I had to consider last evening, it is a difficult one. It is like one or two questions I considered last evening. There are arguments on both sides which are very strong, and if hon. members would be patient with me for a few moments

I should like to put them so we can consider both sides of the question.

It is quite true, as hon. members such as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who have been in the house for a long time, will recall, that at almost every redistribution the question of dividing Halifax and dividing Queens comes up, and in the end this is not done. At least the hon. gentleman said it was done long ago, but it has not been done for a long time. There is a certain pattern, and I think that is true in both places. Perhaps I am a little more familiar with the kind of considerations which were put to me so strongly and so recently by the hon. member for Halifax in connection with conventions in Halifax applying not merely in the federal field but in the municipal and provincial fields as well. I think all of us would be very reluctant to disturb considerations of this sort by general legislation unless there is a strong argument on the other side.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think there is a strong argument on the other side. It is much stronger in the case of Halifax than in the case of Queens, but I think it applies in both cases. In the case of Halifax, by itself Halifax county, not taking into account the relative rates of growth, would be almost entitled to three members. So if the law is to be followed there is no possibility anyway of retaining the historic constituency of Halifax; only part of that constituency could remain a dual riding. I certainly do not think we would want any triple ridings; at least I would not have thought it possible in legislation of this kind, which is not dealing with the election law but is dealing with redistribution, to seek to make an amendment of that kind to the election law. I think that would be an altogether bad thing to do.

In the case of Prince Edward Island I have not done the arithmetic—I have no doubt the hon. member has—but I have the impression that Kings county, even with a 25 per cent tolerance, would probably have too small a population to be a constituency. So the historic riding of Queens will not remain the historic riding of Queens if the law is carried out. I have not done the arithmetic, so if the hon. member says I am wrong I will accept that right off, but I think that is the case. Probably Prince county has too large a population for the existing tolerance having regard to what would be the norm for Prince Edward Island.

Since I had been warned about this matter I did have something drafted so that we could look at it, but before we decide whether we should move an amendment perhaps we should consider rather carefully whether, even if we did seek to do this, we would be carrying out what are the hon. gentleman's real intentions.

There is another consideration that is of some importance. I might say that the method suggested by the gentleman is the only method I would support at all. I would not be prepared to say to the commission that there must be dual ridings. All I would be prepared to say is that if they saw fit they could preserve them in these two cases only. That is the most I would vote for, though I am not saying that I would even want to vote for that.

Mr. Fisher: Is the minister going as far as saying that he would put this in the statute? Is that the suggestion?

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, it could not be done unless there were an amendment to this clause. If we leave the clause as it is now amended in this way, it will not be possible for any commission to establish a dual constituency anywhere. The only way this could be done, as the hon. member for Queens has indicated, is by moving an amendment to provide an exception. Well, it could be done in two ways. It could be made a general power of commissions all across Canada, although I would not be in favour of that at all. I do not think we want to introduce these things where they do not exist. I think the only way which could be justified would be by giving the commissions power to perpetuate as far as they legally could these two particular situations.

I am also a little troubled—and I am trying to be very frank and dispassionate—about delegating a legislative power of this kind to the commissions. It is one thing to tell them to draw the boundaries fairly, but I am wondering whether it would be quite right for parliament to tell these commissions that they might in these two cases, one in Prince Edward Island and one in Nova Scotia, if they saw fit, preserve their dual constituencies in the new boundaries which were drawn, one of which would be the heir, so to speak, of the present constituency of Halifax. It could not be the whole of the present constituency; that would be impossible. The same would be done for Queens.

I have sought, Mr. Chairman, to put the arguments on both sides. I appreciate that I am an import to a part of the country where history and traditions are perhaps cherished more than in other parts of the country.

It is a part of the country where one hates to upset old and established customs; at least, the kind of historically minded person that I happen to be hates to do this. I can understand the point of view of the hon. member for Queens very well. I confess to having a certain sympathy for his argument, but such logic as I possess does not seem to run in the same direction as my sympathies. However, I do not think, having said that, that I should say anything more because I am sure there are other hon. members who want to say a word on this matter.

Mr. Macquarrie: If I may just say a word, Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. and learned minister has himself very well demonstrated the importance of having this matter considered by the commission. He has put forward arguments pro and arguments con, and that is all I would ask we arrange for. We certainly could not insist on making it mandatory for the commission that there be dual ridings; but I think in view of the sort of process through which the minister went a few moments ago without, as he admitted, having the figures, that the commission, with its experts and their figures, might look at this situation.

I am not going to burden other members of this committee with the details of the situation in Prince Edward Island, but it is obvious that there will only be four seats there. There are only 107,000 people in that province. I think it would be unfortunate if, before the commission moved into the constituency-drawing process in Prince Edward Island, we said to them—in effect this is what we would be doing—that no matter how logical it may appear to have a dual riding in the area surrounding the capital city, or perhaps some other urban population centre, this was not to be the case. I think it would be an unnecessary and unfortunate restriction upon the commission which will find, as all commissions will find in every province, some demographic problems when it gets to Prince Edward Island, where the population spread is not as mathematically neat as it might be for purposes of constituency drawing. So I say that we would improve the potential work of the commission by giving them the opportunity to study the situation, to peruse their figures and to do in detail what the minister has done himself so well during his discourse to us.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say one or two words in this regard, and make it clear that there are four members of this committee, only two of us here today, who have a special concern in this matter. Because we are the only members of the house who represent dual ridings we are all very much aware of the special considerations and traditions that affect those ridings.

I think our general feeling and concern is that the committee is not being sufficiently careful if it passes the bill as it is, because by so doing it will make it mandatory for the commissions to eliminate dual ridings. I want it understood immediately that I have no thought that the commission should have the privilege of instituting dual ridings where none now exist, nor do I suggest that it should be mandatory that the present dual ridings be continued. I do think it would be reasonable, in light of the fact that these dual constituencies have survived every redistribution in this century, that the arguments pro and con in each case be carefully studied by the commissions in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island.

Personally, from a theoretical point of view I favour single constituencies, but I realize that in these special cases the general advantages of having single constituencies are outweighed by other considerations. Therefore I feel we should introduce an amendment at this time, and I think this is non-controversial, which would allow the commissions to look into the matter carefully. If they find it reasonable they should have the option to come up with single constituencies or, if they find heavy arguments in favour of the other side of the question in these two cases, they should not be categorically precluded from the privilege of continuing dual constituencies in one or both cases.

Mr. Chairman, I should be very pleased if the minister would let us know what amendment he would consider appropriate.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that although the Minister of Transport tried to give the arguments on both sides, his argument was very strong that parliament should not toss this legislative decision to the commissioners. I should also like to add one argument which I do not think he made, unless he did so when I was called away to the telephone. If we give this discretion to a commission, are we going to give it to all the commissions, or just to the two in question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I did make that point very clear as far as my position is concerned. I would not approve of any amendment which extended this in any way whatsoever.

Mr. Knowles: May I then proceed one step further. If this discretion is being given only to the two commissions, we must remember that these commissions operate independently. It is true there is one man who is on all of them, but what happens if one commission, say the commission for Prince Edward Island, decides on a two member seat for Queens but the commission for Nova Scotia decides on a single member seat for Halifax?

Mr. Pickersgill: That situation would present no problem, because they would have an option, as the senior member for Queens just indicated.

Mr. Knowles: The minister suggests this would present no problem, but I think those who are on the opposite side of the decision might think it presented a problem.

Mr. Pickersgill: It would not be a legal problem.

Mr. Knowles: The other point I wished to touch upon is the issue raised by the two members for Queens when they made a point of their desire not to have serious changes in something which has been a fact of history. May I point out to them that the members and people across this country are going to receive the shock of their lives when the boundaries of the constituencies are drawn in light of the rules that we are laying down. I suspect the constituency which is now the constituency of Queens, although it will be divided as a result of this legislation into two parts, will probably be geographically closer to the present constituency of Queens than 90 per cent of ridings.

The hon. member for Port Arthur started to say a moment ago, when the Minister of Transport told him to write it in his column, that hon. members did not realize the enormity of changes which will take place under this legislation. I do not think what will happen to the constituencies of Halifax and Queens, if these areas are divided into single area ridings, will be anything compared to the enormity of change which will take place generally.

Whatever does take place, Mr. Chairman, I think this decision should be made by parliament, and we should not leave legislative decisions of this kind to the commissions.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I am getting into bad company and becoming argumentative. Neither the senior member for Queens nor myself has been arguing that the status quo be preserved, but if it should happen that the commission in any province finds that a certain constituency should remain unchanged, surely the commission should have that right. We are asking that the commissions not be prevented from deciding, suggesting or recommending something which happens to coincide with an existing fact, namely the existence of dual ridings. That is all we are asking, and I am quite confident that the commissions can deal with this matter. Although conservative, I am not an unrelenting champion of the status quo. I am trying to look for the maximum efficiency for a commission as it deals with these problems, which I know is going to be saddled with some difficulty.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, in this connection I think it should be pointed out that in the constituency of Halifax there are established traditions and principles which have been in effect for many, many years, whereby a dual constituency has been maintained. More than the usual geographical problems would be presented if that constituency should be changed now, because there have been very easy relationships and working arrangements established throughout the years. There can be no question whatsoever raised as to representation. If a commission should decide to divide that constituency, and perhaps make some additions, into two watertight compartments, it would have to draw a line through established principles which have been maintained for over half a century. I think the course followed by the cow which Laura Secord drove through the woods at the time of the war of 1812 could be considered a surveyor's line compared to any line drawn by a commission which attempted to do so.

Mr. Chairman, I think there is some merit to the suggestion that we should leave to the commission the right or responsibility of making a decision in those cases where dual constituencies have been established heretofore, Queens and Halifax. The commission should be allowed, if it so determined, to maintain dual constituencies rather than create two single constituencies. Personally I have had experience in another theatre of a dual constituency, and I would not wish that kind of experience on my worst enemy, because it involves a very difficult task. There are many entrenched problems associated with this question, particularly in Halifax, and I should like to see something done whereby the commission would have some latitude in reaching its decision.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I should also like to add a few words by way of support. We are dealing here with exceptional cases, but I think in many instances an exceptional case removes us from the blandness of a purely uniform and mathematical formula. After all, Prince Edward Island already has a constitutional floor, and this proposal is not going to impose any burden on the representation from that province. The numbers are not going to change. I do not think anyone is going to suffer any injustice. I would say that the same applies in Nova Scotia.

To me there is no compelling argument to make the change. There may be pros and cons, but none of them is of sufficient weight to justify a change. Under these circumstances I think we should provide the commissions for these two provinces with the opportunity of choice in this regard. We are not asking for it elsewhere in the country.

I should like to refer to what is perhaps a similar situation. When the city of Edmonton decided to number its streets and avenues it adopted a very monotonous, rectangular, mathematical plan of streets and avenues north and south and east and west and gave them numbers. I say thank goodness that somebody was instrumental in retaining Jasper avenue, running right through the middle of the city.

I would say the same thing in this connection. This exception does not hurt the rule. There is also a strong historical background, and I do not see why we should destroy history in so far as these two provinces are concerned. If the province of Newfoundland had had some historic dual ridings at the time it entered confederation I am sure this would have commended itself to the Minister of Transport, and that he would have found compelling arguments to retain that right to individuality rather than ruling it out absolutely by the stroke of a pen or by the printed word as we are proposing to do today. Therefore I heartily recommend that hon. members should support any amendment put forward on behalf of the members for Queens and Halifax.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, obviously I do not want to prolong this debate, but may I say I do not feel I could propose such an amendment. On the other hand, I have one drafted here that is slightly different from the one shown me by the hon. member for Queens, who was good enough to send me the one about which he was thinking. I would think that the one I have here would be preferable if this is going to be done, because the only real difference between the two is that in the one case it just says that the commission "may" and in the other case it says "may if it sees fit to do so".

[Mr. Nowlan.]

In view of the queer interpretations sometimes placed on the word "may", if that additional phrase was not included I think there might be a suggestion that parliament's inclination was to have it done. My own inclination is not to have it done. I say that quite frankly. I really feel about this matter, and it is going to be very difficult for me to vote. I have been thinking I might do something that I thought only members of the N.D.P. did, sit on my hands, if there is a vote.

I have not made up my mind yet, but I certainly do not want to influence the judgment of any other member of the committee. Particularly because of the objection reiterated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I do not feel it is fair to impose upon the commission the making of another decision which in my bones I feel we ought to make ourselves if it is to be made at all. I think it would be very hard for me to vote for this. On the other hand I am rather impressed by the argument put forward. I want to reiterate, however, that these historic constituencies will not survive anyway. Halifax county is far too big to be one constituency, so we will not be preserving the historical situation there and probably not in Queens either. However, if the hon. gentleman wishes to do so I think the simplest way would be for him to move his amendment in order to test the committee on it and get the agony over with.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Chairman, I think this is certainly fair enough. In my opinion the minister's suggestion as to an amendment is an improvement on the one I had in mind. For the information of members of the committee who are not familiar with the maritimes I might say that this is not an anomaly in the maritime setting. In the legislatures of the maritime provinces, unlike other provinces, virtually all the constituencies are multiple constituencies. In New Brunswick some of them have as many as four or five members. In Prince Edward Island they are all dual constituencies, and in Nova Scotia there is a similar situation. I do not know whether it is necessary for me to read this amendment.

Mr. Knowles: Move it. We would like to hear it.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am buying this in a poke because I have not read it yet. I think I will read my own amendment and in doing so can add to it what the minister has suggested. I move:

That clause 13 be amended by deleting the word "and" in line 31 and inserting a new subsection (b) as follows:

"(b) where, immediately before the coming into force of this act, any electoral district in a province was represented by two members of the House of Commons, the commission may, if it sees fit to do so, recommend the continuation of such representation, in which case the division of that province into electoral districts and the description of the boundaries thereof in accordance with rule (a) shall proceed subject to such adjustments as are necessary in order to give effect to the continuation of such representation;"

and that the present subsection (b) be designated subsection (c) and that in line 46 thereof there be inserted after the word "case" "except as may be necessary in order to give effect to rule (b)."

Mr. Pickersgill: Since the other one has been vetted by the law officers of the crown I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would mind having it formally moved so that we will not get into any possible legal troubles.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I believe it is the same wording. I have not read it, but I would move it as the official amendment.

The Chairman: Mr. MacLean (Queens) moves:

That clause 13 of Bill C-72 be amended

(a) by striking out lines 30 to 33 on page 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"(b) representation commissioner under section 12; where, immediately before the day this act was assented to, provision was made for any electoral district in the province to be represented by two members of the House of Commons, the commission may, if it sees fit to do so, recommend the continuation of such representation, in which case the division of the province into electoral districts and the description of the boundaries thereof in accordance with rule (a) shall proceed subject to such adjustments as are necessary in order to give effect to the continuation of such representation;

(c) the commission may depart from the strict application of rules (2) and (b) in any case where"

(b) by striking out lines 46 and 47 on page 4 thereof and substituting therefor the following:

"but in no case, except as may be necessary in order to give effect to rule (b), shall the population of any electoral district in the province as a result thereof"

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I recall an earlier observation of the minister that perhaps those who come from the eastern part of the country may have a greater appreciation of historic traditions and customs than others. As someone who was born, brought up and has lived all his life in western Canada, may I say that at least some of us have some appreciation of the historic traditions and customs not only of our own areas but of other parts of the country.

However, Mr. Chairman, the point on which I wish to rise in speaking against the proposed amendment is that while I may have a good deal of sympathy with the point of view of members who have suggested this amendment out of respect for their own local customs and traditions, nevertheless I think it should be obvious that in spite of that sympathy we in this house have to recognize that this amendment, if it passes, is not going to be confined in its implications and results to Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia.

Mr. Nowlan: Yes, it is.

Mr. Barnett: Hon. members are trying to tell me I am wrong, but perhaps they should listen to my conclusion. I think we recognize that each provincial commission is going to be autonomous in respect of its operations within a province under the provisions of the legislation. Nevertheless, I think we recognize also that there is provision in the proposed legislation for objections to be raised in this house.

The point I should like to make is that accepting an amendment such as is proposed may very well develop arguments as to why certain customs and traditions with regard to county boundaries and other historic considerations in respect of constituencies in other parts of the country should be retained by commissions in the respective provinces. It strikes me, therefore, that this is not purely a local issue with regard to Halifax or Queens, but one to which consideration should be given because of its general effect across the country.

It is with that sort of consideration in mind and, as I say, with some sympathy for the point of view that has been advanced for the respective traditions, that I feel it would be most unwise for us to adopt this amendment. It would serve to put not only the commissions in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island on more of a hot seat, but indirectly the commissions in other provinces across the country.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question on the amendment?

Amendment agreed to: Yeas, 24; Nays, 17.

Clause agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the many amendments that have been made, I think we should not have third reading until we see a reprint of the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I very much regret that hon. members do not see fit to give it third reading now. I would have liked to get this thing completed today, but of course the rules are against me.

Mr. Lambert: If the minister will just cast his mind back a few years to the time when he was on this side he will recall that he took the same position with regard to bills of this importance and complexity in which many changes had been made, notwithstanding the pleas of the government. This is not with the idea of getting back at anybody. I think a bill of this nature, with this number of amendments, should be reprinted before it is given third reading. We give an undertaking that we will see it Monday afternoon.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not like it to be thought I was complaining, but one can always hope.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. Members: Next sitting.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

The Chairman: It being one o'clock I do leave the chair.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Office of the chief electoral officer—

1. Salaries and expenses of office, $106,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Chairman, as hon. members know, the position of chief electoral officer is being filled on an acting basis by Mr. Castonguay, who is also representation commissioner. In fact I think the latter is his principal job because it is for it he gets paid. Up until this point it would seem to present no difficulty in having Mr. Castonguay fill both these positions, but now that the redistribution bill may soon be passed Mr. Castonguay will have to devote a great deal of time to his work as a member of ten provincial commissions. That being the case, would it not seem desirable to make an early move toward filling the position of chief electoral officer?

I am not fishing for a prediction as to the date of the next election. The Secretary of State is probably no smarter than the rest of us on that point.

Mr. Lamontagne: We would not want to move on this until the redistribution bill has been finally approved, but the hon. member may be quite sure that we will try to find a suitable replacement as soon as possible.

Mr. Knowles: Does "as soon as possible" mean within the next few weeks so that Mr. Castonguay may devote his full time to the representation job and not have to worry about the possibility of having to conduct another election?

Mr. Lamontagne: Provided we can find a suitable candidate for the job, it will be within the next few weeks.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand that on Mr. Castonguay's appointment as representation commissioner he will not have authority as chief electoral officer? If that is the case, then I want to register my opposition because I believe he and his father before him have done wonderful work as chief electoral officers.

I should like to speak briefly about Mr. Castonguay himself. One may not always agree with his decisions, but based on my years of experience campaigning for federal office I doubt if in the history of Canada there has ever been anyone like Mr. Castonguay, with such a knowledge of the Canada Elections Act and with such decisiveness in reaching conclusions when required during the heat of an election.

Though I can appreciate the reasons he is to have such important responsibility in the matter of redistribution, personally I would very much dislike it if some person is named as chief electoral officer without Mr. Castonguay having overriding responsibility. Does passage of the redistribution bill mean that we will lose the services of Mr. Castonguay as chief electoral officer? I repeat that I would hate to see the day come when he will not have some responsibility in the electoral and campaign system of this country.

Mr. Lamontagne: I am sure we all share the views expressed about Mr. Castonguay by the hon. member but, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, his important new responsibilities as representation commissioner will require a lot of his time if we are to implement the new redistribution system during the next few years. Mr. Castonguay will continue with his present responsibility as chief electoral officer until we are in a position to make a new appointment. However, I am afraid it will be impossible for him to carry on the two jobs indefinitely.

Mr. Winch: After the redistribution is complete, will Mr. Castonguay carry on in the office of commissioner or will he return to carry out the duties of chief electoral officer?

Mr. Lamontagne: I understand that when a new chief electoral officer is appointed he will be responsible to the representation commissioner, so we may not lose the services and the experience of Mr. Castonguay completely.

Mr. Winch: Do I understand that whoever is given the new appointment will be responsible to Mr. Castonguay and that final authority will still rest with him?

Mr. Lamontagne: I believe that if the hon. member would refer to the act he would find this to be the case.

Mr. Nesbitt: I gather that the concern in the mind of the Secretary of State and, indeed, in the mind of the government is that if Mr. Castonguay is made representation commissioner he could not obviously carry out his duties in the event of an election taking place at the same time. However, if a federal election were to come before Mr. Castonguay had completed his work as commissioner there would obviously be no great hurry for him to complete the task of redistribution. What would be the objection to his having leave of absence, as it were, so as to take charge of the election arrangements? Afterwards he could return to complete his other job.

Mr. Lamontagne: I understand that the act requires each commission to end its work within a year. Moreover, once we have made the appointment of chief electoral officer it would not be easy to ask the new man to vacate his responsibilities.

Mr. Nesbitt: The Secretary of State is correct in accordance with the present terms of the legislation but there are a great many of us in this house—in fact, I think, most of us in all parts of the house—who would hate to lose the services of Mr. Castonguay as chief electoral officer. It is true that in his other appointment he may have a supervisory capacity but many of us are disturbed about the thought of losing his services in this regard, and I am wondering whether the Secretary of State could not consult with his colleagues and insert some amendment into the redistribution bill which might allow Mr. Castonguay to take temporary leave of absence to carry out the duties of chief electoral officer before returning to his duties as representation commissioner, if a general election were to come after the appointment had been made.

Mr. Lamontagne: Should an election come before the new appointment is made then, of course, Mr. Castonguay would be in charge of that election. However, we certainly cannot delay this appointment indefinitely; and I might add that no date for the new election has yet been announced.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the whole difficulty could be obviated if the Secretary of State were to consult his colleagues over the week end. Possibly some minor amendment could be made in the redistribution bill which would allow Mr. Castonguay to leave the one office for a temporary period so as to act as chief electoral officer should an election take place. In that event it would not make much difference if redistribution were completed within one year or say, 15 months after the election had been called.

Mr. Lamontagne: I will be happy to discuss this with my colleagues during the week end.

Mr. Macquarrie: There is one small matter. I will not ask the minister to tell us the date of the next election, but the senior standing committee of the house, the committee on privileges and elections, did a great deal of work on the Canada Elections Act last session and I wonder if it would be correct to assume that since the chief electoral officer has sent supplies out to the constituencies it is the thinking of the government that no further consideration shall be given to the elections act, and the careful scrutiny the committee gave it. Important suggestions were made as to the lowering of the voting age, and so on. I have been trying to elicit some information on this subject from the leader of the house. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could bring us up to date as to the government's thinking in this regard.

Mr. Lamontagne: The decision taken by the chief electoral officer recently was an ordinary administrative decision taken by him without any kind of instructions from the government. It was, I understand, a routine exercise.

Mr. Knowles: I was just about to say there was one question the answer to which might solve the problem we were discussing a moment ago. In view of the high regard we have for the work done for us by Mr. Nelson Castonguay and in view of the equally high regard we have for the work done for us previously by his father, Mr. Jules Castonguay, the question is: Are there any more Castonguays?

Mr. Leboe: I am interested in the question raised by the hon. member for Queens—what will happen to the work of the committee on privileges and elections? Will the work of the committee be finished, or will it be left in abeyance.

Mr. Lamontagne: We hope that the work of this committee can go on, perhaps before the end of this session, but certainly at the beginning of the next session, so as to enable the government to introduce changes and revisions in the act in 1965.

Mr. Knowles: When will the next session start?

Mr. Barnett: It seems to me that the hon. member for Oxford and the hon. member for Queens have put their questions to the Secretary of State the wrong way round. I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he will confer with his colleagues and bring us an assurance that the work of the redistribution commissioner and of the commissions will be completed before we shall require the active services of a chief electoral officer.

Mr. Lamontagne: I am afraid I cannot answer that question.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission—

1. Salaries and contingencies of the commission including compensation in accordance with the suggestion award plan of the public service of Canada $5,516,500.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the passage of these estimates, but I wish to take this opportunity to make a few remarks concerning the civil service commission.

Could the minister tell us whether he intends to have the civil service act amended during the course of this session or the next one to provide a bonus for any civil servant who is bilingual, in other words for those who speak French and English.

In my opinion, that would be a positive step since it would contribute to the spread of bilingualism within the federal civil service.

There are many disadvantages to the fact that a good many senior officials, in various services, are unilingual but that situation goes way back in the past.

I know it will be a tremendous job for the minister to remedy that situation.

When, for instance, a farmer from the province of Quebec wishes to approach the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) or a departmental section chief who is unilingual, it is very difficult for him to obtain the information needed. That may be one of the reasons why agriculture in Quebec, more particularly, is in a state of inferiority; means of communication are lacking between the federal Department of Agriculture and the French speaking farmers in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that if the government granted a bonus to bilingual persons, at all levels of the federal administration in Ottawa the situation would improve. It is not a question of rushing things, of changing the policy overnight, but rather of implementing it gradually for those who are already bilingual and for those who are applying for civil service positions.

I also feel it to be important that all deputy ministers of the federal administration, in every department, should know both languages, in order to make their own contribution towards the improvement of the situation within the various departments.

May I point out that in many countries across the world, in foreign affairs, applicants are not only required to know the language of the country, but also to have some knowledge of French and English.

For instance, Mr. Chairman, in the United Kingdom applicants for a job in foreign affairs are required to learn another language, either French, German, Spanish, Italian or Russian.

The same situation applies to France, and also to Belgium, which is a bilingual country and where not only the knowledge of French and of another language is required, but also of English and Dutch. The Federal Republic of Germany also requires sufficient knowledge of English and French, apart from the official language of the country. The same situation exists in Holland and Austria.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of External Affairs reflects the cultural character of a country, and it would be important, particularly in that department in Canada, that candidates be bilingual so they can assert, on a world-wide level, the bilingual and bi-racial character of our country.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the minister has endeavoured to create a school where French will be taught. I think that school is located in the province of Quebec.

But I am wondering if the fact that that school is run with public funds is fair and reasonable since the Canadian government, supposedly to help our English speaking compatriots, puts at their disposal professors paid by the government to teach French to civil servants also paid by the government during their working hours.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, French Canadians had to spend their own money for the courses they had to take to learn English.

That fact may not be of prime importance but it is worth mentioning.

I wish to point out that there are at the present time in all the departments of the federal government deficiencies in the French section of the information services. I think there should be some way of improving the situation.

I have another suggestion: That the translators and interpreters, who are bilingual and carry out important and indispensable work for the government be given a higher salary than they are receiving now.

I also ask the minister whether there is no means of increasing the number of translators, so that all the house committee reports might be published simultaneously in their English and French versions, and all other government publications be issued at the same time in both languages, under a single cover. In this way, there would be no exceptions, and the minister would be sure that French and English publications were issued simultaneously in every department, as they would be under one and the same cover.

Mr. Chairman, those were the few remarks I wanted to make in the interest of national unity.

I feel that this constructive action would make it possible to stem the separatist wave which is now on the upsurge in some parts of the country.

A last remark. Does the government still intend to allow civil servants to incorporate as a union, like the other workers of the country, in order to negotiate a labour agreement?

I know that several members of this house would be happy if there were such legislation.

I would be glad to know what the minister intends to do so far as bilingualism is concerned in the federal civil service.

[Text]

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, there are a few observations I would like to make to the Secretary of State on the question of the civil service commission. The minister is in a rather unique cabinet position inasmuch as he transmits messages to, or replies in this house on behalf of, two creatures, or perhaps I should say creations, of parliament, one being the civil service commission and the other the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. On the latter creation of parliament I shall have some observations to make later on, but on the civil service commission I have a few to make at the present time.

Mr. Fisher: Among a dozen others.

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes; as the hon. member for Port Arthur says, among about a dozen others.

When the civil service was created it was my understanding that the intention—and it is a very commendable one—was to get rid of what had become a black mark on the face of Canada, namely political patronage in the civil service. In former days I am told that every time the government changed while everyone in the government service was not removed most of the important jobs changed hands. The result, of course, was that it eventually became impossible to get people of any competence to do these jobs, and no one for one moment wants to see a return to that state of affairs.

On the other hand, I think in its efforts to make the civil service commission completely independent of political patronage—and as I say I think the theory behind this is very commendable—the civil service commission itself has bent over backwards almost to the point of breaking in half in order to try to show that it is not influenced by any kind of political patronage. Those of us here who have sat on both sides of the house know that this is true; as far as political influence is concerned I have heard of very little political patronage in the civil service commission in connection with making appointments.

However, with the good which may go with this sort of arrangement there is also the bad. In order to keep political interference out of the civil service commission, the commission itself has as a result now become responsible to nobody. I know that in theory the civil service commission is responsible to parliament as a whole, but that is a rather nebulous status. In fact, the civil service commission like the C.B.C. has become a law unto itself, does what it likes and is probably the greatest example there is in Canada of the so-called establishment. Any time anybody makes recommendations in connection with the C.B.C. he is either brushed aside, as though no one is supposed to know anything about it except those who sit on the civil service commission, or else it is suggested that the proposals are some kind of political interference, no matter what they may be.

I think in most cases—and I want to make this perfectly clear before I continue further; the theory and principle behind the civil service commission is excellent—the commission generally speaking does a very good job and has done a very good job over the years; but like any other organization composed of human beings problems arise, errors are made and improvements are required. It is in this latter regard that I have a few suggestions I should like to make.

Regardless of where members of parliament sit in this house, they do from time to time receive letters from constituents who are applying for jobs and are asking for recommendations. A new member to this house very naïvely, and almost invariably writes a letter of recommendation and forwards it to the civil service commission. Members always receive very polite acknowledgments and an undertaking that the commission will keep the member informed as to what takes place. I must say at this time that the commission always keeps its word in this regard. It has been my experience, as I am sure it has been the experience of a good many members of parliament, that the longer one is here the more wary he becomes about writing letters of recommendation as to character and background on behalf of those individuals who make such a request, because it is my impression, and it may be an inaccurate one, that a letter from a member of parliament to the civil service commission in recommendation of an applicant is tantamount to the kiss of death. I have yet to hear of many individuals being successful in applications for a civil service job who have had the dubious advantage of letters of recommendation from members of parliament. Most of us in this house feel we are second class citizens as far as making recommendations are concerned, even for the most trivial positions. Perhaps we are developing an inferiority complex in this regard. That certainly is the feeling one gets, and it becomes stronger the longer one is here.

Mr. Chairman, in the event the civil service commission officials are not aware of this fact, it is time they were told in plain language that regardless of where members sit in this house they have the feeling that their recommendations are unheeded. I have heard individuals state in private that if the civil service officials accept the recommendations of members of parliament they are allowing political patronage to creep into the system. While I realize that may be true, and that is something we do not want, I should like to make it quite clear that there is a more practical approach to this problem. In respect of positions which are of a strictly local nature, and perhaps I can use the position of postmaster in a rural or semi-rural community as an example, quite apart from certain qualifications required, there are other important characteristics, such as the ability to get along with the people of the community, record of honesty and the like, which can be assessed by the local member of parliament as well as or better than anyone else. Surely a member of parliament is qualified to know about these things, or in a position to find out about them. If a member of parliament makes a bad recommendation the electorate can rectify that error at the following election.

What actually happens in fact is that an individual from the establishment makes a trip to the village or the community and very often consults with people who are not in a position to know whether an applicant is qualified, and then sends in a report which as often as not is quite out of touch with the general feeling of the village or community in question. I think the civil service commission could perhaps make greater use of recommendations from members of the House of Commons in this regard, particularly when considering background, integrity and general ability of applicants.

An individual who is elected to this House of Commons surely has some status of responsibility in the community which he or she represents here, and in light of that fact I cannot understand the consistent attitude taken by the officials of the civil service commission at this time of ignoring recommendations of members of parliament, regardless of the party to which they belong.

Perhaps one of the most serious things we must face in respect of the civil service is the fashion or mode now in vogue in Canada, that an applicant for a job in order to succeed must have a great number of paper qualifications. I hesitate to cite specific examples, as this does not prove anything, but the one I have in mind is a case in point. This is not related to the federal civil service commission. I noticed in a Kingston newspaper several weeks ago an advertisement for a garbageman. One of the required qualifications was grade 13 education.

An hon. Member: For a garbageman?

Mr. Nesbitt: Yes, one of the required qualifications for a garbageman, according to this advertisement, was a grade 13 education. In my opinion that is going just a little bit too far. I suppose a prospective garbageman must have some appreciation of logarithms to count the orange peels in each bundle of garbage. That is the kind of thing that makes legitimately required qualifications appear rather ridiculous in certain instances.

I have certain notices of competitions for various positions in the civil service. I do not think I need to go into too many examples, because most hon. members are familiar with the type of thing I have in mind, but almost all of them contain long lists of required paper qualifications, and these qualifications are rigidly applied. I should like to know what are the qualifications of the individuals who draw up these qualifications. Several years ago representatives of the civil service commission appeared before a parliamentary committee at which time we had difficulty obtaining much information in this regard. In reply to this type of question these representatives said that the people who draw up these qualifications were experts of one kind or another. I should like to know who draws up these qualifications and who determines what qualifications are required for specific jobs. I know the answer we will receive in a moment or two is that these people are highly qualified, holding degrees A, B, C, and D from technical schools X, Y and Z. I think the rigidity of the application of these qualifications should be considered very carefully.

There is a problem in existence today as a result of automation, which makes it very difficult for anyone over the age of 35 years who has not had the advantage of a formal or technical education to get a job. This is perhaps due to the fact that individuals in this age group for various reasons were not in the position to obtain the kind of general education now afforded today's students. There should be a little more elasticity to the application of these regulations, as to qualifications for positions. Surely there is nothing wrong with allowing a certain degree of discretion to the officials of the civil service commission. We all have a high degree of respect for the ability of the officials of the civil service commission and our complaints are not directed toward them individually but toward the establishment or scheme of things which has been developed over the years.

Examples do not prove principles, but they do show the kind of thing about which I am complaining. Competition No. 64T1075 for an auditor for the unemployment insurance commission at the London, Ontario branch sets out the duties and qualifications, the number of years experience in accounting or auditing, as well as a requirement in respect of the principles of accounting, including the double entry system, and also suggests that integrity and personal suitability are required. The competition notice then sets forth certain basic educational requirements, grade 11, I believe. I do not wish to mention anyone's name because I do not think that is fair, but an applicant for this job had all the necessary qualifications with the exception of a junior matriculation certificate. He had 11 years experience with one of our principal banks in this country as an accountant. He had also carried on a successful merchandising operation for a number of years, but because of ill health had to give up that business. He is a very well thought of individual in the community. Unfortunately several years ago he was unable to obtain a junior matriculation certificate, as a result of which he was unsuccessful in his application for this position.

Mr. Chairman, that is the type of thing many of us complain about, but there is little benefit to be gained by complaining without offering some constructive suggestions to correct the situation. In a number of these jobs the application could state, in respect of educational qualifications, that such and such a level was required, or the equivalent thereof, and the qualifications of an applicant could then be left to the discretion of the officials of the civil service commission. A great many very excellent people are lost to the civil service because of some really minor technical requirement. I can remember very well what happened some years ago during world war II when officers were being selected for the navy. At one time I had some connection with that operation and I remember person after person being turned down because of colour blindness. The reason given was that they allegedly could not distinguish between rocket flare signals at night. From a practical point of view it made no difference at all, but dozens of good people who would have been excellent in every other way were turned down because of this requirement. Eventually the navy got away from the requirement when they found it did not really matter.

This is the kind of thing one has to watch and I would hope there would be a little more elasticity in the qualifications and a little more discretion left to the members of the commission so that a good many people who are qualified in many ways will not be turned down because of some minor technical requirement. I think this is something that could improve the situation for many people. I wish that the members of the commission and the Secretary of State would bear in mind that one of the biggest problems any member of the house has is in trying to find employment for so many people who are over the age of 40. They lack the technical training to get jobs in industries now, and have to try to get other positions which often they are really very well qualified to fill except for some very technical requirement.

There is one other matter about which I should like to ask the Secretary of State and which he perhaps can deal with after he discusses it with the members of the commission. I refer to the question of bilingualism in the civil service. I know this is a very touchy and sensitive subject these days but I think it would be less touchy and less sensitive if the policy in this regard was made absolutely clear by the Secretary of State. There is a great deal of suspicion and concern on the part of many people because the policy does not seem to be clear.

I think all of us will agree that for many civil service positions it is absolutely essential that the applicants be completely bilingual. With regard to people who work in Ottawa, certainly those who work in the province of Quebec, and also in parts of Ontario and other parts of Canada such as New Brunswick, there are many jobs which require these people in their daily contacts with the public and in correspondence to be completely bilingual. I do not think anybody would quarrel with that.

However, I have had a number of civil servants approach me in this regard. They wish to remain anonymous and I can understand their point of view in that respect. They have expressed concern to me, in that with regard to many competitions, which seemed to involve branches of the civil service that really did not require people to be bilingual at all, it was provided that only bilingual applicants would be considered. There is great concern in many parts of Canada where the French language is not spoken that the only people who will be allowed to apply for these positions are people who speak French as well as English. From a practical point of view this gives a very decided advantage to people who come from the province of Quebec and parts of Ontario adjoining Quebec—

Mr. Grégoire: Why do they not become bilingual?

Mr. Nesbitt: I hear an interesting question from the hon. member for Lapointe and I am going to reply in a minute—as well as people who live in New Brunswick. The hon. member for Lapointe has asked an obvious question. Why do people not become completely bilingual? If the hon. member for Lapointe lived in Vancouver, Calgary or London, Ontario, he might find it rather difficult to find people there who speak French very fluently. It is just a matter of practice. I can tell the member for Lapointe that I have studied French for nine or ten years and I can read and write the language almost as well as English, but because of lack of practice in speaking the language in my own part of the country, and this applies to a good many members, it is not easy to become fluent in speaking the language unless you have the opportunity to speak it daily.

Mr. Grégoire: There is no more opportunity in my area to speak English.

Mr. Nesbitt: I think the hon. member for Lapointe realizes that his arguments are not all that logical. Taking the total population of both Canada and the United States, English is the predominant language in commercial relations, and because of necessity, I realize, many people in Quebec have a greater opportunity to learn English than people in parts of Canada not adjacent to Quebec have to learn French. I do not think there is any argument about that. It is a fact of life. Maybe it should not be that way but it is a fact of life that exists whether one likes it or not.

There is a great deal of worry among many people that persons from parts of Canada not adjacent to Quebec may not have the opportunity to join the civil service in the future. If the policy in this regard were laid down clearly I think there would be a lot less worry and concern. There is not only concern on the part of those who fear they may not have the opportunity to get into the civil service but also on the part of those who are already in the service and fear they cannot get promotions.

I say again we must find some practical way of approaching this problem. It is quite clear that for many positions in the civil service people must be bilingual. I think we all agree with that. On the other hand, there are clearly some positions where it should not be necessary at all and between the two extremes, of course, there are other positions where it is a little harder to define whether or not it is necessary. Again I say it is a fact of life, whether one likes it or not, that if one lives in a part of Canada where it is not easy to find the opportunity to speak French it becomes very difficult for one to do so. If the Secretary of State would lay down some policy in this regard on behalf of the civil service commission I think there would be a lot less worry and concern because people would then know what was going to happen.

In concluding this subject may I say it is quite clear that in the part of the country from which I come it would not be necessary for persons working in the national employment office for example, to speak French because I do not believe there are half a dozen people in the whole area with a reasonably fluent approach to the language. On the other hand, it is quite clear that people must speak French fluently in many parts of Ontario, particularly in the Ottawa area. I should like to hear a definite statement of policy in this regard because the matter is causing concern among those already in the civil service and also among those who will perhaps be applying for positions at some time in the future.

I think that covers most of the questions and remarks I have in mind and we would like to hear some replies from the Secretary of State as to these matters.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, I too should like to say a few words at this point with regard to the matters raised by the hon. member who has just spoken, and his predecessor, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I am concerned about the application of bilingualism in the public service, recognizing that this is one of the declared objectives of the government toward which we are all trying to work as consistently, fairly and equitably as possible.

When we look at the stock of bilingual persons in Canada we see according to the 1961 census that one out of every eight persons declared himself or herself to be bilingual in the two official languages, English and French. Sixty per cent of the persons who so declared themselves resided in one province, the province of Quebec. Four out of five of the persons who claimed to be bilingual can be found in the few contact areas of English and French culture, the Ottawa valley, metropolitan Montreal and northern New Brunswick.

The recruitment of an adequate stock of bilingual persons in the public service does raise serious problems of regional discrimination in the selection process. We must recognize that this is merely the measurement of the challenge because many parts of Canada have simply not faced the problem of teaching the second language adequately. This is a provincial responsibility in the first instance. A great deal could be done at the provincial level if the provincial departments of education would undertake measures to encourage competent teachers in the second official language to come from the parts of Canada where they can be recruited and to teach within the school systems of those provinces where such persons are lacking in supply.

I think for example, of the provinces of western Canada and the province of Ontario. They could make a very great contribution to national unity by encouraging people to join the elementary school systems of those provinces who have lived and have been trained in the province of Quebec. Such persons whose native tongue is French or who were perhaps unilingual people in the first instance, could go into other parts of Canada and make a contribution toward a better quality of French, a better understanding of French in the elementary schools. The problem has to be met in the school system and has to be persistently followed up through such instruments as the C.B.C., the film board, the television programs and so on which are available to us.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I do feel there is one area in which the civil service commission is to be criticized at the present time, and very sharply criticized. I refer to the determination of proficiency in two languages amongst bilingual applicants. The procedures for the measurement of language proficiency are not consistent, they are not objective. They lead to results which cannot be equivalent from one instance to another. In my opinion there is only one obvious remedy, and I would be anxious to hear the opinion of the minister on this matter. The remedy lies in the application by the civil service commission of methods of testing language proficiency in English and in French, orally and written. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the civil service commission has got to break new ground and establish for applicants for jobs that are rated as bilingual, the degree of proficiency in the two languages.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm when he claimed that a bilingual bonus should be applied to those who speak the two languages. I could not agree more, provided they really know the two languages. I once asked the hon. member in an earlier debate if he considered himself to be bilingual and he said he did. I am going to say to that hon. member that I do not think his English is any better than my French and I do not believe they could rate either of us as being completely bilingual, much as we would like to be. This illustrates again the problem the civil service commission faces. A mere acquaintanceship with the two languages is not good enough in relation to the jobs that have to be performed, and the civil service commission has not faced the problem with the objective of determining a measurement of language accomplishment.

I would be very interested, Mr. Chairman, in hearing the views of the minister as to how the civil service commission attempts to make a policy rule in terms of recruitment of bilingual candidates. When it advertises for bilingual candidates, how does it test the bilingual proficiency, what methods does it propose to undertake to make sure the applicants who are recruited for bilingual jobs are in fact bilingual according to the requirements of the position?

Mr. Nielsen: I just want to add one or two comments before the minister replies. My concern arises with bilingualism in the civil service but from an entirely different angle. In a recent civil service competition poster advertising for the position of northern service officer, there was included a statement in the qualifications subheading that applicants would be more favourably considered if they had a knowledge of both English and French languages. It seems to me that a knowledge of French among the Eskimos of Coppermine or a knowledge of English amongst the Indians at Old Crow, is just about as useless as horns on a boar. Rather than requiring that the applicant for a position in the department of northern affairs for service amongst the Indians and Eskimos be bilingual, perhaps additional credits might be given if the applicant were of Indian or Eskimo origin, or perhaps if an applicant of English or French origin had a knowledge of the Indian dialect or the Eskimo dialect in the area concerned.

It seems to me that a poster that holds forth additional credits for people who speak the French language in order to obtain preference in a job for northern service is rather ridiculous. Rather than adopting this course, the commission and the department should be adopting the course of attempting to recruit from amongst the native peoples themselves in order to fill these positions, whether or not these people speak the two languages. There is a lot of excellent material there.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: Just a few words, Mr. Chairman, to mention that when I talked about granting a bonus to bilingual employees, I was referring to those working in the federal service in Ottawa where all the requests from English and French are converging.

We must not go from one extreme to the other. I know that some colleagues from other parties in the house share my opinion that a bonus should be paid to a civil servant filling an important position or working in a department in Ottawa. That he should be given a bonus because he is bilingual, this is quite normal, but if some people are opposed to this, if English speaking citizens think that it is illogical. I wonder whether they find it more logical to demand that French Canadians working in Ottawa should speak English.

When a person who has the required qualifications is employed in the civil service, we cannot expect an English speaking Canadian to speak a second language, but on the other hand, we should not require that a French Canadian who wishes to obtain a position in Ottawa be able to speak English. Let us be fair. If we wish understanding and unity to prevail in this country, what is sauce for the goose should be sauce for the gander.

We should not require that a French Canadian civil servant speak English, nor that an English Canadian speak French.

Why should we compel most of the French Canadians who work in Ottawa to speak English, while we do not ask the English speaking candidates who wish to obtain a civil service position in Ottawa to speak French?

The blame should not be attached to either government in particular, because the same situation existed under all governments, but I wonder why French Canadians should be placed in a special category.

Why require that they be bilingual when both languages are official in this country? If both languages are official, let us be fair towards all Canadians, whether they be English or French speaking.

I hope that the minister will remain favourably disposed without ever becoming an extremist. We do not expect an English speaking Canadian stationed in the Yukon to know French. We only wish that a premium be granted to a bilingual civil servant who works in the central administration at Ottawa.

French Canadians or English Canadians should not be forced to speak a second language because the future of Canada will suffer from it. As a matter of fact, if there is now, unfortunately, a wave of extremism in some areas of Canada, a situation which I deplore very much, it is precisely because there might be a lack of understanding and a lack of justice on the part of some Canadians.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, just a few words to answer some questions asked by hon. members.

First I want to point out to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) that I made a preliminary report to the committee last week about bilingualism within the civil service, and I am convinced the hon. member will benefit from reading the statement I made then.

Indeed, the progress made in that field during the past year is only a start and I am sure that during consideration of my estimates next year, I will be in a position to report that other important measures have been taken in that respect.

I should like to point out to the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Francis) that the question he mentioned, that of examinations to determine the degree of bilingualism, does constitute an important and complicated problem.

I am convinced that the school of languages which has now been set up in Hull will provide us with new data and, possibly, with a new method of determining the various degrees of bilingualism. I am equally confident that the civil service commission will benefit from the progress made in that field and that it will be able to improve its present examinations for civil servants.

[Text]

The hon. member for Oxford listed a series of grievances with respect to the civil service commission and I am sure the commission will give serious consideration to what he said. As I stated last Thursday evening, the whole system of classification is now under review, and I am further informed that the commission is setting up a new division to re-examine this situation, especially with regard to collective bargaining which is on its way.

Dealing with older employees I would like to point out that 25 per cent of the appointees in 1963 were over 40 years of age. Perhaps there may be some improvement necessary but at this stage I think that is quite an achievement. I would hope private industry could show a similar record.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, in respect to the civil service commission, the whole Canadian civil service is concerned. In my opinion, there has been an improvement in the last two years in the field of bilingualism. I think that this commission shows a lot of good will.

There is no question, as a few members said a while ago, to try and ask all civil service employees to be perfectly bilingual. I think that one cannot ask those who carry the mail in Toronto or Vancouver to speak both languages. It is the same for letter carriers in Jonquière or Quebec city; I do not feel that it is essential for them to speak English.

Today problems are facing the civil servant, whether it be in the unemployment insurance commission, the income tax branch, the administration of old age pensions or of the family allowances act, or in any other department. There is the problem of the individual with whom he is dealing and the problem of the act he has before him, an act amended on several occasions in recent years. Then we see a civil servant who is perhaps individually a very intelligent and a very competent man, but because he is faced with many regulations and acts, as well as with numerous persons who come to see him to try and solve their problems, he rather tends to follow strictly the letter of the law—it is a way of thinking which has established itself in the civil service —when in view of the complications of the law and of cases submitted the civil service commission should try and make innovations, instead of considering every government employee as a mere machine in the face of regulations, but as individuals using their judgment, besides enforcing the law, using their imagination and initiative, not only in order to follow the law, but to go beyond and above it, which might be called reasoning according to each individual case placed before them.

I shall give an example to illustrate what I mean: an employee with the unemployment insurance commission enforced the law strictly in a certain case, for which he cannot be blamed. Still, the result was no less than disastrous. A single man was working. Unemployed, he declared that he was supporting a family, but as he did not pay all the family obligations—he was supporting his mother and his brother—when he resumed work, he was asked to reimburse a certain amount to the unemployment insurance commission as he had received a weekly overpayment of $6 or $7 during six months. When the man started to work again, he was asked to reimburse that amount. As he was unable to reimburse it at that time steps were taken to have it deducted from his salary—he was working as a lumberman—and his boss fired him because he did not want to have anything to do with garnishees. At that point the individual concerned, who owed something like $180, went back on unemployment insurance and, instead of being reimbursed little by little, the commission again was forced to pay him unemployment benefits. Thus, the commission loses in the case of strict and rigid enforcement of the law.

I feel that if civil servants are asked to enforce the law strictly and rigorously, without giving at times due consideration to conditions and circumstances, without attempting to give them as much latitude as possible in their decisions, countless examples will be found of cases similar to the one I have just pointed out.

To my mind, the Secretary of State and the civil service commission might somehow guide the official's work and leave him the greatest possible scope in considering each particular case, because he is in contact with each individual and should be able to consider the particular circumstances and data of each situation.

If officials had enough scope to deal properly with certain cases which may not strictly conform with the law, better results would be obtained than the prejudice which often follows a rigid administration of the statutes.

Since we are dealing with the civil service commission and civil servants generally, I think that the commission and those responsible for the civil service in general should seek to adopt a new policy toward the civil servant and try to consider him more like a human being, like an intelligent individual upon whose judgment we can rely, in short, give him more authority in the settlement of problems concerning civil servants.

One may observe that this may lead to complacency. I do not think so, because the civil servant will always have to act according to regulations, but we should let him use his judgment and his intelligence in the many cases where the act should not be applied to the detriment of the individual or that of the commission or the government he is serving.

In other words, and to sum up, the government should endeavour to give more authority to the civil servant so that he may perform his duties, his mission, not only in respect of the act but also toward those who consult him, bearing in mind the circumstances surrounding each particular case, the job he has to perform. For instance, an unemployment insurance inspector often has to say: In your case, I have no authority to rule in such or such a way, although I know that in this particular case the act is not clear. This happens regularly. But this is due to the fact that the civil servant is not authorized to decide for himself what should be done in the case before him.

Perhaps one might say that this would be making innovations in a somewhat daring way; but if we start breaking new ground along those lines, if the civil servant is progressively given more leeway, perhaps our civil service will be more competent in a decade, not because civil servants are not efficient now, but probably because they are not given enough leeway to make decisions by themselves which they are not allowed to make according to their own judgment. In many cases, that would eliminate a lot of bureaucracy and transfers of responsibility that would eliminate the submission of many decisions to mediators or appeal commissions; in short it would get our civil servants used to face the current facts of life and make decisions according to their good judgment, and not always according to a lot of regulations which are amended and make their situation complicated as well as the life of the person who has to deal with the officials in a given department. I think that at this time our Canadian citizens and especially the civil servants in the employ of the Canadian governments are competent and able to show sufficient judgment, intelligence and reasoning to be allowed to use those qualities and make decisions by themselves, even if at times it is not always according to the spirit of the law, because the law can be complicated and not applicable to all individual cases.

If our civil servants were allowed to decide by themselves in several of the cases submitted to them, this would eliminate the bureaucratic character, if I might say so, ascribed to them.

Mr. Barnett: I have one or two questions concerning the operation of the commission. I notice the estimates provide for an increase of some $488,000 as compared with last year. As far as I can see, the largest single item in this connection represents an increase in wages and salaries paid to people in the employ of the commission. I notice, also, there has been no significant change in the total number of positions authorized in the establishment of the commission. However, it appears there has been a change in the composition of the commission's staff—a decrease in the number of clerical staff and an increase in certain categories of senior administrative and professional personnel. Could the minister explain to the committee the significance of these changes? What direction are we moving in which would result in a need for a change in the composition of this commission as compared with previous years?

Mr. Lamontagne: I understand there was a significant increase in salaries in effect for part of the year and, in addition, a number of reclassifications which I presume were being made as the commission is redefining its role and getting prepared for certain new arrangements which will be made as a result of the implementation of the recommendations of the Glassco commission. The language school is included in these estimates and it constitutes a net addition to the expenditure and to the staff.

Mr. Barnett: In other words the increase is partly attributable to the development of the language school and partly to the appointment and higher salaries of professional personnel.

I see there has been a relatively substantial increase in the provision for travelling and removal expenses. I do not know whether any special significance attaches to this. Further on in the details of expenditures there is an indication of an increase of $100,000 in the amount provided for advertising for recruiting purposes. The amount has risen from $250,000 to $350,000, which is an increase of almost half as much again. Can the minister tell us the reason for this large increase?

Mr. Lamontagne: This was due, I presume, to the increase in recruiting activity which took place at the end of the austerity program. In particular it was needed to meet the demands of the new Department of Industry.

Item agreed to.

Privy council

Economic Council of Canada—

35. Administration $817,920.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Mr. Lamontagne: I made a report on the economic council last week and we had some discussion about it. The item was not approved, but at this stage, at least, I have nothing to add.

Mr. Lambert: Let us go back and consider what happened last Thursday when this matter was discussed. The minister's estimates were under consideration from eight o'clock to ten o'clock and the committee dealt with four or five items directly under the administration of his department. I can hardly agree with him that an extensive statement was made.

On a previous occasion, when we were discussing interim supply, we did discuss this matter. We asked what the economic council was doing. We did so because the council had been introduced with a great fanfare of trumpets to replace the national development council, but since that time we have not heard a great deal about it. I notice that as reported on page 9811 of Hansard the minister made a few remarks in connection with the council but I suggest he may be in a position now to add to what was said on that occasion. With the greatest respect I do not think that the two-hour discussion on Thursday indicates that this is all the consideration which need be given to the activities of the various agencies which come within the jurisdiction of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Lamontagne: No.

Mr. Lambert: I know he had a few remarks to add this afternoon so perhaps we might have them en passant.

Mr. Lamontagne: I have nothing to add to what I said last Thursday about the economic council. All I said at that time was that the economic council had picked up its staff in its first year of existence and that its first objective had been to get into a position to present its first annual review, which will appear in December of this year and will contain a forecast and an outline of economic problems for the period between 1965 and 1970. That is more or less the gist of what I said at that time, although I also went on to explain the activities of the council and also to point out the number of meetings, etc.

I do not think I have anything to add at this moment in regard to the economic council itself. The hon. member may know that at this stage I am not seeking to have the estimates of all the other agencies passed. As soon as we can deal with the economic council I intend to make a rather elaborate statement on the so-called cultural agencies of the federal government, including the C.B.C.

Mr. Lambert: There was one point on which I thought the minister might be able to help us some more. I have had an opportunity to read the remarks he made the other day and I think he hinted at this, or touched on it briefly. It seems to me that the national development council had moved to a considerable extent in getting joint studies and shall we say a spirit of co-operation between management, labour and government, which area was most promising. The minister did give a few hints in this regard and I was wondering whether he could elaborate now. Unless he feels that this matter should be held until next month when the report will be coming forward, how far has the economic council gone in furtherance of this particular work? Because we have not heard a thing from the economic council since its foundation.

Mr. Lamontagne: You have not read the papers.

Mr. Lambert: Well, surely the minister is not suggesting that because these reports are contained in newspaper summaries the members of this house must rely on the newspapers for reports from government agencies. I do not think the minister is trying to give that impression.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to tell the hon. member that last Monday and Tuesday there was held in Ottawa an important seminar on management-labour relations. This seminar was held under the auspices of the economic council, and the event was widely publicized in the papers. It was preceded by four major studies in this field, which were considered, analysed and discussed during these two days. There were at least 150 leaders from all sectors of the economy attending. This shows that the work which was started by the national productivity council is being continued and activated by the economic council.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, in relation to the last remarks of the minister I would say that I had an opportunity of talking to one of the people at the conference, one of the labour representatives, who informed me that the session had been rather illuminating and rather interesting. However, the particular point I want to make to the minister has to do with his remarks the other evening in which he said the highest priority in the program of the economic council is being given to the first of the annual reviews on Canada's medium and long term prospects, and he made reference to the fact that its report will be published in December.

The question I would ask the minister is whether or not it is the intention of the government, once this report has been received from the economic council, to revive its action on the proposal for a Canada development corporation, which can perhaps activate some of the studies reproduced in this report on the long range prospects of Canada issued by the economic council.

Mr. Lamontagne: Well, Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member knows, this Canada development corporation is part of the program of the present government and its establishment will be announced as soon as possible. It has nothing to do directly with the economic council.

Mr. Barnett: The minister says that it is part of the program of the present government. My observation is that we certainly have not seen much indication of that recently. Some of us are beginning to wonder whether it really is part of the program of the present government. I think the minister will also realize that in posing this question I am implying that any useful outcome of the activities of the economic council is, it seems to me, inevitably related to some form of action along the lines suggested by the Canada development corporation.

Mr. Lamontagne: The hon. member might reserve his question for the Minister of Finance when the estimates of the Department of Finance are before the committee.

Mr. Barnett: The minister is not going to pass the buck to his colleague, I hope.

Mr. Lamontagne: But that is not my responsibility.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

As there are also economic councils in at least one province, and even in several provinces, and also some regional economic councils, has the Canada economic council been in touch with the regional or provincial economic councils? Is the work done in co-operation by all those councils?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated last week, the economic council of Canada works in close co-operation with similar provincial agencies.

Meetings are being held regularly, and as soon as the economic council of Canada publishes its annual review, it intends to call another meeting of all provincial agencies directly or indirectly interested in its research.

Mr. Grégoire: A further question, Mr. Chairman. Could the Secretary of State tell us whether the economic council of Canada makes use of the work already done by the economic development board, an organization which existed before the council, and whether it makes it a point to pursue the work already started by the economic development board?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, as I said a moment ago, the duties to be carried out by the national economic development board have simply been transferred to the economic council of Canada which is trying, as much as possible, not only to carry out previous projects but to undertake new ones.

Mr. Lambert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Can he give us detailed explanation about the duties of the 11 employees, under the heading "administration and professions" whose salaries range from $15,000 to $19,000? Are they economists, office managers, and so on? Can the minister tell us about it?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, of course I do not have any detailed information at this time.

However, the president of the economic council as well as the vice president, the permanent director and the other members of the council themselves have come to the conclusion that the council should have a very small staff. In fact, there is no intention of going much over a hundred employees and, of course, that number includes office employees, stenographers, secretaries, etc.

However, the council itself wants to concentrate on professional services and that is how it managed to secure the services of a good number of economists from practically all quarters. Some are permanently employed by the council, others are just on loan from other government departments and even from labour unions or private industry.

[Text]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Chairman, I take it from what the minister has said that in addition to the relatively small group to which he has referred there is an intention to obtain the co-operation of private organizations. I believe at one time it was the policy to second, borrow or use the services of individuals connected with corporations to further, or supplement the work of the council. That is the situation as I understand it.

Mr. Lamontagne: That is exactly the situation. A small nucleus of professional people will carry on the work in collaboration with individuals invited from all corners.

Mr. Nowlan: That was the original intention.

[Translation]

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Does the economic council of Canada deal specifically with such urgent problems as that of the industrialization of rural areas?

Does the economic council of Canada deem that one of the most vulnerable areas of our economy is eastern agriculture? Even if special agencies have been established, such as the ARDA program, in order to promote eastern agriculture, does the council intend to foster expansion, and if such is the case, what steps, if any, have been taken in this connection?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, as I said in my general statement, the economic council of Canada was created in 1964. Its main objective was to organize a research group and promote research so it could submit a general report on the Canadian economy; this report will be published in December, 1964.

That project had some scope, believe me, Mr. Chairman.

According to its terms of reference, the economic council of Canada will study the regional aspect of our problems, and I trust that as soon as its first report is published, this agency will turn to other aspects, including the regional one of our economic problems.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

1. Grant in respect of the net operating amount required to discharge the responsibilities of the national broadcasting service, $85,900,000.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, as I explained last Thursday evening when I introduced the estimates of my department, I now intend to make a second general statement devoted to the so-called cultural institutions, namely the C.B.C., the B.B.G., the national film board, the national museum, the national gallery, the department of public printing and stationery, the public archives and the national library.

Mr. Nielsen: And the Canadian Liberal federation.

Mr. Lamontagne: That is not cultural.

This statement will be in the nature of a progress report on these various agencies and, although it will appear to be too long, it will certainly contribute to and shorten my participation in this debate.

When the estimates of these agencies have been approved, I propose to make a third and final statement on the estimates of the centennial commission.

Mr. Baldwin: Plus many explanations.

Mr. Lamontagne: That will depend on you.

I hope that the discussion which will follow my report will be a constructive one. In recent months most of the agencies for which I am responsible have been re-examining their activities and their administrative structures in the light of what are or should be their national goals. When these reappraisals are completed, and I hope they will be in the first part of 1965, new legislation will be needed in several cases to bring about necessary changes. That is why I hope we will have a constructive discussion during this debate, and that the members of the committee will not hesitate to make suggestions, so that we can take them into account in drafting the legislation. This is the time to improve and strengthen our national institutions. This is not the time to weaken and destroy them.

[Translation]

Before submitting my report on the various federal cultural institutions, I would like hon. members to consider for a few minutes at least, the need of a more co-ordinated and dynamic federal policy, as well as the general aims of such a policy.

As I have said on various occasions, there is a considerable lack of balance between our material and cultural developments, between the body and the spirit of our nation. In the economic field, the pace of our development has been very rapid, more particularly since the start of the 20th century, and we have now reached one of the highest standards of living in the world. To achieve this, of course we called upon private enterprise, but, on the other hand, we did not hesitate to ask for help from the state, either to stimulate individual initiative, or to complement it.

With respect to culture, we have drawn our inspiration far too much from the American tradition, and not enough from the European. We have left our cultural development almost exclusively in the hands of individuals and private organizations, whose potential is necessarily limited, in spite of occasionally outstanding efforts. As a consequence, our cultural life is anaemic and dangerously exposed to American encroachment. Moreover, to the extent that they have progressed, our main cultures have developed in isolation, for a lack of opportunities and financial means constituted the major obstacle to the setting up of frequent and worthy contacts.

Our poorness and, perhaps even more, our cultural isolation largely account for the present tension in Canada which, in many cases, is due to frustration on the part of those who are forced to live on the fringe of our society.

Encouragement to research and creative work in the field of humanities and social sciences is clearly insufficient. In spite of heroic sacrifices on the part of certain individuals, our artistic groups can barely survive and, even in Canada, their influence is mostly local in scope. Popular culture is having a hard time getting organized. Even amateur sport has its difficulties.

This lack of culture is the more tragic in our contemporary society that technical and economic progress leave more time for leisure and creative activities. Our society will truly be a failure if after having taken the human element out of man's work, it does not succeed in uplifting his moments of leisure.

[Text]

Moreover, as long as we fail to build a strong cultural life and to develop frequent exchanges between our cultures, I am quite sure we will continue to be uneasy about our country and worried about its future, that many young Canadians will continue to leave Canada and to be more interested in other countries than in ours, and that we will continue to ask if Canada constitutes a nation because we will have failed to develop a real Canadian identity.

On the other hand, Canadian history shows that cultural expansion and more frequent cultural contacts will not come about by themselves or through the sole efforts of individuals and private groups. The experience of other countries, with the possible exception of the United States, confirms our own. This is why I am convinced that our cultural life needs both protection against impoverishment and stimulus to improvement and that a deliberate effort to these ends, in which each sphere of government within its own jurisdiction will play its full role, is not only justified but most urgently needed.

Up to now I have tried to show the need for a cultural policy in Canada and what ought to be its general objectives. I should like now to indicate how it should attempt to reach those goals. In the first place, it should give assistance to individuals and private cultural groups—

Mr. Lambert: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, since the minister's staff has been kind enough to distribute copies of this speech to the press generally and to people in the officials' gallery, I wonder whether copies of this rather long and important statement could be distributed to the chief representatives of the parties in the house. After all, the minister is speaking to the house, not to the press representatives, and if he expects intelligent comment, which I think one can expect both from hon. members on the government side and on this side, copies of this statement should be made available to us. I am not singling out the minister in this regard because I have made this point to some of his colleagues. I have said before that if a minister is going to read a lengthy statement which has been carefully prepared and distributed to outside agencies, then certainly a number of copies should be made available within the house so members may comment on it with a little more care and preparation.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Chairman, I was not aware that copies had been made available to the press, but I would be quite happy to have copies made available to the representatives of the parties in the house.

Mr. Lambert: It is not that I am complaining about the press getting it but rather that I should like members to get it too.

Mr. Lamontagne: I have no objection at all and I hope somebody will be able to take care of the matter as I go along.

I was saying that in trying to reach these goals a proper cultural policy for Canada would be, in the first place, to give assistance to individuals and private cultural groups to enable them to improve themselves and to travel and to perform in Canada and abroad. This is an essential element of a cultural policy in a society like ours which relies primarily on private initiative.

The centennial commission has begun to offer assistance for such purposes and I will have more to say about it on another occasion. The government is studying ways and means of fostering a feature film industry in Canada and I have already announced our intention to establish a loan fund, which we think would be very helpful. We have given a special grant to the Canadian conference on the arts to organize a seminar next February on the situation of the arts in Canada. This meeting will give us, I hope, an overall picture of the needs and requirements in this sector for 1967.

The Canada Council was established to help individuals and groups and it has done since 1957 a most remarkable job in spite of its limited resources. More recently it has been suggested that we should increase the funds available to the council. Others have proposed that the council should be restricted to the arts and that a national research centre for the humanities and the social sciences ought to be established. We are considering these various proposals at the moment and we will announce our decision in 1965.

In the second place, a cultural policy for Canada requires public cultural agencies in certain sectors where exclusive reliance on private initiative is undesirable and which fall within federal jurisdiction. These agencies must serve national purposes and help to develop the Canadian identity. They must be acceptable to the greatest possible number of Canadians, not only to the national capital or to a restricted group. They must reflect the true picture of our country and they cannot afford to succumb to extremism. They must encourage creation with due regard to administrative efficiency.

It is in the light of these and other requirements that a serious reappraisal is now in process. Two important steps have already been taken. A cabinet committee on cultural matters has been established and, for the first time in our history, all federal cultural agencies have been brought under the same ministerial roof. Moreover, as soon as the preliminary reappraisal is completed in each individual agency I intend to set up an interagency committee. Such a committee will serve several useful purposes, without reducing or weakening the independence of the institutions. It will enable them to meet at regular intervals to discuss their common goals and problems, to try to improve the co-ordination of their activities, to prevent duplication and fill the gaps that may exist.

In addition, the time may have come to establish the relationship between parliament and those agencies on a more proper and continuing basis. It may have become desirable to establish a standing committee of parliament on cultural matters. All agencies responsible to parliament could be asked in succession to appear before the committee to report on their current activities and on their plans. These meetings could be most useful, I am sure, both for parliament and for the agencies themselves.

I should like now to make a rather brief progress report on each individual agency and, to begin with, broadcasting, the B.B.G. and the C.B.C. As I have said on earlier occasions, and I think it should be repeated here, there are several problems and questions involving both public and private broadcasting in Canada which must be solved and answered as soon as possible. One of the major problems is the lack of clarity and the shortcomings of the Broadcasting Act of 1958. Unfortunately the Broadcasting Act did not solve what Albert A. Shea in his book "Broadcasting the Canadian Way" called "the one basic issue... to which all others are related: what are the aims and purposes of broadcasting in Canada and how can broadcasting best be organized to achieve these objectives?"

Dr. Andrew Stewart, chairman of the board of broadcast governors, has publicly told of the board's distress at this lack of clarity in the act and the resulting confusion and conflict in its other provisions. Hence, confusion exists about the aims and roles of public and private broadcasting in Canada, about the relations between the C.B.C. and private broadcasting, about the powers of the C.B.C. and the B.B.G., and about the extension of television broadcasting.

On the question of the board's authority, for instance, certain clauses of part I of the Broadcasting Act can be interpreted to mean that the B.B.G. has complete jurisdiction over all Canadian broadcasting, but other clauses in part II can be construed to mean that the C.B.C. is independent of the B.B.G. in certain instances. By its vagueness, then, the act has set up potential conflicts between the C.B.C. and the B.B.G., both organizations apparently operating from different, necessarily self-defined premises. The Grey cup issue was a notable example of this confused and difficult situation.

Similarly, Dr. Stewart—quite rightly I think—has alluded to the fuzziness of the act about the extension of television service in Canada. This, too, has caused certain disagreements because the C.B.C. apparently feels that it should decide, with the concurrence of the governor in council, what stations it can establish, while the B.B.G. is not at all certain that this is a correct interpretation of the act.

Should the C.B.C. have first call on all television station applications? Should it have its own stations across the country or should it depend partly upon affiliates? In other words, should the C.B.C. in future work towards a B.B.C. type system of station ownership, or should the C.B.C. system be different to fit a different Canadian situation? More generally, should there be statutory conditions under which television stations can be established by public or private broadcasters? These questions must have answers and the answers obviously depend upon what kind of Canadian broadcasting system is desired —single, dual or mixed.

Apart from these general questions and problems raised by the uncertainty of the Broadcasting Act, there are related subjects pertaining specifically to the C.B.C. The structural organization of the corporation is one of them. The Glassco commission made some general comments about the structural organization of the C.B.C. and if the Glassco inferences are well founded, important changes must be made in the corporation. At the moment the C.B.C. itself has a small "Glassco committee" studying the corporation's structures. Undoubtedly it would be useful to make serious appraisal of the findings of that study.

The government also feels that there should be a serious look at the whole C.B.C. financing picture, both short term and long term.

Included in a study of C.B.C. financing, of course, is the subject of advertising and its ramifications in terms of Canadian broadcasting, public and private.

Also involved in C.B.C. financing are the costs of C.B.C. consolidation projects like those contemplated for Montreal and Toronto. In turn, these consolidation projects may influence the future development of Canadian private producers and technical facilities whose general role vis-à-vis the C.B.C. merits serious study and consideration. The Glassco commission had something to say about this last item, but again its remarks were rather general. There are other problems, such as the standards of programs both on the C.B.C. networks and in private stations which I do not wish to raise at this stage.

When the present government assumed office, it was already aware of those urgent and complex problems. In May 1963, my predecessor, the Minister of Transport, asked three gentlemen—Dr. Stewart, chairman of the B.B.G., Mr. Ouimet, president of the C.B.C. and Mr. Jamieson, the president of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters—to consider some of the problems and questions I have cited here. The joint report of the so-called troika and the three separate reports of its members were tabled in the house on May 25. We were not surprised to see the limited areas of agreement shown in those reports because when my predecessor had announced the creation of the troika, he had described it as "an essential first step to a new definition of public policy" and as a preliminary step to a public inquiry.

When those reports were tabled in the house, I immediatedly announced the establishment of an advisory committee on broadcasting with comprehensive terms of reference and experienced members. The Fowler committee has since been hard at work. Numerous briefs are being received from individuals and private groups. The most recent developments in the United States and Europe are being carefully considered. Expert consultants have been assigned special studies on particular problems including the structural organization, the methods of operation and the main consolidation projects of the C.B.C. I have and the government has complete confidence in the committee and its work. When its report has been submitted in the first part of 1965 as expected, it will be made public immediately; the government will introduce new legislation as soon as possible thereafter and, at the proper stage, the proposed measure will be referred to a parliamentary committee. The examination that such a committee will then be in a position to make will, I am sure, be most useful.

It would seem that very few people are satisfied at the moment with present legislation and arrangements in the field of broadcasting. Private broadcasters, of course, are here to stay. They have a very important role to play in our community life. They know that this role is not limited to presenting more American shows than the C.B.C. does or programs of lower quality than those of the public network. They are more and more conscious of the fact that they are not exempted from their public responsibility only because consumers may pay a greater share of their costs than taxpayers. However, they also realize that it is very difficult to improve and, at the same time, continue to compete, if common standards are not applied to all.

A number of Canadians believe that the administrative efficiency of the C.B.C. and the content of certain of its programs should be improved and that the corporation should be more conscious of the national and public interests it has to serve. No doubt improvements are called for. Some are being made at the present moment; others will have to wait the implementation of new legislation or the completion of the consolidation projects. It is equally evident that an institution like the C.B.C., operating in such a complex and touchy field of activities will never be able to fulfil its true role with dynamism and creative imagination and satisfy everybody at the same time. This certainly does not mean that the right to criticize the C.B.C. should be denied or that the corporation should not be accessible to parliamentary supervision. It does not mean either that the C.B.C. should become cynical about criticism and negative when sound suggestions are made. It means that criticism and supervision must be such as to strengthen and improve the C.B.C., not to weaken and destroy it.

The C.B.C. has a very high reputation in the world. The rank it has gained among the broadcasting systems of the world and the great number of international awards it has won prove it. It is the envy of a great number of other countries and people including many Americans. The C.B.C. has made a major contribution to the development of our country in the fields of entertainment, information and knowledge. It has enriched our intellectual life by helping our artists and our artistic groups. It has made culture in its broad and truly human sense, more accessible to the general public. The C.B.C. is one of Canada's most vital and essential institutions, at this crucial moment of our history. The C.B.C. must become more than ever before a living and daily testimony of the Canadian identity, a faithful reflection of our two main cultures and a powerful element of understanding, moderation and unity in our country. If it performs these national tasks with efficiency, its occasional mistakes will be easily forgiven; if it fails in that mission, its other achievements will not compensate for that failure. I know that the management of the C.B.C. has been and continues to be very conscious of those vital tasks and of that great challenge.

Turning now to the national film board:

The philosophy I have just outlined with respect to the C.B.C. applies equally well to the national film board. The board has celebrated its 25th anniversary in 1964. During this relatively long period, its work has reached a very high standard of excellence and its films have faithfully reflected Canada's social, cultural and economic evolution. Over the years, with respect to each of its functions, as laid down in section 9 of the act, the board has made a valuable contribution. This is especially true with respect to its main function which is the production and distribution of films in the national interest and particularly of films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations.

During that period, however, our country has witnessed drastic changes which require a new image to be adequately reflected. The advent and the rapid expansion of television has created a new and growing need for films, in addition to the theatrical and community audiences and to increasing government requirements. I do not believe that these changes require a revision of the functions of the board as defined by parliament in 1950. As the new demands were met, however, there may have been a shift in priorities due also to limited resources, and certain functions assigned to the board may not have been discharged as fully as it was desirable. The chairman and the members of the board are aware of this situation. They have begun a reappraisal of the institution itself and they are reviewing its programs and operations in several fields of activity in the light of current demand of course, but also of its national purpose and the relative importance of the functions assigned to it by parliament.

As an agency at the service of Canada and its people in the fields of information and culture, the board has already decided to strengthen its program for community audiences, and to undertake a survey and analysis of its distribution operations in Canada, with a view to identify and evaluate more precisely its audiences, in relation to their needs and to the purposes the board pursues.

The board is also considering at the moment the desirability of a film training center in Canada and the means through which this could be achieved. The board's great reputation abroad has convinced many developing countries that one of the best places to send their future film-makers for training would be in Canada. If this could be done, it would be also to our advantage because it would further increase our prestige and our influence abroad. However, the board does not have adequate training facilities and programs to meet these requests. There is also a growing demand in Canada for such facilities and programs. The provinces are more and more interested in the production of films for their own purposes. Moreover, the private film industry has made real progress recently and will grow even more rapidly in the immediate future, if parliament approves our program of assistance, which will be submitted early next year. In view of these growing needs for trained people both in Canada and abroad, we may have reached the point where it is both feasible and desirable that a comprehensive film training center be established in Canada. As soon as the board will have presented its recommendations in this respect, I will be pleased to announce the intentions of the government.

With the reappraisal of the board's activities which is taking place at the present time, with the assistance program now under preparation to encourage the production of private feature films in Canada, with the consideration being given to the establishment of a film training centre, I believe that we are taking all the preliminary steps which are required for the establishment, on a realistic basis, of a dynamic, well integrated film industry in Canada, which will fill an important cultural gap and will make us less dependant on foreign sources of supply.

Turning now to the national museum:

The national museum is going through a phase of fundamental reorganization which has been too long delayed. In July 1961, the former government directed that a Canadian historical museum be ready by July 1, 1967, which would include the human history branch of the present museum, the war museum and other material; that a Canadian museum of natural history be established; and that a building or buildings be ready for occupation by the Canadian history museum by early 1966 and the natural history museum as soon as possible thereafter.

On January 24, 1963, a resolution respecting the national museum of Canada and the establishment of different branches was moved in the House of Commons but it never came up for discussion. When our government came into office, almost two years had gone by, since July 1961, without any concrete steps having been taken, beyond the planning stage, to provide the museum with new buildings and a new administrative set-up.

Meanwhile the priorities had changed. The arts alliance of Ottawa had prepared a comprehensive report which showed quite clearly that what the national capital needed most for the proper celebrations of the centennial was a Canadian centre for the performing arts. The government accepted that conclusion. With that decision and the other priorities in the government construction program for the national capital area, it became almost physically impossible to realize the plans made for the museum in 1961.

The government has therefore decided to start the construction of the new museum during the fiscal year 1965-66 but to proceed at a slower pace than previously contemplated. Present plans provide for the completion of the first phase of the project at the Woods building and Roxborough apartments site in 1968. The second phase, which is to take place where the present temporary headquarters of national defence are located, would be completed as soon as possible thereafter.

As to the legislation designed to improve the prestige of the museum and to provide for its reorganization, I intend to introduce it during the next session of parliament.

I regret these delays, which do not mean, however, that nothing will be done in the interval. The government is prepared to enable the museum to increase its activities, to improve its collections and exhibits and to plan for its future development. We are well aware of two immediate needs which must be met.

In the first place, it is not an easy task to plan for the museum complex that we envisage. Although we have complete confidence in those devoted civil servants who are responsible for the museum, they would feel much more at ease and willing to use their creative imagination and their expert knowledge if they could readily seek the views and the reactions of an advisory group. The experience we have had with such groups in planning the arts center has been most valuable in this respect. I think, therefore, it might be desirable to establish an advisory committee composed of experts and of other people interested in this field to review the plans for the new buildings, and to give their views on the preparation of programs and activities which should be initiated by the museums as the new buildings become available.

In the second place, it is quite clear that there is in Canada an acute scarcity of trained personnel in regard to the growing demand of existing museums and the future requirements of new museums which will be completed in 1967 or soon after. I will ask the proposed advisory committee to look at this problem as a matter of great priority and to propose immediate and long term solutions, including if necessary, a special program of grants and scholarships.

More than 500,000 people visited the national museum, the war museum and the aviation museum in 1963. It is expected that attendance records will be substantially higher in 1964. We hope also that the national museum will be able in the future to work in closer co-operation with provincial and other museums and to make available to them some of its exhibits and collection of objects so that this great national institution will be accessible not only to Ottawans and to those who visit the national capital but also to the greatest number of Canadians in various parts of the country.

Turning now to other agencies:

Finally, I would like to deal very briefly with the other cultural agencies. The national gallery needs a new structural organization which will provide greater flexibility and enhance its prestige. New legislation is now being prepared and will be introduced during the next session.

The Glassco commission recommended the separation of the printing bureau from the printing and stationery department and the creation of a new office called the queen's publisher. The separation has been made but special legislation is required to create the new office. The future role and attributions of the queen's publisher are now under review and the new legislation will be ready for consideration next year.

The public archives and the national library are also going through a period of transition. The new building is scheduled to be completed in the latter part of 1966. Apart from its other normal activities, the archives expects to resume in 1965 the publication of documentary volumes which was interrupted by the war. The first volume will be a collection of unpublished documents relating to Champlain and his times. A second volume of Champlain documents should follow in 1966. A comprehensive edition of the letters of Sir John A. Macdonald is in preparation and the first volumes will be published in 1967. They will be the first of a long series which will include the letters of all the prime ministers.

In anticipation of the completion of the new building, the book purchasing program of the national library is being expanded. In order to avoid needless duplication and to discover the most important gaps in the government's book resources, the national librarian, in co-operation with the chief librarian of the national research council is making a survey of all government libraries in order to secure up to date details of their collections and book purchasing policies. Although the national library gives first priority to the acquisition of publications relating to Canada, the ultimate aim is that in co-operation with other government libraries in Ottawa, it should provide a comprehensive book collection covering all major subjects.

The legislative measures which will be submitted to the house, the elaboration of new programs and the improvements to existing ones, should go a long way in fostering in Canada a new awareness of our immense intellectual and spiritual resources and in developing to the fullest measure our cultural potential.

The debate going on today in Quebec and throughout Canada gives ample proof that cultural and spiritual values transcend the more material exigencies of our Canadian existence. Many of the difficulties in achieving greater Canadian unity, a unity which must be based on moderation, good will and mutual respect, may be traced to a lack of cultural progress and to neglect of our more human values. Government policy in this field has many pitfalls. It must avoid the creation of state regimented cultures by doing too much, and it must beware of abrogating its true responsibilities by doing too little. The government must direct its efforts to assisting in the development of all our gifted creative talents and yet its cultural programs must be established in such a way as to assure a broad popular participation.

Culture has too long been confused in the popular mind with something exclusive, and pretentious. This situation only leads to a wider gap between the cultural level of a few and the cultural level of many. Our efforts should be directed to bridging this gap. Our aim should be to provide the catalyst whereby our diverse cultures, which find expression in many fields, from ballet to folk-dancing, from Camus to Leacock, can grow and flourish through more frequent contacts and exchanges. Government policy must also be directed to making the fruits of our cultural achievements of greater benefit to more Canadians in more distant parts of the country.

The general program I have announced today constitutes not so much a radical departure from previous government policy as it reflects an awareness of the greater need in our complex and troubled society for greater cultural and spiritual efforts. This is a task to which all Canadians of good will must lend their efforts, in which both public and private groups must participate and in which, I am sure, hon. members will find common agreement.

Mr. Nowlan: Many of us have sat here in this place on Friday afternoons when estimates were being brought forward—usually a handful of members from the maritimes and from western Canada were present—and the function of the minister was to make as short an address as possible, to get as much supply as possible, and to have votes passed for as many dollars as possible. This has been the practice on Friday afternoons for a number of years, in fact for as long as I have been here.

This afternoon, however, we have seen a unique departure from that practice. We have seen a minister bringing forward a philosophical, a lengthy and, I will say, a learned and able dissertation on some of the cultural problems with which this country is faced. It is by way of a unique experience and it is an initiative on which I commend the hon. gentleman at this time. Certainly, what he has said is worthy of careful consideration.

Since it is now ten minutes to five, and since private members' hour begins in ten minutes' time, I am sure the minister would be horribly insulted if anybody attempted to deal at length with his estimates in the short time we now have left to us. I had thought the minister would follow the policy pursued by many of his predecessors, some of them seated on that side of the house and some on this, when we attempted to do as much as possible in such a short time. But since he has chosen not to follow that practice—and I am by no means criticizing him for this—any notes I had made on the administration of the C.B.C. would be out of place, at the present time and I do not intend to deal with the subject at any length.

The minister raised interesting questions with respect to cultural development and the development of the Canadian nation as such. I recall reading a paper some years ago by the president of the Canadian historical association. The writer asked the question: Is there a Canada; is there a Canadian nation? He answered that question affirmatively but he also said, as the hon. gentleman himself hinted this afternoon, that Canadians are prone to take their livers out, prop them up on their knees and examine them introspectively to find out whether they are suffering from cirrhosis or some other ailment. I think there is this introspective quality among Canadians, an inferiority complex even, which requires a careful study. Possibly the minister in his statement this afternoon opened the way to a discussion of that matter at some time in the future, but certainly not this afternoon.

The minister referred specifically to the various agencies for which he is responsible. He referred to the board of broadcast governors, to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to others and he mentioned the fact that there are conflicts and ambiguities in relation particularly to the act which should be clarified. With that I quite agree. When the minister responsible for that legislation first introduced it into the house he said that it was something of an experiment, that there were bound to be difficulties emerging in connection with its administration.

We were facing a situation at that time which was novel. Up until then the C.B.C. had complete control of all agencies so far as broadcasting was concerned. Pressure was put on the C.B.C., and incidentally on the government, to set up a regulatory body and the government of that day felt its way along the pathway. I think it felt its way fairly well, but undoubtedly far from perfectly. Then they set up the B.B.G. In introducing the legislation the minister at that time stated it would certainly require amendment and careful study, and he thought that within three or four years parliament would have to review the whole situation. I am glad to hear that the minister agrees with the minister of that day and apparently he intends to revise this legislation. There are one or more committees now studying the whole problem, and it is certainly one worthy of very careful study.

The committee of this house has spent some considerable time, particularly on interim supply, in relation to the C.B.C. There were many questions asked during those days which I think the minister is expected to answer. The fact that they were asked and that the minister will deal with them—I hope —will justify at least to some extent what sometimes alleged in certain quarters not too far removed from over our right shoulders—I refer to the press gallery—to be a waste of time on interim supply, because the more these matters are worked over in interim supply and the more the minister answers them now, the less time will have to be spent on the estimates of the C.B.C. itself.

I am not one of those, Mr. Chairman—I am sure I do not need to tell the committee this —who feels that parliament or the government should dispose of the C.B.C. I think the C.B.C. has performed and is performing an integral service in the development of the Canadian nation. I would deprecate any suggestion that we should do away with or should sell, or anything of that kind, this corporation. After all, it was established many years ago; and without indulging in any partisan memories I would just like to say it was set up by a Conservative government under Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. I see the minister is shaking his head; I appreciate some vague efforts were made in this regard by the preceding government, but the government of Right Hon. R. B. Bennett brought it to fruition. Although changes have been made from time to time by parliament and there have been many investigations, complaints and inquiries, every time the answer comes back that the C.B.C. is an essential part of our development and deserves the support of this country. And I agree with that.

However, this does not mean I agree with all of the actions of the C.B.C. at this time. Frankly I feel that the C.B.C. is required to exercise more self-discipline perhaps than it has heretofore. If it does not I am afraid that the government, or even parliament, will be pressured into exercising that discipline, and it will be necessary so to exercise it. I am not talking now about programming. Many of the programs of the C.B.C. I think are excellent; I think some of them are atrocious. But after all, that is only my opinion and I think in this area we are all entitled to our own opinions and the C.B.C. should not be criticized in this regard.

There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when I sat where the present minister now sits, and there was not one day that I did not receive between 25 and 50 letters. Half a dozen of them would be blasphemous. Well, they would not exactly be blasphemous because the authors of them would not indulge in blasphemy, but they were expressing opinions about what were called indecent and obscene programs produced by the C.B.C. and televised on a certain night. Then again another dozen or so letters would tell me what a wonderful program it was and what a great thing it was to have me as minister and to see programs on the C.B.C. by independent producers. So there is no way in which you can deal with programming per se.

I think in the area of finance there does need to be a little discipline exercised. Although I am only dealing with small details at the moment, frankly when these estimates come again I intend to spend some little time dealing with the paper which the minister has put before us this afternoon and which I did not anticipate; therefore I am only dealing with the mechanical aspects at the moment.

I think there could perhaps be some criticism of the C.B.C. in some of its expenditures, for example in sending camera parties here, there and everywhere, to places where we have good existing media of communications. I think it is true that there were more cameramen present at the Olympic games in Tokyo than there were medals won. I think that that is a particular area deserving careful examination.

I am also directly concerned—I am mentioning this now because I know the minister will deal with it later on—with one particular item of his expenditures, and that is the loan amounting to $14,500,000 or $14,250,000 to the corporation. Loans have been made in the old days. I am not criticizing any government for this. Possibly they were made under the government of R. B. Bennett, but the point is that they have been built up, built up and built up until the minister concerned had millions of dollars under loan, all of which was impossible of repayment. To make a loan to the C.B.C. is the same as giving a snowball to a fireman in a furnace room and expecting him to return it tomorrow morning. The snowball of course will have evaporated just in the same way as this money is spent. To call it a loan is a euphemistic statement of the most extreme kind. In addition to the money listed in the public account we also have this $14,250,000 loan, which as I said is a euphemistic expression which I think is used to cover additional expenditures.

I notice the hour is five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, but as I said I am only touching on a few of the mechanical aspects at the moment. The minister has brought forward a very interesting document this afternoon and I am sure he would be very disappointed if we did not spend two or three days or even longer some time next week or the week after in order to discuss the matters he has put before us. Therefore, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, may I just say the house leader, who is detained elsewhere, asked me whether I would come down to the house and see, since the house has been so agreeable these last few days, whether there is a general disposition to go right on until six o'clock with these estimates? Perhaps the hon. gentleman himself wants to make a speech, as well as others, and this would provide a wonderful hour for making them.

Mr. Nowlan: No. I think the minister's remarks were of such a wide ranging nature and so different from what is usually entertained on estimates on a Friday afternoon that as a tribute to the minister—because he deserves this tribute—we should adjourn this matter now and go ahead with private members' hour.

Mr. Pickersgill: Well, could we take some of the other items—

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: —stood over from other parts of the minister's department.

The Chairman: Order, please. May I suggest this discussion is out of order and that this proposal should be made with the Speaker in the chair.

In order to allow the house to proceed with the consideration of private members' business, shall I rise, report certain resolutions, and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the house, as the case may be?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I think it is usual on Friday afternoon before commencing private members hour for the acting house leader to inform us what business we will be dealing with on Monday and Tuesday of the following week.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am not in my right place, but if the house will suffer me to speak I might say that the house leader is at this time consulting with the Prime Minister about that matter, and I do not think he will be in a position to say anything about it until six o'clock.

Mr. Nowlan: He will be in at six o'clock.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

AMENDMENT TO REVISE DEFINITION OF "ELEVATOR"

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-70, to amend the Canada Grain Act (Off-track elevator licensing).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the intent of Bill C-70 is very simple. It is to amend the Canada Grain Act by dropping the words in the second line "directly from or into railway cars or vessels". Under the definition of an elevator in the Canada Grain Act it is specified that no licence can be granted to an elevator unless the elevator is in a position where western grain may be received, or out of which it may be discharged, directly from or into railway cars or vessels. There are some further provisions.

Mr. Speaker, we believe that this definition of "an elevator" needs to be changed, particularly in view of the proposed railway abandonment or rationalization program which may come into being as a result of the passage of Bill No. C-120. I am not sure whether it is well known to hon. members of this house that there was a period of time when it was possible for the board of grain commissioners to license an elevator whether it was located along a railroad track or not, but since the adoption of the amendment to the act inserting the words "directly from or into railway cars or vessels," it has been impossible and unlawful to license an elevator unless it is located alongside a railway line.

There is a very useful purpose to be served by an elevator in this day and age, 1964, whether or not it is located beside a railway line. As an example of this I could refer to many small towns where all, or almost all, of the grain is delivered to the elevator and taken out of the elevator by motor truck transport. While there are railway lines located in these towns, very little use is made of them for the movement of grain. If the provisions contained in the Canada Grain Act were enforced, unless those elevators were standing alongside a railway track it would not be possible for the elevator to be licensed.

I am certain that in years to come, particularly if there is a large scale program of railway line abandonment undertaken, motor truck transport is going to play an increasingly important part in the movement of grain. We might as well recognize this fact now so that it will be possible for an elevator to be licensed, whether or not it is located adjacent to a railway line.

Perhaps there would not be a great amount of grain moved from these elevators by motor truck transport for export, yet when one considers the economics and the cost of maintaining some of these branch lines solely for the purpose of carrying grain in boxcars as opposed to short movements by motor transport and then into railway cars, it becomes fairly obvious that some substantial savings can be effected by the use of motor truck transport.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to spend a great amount of time advocating the acceptance of this bill because it is completely obvious that it needs to be amended for the reasons I have suggested, but I hope if the government is not prepared to accept this amendment today it will at least be prepared to refer the subject matter to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, so that it can be considered at the same time as that portion of Bill C-120 which relates to railway line abandonment.

I could spend some considerable time outlining the history of this licensing practice, and give many examples of the beneficial results of off-track storage, particularly in the early 1950's, but I am not as interested in what has happened regarding these elevators in the past as I am in what may happen in the future. I know that the three western wheat pools and some of the line elevator companies have advanced as one of their arguments against the abandonment of any branch lines this particular section of the act which would in fact mean the revoking of their licences if the lines were abandoned. However, I am one of those who believe that while we cannot have wholesale abandonment of railway lines we must face up to the fact that some of them are not being used for any other purpose than to haul a very small amount of grain. If we want to be practical and realistic we have to recognize that some of these lines are going to be abandoned because they are not being used for hauling l.c.l. or local freight any more, or for passenger service or for carrying the mail. Therefore it just does not make common sense to maintain them for the hauling of a very small amount of grain.

Before anyone misunderstands me let me say that this applies to a very few railway lines, and the argument I am trying to make is that even though those railway lines are rolled up and abandoned the elevators now situated in some of these small towns could serve a very useful purpose if the board of grain commissioners would license them. The grain could then be transported by motor truck to the nearest railway line where it could then be moved to an export position or in some cases to flour mills or places where other types of processing of grain are carried on.

That is all I want to say about the matter. The bill is very simple and is almost self-explanatory. Its passage would serve a very useful purpose from the point of view of some of our communities in western Canada.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-70, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act, off-track elevator licensing, has been introduced by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) and I believe it received first reading last February. I think it deserves a certain amount of commendation and has a certain amount of merit, but there are some facts I should like to put on the record.

The bill concerns the definition of a grain elevator which, according to the board of grain commissioners' interpretation of the Canada Grain Act must, for the purposes of the act, be a structure situated on a live railway line where it can be serviced by rail cars, or a structure situated on the waterfront where it can be serviced by vessels. The bill would change the act so that there would not be a restriction to servicing by railway cars or vessels. In other words, grain could be shipped out by truck without a special permit from the board.

However, the definition envisaged in Bill No. C-70 is much too loose and would permit the unrestricted licensing of any storage space at all, from curling rinks or churches to farm storage bins, with a consequent loss of control by the board of grain commissioners and by the Canadian wheat board. Moreover, it is premature in that the effects of the branch line rationalization program cannot be known for some time yet, and indeed it may never be necessary to go as far as amending the Canada Grain Act in order to accommodate the few elevators which it may be expedient to retain on abandoned lines. The situation has not had time to crystallize yet, so that no one really knows whether or not it is an urgent matter. Meanwhile, as long as there is enough flexibility in the Canada Grain Act to permit the continued operation of grain elevators on abandoned railway lines, although restricted to shipping out only, no urgent problem exists.

The board of grain commissioners does continue to license elevators situated on abandoned lines under an agreement with the Canadian wheat board whereby the elevators may stay open for shipping out grain but, as I said earlier, they are not permitted to receive grain once the line is closed. There are currently 29 such licences in force and the quantity of grain involved is approximately one million bushels.

There are two country elevators that are fully licensed despite the fact they have never been situated on a railway line. One is at Olds, Alberta, and the other is at Makwa in northwestern Saskatchewan. The latter was erected and licensed in the expectation that the railway line was to be built, but this never happened. Producers who deliver to that point now pay 5 cents per bushel extra to have their grain trucked to the railhead. However, these are the exceptions. For those elevators not yet closed which are situated on an abandoned rail line the board of grain commissioners continues a restricted licensing but would not, of course, permit the construction of additions to them and does keep these licences under continual review.

By and large the Canadian grain marketing and handling system was well designed for the purpose of facilitating the export movement of grain and there is no reason for it to be altered now. Accordingly grain should not be stored in any facility where it is not readily accessible for shipment when it is required. Furthermore, experience has shown that grain stored at off-rail sites deteriorates more readily than does grain in elevators where it can be turned over more frequently.

This question has been discussed with the grain handling organizations and they are in full agreement that the effect which the passage of Bill No. C-70 would have on our grain collection system would not be in the best interests of western grain growers. There is a school of thought among the grain handling people that our country elevator system has been overexpanded. Some firms are known to be eagerly looking forward to the day when certain branch lines will be closed because they will then have an acceptable reason for closing down elevators where they consistently lose money.

Because of the Crowsnest pass freight rates and our egalitarian delivery quota system, our country elevator set-up will probably continue in its present general pattern rather than move to the type of elevator system that we see in the United States. Nevertheless some improvements can be carried out that would lead to a more efficient operation and so allow Canadian grain to remain competitive in world markets. It seems to me that the dropping off of the high cost elevators along uneconomic branch lines will help us to do that. The implementation of the idea inherent in Bill No. C-70 would effectively prevent the desired improved efficiency. Consequently I cannot support the bill.

The overexpansion of our country elevator system has generated a progressive rise in both direct and indirect operating costs related to this overbuilt position, and has resulted in a total cost of operations which may well be in excess of the level that the Canadian grain system can bear if it is to remain competitive. It has been suggested that the prairie grain collection system now comprises too many, too small elevators at too many delivery points. The system now consists of 5,187 separately licensed elevators located at about 2,000 separate shipping points.

The licensed capacity totals 370 million bushels. These levels are fairly representative of the situation that has prevailed over the past six or seven years. Prior to 1940, the country elevator capacity was stable at about 200 million bushels, distributed amongst 5,600 elevators. During the war the construction of temporary annex structures and enlargements of existing elevators brought the total country capacity to 310 million bushels.

After the war the temporary storage was progressively cut back so that by 1952 the post-war low point of 293 million bushels was reached. The number of elevators totalled 5,430. The high level of crops in 1951 and 1952 reversed the trend and by 1957 a level of 371 million bushels of space was available in country elevators and special annexes, the latter including non-elevator structures such as rinks and airplane hangars. Since then this temporary storage has been progressively eliminated.

Such capacity is not at all desirable for reasons already given, and it would seem that permitting the storage of grain in elevators on abandoned rail lines is in the same category as storing it in these temporary structures.

Another factor to bear in mind is the size of the box car fleet which must, as a matter of course, be related to the size of the country elevator system. With fewer elevators and the same number of box cars, efficiency is automatically increased because the throughput is increased; that is, the ratio of the volume of grain moved to the storage capacity is higher. At the same time, the box cars become available more quickly and the whole grain flow is speeded up. With an adequate box car supply each country elevator can turn over its capacity four or five times per year with little difficulty. Only at that rate, as a minimum, can grain handling through a country elevator be made to pay. Because of the overexpansion, very few elevators have such a turnover and this indicates why some companies eagerly await an opportunity to close down some elevators.

It has been estimated that a country elevator system of 250 million bushels capacity, consisting of modern, properly located plants, is ample to handle marketings of 700 million bushels or more per year. If this is so, then the loss of elevators on abandoned lines will not be felt in the over-all grain movement picture. Indeed, to keep them open and transfer the grain to an elevator on a live line by truck would be a self-defeating act because of the added expense.

Mr. Olson: I wonder if I could ask the hon. member one question?

Mr. Whelan: Yes.

Mr. Olson: Does he not think there are other qualifications and specifications that could be applied in considering whether or not an elevator should have a licence, other than the fact that a railway line runs alongside of it?

Mr. Whelan: I said that I thought the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) had a certain amount of merit and I think it warrants some definite consideration. The fact that an elevator may not be located on a railroad line deserves some definite consideration when it comes to licensing. However, the potential of the area and the history of it should be considered in connection with licensing. If my words were interpreted in the manner the hon. member suggests, I certainly did not intend to give that impression.

Mr. Olson: Then, why are you opposing the bill?

Mr. J. H. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I find myself wholly in agreement with the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), the sponsor of the bill. Actually, Bill No. C-70 will have a direct effect on the grain marketing industry in the years ahead, even if rail line abandonment does not reach the huge proportions the railways would like to see it reach. Actually, what the bill does is to leave out five or six words that are in the act to the effect that such an elevator must discharge grain directly into railway cars or vessels.

As the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan) pointed out, few off-track elevators are licensed. The hon. member for Essex South showed some ignorance of the grain handling facilities when he said that a 250 million bushel capacity would handle a 700 million bushel crop. Where would the extra grain be stored? It would be stored on the farms. Any farmer will tell you that one only has to go back to the fifties to find that it was obvious that farm stored grain, while it was like money in the bank, did cause many farmers to sell their grain at what one might call depressed prices. If they had only waited, they would have obtained the wheat board price for it. If the amount of storage space available for grain were cut down, this would be a retrograde step. Actually this would happen if rail line abandonment were given effect to the extent the railways want it, and if the grain act were not amended to allow off-track elevators to be licensed.

Some years ago in Winnipeg the chairman of the Canadian National made a speech about grain handling. He suggested that the elevator companies, the railroads and the farmers, the people concerned, should get together and study the grain handling facilities. He felt that 100,000 bushels of grain could be moved 50 miles on either side of the main line easier by truck than it is moved now by rail. Many of these lines could be abandoned and the grain could be moved by truck. He did not go so far as to suggest that the farmers should be moving the grain themselves that extra 50 miles, but he did suggest that the three parties concerned should get together and perhaps a trucking fleet could be devised to move the grain. If this is true, then surely off-track elevators should be licensed.

As I say, the hon. member for Essex South thought there was enough storage capacity and that the elevator grain system was now over-extended. This was not true a few years ago when the box car commission investigated grain handling facilities and grain storage capacity on the prairies. This was not the situation when we had to institute cash advances on farm stored grain. Certainly we must proceed and let experience be our guide. Experience with grain handling facilities does not suggest that grain storage capacity is necessarily overextended. It does not suggest, to me at least, that a 250 million bushel capacity can handle a 700 million bushel crop year in and year out without putting an added burden on the farmers. They are the ones who would have to store the grain.

The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp) well knows the difficulties experienced in the middle fifties with regard to farm stored grain. They tried making payments on it in one form or another in an effort to compensate for what we might call this underdeveloped grain storage system. When we are discussing this bill, we are not saying that we should go back to the middle fifties and license all the community curling rinks, skating rinks or abandoned airplane hangars for the handling of grain. We are saying that an elevator should be able to obtain a licence to handle and store grain on wheat board storage tickets, but it should be an elevator, not a skating rink or a curling rink. An elevator has facilities to move grain and turn it. The only reason grain could not be kept in other storage is that it cannot be turned if it is slightly heated or if mice and termites get into it. Therefore there is no reason why an elevator could not be chosen as a good storage place, no matter whether it is sitting beside a railroad or 15 miles away from one.

As the hon. member for Medicine Hat pointed out so aptly, there are many other specifications to be taken into consideration. This bill may not be passed today but it will certainly be considered when the railway committee studies Bill C-120.

The railroads propose to abandon 4,000 miles of track in the prairie provinces and this might envision the abandonment of 700, 800 or possibly 1,000 elevators. What will happen then if, as Mr. Gordon says, grain can be moved cheaper by truck over short disances? Why shouldn't elevators on abandoned railway lines be allowed to continue in business? As road networks improve trucks will be able to handle the grain.

Although he did not say so, Mr. Gordon may prefer to use a fleet of trucks rather than a diesel locomotive. In fact the railways are fast moving into the trucking field. Perhaps this is what he envisions when he says a whole new grain transportation system should be devised.

Mr. Sharp: I was very interested in the comments the hon. member was making but I wonder is he satisfied that Bill C-70 would achieve what he is speaking of now? Would not this seem to open the way for the licensing of almost any premises?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sure that before any premises is licensed—

Mr. Tardif: Did you read the bill?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I have the grain act before me and I have read it several times during the past six or seven years. I also read the bill. Surely the board of grain commissioners do not license any elevator alongside a railway line. It has to be open for public business. A farmer cannot buy an elevator alongside a railway track and keep it for his own business. It has to be open for public business before it can be licensed. Therefore the reverse is directly true. If an elevator is alongside a railway track it does not automatically receive a licence, and neither does it automatically receive a licence if it is not alongside a railway track.

A curling rink would not qualify under any definition as an elevator. I remember when curling and skating rinks were allowed to store grain but they were not covered by separate licences. It was merely the case of an extension of an elevator company's licence permitting it to store grain in an off-site storage place. When this was done away with I questioned the wheat board on it when its representatives appeared before the agriculture committee the following year, and they pointed out that it was eliminated because there were no turning facilities in such places.

I do not intend to discuss the bill at length but I know provision will have to be made for off-site storage if the railways proceed with the abandonment of 4,000 miles of track in the prairie provinces.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to go on record as being opposed to Bill C-70, but I would like answers to a number of questions. For that reason I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson), that the bill be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, is a good one.

If railway abandonment is proceeded with and these off-track elevators are licensed to accept grain I would like to know at whose expense will the grain then be moved to railway elevators? Will it be at the expense of the farmers or of the railways? If it is at the farmers' expense, then many of the benefits they receive under the Crowsnest pass agreement will disappear. Further, if railway abandonment goes through, I would like to know how many of these elevators will be licensed? Will all the elevators that are at present alongside railway tracks be licensed?

If railway abandonment is proceeded with, then instead of licensing many of these elevators I think the government should give serious consideration to having government terminals built on those lines which will not be abandoned, so that if the farmers have to haul 40 or 50 miles to these terminals there will nevertheless be money saved because these terminals will deliver grain to the ports, Vancouver or Hudson bay, but not at the farmers' expense.

I think the minister should give careful consideration to having this bill referred to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. I do not believe it should be talked out. Representatives of the board of grain commisioners or of the Canadian wheat board could appear before the committee and give evidence as to the likely effect if off-track elevator storage were licensed. I know this is a matter of great concern to the prairies where thousands of miles of track will be abandoned. Farmers who had to haul their grain only five or ten miles will be obliged to haul it 50 or 60 miles to the elevators, and this will be an expensive business. If these elevators which are on the lines to be abandoned would accept the grain, and if the government, or the crown companies, were to be responsible for moving it to the nearest station where it could be loaded into boxcars, it would be a different story altogether. If there is merit in the bill now before us, I think it is up to the government to allow the farmers to benefit from its provisions by referring the measure to the committee as I have suggested.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): The mover of this bill, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson) is to be congratulated on adopting this means of calling attention to a problem. I know that as an experienced parliamentarian he is well aware of what a private member's bill can realistically be expected to do in the hour which is set aside for us here. I think the intention of the bill is to call attention clearly to a problem which has to be thought through, namely what would be the effect of branch line rationalization on the elevators which are bound to be affected and upon our storage program.

I have followed this debate with great interest. I especially enjoyed the brilliant contribution made by my hon. friend from Essex South (Mr. Whelan). I also enjoyed the contribution made by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Horner) whose talents I have always admired. I must say he was lacking something in fire and volume this afternoon, but I think it was very considerate of him, especially on a Friday afternoon when the house has some difficulty in maintaining its numbers, to choose to assist us. I can well recall his contributions to our debates on previous occasions and I will always remember his speech in this chamber during the flag debate, along with that of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis).

The difficulty which this bill was designed to cover is the problem which will arise with respect to elevators along railway lines which will be abandoned. My hon. friend from Essex South made a good point when he said we had to think of a desirable volume in a country elevator system in relation to an expected volume of export business. We must realize that the whole purpose is to keep our system of grain marketing competitive, and in order to do this we must see that the storage facilities are situated at points where there are no unnecessary additional trucking or related charges—points where the grain can be turned over properly and where the marketing board can maintain proper control. They must be close to transportation facilities and so on.

It seems to me there is a major line of criticism which could be directed at the bill before us. Basically, as I have suggested, a bill of this nature serves an educational purpose; it calls a problem to our attention and offers a possible solution. The difficulties which may still exist can then be examined in the course of public debate, and possibly some other line of attack on the problem can be found.

The concern I had on reading this bill arises from the definition of "elevator". The definition presently reads as follows:

> "elevator" means any premises into which western grain may be received, or out of which it may be discharged directly from or into railway cars or vessels—

It seems to me by eliminating the phrase "directly from or into railway cars or vessels" one leaves the definition very loose indeed. The possibility of using any type of storage space is opened up, whether it be an abandoned aircraft hangar, an abandoned community skating rink or storage space in general—space which may not be a desirable location for the storage of grain.

I am told, although this is a field with which I am not as familiar as I should like to be, that grain in storage has to be turned over regularly, that we cannot be haphazard about these things and that control over conditions of storage is most important, especially when grain is intended for export. There is no doubt that the elevators system has to be examined. Canada must develop the most effective facilities in order that our export business may be conducted with the minimum delay and the maximum efficiency. Any amendment to the legislation which would have the effect of worsening our storage facilities by creating too loose a definition should not be undertaken lightly by this house, especially if it were likely to remove some of the tools now at the disposal of the marketing board for controlling the quality and nature of our storage facilities.

I think the fate of a measure of this kind should be as follows. The question is a large one and it deserves the attention of more hon. members than are present this afternoon. It should be up for debate again, at which time there might possibly be a correction in the definition which would meet the deficiencies which have been pointed out in the course of this debate.

The hon. member could introduce it again. By the force of compelling public debate which has brought attention to the problem an examination will take place, not only in this house and the press of the land but among those who examine public problems and try to resolve them in the most satisfactory manner. Attention will also be focused upon it within the department. Certainly the problem is there. We are going to undertake a program of abandonment of certain branch lines in the process of the rationalization of our railway system in western Canada. Legislation in this respect has been placed in general form before the house and it will be discussed and debated at great length. The final impact of the program is not yet clear.

When we have taken that step we shall have to look at the elevators program at the same time. I think the hon. member who moved the bill has shown commendable foresight in calling attention to the problem, doing so in a timely way and according to the established procedures of the house. I think it illustrates the proper use of private members' hour. I know the hon. member who moved the bill is a little more sophisticated and knowledgeable than some hon. members of the house, not of his group but who sit near him, who seem to take a very liberal approach to the problem of private members' bills and who think that every private member's bill should be voted on, except the ones they choose to talk out. These members have chosen to talk out, for example, the Bell Telephone Company bill on a number of occasions. They have asked that other bills be voted on as a principle of reform in this house. I realize the hon. member who moved this bill recognizes the fundamental educational purpose served by debate on a measure of this type. The problem receives proper and careful attention as a result of the kind of debate which this house is undertaking. This is one of the best and the most laudable purposes of the use of this hour, which is set aside from the government business in this house.

I can only conclude, reluctantly, Mr. Speaker, that in its present form this bill does not appear to meet the requirements of the definition of an elevator which would permit the authorities charged with the marketing of grain to have the kind of discrimination they must have to build up a rational and efficient system of grain elevator marketing. If the bill has this serious defect, as I believe it has, I should not like to vote against it, although if compelled to do so I would have to vote against the bill in its present form. But I think the purpose of this bill can be achieved as a result of the debate which has taken place. The hon. member should look at it again, consider a modification in the wording, and then once again bring the matter before the house for reconsideration.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I do not represent an agricultural constituency but I have listened with a great deal of interest to all the statements from both sides of the house made since five o'clock on Bill No. C-70. There has not been one member who has highly commended the hon. member who introduced this bill. There has not been one member who has not pointed out that there is a problem here which should be considered. Some technical objections have been raised but I do not think they are of sufficient importance to override or overbalance the fact that everyone is in agreement with the hon. member, who has introduced a subject which is worthy of further study.

That being so, Mr. Speaker, and because I think all are in agreement that the bill should not be talked out, I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That Bill No. C-70, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act (off-track elevator licensing) be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for study and report.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is unusual for a minister to take part in the debate on a private member's bill of this kind, but in view of the motion which has just been moved I thought I should say a few words.

I, as a member of this house, should like to consider a little more carefully the implications of the motion which has been made to refer the subject matter of this bill to a committee. As several hon. members have said—and I am very happy to join with them this bill does relate to a problem of some importance; at least it can be so construed. I share the doubts of some of the members who have spoken as to whether the bill does in fact deal directly with the problem which is in the mind of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Olson).

Mr. Winch: For "study and report", by the committee.

Mr. Sharp: Yes. Perhaps I should say on behalf of the government that the government very well understands the problem, and while the hon. gentleman has brought the matter before the house in the form of this bill it is a problem which is engaging the attention of the government in connection not only with the program of rail line rationalization, which will be proceeding in due course, but also in connection with all the ancillary changes which have to be made in the handling of grain.

Therefore I am a little reluctant to see this motion which has been put before the house decided today. I think we ought to look a little more carefully at the subject. I should like to look carefully at the bill myself before deciding whether it is the most useful way to bring the matter before the committee of this house or to have it decided by the house itself.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business has expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did ask at five o'clock about the business but was told that I could not get an answer until six. Can we now be told what the program will be for Monday, and if possible for as much of next week as possible.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to give the business for the first couple of days of next week in any event. Although I was not in the house earlier today at one o'clock when the committee stage of the redistribution bill was completed, it is my understanding that there were certain amendments to the bill this morning and that third reading of the bill was held over in order to have these amendments printed in the bill. On the assumption that third reading will be only a formality I propose calling third reading of that bill first thing on Monday. If it is not to be merely a formality I expect to be aware of that fact before the house opens on Monday.

I am happy to report that there is agreement among the parties to give second reading to the Canada pension plan bill in order that it may be sent to a committee before the conclusion of the sitting on Wednesday at six o'clock. In order that we have a committee to which we can refer that bill it would be convenient to adopt the motion, which is item No. 17 on today's order paper, for the establishment of that committee on Monday before second reading. When that motion is passed, and I assume it is a mere formality, we will then call second reading of the Canada pension plan bill and continue our consideration in that regard until second reading has been given, with the understanding that that will take place not later than Wednesday.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, the house leader has shown a high degree of optimism in assuming that any motion for third reading, or for the setting up of a committee will be a mere formality. I trust that that may be true, but I do not know who could be sure of that in this house as it is now constituted. Nevertheless, as far as we in the opposition are concerned, we will co-operate with the house leader to make sure that we can proceed with the business of the house.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, November 16, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ALASKA HIGHWAY—STUDY RESPECTING RECONSTRUCTION AND PAVING COSTS

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, as the house is already aware, the Department of Public Works is carrying out an engineering study to determine the cost of reconstructing and paving the Canadian section of the Alaska highway, and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources is conducting an economic study to establish the benefits which would accrue to Canada as a result of this construction if it were undertaken.

Hon. members will be interested to know that the above studies are progressing, and for these it is now necessary to ascertain more precisely the design standards on which estimates of construction costs will be based and to obtain more detailed information about related engineering aspects. For this purpose there will shortly be technical talks between Canadian and United States officials. These talks will be without reference to possible means of financing.

Officials of the government of British Columbia and of the territorial government of the Yukon are being invited to participate in these talks and to have prior discussions with the federal officials. The question of paving the portion of the Alaska highway which lies in Canada, and of any negotiations with the United States government on the matter, remains open. Before any decision can be made it will be necessary to have more information regarding the cost of reconstruction, relocation and paving of the highway and regarding the economic benefits to Canada. A tentative date for talks with British Columbia and the Yukon is December 3, 1964, and with the United States, December 4.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, if I may comment briefly on the minister's statement may I say I am sure that members of the house, particularly those from the provinces of Alberta and British Columbia and, of course, the northern areas will especially welcome the minister's announcement. We have been waiting for some time for this development to occur, and while I for one am disappointed that the talks will not include the subject of cost sharing, nevertheless the talks will no doubt be fruitful.

As the minister is well aware, there are two bills pending before the United States Senate and House of Representatives which suggest that the United States undertake half the cost of reconstructing and paving the Alaska highway. I suggest that perhaps it would be useful to include a discussion of the financial and cost sharing implications of the paving and reconstruction of the highway, particularly since over half of the highway, 657 miles, is in the province of British Columbia. With the energy, ambitions and convictions of the premier of British Columbia I am sure he would be only too happy to enter into any cost sharing arrangement with the federal government and the government of the United States for the paving of the highway. My own suggestion has been for some time that the United States should bear half the cost, British Columbia should bear one third of the cost and the federal government should bear one third of the cost.

An hon. Member: What arithmetic.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry; the United States should bear one half of the cost, the federal government one quarter and British Columbia one quarter. I was quoting Social Credit theory, as one member suggests.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: I really do suggest to the minister that these cost sharing talks should be beneficial. I am sure we are all extremely happy to hear that progress is finally being made and that concrete talks are going to be held with regard to paving this very vital artery through the Yukon to Alaska.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): We do welcome the report that has been given to us by the minister today. We hope, however, that emphasis will continue to be put on getting those sections of the highway paved that fall within the alignment on the official survey. This, of course, would greatly assist in the time that is going to elapse between the total paving of the highway and the time some of this work can be accomplished. If the amount of paving that can be done is brought forward immediately, it will be of great help to the Yukon and to Alaska. I hope the minister will continue to study this angle so that as much paving as can be readily done in certain spots will be done. This, I am sure, will meet with the approval of the people of British Columbia and the Yukon.

In so far as Social Credit policies are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the remarks and the laughter indicate just about how much the people of this country do understand Social Credit.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources based on his announcement today concerning the talks that will be proceeding with the three governments mentioned. Since there are two other very important matters that can be usefully discussed, I wonder whether the minister would consider suggesting to the governments concerned the inclusion in these talks of the recently discovered Tarr inlet as a tidewater port in the Yukon and the construction of the Skagway road, since they concern all three governments?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, our latest information on the so-called Tarr inlet harbour area is rather discouraging. These other matters may come up when the governments get together. However, the technical discussions to which I referred, will concern themselves essentially with the Alaska highway.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FREE MEDICAL AND HOSPITAL SERVICES TO OLD AGE PENSIONERS AT 65

Question No. 2,001—Mr. Mather:

Has the national pensioners and senior citizens federation requested that free medical and hospital services be extended to persons entitled to an old age pension at age 65 and, if so, what consideration is being given to this request?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Reference to this matter was contained in one of a number of resolutions set forth in a copy of a report of a recent meeting of the national pensioners and senior citizens federation addressed to the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and members of the federal parliament.

Old age assistance is provided at age 65 to persons who fulfil the requirements of the Old Age Assistance Act and regulations. As the provinces administer and share the cost of old age assistance, any supplementary benefits for recipients involving the expenditure of provincial funds would require consideration by provincial authorities.

ROYAL COMMISSIONS SET UP AT PROVINCIAL REQUEST

Question No. 2,039—Mr. Laprise:

1. How many royal commissions have been set up at the request of the governments of each of the provinces since 1957 and what are they?

3. Which of these commissions have still to report and when are they expected to do so?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. Suggestions for the appointment of a commission of inquiry may originate in many ways and often come from a number of sources during consideration of the matter by the federal government. Consequently, while provincial governments have, on occasion, expressed views about the need for various inquiries, it is not possible to say that any royal commission has been established specifically at the request of any particular provincial government since 1957.

2. If not, why was such an investigation not instituted?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. No formal inquiry was instituted under the Combines Investigation Act.

2. In his annual report for the year ended March 31, 1964, at pages 36-38, the director of investigation and research under the Combines Investigation Act reported that because of public concern regarding the high level of sugar prices and fluctuations in the price of this commodity, the domestic sugar industry was subjected to very close scrutiny to determine whether there was any cause for inquiry under the act. He stated that his assessment of the situation, based on the information available, was that the price behaviour of the industry and other factors known to the combines branch did not disclose the likelihood that evidence of an offence would be forthcoming and that, therefore, he did not have proper grounds for undertaking a formal inquiry under section 8 of the act. The director also stated the industry would continue to be the subject of close surveillance by the combines branch.

7. Has Air Canada flight 259 been rescheduled 40 minutes earlier and, if so, for what reasons?

8. Has Air Canada flight 262 been rescheduled 35 minutes earlier and, if so, for what reasons?

9. Have Air Canada flights 354 and 356 been cancelled and, if so, for what reasons?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Trans-Canada Air Lines advise as follows:

Parts 1 to 9—Air traffic volume in the winter months is traditionally less than the preceding summer, necessitating cut-back in schedules on certain routes.

The various flights mentioned were rescheduled when winter schedules became effective October 25. The reason for minor changes in time was to maintain connections with other flights, or due to economical utilization of aircraft or ramp staff at the terminals Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

To improve passenger service between Toronto and Ottawa, Viscount flights 354 and 356 were replaced by Vanguard flight 672. From Ottawa to Toronto, Viscount flights 237 and 307 were replaced by Vanguard flight 671.

Question No. 2,288—Mr. MacRae:

1. What is the number of aircraft now owned by Air Canada?

2. What are the different types and what is the value of these aircraft?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Trans-Canada Air Lines advise as follows:

1. Eighty aircraft.

2. Forty one Viscounts; 23 Vanguards; 16 DC-8's.

Aggregate cost, $217,411,000; depreciated value as at October 31, 1964, $145,329,000.

STUDENT LOANS FUND, P.E.I.

Question No. 2,290—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What was the amount made available to the province of Prince Edward Island under the student loans fund?

2. Have representations been received from the government of Prince Edward Island for an increase in this amount and, if so, what response did they elicit?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The provincial allocation of Prince Edward Island under the Canada Student Loans Act for the loan year ending June 30, 1965, is $232,000.

2. There has been liaison on this and other matters between federal and provincial officials. No representations, however, have been received from the government of Prince Edward Island.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN ATTITUDE TOWARD SO-CALLED RESCUE FUND

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be directed to the Prime Minister as it covers the activities of a number of departments. Considering the impending crisis in the United Nations, is the Prime Minister in a position to say whether Canada is one of the four nations which are engaged in an endeavour to bring about the collection of a rescue fund made up of contributions from the 112 members of the United Nations? As the Prime Minister knows, this initiative was launched by the former president of the United Nations in 1963.

Is Canada participating in this, and what is our country's attitude in relation to this matter and its possible acceptance as a solution for the serious results that would follow should the U.S.S.R. fail to pay the sum of $53 million that it is in default?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the four members of the United Nations which held these talks were non-permanent members of the security council and, as my right hon. friend knows, Canada was not one of them. However, we have been kept informed of these talks through a discussion we had with the foreign minister of Norway, who was here last week and who represents one of the four. We have also been kept informed in other ways, and we are doing what we can to assist in working out an arrangement by which the charter will be observed. We are endeavouring to avoid a direct confrontation on this matter, but in a form which will insist on charter observance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that form comprehend the acceptance of a rescue fund, as it has been described, to be provided by the various members of the United Nations through voluntary contributions? Also, when the Prime Minister is replying would he tell us the four non-permanent members of the security council which belong to this group?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the so-called rescue fund was one element put forward in the negotiations as a way out of this difficulty, but it was only one element. Other proposals have been made, but it is difficult for me to go into them in detail because the negotiations are continuing. I am not aware of the identity of the four non-permanent members involved in the discussions. I know Norway was one, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs might brief me as to the other three. I think Nigeria was one, and if the Secretary of State for External Affairs would speak a little louder I could give the other two.

DISARMAMENT—PROPOSAL RESPECTING ARCTIC AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has his attention been drawn to the suggestion made by the United States and Russian scientists, Drs. Rich and Vinogradov, regarding a three step disarmament proposal for the Arctic area modelled on the Antarctic treaty? In view of the fact that this will eventually affect Alaska, Siberia, Greenland, Canada and areas of Norway and Sweden, has the Canadian government any statement to make regarding its reaction to this proposal?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the proposal to which my hon. friend draws my attention was put forward privately by a Soviet and a United States scientist in the current issue of a United States scientific journal. We are interested in this proposal and are studying it. Disarmament proposals embracing the Arctic region, mainly in the context of aerial inspection and other measures aimed at inhibiting surprise attack, have a long history dating back to the post-war disarmament discussions. My hon. friend will remember that Canada was a very active participant in those discussions.

Mr. Douglas: After the Canadian government has had an opportunity of studying these proposals, is it its intention to make recommendations or advances either to the government of the United States or the government of the Soviet union with a view to bringing them together for a discussion of these proposals?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If these proposals commend themselves to us we will take the opportunity to bring them to the attention of all interested parties.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Minister of National Defence or to the Minister of Industry. My question relates to a labour dispute between Canadian Aviation Electronics, Winnipeg, and the united automobile workers. I recognize that the labour dispute itself comes under provincial jurisdiction, but in view of the fact that the Royal Canadian Air Force has been a principal customer of this firm, and in view of the co-operation which the R.C.A.F. itself has given, would the government use its good offices to try to persuade the firm to sit down with labour and discuss the matter?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): I was not aware of this, but I will consult with my colleague the Minister of Labour and see what can be done.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in view of reports which are circulating in Ottawa, I am wondering whether Your Honour has any information to give other members of this house to the effect that the members of the Créditiste party are boycotting the debate on the Canadian pension plan by not appearing at all at this sitting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PUBLIC HEARINGS OF COMMISSION ON RUN-THROUGHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport regarding the railway run-through in Saskatchewan. Does the minister intend to hold hearings in towns which are affected by this run-through when the commission is set up?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think that question would be more properly directed to my colleague the Minister of Labour, but I did read in the press, as no doubt the hon. gentleman did, that there were to be hearings in certain of these places.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Cooper: A supplementary question. Could I have an assurance that since Biggar is more affected than almost any town between Saskatoon and Edmonton, there will be a hearing held in Biggar, Saskatchewan?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): The question of the location of hearings is in the hands of Mr. Justice Freedman, who I am sure would listen to any representations made to him from these communities with regard to the hearings.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—WINTER USE BY RUSSIAN SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Lloyd (Halifax): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Press reports indicate that the fleet of icebreaker-ice reinforced cargo ships scheduled for winter service on the St. Lawrence river to Montreal will be augmented this winter by Russian cargo carriers. Will the minister inform the house whether the government is considering any measures to maintain and equalize the competitive position of the ports of Halifax and Saint John in view of the increasing use of Montreal as a winter port?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I have heard reports that these Soviet ships are to attempt to come up the St. Lawrence during the winter time, but no exceptional steps will be taken as far as icebreaking is concerned.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Will the minister give every assurance that there will be no assistance whatever to these Russian ships?

Mr. Pickersgill: It is possible, of course, that a ship might be in distress. Recalling some of the interventions of the hon. gentleman on previous occasions I would be very hesitant about giving any blanket undertaking of that sort. But, as I told the hon. member for Halifax, no measures which would not be taken in the ordinary normal course will be taken as a result of this attempted passage.

Mr. Lloyd: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Canada has a substantial investment in port facilities in Halifax and Saint John, will the impact of these developments on the revenues and investments of Canada be considered by the government?

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Pickersgill: They certainly will be, Mr. Speaker; and, as the hon. member knows, we are conducting a very intensive study at the present moment of means of developing further the use of the ports of Halifax and Saint John.

Mr. Fisher: And Montreal.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—DISPOSITION OF BAIL FORFEITED

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Paul (Berthier-Maskinongé-Delanaudière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Can he tell us whether an agreement took place between the department of the attorney general of the province of Quebec and his own department as to the appropriation of Hal Banks' $25,000 bail? If so, what was that agreement?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to answer that question today, but I will inquire from my officials and I will answer it tomorrow.

[Text]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the national press stories in connection with Hal Banks, the S.I.U. and Liberal members, particularly a story not related to the S.I.U. but one appearing in the Toronto Star of November 13 in connection with the administration of the R.C.M.P. in Quebec, would the minister not assure the house that he will cause his estimates to be brought before us at the earliest possible moment so that all these matters can be carefully looked into by the committee?

Mr. Favreau: Of course, Mr. Speaker, my estimates will be brought in as soon as possible, but this is a matter of the business to be called by the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago the Minister of Justice said that as soon as he found out where Mr. Banks was he would let the house know, as I recall it. Has he any information yet that he is in the United States?

Mr. Pearson: He may have left.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No official information.

AGRICULTURE

AID TO FARMERS SELLING CATTLE BECAUSE OF DROUGHT CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question but, in his absence I shall put it to the Minister of Forestry who is responsible for eastern agriculture.

Could the minister tell us what steps the government intends to take to assist Ottawa valley farmers who are now forced to get rid of their cattle owing to the shortage of water and fodder?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, that matter comes under the Quebec minister of agriculture. If the province wishes to call upon Ottawa, we shall be glad to help.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Can the minister tell us whether or not such a call has been made and if he is aware of the present crisis?

Mr. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, since none were made in previous cases, I doubt that there was a call this time.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister in view of the fact the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue did not obtain a satisfactory reply from the Minister of Agriculture.

I am referring to the drought which is forcing farmers to sell their cattle, as reported in today's newspaper, and I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will look into this very serious situation; because if these farmers are forced to sell their cattle at this time it will force the cattle market across Canada to an even lower level with a resulting adverse effect on the economy of this country.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to look into this matter.

BRIDGES

JACQUES CARTIER BRIDGE, MONTREAL—AGREEMENT RESPECTING SALE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport?

I should like to ask him whether the government of the province of Quebec has entered into an agreement with the federal government for the purpose of acquiring the Jacques Cartier bridge in Montreal?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, an agreement in principle was made between the previous administration and the government of Quebec, but the details have not all been settled yet and the matter is still under discussion.

CROWN ASSETS

SASKATOON, SASK.—DISPOSAL OF LAND AND HOUSING UNITS AT R.C.A.F. BASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry. It has to do with the advertisement inserted in the press by Crown Assets Disposal Corporation regarding the disposal of 48 acres of land and 162 housing units in the former air force base at Saskatoon. The call for bids, or offers, expires today. I want to ask the minister whether there have been any negotiations with the city of Saskatoon for the disposal of these buildings, particularly in view of the fact that the municipal services for this area are supplied by the city of Saskatoon even though it is not located within the boundaries of that city.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, in disposing of surplus assets of the crown, Crown Assets Disposal Corporation acts as trustee of the assets for the government and the taxpayers of Canada, and with regard to any disposal is obviously required to get as fair a price as it can.

In pursuit of this aim it will offer the right of first refusal at the fair market price to the government of the province in which the assets are located. If the provincial government has no interest, then the right of first refusal will go to the municipality in which the assets are situated. If the municipality has no interest, then the assets will be offered at public auction.

In the present case the housing project is located entirely within the municipality of Cory. The municipality of Cory does not wish to purchase these assets at the fair market price, consequently they are to be put up for sale at public auction. If the city of Saskatoon has an interest in these assets it will be free to bid, like any other bidder.

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question. May I ask the minister what will happen if private interests are the highest bidders and consequently acquire this property; because the municipality of Cory within which these assets are located could not possibly service this area, and the city of Saskatoon may refuse to do so? That is the position in which the government has put the entire housing unit.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, presumably a private purchaser, before making a bid and entering into ownership, would make sure that whoever is concerned, either the officials of the municipality of Cory or of Saskatoon, will provide services.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask whether any such arrangement has been entered into with the city of Saskatoon?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, we have not got the names of the bidders as yet, so I am unable to answer as to whether any arrangements have been made.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING DESIGNATED AREAS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Did he receive, from the minister of revenue of the province of Quebec, Mr. Kierans, suggestions or information concerning the districts in the province of Quebec which the latter would like to be designated for economic assistance, and when will those districts be announced publicly?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, discussions were held between officials of my department and officials of Mr. Kierans' department, during which information was exchanged, but no agreement has yet been reached.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, which question is related to the one I asked him a while ago. He said discussions have taken place between members of his department and those of the department of revenue for the province of Quebec and that they failed to reach an agreement. Will there be other discussions between the same parties with regard to designated areas?

Mr. Drury: Information has been exchanged, Mr. Speaker, and these exchanges will continue.

WATER RESOURCES

GRAND CANAL—INQUIRY AS TO FEASIBILITY STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister received a report of the meeting that was held in North Bay on Friday night in regard to the Grand canal proposal, and is he disposed to recommend that a feasibility survey be made of this important project, especially in view of the critical conditions existing in the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the government is fully aware of all the consequences of the low water levels of the great lakes. It is also aware of the number of cures that have been offered and, without indicating any agreement on the part of the government that the introduction of new water from outside would be satisfactory, we think that it is imperative that we make a complete study of the proposals which have been made. To that end we have approached the governments of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, suggesting to them that we should like to make studies as to feasibility of such a program. We have received a letter from the province of Ontario indicating that it would be glad to work with us in connection with the Ontario water resources division, and we have also received a tentative reply from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, can the minister indicate the nature of the tentative reply that has been received from the province of Quebec?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I can say that I think we will now be able to approach the province of Quebec with a more definitive statement as to what our proposals might be, and I look forward to receiving their co-operation. I hope that will be the case.

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—REPORTED RADIOACTIVE POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he is yet prepared to make a statement regarding the pollution of certain lakes by the waste from uranium processing. Since this matter was first raised in the house there have been press reports indicating that other lakes have also been contaminated. Is the Prime Minister ready to make a statement?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been as active as possible over the week end trying to get all the information available both on the provincial level where the primary responsibility and jurisdiction lie, and on the federal level, and I hope to be able to make a full statement in respect of the particular matter at Elliot Lake and vicinity and also in more general application either tomorrow or the next day.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): In that connection will the Prime Minister say whether any reports were received by the government regarding the waters in the Elliot Lake area from the atomic energy control board at any time in the last three months, pointing out that there was danger as a result of the pollution of these waters?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will be dealing with this matter in detail in my statement, and I hope to make that statement tomorrow.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the Prime Minister not in a position to say whether he had any reports from the atomic energy control board? Surely that is a matter upon which he should be able to give an immediate answer. If he had reports, it is strange that nothing was done.

Mr. Pearson: I am in a position to say that I have not received any reports, but I wish to go into the matter in further detail.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RETENTION OF MILITIA UNITS RECOMMENDED FOR DISBANDMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Will the minister tell me what steps are necessary to have a unit of the militia retained on the order of battle in spite of the fact the Suttie commission recommended that it be transferred to a supplementary order? I notice that the minister has had success in having the 40th medium artillery regiment, R.C.A., retained on the order of battle under the recommendation of the Department of National Defence. I should like to have the same information as to his method so I can relate it to the Toronto members on behalf of the Irish regiment and the Vancouver members on behalf of the Irish Fusiliers?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, the former minister of defence has made a speech, but I will make inquiries and suggest that his answer will be forthcoming in due course.

Mr. Nielsen: In whose riding is it located?

Mr. Churchill: I did not make a speech, Mr. Speaker; I asked a question. The artillery unit is located in Kenora.

May I ask the Minister of National Defence what he meant on Thursday when I asked him a question, as recorded at page 9994 of Hansard, as to why the department failed to accept the recommendations of the Suttie commission, which reported favourably with regard to the maintenance on the active list of some of these regiments. The minister's answer to this question, as recorded on that same page, was as follows:

> —the reason that some of the recommendations were not upheld was very carefully explained in the committee on defence—

May I ask the minister whether the explanation contained in four lines of the report of the proceedings of the committee on defence is a full and very careful explanation as to why the department did not accept the recommendations of the Suttie commission?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): I do not know to which four lines the hon. member is referring, Mr. Speaker, but I think the explanation I gave was fair and reasonable.

Mr. Churchill: Now that the minister is in a fair and reasonable mood, Mr. Speaker, may I ask him whether he considers this to be a careful explanation of a departmental decision; and I quote his words as they are recorded at page 806 of the report of the special committee on defence, in its minutes of proceedings and evidence No. 19 for Thursday, November 5, 1964, as follows—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is not the hon. member beginning to argue the case rather than ask a question?

Mr. Churchill: On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I am not presenting an argument, unless you wish me to base my statement on a question of privilege, in that the minister has misled the house. I hope, sir, that you will permit me to read the four lines to which I have referred, which are representative of—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Churchill: —the so-called careful explanation, which the minister used—

An hon. Member: Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Churchill: —to brush aside my question on Thursday.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would indicate the great urgency of this question, because I am unable to see the degree of urgency that would require a general statement from the minister at this time. Perhaps if the hon. member put his question on the order paper he would obtain the necessary details.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, questions can stay on the order paper for months at a time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I point out to you that there is still a question on the order paper dated June 3, several others under dates in July and some under dates in August. Therefore, sir, I regretfully have to submit, on a question of privilege, that the Minister of National Defence misled the House of Commons on Thursday when he gave the answer which is to be found in Hansard at page 9994, in which he said that a careful explanation of the alterations to the Suttie commission recommendations was made by himself to the defence committee. I base my charge on the fact that the careful explanation amounted to only these words:

> —in the interests of what we felt to be an even greater uniformity in the application of the standards across the country, some of the decisions had to be reversed and some were reversed in each direction. It was the application of our review that resulted in some different recommendations from those that had originally been put forward.

I submit that is not a careful explanation of why these changes were made, and that the minister was misleading the house on Thursday in the answer he gave me on that occasion.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, in addition to the very brief statement just read there were a number of factors which had been listed as forming the judgments which were made in respect of various units, and most members of the committee on defence found them adequate to their comprehension.

Mr. Churchill: That, Mr. Speaker, is another misleading statement, because these units are not mentioned by name with the exception of two, the Irish of Toronto and the Irish Fusiliers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

THE SENATE

INQUIRY AS TO REFORM MEASURES PROPOSED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a non-contentious question of the Prime Minister which is prompted by two things; first, the wide reaction to his latest appointment to the other place, which I am sure he has noticed; and second, item No. 40 on the order paper regarding reform of the other place. I want to ask the Prime Minister when he intends to proceed with this reform and whether this is the limit of Senate reform at present intended by the government?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): We will proceed with that motion just as quickly as possible, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON CHANGES IN ACT AND REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister yet received a report from Mr. Joseph Sedgwick in regard to some matters affecting the department and the proposed changes in the regulations and the Immigration Act? If not, does he expect it soon?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet received this report from Mr. Sedgwick but, as I indicated, I hope to have it before the end of this month.

[Text]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is there any truth in the story circulating in Toronto that a number of people who were incarcerated by the department were deported without Mr. Sedgwick first having the opportunity to interview them and get their stories?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to say that no deportation order has been signed in the case of the persons who were to be investigated by Mr. Sedgwick, before Mr. Sedgwick had been informed of the action contemplated. Therefore, no action has been taken without his consent and, indeed, in several cases the decision was taken on his advice.

[Text]

Mr. Orlikow: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has not answered my question. I am not concerned whether Mr. Sedgwick approved it. I should like to know whether any of the people involved were deported without first seeing Mr. Sedgwick and telling him their stories.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO CONFERENCE WITH PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is she now in a position to answer the question I put to her parliamentary secretary on Friday, which was in these words:

> Now that the government has decided to meet with the medical representatives regarding the Hall commission report, will they announce a date for a conference with the provinces?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, we met with representatives of the Canadian medical association and affiliated associations from 11.30 a.m. until 1 p.m. today, but this did not put us any closer to selecting a date for discussions with the provinces.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INTERFERENCE WITH SHOWING OF EXCERPTS FROM FILM "MR. PEARSON"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Is it true that government interference prohibited the showing of excerpts from the film "Mr. Pearson" last night on the C.B.C. program "This Hour Has Seven Days"?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there was no interference whatsoever.

Mr. R. W. Prittie (Burnaby-Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say if there was any interference with the producers by the top management of the C.B.C.?

Mr. Lamontagne: I am not aware that there was interference or that any action was taken by top management.

FISHERIES

NORTH PACIFIC COMMISSION—DISCUSSION OF TERMS OF OPERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the minister tell the house whether any discussions will take place at the meeting of the international north Pacific fisheries commission which may serve to clarify the possible terms of operation of the commission in the future?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the commission is now meeting in Tokyo, and I have to await a report from the meeting before I can say anything further about what is taking place.

Mr. Barnett: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell us whether he anticipates that any significant information will be provided by the commission as a result of any program of research in the technical and scientific fields arising out of this meeting of the commission which may serve to help set a pattern for a fruitful future for the north Pacific treaty?

Mr. Robichaud: I am not in a position to determine at this stage exactly what discussions will take place in Tokyo, but I can point out that the discussions which are taking place are in the interests of the north Pacific fisheries.

REDISTRIBUTION

PROVISION FOR BOUNDARIES COMMISSIONS AND READJUSTMENT OF REPRESENTATION

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister) moved the third reading of Bill No. C-72, to provide for the establishment of electoral boundaries commissions to report upon the readjustment of the representation of the provinces in the House of Commons and to provide for the readjustment of such representation in accordance therewith.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I should like to make a few brief comments on the third reading of this bill. During the course of the debate it has been suggested by various speakers that when the provincial commissions begin their work they are likely to search the Hansard record to help clear up any matters of interpretation that they might find it necessary to deal with, and that the Hansard record would assist them in this regard by making clear to them what were the wishes and intentions of the members of parliament.

I am going to confine my remarks to the interpretation that might be applied to section 13, subsection (c) which reads as follows:

(c) the commission may depart from the strict application of rules (a) and (b) in any case where

(i) special geographic considerations, including in particular the sparsity, density or relative rate of growth of population of various regions of the province, the accessibility of such regions or the size or shape thereof, appear to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable, or

(ii) any special community or diversity of interests of the inhabitants of various regions of the province appears to the commission to render such a departure necessary or desirable,—

Then the section goes on to state that a tolerance of 25 per cent may be applied in the case of constituencies in which it is found necessary to vary the strict rule. I should like to say that in the province of Ontario the constituencies have traditionally been based upon county boundaries. This does not apply in some other parts of Canada, but in the province of Ontario it is of great importance. I should like to make a plea today that when the commission for Ontario comes to the interpretation of the provisions of this bill they respect this traditional practice of basing the constituencies on county boundaries.

There are two concepts that such a commission might use in approaching the problem. The first is to apply a rigid, mathematical formula based on the fact that urban constituencies should have the maximum population, rural constituencies should have the minimum population, and constituencies which are part urban and part rural should come between these two limits. Now, if such a concept were applied rigidly it would probably have the effect of completely wiping out or completely distorting the present constituency boundaries in the province of Ontario.

I believe this is unnecessary if the commission, rather than adopting such a rigid, mathematical approach, would adopt a practical, non-disruptive approach and deal with the constituency boundaries in Ontario with as little distortion as possible. I believe this procedure would be found much more satisfactory for the people in the Ontario constituencies.

I should like to indicate briefly what may happen in western Ontario in this regard. Down in the southeast corner of Ontario is Essex county, containing the city of Windsor. There are three constituencies in Essex county, including the city of Windsor, namely Essex East, Essex West and Essex South. If the population of these three constituencies is divided by three, that is the population of Essex county including the population of the city of Windsor, we come up with a quotient of 85,258. Now, assuming that the average population of a constituency in Ontario will be about 70,000—and preliminary calculations indicate that this will be the case—then in these Ontario constituencies we can go from a low of about 53,000 to a high of 87,000 or 88,000. The figure for the three constituencies in Essex county, including the city of Windsor, would work out at 85,258, which is quite within those limits. I submit, therefore, that Essex county and the city of Windsor, with some slight adjustment in the boundaries to even up the three constituencies in that area, could be left alone.

Then we go a little farther north to the county of Middlesex, including the city of London. If we divide the population of the county of Middlesex including the city of London by three and make a similar adjustment by putting certain municipalities from one constituency into another but still maintaining the traditional county boundaries, we get an average of 73,000 per constituency. I suggest that this is just about right. Elgin county, which is down in that corner, is just about right at present with 62,000. Kent and Lambton counties at the present time have been adjusted so that the constituency crosses the Lambton-Kent boundary line. However, with some slight adjustment, that is by moving municipalities from one constituency to the other, these two constituencies could be left alone with an average population of 57,000. This comes within the maximum and minimum limits.

Going a little farther north we come to Huron, with a population of 48,000, which is slightly under the minimum. However, by taking a municipality off the north end of Lambton West or whatever is necessary off the north end of Lambton West, which includes the city of Sarnia a well populated area, the average for Lambton West and Huron works out at 63,418, again well within the limits.

Then going north again we run into a problem in the Bruce peninsula. Bruce has 29,000; Grey-Bruce has 36,000; Grey North has 38,000 and Wellington-Huron has 32,000. It is difficult to see how these areas could be adjusted. The only place one finds more population in an adjacent territory is Waterloo North, where that one constituency has a population of 115,579 according to the 1961 census.

I am giving this information to indicate that sweeping changes across these Ontario constituencies are unnecessary if the commission is willing to adopt a practical, non-disruptive program. With the 25 per cent tolerance allowed, these constituencies can be left alone except for very minor adjustments.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, the only point I wish to raise relates to the dual constituency matter. I left the chamber before the vote was taken on it in committee the other day, and so did not get a chance to express my objections to it. Now having read the observations of the minister who sponsored the bill I am even more put out about it. Could we have a clearer expression from the minister of what he was talking about? As recorded at page 10064 of Hansard for Friday last he said:

> Mr. Chairman, obviously I do not want to prolong this debate, but may I say I do not feel I could propose such an amendment. On the other hand, I have one drafted here that is slightly different from the one shown me by the hon. member for Queens, who was good enough to send me the one about which he was thinking. I would think that the one I have here would be preferable if this is going to be done, because the only real difference between the two is that in the one case it just says that the commission "may" and in the other case it says "may if it sees fit to do so".

In view of the queer interpretations sometimes placed on the word "may", if that additional phrase was not included I think there might be a suggestion that parliament's inclination was to have it done. My own inclination is not to have it done.

We are getting very clear here.

> I say that quite frankly. I really feel about this matter, and it is going to be very difficult for me to vote. I have been thinking I might do something that I thought only members of the N.D.P. did, sit on my hands, if there is a vote.

The minister has a very short memory if he does not remember the session of 1957-58, when a lot of Liberals sat on their hands until one brave day in January a lion came into the house and then we did get a vote. To continue with the quotation:

> I have not made up my mind yet—

Here is the minister who sponsored the bill, and right in the final stage of this very debatable issue he says he has not made up his mind yet.

> —but I certainly do not want to influence the judgment of any other member of the committee. Particularly because of the objection reiterated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I do not feel it is fair to impose upon the commission the making of another decision which in my bones I feel we ought to make ourselves if it is to be made at all. I think it would be very hard for me to vote for this. On the other hand I am rather impressed—

This is about the fifth "on the other hand."

> —by the argument put forward. I want to reiterate—

This is about the fourth reiteration.

> I want to reiterate, however, that these historic constituencies will not survive anyway.

What is the point of all this? If they are not going to survive, why bother?

> Halifax county is far too big to be one constituency, so we will not be preserving the historical situation there and probably not in Queens either. However, if the hon. gentleman wishes to do so I think the simplest way would be for him to move his amendment in order to test the committee on it and get the agony over with.

Here is a minister with largeness of spirit. First he is on one side and then he is on the other. He feels things in his bones and is a bit worried about the agony. I want to ask him what he means by saying it is not going to help Halifax anyway, that Halifax cannot survive anyway. Why did he go ahead and let the amendment come to a vote without putting it much more clearly that this was a nonsense amendment in so far as it affects Halifax? Or is it a nonsense amendment in so far as it affects Halifax? How does the minister see it?

The thing which bothers me is that throughout this whole debate on redistribution which, with intervals, has stretched for many months, we never heard anything about this problem of dual constituencies. I happen to represent the twin cities of Port Arthur and Fort William and I am sure if there are arguments —aside from historical ones—for dual representation they are even better for Port Arthur and Fort William than they are for these two constituencies down east, because there is almost an equal balance in the size of my constituency.

If we are having a really clean slate to start with, then we should never have had this amendment. I am not going to raise any objections to the bill as it stands, but I would like a fuller explanation from the minister than this sort of tortuous path he walked on Friday between his own feelings and the feelings of other people.

Having said this critically I think I should go on to compliment the minister. I think we should thank somebody that he managed to get back here from his bed of pain, because this is the first measure of any scope which we have got through this place for a long time; and despite criticisms I and others may make I think he deserves some recognition for the fact that he got it this far. But surely it was not just to get it this far that he made that rather equivocal speech on dual constituencies?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I think there is only one point involved here, and if the hon. gentleman had read my earlier observations he would have seen that it was explained. The historic constituency of Halifax is in fact Halifax county, which has far too big a population to be merely two seats. If I understand correctly what we did on Friday, and I think I do, if the commission so desires it will be possible to make a dual seat constituency out of part of Halifax county, the greater part population-wise, but this will not preserve the historic riding of Halifax, which was the whole county, because of the rule that the population cannot exceed a certain figure.

I know both hon. members for Queens who proposed this matter understood that perfectly, and I think the same would be true in P.E.I. where, because of the 25 per cent rule, it would not be possible to have Queens county retained as Queens county, or where it would be very difficult to do so. However, that does not mean that the greater part of Queens county could not be a dual constituency. Therefore this has some meaning, but I think I am right in saying this would not preserve the historic ridings we have known because the commission will have to carry out the mandatory part with regard to limits of population.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have three points to raise on third reading. The whole purpose of this bill is to provide more realistic boundaries for our constituencies, and I would like to bring to the attention of the house that in my own district of Athabasca it is at present necessary for the hon. member for Jasper-Edson to travel 100 miles through my territory on the only road available to get to the northeast corner of his own district. This is a waste of his time, and it is a waste of public money when he tries to cover isolated communities up near my headquarters.

This brings me to my second point. I am afraid that these commissions, when they are set up, will be operating in the dark. In every constituency there is a man who for possibly ten or 12 years has had a close relationship with everything that goes on in that constituency. He knows its problems, and it would be a tremendous waste of his experience if the commissions could not consult him.

I am referring, Mr. Speaker, to the sitting member. I do not say sitting members should be appointed to the commissions. In any case, this would probably require an amendment to the bill itself. But I think it should be placed on record now, for the guidance of the commissions, that use should be made of the services of the sitting member, or possibly of those who have sat in this house over the past ten or 15 years. The commission should ask them what they think should be done in connection with the redrawing of the maps, for the welfare of the country as a whole.

Cynics may say this would amount to political interference but I think most if not all members of the house are public spirited in these matters, and surely it would be a waste of experience if they were not consulted.

There is another matter I wish to raise, and I ask permission of the house it bring it up at this time because it is difficult to discuss it in connection with any other piece of legislation I know of. A great many of our constituencies are far too large to allow any member to get around them adequately in the absence of some further assistance from the government. As the most important example

I will quote the Northwest Territories, which cover an area of some 1,342,000 square miles. The sitting member is expected to serve this vast region on the basis of exactly the same expense account as is available to, let us say, the hon. member for Carleton or the hon. member for Ottawa East, which is patently ridiculous.

I suppose that in the absence of government legislation this is a matter which no private member could seek to remedy; it would be called a money bill. Therefore, while we are talking about redistribution, I think the present is an appropriate time at which to bring the subject forward. I do not suggest we should cut down the size of the enormous riding to which I have referred, but I think we should certainly take a realistic view of the situation and make sure that no undue financial strain is placed on a private member because he seeks to do a job for his people, which cannot be done unless some change is made in the provision allotted to him.

It may be of interest to the house to know that the most easterly point in the Northwest Territories Cape Dyer on Baffin island, a point which is east of Halifax. This constituency runs west to a point west of Queen Charlotte islands off the coast of British Columbia and to Aklavik in the far northwest corner. And we, as representatives of the people, try to pretend that a man can cover this immense territory with the same ease as those who represent, say, Ottawa East and Carleton county.

I know all members of the house recall the contribution which was made by the former member for the Northwest Territories. There is no one here who does not know what a strain this imposed on him, both physically and financially. We cannot undo the harm we did to this man, but we can certainly make sure it does not happen to another. The least we can do is to be realistic and make sure that some consideration is given to placing public transportation at the disposal of members who represent these vast outlying districts.

I represent one of these large districts myself. I am not complaining particularly about that, but even in my district it is very hard to get around an area of some 65,000 square miles. So I have great sympathy with those who have to cover a territory such as the Yukon, for example, on exactly the same basis as is made available to other members, and I think it is time we did something about it. If I am out of order in discussing the subject, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to enlarge on my remarks on some other occasion, but since this is a question of some urgency I hope my words will not go unheeded at this time.

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I am glad the hon. member for Middlesex West has put his views on record calling for special consideration to be given to particular areas affected by this redistribution measure. I too wish to make a few remarks on Bill No. C-72 before the house completes its consideration on third reading. I wish to protest very strongly, as I did on Friday night, against the threatened loss of four seats in Saskatchewan. I do not think any province should suffer such a loss in its representation as four seats in the course of one redistribution.

I draw to the attention of the house what happened during the redistribution of 1952. At that time the Liberal government of the day took action to see that the reduction of seats in Saskatchewan was minimized. Of course at that time there were Liberal representatives from Saskatchewan in the house, and this probably had some effect on the thinking of the government of the day. I drew attention on Friday to the statement of policy just released by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, that factors other than population should be used in determining equitable representation. What I am suggesting is that action should be taken to see that the west has equitable representation in this house in accordance with its position in the country's economy. I believe, too, that discussions of changes in our country's constitution will be coming up very shortly, and I understand some effort will be made at that time to consult with the provinces in connection with the representation which each province should have.

I do not intend to repeat what I said on Friday, but I wish to point out once more, as forcefully as I can, that the action taken in clause 13 in providing special consideration for certain constituencies should also apply to provinces as a whole. I think the commissions should be instructed by this house to consider the situation in Saskatchewan very carefully. I also believe special consideration should be given to the prairie provinces as a whole so their representation may be kept in fair balance with that of Ontario and Quebec.

As I said on Friday night, I do not wish to become too political. Nevertheless, I believe I should put the situation very clearly once again. In doing so I will use the words of Robert McKeown, writing in Weekend Magazine of November 29, 1963: "The Liberals now draw most of their support from the cities and the Conservatives get theirs from the country." I think I could enlarge on that statement by saying that support for the Conservatives comes to a large extent from the west, and that this might have some influence with regard to the possible loss of four seats there. Mr. McKeown also said a member of parliament had told him that the next election might be won or lost as a result of what happens in this redistribution measure. I wish to point out once again that special consideration should be given to Saskatchewan with regard to this matter of seats in the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Théogène Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, the few remarks forcefully made a while ago by my hon. friend from Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) have given rise in my mind to some suspicion.

I think that his remarks are extremely to the point and that the commission which will be responsible for considering the matter will have to give special attention to the boundaries of the constituencies in the province of Quebec as well as in Ontario.

For instance, if I take my own riding I come to the conclusion that the people are satisfied with the proposed requirements for the redistribution. But on the other hand, if my information is accurate, there is no doubt that in the event of a redistribution, my riding would be seriously dislocated.

In my opinion, this would be an error, because the citizens of St. Hyacinthe-Bagot have been used to it for many years, and if the difference between the number of the population and the 25, 20 or 30 per cent to be provided for in the act is observed, then I believe that more would be done to respect the aspirations of my electors and those of electors in the other ridings, and to adjust the situation from top to bottom and from bottom to top in order to have the number of electors required to form an electoral riding. There must be a more equitable way than the one suggested; otherwise, many counties which have existed since confederation could disappear, and this would be against common sense.

I make these remarks so that those points will be taken into consideration by the commissions which will be studying this matter, because I know that a great deal of attention is being paid to it in our ridings by the electors and the citizens in general.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PENSIONS

MOTION TO SET UP JOINT COMMITTEE ON CANADA PLAN

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to consider Bill C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors;

That twenty four members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee, and that standing order 67(1) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses; and to report from time to time and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that standing order 66 be suspended in relation thereto; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, on item No. 17, in connection with the setting up of the joint committee may I ask the house leader this question. I realize the importance of getting the committee set up, but I do not quite see the urgency of it; because as I understand it the other place is not now in session and will not reassemble for some considerable time. Supposing we pass this resolution now and send a message to the Senate; when is that message likely to be dealt with? Is there any likelihood of expedition in promoting the business of parliament?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I was somewhat concerned about the whole procedure as to when the committee should be set up, either before or after second reading of the bill. On reading the cases I came to the conclusion that it is desirable and the usual practice, although not always followed, to have a committee in existence so that when second reading is given you can immediately refer the bill. But I found in that connection, somewhat to my amazement, that a bill had been referred to a joint committee even although the message had not come back from the other place saying that they had concurred. In other words, a bill had been referred to a committee that had not been perfected.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister refer to specific examples, if he has them there?

Mr. McIlraith: I do not have them with me at the moment. I did a lot of work on this on Friday and I regret that my right hon. friend was not here, because it troubled me a great deal. The difficulty about leaving it until after second reading is that then you have to have unanimous consent to bring it on. I went further than that; I consulted with the leader of the other place to see when that place would reassemble. The motion on the order paper is that they have adjourned, I think it is, until next Tuesday or an earlier date. I am not sure whether the motion reads "at the call of the Speaker" or "the leader", but in any event it can be reconvened at an earlier date and I would anticipate that this course may be followed, although I cannot say, in fairness, that it will.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we are not raising any objection to the proposed resolution to set up a joint committee, but I want to make some reservation about the minister's suggestion that after second reading the motion to refer to the committee should be adopted by this house, until we have heard from the other place. I would prefer to reserve judgment on that suggestion, because unless there is an established procedure whereby following second reading a bill can be referred to a committee which is only partially set up, we would be rather reluctant to adopt that procedure now.

Mr. McIlraith: I have no objection whatever to the hon. member reserving his position on that point. I must admit that the point did cause me some concern on Friday when I was trying to look up the authorities to decide just what procedure should be followed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, could not the minister give us a general outline—he has a very good memory—and give us examples of this procedure being followed; because it seems most unusual.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There is a good example in the 1960 Journals, when the right hon. gentleman had a motion, I think it was on the bill of rights resolution. It went to a special committee. In that case the right hon. gentleman, at the conclusion of second reading, asked for the unanimous consent of the house to set up the committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is quite different.

Mr. McIlraith: When he obtained unanimous consent he then proceeded immediately to refer the bill to the imperfect committee. That is one example that I can recall.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the very reverse.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell us what happened back in 1950 at the time a joint committee was set up on the same subject.

Mr. McIlraith: There was no bill. It was a different point altogether. That is not applicable to this situation. The one precedent which seems to have a bearing on this point is the one in 1960 to which I referred. I will get the exact reference and give it to the hon. member. In that case the unanimous consent of the house was required, and with unanimous consent the bill was referred to the, if I may so describe it, unperfected committee.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if that is not the antithesis. In this case you are placing the matter before a committee before second reading has been given.

Mr. McIlraith: No, there is no motion to refer the bill to a committee at this stage. This motion is to create a committee to which the bill can be referred when it receives second reading. This motion merely creates the House of Commons part of that committee. I think this is the usual procedure. As a matter of fact, the right hon. gentleman will recall that earlier this session there was some objection taken in the house because standing committees were not perfected, although they were already in existence and bills were referred to them. There could be objection taken if this committee was not in existence when second reading was given to a motion for referral.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, do I gather from what the minister has said that he is arguing that there must be a committee of some sort before the bill can be referred?

Mr. McIlraith: That is the whole point.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the next item may I ask the house leader whether the government is in a position to present a motion containing the names of the members of this committee?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the list of names has not been completed as yet, but I hope it will be, immediately second reading is given. I asked for them on Friday, and I hope to have them very quickly.

PROVISIONS FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRIBUTORY PROGRAM

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved second reading of Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

She said: Mr. Speaker, members of the house have now had an opportunity, even though a short one, to examine the Canada pension plan set out in Bill C-136. One can appreciate from its length and complexity the difficulty I face in endeavouring to cover adequately the provisions of the measure in my statement on second reading. I propose to deal with a number of the more important aspects. A number of other areas of special interest and importance will be discussed by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), whose department will be responsible for the administration of coverage and contributions, and by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) who is concerned with the financial and economic implications of the plan.

We are concerned at this second reading stage with the principles of the bill. It is apparent that there will be many detailed points which will need more explanation than can be given in these statements. The parliamentary committee will provide the opportunity for this, after approval in principle is given and the bill referred to it.

When speaking last week on the resolution preceding this bill, I emphasized that our objective was to have as comprehensive coverage as possible under this plan. Therefore I should like to make a few remarks about the question of coverage.

Only a few groups have been excluded from coverage, and these have been for constitutional, legal or administrative reasons. The crown in the right of Canada has not the power to require employer contributions from the crown in the right of any province: for this reason provincial government employees and provincial crown agency employees cannot be covered unless the province concerned wishes to enter into an agreement with Canada to have its employees covered and to pay the employer's contribution. Similarly, employees of foreign governments or international agencies will only be covered if their employer enters into an agreement to pay the employer's contribution. As I mentioned last week, members of the armed forces and the R.C.M. Police will be excluded from the plan because of the special provisions for relatively early retirement that are already made for them.

Because of the administrative difficulties involved in reaching them, certain groups of migratory workers have also been excluded from the plan. In agriculture, horticulture, fishing, forestry, logging and lumbering, a worker who does not spend at least 25 working days a year with the same employer, or one who does not earn at least $250 a year from the same employer, will not be covered under the plan. Most migratory workers in this country have other employment for much of the year, and spend less than 25 days on one job in these primary industries. The $250 a year represents an income of $10 a day for 25 days; it is also the amount of income a married woman can earn without affecting her husband's taxation status. It may be of interest to compare these provisions with the provisions of the United States program where farm workers are excluded from coverage unless they work for one employer for at least 20 days a year and earn at least $150.

I am often asked about the baby sitter or about the man who cuts your grass or shovels your snow or paints your fence, or about the woman who comes in to help with the spring cleaning or to help your wife make curtains. The answer is, this is not pensionable employment, though in fact what you pay may become part of the person's self-employed earnings.

I should like now to outline contribution rates. The contribution rate proposed for the Canada pension plan is 1.8 per cent each from employer and employee, making a combined rate of 3.6 per cent. This contribution will be paid on earnings between lower and upper limits which are initially $600 and $5,000 a year, respectively.

The effect of the lower limit is progressive, in the sense that the man with low earnings will contribute a smaller proportion of them than will the man with average earnings. On earnings of $300 a month—about the present average level—the employee's contribution will be equivalent to 1.5 per cent of his total earnings.

Both lower and upper limits will rise during the ten year transition period if the cost of living rises, and thereafter in ratio to an eight year moving average of earnings.

The combined contribution rate of 3.6 per cent on earnings between these limits, is proposed as a rate that can be expected to finance the plan for at least 20 years, without liquidating any of the investment reserve that will be built up meantime. After that, the estimates necessarily become less precise. There are too many uncertainties for us to predict what the contribution rate should be more than 20 to 25 years, that is, more than a generation from now.

There is, of course, a good reason why the cost of pensions may increase over the years. We can expect to live longer. All the estimates prepared by the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance are based on the assumption of a considerable continuing improvement in mortality rates; that is to say, more people will enjoy their pensions longer.

This, of course, will increase the total cost of pensions. What it does to the contribution rate, however, depends on what happens meantime to the total amount of earnings to which the contribution rate is applied. This, in turn, depends on a variety of factors—the rate of increase of the population of working age, the proportion of this population actually at work, the rate of increase in their productivity, and what happens to prices. I therefore propose to refer briefly to each of these.

As those who studied the actuarial report made public last fall will recall, the actuarial work for the Canada pension plan has been based on two different sets of assumptions about population growth. These were deliberately chosen by the chief actuary as extremes. That is to say, one is the slowest rate of population growth which seems at all reasonable and the other is the fastest which seems reasonable. On the first set of assumptions, that is, the slow population growth rate, the number of Canadians in the year 2050 would be 46 million; on the second set, the fast growth rate assumptions, it would be 156 million, or a difference of 110 million.

Even in the course of a generation the divergence between the two estimates is considerable. In 1990 the population of Canada would be 30 million on the first set of slow assumptions and on the second or fast set of assumptions it would be 37.2 million. That is to say, the difference between the two projections is, within 25 years, equal to the present population of Ontario and Manitoba combined.

These alternative population projections produce very different ratios for the future number of pensioners compared with the number of contributors. On the first set of assumptions, that is, with a slow growth of population, the pensioners will increase much more than the contributors, and the contribution rate therefore has to increase. On the second set of assumptions, that is, fast growth, the ratio would not change much, even if the projections are carried as far into the future as the year 2050. That is to say, if our population increases fast the contribution rate required in the 2050's may well be no higher, and indeed could be lower, than the rate required in the 1990's.

The possible wide variations in population are the greatest of the uncertainties which affect the long term cost of the plan. Economic factors, however, are also of great importance. The actuarial estimates depend on, for example, assumptions about the proportion of people of working age who in fact will be at work. They assume that for the first ten years of the plan unemployment will average 5 per cent of the labour force and thereafter it will average 4 per cent.

Before hon. members jump to any conclusions I should like to emphasize that these assumptions, like others in the actuarial report, cannot in any way be taken to reflect what the government actually expects to happen. They are the independent assumptions of the chief actuary who has worked on the principle that he should choose, to use his words, "assumptions that would not underestimate the cost" in this as in other doubtful areas. In other words, he is being deliberately on the pessimistic side or, if my hon. friends opposite will permit me, he is being somewhat conservative.

The cost of the plan will also depend on the future development of prices and earnings and especially on the relation between the two, that is, on productivity or real earnings per person.

Many different projections could be made. In order to avoid so many that they would be confusing, the chief actuary has made two assumptions about prices. Pensions will cost more, of course, the more prices rise. For the long term estimates based on a slow rate of population growth a rapid increase in prices, by 2 per cent a year, is also assumed. Thus this is deliberately a "high cost" estimate on both counts. For the estimates based on fast population growth, and therefore "low cost" on that account, a slower but still considerable rate of price increase, 1½ per cent a year, is assumed.

Again I point out that these assumptions of the chief actuary in no way should be taken as an indication of any government expectation. The chief actuary chose them because he is seeking to guard against the danger of underestimating the possible cost of the plan.

Between these high cost and low cost estimates, the actuarial report, which I will be tabling, develops projections which are described as "intermediate cost"; that is to say, they represent costs with an intermediate rate of population growth and with price increases equivalent to 1¾ per cent a year. Each of these projections is developed on two different assumptions about earnings, a rate of increase of 3 per cent a year or a rate of increase of 4 per cent a year. The first, 3 per cent, applied to the high cost estimates with a 2 per cent rate of price increase, would imply that productivity rises by only 1 per cent a year. This is the highest cost estimate of all. This is what will happen only if there should unfortunately be a dramatic reduction in the rate of technological progress.

Such progress has led in the past to long term productivity increases at an average rate of 2 per cent to 2½ per cent a year. A 2½ per cent increase is the rate implied on the lowest cost projections, where a rapid rate of population growth is combined with earnings increases of 4 per cent a year and price increases of 1½ per cent a year. A moderate rate of productivity increase is provided for in the projection which combines the intermediate population assumptions with a 4 per cent rate of increase in earnings, which is equivalent, given the assumed 1¾ per cent price increase, to a 2¼ per cent rate for productivity.

These various estimates cover a wide range of possibilities. Consequently, they have very different implications for the costs of the plan on a very long term basis. But for 20 years at least the stories they tell are not too divergent. On anything from the lowest cost to the highest cost assumptions, the proposed contribution rate will result in building up an investment fund which is substantial but not, in relation to our economy, unduly large. The actuary's estimates apply to the fund which the plan will generate in Canada, excluding Quebec. These estimates, at the end of 20 years, range between $6.7 billion and $8.4 billion.

[Miss LaMarsh.]

I should point out that these figures are based on the chief actuary's assumption that the rate of interest will remain at about the current level, roughly 5 per cent, for ten years but will thereafter be 4 per cent. About this I would enter the same reservation as I have made about others of the actuarial assumptions. The actuary's estimates must not be taken to imply a government view that interest rates are going to decline. From many points of view, of course, a decline in interest rates would be welcome. But if the developing nations of the world are to achieve the progress that is probably essential not only to them but to the security and prosperity of all of us, this may well remain a capital hungry world for many years to come. I understand that for this and other reasons many economists would say that interest rates are no more likely to go down than they are to go up.

If the actuarial projections were made on the basis of unchanged interest rates, that is, 5 per cent throughout, the estimates of the investment fund at the end of 20 years would be higher. On the various assumptions about population and earnings, they would range between $7.4 billion and $9.3 billion.

It is, however, common to all the actuarial estimates that by 1985 income of the plan from contributions, at the 3.6 per cent rate, will no longer equal the full cost of the pensions being paid. On some of the projections, the interest on investments will for a time more than fill the gap, so that the fund will continue to increase for part at least of the plan's third decade. The highest of the chief actuary's range of estimates for the fund in 1990 is at $8.6 billion, slightly higher than for 1985. On the least favourable estimate, on the other hand, the fund would decline to $5 billion by 1990. These again are the figures with the assumption of a 4 per cent interest rate. If the interest rate remained at 5 per cent on the average, the highest figure would become $10.1 billion and the lowest $6.3 billion.

All the actuary's estimates indicate, however, that some time after the plan is 20 years old there will be a need to reassess its finances. By that time, experience of the plan will have made possible considerably more precise estimates of its costs. The range of population and economic projections is too wide for it to be realistic to try to anticipate now what should be decided more than a generation hence. The timing of any change will, of course, depend in part on the views that are then taken about the desirability of continued partial funding and about many other points of economic policy. The most that can now be said is that if the current range of predictions is sustained, and if it is desired to preserve the funding of the plan, some increase in the contribution rate probably will be required some time in the later 1980's or the 1990's.

If I may pass now to the question of benefits, it may be helpful for hon. members if I list the benefits provided under clause 44 of this bill. They are as follows:

1. The retirement pension, available on retirement at 65 or unconditionally at age 70.

2. A disability pension.

3. An orphan's benefit.

4. A pension for widows of any age if they have dependant children.

5. A pension for all widows over 65.

6. A pension for women widowed after age 35.

7. A pension for disabled widows and widowers.

8. A death benefit.

Now, in order to receive a survivors pension or death benefit contributions must have been made for at least three calendar years and one third of the total number of years possible for the contributor.

This rule, while a reasonable one in general, could operate unfairly for people who are unable to join the plan until late in life. I am thinking, for instance, of members of the armed forces who cannot join a plan until they leave the service and are employed in some sort of pensionable employment. I am thinking also of older immigrants who do not come to the country early enough to be able to contribute. For the sake of these people, it is provided that they can achieve permanently insured status after ten years of contributions.

Because of the nature of the benefits provided the eligibility period for the disability benefit has an added requirement which could be called currently insured status. Contributions must have been made for at least five of the last ten years before the benefit is claimed.

The adjustment of benefits in payment to changes in the cost of living is an important feature of this bill. It will apply to all the benefits provided by the bill. The adjustment will be made whether the pension is being paid for the first time or whether it has been paid for many years.

This feature of the bill means that for the first time Canadians will be able to be sure of their pensions being kept up to date in value. I do not think there is any serious dispute about its desirability, but it does necessitate some rather complex sections in the bill, which I am sure hon. members have run into already. It is not desirable to adjust pensions annually if there have been only minor changes in the cost of living. Nor is it desirable to provide either for large jumps from year to year or reductions of pensions should the cost of living fall. The formula provided in the bill will therefore have the effect of keeping the pension adustment closely in line with the cost of living, and without making increases from year to year of less than 1 per cent or more than 2 per cent.

Benefits will be paid under this bill for the first time in 1967, and therefore the first adjustment to any cost of living cannot be made until 1968.

The pension is to be a fixed portion of the average earnings upon which a person has contributed. But in calculating this average, his past earnings will be revalued to their current equivalent; that is, in proportion to the changes that have taken place in the meantime in the general level of wages. In this way, the pension he has earned will be in step with improvements in productivity and in wage rates.

As in the case of the cost of living adjustment, it is desirable to find a way of smoothing out these changes. The formula in this bill, therefore, establishes an earnings index based on employees' actual average earnings throughout Canada in the most recent eight year period for which information is available, as related to the employees' actual average earnings in the first eight years of the plan.

The retirement pension is to be 25 per cent of average monthly pensionable earnings. A man who has earned $200 a month will have a pension of $50 a month; a man who has earned $400 a month will have a pension of $100 a month. A member of parliament who has contributed to the plan on the first $5,000 a year of his indemnity, will have a pension under the plan of $104.17 a month. I have to warn you, however, Mr. Speaker, and all hon. members, that the average monthly pensionable earnings are your total lifetime earnings after the plan starts and up to the earnings ceiling, averaged over your working life and expressed on monthly basis. During your working career, you may have had months or even years of sickness or unemployment, or just low earnings before you were a member of parliament. Some people will have been attending university or taking other types of education beyond age 18. There is therefore a provision in the bill for a dropout of years of low earnings or no earnings amounting to 10 per cent of the number of months in which you may have contributed.

If you continue to work and contribute beyond age 65 up to age 69, you may substitute any months of earnings during those years for less favourable months of earnings before age 65, as long as this does not reduce your contributory period below 120 months.

The disability pension consists of two parts, a flat rate benefit and an amount equal to 75 per cent of the retirement pension the contributor might have claimed had he been age 65. The flat rate portion will be $25 adjusted in line with increases in the cost of living. The total disability pension will be at least as large as the retirement pension at any given level of earnings. The actuaries have estimates that in the year 1975 about $63 million will be paid out in disability pensions. This will represent about 17 per cent of the estimated total benefit payments.

A widow of 65 or over will be entitled to a pension at 60 per cent of her husband's retirement pension. She will be able to draw this in addition to the flat rate old age security benefit that is to be available from age 65 in the future. For widows under 65, and therefore not entitled to old age security, the widow's pension will itself contain a flat rate component as well as an earnings related component. The flat rate component is the same amount, $25, adjusted in line with the cost of living, as that provided for orphans and disabled people. The earnings-related component will be 37½ per cent of her husband's retirement pension.

The philosophy on which pensions are paid to widows under 65 is that a full pension should be available to those who cannot easily obtain employment. That is, a full pension will be paid to all widows who have dependant children, and to all widows who are disabled, no matter how young they may be. Other widows will receive a full pension if they are age 46 or over when they are widowed. For those who are widowed before age 45, the pension available will be reduced on a sliding scale so that those who are aged under 35 will not receive a pension. Young widows in their twenties and early thirties usually have little difficulty in finding employment, and of course many of them remarry.

When a widow reaches 65, or when a woman of 65 or more becomes a widow, the widow's pension is calculated at 60 per cent of her husband's retirement pension. She may, however, be entitled to a retirement pension in her own right. In that case she receives the larger of 60 per cent of her own pension plus 60 per cent of her husband's, or 100 per cent of her own pension plus 37½ per cent of her husband's, up to a ceiling equal to the maximum pension payable to a retired contributor.

The pension for the disabled widower is calculated in the same way as that for the disabled widow. The actuaries estimates indicate that in 1967 widows benefits will amount to $89 million.

If the father dies, what happens to children under the Canada pension plan? The orphans benefit will be paid to all dependant children up to the age of 18, and to age 25 if they continue their full-time education.

The benefit will be paid on the death of the father or if the mother dies in cases when she has been the main support of the family. The benefit for each child will be $25, increased in line with the cost of living. However, the total amount paid to the children of one contributor cannot exceed the maximum retirement pension payable in the year the parent died. It is estimated by the actuaries that in 1975 the payment of orphan's benefit will be about $37 million.

The death benefit is a lump sum payment which amounts to six times the monthly retirement pension, or 10 per cent of the earnings ceiling for the year of death, whichever is less. Initially the maximum would be $500 but it will increase as the earnings ceiling rises. The actuaries estimates indicate that in 1975 death benefit payments will amount to $20 million.

At ages 65 to 69 many people continue full time employment. Indeed, while many of us can hardly wait to be 65 to retire it is noticeable that as we get closer to that age, and this is especially true of men, there is a desire not to leave the labour force. But the purpose of this bill is to provide pensions for those who do retire voluntary or involuntarily. However, a person who does retire may still make modest earnings from part time or casual employment without any effect on his pension benefits under the Canada pension plan.

At the outset, when the plan's earnings ceiling is $5,000, a pensioner will be entitled to earn 1.5 per cent of that ceiling each month, without pension reduction. That means, to begin with, that he could earn up to $75 per month without reduction in his pension, that is, $900 annually. Beyond that, up to $1,500 extra income per year his pension will be reduced by 50 cents for each extra dollar he earns, and if he earns more than $1,500 it will be reduced by $1 for every dollar he earns over that $1,500.

In considering the level of earnings at which the retirement test applies we should remember that old age security pensions will also be available from age 65. Exempt earnings of $75 a month, or $900 a year, combined with an old age security payment of $51 a month, or $612 a year, mean that a single person could have an income of $126 a month, or $1,512 a year, with no reduction in his retirement pension. A married couple both eligible for old age security could have a combined income of $177 a month, or $2,124 a year, with no reduction in the husband's retirement pension.

So far as administration of the plan is concerned I should like to say, Mr. Speaker, that a number of departments of government have been involved in drawing up the plan and will be involved in the administration of the program. We intend to avoid expensive separate facilities for collecting contributions by taking advantage of existing machinery. The contributions will be collected by the Department of National Revenue in the same way and at the same time as taxes are collected. The administration of benefits will be integrated with our existing old age security, family allowances and youth allowances administration.

The federal administration will be coordinated with that of any province having a comparable plan. In the case of Quebec these arrangements have already been worked out. If a contributor to the one plan becomes a contributor to the other plan, through a change in job or a move in residence, the earnings records of what we might call these dual contributors will be merged and only one combined pension will be paid. The act will determine which of the two jurisdictions will pay the pension and there will, of course, be financial reimbursement from the other. Arrangements of this sort are essential for the complete integration of the two plans.

The chief actuary has assumed that expenses of administration will be 0.1 per cent of contributory earnings. That is the same percentage used by the chief actuary of the old age, survivors and disability insurance program in the United States, based upon their quarter century experience in the field. This amounts to about $12 million a year, rising slowly to about $18 million in 1975. In addition to this general assessment of the magnitude of these costs, more detailed cost studies by the different departments concerned with the administration indicate that expenditures will be well within the actuaries estimates. Of course, as has been stated many times before, the administrative expenses will be a charge against the revenues of the Canada pension plan.

The bill provides a right of appeal to contributors and beneficiaries who disagree with administrative decisions. We have made an effort to establish an inexpensive and convenient review procedure. In cases where appeals from this review are desired, final determination will be made by a pensions appeals board. That board will consist of a chairman who will be a judge of the Exchequer Court of Canada or a superior court of a province, and not less than two or more than five other persons, each of whom shall be judges. Provision is made for a province administering a comparable pension plan to be able to refer cases to the same appeal board. By this means there will be not only the common benefit and contribution rate which have already been provided for, but also common interpretation of federal and provincial legislation.

The bill also contains a requirement that at least once in every five years the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance shall prepare a report based on an actuarial examination of the operation of the legislation and the state of the Canada pension plan account. This report will include estimated revenues and payments for each year in the immediately succeeding ten years, as well as other pertinent financial projections each fifth year for a period of not less than 30 years. It also directs that whenever any bill is introduced or presented to the House of Commons to amend this legislation in the future, the chief actuary must undertake an actuarial study of the effects of the proposed changes on any estimates contained in the most recent actuarial report. This information must be placed before parliament so that it can be studied in relation to the proposed amendment.

The periodic scrutiny and the suggestions and advice of a representative advisory committee are very much needed in this type of legislation as it will directly affect almost every Canadian, as a contributor or as a beneficiary. The bill provides for the establishment of a 16-member Canada pension plan advisory committee. The committee, which will provide for representation of employees and employers and the self-employed, will meet at least once a year. In giving advice to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, it will be the responsibility of this committee to review and report on the operation of the legislation, the state of the Canada pension plan investment fund and the adequacy of coverage and benefits. Each year a report of the activities of the advisory committee will be included in the annual report of the minister to parliament.

The legislation provides within this nationwide pension plan for a province to legislate and operate comparable pension provisions. This situation applies if a provincial government, within 30 days after this act receives the royal assent, signifies its intention to enact provincial legislation providing a comparable provincial plan beginning at the same time. The province of Quebec has indicated that it proposes to do this.

This choice remains open to the provinces for the years ahead. However, once the federal legislation becomes operative a transfer to a provincial plan is involved, and therefore a notice period is required. The province would have to signify its intention to implement its plan commencing with the third year after the year in which notice was given. The benefits would have to be comparable to those under the federal legislation or any other provincial pension plan. The province would have to assume all obligations and liabilities with respect to benefits accrued under the federal legislation.

It must again be emphasized that in this bill we are dealing with a subject which has a very special status in our constitution. Under section 94A of the British North America Act, which parliament approved in 1951 and this house again approved earlier this year, there is federal jurisdiction for pensions and supplementary benefits but the federal legislation must not interfere with the operation of any present or future provincial legislation.

This unique constitutional position means that we can achieve a comprehensive Canada-wide system of pensions only by means of legislative provisions which ensure continuing consultation and co-operation with the provinces. For this reason, the bill provides that amendments of substance will require the consent of two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the population. Amendments altering the general level of benefits and contribution rates require a notice period of at least two years.

While future parliaments cannot be committed—they can amend the legislation as they see fit—it is difficult to imagine any future parliament disregarding the requirements of this legislation, because these requirements give meaning to the special nature of the federal and provincial jurisdiction provided for pensions under section 94A.

I should like to thank hon. members for the attention they have shown in listening without interruption to this statement. As I indicated earlier, it is really not possible to anticipate all the questions which may arise in the minds of members regarding the provisions of the bill, but I have tried to deal in the course of my remarks with the salient points. My colleagues the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) will, during the course of the debate go into further detail on some of the other provisions and on the financial and economic implications in general. I propose to place before the house at this time the report of the government actuaries. I regret it is in English only, and I apologize for this to the house; the French copy is not yet ready. I regret too, that the six appendices are not yet attached to it; they are not quite completed but they will be completed in time to be made available to the special committee when it is set up.

Mr. Churchill: Will they be handed to the house?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, I will be happy to hand them round to everybody.

Mr. Monteith: But not before second reading is complete.

Miss LaMarsh: I do not expect they will be ready before second reading is completed. However, I have the actuarial report, which is complete, and it deals with some of these appendices. Perhaps it might be of assistance to the house if I were to read the titles of the appendices. Hon. members will know what it is I am not at this time producing. They are as follows: (1) The development of population projections; (2) the development of rates of participation in covered employment; (3) the development of average earnings; (4) the development of contributions and age retirement benefits; (5) the development of death and survivor benefits and (6) the development of disability benefits. This information will be available to the members of the committee and to members of the house at the same time.

I hope the bill will, by Wednesday evening of this week, have received approval in principle so that it may be referred to the special committee we have just set up. The committee can then get on with its work of calling expert testimony and hearing representations from many interested groups as it proceeds with a clause by clause examination of Bill No. C-136.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask whether copies of the actuarial report are available for each member?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes, they will be available for all. They will now be placed in members' boxes.

By leave, I wish to table two copies of the actuarial report on the Canada pension plan dated November 6, 1964.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister have the unanimous consent of the house to table the document referred to?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth): One of the questions I had intended to ask the minister later on in the course of my remarks was: What about the actuaries' report, and who are these actuaries? I have heard the hon. lady mention the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance and I hope she will tell us whether or not this report was drawn up by the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance alone or whether there were outside actuaries, or others, involved. The hon. lady shakes her head—no. So this is completely within the Department of Insurance.

I am shocked at the way this house has been treated in this respect. Last Monday we had the resolution. It was passed on Monday evening, but the bill was not ready. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill)—

Miss LaMarsh: On a question of privilege.

Mr. Monteith: Only 100 copies in English—

Miss LaMarsh: On a question of privilege, the bill was ready in both English and French and it was only because of the fact that it could not be reprinted in large numbers because it had to have the number of the bill put on it—

Mr. Monteith: For goodness sake, when is the government going to take some responsibility in these things?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Monteith: The bill was not ready last Tuesday in English and in French for all members of the House of Commons. I inquired of the Minister of National Health and Welfare what the circumstances were, and she made an explanation. She said there had been about 100 copies printed. I thought she said at that time they were available in English only. There may have been some French copies; the translation may not have been completed, or sufficient copies printed. But she also said they would not be available to members of the house until Thursday of last week.

Now, several days have passed. One question I had intended to ask the minister was: Where is the actuarial report; would it be presented only to the joint committee when set up? Now I ask the minister this: Why are not the members of the House of Commons taken into her confidence? We should have had this report before the second reading of this bill came up. I think this represents a complete abdication of responsibility. I am referring to the appendices. I made a note of the minister's remarks in the last few moments of her statement. Apparently they are still not complete. I do not know what kind of discharge of responsibility this represents in the opinion of the government, but in my opinion it is most inept.

Mr. Byrne: Sour grapes.

Mr. Monteith: Sour grapes my eye. The hon. member from, wherever you are from—Kootenay East—

Mr. Byrne: I know where I am from.

Mr. Monteith: You do, but nobody else does. All we hear from this member is when he chirps up and interrupts. Get up and talk on the pension plan.

Mr. Byrne: If I did, I would make more sense than you.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, we have just agreed to set up a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons, of which 24 members are to be from the House of Commons. We are requesting the Senate to consider appointing some members to this special committee. I go back to the joint committee of 1950. That committee, if you recall, sir, did reach unanimity; all parties and members of both the Senate and the House of Commons were unanimous. I do not know whether this was the first time in the history of our parliament, but it was probably about the first time in the memory of a great many of us that actual unanimity was reached in a matter such as this. I can only say that

I trust when this committee begins its proceedings and sittings it will do its best to reach unanimity. I have to admit that I doubt this. I have had some experience recently in a committee of the House of Commons. I had hoped then for unanimity, because I felt it would have meant so much to Canada as a whole. This was not to be achieved, however.

I would like to ask the minister this question, Mr. Speaker. I believe I asked her the question during the resolution stage. She did not reply then. I know we were anxious to get the motion through a week ago today, and I am not criticizing her for not replying then; but I hope she replies when she closes the debate. I am wondering how long she is going to allow for study of the bill. Let us face it, Mr. Speaker, some members of the House of Commons have only had a copy of the bill since last Thursday, as I understand it.

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

Mr. Monteith: I certainly think the bill should be available to those interested citizens of Canada, also, so they can examine it in detail. How long is the committee going to be given, or how long are the people of Canada going to be given to study the bill, prepare briefs and present them to the committee? We were in such a big hurry today to authorize the setting up of the committee. When are we going to give the people of Canada an opportunity to study this bill?

Mr. Lloyd: When you send it to the committee.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd) need not interject, either. He can get up and make his speech, just like the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne). I was asking a question of the minister, and I think I asked it during the resolution stage. How long will the public of Canada be given to study this bill before the committee forces a deadline on it? How long are they going to be given to prepare briefs? When I asked the minister this question previously, she smiled rather benignly. I asked whether the committee was going to be in operation before Christmas. I ask this question again. Some preliminary work of the committee could be done before Christmas, and surely to goodness the people of Canada are going to be given an opportunity to study this most complex piece of legislation. I do not suppose there has been for a long time any piece of legislation that has meant so much, not only to the recipients of pensions, those who are going to benefit under the bill, but to the whole citizenry of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith: All right. I further ask, Mr. Speaker, when the people of Canada are to be given the chance to study this 85-page, 125-sections bill. Are they not to be given this opportunity?

Mr. Lloyd: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member has asked whether we are going to give the people of Canada an opportunity to study this bill. The hon. member was in his place today when the committee was established, and surely its function is clear.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I have no idea what the hon. member for Halifax is talking about. It sounded to me like a program I saw on television last night, which was called "Candid Camera". It was a bunch of gobbledygook, or whatever it is called. The hon. member's remarks could not have meant any more than that. The minister, in her introduction on second reading, sounded good, I admit; but really it was so technical. I am not blaming her for that; it would have to be technical, on a bill of 125 sections and 85 pages. How could it be other than technical? I would mention in passing that this is a bill of four parts. Part I has divisions A to E; part II has divisions A to G; part III is administration, and part IV amendments to the Old Age Security Act. I am not a lawyer, but I doubt very much whether there is an expert lawyer in Canada today who could have analysed this bill between last Thursday, when it was received by most hon. members, and today. I think this is another illustration of the deplorable handling of house business by the government. I insist that this bill needs a great deal of detailed study.

I am very pleased that the minister is going to be buttressed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson). I see the Minister of National Revenue in the offing. No doubt they are going to make very worthy speeches, one as to how he is going to collect the money and the other as to how it is going to be possible to spend the money. This is the sort of thing they will be speaking about. It will all make a pretty good argument, I am not denying that; and I am really very pleased that the minister should have this assistance. The minister did mention that the employees of foreign governments in Canada —she may correct me if I am wrong about this —may be covered if the employer agrees to pay their contributions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Monteith: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) applauds.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but the hon. member did not realize that we were applauding the appearance in the house of the Créditiste party. It has just arrived.

Mr. Monteith: At last. I am certainly very pleased to join in the welcome.

Mr. Churchill: I don't.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, to answer this welcome from the hon. member I would like to say that the Créditiste members were attending about 40 public meetings during the week end, were continuing to organize throughout all the provinces, and were saying—

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has any right to be on his feet.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) has the floor.

Mr. Monteith: What they were doing had nothing to do with pensions, unless they are looking for one in some other sphere.

I would, in all seriousness, like to ask the minister another question. I will take an example. If a Canadian citizen were a chauffeur or worked at a foreign embassy in Canada, and the foreign embassy did not choose to enter into an agreement, that person could not be covered, could he? Am I right in my thinking in this regard The minister nods, indicating "yes". I think this is unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, but I will not argue the point at the moment.

This will undoubtedly come up during the course of the study by the joint committee. The minister's statement contained reference to baby sitters, snow shovellers, individuals who make curtains, and individuals in other categories. I do not intend to go into this subject, because various categories of eligible workers will undoubtedly be studied by that committee.

One certainly could not hope to digest all of the detail contained in the minister's opening remarks in the time available, but I should like to refer to several specific points. She made two assumptions about rates, but she would not accept the responsibility for either. These were actuarial assumptions. Sooner or later the minister is going to have to accept some responsibility in this regard. She pointed out that the thinking of one group was such and such, while the thinking of another group was different, and she did not appear to know exactly where she herself stood. In my humble estimation she is going to have to accept responsibility in this regard and make some declaration.

I was amazed by her suggestion concerning the thinking of some people that 5 per cent of our labour force being unemployed is not a bad situation, whereas the thinking of another group was that 4 per cent of the labour force being unemployed was not too bad. I am wondering what the minister herself thinks in this regard. In this connection I recall the considerable amount of conjecture expressed by the Minister of Finance in his book.

Again, Mr. Speaker, the minister has manifested a certain amount of what I should call waffling. She has stated that some economists have said that interest rates will go up, whereas others feel interest rates will go down. It certainly appears to me that she was waffling, in that she did not declare her position or thinking in this regard.

One other comment by the minister in her opening remarks I found intriguing. I hope she will correct me if I am wrong, but I thought she was referring to the members of this house. She did say that the lifetime earnings of members of parliament were going to be averaged out. I should like at this time to ask the minister how she thinks this averaging out process is going to be worked out. I hope she will answer that question in due course. Is the Department of National Health and Welfare going to have access to the records of the Department of National Revenue? These records have been considered somewhat sacrosanct in the past, and I do not think departments should collaborate for the purpose of exchanging this kind of information. I am not complaining seriously at the moment in this regard, but I should like the minister to tell us whether these lifetime earnings are to be averaged out on the basis of that kind of exchange of information.

The minister made one other remark which struck me as facetious. Surely she was not being serious when she suggested that many of us could hardly wait until we reached the age of 65 to retire. I look forward with happiness to every year before I reach age 65, as I am not in a hurry to attain that precarious age. Perhaps one could sense a slight innuendo in her remark, and I admit that the minister is much younger than I, but is she looking forward to the time I reach 65 and retire?

Last Tuesday I asked her whether the bill, a copy of which was apparently available to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), was to be made available to other members of the house. Within 20 minutes of the time I asked that question two copies were made available, so the question was worth while. Having studied this bill since it has been available, I have concluded that it has taken a great many months to prepare. One need only examine it to see how intricate and complex it is. Perhaps one could suggest that it has been in preparation almost since April 8, 1963. There have been many revisions, and this bill is the final draft.

In spite of the fact that there may be agreement between house leaders as to the length of debate at this stage, I should like to complain vociferously, as an individual member, about that limitation on the time we have to study this very complex bill. I do not believe the greatest legal mind in Canada could come up with answers, within such a limited period of time, to the many apparent questions arising from a consideration of this bill. I hasten to add, Mr. Speaker, that we are not going to oppose second reading. That has been our position in respect of a Canada pension plan throughout the various phases of every presentation of the government's pension scheme. We favour a Canada pension plan.

There are one or two general questions I should like to ask the minister. A week ago today, when the resolution was before the house, I asked the hon. lady several questions and I do not criticize her for not replying to them on that occasion. At that time we had reached the end of our evening's work and we allowed the resolution stage to pass. I do hope the hon. lady will see fit to give us at least some of the answers to those questions. During her earlier remarks she said she would attempt to answer some of the questions, but that she may not be able to answer them all. I can understand that situation because the bill is to be referred to a joint committee immediately following second reading, or as soon thereafter as the joint committee has been established. We as a committee of the whole will be studying the bill when it comes back from the joint committee, so at that time we will have the hon. lady with her officials in front of her to answer questions in detail.

I am sure hon. members who speak on this subject during the next two or three days will refrain from asking unnecessarily detailed questions, but rather will confine their questions in depth to the pertinent realities of the plan. We will, however, want to know about some of the things the minister as yet has not explained. It may be that she will be in a position to give some detail, but at least for my part I will not expect her to give this detail, unless she does so following consultation with her officials during adjournments between sittings. That is the position I intend to take, but perhaps other members will feel differently.

During the resolution stage I asked the minister whether she had given any consideration to possible priority requirements recommended by the Hall health commission. What is she going to do about the report and recommendations of that commission? Are those recommendations to be left in abeyance or forgotten? I should like to receive a reply to that question.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I have a general question I should like the minister to answer. Has there been any indication of how many provinces are going to join with the federal government in the Canada pension plan or how many are going to operate their own plans? The minister mentioned today that Quebec is going to proceed on its own, and I am not quarrelling with that. The legislation provides for it. But is this the only province which, according to the minister, has indicated it is going to do this? Are other provinces going to do the same thing? Has there been any indication as to the number of provinces that are actually joining in the Canada pension plan with federal administration only? I should like to know about Ontario. Has there been any indication yet? Surely the minister can give us some enlightenment on this matter.

There is another matter about which old age security recipients in Canada are going to be very disturbed. It is obvious that when the minister spoke at the resolution stage she intended to build up great hopes for the elder citizens of Canada. These hopes have proved to be completely unfounded. She mentioned at that time that all future old age security pensions would be pegged to the cost of living index and would increase automatically if living costs increased. The minister said she hoped that this would not only develop a sense of security among our older citizens but would protect the real value of the pension dollar for Canada's million-odd pensioners.

I cannot help but say that, deliberately or otherwise, Mr. Speaker, this was a complete distortion of the real facts. It sounded noble until some of us received copies of the bill on Tuesday, and other members on Thursday. The bill provides that the Canada pension act shall come into force on January 1, 1966 and that payments under the act will commence on January 1, 1967. The shocking provision so far as present old age pensioners are concerned is that payments based on the cost of living index will not be made until January 1, 1968. They will then be based on experience in the year 1967 only and the increase will not be less than 1 per cent or more than 2 per cent.

Mr. Knowles: It might be zero.

Mr. Monteith: As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, it might well be zero. What this means in effect is that old age pensioners cannot expect any increases until January 1, 1968. They might then receive an increase of 75 cents a month if the cost of living index has gone up by 1 per cent in the year 1967. If the cost of living has increased more than 1 per cent old age pensioners can expect an increase of up to $1.50 per month. If the cost of living does not increase during the year 1967 then, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, the old age pensioners will not receive an increase. This is a terrible blow to the old age pensioners, Mr. Speaker. These older people have to wait three years and possibly they will then receive an increase of 75 cents a month.

I said earlier that it would be impossible for the greatest legal mind in the world to digest this bill since last Thursday. I admit I have had it since last Tuesday afternoon. I have tried to peruse the bill in the meantime but it has been impossible to digest it. It is an affront to parliament to bring it forward when we have not had an opportunity to study it. However, I would go so far as to say that the officials of the department deserve a great deal of credit. I refer not only to the officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare but also to the officials of finance, justice and maybe national revenue because the bill is so comprehensive.

So far as references and cross-references are concerned, I do not know whether the idea came from the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), but as he well knows the Income Tax Act is the most complicated piece of legislation on the statute books of Canada today. He made his living out of it, and so did I for a while. But I must say that one would have to sit down for weeks in order to look into the cross-references having to do with this particular legislation. I am not fooling when I say that.

The minister did clear up one matter for me earlier by nodding her head in agreement that the only actuaries who have worked on the actuarial report are government actuaries. Am I correct in that?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes.

Mr. Monteith: And the chief actuary of the Department of Insurance is accepting all responsibility for the figures which will be found in the actuarial report?

Miss LaMarsh: No responsibility?

Mr. Monteith: All responsibility.

Miss LaMarsh: Yes.

Mr. Monteith: That is fine. I accept that. In her remarks the minister referred to the fact that any province, within one month after the act is assented to, may signify its intention to operate its own plan. The minister referred to this in her remarks and I have a question for her. It may be I am at fault here because there were so many details in her statement that I could not quite follow them all and get them all down in writing. However, I believe she did say that a province can opt out at any time after three years if notice is given in writing. Am I correct in that?

Miss LaMarsh: Yes.

Mr. Monteith: I am wondering why the period of three years was chosen. There may be very good reasons. I should like to refer to subclause 2 of clause 4 where I find these words:

> Subject to subsection 3, all of the provisions of this act to
> (a) employment by Her Majesty in right of Canada or by an agent of Her Majesty in right of Canada in a province providing a comprehensive pension plan.

Perhaps the minister would tell me just how employees of the C.B.C. and the C.N.R. who reside in Quebec will be affected by the plan. I am also interested in clause 6 (1) (i) which reads as follows:

> 6. (1) Pensionable employment is—
> (i) employment by Her Majesty in right of a province or by an agent of Her Majesty in right of a province.

Does this mean provincial employees or just what does it mean? There are so many questions that arise but I am not going to pursue them today.

I should like to impress upon the people of Canada, Mr. Speaker, as I did at the resolution stage, that there is a great discrepancy between people who are hired by somebody and the self-employed person. I gather that we, as members of parliament, will have a deduction made of 1.8 per cent of our pay up to $5,000. Is this correct? The minister nods, yes. Some person who is running a corner grocery store is going to have to pay 3.6 per cent of his earnings. The farmer is going to have to do the same. I do not believe this provision is going to be acceptable to many of the self-employed people in Canada. In other words, I believe one might say that the self-employed are going to pay exactly 100 per cent more towards a pension than those who are employed at the present time.

In so far as reciprocal agreements with other countries are concerned, I am not against them. I think this is a wise provision. I ask again, how many provinces have indicated a desire to enter into the scheme? I should like to ask one more question. If a province requests the federal government to enter into a reciprocal agreement with another country, must the federal government do so? I will put it this way. The minister, thus far, has only mentioned the province of Quebec so I will refer to Quebec. If the province of Quebec asks the minister to enter into a reciprocal arrangement with Italy or any country in South America, must the federal government enter into such a reciprocal arrangement? I ask her that question.

There are other items, Mr. Speaker, about which I am not going to comment in detail this afternoon. We want to get this bill into committee, and I know there are many other speakers to be heard. There are one or two things under part IV upon which I should like to comment. I notice the minister has retained one feature, and I must admit I am probably responsible for this to some degree. I notice that clause 120 of part IV is being amended, but this part is being retained:

> Subject to the provisions of this act and the regulations,
> (a) a monthly flat rate pension may be paid to every person who has attained 70 years of age and has applied to receive such a pension,—

Then, we go down to paragraph (d):

> (d) has resided in Canada for at least one year immediately preceding the day on which his application is approved.

[Mr. Monteith.]

I notice this provision is being retained. I know also from my experience in the post the hon. lady now holds that great hardship is caused in certain cases. Frankly, I do not know the answer, but if a wife of lesser age may be living with a husband in California or in a warmer climate in the south, this provision means she must come back to Canada to reside for at least a year before she attains the age of 70 to be eligible to receive her pension. I am only pointing this out in the hope that possibly in the last year and a half or so, additional experience has been gained which would permit some cure of this inequity which often develops.

There is one provision upon which I must congratulate the minister. I refer to clause 122 of the bill. It is very rarely that I ever congratulate a minister of the government because frankly, I do not believe they deserve it too often. This particular provision indicates that where a person has applied for old age security and it is found subsequently he is older than was thought, the date of eligibility for the pension may be made retroactive one year. I have known this to happen during my tenure of office, and I feel this is a good move. In fact, I was planning such action myself when circumstances suggested otherwise. I do believe this is a good move in the right direction. When a person reaches this age, quite often the family Bible has been lost and the person might not be as mentally alert as previously. I have known four people in one town to have this happen to them within the course of a few months. These four people all applied for their pension when they were actually 71, but it was impossible to do anything for them. Now it is going to be possible to make the pension retroactive one year.

I am going to close my remarks by saying that the government has shown complete ineptitude in handling this whole question of pensions. At last, at long last, we have reached the second reading stage of the Canada pension plan bill. We want to get on with the job, and we want the government to get on with the job.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) would hardly expect me to share completely her enthusiasm for this bill, as though it were the last word in pension legislation. I must say also that I cannot join in the ranting and complaining that we have had from the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith).

He seemed to spend most of his time complaining that we should not proceed with this complicated bill today because we have not had time to study it. I do not claim to be as smart as the imaginary lawyer to whom he referred, but I would point out that we had a bill very much like this, Bill No. C-75, which was given first reading and presented to us on March 17. This Bill No. C-136 is based very largely on that bill. There are very few changes in the retirement benefits set out in the bill. Bill No. C-136, in the main, adds the widows, disability and survivor benefits.

I point out also that since August 10 we have had a white paper that explains the provisions of this bill. All told, I do not believe we have any complaint at being asked to proceed with it today, even if some members did not get their copies of the bill until last Thursday. Personally, I found no difficulty on Monday night, just out of my own interest, in ascertaining that there were copies of the bill, after it had been tabled, and if any member really wanted one he could get it quite easily. My concern, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Churchill: That is not the way to run a government.

Mr. Knowles: —is not so much with the fact that the government has brought on second reading, but is rather with the long delay we have had in connection with the Canada pension plan since this government first came into office, and the fact that we might yet fail to get it on the statute books at this session. I hope that is not the case but I express that fear as a way of indicating my desire that this house and the government take the steps that are necessary to complete this legislation at this session.

I believe we are all satisfied that a bill of such complexity is better studied in committee. Therefore it is not inappropriate that there has been general agreement among the parties that the debate on second reading be limited to three days. I think it is well understood also that when the bill goes to a special joint committee that committee will be granted all the time it wishes to examine and discuss it. However, I would like to suggest to the government that if the time taken by the special committee is such that we get beyond Christmas, or beyond some point at which the business of the house requires the house to continue in session, technically speaking the house be continued in session, even if it is given some kind of recess, so that the special joint committee can make its report back after that recess to a resumed portion of this same session.

I am sure hon. members realize that if the house is prorogued while this matter is being discussed by the joint committee that would kill the bill for the session, and we would have to start all over again at the next session of the house. I remind the minister of the commitment made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) on July 6 when he was house leader, that the government would take all the steps necessary to complete the legislative process with respect to this bill at this session. I trust that commitment will be kept.

On several occasions we have said that we welcome this bill and we have indicated the aspects of it that are good. Therefore it is hardly necessary to spend any time repeating that welcome or to go into greater detail with respect to the value of this legislation. However, I would like to say that we feel security for our people in their older years, security for our people on the advent of widowhood or disability, or on the occasion of children being orphaned, is one of the most important marks of a decent civilization.

We think the time has come to make an adequate pension plan an integral part of our economy. As I have already said to the minister, we do not regard this bill as the last word in this kind of legislation but it is certainly a forward step. We have moved from the first positions that we took in this field when we provided pensions that merely kept starving people alive. We have moved into universality with respect to pensions. We have moved into a fairly broad range of pensions, and now we are considering the proposition that one of the things that should be an integral part of our economy is a plan whereby pensions as of right are available upon retirement, are available to persons who are disabled, are available to persons who become widows, or in certain instances widowers, and are available to orphans.

A great deal has yet to be done to raise the levels provided by this bill and make them really adequate, but this bill starts in that direction and for that reason we are glad that at last we have it. Nevertheless I wish to say again that we feel this legislation is too modest in its beginnings.

I know there are those in the house who think we should be grateful for the extent to which the bill goes, but I suggest that this concept of starting things in a modest way is one that has been with us far too long. I may have occasion to quote this sentence again with respect to something else, but I would now like to quote what the minister said in reply to the point of privilege I raised last Tuesday when I complained about the cost of living bonus of 75 cents that is to be paid in 1968. As recorded at page 9938 of Hansard for that day the minister said:

> I would ask my hon. friend and all members of the house to bear in mind that in the usual spirit of Canadian fiscal responsibility we are beginning this experiment in a relatively modest manner.

That was well put, Mr. Speaker. That is the way we have begun most of our social security programs in Canada. We began them in the usual spirit of Canadian fiscal responsibility, in a relatively modest manner.

We know there are certain things that happen which make it possible for huge sums of money to be made available overnight, and so we feel that in the whole area of social security the time has gone for talking about modest beginnings. The time has come to take the kind of steps that will let our economy provide the full measure of security that it can for all our people.

Another comment I would like to make about this bill is that the relations between the federal government and the provinces which are spelled out in it, seem to be too much of a one way street. I am thinking in particular of the provision whereby any province which informs the federal government within 30 days after royal assent to this bill that it has a plan of its own, is automatically out. This is a provision which was in Bill C-75, or at least there was language to that effect, and we know this covers the case of Quebec. But in addition to that there is a new provision in this bill which makes it possible for other provinces in the future to decide to opt out of the Canada pension plan. In fact the bill sets out the steps that can be taken by certain other provinces to opt out, but I do not see anywhere in the bill the street that runs the other way.

There does not seem to be any way in which Quebec, or some other province, having opted out of the plan can later come back in, and this is a one way street arrangement in federal-provincial arrangements which is not good.

I also believe that the arrangements as to whether an employee belongs to a province or to the federal government for purposes of this legislation are loaded in favour of the provinces. Again this is a one way street. I recognize what the minister said about legislation of this kind succeeding only if there is co-operation between the federal and the provincial governments, but I suggest that co-operation and mutual arrangements work best on a two way rather than a one way street.

As I stated in committee on the resolution a week ago, I believe the government will have to do a great deal more in the field of public relations with respect to this legislation. I suppose we have to forgive the government for its lack of action in this respect, or understand why it has not taken adequate action up to this point. The government no doubt takes the view that it cannot use public money to publicize something which has not yet become law. But in the meantime many misunderstandings have arisen, particularly as to the relationship between this plan and private plans—the kind of misunderstanding which has led organizations such as the teachers to think this is something they must oppose. There is the misunderstanding created in the minds of employees of some large corporations because the notion has gone abroad that somehow or other the federal government intends to take over existing schemes as a result of which retirement conditions will be less favourable than they are now.

Once this legislation has been passed, however, it becomes the law of the land. Then I think the time will have come for a great deal to be done by the government to help the Canadian people realize what it really involves; the government will be free to help them realize its benefits and at the same time to help them realize its real shortcomings so that the people can work together to have those shortcomings remedied.

I have commented previously on the funding aspect of this legislation and one or two of my colleagues may have something more to say on this aspect of the subject than I intend to say now. But I wish to repeat what I said last Monday: It strikes me that this plan is neither a funded plan nor a pay as you go plan; it is in between the two. But it is a little closer to being a funded plan than it is to being a pay as you go plan, and to the extent it is in that direction I do not like it. The reason is simple. We are using a pension plan based on the need and desire of people for pensions, and the fact that they have to pay for them, as a means of taxing people in the lower income groups for the building up of investment and development funds. We in this party believe there should be funds available for investment and development. We wanted to see and have a chance to vote for the Canada development corporation which the government was talking about a year or so ago, but it seems to have been forgotten since then. But we believe funds for these purposes should be obtained on a voluntary basis and on the basis of ability to pay; they should not be built up by taxing people in the lower income brackets. I also believe that when we are building up a fund for investment in the development of the country on the basis of the peoples' savings there should be much greater control of such a fund from the centre than is envisaged in this present plan under which, as I understand it, control and direction of investment is given to the provinces in proportion to the amount of contribution made in each of the provinces.

I trust I have made it clear that though the plan itself is one which we welcome—indeed, it is similar to the plan we have been advocating in this party for a long time—there are many shortcomings attached to it and we hope these can be eliminated while the bill is in committee, or if not as the years come and go.

Thus far I have been talking mainly about that part of the bill which concerns the Canada pension plan proper. I now wish to say a few words about that part of the bill which deals with a related subject, but which in effect amends the Old Age Security Act. We welcome some of the proposed amendments to the Old Age Security Act which are contained in this part of the bill. We suggest, however, that if this is a time when the Old Age Security Act is being opened up there are many other changes which ought to be made. For example at the present time—and the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) has referred to this—no matter how many years of residence a person may have here he cannot qualify for the pension unless he has spent the last full year before going on the pension in Canada. I understand the reason for putting this requirement into the act but I suggest it has produced some strange anomalies. We now have a situation where some people can live in this country for ten or 15 years, reach the age of 70 and live on the old age security pension in full for the rest of their lives. Other people who may have lived here for 30, 40 or 50 years, but who have had to leave for health or family reasons before the age of 70, find it difficult or financially impossible to come back and spend a year here. So they are not able to qualify for the pension. I have records of a number of such cases in my files upstairs, letters from the United Kingdom or the United States where people are waiting hopefully for a message to the effect that there has been a change in this legislation of advantage to them. Such a change does not appear in the bill now before us but I hope we can bring about an alteration of this kind while the bill is under examination in committee. I remind the minister that either she or the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) told us that these changes which we now see in the Old Age Security Act were made at the instance of the federal government without consultation with the provinces. Therefore, although there might be some difficulty about getting changes in the Canada pension plan part of this bill because of agreements, almost treaties, arrived at with the provinces, we can surely get changes in the old age security part of this measure.

But the part of the bill which concerns or annoys me most in relation to the Old Age Security Act is the part about which I rose on a question of privilege on Tuesday of last week, namely this cruel hoax of telling our old age pensioners that things are going to be fixed up for them, their pension dollar protected, and so on, because pensions are to be pegged to the cost of living index. First, may I say to the minister that it is inaccurate to use the word "pegged", giving the impression that the pension will go up to the same extent that the cost of living index rises, because she knows that under the provisions of the legislation the pension cannot increase by more than 2 per cent in any one year. Therefore if we had a situation—and it could quite conceivably occur—where the cost of living index rose by 3 percentage points in each of ten years, at the end of ten years the cost of living index would have gone up by 30 percentage points but the old age security pension would have gone up by only 20 per cent.

But apart from this—and my colleagues in my party know this is something I have been talking about for many years—I complain about this device because I think it is a snare and a delusion to tell old age pensioners that things are fixed up for them once their pensions are tied to the cost of living index. The cost of living index is not the only element in our economic life; it is not the only element which has a part to play in the standard of living of our people. More important elements are the gross national product, the level of productivity and, to use language out of the Canada pension plan itself, the earnings index. I congratulate the minister and the government on what they have done in devising the formula on the basis of which the retirement pension is worked out. The scheme, a complicated one, but one not beyond comprehension, is a formula whereby the rate of pension at which a person will retire on reaching 65, or between 65 and 70, is related not to the actual number of dollars he was getting at that point but to his earnings throughout his working lifetime, adjusted according to the changes which have taken place in the earnings index. That is good.

It recognizes that there is something else besides a rise in the cost of living, and that this something else is better measured by changes in the earnings levels than it is by changes in the cost of living index. I think there are other factors, the general productivity and the gross national product of the country. But at any rate the government has accepted the proposition that in arriving at a rate of pension up to or at the point of retirement something else than the cost of living index is taken into consideration. However, once a person goes on pension, whether it is the Canada pension plan amount of $104.17 a month, to use the initial maximum figure, or the $75 under old age security, once that point has been reached the government says, "From here on you senior citizens, you great Canadians, the only adjustment you are going to get in either of these pensions is based upon the cost of living index. The gross national product may go up, earnings may go up, the standard of living in Canada may go up, we may have a society infinitely more affluent in ten or 20 years time than was the case when you retired, but the only basis on which there is to be any change in your Canada pension plan retirement benefit, or any guaranteed change in your old age security benefit, is on the basis of a rise in the cost of living index."

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the rise in the cost of living index must be compensated for when we ask for pension increases. It has to cover that, but that is not the only item. What I do not like about tying the old age security pension to the cost of living index is that it ties it to only one element and denies to our senior citizens the other benefits of a society that is growing more affluent and is producing more wealth. These are benefits in which our senior citizens should have the opportunity to share. I recognize what the minister said the other day, and one of the reasons I am glad I raised my question of privilege was that it got one admission out of her that had been very difficult to get; that is, that the $75 figure is not necessarily fixed for all time. In all previous discussions on this matter I had not been able to get a word out of her, but when I complained about this increase of only 75 cents in 1968 the other day she did say:

> Nor is anything in this bill intended to exclude any future action by any parliament with respect to that base.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is good to know. One of the Liberal members the other day said it is fine to get this cost of living index change; it means from here on there will be no more politicking about old age pensions and the increase will be automatic. If it is left to the automatic increase it will take ten or 15 years to get a few dollars increase. It will be only because of the genuine political interest in the well being of the Canadian people that we will get an increase in that $75 a month. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the government should even now realize that there have been increases in the cost of living since the $75 was set, increases in the wage levels and general productivity, and it should set for parliament as a goal that the flat rate of pension should be raised to $100 a month by the time we reach our 100th birthday in 1967. I submit that it would be a mark of good faith on the part of the government toward our old age security pensioners if they were to set out a schedule of $5 increases every few months which would bring it up to that figure of $100 a month by 1967. If we do not do this, we are really leaving them out of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I want this principle of still being concerned about the people who are retired to extend not only to the old age security pension but also to the Canada pension plan retirement benefit; I want it to extend to superannuated civil servants, to Canadian National employees and all people on pensions. I think one of the tragedies of the viewpoint the government has taken with respect to pensions is that it does pretty well up to a point, it keeps improving the various pension plans and the public service superannuation plan; but it says to people once they get on pension, "Well, you are off our hands now". Up to this point that has been absolute—there has been nothing more. Once this bill gets through there will be a slight improvement; we will get the benefit of the increase in the cost of living index. But this is the only benefit our pensioners will receive, and it is very small. That is only one element in the standard of living of our people. We do not deny to members of a family the increased benefits that the family can enjoy; and I submit we should be taking the same attitude toward our senior citizens, to those who are retired, and they should get the full benefit of the increase in productivity and the general increase in wages and earnings and all the other things that go to improve our standard of living.

I see that it is almost six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I am not going to take my full 40 minutes; that would mean rising to speak for only a few minutes after eight o'clock tonight. I hope I have made the point that we welcome this legislation. We regret that it has taken so long to even get this far. We hope that once it gets to the committee there will be abundant opportunity to examine and study it. We think that the reports of the actuaries will have to be studied in full and all these 125 clauses will have to be examined and questioned. I hope, also, that the sittings of the committee will do a good public relations job for this legislation. As a matter of fact, I hope there is something to the rumour that the house may recess for a period while that committee is sitting and dealing with this bill, so that it can be the main thing that is happening in parliament. As I say, I hope that if the rest of the business of the house is more or less completed, the house will not be prorogued but that instead there will be a recess so that the committee can deal with the bill and come back to the house with it, in order that we may get it through before the end of this session.

There is just one comment I wanted to make on an unrelated matter, but it is something to which the minister referred. I suppose we non-lawyers, every time we get into a legal matter, point out that we are not lawyers. I do not know whether that strengthens our case or weakens it.

Mr. Monteith: Even the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill).

Mr. Knowles: However, Mr. Speaker, I really am puzzled about the provision in the bill that virtually says the act cannot be amended in certain respects in the future unless such amendment is assented to by two thirds of the included provinces representing two thirds of the population of those provinces. Mr. Speaker, this is not the constitution of Canada; this is just an act, a statute passed in this 1964 session of parliament. Nothing could prevent the next session of parliament from amending this statute. Nothing could prevent any future parliament from amending this statute. This is the kind of language that I would think a law student who had not got very far would write into a bill. As a statement of intention on the part of the government, perhaps I can understand it; but it seems to me that in legal terms it does not stand up at all. If this government is giving a commitment to the provinces that it will not do anything like that, that is something for the government to do by way of commitment to the provinces and to stand or fall on it; but to ask parliament to tie itself in an annual statute to something that is constitutional in character is, I suggest, bordering on the ridiculous. However, Mr. Speaker, rather than rising at eight o'clock in order to conclude my remarks, I would say in conclusion now that we welcome the bill; we are pleased with the things in it that are good, but we hope that the weaknesses we have pointed out will be improved before the bill is finally passed at this session.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty pursuant to provisional standing order 39A to inform the house that the question to be raised at ten o'clock this evening is as follows: The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher); the Senate, inquiry as to reform measures proposed.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRIBUTORY PROGRAM

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of my party I should like to say a few words about Bill C-136 now before us.

As has been stated by a number of members of this house about both Bills C-136 and C-75, the predecessor of this bill, it is a very long and complex bill which requires a great deal of study and explanation before it is completely understood by all members of this house. I should like to say at the outset that I do not intend to get caught in the trap in which the hon. member for Perth (Mr.

Monteith) found himself. I might say that was a trap of his own making, because he admitted that he did not understand or comprehend this bill and then proceeded vigorously to criticize what he did not understand.

Mr. Monteith: So you understand it all?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if the members of this house were completely familiar with all the ramifications which may develop during the operation of the provisions of this bill, there would be no apparent reason for sending it to a joint committee for study. I do not pretend to understand all of the sections of the bill, nor do I pretend to comprehend fully how all the provisions of the bill are going to be handled in its practical application. Perhaps I should go further than that and state that I doubt whether the minister and her advisers have fully anticipated all of the problems with which they will be faced in the application of the 125 sections of this bill.

In spite of the intended insult, if I may call it that, on the part of the hon. member for Perth, I think this bill is being sent to a joint committee for further study because members cannot be expected independently to study it and understand all of the implications of it, nor answer all the questions which are apparent to one who reads the bill.

There are some questions, quite apart from the provisions of this bill, which should be answered by the minister, particularly when we are being asked to accept the principles of a Canada pension plan. These questions do not necessarily arise from the contents of any section of the bill now before us for consideration, although I believe they are very germane to the successful operation of the pension plan when it comes into being.

One question which has been asked on many occasions by a number of members, and we have yet to have an answer, relates to the number of provinces which have indicated to the minister a willingness to participate. We know for example that under the provisions of certain sections of this bill the province of Ontario can choose not to participate, by opting out within 30 days from the date of its proclamation. That being the case, 12 million people, representing the populations of Quebec and Ontario, of the 19 million people in this country, would not be partaking in the plan. The explanation the minister has given this afternoon, to the effect that provinces can opt out only after positively stating an intention to set up a plan similar in operation with reciprocal arrangements, is not a sufficient explanation, because with two thirds of our population not participating surely this cannot be referred to as a pension plan national in scope. I am not sure that the federal government should be involved at all in a pension plan under those circumstances, with this large part of our population not included.

One other question which has been asked repeatedly, particularly during the resolution stage, and at other times when other bills preceding Bill C-136 were before us, had to do with whether any arrangements had been made for the reconciliation of this plan with other pension plans, particularly of public service organizations, and administered by the government. We are led to believe, by certain articles appearing in various newspapers, that there are some 11,000 private pension plans in existence in Canada. Perhaps some of them cannot or should not be reconciled with this plan. Some of those plans may have been in existence for a long period of time and set up in such a way that the differences are so great it would be at least difficult if not impossible to reconcile them with this plan. I believe the minister will have to face this situation fairly soon and indicate what position will be adopted by the federal government when some of the long established private pension plans are adjusted in such a way as to take into consideration the provisions of the proposed Canada pension plan.

What will be the attitude of the government about these adjustments, particularly if and when it is decided by the administrators of a long established pension plan, in cooperation with the employees covered to reduce the contributions and perhaps the benefits to the extent of the amounts collected and the benefits inherent to this Canada pension plan? It will indeed be a difficult and complex matter to decide what will be fair reductions in potential benefits, at reduced costs.

This situation is not entirely hypothetical, because I have learned from reliable sources that some of the larger companies in Canada are giving serious consideration to this very thing.

So I think we should at least have some indication whether the minister and her officials have considered what their attitude is going to be.

But what is even more important is the question of public service pension plans. For a number of years the province of Alberta has administered a civil service pension plan for the civil servants of Alberta, and I think the same situation exists in every other province across Canada. Whether or not these plans can be reconciled is one thing, but just recently the province of Alberta has undertaken an extension of this type of administration to cover other public service pension schemes involving such people as municipal employees, hospital employees and a number of other categories, all falling within the ambit of what can be called public service. If there is no provision in the Canada pension plan for reconciling these public service pension plans so that the administration can be carried out by the same organization, and if the provinces are going to be required to continue to operate and administer pension plans covering quite a large number of people, when you take into account the civil servants and all other public service employees, then there is some opinion to the effect that, if they are going to have to be in the pension administration business, in any event they might as well set up their own plan and expand it to include all those people who would normally come under the Canada pension plan.

I do not think this is a problem that cannot be solved. I do not think it is an insurmountable difficulty; but in spite of the discourse of the minister this afternoon there has been complete silence up to this hour with regard to what the federal government and the Department of National Health and Welfare are willing to do to take into account these very serious matters. So I think that, without getting into the 125 sections of the bill, there should be some kind of explanation from the minister with regard to this matter.

There is another question I should like to ask the minister, since she is apparently so reluctant to tell us how many provinces have indicated they are willing to participate in the plan. Have some of the provinces asked for explanations along the lines I have been discussing but which have not been given by the minister? In other words, have queries come forward from the province of Ontario and the province of Alberta that have not been satisfactorily answered by the minister and her officials? Are the provinces asking questions that the minister and her officials are unable to answer? It seems to me one can reach no other conclusion but that the provinces are asking for explanations and details with regard to the application of this plan which the department is apparently not prepared to give, at least at this stage. I think we have reached the point in processing this bill through the House of Commons where we deserve to be given the answers now.

We are pleased to hear that the administration of the plan may not be as expensive as it might have been if it had involved the setting up of a completely new department of pensions. From the minister's statement today we understand that collections under the pension plan will probably be made through the Department of National Revenue and that payments or disbursements will probably be made through the Department of National Health and Welfare by utilizing the same channels now being used for the distribution of old age security cheques, family allowances, youth allowances and so on. It seems to me there is a great deal of machinery set up in both of these departments, on the one side for collections and on the other side for disbursements, that could be satisfactorily used at substantially less cost than would be involved in setting up a completely new and separate collection and payment agency.

I might also say we are very interested in the amount that it is anticipated will be built up in the fund, particularly in the first ten years of the plan. We would like to know what the anticipated amount of money will be that will be available to the provinces for investment and other purposes. We are told that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) will be making contributions to this debate later. Perhaps they intend to deal with this matter, as well as giving us an outline of the anticipated effect on the whole economy. I hope there will be considerably more explanation as to what is going to be done with this fund. There has been speculation in the newspapers from time to time by a variety of people that a fund of several billion dollars will be built up in the initial stages of the plan, but so far I do not believe we have had any straightforward statement by any minister in the government as to what the anticipated size of the fund will be and how much will be available to the various provinces for investment purposes.

Generally speaking we in this party are prepared to have the bill referred now to the special joint committee. We think that is the place where we can go into some of the additional details we have been requesting. Therefore we are satisfied to let the bill go now to the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, we often have pieces of legislation which, though good in themselves, are somewhat less so in their application.

The people in charge have managed to come out with a rather thick volume for this new Canada pension plan. I think the governments, be it the present one or its predecessors, would gain by calling upon popularizers of legal documents, that is, specialists who could write the legislation we have to pass in words everybody could understand. Do not forget that, when passed, the bill will have to be applied by employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare or the Department of National Revenue, who will not have the legal training required to interpret its provisions correctly, which will result in complications both for the staff of those departments and for the people who, some day, should benefit from the measure.

Therefore, what is missing—and I am speaking not only about the bill which is now before us, but about every bill which is passed by this house—is popularizers of texts who will offer to the understanding of all a simple and easily accessible draft which, subsequently, will not give rise to a misinterpretation of the law.

Mr. Speaker, we do not intend to speak at length on this bill because it is another federal act which will not affect Quebec. And it is not the first one either, because during this session we have passed many bills which will concern nine provinces, but not Quebec. We only have to look at legislation passed this year to see that this has happened in several other cases.

In most cases, the bills passed will not apply to the province of Quebec. For instance the legislation concerning student loans will not apply to the province of Quebec; the legislation concerning the Canada pension plan will apply in nine provinces, but not in the province of Quebec; the legislation concerning the $10 allowance to children 16 to 17 years of age applies to nine provinces but will not apply to the province of Quebec.

In the final analysis, during this session we will only have passed legislation concerning nine provinces, and I was forgetting the Crop Insurance Act which does not apply to the province of Quebec.

This will be a session where members of parliament representing ten provinces will have passed legislation applying to nine provinces only.

Therefore, why not sanction officially facts which are becoming increasingly numerous by radical changes in our constitution? That is a question which arises.

I think we are following the British mentality, that is we are proceeding by way of precedents. We are passing legislation which is not applicable to the province of Quebec, and by always proceeding by way of precedents and jurisprudence, we finally decide that it is best for everybody and the facts are sanctioned by precedents.

The facts are there. The Ottawa government legislates for nine provinces in some fields and it takes 20 years to set up a jurisprudence around these cases which are sanctioned at a given time. But the situation being as it is in the province of Quebec, it is impossible to wait 15 or 20 years, because the kettle is boiling over.

The present legislation, especially the measure introduced today, should serve as an example to hasten the sanction of facts, namely that the Ottawa parliament exists for nine provinces, but not for ours. Let the tenth province, Quebec, organize its own programs and act on its own. It is on that one condition that in many areas an understanding will be possible which will strengthen the structure of an altogether changed confederation.

Our intention is not to delay the debate, of course. This legislation does not apply to our province but as we want to co-operate with the other provinces, we intend to see to it that it is passed as soon as possible, since the other provinces want it. We do not want to stretch out such a debate. On the contrary, we want to prove that we are ready to co-operate with the other provinces in order to enable them to take advantage of this pension plan as soon as possible.

But one thing is certain; this pension plan constitutes a new tax for Canadians on whom the tax burden weighs so heavily already. It will be a tax which will serve to accumulate funds, and finally, when the time comes to receive a pension under this plan, it will be our children who will pay for the amounts we will receive in 25, 30 or 35 years.

However, there are two points I would like to deal with for a few minutes.

One of them, which may be of interest to the province of Quebec, is that there are at this time, pension plans in operation in various plants and industries. The contributions paid those trade unions by their members have to a great extent been transferred to international unions. The amounts thus contributed to international unions under those pension plans are now largely in the United States. Now—and this applies to contributions paid into international union funds with regard to pension plans in the province of Quebec as well as in the other provinces—is the federal government ready to take the means to bring home those funds and contributions which were paid into pension funds and are now in the United States?

I suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) should take that into consideration and make sure that the amounts paid in the past will be added to those to be paid in the future, so that the worker who will retire in five or six years will benefit from what he has paid in the past, in short, that this will be added to the pension plan.

Then, the province of Quebec will probably be pleased to count on the co-operation of the federal government, since the latter can use its influence in this field to bring back to Canada the dues paid to unions now established outside this country.

Before ending my remarks, I have a word of advice for the members from the other nine provinces who want this pension plan to be adopted as quickly as possible. It has been suggested that this bill be referred to a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons. Well, the experience I acquired while sitting on two committees only leads me to tell you that referring something to a joint committee on which senators sit is practically a waste of time, a needless delay. Since senators are always on holiday, how can you expect them to undertake the study of that pension plan and finish their work before Christmas? That is why I advise you to refer it to a committee of the House of Commons. If some minor bills have been pending for six months in the other place because they have not found time yet to complete their study of them, how can they complete in time the study of a bill as important as the one now before us? You will give them heart trouble, or else make them sick with work, I am not sure which, for the study of this bill will just be too much for them.

So, if you want action, if you want things to get going or to keep going, let us amend the motion in such a way as to refer the bill to a committee of the house where work stands a chance of getting done more expeditiously.

A joint committee, in my opinion, is one where the work is done far too slowly, where ideas are put forward which are two centuries behind times, where there are representatives of finance companies and banks who are more concerned with their own interests or the interests of their firms than those of the people, for their own interests have priority over those of the nation. The bill would run the risk of being consigned to oblivion. So, here is a bit of advice: let us try to send this bill to a committee of the house.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am happy to see that nine provinces in Canada will take advantage of a pension plan established according to their wishes, since they are on the way to centralization. On the other hand, we are glad to see that the province of Quebec will have its own plan, since it is its desire to administer its own scheme and that its pension plan meet its own aspirations and characteristics.

Let us keep on passing such pieces of legislation applying to nine provinces, with Quebec adopting its own legislation. But in return let us give to the province of Quebec the sources of revenue which are imperative; let us give back to Quebec the revenue from direct and indirect taxation, so that this province will not be a hindrance to the development of the nine other provinces and so that it might develop properly. When this is achieved, when the federal parliament will legislate for nine provinces and the Quebec parliament for the other, then we will all agree, there will be no more quarrels and we will no longer hear the fanatics which are heard now. And everybody will be happy in Canada.

I hope that this year a precedent will be repeated in the years to come and that before long—in the shortest possible delay—the constitution will be drastically changed so that two associate states will co-operate and show good will in a number of fields, while each goes its own way in others.

[Text]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) stated this afternoon that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and I were to back up the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), but I would like to commence by stating that after the knowledge she displayed this afternoon my colleague needs no backing from either of us. On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the hon. member for Perth who needs the backing of informed members of his party.

For one who claims paternity for the Canada pension plan and who has had in addition access to Bill No. C-75 for several months, to the white paper preceding Bill C-136 since August, and to the bill itself for six days, he displays—

Mr. Monteith: There are no actuarial figures at all.

Mr. Benson: —either a surprising lack of knowledge of the plan or else he can find little in it to criticize.

Mr. Monteith: It has taken you all dinner hour to figure out that one.

Mr. Benson: Indeed I am sure that the hon. member for Perth as a practising chartered accountant has previously had far less time to analyse far more complicated financial statements.

I would like to contrast his knowledge of the bill with that of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who also claims paternity of a sort.

Mr. Baldwin: Who is going to support the child?

Mr. Monteith: Judy.

Mr. Benson: Before proceeding I would like to make a few comments on a few of the questions that were raised by the hon. member for Perth, and first I would like to comment on his charge of government ineptitude in respect of this measure. In this connection I would point out that in my opinion ineptitude is far less of a crime than the inaction of the previous government on the matter of national contributory pensions.

Second, I would like to refer to his question of priorities concerning this legislation and a national health plan. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if he was suggesting that this legislation be held up pending the consideration of a national health plan. I hope that this is not the case for, if it is, we have further evidence that the official opposition intends to stifle this parliament and prevent the passage of legislation urgently desired by most Canadians.

The only other point to which I would like to direct attention is his comment on the varying estimates of the chief actuary, which were referred to by the minister. The hon. member for Perth, as a fellow chartered accountant, knows as well as I do that when one deals in the field of expected increases in the gross national product, population growth, wage rates, and changes in interest rates in the future, no precise figures can be quoted. Rather, one must make maximum and minimum estimates, especially when he tries to predict beyond a very short period of time; and this is exactly what the chief actuary has done.

The security provided by Bill C-136 is a basic level of protection, especially important to people of low and moderate incomes. It is sure protection, with 100 per cent portability, valid wherever they move, assured in real value if the cost of living rises, and automatically kept in step with improvements in earnings. This protection extends not only to one's own retirement but to one's wife and children if one should die, and to the contributor himself if he becomes disabled.

For many Canadians this will be an addition to provisions they are already making for their old age by individual savings or through company pension plans. If such a private plan is on a modest scale it will probably continue unchanged.

If the private pension plan is one providing pensions on a fairly high scale, people will not lose any contractual rights secured by their contributions to date, but they may expect some adjustments for the future. The contribution rate will probably be reduced, with a corresponding scale down of the benefits that would otherwise have been provided. The net result of the Canada pension plan, plus the old age security pension attached to the pension index, and the continuing private plan, will still represent a considerable gain in security both for older workers, who will be assured of larger retirement pensions in total, and for younger workers who can be confident that their pension contributions will protect them against changing economic circumstances in a way which has never before been possible.

If, on the other hand, a person is one of the majority of Canadians who do not have the benefit of a substantial pension plan, it is likely that the new plan will not only provide a basic level of security but will also encourage the spread of supplementary provision for retirement through additional private plans.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-136 is the most far reaching piece of social legislation which has been proposed in many years. It is legislation which will affect all of us, both now and in the future. When the ideas contained in this bill are incorporated into law and the Canada pension plan reaches maturity, all Canadians will have security in the knowledge that after a lifetime of work at least their minimum requirements for a decent living in their twilight years will be provided by the combined benefits of the Canada pension plan and the old age security pension.

It is not my intention to deal with the economic aspects of the Canada pension plan or, further with the question of integration with existing pension plans, as both these matters will be dealt with by the Minister of Finance. Suffice it to say that integration with private pension plans can and will be achieved, and indeed has been worked out for the largest single pension plan in the country, namely the federal government's civil service pension plan.

It is the unpleasant task of the Minister of National Revenue to collect the funds which his colleagues require in order to carry out the objects of government. Thus, under the present bill it will be the responsibility of my department to see that all those who are required to contribute to the Canada pension plan do so, in order that the benefits referred to so glowingly by my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, may be paid when the individual becomes entitled to them.

I think it might be useful if, after a brief reference to benefits provided by this bill, I were then to turn to the method of financing these benefits, the integration of the Canada pension plan with that of a province providing a parallel comprehensive pension plan, and the method provided for the handling of the funds which will accumulate in the early years of the Canada pension plan in excess of those required to pay benefits and cover administration costs.

There are three main differences in this bill with regard to benefits as compared with Bill No. C-75. These are the extension of widows' benefits, the introduction of orphans' benefits and the inclusion of disability and death benefits and the attachment of the present old age security pension, whether taken at age 65 or age 70, to the pension index which is in turn dependant on the cost of living index in Canada. I need not elaborate further on the first two of these changes, which were made possible by agreement with the provinces for a constitutional amendment. Indeed, they have been ably and fully described by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. However, I should like to say a few words about the third major change, which is that of attaching the old age security pension to the cost of living index because this in the long run will, I believe, prove most beneficial to all Canadians.

Some hon. members have made disparaging remarks concerning this move since this course was indicated during debate at the resolution stage of the bill—remarks which, I believe, were altogether unjustified and which took into consideration only one year, rather than accumulative effects over a longer period of time. I think the argument which has been put forward by various speakers including the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) this afternoon as to the adequacy of the basic $75 raises an altogether different consideration from the attaching of all benefits to a pension index. I believe one should not argue that because he has attached a cost of living index or a pension index based on the cost of living index to benefits presently paid, future parliaments or even this parliament may not see fit to adjust the base itself.

An hon. Member: Just before each election.

Mr. Benson: Yes, we might copy the Conservatives in that regard.

I have made some calculations which show that if we assume after the first two years a 2 per cent annual increase in salaries and wages as well as in the pension index, at the end of five years during which this legislation has been in effect a man earning $100 a month as of January 1, 1966 will be able to retire at the age of 65 with a combined pension of $68.45 or 64.5 per cent of his income at date of retirement. Similarly if he were to continue to work until retiring at the age of 70 he would receive a combined pension of $118.72, or 101.3 per cent of his wages at date of retirement. Of course if he were married the combination of his wife's old age security pension with his own combined pension at either date would cause his pension income to further exceed his own income at date of retirement. However, I do not believe it is fair to presume that a man can presently support himself and his wife on a total of $100 a month, and if he can I believe he has earned any bonus he may receive on retirement.

Let us now consider the case of a person who is earning $250 a month when the plan comes into force. On the same assumptions, such a man, if he attains the age of 65 years after the plan comes into force, may receive a pension of $88.33 or 33.3 per cent of his income at that age. If he were to continue to work until the age of 70 he would receive $162.35 representing 55.4 per cent of his income on retirement. In this case I think we might assume that the man in question is married to a wife of similar age and in these circumstances the combined pension would amount to $143.53 at age 65 or $251.98 at age 70. Based on the assumptions made, the pension would amount to 54.1 per cent of retirement wages at age 65 or 86 per cent of retirement wages at age 70. Of course, as incomes increase the percentage of total benefits to income on retirement decreases. This I believe is defensible on the grounds that persons with higher incomes are better able to provide something toward their retirement income through supplementary pension plans or accumulated savings.

Now I should like to say something about the financing of benefits to be received on retirement. The old age security pension will continue to be financed as at present by 3 per cent of the sales tax, 3 per cent of corporate income tax and 4 per cent of personal income tax to a maximum of $120 per annum. In the long run these contribution rates should be adequate to provide for all benefits including attachment of the pension index to old age security benefits and the payment of reduced benefits at age 65.

Turning now to the Canada pension plan benefits, these are to be financed by employer and employee contributions of 1.8 per cent each as indicated in clauses 8 and 9 of Bill C-136. In the initial stages the first $600 of earnings will be exempt and the maximum contributory level will be $5,000 so, that the maximum possible contributions will be $79.20 each for employer and employee. It is, I believe, worth noting that an earnings index is provided in the bill itself so that both the exemption and maximum contributory earnings can be adjusted as the general wage level rises.

Contributions by self-employed persons are exactly equal to the combined contribution of employer and employee, with the difference that no contribution need be made unless earnings are $800 per annum or more.

I should point out that on an income of $5,000 the self-employed will contribute exactly the same amount as the combined contribution in the case of an employed person.

The responsibility for the collection of contributions to the Canada pension plan which, as I mentioned, is the responsibility of the Department of National Revenue, will be assigned to the taxation division where integration with present operations will provide maximum efficiency at a minimal cost. Divisions "C" and "D" of part I of Bill C-136 provide strict rules, rules which we believe are essential to assure that deductions from employees, employers' contributions and required payments by the self-employed are made in order that they may be credited to the person who will ultimately benefit.

One of the features of Bill C-136 is that it provides for a pension plan which will be uniform with respect to contributions and benefits across the whole of Canada. In order to accomplish this it will be necessary to have close co-operation with all provinces, especially a province which provides a parallel comprehensive pension plan. It is hoped this will be accomplished by first of all having essentially similar legislation, that is, legislation providing for the same benefits and obligations in respect of individuals who change their places of residence; second, by having a reasonable exchange of information concerning pensions and, next, by providing for agency arrangements under which one jurisdiction can make payments of benefits on behalf of both jurisdictions and be reimbursed for its share by the other party involved. A similar arrangement whereby a person need only apply to one or the other jurisdiction for refund of an overpayment of contributions is provided. Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must have a common set of rules concerning pension administration across the whole of Canada.

In order to achieve these ends it is assumed that Quebec, the only province which has indicated its intention to establish such a plan, will pass a bill similar in all essentials to Bill No. C-136 as finally enacted by this parliament. Clause 103 of Bill No. C-136 provides for the establishment of country-wide social insurance numbers; clause 108 of the bill provides for the exchange of information concerning contributions credited to individuals in the two jurisdictions; clauses 82(3) and 40(3) provide for the transfer of funds between the government of Canada and a province having a comprehensive pension plan; and clause 87 provides for the pension appeal board hearing, if the provincial law provides for it, appeals made under a provincial pension plan so that a common jurisprudence may be developed.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to deal with the handling of the excess funds which will accumulate in the early years of the Canada pension plan. Clauses 110 to 114 of Bill No. C-136 deal with the handling of moneys received under the Canada pension plan and briefly they provide as follows: First of all, all funds received will be credited to the Canada pension plan account, including contributions and interest on securities. Second, out of this account will be paid the benefits payable under the plan and the costs of administration of the plan, and no other payments. Third, where an excess of funds is available beyond estimated payments required in the following three months, such funds will be available for purchases of securities of participating provinces or of the federal government. The proportion available for investment in the securities of any particular province is the proportion that amounts received from contributors of that province for the previous period up to 120 months is to the total of contributions received. The balance of such amounts not required for investment in provincial securities is to be invested in government of Canada securities.

Mr. Speaker, in order to ensure liquidity the Minister of Finance is authorized by this bill, on advice of the chief actuary, to specify the term of any provincial securities. The rate of interest to be charged on such provincial securities is to be the rate on similar securities of the government of Canada, which of course will vary according to the term of the securities which are purchased.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would allow a question?

Mr. Benson: I will be finished in just a moment, and then I will answer the question. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw hon. members' attention to clause 116 of Bill No. C-136, which requires a report by the chief actuary at least once every five years on the Canada pension plan account and a report whenever any bill is introduced into the House of Commons to amend this act as it is finally passed.

All hon. members know that this is legislation with far reaching effects. It is legislation which is needed in Canada in order to provide a sense of security for those of our citizens who are no longer able to work. It is, because of its very nature, complicated legislation and I urge its early approval in principle so that it may be referred to the special committee for more detailed examination.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, if the minister would permit this question: Just who does determine the amount that has to be transferred to the provinces?

Mr. Benson: This is clearly stated in the bill, and it is the Minister of Finance. And, Mr. Speaker, it is not a matter of transfer to the provinces, as my hon. friend will find on a further perusal of the bill, but is a matter of investment of the excess funds beyond those required to make all payments and to cover administration for the ensuing three months.

Mr. Monteith: Then the Minister of Finance, I gather, is the one who determines the amount, without any checking or auditing by the provinces?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows better than this.

Mr. Monteith: Don't be disgusted; just answer the question.

Mr. Benson: The Minister of Finance has the right to determine the amount that is required to meet payments out of the pension fund and administration for the ensuing three months. These funds are then set aside. The excess funds beyond these are then available for investment in provincial securities or in securities of the government of Canada. The provinces will be entitled to have invested in their securities out of this amount of money an amount based on the proportion that their contributions during a previous period up to 120 months is to all contributions to the Canada pension plan fund. The Minister of Finance is required by the bill to inform the provinces what amount is available for investment in a particular province and the province may then bring forward the securities.

Mr. Monteith: So there will be nothing left for the federal government to invest in any way whatsoever and the province has the complete determination as to the type of investment in which these funds are placed?

Mr. Benson: The province always has the right of determination as to how it will invest, how it will spend money within its own jurisdiction. There will be some funds in excess of the funds invested in the province, in that we will have contributions from the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. However, the Minister of Finance will make the other funds available for investment by the provinces, and the province must decide how it is going to spend its money.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would permit one question. Earlier in his remarks he made some reference to the relationship between the pension and the level of earnings of people who become 65 years of age five years after the plan comes into effect. I wonder if he could give us some similar examples for those people who are 65 years of age on the day the plan comes into effect.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, this is a question to which the hon. member obviously knows the answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Rhéaume: Do you?

Mr. Benson: If one is 65 years of age when this plan comes into effect and continues to work until age 70 and contribute to the Canada pension plan, he will of course be entitled to 50 per cent of benefits under the Canada pension plan. But if one is retired at age 65 and does not continue to work, or is retired at age 75 when the Canada pension plan comes into effect, he will of course only be entitled to his old age security pension of $75 per month plus any increases which may take place in this pension through either act of parliament or action resulting from the attachment of this pension to the pension index.

Mr. Rhéaume: He gets nothing, you mean.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue, inasmuch as he referred to clause 116, whether the chief actuary will be required to prepare a report every time a private member introduces a public bill to amend this act.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think the government would have to reserve the right to obtain second reading before the actuarial report is prepared. Indeed if a private member proposed a bill to amend the Canada pension plan it would take the actuary that amount of time between the introduction of the bill and second reading to prepare such a report.

Mr. Olson: May I point out that the section says the chief actuary shall, whenever any bill is introduced in or presented to the House of Commons to introduce this kind of measure, prepare this report. I suggest we will have to amend this act to take care of what the minister has suggested.

Mr. Benson: I think if it were amended with the effect of changing the contributions or benefits, it would be improper. It would certainly be improper for a private member to introduce such a bill. However, the question raised by my hon. friend is one which could very well be considered by the special committee when it considers the bill in detail.

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I had prepared a speech this afternoon which I felt was short and to the point, and of interest to the members of this house and to the public generally. However, after listening to the debate this afternoon, and particularly to the statement of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) I feel that some rebuttal to various suggestions should come from this side of this chamber.

I listened with great interest to the speech made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), and for several reasons. I listened with interest because today is the first time I have heard him make a speech in this house, and because I have a great deal of respect for him. That hon. minister referred to the white paper, and I should also like to refer to that white paper in a later part of my speech. He also referred to the inaction of the previous government. Since listening to him I have decided that several facts should be brought to the attention of hon. members and the general public.

This parliament can take a great deal of pride in some of the actions which were taken by the previous government, and I intend to refer later to those actions in detail. Since 1957 old age pensions have been increased to the extent of some $29 per month. Admittedly $19 of that increase took place under the previous government, and one must remember that it took place during a period of six years.

[Mr. Olson.]

There has been a great deal said about relating old age assistance to the cost of living index. The Minister of National Health and Welfare during her remarks this afternoon dwelt on the provisions of the Canada pension plan as they relate to adjustments to the cost of living index. At the resolution stage of this legislation the minister announced that benefits to old age pensioners would be related to the cost of living index. She should be commended for her tenacity in bringing this bill before the house, because this is the third time we have commenced our consideration of a bill to establish a Canada pension plan. I commend the minister individually and not the government as a whole. She has shown unusual and sincere devotion to the work of her department, and I give her full credit in this regard.

Mr. Speaker, I hope you will forgive me for straying for the moment from the bill now being considered, but having listened to one member of the government talk about the inaction of the former government, I feel some rebuttal is warranted.

As I understand the figures that have been given in relation to the increased benefits to old age pensioners, as a result of the adoption of this bill that increase will be between 75 cents and $1.50 per month. That is a shameful increase in relation to the $19 increase which took place during the six year period when the former government was in office. Originally I had not intended to refer to the six buck boys, but having listened to the Minister of National Revenue stoop to such low tactics as he did, I think the actions of this government to increase payments under the Old Age Assistance Act should be compared to actions taken by the previous Conservative government in this regard.

The members of the official opposition have been accused on many occasions of holding up the business of the house by filibustering.

Mr. Byrne: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I heard someone say "hear, hear". Perhaps that hon. member would stand in his place and be recognized.

Mr. Pascoe: It was the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Gundlock: We have been accused of filibustering and holding up the business of this parliament, but what have hon. members opposite done? They have been guilty of taking up the time of this house by making interjections of that kind. Perhaps by straying from the subject now under consideration

I am also taking up the time of this house, but having listened to the debate this afternoon I trust that Your Honour will be lenient and allow me to discuss some of the things which have been said.

I have on my desk several editorials to which I should like to refer during my speech this evening. As I have said, having witnessed a member of the cabinet stoop to very low tactics, I believe we in the opposition have the right to also use this kind of tactic to point out the inadequacies of this government in its actions to increase social assistance. In view of the unjust accusations which have been made by the Minister of National Revenue and a relatively small number of members sitting to my left today I think one should compare those accusations with the facts, keeping in mind always the bragging words of those members about the increased payments to old age pensioners included in this pension plan, and the relationship of those payments to the cost of living index. I will be through very shortly, Mr. Speaker. What did the former government do? How can you condemn the former government? You are bringing about an increase of 75 cents or maybe $1.50 a month when the former government brought about increases of $6 and $10, with an eventual increase amounting to $25 a month. I have great respect for the minister, Mr. Speaker. I am not referring to her. I am referring to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) who attacked the former government and I am simply trying to point out the difference.

This brings up a point I want to raise in my speech and which is referred to in an editorial I wish to include in my speech. I hesitate to read it all but for the moment I will read part of it. It is from the Ottawa Journal of August 12 last and reads as follows:

> On April 1, 1963, Liberal leader Pearson promised that if his party elected a government it would act within "the 60 days of decision" to establish a contributory pension plan. On August 10, 1964, having been in office since April 22, 1963, the Pearson government produced a white paper on its pension plan.

I referred to that a moment ago and I also complimented the minister on her tenacity in bringing such a measure before the house for the third time. Frankly I think she is to be complimented but, Mr. Speaker, not the government.

> One positive statement in the white paper is that the plan will not be effective until January, 1966, at the earliest. Then the collection of contributions will begin. Pension benefits would start a year later but would not reach their full level until 1976. There is also in the white paper a warning to those who wait expectantly that the rate of contribution in certain categories will be higher than had been proposed earlier.
> There is not a word about the hopes on the pension raised and then cast down. There is no mention—

These are not my words.

> —of what the pugnacious Miss LaMarsh did in making Ontario co-operation in the plan more difficult because she dragged it into the provincial election last year.

All politicians would naturally do that. These are not my words.

> Costs of the plan, on which many questions have ben raised, will be examined in the course of the parliamentary committee study the government has promised.

If I may deviate for a moment, Mr. Speaker, there are two points I want to make. One of them I referred to a moment ago and it has to do with the old age pensioners and the Old Age Assistance Act. The minister has referred to the fact that in the bill before us their pensions are tied to the cost of living index, but because of certain interjections, particularly by the Minister of National Revenue who asked "what did the former government do", I want to repeat by way of emphasis what the former government did and what kind of comparison we have.

From reading the bill, news releases and the minister's speech at the resolution stage and from listening to the minister's speech today it is my understanding that if the cost of living rises to a certain point the pensions of these people will be increased by 75 cents a month or a maximum increase of $1.50 a month. I repeat again by way of emphasis that the former government increased these pensions much more than that, as a matter of fact up to $25 a month in stages. We only claim credit for part of the last $10 increase, but for all of the $19 before that. Compare that with what the six buck boys did prior to that time. These facts should be made known to the house and to the people of Canada so that they can make a comparison. What is $1.50 a month compared with $10 a month? That is the real point I want to make. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said this afternoon, these people might well be referred to as the forgotten group so far as the government is concerned. They brag about 75 cents or $1.50 a month ten years from now when we have already done ten times as much. I hear a member behind me say that we might change the "six buck boys" to the "six bit boys". Another member says "six bit gal", but actually I have great respect for the minister.

I want to refer to previous speakers, particularly the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) who has a lot to say for a few moments when he speaks, but is never in the house either before or after. I noticed today and the other day on the resolution stage that the hon. member was not in his place until the time came for him to speak. I have referred to him on several occasions and I am glad to see he is here at the moment. Since he is here I should like to say that in listening to his speech on the resolution stage and earlier today on second reading I can only conclude that he has done nothing but read Hansard. In reading his speech in Hansard I saw that everything he said had been said previously on the resolution stage and could be found in Hansard.

Mr. Grégoire: You do not deserve any answer.

Mr. Gundlock: If you would like to answer I will give you time.

Mr. Grégoire: No, it is not necessary.

Mr. Gundlock: That is what I thought.

Mr. Grégoire: It is not necessary at all.

Mr. Webb: Send him down some peanuts.

Mr. Grégoire: We do not answer to nuts.

Mr. Gundlock: Well, I answer to nuts because some people listen to them and as I listened to your speech today—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order, I suggest the hon. member address the Chair.

Mr. Grégoire: He is not following the rules. He does not know the rules because he is never here. Anyway, you will be out of here next time.

Mr. Gundlock: As I was saying in this regard to the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) through you, Mr. Speaker, I should like to leave these few words with him. I listened to his speech very carefully—

Mr. Grégoire: You cannot do it; it is too difficult for you.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, at least I listened to his speech.

Mr. Grégoire: You listened, but you did not understand; that is the difference.

Mr. Gundlock: I hear some hon. members say I made a mistake in listening to his speech. Probably I did. If I may, I should like to continue with my speech. I should like to go back for a moment to what I call the fifth party.

[Mr. Gundlock.]

Mr. Grégoire: Dispense; it is not necessary.

Mr. Gundlock: The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) told us earlier, and I rather enjoyed this, that it was his unpleasant task to collect revenues from the various parties for the funds of this pension plan. Well, I should like to say that it is not nearly as unpleasant for him as it is for some of the rest of us who have to pay. I refer particularly to the self-employed people and to farmers. I simply wanted to ask a question of the minister, if I may. He explained part of it, but only part of it so far as I am concerned.

Now, the self-employed people pay 3.6 per cent, and employers and employees each pay 1.8 per cent, so that is about equal. The question I have in mind is this. What do self-employed people like farmers do during periods, perhaps short periods, when they employ someone on a part-time basis?

Miss LaMarsh: It was in my speech.

Mr. Gundlock: I am sorry, I could not hear that. I should like this question taken into consideration.

I see the hon. member is still in his seat, so—

Mr. Grégoire: You would prefer it if I were not here, but I am here.

Mr. Gundlock: I am very glad you are here.

I want to refer to an editorial in today's Montreal Gazette which carries the headline "The Exhausted Parliament". Some of us may be exhausted, and some of us may not. Some of us have been here and some of us have been here only on occasion. I should like to quote briefly from the editorial:

> This session of the House of Commons should prove in one respect at least to have value. For it has set the precedent of the sort of session that should never be allowed to happen again.

Mr. Grégoire: Whose fault is it?

Mr. Gundlock: I hear questions, Mr. Speaker, that are not addressed to you. I have been called to order and told that I should address you, Mr. Speaker. I should like you to ask any hon. member who has a question to address the Chair, otherwise I should be allowed to make my speech.

Mr. Grégoire: It is not important.

Mr. Gundlock: I think it is very important. As a matter of fact, if you do not want to address the Speaker, then I do not have to do so. If the Speaker is going to call me to order, then he should call you to order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order; the hon. member who is now making his speech has a right, under the rules of this house, to make his speech without being interrupted. I am sure the hon. member for Lapointe would want to accord the hon. member for Lethbridge the ordinary courtesies of the house. The hon. member for Lethbridge.

Mr. Gundlock: In deference to you, Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing, if the hon. member for Lapointe wishes to ask me a question, to yield the floor to him. Otherwise, Mr. Speaker, this is what I wanted to say. As I said earlier the members of the official opposition have been blamed particularly for taking the time of this house.

Mr. Grégoire: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gundlock: I pointed out to hon. members of this house, and I hope to the public of Canada, several reasons why I felt the official opposition was not responsible for taking all this time. I have repeated this statement on several occasions. I think the main reason this session has taken so long and has led to such editorial headlines as the one I have quoted, is the multiplicity of parties. The reference is to this exhausted parliament. I want to say that I do not feel exhausted and I do not feel the minister whose bill we are discussing feels exhausted. Some of the other members of this house may feel exhausted because they are not here. They must have something else to do; perhaps the work has been too much for them.

I wanted to say that the main reason for the length of the session is not the work of this house but results from the fact that there are five parties in the house.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask a question?

Mr. Gundlock: Yes.

Mr. Grégoire: Does the hon. member not agree that when the Conservatives have disappeared after the next election it will be better in this house?

Mr. Gundlock: In answer to the hon. member I would agree that when this house returns to being a two party house we will have a much better house and much shorter sessions. We will get on with our business. I am not too sure, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservatives will disappear.

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, they will: You will disappear.

Mr. Gundlock: Perhaps I will, but not the Conservative party. In the light of what I have been reading in the newspapers, I say there will be other parties disappear but not the Conservative party.

Mr. Grégoire: We will be back, anyway.

Mr. Gundlock: You are talking again. You talk about maintaining the rules here, so let us see you do some of it.

I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that the reason this session is so long and so tedious—do not get the wrong impression, we are still here fighting—is the five parties. I refer particularly to the fifth party.

Mr. Grégoire: You are the fifth.

Mr. Gundlock: What do we see in connection with the fourth party? We see the leader of it operating under government controls. What do we see in connection with the next one?

Mr. Knowles: Order; what has this to do with the bill?

Mr. Gundlock: I hear someone say "what has this to do with the bill?" What do questions which are not addressed to you have to do with the bill, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Knowles: My question was addressed to you, Mr. Speaker. What does this have to do with the bill?

Mr. Gundlock: I am simply answering questions that were addressed to me by an hon. member of this house. Is that good enough?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Gundlock: I should like, then, to refer to some statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Grégoire: You both have nothing to say.

Mr. Gundlock: Since you do so much talking why don't you pay your telephone bill?

Mr. Knowles: To whom was that remark addressed?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. I would request members of the house to allow the hon. member for Lethbridge to continue, and I would request him to confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Gundlock: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Earlier today I prepared a very mellow speech and I wanted a couple of questions answered.

Mr. Byrne: What speech?

Mr. Gundlock: I have not been able to get to it yet. I listened to the minister, to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and to some interjections, and quite frankly I have not yet got to the notes of my speech.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre expressed a fear that this bill might be killed once it was referred to a committee. We in the opposition do not feel that way. We want it to go to a committee where many of our questions can be answered in detail. The hon. member also said the government should undertake more public relations with respect to the Canada pension plan, and I agree with him on that.

Further, the hon. member said he was a little worried about central control. I would point out that he belongs to a party that believed in central control. In fact it held power in one province for over 20 years, yet now he says he is afraid of central control. I too do not like the idea of central control very much and, as was pointed out by another hon. member on the resolution stage, I believe private enterprise could do a better job of accounting and controlling the fund that will be accumulated.

The thing which surprises me is that an hon. member will say one thing at one time and another at another time when it suits his purpose, particularly regarding the rules and regulations of the house.

Earlier I was quoting from an editorial and I shall continue:

> Costs of the plan, on which many questions have been raised, will be examined in the course of the parliamentary committee study the government has promised.

We in the official opposition endorse the idea of a committee study because we think that when things are ironed out in committee, third reading and final approval will be hastened.

The editorial added:

> If more problems become evident then the government, in the light of its record on pensions in the last year, may be counted on to postpone action again.

I sincerely hope there will not be any more postponement. The editorial continued:

> The faith of those who voted Liberal because they expected to retire in a few years with a good pension to which they had contributed is being sorely tried.

I shall not say anything further. I have listened to many interjections from the left hand corner, incidentally from a seat in which I used to sit myself.

Mr. Rhéaume: You were not as noisy, though.

[Mr. Gundlock.]

Mr. Gundlock: When I sat there I did not say a word.

Mr. Byrne: You haven't yet.

Mr. Gundlock: There are some members opposite who have not spoken yet. You know, Mr. Speaker, having listened to these interjections tonight I recall a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) in which he referred to the House of Commons as being more like a barn than a debating assembly. If I had the same gift of words as the Minister of Agriculture I might use different words.

Mr. Baldwin: That is not a gift, it is a curse.

Mr. Gundlock: Speaking on the resolution stage, as recorded at page 9915 of Hansard for November 9, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon) said:

> I am also concerned about the very high cost of administration which this plan will necessitate. The career of every citizen from the age of 18 to the age of 70 will have to be followed in the minutest detail.

I agree with that statement, because we have had experience of this many times.

I refer in particular to the experience in this regard of various of the provinces including the provinces of Ontario and Alberta. The plans adopted in these provinces appeared at the outset to be very good. Those responsible were complimented as the government has been complimented today. But there is one fact, which I suggest must be taken seriously into consideration—a fact which justifies my saying a word of warning, or a word of caution. In the last few years, say, in the last 10 years, the cost of most of these schemes has doubled. This is a thought I should like to leave with the minister and with the house. If the plan now under consideration follows the same pattern, if the same trend as to cost is to become apparent, do we not need to look very closely indeed at the legislation we have before us? In these circumstances I am very happy that the government is allowing this measure to go to a committee where the whole matter may be considered in the light of experience with cooperative plans of this kind in the past.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the hon. member a question? My question is very simple indeed. What did he say, exactly?

Mr. Gundlock: The question is so simple that it will not take long to answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The time allotted to the hon. gentleman has expired.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): The hon. member who has just resumed his seat mentioned several times in the course of his speech that there were a lot of interjections but I think, in all fairness, it should be pointed out that the interventions did not come from this side of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, since the house did pass a resolution to appoint a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to consider Bill No. C-136, an act to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors, I think it would be pointless to discuss the bill in detail at this stage. I will therefore confine myself to the general principle.

Mr. Speaker, though it is rather difficult now to foresee the repercussions or the impact the operation of the Canadian or Quebec pension plans will have on the Canadian economy, I shall, during the few minutes at my disposal, try to list the advantages which it seems to have in the eyes of this private member, who would by no means pose as an expert.

The economic principle involved with respect to this pension plan is to divert capital that would be used mostly for consumer goods to investments or compulsory savings. Of course, the contributions paid by employees and employers to be entitled to the pension plan benefits would represent huge amounts that will be withdrawn from circulation, therefore, from direct consumption, and which will pile up in a fund.

It may be said that consumption means immediate satisfaction of certain needs, that is, a short term satisfaction: the amounts of money owned or earned are immediately put into circulation, giving the owner an immediate satisfaction.

Therefore, the portion of those revenues which will be transferred to this pension plan and this investment fund will, in the long run, satisfy the persons concerned. In other words, the percentage of the amount which will secure a revenue to the contributor at the age of 65 or 70, will be put back into circulation only when the individual shall attain pensionable age. The other portion of the paid amount will be affected to a capital fund which will increase from year to year.

Naturally, the benefits which the Canadian people may draw individually from this pension plan justify the sacrifices and inconveniences which may be caused over a period of 20 or 30 years when consumption will be affected by the transfer of funds for investment purposes.

The other portion of the revenue which will be used to accumulate funds for the provinces, will be put back into circulation, but to the general advantage of the Canadian people. Consequently, that will benefit each and every Canadian.

A new country like Canada must force itself to save in that way and everyone must do it willingly to ensure his own or his country's economic future.

It is said, with good reason, that the amounts that will accumulate in that pension fund will exceed $10 billion during the next ten years. Do Canadians realize the repercussions that the investment of such a huge amount of money can have on the Canadian economy? Of course, if the provinces use it for capital investments only, such as roads, schools, public utilities, it is obvious that it will not bring many changes in our struggle for our economic independence, except to prevent borrowing on foreign markets. As far as Quebec is concerned, in particular, that fund will exert an influence on the economic future of the province and the situation of the Quebec people with regard to foreign capital which swamps that province. It is sufficient to think of the General Finance Company and the forthcoming implementation of the steel complex to realize for what purpose the province will use these funds.

Didn't Premier Jean Lesage say:

> We have undertaken to free ourselves economically; this cannot be achieved if the people of Quebec have nothing to say about the way their savings are to be invested?

The French Canadians of the province of Quebec realize how important it is to use such permissible means as this one to take over control of their economy. It is probably an advantage for them to be grouped in one area for, if they really want to, they can succeed. This goal will be achieved as soon as they understand that it can be done, not by putting the blame on others, or isolating themselves from the rest of the world or by making speeches on the constitution, but rather by working, studying, saving and facing up to their responsibilities. This is how the Americans became rich, became masters of their economy.

The financial situation of the Canadians of the other provinces is not much better, since the Americans have almost $28 billion invested throughout the country.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I do not object to the principle of trying to attract foreign capital in our country, because it is thanks to those investments that our country has developed so rapidly, but the desire to reach economic independence is normal for a country, and compulsory savings is the only means to achieve it.

Everyone knows that this objective cannot be reached by sudden changes in the established order of things; this should never be forgotten. It is imperative to apply immediately some measures on a long term basis, in order to regain control of our economy. Besides, the ideas of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in this respect are very well known.

It is obvious that to set up this investment fund, Canadians will have to accept further sacrifices, because a pay as you go pension fund, as first suggested by the federal government, would have been less expensive for contributors.

Mr. Speaker, even if some people claim otherwise, I am positive that Canadians are willing to accept such sacrifices, if they can in this way regain control over part of their economy. And we should not be afraid to impose such a compulsory savings system. Those who contend that it is a hidden tax levied on the citizens are unworthy to represent the Canadian people, because they do not reflect their aspirations and their love for their country.

Let us follow the example of western Germany, which recovered after the war to become one of the most progressive and industrialized nations in Europe, only 20 years after it had been crushed in that war. How was this feat accomplished? By the sacrifices accepted by the people who entrusted the government with a large part of their revenues so that the state could invest it in profitable ventures for their benefit.

As for us, French Canadians of Quebec, the role of the government must be a positive and active one as far as the economic development of the province and the country is concerned.

It is, therefore, a good thing that the Canada pension plan was amended following fruitful negotiations between the provinces and the federal government, for it was important that the plan be the same all across Canada, whether it was administered by the provinces or the federal government. That is what we mean by co-operative federalism, by a central government which understands the provinces who also have to look after matters coming under their jurisdiction, and it is only through this kind of co-operation between the federal and provincial governments that Canada will be a country composed of 11 happy governments instead of one happy government and ten unhappy ones. Then you have a strong Canada, a united Canada.

Mr. Speaker, this new co-operation between the various provincial governments and the federal government is being used by some people as an excuse for the statement that we are legislating for only nine provinces out of ten.

On the contrary, we are legislating for the entire country but leaving the provinces free to adhere or not to certain measures that might be of provincial jurisdiction. Quebec can no more prevent nine provinces from benefiting from certain measures, through collective action if they so choose, than the nine other provinces can stop Quebec from pulling out of joint projects without giving up any tax benefits.

Remarkably enough, those who are finding fault with this type of legislation are the very ones who wanted the province of Quebec to be free to legislate in those fields, and were accusing the government of centralizing tendencies.

But now that we are getting away from centralization, the government is being accused of never legislating on behalf of the province of Quebec. According to others, the tax burden is falling solely on the small wage earner. But what about the employer who has to pay out as much as all his employees together, and for the sole security of those employees?

Mr. Speaker, it can fairly be said that without the leadership of the federal government in this field, there may never have been any pension plan in the province of Quebec and that without the steps taken by Quebec in that field, the rest of Canada may never have had the benefits of a consolidated fund.

Experts claim that the contributions paid into this fund will have no substantial effects on private economies and this contention is based on the experience gained through the first great social security plans introduced after 1940.

Judging from the experience of other countries where a pension plan has already been established, the white paper that was submitted to us as a basis for the pension plan gives a rather fair idea of the possible economic repercussions of implementing the pension plan. There does not seem to be any reference to accumulated funds, but rather to the possible effects on the economy of the country of the benefits eventually to be paid to the pensioners under the pension plan. But I sincerely believe that, in addition to providing security for the Canadian workers, the Canada pension plan, or the Quebec pension plan, can really become an instrument in the hands of the provinces attempting to secure their economic freedom.

I believe that the pension plan could be included in the legislation already in force within the framework of fiscal decentralization, such as:

1. The provinces' growing share of the personal income tax, which from 5 per cent in 1954 will reach 24 per cent in 1967; and the provinces' larger share of the estates tax, which has risen from 50 to 75 per cent.

2. The return to the provinces which so desire of the joint programs coming under provincial jurisdiction.

3. The pension plan may also follow the same principle, in the sense that it makes considerable amounts of money available to the provinces.

Mr. Willoughby: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader whether the business is unchanged for tomorrow.

Mr. McIlraith: There is no change, Mr. Speaker, and should by any chance this bill be finished before tomorrow night we would call perhaps some of the smaller bills on the order paper; item No. 7, a bill to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, item No. 58, measure to amend the Coal Production Assistance Act, and item No. 51, second reading of Bill No. C-137, to authorize certain capital expenditures of Canadian National Railways.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

THE SENATE—INQUIRY AS TO REFORM MEASURES PROPOSED

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) a question arising out of the wide and critical comment that has developed over his latest Senate appointment, and particularly as it reflected upon some of his previous appointments to the other place.

I asked the Prime Minister whether it was his intention to proceed with item No. 40 on the order paper, and whether that was the extent of the government's intention for reform of the other place. His reply was almost typically evasive, that the government in due course would go ahead with this piece of legislation.

One of my reasons for raising this question on the adjournment motion, not that it will do much good, is not only to point up the fact that my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has a bill on the order paper which would abolish the Senate, but also to underline the phonyness of this so-called new politics, about which the Prime Minister talks. This is the party that was coming in with new politics. Well, here is an example of it, Mr. Speaker.

I should just like to read from the Liberal party program for the general election of 1962. This statement is tucked away at page 22, about reform of the Senate. It says:

> A new Liberal government will discuss with the provinces a constitutional reform—

We are not quite sure what that means, but it has something to do with the Senate. The program then states:

> —and will propose, for example, that future Senators be appointed for 15 years or to the age of 75.

I point out that this bill on the order paper only affects senators at age 75. At least if we had this 15 year provision contained in this program we would not have this picture of a young lawyer from Toronto, Mr. Aird, at 41 years of age, with a promising career in front of him, at $15,000 a year until he reaches age 75. Rather, he would be disappearing from the picture at age 56. However, this is another example of the new politics.

One of the efforts often made by young Liberals—and I see one sitting over there from Hamilton East (Mr. Munro), who likes to take this stance of a radical, go ahead party—is to scorn our Conservative friends to my right, because of their reactionary approach to things. I point out to those individuals that here we have an example of our friends to the right of Mr. Speaker coming forward with an even more drastic reform regarding the Senate.

What are we to take from this situation? Charles Lynch put it very amusingly last Friday in his column in the Ottawa Citizen in this way; under the heading "No rocking of the boat":

> A hard-working party bagman is rewarded.
> Party politics being what they are, somebody has to raise the funds. It's hard work, being a party bagman, and it's thankless work, in these days when there isn't much patronage to play with.
> A bagman's lot is not a happy one unless, as sometimes happens, he hits the jackpot in the form of an appointment to the Senate.
> Bagmen generally deal in boxcar figures, and so it is not inappropriate to mention what a Senate appointment means to them as a tangible reward for their services.
> The most recent appointee is 41 years of age. Should he live to 75, his total emolument at $15,000 a year would be $510,000—a lifetime income dwarfing such measly items as the cash award with the Nobel prize, or a win in the Irish sweepstakes, or a football pool in Britain.

I am not complaining from the point of view of some of my Liberal friends across the way, like the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Habel), who all of us hope before the sacred age of 75 rolls around will be called; but some of us feel that the other place should be reserved for people like Azellus Denis, and Yvon Dupuis, because that is the natural place for them. The last seven or eight appointments have been made along this line.

This new approach from the radicals, the reformers, over on the other side is just too much, Mr. Speaker, and I felt I had to draw the attention of the house even at ten o'clock to how inconsistent and how silly the Liberals' claim to be the reformers and the radicals is.

The real question is, when are they going to get rid of the Senate? I should have liked to have the time to go back and read a beautiful little speech made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in 1962. I would refer all my friends who would like to read something of charm about Senate reform to page 1153 of Hansard for the session of 1962, wherein he refers to Mackenzie King's stand on Senate reform and stands bravely forth as saying that aside from that one boner in 1925 the Liberal party has always played it nice and safe and cozy on Senate reform. They certainly have played it cozy without going so far as to say they are really going to reform the Senate. In 1962 they did suggest they were going to limit appointments to 15 years. I suggest that even if Mr. Aird or Mr. Lang or these other characters are wonderful party bagmen, they are a little too young to be given this fantastic emolument until the age of 75 and, of course, at the rate the Liberals move on some of these reforms we are not even sure they will get this reform setting an age limit of 75 through the house. My friend points out that even this reform does not apply to people who were appointed before the bill comes into effect.

Mr. Habel: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, you know it is against the rules.

Mr. Habel: I wish you would.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. J. Watson MacNaught (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely sure that the discussion of Senate reform is in order tonight because, as the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) said, there is an item on the order paper, order No. 40, which provides for a measure of Senate reform.

Mr. Knowles: I have one there too.

Mr. MacNaught: This measure will be brought on for debate as soon as possible after the legislation outlined by the Prime Minister has been dealt with by the house, and I am sure there will be ample opportunity then to discuss all aspects of Senate reform.

I also detected in the remarks of the hon. member for Port Arthur an inference that this party is only interested in appointing what he referred to as party bagmen. I want to point out to him that when I first entered the house back in 1945 a very learned legal light from Stanstead in the province of Quebec, Mr. John Hackett, was sitting on the opposite side of the house. He was appointed to the Senate by the former prime minister, Louis St. Laurent.

I also seem to recall that on another occasion Mr. St. Laurent offered a Senate appointment to Mr. M. J. Coldwell which he, for reasons best known to himself, refused. I do not believe that by any stretch of the imagination these two men could be called bagmen of the Liberal party.

Mr. Fisher: Look at the last eight.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, November 17, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

Fourth report of standing committee on standing orders—Mr. Asselin (Notre Dame de Grâce).

UNITED NATIONS

PROVISION FOR PURCHASE OF CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS BY CO-OPERATIVE CREDIT UNION

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-139, to provide adequate national agricultural credit to the food and agriculture organization (F.A.O. and the Canada pension plan).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Ormiston: The objectives of this bill are spelled out in considerable detail in the explanatory note, so in the interests of brevity and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from the first paragraph:

> This bill provides for a United Nations co-operative credit union whereby more than 100 nations may buy the food and agricultural products of Canada on term credit; and by so distributing these products, actively contribute toward an expanding world economy, vitally strengthen Canada's position in the food market of the world, and assure a rising standard of living for Canada's farmers, fishermen and forest workers; and, in so far as revolution marches on an empty stomach, contribute to world peace.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED FOREIGN AID CONTRIBUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it the intention of the government to greatly extend and increase Canada's aid under the Colombo plan during the current fiscal year? If so, is the minister in a position to make the appropriate announcement prior to the discussion of his estimates?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have already made the announcement, on November 14.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister care to tell the house about any increased contribution Canada is going to make by way of foreign aid, particularly through technical assistance programs of the United Nations, as has been announced in the press? Can the minister tell the house whether any steps have been taken by the various nations toward making up for the decision of the United States not to contribute to this program, with a view to seeing to it that the program is not curtailed as a result of the United States withdrawal, temporary though it may be?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There has been no action taken with regard to the last part of my hon. friend's question. The United States contribution represents about 40 per cent of the total program. The United States has not said it will not irrevocably meet its normal commitment. Yesterday we pledged our contribution totalling some $7,325,000 for 1965. This includes our contribution to the special fund in the amount of $5 million and our contribution to the expanded program for technical assistance which will be at the same level as in 1964, $2,325,000.

Mr. Douglas: Since at the moment the United States have not indicated their willingness to contribute, if the remaining nations were to double their contributions this would certainly make up the deficit, and it would not be a very large sum. Is the Canadian government giving any thought to doubling its contribution if the other nations participating are willing to do the same, so this program does not have to be drastically reduced?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I do not think Canada need be ashamed of the support it has given to this program. Canada, as a close and understanding friend of the United States, is aware of the contribution that country makes to the activities of the United Nations. I cannot believe that the United States will not, in the light of developing situations, continue to be one of the mainstays of the organization.

Mr. Nesbitt: As a supplementary question, since the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in reply to an earlier question of mine that he made an announcement concerning the increase in aid to the Colombo plan countries last Saturday, some place or other, I wonder if the minister could make the announcement in this house as to the extent of the increase in aid?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I did make an announcement in the house on November 14—

Mr. Monteith: We were not sitting on the 14th.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —November 14, 1963—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —when I outlined a three year program, including the provisions for 1963-64 and 1964-65. I also answered a number of questions along this line which were addressed to me by my hon. friend in the external affairs committee during this session of parliament.

Mr. Nesbitt: Now that the minister has specified what year he was referring to, is he in a position to give us some indication of the specific amount of the increase in aid to the Colombo plan countries? Can he do that?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has perhaps forgotten that on that date, November 14, 1963 I indicated that we were increasing our contribution by some $70 million in general terms. I went into considerable detail on this in the external affairs committee when my hon. friend was present, acting as a very distinguished and able vice chairman.

Mr. Nesbitt: I am sorry to belabour the point, but I have one further question. In view of the minister's circumlocution in this regard could he answer one question? Is an announcement to this effect going to be made to the United Nations within the next week?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says "to the United Nations." The announcement is not made to the United Nations. This program for the developing countries is one provided under recommendations made by the government to this parliament, and has nothing to do with the United Nations as such. My hon. friend is probably confusing this with the question asked by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam which had to do with the technical assistance program of the United Nations, and the UN special fund.

CONGO—EFFORTS TO OBTAIN RELEASE OF CANADIAN HOSTAGES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

During the last few hours did he receive any communication from his representative in Africa, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), who went out there to see if it would not be possible to obtain the release of the Canadian hostages held at Stanleyville?

We read all kinds of reports in newspapers, but we have had no official statement from the minister.

The house would like to know if the minister's ambassador was successful in obtaining the release of the Canadian hostages held in Stanleyville.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer is dealing with a critical and very important situation. He is doing his utmost, together with representatives of other countries. Unfortunately, the situation is so serious that we have not yet received any very favourable report.

But I may assure the hon. member that our friend is doing his best, and we acknowledge his efforts with pride and gratefulness.

CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the coming apparent change of attitude of the United States toward China, particularly with reference to recognition of China, does the minister not think now is the time for Canada to take a lead by diplomatically recognizing China and thus put his words into action?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the validity of the premise involved in my hon. friend's question; therefore I could not usefully answer the remaining part of the question.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government prepared to recognize China?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As I said last week, Mr. Speaker, I dealt with this matter rather fully on May 22, 1964.

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since May, 1964, have the circumstances changed? In view of the fact that China now has some knowledge and information about nuclear weapons, has the attitude of the minister or the government changed or remained static since May, 1964?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, these additional factors, to which my hon. friend directs our attention, naturally are playing a part in studies that are current.

TRADE

GATT—REQUEST FOR LIST OF CANADIAN GOODS TO BE CONSIDERED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that yesterday at the conference in Geneva 17 nations submitted proposals for tariff reductions, when will the proposals that were submitted by Canada be made known to the members of this house?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the negotiations that began on November 17 by the tabling of offer lists and exceptions lists in Geneva are being carried on in secret, and I hope that until the negotiations are concluded members of this house do not hear about them.

Mr. Olson: How long will it be until some of the producers in this country know which products are being offered for tariff reductions?

Mr. Sharp: I would hesitate to give a forecast of the length of the negotiations. I think they will extend over a very considerable period, and an announcement will be made when agreement is reached.

Mr. Olson: Has the minister any reason to believe that these negotiations will succeed if there are no proposals respecting agricultural commodities, the inclusion of which is insisted upon by the United States and France?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we would not be engaging in these negotiations if we did not think they will succeed. The only decision that has been made so far is that of November 16, the suggested reductions in tariffs on industrial products should be tabled by the various participating countries. The question of the reduction on agricultural products has not yet been decided in the sense of the method for negotiation or the tabling of lists, but it is the firm view of Canada and of the United States that these negotiations should cover the full range of the articles in which we are interested.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I do not wish to press the minister to give any information which might injure the negotiations which are going on, but since the European common market countries have already made it known that they have submitted lists of items with regard to which they are not prepared to agree to reductions, and these items constitute 16 per cent of the total, can the hon. gentleman tell us whether Canada has submitted a list of items with respect to which it is not prepared to permit reductions and, if so, what percentage of the total would be involved?

Mr. Sharp: As most hon. members know, the form of our participation in these negotiations is different from that of the United States and Europe. We have not agreed to the general formula of a 50 per cent across the board tariff cut; Canada will be making reductions of equivalent value in terms of access to other markets. The form of our list was therefore a positive one. It was not a negative list; it was a list of reductions we are prepared to contemplate on the assumption that the other countries are making a 50 per cent across the board cut without exception. This is one of the reasons it would be most disadvantageous to our bargaining position for any of the present lists to be published; they are merely the opening of negotiations and not necessarily the lists which would be effective when we reach the end of the bargaining.

Mr. Douglas: I appreciate that point, and ask the minister whether he could give the house some idea of the percentage of the total items which would be involved in the positive list which Canada has submitted in respect of which we would be prepared to consider making reductions for equivalent value.

Mr. Sharp: No, I am not in a position to do that, because we are not proposing an across the board cut of equal amount. The list we have submitted is not in that form at all. It is a positive list of reductions we are prepared to make in return for a 50 per cent cut in other countries' tariffs. To ask what proportion is covered is to ask a question which it is impossible to answer in a comparable form.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

S.I.U. CONTRIBUTIONS TO CAMPAIGN FUNDS OF CABINET MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the position of the Minister of Justice and the rumours which were going round in Montreal over the week end, can he tell us whether he has been in touch with the election organization in his riding and his campaign manager to find out if he was among the Liberal members who allegedly received $1,000 from the S.I.U. and Hal Banks during the last election campaign?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, there is no need for me to make an investigation to give a negative answer.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

May I put the same question to the Minister of Industry and Minister of Defence Production? Has he been in touch with his campaign manager to find out if he received $1,000 either from the S.I.U. or Hal Banks?

[Text]

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will put that question on the order paper I will see that it is answered.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON ECONOMIC REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that we have been supplied with an actuarial statement regarding the Canada pension plan I wonder whether the minister would supply the members of this house with a statement on the economic report in regard to the Canada pension plan.

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend might have made that suggestion during the course of the previous debate on the bill, not at this time. There has never been any suggestion that the economic report would now be brought forward. At present we are at the second reading stage of the bill, dealing with the matter of its principle. The actuarial report was brought forward in order to assist the individuals concerned. We already have had reference to an economic report and some of its findings in the white paper which has been out for some months now. Also, a number of economists are assisting my hon. friend, some of whom are in the other place and who are often in this chamber's gallery.

It seems to me quite reasonable, Mr. Speaker, since we are dealing with a bill at hand and not general matters, and considering that this afternoon there will be an opportunity to hear the Minister of Finance on this point, that all the information necessary will be available without further discussion of the economic report.

Mr. Winkler: A supplementary question to the minister. The minister herself has now suggested that such a report is in existence, and I believe her parliamentary secretary at one time stated that it was in existence and completed. Therefore, because of the broad ramifications of the matter and the broad interest as indicated by the minister, surely this is the proper stage to have this document, not later on.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I will address to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that after second reading the pension plan will be referred to a special committee, would the Prime Minister consider at the same time referring the economic report on the Canada pension plan to the economic council for their study?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the economic implications of the plan are referred to in the white paper which my hon. friend has no doubt studied and which the committee can also study. I understand that the Minister of Finance will be making a statement later in the debate, I hope this afternoon, on the economic implications of this plan.

Mr. Starr: I would again ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider referring this report to the economic council for their consideration and views.

Mr. Pearson: I do not think that course would serve any useful purpose at this stage, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winkler: A further supplementary question to the minister. I should like to ask her how far she anticipates proceeding with the bill as it is presently before us before prorogation.

Miss LaMarsh: Well, Mr. Speaker, we are of course in the hands of the house now. Presupposing—as I hope will be the fact—that approval in principle is given by this house, we will then be in the hands of the committee and it will be up to them how quickly they deal with it. We will give them all the information they need, as we have indeed given it in this bill. There was more supplementary information given both to this house and to the public about this plan than about any other piece of legislation in history. It is only unfortunate that some of my hon. friends opposite do not read it.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance which the minister has attached to this bill, is it not all the more important that we be given a copy of the economic report? And is there any reason in the world why we, as the House of Commons, should not receive that economic report before this matter is referred to the committee?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MANITOBA—SUGGESTED UPWARD REVISION OF MAIL CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Postmaster General. It is prompted by the fact that an additional gasoline tax has been imposed in the province of Manitoba, thus imposing great hardship on mail contractors using trucks. Has the minister given instructions for an upward revision of these mail contracts to take care of the gasoline tax increase in the province of Manitoba?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that the effect of the taxes of the different provinces on postal contracts is a question for the orders of the day.

Mr. Mandziuk: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the Postmaster General is quite prepared to answer and could have answered the question. If I put it on the order paper it will bog down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I suggest that the hon. member do put it on the order paper.

PUBLIC WORKS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO RIVER DREDGING

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Could he tell me if his department intends to proceed this year with the deepening of both the Mille Iles and Back rivers?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker—

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely there is no great urgency that would require a reply at this time on orders of the day. Would the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Pigeon: But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, that I had given notice of my question to the minister and he is willing to reply.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR EQUALIZATION OF WELFARE PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the fact that there is a great disparity between the welfare payments made by the various provinces and the welfare payments made by the Indian affairs branch, will the minister undertake to guarantee that the Indian affairs branch welfare payments will be raised to a level equal to those paid by the provinces, in order that by means of higher welfare payments the provincial governments will not entice native Indians to come under provincial plans when they may not desire to do so?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is surely a very good question for the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REMOVAL FROM CITIZENSHIP COURTS OF PORTRAITS OF QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will he now table in the house the instructions issued under his authority to the citizenship courts to remove portraits of Her Majesty the Queen, and at the same time will he give the house an explanation of his unprecedented and unwarranted action?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the right hon. Leader of the Opposition had the courage to make charges against the government about this yesterday, at a press conference, I do not feel it would be proper for me to reply in his absence, and I would very much like him to be in his seat when I do give him my answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR DISCUSSION OF DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in order to see whether the government's courage is on the same level as that expressed by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, would the President of the Privy Council as house leader tell us whether we can have the estimates of the Department of External Affairs on Thursday, in order to dispel the web of obfuscation so ably woven by the Secretary of State for External Affairs with regard to Canada's position concerning a number of aspects of international relations?

An hon. Member: Come on. Where is the courage?

Mr. Woolliams: Where is the courage on Banks, too?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is usual to announce the business at the conclusion of the day's sitting, and I will be glad to announce Thursday's business tonight.

[Later:]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that the time is fast approaching when the United Nations will be meeting officially, could the minister advise the house whether he expects his estimates will be studied before that meeting, so the official delegates and parliamentary observers from Canada will learn the opinions of the house, prior to the meeting of the United Nations, on some of the important matters which undoubtedly will have to be discussed there?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to speak to the house leader about this.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as house leader. Will arrangements be made for the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to be brought before the house prior to the meeting of the United Nations, so the opinions of the house can be conveyed to the official delegates and the parliamentary observers on the important matters that are bound to come before the United Nations?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I shall note what the hon. member has stated. A decision as to the business of the house will be made by the usual methods, which may involve consultation with the various party house leaders. I hope to make an announcement at ten o'clock.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

FLIN FLON, MAN.—ATTEMPT TO BLOW UP FEDERAL BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Has the minister anything to report or can he say what action is being taken in relation to a serious attempt which I understand was made yesterday to damage or destroy the federal building in Flin Flon, Manitoba, by the placing of some 14 to 16 sticks of powder with fuse attached in the mail depository box?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the incident was brought to my attention within a very short time after it occurred, and it is under active investigation by the police and the other authorities.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has he or has the government given any further consideration to the suggestion I made on July 17, which he said might involve government policy, that an independent appeal board similar to the courtmartial appeal boards in the armed forces should be set up for the hearing of cases such as the one in Montreal that is under the minister's consideration at the moment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely this is a question for the order paper. There is no pressing urgency.

Mr. Nielsen: May I respectfully submit that the urgency lies in the treatment of the human, individual and private rights of members of the R.C.M.P. I suggest that any matter involving treatment of an individual, whether he is a member of the R.C.M.P. or otherwise, is surely a matter for urgent consideration. I think the minister has given consideration to such a procedure, and I am simply asking him whether any progress has been made in setting up such a board, which I feel to be an urgent matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I believe we have had this subject before the chamber on several occasions in the last two weeks, so there is not that degree of urgency that the hon. member alleges. Furthermore, the minister has said that he has the matter under observation and consideration and will in due course make a statement. For all these reasons and many more may I suggest this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Nielsen: I serve notice that I wish to debate the matter at ten o'clock.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA HOLDINGS OF BONDS TO BE REDEEMED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the offer of $475 million in government bonds designed to redeem some $645 million in bonds falling due December 1 and December 15. Can the minister say whether the Bank of Canada holds any of the bonds to be redeemed and, if so, how many?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the first place the bonds to be redeemed on the 1st and 15th of December total $465 million, not some $645 million. I will be glad to look into the matter and advise my hon. friend tomorrow.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—PROPOSED TIE TO COST OF LIVING INDEX

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister?

Since we are now considering a national pension plan related to the cost of living, would the Prime Minister tell us whether the government intends to introduce soon an amendment to the Family Allowances Act so that they might also be increased according to the cost of living index? Will such an amendment be introduced in 1964?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This is a matter of financial policy which cannot be answered on orders of the day.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO SERVICE FROM HALIFAX TO BERMUDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to inform the house whether negotiations have been completed for the establishment of an Air Canada service from Halifax to Bermuda?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Obviously at this time of the year this is a very important and even necessary question, but it is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Regan: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. This matter is of very great importance from the point of view of trade and has been under consideration for some period of time, I understand.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Regan: I will raise the matter at ten o'clock.

Inquiries of the Ministry

WATER RESOURCES

ELLIOT LAKE, ONT.—REPORTED RADIOACTIVE POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Does he intend to make a statement on water pollution by the uranium mining interests?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I have already been in communication with hon. members who asked this question yesterday to explain that while I have the information, I got the last report just before I came into the house. I should like to study it and make a statement tomorrow.

LAKE HURON—ACTION RESPECTING PREDICTED DROP IN WATER LEVEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Loney (Bruce): My question is directed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is the minister aware of the recent statement by the United States engineers predicting a further drop of two feet in the water level of lake Huron? If so what action, if any, is the minister's department taking?

Mr. Speaker: If I am not mistaken this question was asked either this week or last week. While it is a very serious question, nevertheless it certainly is a question for the order paper.

FRASER RIVER—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT ON TRIFURCATION PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Public Works when we can expect an announcement regarding the Fraser river trifurcation plan, which has been under study by his department for some time.

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the appropriate time would be when the study of my estimates is resumed, which I hope will be very soon.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POINT EDWARD NAVAL BASE—ALTERNATIVE EMPLOYMENT FOR WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Associate Minister of National Defence. Will the minister report to the house any progress in the alternative work program that was established to help replace men in work who were laid off at the Point Edward naval base?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is not very much I can add to what I have already said. The Swansea was supposed to have been completed; then I understand two auxiliary vessels were to be refurbished between now and the beginning of March.

Mr. MacInnis: The minister says he cannot add anything to what he has already said. He has already said nothing. I would like to know what are his intentions with regard to the older workers, especially those over 60 years of age, whose employment has been terminated and for whom nothing has been done.

Mr. Cardin: The department has done everything it possibly can to replace the people laid off at the Point Edward naval base and other bases coming under the department. There has been a considerable amount of success in doing this, and our efforts are not completed.

Mr. MacInnis: As a further supplementary question, the minister has indicated that there has been a considerable amount of success. Would the minister name one man or rather one position that has been filled by somebody laid off at that base?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

APPLICATION OF WINTER BONUS TO SUMMER COTTAGE CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour, even though he is absent.

Can the minister tell us whether it is a fact that the $500 bonus for winter housing can also be applied to summer cottages, as mentioned in some newspaper advertisements at present?

[Text]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I shall bring this question to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: I have a question for the Minister of National Defence—

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Labour has just resumed his seat it would perhaps be normal to allow the hon. member for Chapleau (Mr. Laprise) to ask his question anew?

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: May I proceed, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think it would be in order for this question to be put again. I did not get the gist of it myself and perhaps the hon. member who was listening did not, either.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, my question concerns the Minister of Labour.

Could the minister tell us whether it is true that the $500 bonus granted for winter housing construction is also applicable to summer cottages, as mentioned lately in certain newspaper advertisements?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper, surely. The hon. member for Mégantic.

Mr. Churchill: May I proceed with my question now after all these interruptions from the floor?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Those advertisements which are published in the newspapers at the present time can lead to confusion and I think it is important that we get an immediate answer in this regard.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps it is my fault, perhaps it is not. In any event, let us solve the difficulty by calling upon the hon. member for Mégantic and then the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. Churchill: I respectfully raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was recognized and started to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. I was interrupted by a point of order raised by the hon. member for Villeneuve—I am sorry, the hon. member for Lapointe. Surely, I should have the opportunity of asking my question now.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I have assumed full and adequate responsibility for the mistake, so I still intend to recognize the hon. member for Mégantic.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING MULTILATERAL FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since this is NATO week in Paris, and in the light of reports last night to the effect that President de Gaulle of France had taken a special stand on nuclear forces while Prime Minister Wilson was taking an opposite stand, what is Canada's position?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question which is far too wide in scope for an hon. member to expect to receive an answer at this time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IRISH REGIMENT—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS FROM TORONTO MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence with regard to the removal of the Irish regiment from the order of battle. What representations to retain that regiment on the order of battle have been made to the minister by members of parliament from Toronto?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): There have been a number of representations, Mr. Speaker. Practically all the Liberal members from Toronto have spoken to me about the Irish regiment, and their pride in this great regiment is understandable. I have, of course, taken their representations under advisement. I regret as much as anyone else that this great regiment, along with some others, must be placed on the supplementary order of battle.

EDUCATION

STUDENT LOANS—INQUIRY AS TO OTTAWA CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the minister has stated that the student loans measure is being administered successfully, would he care to comment on the ramifications of the federal-provincial student loans conference which took place yesterday in the west block?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): There has been a meeting—not the one to which my hon. friend refers—over the last two or three days, of all the provincial authorities who have been administering this bill with the federal officials. I hope to have a full report on it before the week is over, at which time I will make a full report to the house.

[Later:]

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose in regard to the student loan fund. Can the minister say whether the confusion in the administration of this fund that has existed in southern Ontario, particularly in the city of Toronto, is the fault of the administrator, who I believe was previously his executive assistant?

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, in the first place I do not accept the premise to the question, and in the second place the suggestion is completely wrong. As my hon. friend should know, the administration of these loans is the responsibility of the provincial governments and—

Mr. Winkler: Who is the administrator?

Mr. Pearson: The Conservative government in Queen's Park.

Mr. Gordon: I do not want to mention names, except to suggest that the one my hon. friend was alluding to was not among them to the best of my knowledge.

AGRICULTURE

OTTAWA VALLEY—EMERGENCY LEGISLATION RESPECTING DROUGHT CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. J. Greene (Renfrew South): In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I shall direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the very grievous and pressing drought condition that exists in the Ottawa valley, I wonder if the Department of Agriculture contemplates any emergency legislation to cover the hardship which is being suffered by the farmers of Renfrew county.

Mr. Speaker: This is a very important question, we all admit, but it is not the type of question which should be asked, it seems to me, on orders of the day.

[Mr. Smallwood.]

Mr. Greene: With respect, Mr. Speaker, this question is current and it is causing hardship at the moment. I give notice that I am going to debate it at ten o'clock.

Mr. C. S. Smallwood (Battle River-Camrose): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister if he would look into the situation in the Renfrew area where cattle are suffering from drought and farmers are being forced to sell them. Could he make a report today?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I looked into it and I think the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture has a statement to make on it.

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the government, of course, is always interested in the hardships imposed by virtue of drought and other conditions. On July 20 the government authorized the Minister of Agriculture to enter into agreements with the provinces whereby the federal government would share with the provinces the cost of the moving of fodder and the moving of cattle to market. On August 14 this agreement was entered into with the province of Ontario, and on October 26 with the government of Quebec.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): As a supplementary question, when the parliamentary secretary is dealing with this question later in the day would he also deal with the drought of income that farmers in eastern Canada are experiencing?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, on November 9, I directed a question to the Prime Minister respecting the disaster situation involving feeder cattle in western Canada. In view of the situation now existing in eastern Canada could the Prime Minister tell us whether the government is going to bring forward legislation to try to cope with this situation that faces the farmers of the country?

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the government's legislative intentions will be made known in due course.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Would he bear in mind that "in due course" might be too late for those suffering this disaster?

Mr. Pickersgill: That was too late even for an interjection.

TRADE

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN GERMAN TRANSPORT EXHIBITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister indicate to the house whether Canada will have an exhibit at the world transport exhibition to be held in Germany next year?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper. There is not that pressing urgency in connection with this matter.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, my reason for asking this question is that I understand the time for applications is about due to expire. The suggestion has been made that Canada would be represented at this exhibition, which encompasses all phases of transportation.

LABOUR RELATIONS

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry. Is he in a position to make any reply to the question I asked him yesterday regarding the dispute between Canadian Aviation Electronics in Winnipeg and the U.A.W.?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I have made some inquiries in Ottawa and elsewhere, and I am glad to report that a meeting has been arranged on Thursday next between the management and the union concerned with a view to resolving this dispute.

BROADCASTING

SUGGESTED INCREASE IN NIGHT TIME POWER OF RADIO STATIONS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that we are being invaded by American broadcasting, especially at night, a fact which imposes restrictions on Canadian stations, does the government intend to ask the board of broadcast governors to review some Canadian licences so that Canadian stations may have the same broadcasting power, not only during the day but also in the evening?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Sir, I would like to think about that question before answering it.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REPORTED STATEMENT BY QUEBEC PREMIER ON PROVINCIAL AUTONOMY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether the federal government intends to accede to the request of the premier of the province of Quebec who has advocated, in Toronto, a special regime for Quebec and a larger degree of autonomy for the provinces in general?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No such request has been made.

PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRIBUTORY PROGRAM

The house resumed, from Monday, November 16, consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): There are many matters which could be discussed on the second reading of this bill, but what we are really deciding now on second reading are not questions of detail. In normal circumstances we would be deciding whether or not to accept the principle or principles of the bill.

In this particular case we are presented with an unusual situation. After second reading the measure before us is to be referred to a special committee of this house and of the Senate where the whole subject of the pension plan is to be considered not only in detail but in principle. This committee, when it starts its work, will have unusually broad powers if we accept the statements of the Prime Minister in this regard, and the indications given in the correspondence which has been filed.

Earlier this year I requested certain information in motion No. 101, and this information was filed in sessional paper No. 202G of May 8, 1964. It consisted of letters and telegrams sent by the Prime Minister, as well as statements made by him, outlining the duties of the committee it was intended to set up. I should like to mention two of these documents in particular because they give a clear indication of the government's intentions with regard to the work of the committee. The first is a letter sent from Ottawa and dated March 4, 1964. It is addressed to a Mr. Higgins whose address is given. In the course of this letter the Prime Minister makes the following statement:

> The committee will have full power to hear the advice of interested organizations and to make any recommendations, of principle as well as of detail, concerning a pension plan—including, indeed, the recommendation if it so wishes that the plan as proposed should be fundamentally revised.

There was a second letter, also from Ottawa, dated February 22, 1964 and sent to a Mr. Mitchell, and I should like to quote from this as well. Incidentally, both these letters are signed by the Prime Minister. It says:

> The committee will have full power to hear the advice of interested organizations and to make any recommendations, of principle as well as of detail, concerning a pension plan—including, indeed, the recommendation if it so wished that the plan as proposed should be fundamentally revised.

There are a number of other letters to the same effect, but I think the idea is clearly expressed in those two quotations; that this bill, when it goes to the committee, will be examined not only in detail but fundamentally. It seems to me therefore that all we have to decide in this house at the present time is whether or not a pension plan is desirable. While we may discuss many other things on second reading, the extremely broad powers given to the committee leave us with this single question to be decided. The effective date, the amount of contributions and payments, whether this is to be a pay as you go or a funded plan, the question of who would be included or excluded, are all, I believe, still subject to revision at the hands of the special committee.

With this in mind I should like to proceed to deal with another topic, one which concerns the time element the committee will have to face. We now have before us a bill of 125 clauses as compared to the 88 clauses of the previous bill. It is admittedly a complex measure whose effects will reach far into the future. The bill itself was only made public in its revised form a very few days ago. There are many organizations, both public and private, which wish to study the legislation in its new form and appear before the committee for the purpose of making recommendations.

I can hardly believe that the committee will be able to complete its hearings by the end of the present session or in the four or five weeks which are left ahead of us. If it tries to do so it will be doing an inefficient and incomplete job. I believe many of the organizations to which I have referred would require many weeks to examine the bill, discuss its implications and prepare briefs for presentation to the committee. It seems to me that the government has allowed itself to get into a time problem, but this should not be permitted to derogate from the importance of the bill itself. I hope, therefore, that the government does not expect the committee to rush the bill through in the course of the current session.

Arrangements will have to be made, I think, in one of two ways. Either there should be provision for the committee to carry on its work during the next session or, alternatively, the government should arrange for the bill to be renewed at the beginning of the next session. Members of the committee could proceed now to hold preliminary discussions and hear explanations by departmental officials until the end of the current session. Then by agreement the bill could be renewed at the beginning of next session when the same committee could be set up to carry on the work which had been interrupted. I do not think we should ask or expect the special committee to finish its work during the present session.

I should like now to discuss a technical problem in connection with the special committee. We have set up a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, and I think there will be no great difficulty with respect to the members of this house who have been chosen. The bill will have had its second reading in this house and will have been referred to the committee.

But I should like to ask this question. What is the position of the members of that committee who come from the Senate? They will be considering a bill which will not even have been introduced into the other place, let alone given approval in principle. The procedure now being followed assumes that the Senate will give second reading to the bill, and I think that is assuming a great deal. What will be the position of a senator who sits on this committee and takes part in a complete revision and overhaul of the bill before us as a result of which a report is made to the House of Commons? Where will he stand when the bill comes up in the Senate? Where will the Senate itself stand if a majority of its members does not agree with the work done by the committee of which representatives from the other place formed a part? They will have considered the form, the effect and the detail of the bill before ever having discussed or passed upon the principle.

There is a more practical aspect involved. To whom will the joint committee report? I assume it will report to the House of Commons, after which I suppose the measure will be considered in committee by the whole house and read the third time. But the committee could not send its first report to the other place because, first of all, the senators do not have the bill before them and in the second place they will not be set up for the purpose of reporting. I ask, if questions are raised in the other place on second reading, does the bill go back to the joint committee again?

These are not just rhetorical questions, Mr. Speaker, or raising difficulties; I see this as a real difficulty with regard to the procedure that has been adopted. No matter how you go about it there is this assumption that the other place is going to go along with whatever the House of Commons does and whatever its committee recommends. I assume that the gentlemen in the other place will have something to say about this, but I believe it should be said here also; because there is a serious problem involved in the assumption that the Senate will be automatic in their concurrence in the principle of this bill. We certainly know there are gentlemen in the other place who have very serious doubts about the whole question of priorities, as have some hon. members in this house, and we will not have had the opportunity of testing that opinion in the other place before we go into the special committee.

There is another matter, Mr. Speaker, that has already been raised briefly. It is also a technical problem and relates to the provisions for amendment of the act. I refer to the provision that requires two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the population to be consulted and approve of any change in the bill. This bill is a simple enactment of the parliament of Canada. It requires no approval by any of the provinces because by an amendment to the British North America Act they have given this parliament power to legislate on questions of pensions, survivor benefits and disability allowances. Therefore it requires no consent for its passage; it requires no consent for its repeal.

I think it is a well understood principle that no parliament can bind a future parliament in this way. I suggest that if the government wants to make it binding on future parliaments that the provinces must be consulted and must agree to amendments to this bill, that would have to be done by way of approval of an agreement between the federal government and the provincial governments. By this means an agreement would be ratified which would become binding on future parliaments and would be effective in the event that this is a desirable provision. But as it now stands I think the inclusion of this particular provision is worthless and empty, because I see no reason why next year or in any future session of parliament this particular section of the bill could not be repealed and there would be no need to consult any of the provinces to so repeal it. I believe it is merely a unilateral declaration of intention and nothing else.

But, Mr. Speaker, going beyond the mere form of the amending principle, we have to ask whether such a restriction is desirable; that is, that the parliament of Canada would be unable, if it so desired, to amend an act of parliament which had not had the approval of another legislative body. I presume that the objective is portability; that this is written into the bill in order that there may be some evenness in pension legislation across the country so that before the federal parliament makes amending provisions the provinces shall have been consulted and shall have agreed. If that is the intention I do not believe that result is achieved, because the section only affects those provinces which will be in the plan and specifically, as I understand it now in any case, it will not include the province of Quebec. So if the desire is to deal with the question of portability, surely we cannot accomplish it by merely requiring the consent of two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the population. Since Quebec is not in the plan it would not have to be consulted, and the whole question of portability across the country would be thrown out of gear very simply.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if it is portability that is desired by this clause, it cannot be achieved in this manner. If it is a case of the contributions being agreed to by the provinces, I cannot see that having the agreement of two thirds of the provinces with two thirds of the population will achieve this result either; you are still going to have a number of the provinces which presumably do not agree but are going to be forced into this position. Therefore it is not going to be a general agreement across the country at all; it is merely going to be a majority decision. For this reason I cannot, personally, see that the effect has been legally achieved in the bill that we have before us; and second, even if it could be, I doubt whether it is a desirable provision and whether it will achieve the result that the draftsmen of the bill have suggested. I think it fails on all these grounds. While that is not a good reason for rejecting the bill, I think it is a question which deserves very serious consideration in the committee.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, there are many questions which have to be asked about the effect and detail of this bill. We do not have, for example, the economic report which has been requested concerning the effect of the bill. The fact that the minister is keeping this report for the committee strengthens my belief and contention that the committee has basic powers of amendment or rejection in principle; because if the committee is to consider the economic effect of this pension plan on the country as a whole, surely the committee is considering the principle of the bill and the question of whether a pension plan of the magnitude that is now proposed is really desirable.

I think a large number of things have been done backwards in this bill. I think the committee will have trouble with it, and that there will be technical difficulties as between the Senate and House of Commons members of the committee. I think it is not in accordance with the basic fundamentals of the scheme that the economic effect of the pension plan should be studied by the committee. Surely this should normally be done on second reading, when we are discussing the principle of the bill.

Therefore I take the view, as do I think all my colleagues, that on second reading we are falling short of what should be decided in consideration of a public bill. Rather we are deciding, as in the case of private bills which come before the house, the mere question whether or not this is a bill which ought to be given consideration. On that ground alone there could be no objection to this course. If any limitations were imposed on the committee I think we would have the right to insist on more complete discussion on second reading; but with the complete freedom of the committee to consider the whole problem, including the economic effects of the bill, I believe that most of these questions can be left until the bill has gone to the committee.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have before us one of the major pieces of social legislation in Canada's history. It is a pleasure and a privilege for me, as I am sure it is for other hon. members, to be in a position to support it wholeheartedly.

The objective of the Canada pension plan can be stated quite simply. It will provide the community with a means by which the people who are working can assist, or support, those who are no longer able to do so. The Canada pension plan will assure those who are unable to work, the aged and the disabled, that they can live in decency and dignity.

A secondary result of the Canada pension plan will be the accumulation of funds for many years at least, which will be available for pressing social capital needs. Everyone recognizes the urgency of making available more technical and vocational schools, more hospitals, greater urban redevelopment schemes, expanded street and highway systems, and more university buildings. All these are the responsibility of provincial and municipal governments, and these governments will be greatly assisted by the accumulation of capital which will become available as a by-product of this social security scheme.

The Canada pension plan is a logical culmination of one of the major social trends evident in any industrialized society. This is the trend toward the maintenance of separate family units for each generation in the family. In rural societies, in more traditional societies, older people or those who for some reason or other are unable to work are cared for by the immediate family, usually in the home of that family. But as the community becomes more industrialized and the family becomes less of an economic unit, we have seen a trend away from this kind of social organization. It is true that many older people remain with their families or are assisted by them; but I think it is fair to say that most older people now come to be supported by other means. One of these is charity; another takes the form of social aid provided by the state, including, in Canada, the old age security scheme; and still another is the provision of retirement benefits by pension or annuity plans.

But this mixed approach has not been adequate; indeed it has become increasingly unacceptable to the Canadian community. Even now only about 30 per cent of the labour force is covered by private pension plans, and some of these plans provide very small pensions indeed. Social aid is an important adjunct of these plans but the community has never really been satisfied that this is the appropriate form of assistance for people who are no longer able to work. The same is true of charitable support.

Consequently there has developed over the years a growing insistence that a comprehensive public pension plan be developed to meet the basic retirement needs of all Canadians. In 1927 the Canadian government began paying old age pensions on the basis of need, and in 1952 it established the old age security scheme for all people over 70 and began to contribute toward the support of people between the ages of 65 and 70 who were in need.

The Canada pension plan is the logical next step in the provision of a national pension plan. It will provide Canadians with an adequate retirement pension, not one which will finance a high standard of living but a reasonably adequate one. It will remain for the private pension plans to supplement the basic pensions paid through the Canada pension plan; their contribution will be to bring the standard of living of retired people up to the level they want, or have been able to provide through their other savings.

Now I shall say only a brief word about the secondary result which the Canada pension plan will achieve. Everyone recognizes the urgency of Canada's social capital needs, and I think there is a general consensus—I hope there is—that there should be a greater flow of capital in the direction of education, transportation, health and urban development. There is no suggestion that the plan should be fully funded, but in a pension plan which has reasonable contribution rates and which has a transitional period during which pension benefits are built up to their ultimate level there will be some accumulation of capital funds. These funds will be made available to the governments which are responsible for financing the various pressing social capital needs to which I have referred.

Hon. members on both sides of the house look forward, I am sure, to the introduction of this truly national pension plan. It will be a tribute to federal-provincial co-operation and a manifestation of national unity. In fact the plan in its present form was agreed to with the interests of national unity uppermost in mind. Canadians or their survivors in all provinces will receive exactly the same benefits on retirement or disability. They will be able to move from one province to another with complete freedom; in other words, there will be the kind of portability that my hon. friend was questioning just a few minutes ago. This in itself is an important and necessary factor in the preservation of our national unity.

There are, of course, opponents of the Canada pension plan. They have attacked it on a number of grounds. One of these is that it will discourage thrift, that everyone should provide their own pensions through their own savings. The point which these opponents miss, it seems to me, is that everyone will be doing this under the Canada pension plan in considerable measure, only they will not be doing it through private channels. Each generation while working will be contributing to the pensions of retired people, and in return the next generation will contribute to their pensions when they retire. This is simply a different method, and it seems to me a very sensible one, for an individual to provide for his retirement.

What these opponents of this plan really mean, I think, is that they would like to see these pensions provided not by governments but through privately controlled financial institutions. The truth is, however, that private pension plans cannot do what public plans can do, provide for the kind of intergeneration transfers which I have mentioned. Moreover, a large percentage of Canadians have been unable or have felt unable to provide adequately for their retirement through private plans.

But the main criticism advanced against the Canada pension plan, and the one I should like to discuss for a few minutes, is that Canada cannot afford it. I have often wondered what these critics mean when they say we cannot afford this plan. I am sure they cannot be suggesting that the younger generation should not be asked to contribute toward the retirement of older people, that the younger people cannot afford to do this, on the understanding, of course, that succeeding generations will contribute to their retirement. For it is surely possible, given the standard of living that most working Canadians enjoy, for a working man to contribute for this purpose $1.80 a month for each $100 he earns over the basic $50 exemption, subject of course to the built-in maximum.

I suggest it is rather more likely that the critics do not really mean that we cannot afford the plan; rather they are predicting that its consequences would be to weaken the economy and to make all Canadians poorer.

An hon. Member: Is there a difference?

Mr. Gordon: If my hon. friend will wait a moment I will carry on and perhaps I will convince him, but I know his point of view and I am not so sure of that. For our part, we believe that Canadians can afford the plan if they want to, and we believe that the great majority of Canadians do want to. It is of course a question of personal priorities. In the opinion of members on this side of the house provision for our older generation is entitled to a high priority.

Let me describe the essence of the plan in economic terms. I think this can best be done by speaking of it as it will be when the benefits come to equal the contributions. This is the position we likely will be in some 20 years from now. The figures I will be using will refer to the estimated aggregate effect of the Canada pension plan as it would operate in nine provinces, plus the Quebec plan which will be virtually identical to the Canada plan.

When benefits come to equal contributions, income will simply be transferred from the active members of the labour force to those who are retired, as far as employee contributions are concerned. This transfer should lead to an increase in consumer demand since retired people need to spend and do spend an even larger proportion of their pensions than working people do of their wages. To the extent that this happens we will have provided the kind of floor to consumer expenditures which is desirable in a growing economy.

The consequence of higher levels of consumer expenditures is, of course, a relative reduction in personal savings. This is true to the extent that the active working people reduce their savings as a result of having made pension plan contributions. The effect of this must not be exaggerated, however. Total individual contributions in 1966 will be about one eighth of personal savings, that is, about 12½ per cent. It would be surprising indeed if personal savings were to be reduced by as much as 5 per cent of what they would have been were the Canada pension plan not in effect.

In the long run, that is, after the initial adjustments, it is highly unlikely that the rate of personal saving will be reduced at all. Certainly this has not been the case in other countries which have introduced social security schemes. In Canada the rate of personal saving has remained roughly unchanged despite the introduction of old age pensions, family allowances and other social security measures.

As for the consequences of the employer contributions, the adjustments required of the business community are not as great as some people have suggested. Business costs will, of course, increase. But the increase will not be substantial. Indeed I would guess that it will not amount to more than 1 per cent of payrolls. I point out that the contribution rate of 1.8 per cent does not apply to incomes below $600 or to those above $5,000. The effective average rate will be about 1 per cent. When you compare this one time 1 per cent increase in business payrolls—I repeat this is only a one time 1 per cent increase—with the repeated average annual increases in wages amounting to 3 or 4 per cent of payroll, which we have seen in recent years, you can only conclude that this will be a relatively minor adjustment. Moreover, increases in productivity normally enable business to absorb the higher costs without raising prices.

I freely acknowledge, however, that the pension plan contributions must in the short run be absorbed either by a reduction in profits or by price increases or by the negotiation of smaller wage increases than would otherwise have been granted. But again I must emphasize the magnitudes involved. The whole of the employers' contributions will not exceed 4 per cent of estimated profits after taxes and I simply do not believe that all of these contributions will be absorbed through reductions in profits.

Some businesses will pass on this cost. Where they did so through higher prices, total real consumption would rise at a slower rate, thus offsetting in part the increase in consumer demand brought about by higher pensions. The same effect would be felt if, instead of price increases, wage increases were restrained. But let me remind hon. members again of the magnitudes involved. The whole of employer contributions to the Canada pension plan, including the Quebec plan, will likely be only about one half of 1 per cent of the gross national product in 1966.

This leads me to say a word about our international competitive position. The government is very much aware of the role that the improvement in our international position has played in our present expansion. We have done this in part through maintaining relative price and cost stability while the price levels of our overseas competitors have been rising. In these circumstances our export and import competing industries will surely be in a position to absorb the minor increases in costs which I have just outlined.

So far I have been talking largely about the economic effects of the Canada pension plan when the benefits come to equal contributions, that is to say, the long term effect. The difference between this and the short run can be simply stated. Instead of the whole of the contributions being transferred to retired people, part of them will remain in the Canada pension fund, a large part in the early years of the plan. The economic question here is what happens to these funds.

The transfer in 1966 of some $550 million to $600 million, including Quebec, from individuals and businesses to public pension funds would, on the face of it, seem to have deflationary consequences. However, one must trace through all of the economic results in order to perceive the true effect of the transfer. For the apparent deflationary consequences will be offset by three factors: the reduction in government revenues that flows from deducting pension contributions from taxable income, the extent to which private savings have simply been transferred into public hands, and the effect that increased availability of loan capital may have on provincial and municipal capital spending. I should like to elaborate on each of these factors.

First, it must be recognized that the $550 million to $600 million that will be paid into public pension funds in 1966 is not the true measure of the extent to which private purchasing power will have been reduced. One must deduct from this figure the reduction in taxes that would otherwise have been payable by the individuals and businesses concerned. It is estimated that in 1966 individuals and businesses will reduce their tax payments to the federal and provincial governments by approximately $100 million as a result of charging their pension contributions against their taxable income.

Second, it must be recognized that a part of the public pension funds will represent simply a transfer of private savings to public savings. Put another way, we can expect that in the short run there will be a slight reduction in the private savings in favour of the savings which will flow into public pension funds.

It is clearly impossible, as I said earlier, to estimate the magnitude of this effect on private savings, but to the extent that private savings are replaced by public savings the deflationary effect of the introduction of the public pension plans will be reduced.

The third factor to which I earlier referred is the possibility, perhaps I should say the probability, that provincial and municipal governments would increase capital spending as a result of the availability of more loan capital. The need for schools, urban development and redevelopment, highways and streets and other important categories of expenditure, is so great that this result is entirely possible. Indeed it has been represented to us, and to previous governments, that provinces and municipalities have been hampered in undertaking social capital projects by a shortage of loan capital. If in fact these governments do respond to the availability of capital in the pension funds by increasing their capital expenditures, then there will be a smaller adjustment for the economy to make than would otherwise have been anticipated.

There is another point that should be mentioned, and that is the effect the plan may have on the level of interest rates. To the extent that private savings are not reduced by the full extent of the new public savings, or to put this another way, to the extent that aggregate savings increase, one would reasonably anticipate a reduction in interest rates. This would tend to result in higher public and private investment, the magnitude of which is impossible to predict. This would be a further offset to the deflationary effect of the accumulation of the funds.

It will be apparent to hon. members from this analysis that any deflationary effect of the Canada pension plan in its present form will be far less than might appear at first glance. In contrast, the deflationary effects of a fully funded plan, as originally advocated by some people, would have been very serious indeed. If I have the time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a further word at the conclusion of these remarks about the kind of results that might have flowed from this fully funded plan.

Inevitably there will be social and economic changes resulting from the introduction of the Canada pension plan. But these must be considered in the perspective of a rapidly expanding economy. It will be the responsibility of government to ensure that the rate of growth of the Canadian economy is not interrupted.

I should like to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that our thinking has been based on two major premises. The first is that concern for older people is a valid and a high priority. The second is that an economy which is growing rapidly, as ours is and has the capacity to do, can easily make the adjustments that are required in order to give effect to this concern. The evidence supports this view. It cannot be said that the Canada pension plan will seriously impair the capability of businesses to generate new funds for expansion, or distort the structure of costs and prices, or impair the country's international competitive standing. Nor is there any evidence that social insurance programs of this nature inevitably cause a slowdown in economic growth. We are fortunate that the Canadian economy, and the Canadian people are capable of paying adequate pensions to older people. This is a noble endeavour in which all of us should be pleased to participate.

If I have a moment or two longer, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a further word about the original proposal of a fully funded plan. A fully funded plan would, of course, be one in which the initial contribution rate would be good for all time. I have indicated why such complete funding would not be good economics in a nation-wide plan. The partially funded plan that is proposed is, I believe, quite reasonable. It has, of course, the implications which the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) pointed out yesterday. Since we do not have complete funding, the time will come when the contribution rate may have to be raised. When that time will be, no one who understands the uncertainties of these matters will claim to be able to predict exactly. What we can say is that, at the contribution rate proposed, this plan will continue to generate funds—the income from contributions and interest on investments will exceed the outgo in contributions—for at least 20 years. That is true on even the most conservative of the chief actuary's estimates. All of those estimates are designed to avoid the danger of underestimating the cost of the plan. It is quite possible, even within the fairly conservative range of estimates, that the fund will go on growing into the 1990's. In other words, it will be fully a generation hence, perhaps more than that, before our successors have to decide to what extent they want to continue partial funding of the plan. Obviously they will make that decision according to economic circumstances which none of us can now claim to predict. The one thing we can say is that, even at that point, the change in contribution rate that may be made 20, 25 or 30 years from now is not likely to be a big increase. That, again, is true even on the conservative projections of the cost. If those projections should turn out to be right, the rate might go up by a quarter or a third. That is to say, it would still be under 2½ per cent each for the employee and the employer. That would remain a modest price to pay for the benefits in security and social insurance which this plan provides.

Mr. Flemming (Victoria-Carleton): I would like to ask the minister a question, though perhaps I should know the answer. I presume that the contributions by employers under this plan are proper deductions as an expense to their businesses?

Mr. Gordon: They are certainly perfectly legitimate and proper deductions for tax purposes.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am always interested in the statements and observations of my friend, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon). I always find myself in hearty agreement with all his objectives, but am always saddened by the fact that when the issue is joined the minister has an attack of caution and moves back and largely counteracts the benefits he has been foreseeing.

I felt that very much in his presentation this afternoon. He appeared to be spending a great deal of time reassuring the house that this pension plan is not going to have very much effect, is not going to disturb the economy in any way, is not going to move society in any particular earth-shaking manner, and that it will provide—I do not think even he was prepared to say comfortable pensions for the aged—reasonable pensions for the aged.

I have for long been of the opinion that any legislation that is produced that has an economic content should be considered at least high on a level of priorities with the development of a more egalitarian society. I think most of us agree with that today. At least we pay lip service to it. It seems to me this pension plan is a case in point, and that the government is missing a bet in its very careful and cautious approach to the possibilities of this plan.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion that this plan is, or should be, very closely linked with three other pieces of projected legislation the government is presenting to parliament. It seems to me that it is, or should be, concerned with the very problems we have been wrestling with in our banking and commerce committee of late when dealing with the minister's bill with regard to insurance and trust companies.

Here we are dealing with legislation that is designed in some way to offset some of the more socially objectionable features of our present private insurance industry. We are going to great lengths and taking a great deal of time in developing very complicated formulae in order to deal with the private handling of public savings in Canada because that, after all, is what the insurance industry is all about. It is the private handling of public savings.

The bill before us now deals in a very modest way with the public handling of public savings, and I was puzzled a few minutes ago to notice that the minister made a distinction between the funds that flow into private pension plans, or the private insurance industry, and those that will flow into the pension fund authority, a distinction he described as private savings and public savings.

I would suggest this is a really bad—not merely a semantic error—serious misreading of economic facts. I suggest that actually we are dealing in both cases with public savings that in one case fall into irresponsible private hands not responsible to parliament or to the public and which, in the other case, fall into public hands which are controllable by the people's representatives and are responsible to the parliament of the country.

I feel this bill is also, or should be, connected with the legislation regarding the designated areas, this government's attempt—a very praiseworthy attempt—to try and decentralize some of the economic concentrations that have taken place in Canada; its attempt to develop the areas that have been falling behind, and to do so it has adopted legislation which encourages—using both the carrot and stick formula—private enterprise to enter into these areas of the country that have not proven profit making in the past. It has in the case of the maritimes made available a sizeable sum of money from the public treasury to stimulate private development in that area, a measure I heartily support. This also is again dealing with the question of the savings of the Canadian people, how we are going to use them and who is going to have control over their use.

Then there is another projected piece of legislation which, as I said earlier in the session, I almost hesitate to mention. I see the minister has guessed which one—the moribund Canadian development corporation that apparently has been put into the morgue, or somewhere, to preserve it for the time being.

Mr. Fisher: It is left in "Troubled Canada."

I suggest that had the government presented some comprehensive legislation dealing with all of these various aspects of handling the savings of the Canadian people we might be moving more rapidly towards the development of what I have suggested earlier should be our goal in a country such as Canada, a more egalitarian society.

I have been contrasting this plan presented to us—and I must admit presented by the minister in a way which will assuage all the fears and anxieties of those who fear any incursions into the preserves of the acquisitive society of today—with some other plans, in particular the Swedish plan. One of the most striking contrasts is that in the first place the Swedes consider the principle of extracting the money from those who can best afford it is a good one to follow, and in Sweden all contributions are paid by the employers. The employers pay the employees' contributions, and in 1960 this amounted to 1.9 per cent of the earned income of an employee. This year it has risen to 4.5 per cent and it is anticipated that legislation will be introduced shortly which will finally set the limits of these contributions up to a probable limit of 10 per cent.

By the end of this year the fund in Sweden will have grown to the level of some 7,500 million krona, which is about $18 million and, if I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from a report by Mr. Ernst Michanek, who is under secretary of state for the minister for social affairs, labour and housing in Sweden. It is a report issued this year and in it Mr. Michanek says this:

> The fund will continue to grow during the initial two or three decades of its operation, but the pace of this growth will gradually decline as the number of pensioners and the amounts of benefits increase.
> The decision to build up a huge fund was prompted by the need for making up for the decrease in private savings and private pension funds which was an anticipated effect of the adoption of the new pension system.

The investment of this fund is, to my mind, a very interesting factor to be considered too.

Canada Pension Plan

A maximum of one half the total of premiums received by the pensions found in any calendar year will be made available for loans—amortizable in ten years—to those having paid premiums, if their premiums amount to certain minima. The remaining revenue (premiums and yield) not required for the payment of benefits will be invested in public and private bonds.

Not long ago an article appeared in the London Economist dealing with the Swedish fund in which it stated that at present, already far sooner than the Swedes expected, this fund now has in its control some 45 per cent of all the investment capital of Sweden. As a consequence, the Swedish authorities have been able to organize the economy in a much more direct way than was possible at an earlier stage. This is where the present government is exhibiting the usual Liberal party hesitancy, the usual combination of lofty aims and pedestrian methods which always results in those lofty aims not being reached; their wagons are not hitched to stars, or even to treetops and consequently they usually remain on the ground. The minister himself has observed this on a number of occasions.

I believe this plan should have had two, or perhaps three objectives. As an old man myself I can agree with the minister that I am interested in the care of the aged. But as an ancestor I am interested in the sort of Canada in which my numerous descendants will live. I would not say I am more interested, but I am at least equally interested in the latter aspect of our affairs. Here we have a golden opportunity to begin that direction of the economy to which the present government has paid lip service ever since it came into office. Members will recall the establishment of the economic council of Canada which was to play an important part in directing the economy of this country. Silence has been the only answer from that council to date; we have been told it has been too busy setting its house in order to undertake any housekeeping. Always this government has fallen short of placing in its own hands the power to take any decisive step toward the economic direction of the country. Here in this pension plan there was an opportunity to provide the government with funds which could have been channelled into the Canadian development corporation, if it is not completely dead —funds which could have been used to carry out some of the aims which the minister has attempted to achieve on three or four occasions. One of these I mentioned earlier—the attempt to deal with the problem raised by foreign ownership. Here was another opportunity missed by the minister and by this government to take some real, decisive action in order to regain some control over our own economy. Here was an opportunity to pool the savings of the Canadian people in very large measure in public hands and, having done so, to devise a weapon by which this increasing and continuing expansion of foreign ownership might have been reversed.

There is another purpose which I think the plan should have had in mind. I have been thinking of it constantly while we have been struggling ineffectually with this ineffectual piece of legislation designed to overcome some of the dangers which arise when privately owned financial institutions control the savings of the Canadian people. It does seem to me that this pension plan should have been the first step toward a public insurance scheme for Canada which would in the end remove most of the care for this type of savings from private to public hands. But the government has been careful in this regard to assure those who have made a handsome profit out of caring for the savings of the Canadian people that they will be allowed to continue to control the vast bulk of those savings.

There is another aspect of the present plan which I find disturbing, namely the provision whereby the provinces of Canada are to have complete access to all the funds which will be accumulated. The minister has mentioned certain areas in which he thinks the savings of the Canadian people should be channelled and no one will quarrel with him about the fields of investment he mentioned. Certainly, they should be channelled into the building of schools, hospitals, and roads—I think those were the undertakings coming within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures which he mentioned—and certainly the provinces should have access to a proportion of the funds which will be accumulated under this plan. However, I suggest that the development of our economy and the direction in which this development takes place are of equal importance. I believe we shall have to do very much more with regard to the encouragement of development in those areas of Canada which have been lagging behind the more prosperous sectors. I think anyone who has observed the direction of economic development in Canada—and it does not differ to any degree from the trend in other industrialized countries—must have been disturbed by the manner in which greater and greater concentration of industrial potential and financial strength has been flowing into a few restricted areas, leaving a large part of the country to wither, as it were, on the vine.

It is true that the government has been making some praiseworthy, even if ineffectual, attempts to cope with this situation and reverse the trend through legislation designed to benefit designated areas, and through financial aid to the Atlantic provinces. It does seem to me that here is an opportunity to do something decisive in this regard. This will not be an inexpensive project; we shall not do it on the basis of a handout of $100 million to the Atlantic provinces to last them for an indefinite period. We shall require a continuing flow of public investment into these areas. I do not think any of us have any illusions that we can coax private enterprise into unprofitable areas successfully. Some industries will come, of course, as long as there are benefits to be derived from public contributions in the form of exemption from taxation, depreciation allowances, and so on. But in the end we shall have to wrench our economy away from these areas of concentration into these poorly developed areas, and this will take a very large part of the savings of the Canadian people.

The bill before us does not propose to do anything very much in this direction. In the first place, it does not propose to take any sizeable part of the savings of the Canadian people. The minister himself has been at pains to suggest it will not do so. I maintain the plan should have aimed to do just that. It should have aimed to control the majority of the savings of the Canadian people.

Moreover, and I think this is another of the failures of this legislation, we have apparently abandoned the idea of placing the burden of this scheme on the shoulders of those who have the best ability to pay. We are limiting it to $5,000. I see no reason why income above $5,000 should not be taxed for this purpose. I see no reason why we should ask those in the lower income brackets to help finance the old age of those in their own income brackets. This is what I call sharing poverty and I thought our goal was sharing wealth, at least to some degree. Again there is a failure to move toward an egalitarian society and I am at a loss to understand why this government thinks there is anything commendable in placing the whole burden upon those who are least able to bear it while exempting those who are best able to pay.

If there is a case to be made—and I think there is; the case the minister made this afternoon—for those who are now gainfully employed contributing to the welfare of those who have passed that period of their lives when they could be gainfully employed, there is an even stronger case to be made for obliging those who have benefited most from our society to contribute to the welfare of those who have benefited least. We observe this principle at least to a limited degree in our income tax legislation. There are, of course, other pieces of legislation in which it is not observed. The old age security regulations provide one example, with their limit of $60. It has always struck me as a scandalous thing that we should limit income in this way.

Mr. Knowles: It is $120 now.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) assures me it is now $120. I might have known that this government would extend it to $120—a full $10 a month. I still do not understand why this government finds it necessary to be so assiduous in its care of the more fortunate members of society while insisting that the less fortunate should be left to finance each other. I believe the Salvation Army have a little saying which they like to bring out at Christmas when they are collecting money—"Its the poor wot 'elps the poor." The government thinks this is a sound principle on which to proceed. It does happen to be a fact of life that those who are less fortunate in their portion of the world's goods are usually more generous about sharing it. But I do not think this government should take advantage of this.

I think, on the other hand, the government should be prepared to place the burden where it should be placed, namely on the more fortunate members of society. I am not for a moment suggesting that those in the lower income brackets should not make their contributions; but I see no reason whatever why this government should not be prepared to build up a really effective fund of the savings of the Canadian people by imposing a large part of the burden on those in the best position to shoulder that burden and to move then toward that transformation of society in the form of an egalitarian society about which the Liberal party is so very voluble when it is not in office. The members of the Liberal party have always assured us that their party is clutching to its bosom this same principle that some of the rest of us have, but they forget about it once they get into office. They say, "We shall not upset the foundations of our acquisitive society but shall, on the contrary, reinforce it by making sure that those who are not so fortunate in their lives within this acquisitive society will have enough to keep them alive". I am not satisfied with that. I am not satisfied with anything that reinforces what I consider to be a profoundly immoral and a profoundly unworkable form of society and economy. But I do not hope for anything better from the Liberal party. I was naïve enough to hope that the minister might perhaps break ranks, because I know he has professed more advanced views than some of his colleagues; but this afternoon I must confess I was more impressed with his timidity and caution than with his liberalism and progressive ideas. I hope that before this bill comes out of committee some of these shortcomings may be remedied, but it is a faint hope, I suspect.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate, after some very fine contributions by members on both sides of the house, speeches by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson), and the speech we have just heard this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) dealing with the economic implications of the Canada pension plan, it is not easy to say much that has not already been said. I do, however, wish to comment on a few of the general principles involved and make a few points which perhaps may add a little to the debate.

The Canada pension plan, as has been said, is truly a milestone in the development of Canada's social security programs. The Minister of Finance this afternoon reviewed the background of pensions from 1927 to the present measure, and in the debate in this house yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated the development of pension in terms of general concepts which he outlined as, first the acceptance of public pensions as a public responsibility in 1927, the development of universality in 1952, and he then added the further concept of adequacy of pension plans. I would like to say a few words in the latter part of my remarks about the hon. member's discussion of adequacy and the problems which are involved in arriving at and applying this principle. In the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I think it is clear why we have to adopt the principle of a pension plan which is related to earnings. I was surprised to hear some things from certain members of the house, such as the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon), who said as reported at page 9916 of Hansard:

[Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

I suggest the self-employed and the farm people would be much better off under a modernized, up to date flat rate plan.

It is very easy to advocate this when you are not in a position to implement it. The government must bear the financial responsibility of these measures. Using a flat rate plan to achieve adequacy is, first, very very costly. No one is more aware of that, of course, than the Minister of Finance, with his strenuous efforts to improve our budgetary situation. The second reason why the flat rate benefit cannot be used for this purpose is outlined very well in the white paper which was placed before this house; it is simply that the same dollars do not mean the same things in different parts of the country. Seventy five dollars in the city of Vancouver, metropolitan Toronto or metropolitan Montreal is not the same thing as $75 in some of the Atlantic provinces or some of the smaller rural areas where the cost of living is different. The only way one can cope with the problem of different needs in different parts of the country, related to the very complex problem of what is the standard of living we are talking about, is to provide a plan which has some adjustment features in it. This plan has some of these adjustment features in it, and I think it combines them very well.

The second point I would like to make is in regard to actuarial studies. I was disturbed at the remarks of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Monteith) when I read them in Hansard, and perhaps I have misinterpreted them. In Hansard of last night, as reported at page 10125, the hon. member is reported as having said:

I hope she—

The hon. member was referring to the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

—will tell us whether or not this report was drawn up by the chief actuary of the department of insurance alone or whether there were outside actuaries, or others, involved.

Apparently the hon. member for Perth places a great deal of importance—if I have interpreted him correctly—on whether or not outside actuaries were used in this connection. I hope I am not doing him an injustice, because I had the privilege of serving as a civil servant when he was a minister and I know that his relationship with the civil service was admirable and strictly correct. Therefore I hope this is not a reflection on the actuaries of the department of insurance.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I can assure the hon. member now that this was not so. I meant to congratulate the minister on using the government's actuaries.

Mr. Francis: I appreciate that the hon. member has set the record straight, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is possible of being misinterpreted the way it is reported in Hansard. But even when we have dealt with the question of the actuaries' report—and in many circles a great deal of importance has been placed on the actuaries' report—I think we have to bear in mind the comments made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in her remarks of last night. An actuarial report cannot mean the same thing when dealing with public plans as it means when dealing with the private insurance industry. When an actuary makes his studies for a private insurance company he has to deal with two basic assumptions, the expectation of life—and here it is not as mathematically precise as one might expect; life expectancy is increasing, which is a very fine thing—and the second is the interest on the money invested. The actuary has to make assumptions in these respects. These are assumptions of a very broad, general nature. But within this scope the actuary can apply his technique and training in a way which leads to a fair degree of precision.

But look at the additional assumptions that have to be involved when you deal with a public plan. The minister pointed out that the basic and variable assumption is the question of the level of earnings on which the contribution is going to be raised. This first involves the question of the number of people who are going to be employed and assumptions with regard to the rate of unemployment. It involves the natural growth of the labour force; and when we start looking at the natural growth of the labour force we are dealing with things which are not predictable according to the generally accepted techniques of actuaries. We have to think of immigration to this country, which is a great deal; we have to think of birth rates, which are generally remarkably variable and are not predictable. Then we have to think of the attitudes toward employment. These attitudes are reflected in the approach to the retirement age. I am not at all sure that the desire of everyone in the future will be to retire from active employment at as early an age as possible, for reasons of self-satisfaction, pride and self-respect itself. Many people choose to be employed as long as they are physically and mentally able to be employed. It may be that with an increase in the expectancy of life we may see a different approach to the whole question of the retirement age, which will in turn affect the number of people who will be employed. Then we think of the number of married women who go back into the labour force after their children reach a certain age. All these factors will influence the number of people involved and the payrolls affected by the pension rates. They are not predictable in any conventional sense.

The minister again pointed out the problem of prediction of prices and price changes, and on top of that productivity changes. All of these are involved in projections of rates of growth of funds in future years. They are not predictable financially in any greater sense than they are predictable by an economist, a statistician, or a large number of other people trained to deal with these matters; as a result we get a wide spread at the high and low of the fund. But that is no reflection on anyone; it is merely a reflection of the great difficulty of making any estimate of the growth of the fund in which we could place the confidence we should like to place in dealing with these matters.

The third point I should like to make deals with the integration of private plans. Again I am disturbed by the remarks of the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard) as reported at page 9909 of Hansard, when he said:

> Many people are wondering what is going to happen to the amounts already invested in private companies. What assurance will they have that they will not go bankrupt now that they are losing that income? None, actually. What assurance will they have that those company pension funds will not be nationalized by governments? There again, absolutely none.

I disagree, Mr. Speaker, completely with that kind of remark, which I consider to be irresponsible and the kind of thing which should not be said by people in public life. The white paper which was laid before us makes it abundantly clear at page 22 that the Canada pension plan will not take over and absorb reserves which have been built up by private pension plans.

There is a problem of integration. I thought the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) was going to deal with the problem of the integration of plans for the benefit of public servants under the Public Service Superannuation Act with the Canada pension plan, but I am informed that his parliamentary secretary may deal with it. But from looking at the existing scheme it is quite clear that this plan will permit an improvement in benefits under private plans for the same level of premium, or a reduction in premium for the same level of benefit, or possibly a little of both. The Canada pension plan is a better deal, dollar for dollar, than the existing plan. I should like to say, through you, Mr. Speaker, to all public servants both in Ottawa and in Canada that the reports which have been appearing in the press to the effect that public servants will be adversely affected by the Canada pension plan are completely without foundation. This plan will permit a degree of integration to their benefit either through reduced premiums, increased benefits, or possibly both. Because the Canada pension plan is that much better value dollar for dollar.

The question of integration of existing schemes has to be worked out plan by plan. They will have to be negotiated by management and unions, and a decision must be made whether or not they simply want to add the Canada pension plan or whether or not a component will be substituted. This plan is a good plan, one which offers benefits which are very generous compared with the benefits offered by private insurance.

By the same token there is a great role for private insurance in this country, and there will continue to be so. In 1950 when a joint committee of this house and the other place met to consider the problem of the old age security plan which was eventually evolved, representations were made to the effect that this step would prove very harmful to the insurance industry. But the reverse was the case. The effect of the old age security plan which was implemented in 1952 was to make people more pension conscious than they ever were before. It increased the sale of life insurance and made more people aware of the need for planning a retirement income on an adequate scale. I am confident that this will again be the case. We have not yet approached adequacy; nor can we approach it on the scale we should like in view of the standard of living many Canadians have built up for themselves. It reminds me of the old story that a man's reach must exceed his grasp; else what is a heaven for? Obviously we must strive for a higher and higher standard of living. As we achieve more we want more, and that will always be the case.

It will be the job of the private insurance industry continuously to add extra supplements to the public plan, which is merely the floor. These supplements provided by private insurance will be in terms of individual requirements and resources and will be tailor made. I confidently make the prediction that the effect of this plan will be to make people even more insurance conscious. It will not be harmful to the industry but will provide the base which will be much more defensible in terms of all sections of the community; and from this the private insurance industry will benefit.

The last point I want to make is in connection with adjustments to the plan. I was a little disturbed by some remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—I cannot find his exact words in Hansard at the moment—to the effect that $10 a month was old hat and that we will have to do very much better than that now. He also said that the adjustment made a year ago does not amount to anything now and that adjustments must continually be made. Let us look at the adjustments which are built into this plan. First of all there is the cost of living adjustment. It is true that this is limited to 2 per cent in any one year and it is not possible to implement it before 1968. The second adjustment is based on the earnings index. The minimum $600 and maximum $5,000 are adjustable according to the formula as earnings adjust. Earnings themselves will slide up as the general productivity of the economy advances.

I do not think that the hon. members who are complaining about the lack of flexibility in making adjustments to future pensions are so much worried about the Canada pension plan; they keep coming back to the old age security component of it. Nevertheless, I come back again to this point, that it is the responsibility of the government in power and the responsibility of this parliament to guarantee not only a basic dollar and a basic pension but also the integrity of the dollar and the integrity of the pension. That is the greatest contribution which any government could make. If pension increases are followed by massive deficits year after year at the height of the cycle as well as at the low points of the cycle, which in turn leads to inflation, then we are not serving our old age pensioners or anybody else well. Fiscal responsibility has to be the core of the guarantee of the actual worth of the pension dollar.

It is very easy to say, Mr. Speaker, that adjustments should be made to the old age security pension and that perhaps it would be possible to vote the necessary dollars and to run up further deficits. But we all know the consequences of continuous massive deficits without regard to the business cycle. When times are bad or in times of recession there are very few in this house who would not believe it proper to run up deficits on a large scale. But I would argue that very few of us would be prepared to say that deficits should be run up on a massive scale regardless of the high point or the low point of the business cycle. That would be irresponsible and would lead to inflation.

Pension adjustments have to be related to the state of the economy and to productivity. Hon. members who argue for pension adjustments have offered no criterion for automatic productivity adjustments because such criterion is not easily found; but within the Canada pension plan I submit that there are built-in adjustments. It is true they are limited but they are better than those which have been devised so far.

Within the old age security component we have a cost of living adjustment. I for one hope the cost of living adjustment provision never has to operate, because if it does not a stable dollar will make a greater contribution than an inflated dollar, which will mean that the cost of living provision will not have to be used.

I am also confident that over a period of years there will be an orderly, responsible review in terms of the productivity of Canada's economy. This and this alone must be the final guarantee of what we can do. If we do not create conditions for growth, if we do not create conditions for a high level of employment, if we do not create conditions under which expanding incomes are possible, then the rest is not possible.

Mr. Knowles: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Francis: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the fact that at least one of the changes being made in the Old Age Security Act by the terms of this bill is to come into effect on January 1, 1966, namely, the right to take a pension at an age below 70, does he not think it would also be possible to make another change and institute the cost of living bonus as at January 1, 1966?

Mr. Francis: I think this is a question which should properly be debated before the committee. I do not think an answer can be easily or satisfactorily provided in an exchange of this nature on the floor of the house. I am sure the point will be raised in the committee and that at that time a satisfactory answer will be given.

Mr. Knowles: The invitation was not necessary but it is accepted.

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken before in the house on the pension plan, but it was on the earlier plans introduced and at the time I spoke I expressed a note of caution and said that I was quite unhappy about some of the deficiencies in the other plans. I am very happy this afternoon that the plan we now have before us contains provisions for dependant children, widows, disabled persons and so on.

We in the opposition have been quite conscious for some time that any time we have criticized the government it has been called obstruction. I am not sure how successful the Liberals have been in selling this idea, but this is certainly the echo we see in the newspapers every day. Therefore I think it is only fair for me to say now that if it were not for such obstruction we might have been saddled with that first plan which the minister introduced so proudly, so politically and so long ago.

Mr. Bell: Three maple leaves, too.

Mr. Nugent: In fact, we might even have been saddled with the second plan. I am not suggesting this plan is perfect but certainly it is a great improvement. I think it is basically a very good plan and I hope we will be able to work very hard on it in the committee stage and make a few more improvements.

I thought the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) were quite valid. I am not convinced that the only thing we should talk about at this point is whether the plan is desirable because that would leave us with no debate at all, but he did mention that the committee would need a considerable amount of time. The bill is very large and complex. There are not many members of the house who are trained or equipped to deal with all aspects and phases of it, but I do think that most members are quite familiar with the effects of certain sections. They are very familiar with the needs of certain parts of the population. I am sure that all members are most interested in the bill, so the fact is that we will need to do a great amount of work on it.

I do not believe any time limit should be suggested. I would hate to think we would have to start all over again if this session should be prorogued. Therefore I hope that something will be worked out in order that the committee can look into the bill thoroughly and completely, so that its work will result in solid progress which will not be lost but which will be carried forward into the next session.

I followed with considerable attention the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron). I was particularly impressed by his remarks about the fund that would be accumulated and the use that the state could make of this money in directing the economy of the nation. I am sure most of us realize that in today's world the governments of most countries have been directing the economies of their nations more and more. Some go about it to a greater extent than others and different methods are used.

The only point on which I can agree with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands to any extent is that I am not sure I want to see these funds in the hands of the provinces rather than in the hands of the federal government. I think we all agree it is a good thing that the provinces through this fund will have additional moneys available that can be lent to municipalities for various purposes, but I do think we are missing the boat a little by putting these funds into the hands of the provinces from which they are raised.

We have seen over the last few years that the biggest and richest provinces are not necessarily those that need the most help, and if the vast amounts accumulated in this fund go straight back to the provinces whence the money came it will do nothing to help the have-not provinces and will deprive the federal government of an opportunity to use these funds or part of them to provide extra assistance in those provinces where additional assistance is so obviously needed at the present time.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands referred to the Canada development fund as proposed by the Liberal party in the last election campaign. In fact, several members have mentioned it but the emphasis of their references has been more on its absence. I am not sure that any Liberal spokesman has explained why what was so good at election time is so repugnant now, but I suppose if we were to ask them to explain all those things that were so good at election time which they have failed to do they would hardly be talking about anything else in the house.

While I have said I have some reservation about the advisability of turning the funds over to the provinces, and while I think the federal government is missing a chance to even up the needs of the provinces, I have never been too sold on the general idea of the federal government amassing a fund of money which it can use for investment purposes to direct or assist the economy. It has always been my belief that, rather than encouraging our people to save more money by putting it into the hands of the federal government to lend, our people should be encouraged to invest more of their money. Canadians are the most cautious investors in the world. They are also the most consistent savers. Therefore if we are to retain more of the profits of industries within this country I think the Canadian people, rather than just receiving interest on loans, should be persuaded to engage more in risk investment, that is, in the share capital of companies.

The question of the provinces building up funds and having control of them is not my only reservation with regard to the present plan. If the province of Quebec has the same plan as the federal government, frankly I am unable to understand why that province wants to operate its own plan. I am unable to understand why any other province would want to set up a plan essentially the same and to opt out of the federal plan. I have never believed in this opting out process at all. If something is good for the country, I do not think one Canadian is that much different from another and I think it should be quite possible to so arrange the plan that it will be generally suitable throughout the country, and once we have it in that form it should then be a federal scheme, not a partly federal scheme which applies to only nine provinces now, which next year may only apply to eight and the following year may only apply to half a dozen.

There is another point about which I am somewhat puzzled, although perhaps further study of the bill will clear it up. When there is this opting out principle and when the province of Quebec has its own scheme, I cannot understand how the federal pension plan can be truly portable. Certainly, if a province opts out, the only logical reason I can think of for its preferring to run its own scheme is that there is some difference in its scheme as compared with the federal plan. If they already have control of the fund and they want to opt out, there must be that difference, and that difference is a very significant one. If the difference is a significant one, then those Canadians who are going from province to province will have to accept the significant difference in their pension plan. How can we then call the plan a portable plan? If these differences are insignificant or likely to be, then I am left all the more puzzled as to why any province wants to run its own plan. I would dearly love to have that explained.

I was happy to hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) say he felt the Dominion of Canada could afford this plan. I am sure there has been nothing in his budgets to date to indicate that the government has found any way to manage the financial affairs of this nation in such a way as to get rid of deficits. We are aware, of course, that while they have followed the general economic policies practised by the previous government, the full effect of those policies has meant comparatively good times. The gross national product is up. We can therefore expect a much higher return from some taxes. However, the note of optimism from the minister was almost as surprising as it was welcome. I found it a little surprising when the minister stated that the revenues from income taxes alone received by the federal government, once this plan gets into operation, will drop by about $100 million. I hope I understood him correctly. I had no idea it would be that amount. Certainly, we must all bear in mind that this is an extra cost of administration of the scheme. It is costing the federal government $100 million per year at the outset, once this plan goes into operation.

I am sure that with the rising standard of wages, when the scheme is adjusted higher, there will be a similar adjustment in the revenue loss of the federal government through income taxes. This should be calculated as a cost of administration. I am not sure if the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) added this item to administration costs when she spoke of them. I think it is well for us to take a look at it. Perhaps we can examine it more closely in the committee.

I was much impressed by the argument presented by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron). He said he thought this plan did not go far enough. He wanted it to be an all-Canada insurance plan. I am afraid that he is quite socialistic. While I was impressed with his argument, I am afraid that I cannot go as far as he did in adopting that argument. I am happy, however, that there is room for private insurance plans. I believe that individuals have a right to look after themselves if they desire to do so. The duty of the government is to help those who need help rather than force everyone to come under a scheme. There are a good many people, even in the low income brackets in this country, who resent the thought they will be accepting a government handout. People look for a plan like this when they have not found it possible to get involved with an employer-employee scheme, or perhaps they have not been able to make financial arrangements to enter a private insurance scheme. The only assistance they really want is a government direction to make it possible for them, in their income group, to get into a scheme or a pension plan for which they can pay. Then, they can say, I am carrying my own load.

Sometimes in today's society we lose track of the human value and benefit there is to individuals who want to be able to say they are standing on their own two feet. This is especially important, I think, when we reflect that so many of us feel that success or adequacy can be measured by the amount of money a person can earn. Even in the lower income brackets, this feeling of adequacy is there. There is much pride in being able to take care of oneself. The extent of the assistance given in this plan, and the form of assistance, is all that is requested by some. I am quite aware of the fact that there are many in the lower income brackets who feel quite a bit different. They feel that those who are rich should pay for everything. There is a constant struggle in this house about that principle. Perhaps the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands gave us the best answer to that struggle when he said that we take cognizance of it by means of the Income Tax Act. Certainly if there is a great need to adjust the extent to which the rich shall contribute to government schemes, the Income Tax Act is the one means by which it can be done very fairly.

I hope that when this matter is referred to the committee its work will be arranged so we will not be rushed. I hope the organizations that may feel they will need considerable time to prepare properly a brief to deal with the part of the plan which most interests them will be given a sympathetic hearing, and that there will be a great deal of cooperation between the various groups so that they may present their arguments in an orderly manner. I hope the committee may know from day to day what they are likely to be considering and that they will not have to be sitting day and night, day in and day out in order to meet a deadline. I should like to refer to the flag committee for a moment in that regard. I was not a member of that committee, but I do feel it was asking a little too much of the members of the committee to sit so often, day after day, and concentrate to such an extent on that subject. I could certainly understand the feeling of those who wanted to get the matter completed and relieve the pressure on us.

I submit that the same pressures are not present in connection with this matter. When the committee is studying something as complicated as this pension plan, there should be no suggestion of a deadline because that would have only harmful effect on the work that should be done. I do not want to be misinterpreted: I think we all wish to see a pension plan. However, we have had enough experience in the house to know that sometimes we jump a little too quickly, and a second thought or a little assistance from someone might be of great value. I suggest that having waited a long time for this we want to make sure it is as good as we can refine it to be in committee, rather than face the immediate necessity of amendment just as soon as it is passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note how the Canada pension plan and the formula which made it possible were established.

On the judicial and constitutional levels, this measure falls under section 92(13) of the British North America Act which gives the provinces exclusive rights over property and civil rights. As Mr. Ollivier clearly pointed out in one of his treatises, a distinction must be established between pure civil rights and social legislation. This distinction, however, was recognized in amendments to the British North America Act, the first of which was in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Act introduced in this country by a Liberal government. Needless to say that this amendment had first been approved by all the provinces just as a similar amendment and a similar agreement by all the provinces have made possible the setting up of a Canada pension plan. It shows also the priority of the provinces in that field, as their consent is required for the establishment of any social legislation, and also the right of the provinces to discuss the matter and lay down conditions.

On the Canadian political level it was necessary to prevent what some people call the "balkanization" of the country. The agreement reached ensures co-ordination between the Quebec plan and the Ottawa plan, and the pensions will be portable for those who are moving from one province to another. The rates and benefits will be the same throughout Canada, and the danger is avoided.

From the economic standpoint the public reserves accumulated by the federal plan will be made available to the provinces, which will be able to use them for their own purposes: education, highways, the development of their natural resources and other matters of provincial jurisdiction. The source of the right being provincial, it was normal to let the receipts go to the provinces.

There will be two pension plans but their application will be co-ordinated and standardized for the benefit of the Canadian taxpayer who, after all, will pay the shot.

Such is in my opinion the result of a formula which is called co-operative federalism. That formula deserves to be looked into, since it makes possible the achievement of a very important piece of social legislation.

The result is important; it shows that the formula has the required flexibility to meet the present needs and that far from being an exception intended to isolate one or the other of the provinces in the confederative pact, the formula strengthens unity by guaranteeing to all Canadians equal benefits under the pension plan.

What does Quebec ask? The guarantee that it may freely use its constitutional rights. What does Quebec do? It co-operates; here, it reveals the details of its pension plan which, after being studied in comparison with the federal scheme, enrich both plans. Who benefits from this co-operation? The Canadian taxpayer wherever he lives.

The Quebec people are not street fighters. They are moderate, peaceful and they hate disorder. In Quebec city they did not turn their backs on the Queen, but on terrorism. If the Leader of the Opposition would only stop blaming the province of Quebec and the Quebec members of the federal cabinet and work in the general interest, he would find more co-operation not only in the province of Quebec but also among the French Canadian members of his own party and among the English Canadians who still have some objectivity.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I should like to ask the hon. member how he can tie in his remarks about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) with the pension plan now before us. I feel he is completely out of order in leading the discussion onto such ground.

I should like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, to rule the hon. member out of order.

Mr. Cantin: If my hon. friend will just wait a moment, he will see the connection which exists between the present formula and the attitude of his leader.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member is absolutely out of order.

Mr. Cantin: Quebec intends to play a constructive role in Canada. The Quebecker is jealous of his civil rights; he will retain them. He wants his language to be respected, he will defend it. He is proud of his French culture, he will spread it. He intends to take his place in the economy, he will make it grow. But he understands that he must develop and assert his personality in a climate of understanding and peace. From now on he will believe in dialogue at the conference table; he will sit there.

Even if agreement between the provinces and the federal government was not easily achieved, even if four federal-provincial conferences and numerous other consultations between the federal and provincial governments were needed to bring about the creation of a pension fund, that bill will remain in the field of federal-provincial relations a true picture of the bi-racial character of the founders of this country and of a province which is not like the others, for the well-being of a Canada which is longing for unity and which can, thanks to this fact, feel that it is different and distinct from a North American melting pot.

In the federal-provincial relations field, this bill is further evidence of the efficient and up to date formula put forward by our government: co-operative federalism.

I must commend the minister for her success. Being a woman, she knew the virtue of patience, which led her to the true understanding of the problem with which Canada was faced in the establishment of a comprehensive pension plan.

[Text]

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a pension bill which is the third one introduced by the government and, in opposition to what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) said, may I point out that we on this side of the house are not neglectful of our old people. In fact we hope this bill, after being properly tailored, will fit the need.

As it stands I do not believe it will fit the need, and after making a few criticisms I shall try to show in a positive way what we should do about it. It is an old trick, to claim that the opposition has no consideration for old people; but if one looks at the record of social justice and at the record of performance by the previous administration it will be seen great steps were taken during the period of that administration to improve not only the conditions of old people but to solve problems of social justice in all fields.

At this stage of the bill it is necessary to talk principles, and it is difficult to do that without going over the history of some past mistakes. I for one think our present old age pension scheme is one of the best in the world. I do not think we are far behind most countries of the western world, free enterprise countries, in looking after our old people. Of course I am not satisfied to leave it there. We must not rest on our laurels. I do not think many people can live on $75 a month. But as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) has said, it is the basic thing which concerns us and I think it would be as well for us to confine the compulsory part of the plan to this very matter. It would be a strange thing indeed if in a free enterprise country such as Canada—and I hope and pray it will always remain such—we should provide any compulsory system of old age retirement benefits designed to give people what I would call a luxury standard of living. On the other hand I do not want to see any segment of our population left without provision for meeting their basic needs.

As I see this bill, it will not bring a great deal of benefit to those who do not already have a considerable measure of security. Coverage is supposed to be universal I am sure we would all like to see this brought about, but are we likely to get it under the terms of the present bill? It appears to me that after agricultural labourers, all those employed in lumbering, fishing, horticulture, and those who are handicapped or disabled for one reason or another have been excluded, a large section of our population will not be protected. My feeling is we should retain the principles of our present system of old age benefits, a system which includes everybody regardless of income or occupation.

The basic rate is, in my opinion, still not high enough. At the present time a single person cannot possibly get along on less than $100 a month and a married couple might need double that sum, or possibly $175 a month.

It would be easy to get into an argument about where the money is to come from. Well, it can only come from the earning power of our people, from the gross national product. I do not wish to become involved in a long discussion about whether it is better to take the money out of our left hand pocket or from our right hand pocket or whether we should take it from the employer or from the employee. It all comes from the same source, the ability of the Canadian people to create wealth. If we end up providing $300 a month, somebody will have to pay for it; if we provide such a pension for everybody beyond a certain age it means we are asking those who are presently working, the youth of the country, to pay the shot.

There are features of the bill which I like. I like the recognition that we cannot jump into this scheme right away. I like the recognition that it will take time to build up a fund capable of meeting payments of the kind proposed. But I am not in favour of a system which would place all the burden on the young people who are actually producing the wealth. We should take a good look at this plan to make sure we are not setting up a pension scheme which will be badly broken almost as soon as it comes into operation.

It has been suggested that once the fund has been built up we shall be able to lend all the money to the provinces. I am not at all sure that there will be a large enough fund even to meet its commitments, let alone have hundreds of millions left over to lend to the provinces. We all feel strongly about looking after our old people but I feel strongly, too, about looking after our young people, those who are presently wage earners. If this is to be really a national scheme I would be more in favour of the compulsory portion of the bill. In a democracy we are all in it together, I suppose; we are all paying equally according to our means. This at least is fair. But it does not seem to me that this bill will be fair. It seems to me that a great many people will have to pay very heavily for the privilege of retiring in comfort, while others will get something like a bonanza. It has been my experience that bonanzas do not come easily; somebody has to pay for them. We must make sure that in seeking to look after our old age we who are closer to retirement do not place an unnecessary burden on those who are now in the most active and productive stage of their lives.

Personally, after I was married and had the responsibility of raising a family, the security I wanted was in the years when the family was young. The whole idea of saving seems to me to be getting out of line. We are obsessed with the idea that we should all retire at the age of 70 with $300 or $400 a month. I suggest this is almost sad. If a man has lived all his working life and has never had a real opportunity to give his family and children the things he wanted to give them, there is something almost sad in retirement on a pension of $300 or $400 when it is too late.

I am against compulsion in all its aspects. I would accept compulsion only if I was sure it would lead to a better system of security than any scheme I could work out on my own. I am one who thinks it is inefficient to expect the government to do our planning and saving for us. It has been said that private industry is incapable of handling retirement funds. I think some of the plans which private industry has produced are both efficient and generous. I would much prefer to see the companies themselves putting attractive retirement plans in operation and making sure that government interference is unnecessary, rather than that they should be placed under compulsion in any way. I should like to see the government tailor this bill so as to make its provisions available to everybody and so attractive that we would all be glad to participate, even management.

I get tired of hearing the same old wail from the far left to the effect that those who can pay should pay. This assumes we can carry on this Robin Hood type of taxation forever. I suggest there are not enough rich people in Canada to pay this whole shot. Those who are very well off are already paying enormous amounts out of their hard earned incomes in support of all kinds of social legislation, and some of it is wasted. I am in favour of giving help to those who need it but I am not in favour of killing the goose that lays the golden eggs. Whenever our socialist friends wish to prove that socialism is a good thing they point to the example of Sweden. They tell us everything is rosy there. But no one emigrates from Canada to Sweden—the flow is all the other way. Most of us in Canada, the pioneer type, came out here because we wanted the right to enjoy the fruits of our labour. We wanted to own property. We wanted, if you like, to have the right to gamble. We gamble with our lives every day. Others gamble with their money by putting it into investments. I do not think they should be chased down the road for ever and amen, and robbed.

This Robin Hood type of government is very appealing. It is particularly appealing when one does not have the responsibility for producing the money or even for taking it from the people who have it. Socialism will not work in Canada; but social justice does work and has worked. Our present old age pension has relieved the minds of thousands and thousands of people and given them a modicum of security which they never enjoyed before. I think we should continue our old age pension system very much as it has been in the past, with this exception—that we should raise it. Then having raised it perhaps a little more to make sure there is no distress amongst our old people, our younger people should be encouraged to save money on their own. They should be given a really comprehensive plan, and where industries are already heavily taxed in contributing these funds perhaps we could bring in a system whereby we could amalgamate all our pension plans and simplify the whole procedure.

I do not think complete control of our industry, our pensions and everything else will work as well as properly organized free enterprise. I do not think that a compulsory system of making our young people save is half as good as encouraging them to get out and earn, and then save in a sensible plan of their own choosing. At least they should have the choice of opting out. If we allow one province to opt out it means we are not enforcing our democratic will on minorities; and I for one look upon this question as dealing with a minority of one. Every individual person in Canada must, in my opinion, be allowed to retain some of his freedom of movement, and I resent being told that I have no ability to look after my own affairs, and that I must bow to a paternal form of government.

Mr. Macaluso: Let us have a plebiscite on it.

Mr. Bigg: Perhaps we should have a plebiscite on it. I can remember very well that when it came to a question of whether or not we volunteered to defend our country, we had a plebiscite; and that plebiscite was instituted by the great William Lyon Mackenzie King and his able assistant, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill). We had a plebiscite then. I did not need a plebiscite; I was already overseas.

Miss LaMarsh: Hurrah.

Mr. Bigg: I hope that answers the question of my hon. friend in the rear row opposite.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member whether he is in favour of a plebiscite on this Canada pension plan?

Mr. Bigg: I have not mentioned a plebiscite. I think we are here to try and thrash this matter out, and I am delighted to know that it is going to a joint committee where the details of the plan will be thrashed out. I said I was going to talk principles this afternoon. I think before we can decide the details of a plan we should know where we are doing. If gentlemen opposite are willing to hand Canada over to a socialistic form of government, let them stand up and say so. Let us be fair about this. If they believe in free enterprise, like I do, let them stand up and say so, instead of heckling me; and let them do a little thinking for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: If they have a contribution to make, I suggest they should stand up on their own feet and rely on their own words, rather than reading speeches which are written in the back rooms, which are read all the time by members opposite.

Miss LaMarsh: Which people have prepared.

Mr. Bigg: Yes; and I would have someone preparing my speeches for me, if I could, instead of doing it myself and sometimes having to do it three times. We are told by ladies and gentlemen opposite that we have no feelings for our old people; at least that is the insinuation that is left in their remarks. This is a straw man that is put up on their part. We have every feeling for our old people. We are here to discuss method, and I am making the plea that we do it in such a way without interfering with the freedom of the individual, without putting an unfair burden on any one sector of the population and without leaving anybody out. What is fair for one man is fair for another; that is what I claim. It is exactly the same as the right to serve your country; what is fair for one person is fair for another, and we should not have to have a plebiscite to decide things like that.

Miss LaMarsh: Only the flag.

Mr. Bigg: I have made myself clear on the flag question, too. I will go for any flag that tends to unite our country. I say, one flag for one country; a flag for each and every one of us.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would request the co-operation of the hon. member in limiting his remarks to the bill before the house.

Mr. Bigg: It was because of interjections from over there, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Even if there are interjections, I think it is the responsibility of hon. members to try to limit their remarks to the subject matter being discussed.

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) is absolutely correct in this regard, and Your Honour was correct in bringing him to order. But the fact is that there was an interjection about the flag debate which, left without being answered, would look as though the hon. member accepted what was said by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh), who is very good at making interjections; in fact, I have always marvelled that she has so many up her sleeve at all times. I would say the hon. member was merely answering the interjection made at that time.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I will relate my remarks to the bill before us, and I would ask the co-operation of people opposite in relating their questions to the bill, if they wish to ask any. This is supposed to be a universal bill; one for all Canadians. My criticism of it is very plain, namely that it leaves out a vast number of Canadians who I think should benefit under the bill—those who need it the most. I do not know what is going to happen to those people who have not been mentioned in the bill and are considered as having automatically opted out due to the industry in which they happen to be engaged. Apparently they are not going to be able to have the full benefit of the bill.

What about the self-employed people of Canada, of whom there are still a great number and of whom, I might repeat, I hope there will always be a great number? I refer to those people who own their own small farms or their own small businesses. What kind of a deal does this bill as presented give to these people? I am not a Philadelphia lawyer, but as I read the bill, it offers them a chance to benefit under the bill at double the cost of other people; and incidentally, in a great many cases it means they will start at the age of 18, perhaps, and pay for 30 or 40 years at a double rate. This does not seem equitable to me. I think this is something we should look at, not only in this house but in committee. Let us make it a universal bill and have it apply equally to every citizen of Canada. If there is a compulsive part in it—and I think there are times when you must have compulsion—let us have the compulsion equally distributed amongst everybody.

With regard to portability, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the bill at least purports to say that this plan will be completely portable and you will be able to receive your pension if you move from one job to another in no matter what part of Canada. I think this is fair to everybody and I do not know why anybody would want to opt out. Nobody wants to opt out if it is perfectly fair to everybody. What is the benefit in having a special scheme for one province or another? Why not act like a nation for the people in this great Canada, all under one flag, all with equal rights, and with the priming pumps in every province making sure we get a full flow of water. Why allow a particular section to opt out? If you must be compulsive, be compulsive and put us all over the same block.

It is not good enough to say, "Let us make it universal; let us make it portable". It has to be practical. How are we going to pay for it? I suggest we should take a good look at this aspect of the question, because this afternoon the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) said he is not at all sure that ten years from now we are going to be able to afford this plan. I am not at all sure we are able to afford it now.

Miss LaMarsh: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I do not have a copy of the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) with me, but I was in the house during the whole of the time he made his speech and I heard him say he believes the country can afford it, will be able to afford it and wants to afford it. I think the statement my hon. friend has just made is certainly incorrect.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we have to wait for a ruling or whether this is even a point of order. The hon. lady is excellent at raising points of order.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) left no doubt in our minds that he was not 100 per cent convinced that this plan would work or whether we could even finance it today. He hopes, as indeed we all hope, that it will not be a burden around our necks. But what of the young businessmen who are just starting up? They also hope that this added expense will not be a rope around their necks.

What is going to happen to the few independent housebuilding contractors that are left in Canada? Will they be able to survive? Some 225 of them went broke this year alone, a year when everybody else is getting along well and able to afford all the new fringes. Why did these men go broke? They went broke, of course, because their overhead was greater than their income. Even the Minister of Finance would know that.

If the opposition are expected to accept this third scheme holus-bolus, why should we imagine that it is any better than the first two? Certainly until the matter is thrashed out in committee—and believe me we are going to look at every angle of it and see whether there is anything wrong with it—we will not accept it. I know we are only a minority and that the government can impose its will in many ways, as we have found out; but we are not going to be party to a bill of which we do not approve until we have had a good look at it. If in the end, after all the argument has been made, we do think that there is something to be gained here by the people of Canada as individuals as well as collectively, then we will vote for this measure. So let hon. members opposite not bother to put up any straw men or to put words in our mouths by saying we are criticizing this or that, until they hear what the critics say. Why should the Minister of Finance put words in our mouths? This debate is still young and I think that even some of the points I have made have some validity. The plan is not universal. We are not all sure it is really portable. And what is the good of a universal plan or a portable plan if you cannot afford it, Mr. Speaker? That is the practical consideration here.

As far as equity is concerned we do want it to be equitable in addition to universal, portable and practical. It is very practical to tax the so-called rich. It is very practical for a labouring man to put his employer to the wall—until he loses his job, at which time he is not in the category of a man who is even able to contribute, even to the extent of $1.80 a month, toward his pension. He would find himself unemployed, and one of the reasons for this would be because we are breaking the individual, little firms in Canada.

Are we heading, Mr. Speaker, toward the socialist state? Are we going down the road to socialism, the road of no return? This is the stage of the bill at which we should consider this point, before we start something which will affect us all, our children and our grandchildren. If socialism is the answer, all right; then hon. members opposite will be strengthened mightily by the hon. gentlemen on my left who have supported the government the last 18 months without any qualms. As far as I can see the government is on the road to socialism, and not a very economic socialism at that.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bigg: When I am through, if you do not mind.

High sounding phrases are no answer to this problem. I think the government should be only too delighted to let us, with our experience, put forward our criticisms and try and come up with a bill which really will work. There are certainly many people in the country today who are not happy about it. I am not talking here about insurance companies who may have an axe to grind. They may want to run the scheme by so-called private enterprise. But I am worried about compelling people to go into a scheme they do not want and cannot afford, for the reason they have already committed themselves to private schemes of their own. I want them to have the opportunity as individuals to opt out of this plan, the same way as larger groups. If whole provinces can opt out, then why not the individual if we really believe in democracy?

I object to the Minister of Finance or anybody else telling me what is good for me when I can see that I cannot afford to pay any more for my old age security than I am paying already. I have looked after my old age security as well as I can since I started working. I have always contributed part of my salary toward my retirement. If I am expected to put by even a small amount like $1.80 a month into this fund, I want to be convinced that this is right and now is the time to find this out before it is too late.

Other countries have enacted similar schemes to this and have put their heads into the noose of socialism many times. Socialism is not new, it has existed since the beginning of time. And sometimes disastrous results have ensued. As countries get on their feet and reach a position similar to ours in Canada, one of the most favoured nations on earth, they do not have to resort to socialism in order to get along, any more than we do. Instead of priming pumps why not dig a few decent wells? You cannot get any more out of a hole than you pour into it. Just pumping water is no good; let us dig some more wells and get our working people both young and old into a frame of mind where they are glad to work. I am all in favour of fair wages but I want to be able to choose my own job. With socialism in the country you have no choice. You are graded from birth, like an egg. And who is going to do the grading?—eggheads with pink banners.

An hon. Member: Not red?

Mr. Bigg: No, not red. They are not communists. They only use force when it is necessary; I admire them for that. They are patient, gentle people; but behind the offer of free this and free that there is always the mailed fist. We in North America, both in the United States and Canada, have developed a standard of living second to none as a result of free enterprise and individual effort. It is to create this atmosphere of getting every person in Canada willing to work on his own two feet, to contribute to our mutual defence and security for which we strive. We do not need socialism for that; what we need is character.

I am surprised at the sneers from the Liberal benches, because at one time this objective was supposed to be the soul of Liberalism. Where has it gone? There has been a complete abdication of the position of the Liberal party in the world. The name "Liberal" is now beginning to mean nothing at all, and more people who want socialism are beginning to look to the socialists for leadership.

PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRIBUTORY PROGRAM

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

Mr. Joseph P. O'Keefe (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention, though possibly with less interest, to the speakers from the official opposition on this bill, but to me at least their arguments were not particularly persuasive. Before I proceed further I should like to assure the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) that this speech is my own and was not written by any of the backroom boys. It is my own opinion. It is as I feel.

As a Canadian and as a Newfoundlander I am happy to support this legislation. As a member of parliament I am as proud to be a member of the party which has presented it as I will be of the government which makes it law. Representing a district in one of the larger provinces of this country, Newfoundland-Labrador, one of the richer provinces in everything but money, I can easily see the effect which this complex bill will have on the people I have the honour to represent, many of whom now suffer from substandard incomes. This situation is changing, but not quickly enough for those of us who are in a hurry.

I am not an economist, Mr. Speaker. Yet I have had the basic test applied to me, the test of meeting a weekly payroll, and that for a good many years. This is a test which I suggest might be applied to some of our theoretical economists. The reason I support the bill is that I believe it will provide for a nation-wide system of social insurance for every Canadian no matter where he may live, whatever his circumstances may be, whatever moves he may make, and whatever economic changes may occur.

Before coming to Ottawa I lived very near a home for the aged and infirm which is operated by the Sisters of Mercy. It is a model for all homes of its type. We have many others, of course, in St. John's. There is a home which is very well operated by the Salvation Army and also one operated by the United Church. There are others as well and they are all excellently run, but because I lived near this home I had occasion to visit there often. While this home was run perfectly, while the guests had every attention and care, I found that so many of them were unhappy. I sensed that basically there was a sense of loneliness, of uselessness, but above all a sense of insecurity. They simply did not have enough money.

I remember one old gentleman saying to me: "You know, the tragedy of old age is not that one is old but that one is young". I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you and all other members of the house know many people with young minds imprisoned in aging bodies. Some of us have some security. There are others, far too many, who have none. There are many who listen, wait, eat, sleep and dream. Time is relentlessly pursuing these people. In a few years someone younger will take their jobs or possibly a machine will replace them. What will retirement mean to them? This legislation means, I suggest, security. It also means dignity and decency for the elderly, the old, the people who have borne the burden of the heat of the day. They are people who deserve our respect and who need our help. That is why I welcome and support Bill No. C-136.

This government has been called many things. It has been called indecisive, ineffective. This can be and should be refuted. The government has tackled courageously many difficult problems. It has solved many and others are in process of solution. I should like to commend warmly our planners, our government and in particular the minister for what I like to think of as their future-mindedness, their concern for the future of all of us who will one day be old.

The minister and others have explained in detail the background of the bill. May I now for a moment or two attempt to answer some of the questions that I feel Canadians are asking. I know my own constituents are asking these questions: How much will I pay? What will the benefits be? Will there be other benefits? Yes, there will be other benefits. As to the question, how much will I pay, the answer is that the contribution rates will be designed so that the average rate is 1½ per cent for both employer and employee at the average level of earnings. In view of the fact that no contribution is made on the first $600 per annum of earnings, this will mean that the contribution rate on earnings from $600 to $5,000 per year will be approximately 1.8 per cent for employer and employee. The contribution rate for self-employed persons will be double that because they must pay both the employer and employee contributions.

The proposed contributory plan will become effective as soon as the constitutional amendment concerning survivor and disability benefits is passed and this legislation is passed by parliament. This will take some time but I am quite sure it will be in effect not later than January 1, 1966. The benefits will amount to approximately 25 per cent of the average adjusted wage. The term "adjusted wage" is used because in calculating the benefits, the wages on which contributions were actually paid will be adjusted upwards as the level of wages rises in the country. Benefits will also be adjusted upwards because of the fact some persons may have had some years of very low income during their period of contribution. In calculating the average wage on which benefits are based, one year of low income may be dropped for every ten years of contribution.

Perhaps at this point I might give some indication of the scale of benefits which will be received under the Canada pension plan. For purposes of comparison, I will use the example of a man or woman whose average salary is $300 per month. His or her retirement pension, payable at the beginning of the third year, will be $15 per month; at the sixth year, $37.50 per month, and at the eleventh year, $75 per month. This is, of course, in addition to the present old age pension of $75, or a total of $150, if there is no further increase made in the present $75 pension.

Now, a great deal has been said about the effect of this plan on other pension plans now in existence. Questions have been raised as to whether this plan would attempt to control the benefits of private plans. Well, the Canada pension plan leaves it entirely to the operators of the private plans to determine whether, and if so to what extent, private plans will be modified. Of course there are many employers who have not yet introduced plans of their own. It is the hope of this government that the Canada pension plan, by providing a basic pension, will also provide encouragement for others to augment it by a supplementary pension plan.

In the case of existing plans, particularly where these plans are not overly generous or the employer may have been considering an improvement in any case, many employers may simply leave them unchanged. This Canada pension plan would, in these cases, simply be added on and so provide a much better total pension. Other employers, who know that people are far more important than profits, with adequate pension plans may wish to have the same over-all benefit levels as before, and adjust the contributions to the level required to produce these benefits. In any event, because deductions will not be made from salaries under $600 or over $5,000, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) estimates the plan will cost only 1 per cent of the cost of the payroll. This 1 per cent is also tax deductible.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this Canada pension plan is good, sound, beneficial legislation. As I said before, it is an example of the future-mindedness of our minister and of the government. I warmly support it and urge the earliest possible enactment of it.

The late President Kennedy, soon after assuming office, called a conference on aging. In view of the fact that the aged now form, and will continue to form, an increasingly large part of our population as health standards improve, I suggest some thought should be given to this problem. It is a fact that people over 65 are increasing at a rate of a little over twice that of the national average. I know, of course, the government is keenly aware of this problem, and for this I am happy. I am happy to notice, too, and commend the good work now being done by the Senate committee here on the same subject.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that it is this government's hope that as each of us reaches the time of slowing down it can be done in health, dignity, serenity and security, with the satisfaction of being needed and wanted, of still being a part of our vital society. In a month, a year or perhaps longer, every Canadian will have to leave his job and give it up to someone younger than he is or to an electronic machine. He will then begin his period of retirement. Is he or she sufficiently protected? I am concerned about the 30 per cent approximately of our people who already have protection, but I am far more concerned about the vast majority who have not. Are the children protected? The legislation I support today, Mr. Speaker, is the beginning of this security, the beginning of dignity for the aged in Canada. I support it wholeheartedly.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): I welcome the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of saying a few words on the Canada pension plan, just as four days ago I had the pleasure of welcoming the hon. lady minister to Baffin island where she had taken the time to come to open a new hospital for the Eskimo people. I think I should tell the house that the hon. lady did herself proud on the island. After all, she was before an audience of some 300 Eskimo people who can constitute a unique sort of truth squad, not truth in the sense of whether the words correspond with the facts, but truth in the sense of whether you are sincere or not. I can tell the house that she was well received, because they knew she was busy, they knew she had many other things including this pension plan to prepare for the house. I will welcome her back into the Northwest Territories any time she wants to come, with the exception perhaps of during the next general election campaign.

I wanted to make a few remarks on the Canada pension plan tonight, remarks that put forward essentially my own ideas gathered from ten years of welfare administration prior to entering this house, based on training in the field of welfare and more recently, in the last few years, based on reading, and the first two versions of the Canada pension plan, as well as assorted other opinions I have been able to gather. I shall put forward my own ideas in this case and shall do so as a person representing nearly all the Eskimo people in this country, and many of our Indian people who, after all, have a lot to gain from any system of expanded social security.

I open my remarks by saying that I strongly believe Bill No. C-136 should have been referred to a parliamentary committee prior to second reading. I know this can be done and no doubt hon. members who are as new as I am, who have never been here before the twenty sixth parliament, can think of an instance in which it has been done. I think of this instance particularly because it concerned a bill that would have had the effect of dividing the Northwest Territories into two separate territories. After much discussion in this house and much uncertainty, it was decided by unanimous agreement of the house that the best course of action would be to refer the matter to a parliamentary committee prior to second reading. This did not have the effect of killing the bill, for the very good reason it was a controversial matter upon which many persons in this country wanted to make representations. It was decided to refer it to a committee prior to second reading so that the government would not feel that any substantial changes in that particular legislation would involve any backing down or votes of non-confidence. I am sorry this course was not adopted in connection with this legislation, but I assume the government has no intention at this stage of changing its course and referring it to a committee before second reading.

After listening to the debate I also resent the approach of some of the speakers, notably those on the government side, which suggests that any members who object to any phase of the pension plan are trying to deprive the lame, the halt, the blind, the widowed and the orphaned from receiving a decent standard of living. This attempt to label anyone who has any criticism to make, be it constructive or not, as some sort of callous monster of the extreme right, places us in an unfortunate position if we honestly try to put forward our objections.

However, I have a proposal to put forward which I think could have been considered by the hon. lady, though she never asked me for advice and I am not surprised about that. I wish to advance a suggestion merely to show there are other possibilities of accomplishing the same sort of things that are involved in Bill C-136.

It seems to me there are five or six principles that any expansion of social security must meet. These are practical principles, assuming we all agree that Canadians want to retire in dignity and decency. The first of these is that a plan must be readily understandable by those who are to receive benefit from it, by those who are to pay for it, and by all Canadians who at one point or another are going to be called on to vote for the government that brings in this plan. There must be a clear understanding of what they are voting for and against.

The second practical principle of any social security scheme is that it must be the best way not only of meeting existing needs but of filling in gaps in the social security program. I recall at the time of my graduation from the British Columbia school of social work that the guest speaker was the then deputy minister of welfare, Dr. Davidson, and he described Canada's social security system as a Joseph's coat of many colours. He was followed on the podium by Dr. R. E. Davis of the Canadian welfare council, a man involved in the day to day administration of welfare, and he said that rather than a Joseph's coat of many colours it might be likened to a good old Canadian patchwork quilt. I mention this because there are many different ways of looking at this and of meeting all the needs. I suggest the Canada pension plan is only one of the possibilities and not necessarily the best.

The third practical principle in welfare administration is that the administrative costs of any program must be kept to an absolute minimum so that the bulk of the funds collected go to the people they are designed to help, and so that they are not collected by the government to maintain a huge army of employees taking in each other's paper work.

The fourth practical principle of a federal program is that it must be the same for all Canadians. It must have complete portability no matter where you go and it must be under the control of the same authority. As a Canadian I am not prepared, having gone to another province, to reapply for benefit and to be placed under the control of the provincial authority, and it does not matter which of the ten provinces is concerned.

As a fifth practical principle it must be able to stand the scrutiny of those of us here and now who want to look at it, and it must stand the test of time.

The sixth practical principle in social security is that whatever scheme is introduced must cause a minimum of disruption in the private and public sectors of the economy. I want to state in a paragraph an alternative that I have in mind.

I believe that we would have accomplished suitable care of the elderly by raising old age security payments to $100 a month immediately, by lowering the eligibility to 65 years immediately, by pegging payments to the cost of living, by keeping it a totally federal program with no possibility of opting out, and by financing it through the required increase in the three taxes that now finance it, sales tax, corporation tax and income tax.

In order to meet the needs of another large group who would not be covered by this scheme—because after all I am only talking about those over age 65—in keeping with the request voiced by one province and which had general support, I would suggest that the federal government convene a meeting to look at the whole area of services to the disabled, the blind, and the mother's allowance programs now in effect through the provincial authorities. It should allow these programs to remain under provincial control, with whatever necessary federal guidance and help that would be required by the provinces.

The advantage of my suggestion is that everyone in Canada can understand what $100 a month is. It would be available to everyone, and when I mention pegging it to the cost of living I suggest that the cost of living for 1965 be equal to 100 points and, not as presently calculated, to 100 points in 1949. Mr. Speaker, if you follow what I am saying you will see that what I am suggesting is that we guarantee to every old person over 65 years $100 a month in purchasing power, no matter what happens to the cost of living from now on.

If my plan were adopted it would not be necessary to increase old age security immediately prior to an election. Everyone would understand the benefit would be $100 a month and the cheques payable would be pegged to the cost of living as of today, not as of 1949. This would have the advantage of payments beginning on a universal basis at the age which is now generally accepted for compulsory retirement. At present there is a gap. In many instances people are compulsorily laid off at age 65 and cannot acquire old age security until they are 70.

I want to read one subclause from the bill, and by no means is it the most complex.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rhéaume: No. The hon. member can make his speech when I am finished.

Mr. Moreau: Thank you.

Mr. Rhéaume: Clause 22(3), relating to contributions to be made by employers and employees, reads as follows:

> Where an employer has been informed in writing on behalf of the minister pursuant to an inquiry, other than an application for determination of a question under section 28, that he is not required to make a deduction from the remuneration of an employee under this act and it is subsequently determined or decided under section 28 or 29 that such a deduction should have been made, except where the employer was so informed on the basis of information furnished by him to the minister that was incorrect in a material particular the employer is not liable for failing to make the deduction or for any amount that should have been deducted before the determination or decision is communicated to him, but is thereupon liable, without interest or penalties under this act, to pay the contribution required to be made by him with respect to the employee from whose remuneration the deduction should have been made, and upon payment by the employer of any amount as or on account of the contribution so required to be made by him the employee shall be deemed to have notified the minister as required by paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 14 of the employer's failure to deduct that amount from the remuneration of the employee.

Now what in God's name does that mean? I have taken this clause apart phrase by phrase and it is simply not understandable. I suggest that the first requirement of any adequate security program must be that it can be understood by those who receive benefits, by those who are to pay for them and by the voters at large.

Now I want to get on to my next point. It is that the administrative costs of any plan should be kept to a minimum. Let us look at the plan before us in terms of what it will cost to administer. What would it cost us to number Canadians and keep track of them throughout their working lives? What would it cost us to transfer files from one area to another as people move from one area to another, or to other countries, to work? What will it cost us to determine whether a man is disabled under the terms of this act? This has proved a major source of difficulty and expense already in connection with the Disabled Persons Act. What about the cost of appeals made before the quasi-judicial bodies which will have to be set up to determine blindness, disability, and so on? What about the procedure involved in transferring from the federal program to the provincial program when a province has decided to opt out? Who will transfer these files? What vast army of bureaucrats will be necessary to carry out this work even assuming its members do not engage in empire building and spend all their time watching each other? What army of officials will be needed in every province of this country to keep track of all these things? Compare this with the program I have put forward under which we need keep track of no Canadian until he reaches the age of 65 and establishes his eligibility.

I have said that a program of social security if it is to be effective must be the same for all Canadians. At this point only a single province has decided that it will not implement this plan but that it will implement its own. As a Canadian prepared to pay federal taxes and prepared to be a Canadian, I object to having to place myself or my parents or my children in the future under the control of the provincial authority of any other province of this country. I object to this most strongly when we are using federal funds.

I have said that a social security system must stand scrutiny now and that it must stand the test of time. According to the minister's own paper we do not know what is going to happen in a few years; we cannot carry the projection beyond a few years. By pegging the pension at $100 a month based on the cost of living in 1965 equalling 100, the old people will know what they are going to get. At present many of them think they will be reaping good benefits if this measure goes through, although in fact if in 1967 the cost of living goes up by 1 per cent a person now in receipt of old age security benefit will end up in receipt of the grand total of 72 cents a month added to his existing pension, enough to handle the correspondence between himself and the local office of the Canada pension plan to find out why he is not getting more.

I have also said that a good social security system must cause the least possible disruption to the private sectors of the economy. Under my plan everyone reaching the age of 65 would be entitled to $100 from the state, and no more. Those who are able to look after themselves and who are fortunate enough to be able to arrange for their own insurance would have that in addition. There would be no need to disrupt a single existing pension plan. The pension or benefit from state sources would amount to $100 and I do not think the state has a responsibility to guarantee any person more than $100 from public funds. Under the proposed Canada pension plan no one knows for certain what the future will bring. We have been given brave assurances by the minister that somehow or other, through some strange Liberal magic, integration of the Canada pension plan with private plans will occur.

I have tried in the brief 15 minutes I have taken to outline one possible alternative to the Canada pension plan, one which would not require a pound and a half of printing to describe it, one which would be understood by every Canadian. It would be understood by every Canadian voter when the time comes to have another go at the polls. This is important because there will be no element of fooling; the people would know. I put forward this suggestion not because I expect the government to accept it but merely because I want to point out as a person trained in the field of welfare and as one with a good deal of experience in administering provincial plans that there are other ways of achieving the benefits which the minister and all of us in this house wish to achieve for Canadians. It is regrettable that the government should refuse to allow this to go before a committee before second reading, where this kind of thing could have been studied and documented. I repeat my request now. If the minister would agree to it, it would at least establish that at least the government is not afraid of taking this particular 125-clause bill to a committee—is not afraid to let it stand the test of close scrutiny.

Mr. Moreau: Would the hon. member permit a question? I was wondering if the hon. member for Yukon could tell us what his instant pension mix would cost and what changes in the taxation formula it would require.

Mr. Rhéaume: I am certain the hon. member for Yukon could; but I am the hon. member for the Northwest Territories and I should like to try it. I was suggesting that we could calculate the cost rather finely and that we would finance it out of stated tax increases in the three fields from which we are now financing old age security benefits. I have no access to the kind of advice the minister has available to her, so it is not possible for me to give the figure, but I suggest that in no circumstances would my proposal cost more than it would cost to maintain an army of bureaucrats to keep track of every Canadian, to number them and follow them from job to job, in and out of employment, overseas and back, as we will have to do under this scheme. I submit that the total cost would be less than it is going to cost us anyway, and under my proposal we would know where we are going.

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I feel that any member seeking to intervene in a debate at this stage, if there is to be any point at all in the remarks he is to make, should attempt to deal with some of the issues that have developed during the course of the debate. I must say I am rather glad that I did not secure the floor until I had the opportunity of listening to the speech which has just been made by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume), because I believe that he did make an honest attempt to put forward a straightforward presentation of his views; he did attempt to outline his own criteria as to what was required in the matter of a pension plan for Canada and for Canadians.

I would like to say at once that as I listened to him outline the points of his criteria, in my assessment the plan as we have it proposed in the bill that is before us pretty well meets all the criteria which he outlined. This is my assessment of the plan in its outlines as I have been able to understand it up to this point. I do share with him the regret that I am sure a great many Canadians feel, namely that it is not going to be completely integrated in its administration. While one can express regret that it is not possible to have a plan which is administered uniformly from one coast of Canada to the other, nevertheless the plan as it is proposed, and with the understanding that we have of action that is to be taken by the one province which indicates that it does not want to share in it completely, has the criterion of universality which the hon. member outlined. I think all of us must agree that this is a step forward.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I was glad I had not been called upon to speak until I had listened to the hon. member's speech, because I must say that up until he spoke I had a feeling that it was very difficult to grapple with any issues that had developed in the debate. I had listened to some of the speeches made by his colleagues in that part of the house, and up until his speech I was reminded of a refrain from an old song which, if I have it correctly in my mind is, "She wouldn't say yes, and she wouldn't say no".

Mr. Skoreyko: Judy.

Mr. Barnett: This, quite frankly, was the way I felt about the speeches from the Conservative quarter of the house to which I had been listening. I had not heard anybody stand up and say, "I am against this plan". This would have given us a clearcut issue to fight on, as far as I am concerned. Possibly the closest we came to that this afternoon was in the speech made by the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg). As far as I could judge, the gist of his speech seemed to be that we socialists were leading the government around by the nose and persuading them to embark upon a very dangerous course which would probably bring about some form of totalitarianism in Canada. I did not feel that was really a very constructive assessment of the Canada pension plan.

The hon. member for Northwest Territories did make a fairly definite proposal which he felt would be better than the one proposed in this pension plan. Let me say at once, Mr. Speaker, that I would be quite happy to support the proposal he advanced, namely that the present old age security be increased to a level of $100 a month and that it be made available at the age of 65. However, where I part company with him is in his assessment that this would be what he termed an adequate basic provision for old age security in this country. As far as I am concerned, I would say let us have his proposal and the one the government is making as well; then we would be approaching a plan which could be considered, to use the words of the minister, reasonably and modestly adequate as far as retirement for the elder citizens of our country is concerned.

An hon. Member: We will be getting $100.

Mr. Barnett: We certainly will not be getting $100 under the plan the minister has been proposing. But her colleague the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) at least held out a few teasers to us when he spoke last night, in that he said if we lived long enough and were able to draw the pension long enough, we might possibly see something like that happen.

Before I came down to the chamber, Mr. Speaker, I was wondering just what are the issues with which one can grapple in dealing with the principle of this bill. I found that I really had to go outside this house to find anybody who was prepared to stand up and say he was opposed to the Canada pension plan. I recalled what I had read somewhat earlier in an address which was given in the city of Winnipeg by a Mr. Kilgour, entitled, "Let's raise a storm". This he delivered in the city of Winnipeg on September 9, 1963. I was rather interested in the concluding paragraph of his speech as it was reproduced, because he said:

> We have three short weeks in which we either can or cannot succeed in having parliament stop, look and listen before this die is cast.

As I have said, this speech was delivered on September 9, 1963, and certainly Mr. Kilgour was a little out in his estimate of the speed and haste with which the government was going to proceed with this plan. Members will realize that he was obviously dealing with a proposal that differed in some respects from the one which we now have before us, nevertheless a proposal which in its main essentials was similar to the one contained in the present bill. Mr. Kilgour had this to say as part of his remarks. He was talking about the proposal of the province of Quebec to introduce a plan which had a greater funding element in it than was being proposed at the federal level, or indeed than is proposed in the bill that is before us. He said:

> This is a completely new role of government, certainly in North America.

Of course, he may be right in that connection as far as North America is concerned, but in the wider application I think Mr. Kilgour was somewhat off the mark:

> Whether the public can wisely turn over its life savings to the investment wisdom and political pressures of an elected government is a question which should have the deepest and most thoughtful appraisal—but this is not the time.

That is a pretty good Liberal phrase, of course, even though Mr. Kilgour was rather vigorously attacking certain of the proposals and was indeed rather vigorously attacking the minister herself in this speech. He went on to say:

> The fact remains that we appear to have pressed the panic button on pensions. We are doing this at a time when unemployment insurance is thoroughly insolvent, and there are wide expectations by many people that medicare is just around the corner. Our social priorities or capacity to pay unlimited taxes are not even under debate.

Then he goes on to make this suggestion later in his speech:

> Let's raise a storm. Let's make it a good one—the strongest most lightning-packed, angry wind that has blown around parliament hill for a long, long time. It could sober this country as it sorely needs.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if we had people getting up in this house and making speeches with the vigour and directness of that made by Mr. Kilgour we would really have something we could get our teeth into.

I think this is one of the elements which has been lacking in this debate. I would have been quite interested and intrigued if somebody—I could only envisage its being somebody over in the quarter of the house which comprises the official opposition—had been prepared to get up on his hind legs and say that this whole pension idea as far as any public application is concerned is for the birds, and parliament should not even be looking at it. But the strongest suggestion which we have had came from the hon. member for Northwest Territories, who suggested that this bill should not be proceeded with past second reading but that it should be referred to a committee prior to second reading; and he was regretting that this had not been done.

I would suggest to him and his colleagues that that is a motion which is perfectly in order. If that is the way he and his colleagues feel about this bill why do they not make that motion and test the house on it? I made a motion like that on the 12-mile fishing zone bill not too many weeks ago. It did not pass the house and I really did not expect it to when I moved it, but at least I tried to say that I thought the bill was so inadequate it should not pass the house in its present form. If that is the way any hon. member of this house feels about this bill I wish he would get up and make that motion so that we would find out exactly who feels what about this pension plan, and then we could get on with it.

I suppose the main function of a member of the opposition is to consider and assess the proposal which we have before us.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you think anybody thoroughly understands it, other than those who worked on it? Let us be fair.

Mr. Barnett: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) asks me whether anyone understands it thoroughly. I do not profess to understand it thoroughly in every detail. I do not profess to understand every phrase in the clause which the hon. member for Northwest Territories read. But I will say this, that I do understand it well enough to know whether I am for it or whether I am against it. It is true that there are a lot of complicated clauses in the bill, but the principles of the bill are very simple. I suggest that anyone who wants to sit down and take the time to read it and who has had at least a grade eight education can understand what it is about. I have talked to people in my constituency, not about the details of this plan but about some of the details of an earlier version of the plan, and I found that the average person I talked to had no difficulty in understanding what it was about. Most people in my constituency have some idea what is meant by universal portable pension plans. Most people understand something of what is involved in making contributions over the period of one's working years into a pension plan.

I know one is not supposed to impute motives in this house, but having listened to some of the speeches I have heard in this house I find it difficult to believe that some people, like the former minister of national health and welfare, are being anything but deliberately obtuse as far as their alleged difficulty in comprehending the terms of this plan is concerned. I certainly reserve my right as a member of this house to assess and examine the representations which will be made with regard to this plan, either in connection with some of its broader terms or its details, in its committee stage of consideration. I certainly agree with some of the things said earlier in the debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) in connection with some of the terms and some of the inadequacies of the plan. But, Mr. Speaker, I just cannot believe that my colleagues in this house in the Conservative party are quite as stupid as they are trying to make out they are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Barnett: Well, Mr. Speaker, as I started to say a little earlier I think one's principal function as an opposition member is to try and assess the proposal as it is put forward by the government, and to assess what has been said by the various ministers who have spoken in the debate.

In this connection I had the feeling when listening to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) this afternoon that one of the things he was trying to do was to soothe the fears of people like Mr. Kilgour. My colleague for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands dealt with some of the remarks of the Minister of Finance, I felt much more in sorrow than in anger. But as far as I could understand it, the gist of what the Minister of Finance was trying to say this afternoon was: Well now, you fellows—people like Mr. Kilgour, who freely admits he is somewhat interested in the plan and was quite forthright about admitting that he had an interest in it as president of a private life insurance company—this thing really does not amount to very much; it is only a minor factor in the economy of the country and nothing for you to worry about. Which, of course, is and has been for a long time rather typical of the attitude taken in Canada by Liberal governments. Their general attitude seems to me: Well now, we must be very careful not to do anything to rock the boat. I think the Liberals must have a congenital weakness which makes them liable to seasickness; they are always so afraid of rocking the boat.

I thought the Minister of Finance gave us this afternoon a perfect example of just how touchy he is as far as the dangers of rocking boats are concerned. I suppose I could suggest that there are such things as seasickness pills; and if the Minister of National Health and Welfare could provide as part of the health services for the country some seasickness pills for the members of the government and the members of her own party who are so afraid of rocking boats perhaps she might be able to bring forward a better and more adequate proposal than she has put forward in this bill.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that those who are so concerned or inclined to be concerned about group security plans provided under the aegis of public authority are really people who refuse to recognize or to realize just how radically the structure of our society has changed and how, as one of the consequences of that change, the older generation have tended to be pushed into a sort of side line position in our economy.

I think that the fact of this change was perhaps illustrated by some of the considerations we had in mind when we recently dealt with the redistribution bill. During the discussion it became quite clear, as it has through many other avenues of knowledge, that the structure and economic status of Canadian society has radically changed because of the movement from rural areas into urban areas, and the question of adequate security for old age is part and parcel of that development.

In a simple rural society largely established on an agricultural base the question of security for the aged tended to take care of itself as a result of the rather simple and basic fact that by and large the ownership of the means of production rested in the hands of the older people. In other words, father owned the farm and, while the sons might work it, as long as father was alive he had a proper right, title and interest in the products of the farm. On the other hand, let me take an example that pertains to the area of the country from which I come with regard to the society in which we live today. In the society of today the father no longer owns the pulp mill or the paper mill, and once his active working years are over he has no automatic right, title or interest in the continued production of that pulp or paper mill or in any of the other complex industrial institutions which operate in our society today and which represent our main economic base.

I think it is out of that change in the structure of our society that the need for public pension plans arises which will ensure that the older generation will continue to enjoy some of the fruits of current production. In my view it is in that context that this kind of plan has to be assessed, and it is in the context of the productivity of the industrial machine that the adequacies or inadequacies of proposed levels of pension plans must be considered.

There has been a good deal of talk recently about priorities. Some of it has arisen out of the fairly recent statement by the premier of the province of Manitoba on this subject. A recent newsletter of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce quotes from the statement of Premier Duff Roblin and then proceeds to make certain assertions which they suggest arise out of the premier's statement. They completely overlook the fact that the premier's statement dealt with the matter of a co-operative effort on the part of the provincial and federal governments to assess their sources of revenue and to work out some co-ordinated plan for the manner in which expenditures are to be made. The chamber of commerce goes far beyond the context of Premier Roblin's remarks. In their newsletter they say:

> The newly elected board of directors of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce urges federal and provincial governments to co-operate in establishing priorities in respect to government expenditures.

They go on to say:

> It is clear that the tasks which the nation undertakes in the fields of education, old age security, health and other programs affecting the public sector of the economy must be considered and dealt with on a priority basis.

I do not claim to be an economist, Mr. Speaker, but I have enough knowledge of the proper use of economic terms to realize that this statement emanating from the board of directors of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce is utter and complete nonsense. They talk about programs affecting the public sector of the economy as if the public sector of the economy comprised such things as education, health and old age security. To me this is a complete misuse of that term, because as far as I am concerned the public sector of the economy refers to such activities as public enterprises, publicly owned railways or the Polymer Corporation or Air Canada, which are part of the economic life of Canada. To suggest that matters such as education, old age security and health are matters of concern only to the public sector of the economy does not make economic sense to me.

In my view nothing is more important to the private sector of the economy than that we have educated and healthy citizens. In my view nothing is more important to the private sector of the economy than that all Canadian citizens have the kind of incomes which will enable them to purchase the products that our industrial economy is capable of producing.

I have referred to this statement in order to suggest that we in parliament as well as people throughout the country are in danger of putting such questions as old age security, education and health services and the matter of whether or not we can afford them in a completely false perspective. So many people tend to look upon these things as something to be put to one side as luxuries. To me this is a completely false assessment of priorities. The only sound basis of assessing these things is within the total public and private sectors of our economy and their potential productive capacity.

Viewed in those terms, Mr. Speaker, and thinking of a proper sense of priorities as to the things which are really necessary I would say, as I said earlier, that it would not be too much so far as the field of old age security is concerned if we were to put together the proposal advanced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) and the proposal which the hon. member for Northwest Territories made in reference to the increase in old age security. I would suggest that is the least we can do that would be adequate.

I attempted to point this up in a question I addressed to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) when he concluded his remarks last night. I asked him if he would indicate to the house the position of people who are now of retirement age or who will be at the time the proposed pension plan comes into effect. To me this is something that should not go unnoted in the house, because what it means is that we are taking steps now to ensure that some of us who are of age now to benefit from the plan when we reach retirement age will receive the proposed pension. But apparently the government is content to let those who are now of retirement age fall by the wayside, to simply let them go on living in many cases on the verge of want and starvation.

The Indian society of an earlier day on the west coast of Canada at least had a simple and effective means of dealing with the problem of old age. When the people in some of these societies got to the point where they were no longer productive and could not fend for themselves, they had the very happy custom of taking them down to the rocks at the seashore at low tide. They simply left them there until the tide came in to the top of the beach. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, this is what we are doing under this plan as it stands. We are simply saying to the people who are now at retirement age, so far as this parliament is concerned we are quite prepared to leave you on the beach at low tide and let you be submerged. If I have one basic criticism of the proposal of the government, it is this niggardliness. I do not believe the Canadian people really want parliament to be this niggardly with these people who are being completely left out except for this very minor modification of old age security being tied to the cost of living.

I suggest that this nation, on any proper assessment of its economic capacity, on any proper assessment of priorities, should say that it is prepared, as part of this plan, to close that gap either by increasing the present old age pension to an adequate level or by the abbreviation of this transitional period in the Canada pension plan. Through this parliament the people of Canada should pick up the tab for the people now of retirement age or the people now on retirement. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, this is the only valid, fundamental criticism of the proposal that we have before us. Certainly I hope that before this plan becomes law or even before the bill passes second reading, we will have an indication that there will be general support in this house for something being done about this aspect of the proposal.

Mr. Jean Chrétien (St. Maurice-Laflèche): I want to reply to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), Mr. Speaker. He said we were afraid to say where we stand on this pension. I will say that I am for the bill, all the members on this side are for the bill and I believe the same is true of members on the other side of the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) and the government for their persistency in preparing this bill.

We have heard several hon. members mention that the government presented two, three or four versions of this bill. I wish to commend the government for this attitude which illustrates its broadmindedness.

Had the federal government not taken this action in 1963, there would be no pension plan covering all Canadians, and there would not be any either in the province of Quebec for several years.

It may be said that the federal government had to back-track and to compromise with the government of the province of Quebec but what counts, in the final analysis, is that with this piece of legislation we have reached our goal: a comprehensive pension plan will be established across Canada, from Vancouver to St. John, Newfoundland, a plan which will follow every worker in Canada whenever he transfers to another province to earn his living.

This excellent piece of legislation is vitally important to the mobility of the Canadian labour force because we have often seen people residing, for instance, in eastern

Quebec, go and work for a few months or a few years in New Brunswick; we have often seen people in western Quebec finding employment in northeastern Ontario.

So, this plan which was worked out in co-operation with the provinces, gives Canada a very important security measure and I think this is an important date in the history of social security in this country.

In the last 12 years, we had not had many new measures in the field of social security. In 1952, a general old age pension plan for Canada was inaugurated but between 1952 and 1964, except for the hospital insurance plan, Canada did not do much with regard to social security.

Today, with this pension plan which covers all Canadians, I think that we are taking a great step forward.

It was not an easy task to prepare and draft that bill on account of the many constitutional objections it gave rise to. But because the governments carried out cool-headed discussions a solution was found. Section 94A of the constitution, following the 1951 amendment, allowed the federal government to legislate with regard to pensions. However, that gave prior rights to the provinces if they decided to take the initiative in that field.

When the present government announced its intention to establish a national pension plan, the province of Quebec said that it intended to set up its own plan and, in conformity with the rights it has under the constitution, it evidently was entitled to do so.

In my opinion, from a confrontation of the Quebec and federal plans there resulted appreciable benefits for both. This confrontation greatly improved the federal as well as the provincial plan.

I am not mentioning the pension plan put forward by the province of Ontario, because it was a security plan for insurance companies rather than for workers.

Mr. Caouette: Oh, oh. Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Chrétien: If you do not mind, after I have concluded my speech, I will be glad to answer you.

Mr. Caouette: My question is quite pertinent and should be asked right away, because it refers to what you have just said.

When the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche mentions that the pension plan is such that it could replace some other social legislation, does he mean that old age pensions, for instance, would be replaced by the retirement pension plan proposed by the present government?

Mr. Chrétien: In reply to the hon. member for Villeneuve, I must say I mentioned no such thing. On the contrary, the pension plan now before us will supplement the old age security which now exists. I did not suggest that the pension plan now before us would replace anything. This is a new measure which will be additional to old age security.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, the confrontation of those two plans resulted in the improvement of both, the federal one and the provincial one.

Among the social security improvements to be found in the federal plan, there is a capitalization which will be most useful to the federal government as well as to those provinces wishing to use the amounts made available to them for investment purposes, as mentioned in the bill, especially with regard to the investment programs of each of the provinces.

The second improvement brought to the federal plan since its first draft is that it is now compulsory for everybody. All citizens have been put on an equal footing. In my view, it is very important to compel every one to take part in this pension plan, because if they had been free to do so, some individuals would not have taken advantage of this pension plan, and upon reaching the pensionable age, they would have been second class citizens deprived of the protection which every citizen must receive in a relatively modern society.

Another advantage which was brought about by the confrontation of both plans was the extension of this plan to invalids, widows, orphans and also the granting of death benefits. In my opinion, the fact that both plans were compared at a certain time allowed the central government to obtain authorization from the provincial governments to amend the constitution so that the benefits of this pension plan could be extended to those persons who, during their working life, for instance, may become destitute because they were not included in this pension plan.

Then, thanks to this pension plan, these people will receive benefits, even when a member of the family leaves them for a better world.

This is very important for the security of our fellow citizens in general. In my opinion, this improvement was essential. And even if this were the only result of the confrontation of the two plans, this event was worth while.

As far as improvements to the Quebec plan are concerned, I could mention the following: first of all, a reduced rate of contribution from 4 per cent in the original Quebec plan to 3.6 per cent.

Another improvement is the reduction of the number of years prior to the date of coming into force of the plan. Under Quebec's original scheme, the act would not have applied to citizens for 20 years. Because it was possible to combine both schemes, the citizens of my province will benefit from that great social security legislation ten years hence. That is a tremendous improvement.

Another advantage I mentioned earlier is the portability of the pension, which means that throughout the country the worker is sure that wherever he goes his pension will go with him. In my opinion, the Quebec worker would not have enjoyed that advantage under his own plan if there had not been an agreement with the federal government. That additional improvement must be greatly appreciated in the province of Quebec.

Both plans also contain a very important principle I want to point out.

This is the first piece of social security legislation which recognizes the very important principle that benefits will increase when the cost of living increases. I think that is a new principle which is being accepted and that in the future it should gain a wider acceptance than in the past because we notice, unfortunately, that social security legislation enacted several years ago has not taken into account the rise in the cost of living, which has considerably reduced its usefulness.

In closing, I think that the federal pension plan now under consideration holds many advantages for the citizens. I am happy to see the bill referred to a committee at this stage so that all its provisions may be studied.

For instance, some complain because the contributions will have to be paid on incomes ranging from $600 to $5,000. It would perhaps be advisable to examine more closely the possibility of increasing it up to $7,000 or $8,000 in order perhaps to reduce the minimum rate, because some labourers who have very low earnings will find it too difficult to contribute to a certain part of the social security provided in the pension plan.

It is true that the minister has amended the plan two or three times and I again congratulate her. It is an excellent thing to reach an agreement after some negotiations and nobody must be blamed for reaching a compromise; indeed it has often been said that an arrangement is concluded by two intelligent persons.

We should not withdraw into rigid positions. I want to compliment both governments that looked calmly into the situation and found through constructive negotiations a common ground for the utmost benefit of all Canadian citizens. This constitutional crisis has been settled to the advantage of all Canadians.

Quebec needed funds for its economic development and it got them. The Ottawa government wanted a comprehensive pension plan for all Canadians and we have it. May this example be followed in the future. We should not be ashamed to make a compromise like this one, because we will have in the near future, included in our pension plan, an eminently social measure that the people of my province as well as those from all Canada must welcome wholeheartedly.

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks on Bill No. C-136. This bill will put Canadians at the mercy of a government or an institution. It will put them in a straitjacket and encroach upon their freedom as individuals, either directly or indirectly.

Man, by his very nature, was created free to organize his life according to his aspirations provided they do not harm society. But now the state wants to force Canadian citizens to set aside part of their production and amass something from which they will benefit 52 years hence, that is the period which will elapse between 18 and 70 years of age. And this law is compulsory, if you please, as if it were feared that the earth would quit producing and bearing fruit.

Through this plan, money will pile up, but what exactly will it be used for? Will it not be, for that matter, money which has been taken forcibly? Canadians will be bled white economically, the very minimum requirements for a decent living will be taken away from them, to be used to improve their standard of living 50 years from now.

Mr. Speaker, when I see how little attention the government ministers pay to what we say, I often feel like taking a drastic decision: that of never opening my mouth again in parliament and taking every other available means to fulfil my duties as a member of parliament, as a representative of the Canadian people and as the member for my district.

However, Mr. Speaker, if hon. members on the treasury benches have ears, but do not hear, and eyes, but fail to see the people's plight, I should, nevertheless, try and raise my voice to a still louder pitch to throw more light upon the matter whenever I get an opportunity.

As far as this Bill No. C-136 is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this considerable effort made by the government further to mislead a suffering and disheartened people, I shall rise once again in the desert of this House of Commons, and this Canadian parliament, which I had thought were more favourably disposed towards the Canadian people.

This famous Canada pension plan bill, in spite of its bombastic title, offers the Canadian people but another opportunity to see their daily bread curtailed, rationed, dried out and shrunk to a mere abstraction, a mere memory or hope; a war-time memory when money was plentiful while blood was flowing in remote parts. Five years of war brought prosperity to the Canadian people and healed the scars of that decade of depression between 1930 and 1940; but, from 1945 to 1965, after 20 years of peace, our whole hard working, peaceful and generous people have gone back to the days of depression, unemployment and destitution.

And to answer the peaceful demands of the people, all the government has to offer is Bill No. C-136. That is all our wise economists, accountants, scientists, experts, engineers and administrators have managed to offer us, the representatives of the people. And you would like us to express satisfaction at such a hazy, cumbersome and devious project as this Canadian pension plan. You are surprised that we do not think of congratulating you for that ridiculous discovery.

Fortunately, ridicule does not kill.

So you do not understand yet that the people no longer want compulsory savings deducted from their salary cheque which is already too small and inadequate for the daily needs of the dedicated worker and his family.

You have not understood as yet that our very presence in this house, we members of the Social Credit, members of the splinter parties, is a popular challenge to your bad political administration; it is a refusal to cooperate in your system which protects the wealth and capital of large institutions and lets a whole people starve or die of misery and poverty while producing plenty? Will such conditions go on forever? Have not the people reached as yet the end of their hardship and misery? They will have to accept one more deduction from their daily earnings, so that the governments may pile up billions of dollars from the pittance of the people who lack the necessities of life.

What else can we do? Have we not tried everything to open your eyes? Have we not offered various plans which could at least get your attention and your appreciation? But no, our only appreciation is your mockery, when it is not your contempt. Never mind. We are forging ahead just the same. A day will come, which is not far, I hope, when common sense and the natural intelligence of the people will upset once and for all not only the whole system of those bad pieces of legislation intended to pile up capital to the detriment of the human being, but also those schemes, those hindrances which further reduce the freedom of individuals, and especially of the Canadian citizens.

Just imagine a young man 18 years old, earning his first dollars and going into the world full of hopes, not yet entitled to vote, who sees that a deduction is made from his small salary so that he may get a pension when he reaches 70 years of age. Fifty two years later. Old age is not his main worry. He is forced to make a sacrifice today in order to reap crumbs at the end of his career when he reaches 70.

I suppose that your pension plan, as it stands and as it will be applied, will raise further the cost of production and reduce the purchasing power of the people.

What was already wrong is now still worse. Consumers' revenues will decrease and the cost of production will increase all for the purpose of increasing government capital when the government has the power to create capital through the Bank of Canada.

But no, the government prefers to further reduce the purchasing power of the Canadian people. It is more in line with the absurdity of our present system. This absurdity must always be preserved since it is serving the purpose of a few.

Out of an annual production of $46 billion, we allow a few Canadians to pile up profits and capital amounting to $14 billion after paying taxes and making a good living, but we do not want the small earner to enjoy even the bare necessities of life. It would be too dangerous if the people had security. This surplus must be taken away from them even before they have a chance to look at it. It is taken from them even before they cash their pay cheques. They are being deprived of it without ascertaining whether or not they need it for their own children, to buy them shoes. But that does not enter into the picture at all. We must at all costs increase the capital of our poor governments who entrust others with the power to create money, capital, under any possible debt forms.

Imagine, besides, that this Canadian pension plan, which deprives the poor in Canada of their daily bread, will serve to increase the pension of the wealthy, who have already all the necessary reserves to ensure their old age. It is not without any reason that we find in the gospel: "Who hath not from him shall be taken and whosoever hath to him shall be given."

The writers of those days already saw what was going to happen in Canada in 1964 at the federal government level under the leadership of Christian ministers, defenders of the faith in Christ.

Now, imagine, Mr. Speaker, that in this Canada pension plan no thought is even given to all our Canadian citizens. Our citizens will not all be entered on this pension list. A great number of them will still lack the essentials of life and will not benefit from this pension plan. What will you do then with those citizens who have none the less to defend themselves against the mishaps of destiny, this famous bill of rights guaranteeing to each individual in Canada his right to life, freedom, security of the person? Go and see, I invent nothing. Look up the Canadian Bill of Rights, which was passed unanimously by the 265 members, without any exception, of the parliament of Canada, where it is declared that each citizen is entitled to life, to the necessities of life, but where care is taken not to say that each citizen is entitled to the amount of money necessary to his life, his freedom, his subsistence.

And yet, what can we do without money? Would the ministers themselves have been able to get elected without the fabulous sums that elections cost? Where does this money come from? But to secure a strict minimum for Canadian citizens, it is impossible to guarantee each Canadian citizen the minimum amount required.

If we have the right to live, if the pension payable under the Canada pension plan is a strict minimum, even inadequate for a decent living, why are we required to pay more money for what is already a recognized right in our legislation? Why make anyone pay for something which is already recognized as a right of each individual in Canada?

Is a dog obliged to pay to have the right to live?

Mr. Speaker, only man, that proud and superior animal, is subjected to that vile and degrading slavery. Only man, among all God's creatures, is obliged at 18 to start saving for the time when he is 70, if he lives that long. Only man is thus obliged to provide against God's kindness.

That is to explain, Mr. Speaker, why science is only the third of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit or the Holy Ghost, as you wish. It is just as good if not better than party spirit.

God's wisdom, or God in His wisdom, has given the earth the power to produce all that is required for the nourishment of all its inhabitants, yearly and for every year.

Our monetary, economic and political systems should abide by this will of God that is so well expressed in nature. I was going to say in the Bible, but nature is, still more than the Bible, the word of God. Nature is rather the act of God, than the word.

When in your Canada pension plan you are asking, you are requiring an 18 year old boy, who is not yet entitled to vote to start paying taxes out of a meagre salary, so as to save money in order to get the benefit of it in 52 years, when he is 70 years old perhaps, if he is still living at that time, in the year 2016, you are guilty of a sacrilege, a sacrilege against God, against his Bible, against his gospel, against your oath of allegiance.

When a young man has not enough money to live decently at the present time, to marry, to carry on his studies, if he so wishes, you force him to put aside certain sums which will serve to pile up billions of dollars—according to the Minister of National Health and Welfare $8 billion will be accumulated in ten years—I submit that this is disgraceful. In fact, I believe that as Canadians, as representatives of the people, if we cannot find a more logical formula which would be more acceptable to the people, it would be preferable for us to resign and go back home, because not one of us deserves to represent the people.

Those were the remarks I wanted to make, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to speak in support of second reading of this bill to create a Canada pension plan. I suppose it is understandable that I do have a certain pride in the fact that whatever the interests of the other parties might have been, this Liberal government has been the first to actually present to parliament legislation to create a comprehensive, portable pension plan for Canadians. While this legislation may represent the end result of a series of conferences and discussions with provincial governments and others, this should not be a reason for concern or criticism if it has led to a better plan than would have been the case without those conferences and discussions. I think this is what has happened. The turmoil, the ill will that followed the introduction by the former New Democratic party government of Saskatchewan of its medicare program shows what can happen when far reaching measures of social welfare are introduced without first having adequate consultation and discussion involving all groups concerned.

It is important that any such measure be the subject of the fullest and widest consultation and discussion so that it will work relatively smoothly from the very beginning and provide the benefits intended. This smooth operation has characterized the introduction of every social welfare measure created by previous Liberal governments. Old age security, unemployment insurance, family allowance all worked properly from the beginning without breakdowns due to conflicts, disputes or constitutional arguments; and I am sure that as a result of the consultations and discussions which preceded this piece of legislation, it will work equally well.

The introduction of this legislation with the approval of the provinces, who would otherwise have had the constitutional power to block it, demonstrates the true effectiveness of this government not only in maintaining but also in strengthening national unity. It has been a vindication of its concept of co-operative federalism, involving as it does consultation with other levels of government in matters of common concern in order to create programs in the national interest. Without this concept of co-operative federalism there could not have been a national pension plan at this time and national unity would have been the weaker. In getting the agreement of all provinces to this legislation and introducing it into parliament at this time, this government has done more in a solid and meaningful way for the cause of national unity present and future than any number of dramatic opposition speeches, no matter how colourful and flowery and no matter how often they contain the word "Canada".

Mr. Nielsen: Read on.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, this legislation is creating a standard of retirement benefit, of survivor and disability benefits for all people in this country no matter where they live. It has made it easier for people to take advantage of opportunity no matter where it may exist within our boundaries. With this bill this government has woven strands essential to the strengthening of the national fabric—

Mr. Grafftey: Stephen Leacock.

Mr. Gray: —and has created another powerful reason for all of us to continue living together as Canadians. The definite need for this plan at this time is surely demonstrated by the fact that almost 75 per cent of our total labour force has no coverage at all under private pension plans, and many of those who do belong to such plans do not have anything that could be called adequate coverage. The existence of 4,600,000 workers without coverage and the nature of the coverage of the many who are in private plans show to what extent private insurance companies have not—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, I would ask for the author of the document from which the hon. member is quoting.

Mr. Rhéaume: Tom Kent wrote that.

Mr. Gray: I am pleased to inform this house, Mr. Speaker, that I happen to be the author and I have to take responsibility for what is in it, for better or for worse.

An hon. Member: It sure is for worse.

Mr. Gray: It is not as bad as some of the things those on the opposite side of the house have said. Perhaps I may continue, Mr. Speaker. Private insurance companies have not used the opportunity that is theirs to fill this definite social need—an opportunity which some of these companies at least have now been asking governments to leave entirely to them alone.

Questions have inevitably been raised as to whether or not we can afford this type of social security, this type of social security system embodied in the Canada pension plan. But those asking these questions overlook the ability to support this type of plan existing in our buoyant economy and the ability that will come through increasing productivity and the continuing growth of this economy. Canada certainly spends less of its gross national product, according to the recent white paper on this subject, on its old age security program and on programs of supplementary aid for the elderly than other English speaking countries. In the 1962-63 fiscal year Canada spent only 2 per cent of its gross national product for that purpose, while Australia spent 2.3 per cent, the United States 2.7 per cent, and 3.4 per cent was spent by the United Kingdom. It is expected that when this Canada pension plan is operated fully our country's spending on the aged will increase to only 2.3 per cent.

There have also been criticisms of the plan because it has been suggested that full benefits would be available to some, even though they have contributed for only ten years and their contributions would not equal the benefits they would be obtaining. But this would be true only in so far as it applies to those reaching pensionable age at the end of the initial ten year transition period; it would not be true in so far as any other ten year period of contribution under this plan is concerned.

After all, Mr. Speaker, one of the main reasons for creating a national contributory pension scheme at this time is to make sure that reasonable retirement benefits are available to those in their 40's or 50's who are nearing retirement age, most of whom belong to no private pension plan at all or have no adequate coverage under any private plan. There would be not much point in creating such a plan now if these important groups of people were to be overlooked. But this is exactly the same thing that has been done by many private pension plans when they have been set up by employers which give credit to their employees for years of service rendered before the new plan goes into effect. This means that employees who have worked for the maximum period required by the plan are entitled to full benefits when they retire, even though they have not contributed over the entire period before the plan went into effect. And the right to enrol in such private plans is frequently restricted to employees of 55 years of age or less who can be expected to work at least another ten years before retirement. If they complete these ten years of service they would then receive the full pension benefits.

This is exactly what happens under the Canada pension plan. People who can serve another ten years of pensionable employment from the date the plan comes into operation will be able to get full benefits when they retire, even though the benefits they are to receive would be far in excess of their contributions. Therefore the Canada pension plan, in the same way as private plans, recognizes the past service of employees, the contribution they have made to their country, and permits them to receive full benefits. This certainly cannot be considered an unfair burden on our younger people who will be contributing to the plan for a long period. After all, they have benefited from the efforts of those who are now reaching retirement age. In any event, it would not be correct to say that the difference between the amounts contributed by those who do receive full benefit at the end of the transition period and the amounts of these pensions would be paid solely by the younger people. This difference would undoubtedly be made up, at least in part, by contributions from employers.

However, the argument has still been made that in creating the Canada pension plan we will be placing future generations in a situation where they have an overly onerous burden placed upon their shoulders, forcing them to pay the costs of the benefits which we may be establishing today. But this plan's approach is basically the same as that of our existing old age security system under which those now working pay for the old age pension of those who are retired; and the same can be said to apply with respect to our other existing social welfare benefits—that those not getting them help pay for those who are, to the benefit of the entire population. If the contributions of those who come after will pay for the pensions of those already retired, they in turn will be in the same situation.

The minister in her speech on second reading pointed out the unlikelihood of an increase in contribution rates for a generation; but if after 20 years some increase does become necessary surely it will be no different from increasing taxes, as we have done from time to time, to bring about needed increases in existing old age security pensions. I am sure that, as is the case today, members of future generations will be more concerned with the percentage of their income which they pay to the plan and the benefits they receive from it than the possibility that they are also helping to pay for benefits for others.

This Canada pension plan finally before us has also been subject to criticism because it provides for the building up of a sizeable fund in its initial stages which will be available to the provinces in proportion to the contributions from them. It seems curious to me that some of this criticism has appeared to come from some of the very same people who criticized the complete pay as you go basis of the first version of this plan on the ground that it was not actuarially sound. While in this house we cannot attribute motives to speakers within its walls I do not suppose that there is anything to prevent us from doing so with regard to those who criticize in this way legislation of this type. In any event, there has been a lot of discussion lately about priorities of government expenditure, what should come first, whether it should be pensions or education or medical care. But this question cannot be answered by fixing on only one of these needs to the complete exception of all the others. The sick, the aged, the young are all part of our society, as they always will be. None of them can be ignored completely while another group is being looked after.

Therefore, the priorities can only be priorities of emphasis and of degree. You cannot decide that for the next ten years, for example, you will spend money only on schools and nothing on pensions. Some way must be found to meet these needs to one extent or another. The building up of a fund from the contributions made during the initial years of the Canada pension plan provides a way, at least a partial way, of dealing with this question of priorities for the next several decades, of harmonizing seemingly conflicting needs of different segments of our population, all of which have a right to be taken care of to some degree at the same time.

I wonder if I might call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Rhéaume: Read another couple of pages.

Mr. Gray: I see there are still a few minutes so I will continue with my remarks.

There has been a tremendous demand for schools arising out of our rapidly expanding population and its need to adapt to changing technology. This same population has created a similar demand for hospital facilities and these are considered amongst the most pressing needs for social capital. However these fields fall under the responsibility of the provinces and are likely to do so certainly for the immediate future. To meet these demands for social capital today the provinces must have the necessary finances. The Canada pension plan provides a way for them to obtain these finances and at the same time enables Canadians to begin providing for themselves a reasonable, basic standard of income for their retirement years.

Some concern has been expressed over the implication of making available these sizeable investment funds to governments, and at having them left in the hands of politicians. While I am not suggesting that all politicians are above reproach, at the same time I cannot accept the argument that all elected representatives in Canada today, aided by their civil service advisers, are generally speaking any less responsible or sound in their judgments than business executives, among whom have been found some who have made decisions which led not only to loss of money on the part of their firms but to actual bankruptcy.

I now see, Mr. Speaker, that the clock has at last caught up with me, so I suppose I can legitimately call it ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the house leader, if this debate is concluded tomorrow and if there is any time left, whether we will go on with the smaller items he mentioned yesterday. Then may I ask a second question. Which estimates may we expect to take up in the house on Thursday and Friday?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose continuing with the present debate on the second reading of the Canada pension plan. If it is finished before the end of the day we will take up the three bills I mentioned last night, as set out at page 10151 of Hansard. On Thursday it is my understanding that the chairman of the special committee on the Canadian flag proposes to move concurrence in the report of the flag committee.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the importance of the business that has been mentioned but I was wondering whether the house leader has given consideration to the fact that perhaps a few more days uninterrupted on the main estimates would ease him quite a bit in the onerous duties he is performing in this house. Because I am sure he would not want to ask for interim supply again, having received nine twelfths of the fiscal year already.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would care to be very specific and tell us just how many days is "a few" in that context and how many estimates would be through at the end of that period, I would certainly give the matter very urgent consideration.

Mr. Winkler: Let us start with justice.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the house leader has asked me a question. My survey of the situation leads me to say that I think the main estimates, if discussion is continued without interruption, can be completed by the 30th of November.

Mr. Leboe: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that if we can get these estimates before the house I think we can dispose of them all by the end of the month and the government would then have control of the house. As long as they have to come back for interim supply they have not got control of the house and I think it is in the interests of parliament—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. My understanding is that it is irregular to have a debate on the announcement of government business. It is the duty of the government house leader to announce the business. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre wants to ask a question—

Mr. Knowles: Yes, I should like to ask a question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the discussion that has taken place, will the government house leader consider calling a meeting of the party representatives to discuss the program for the immediate future?

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, before the leader of the house answers the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I must say that, in my opinion, we have had enough meetings of the party leaders and that we must accept the house leader's suggestion to the effect that on Thursday we take up at last, consideration of the report of the special committee which had the responsibility of choosing a distinctive Canadian flag model.

We are anxious to settle this issue in order that we can consider after that all the programs which our friends the Conservatives might want to suggest to the government.

[Text]

Mr. Olson: May I ask the house leader a question? When the motion is moved for concurrence in the report of the flag committee, will any special provision be made for the question period on the days when that motion is being discussed?

Mr. McIlraith: There has been no request for any such special condition to be made applicable. The motion for concurrence is a routine proceeding and would take precedence over all other business. I will look into the possibility of doing something about this matter. If it became apparent that there was some need for a question period perhaps we could use the hour from 10 to 10.30 for that purpose.

Mr. Douglas: Does this mean that the government intends to proceed with the discussion of the flag committee's report and continue with it until it is completed? Does this mean that the labour standards act will not be dealt with until after that report has been approved?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, we are getting into a debate—

An hon. Member: Let us have an answer.

Mr. McIlraith: —but may I say I did not put any such negative proposition at all. I was asked, very properly, by the house leader of the official opposition to announce the business. I announced it for the next three days, as I thought was proper, and it must be evident to all hon. members, of course, that we can only discuss one item of business at a time in the house although sometimes I wonder if that is what we actually do.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS—REQUEST FOR EQUALIZATION OF WELFARE PAYMENTS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, today I asked the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if he would allay the fears of many native Indian people across the country by announcing the government's policy with respect to the amounts of welfare benefit payments to these people in order that the Indian people of Canada will not be enticed into the field of provincial jurisdiction by higher welfare payments when they may not want to participate in the provincial plan.

On November 2, the minister answered a number of questions posed by myself and other members of the house about the procedure to be followed after the dominion-provincial conference on Indian affairs was held. The minister stated, as reported on page 9652 of Hansard:

[Mr. Olson.]

> Firstly, in every province of Canada, there shall be held a conference to which all Indians will be invited so they can express their wishes and their suggestions on the very principle of extending provincial services to the Indians in every province.

The first thing these native people would like to know, Mr. Speaker, is who is going to arrange for this conference? How are the native people going to get there? Who is going to pay the costs of the conference, the costs of transportation and the like, of the native people to attend this particular conference? They would like to know that. However, that is incidental to the main point.

I continue to quote from the minister's statement:

> After this consultation and provided the Indians agree that such provincial services would be desirable, there shall be a second method consultation; the bands will be consulted. Every band in Canada or in every province will be consulted—

Then he went on to say that every band in Canada or in every province would be consulted, that is the councils of those bands would be consulted, in order to ascertain if they wished to take advantage of a program to be established in a province, and every band which did not wish to take advantage of provincial services would be free to reject such services. Under those circumstances, the federal services would remain in force.

We do know that there are native Indian people in different parts of Canada who strenuously object to having jurisdiction over their affairs dealt with in any way by provincial governments. There are Indian people in other parts of Canada who believe it would be desirable to have jurisdiction over their affairs dealt with in the same way as everybody else, and that there be equality of application of the law. This situation is likely to develop. A native Indian or a group of native Indians may not want, for the sake of argument, to have jurisdiction over welfare services dealt with by the provincial government. It may well be that the provincial government is paying welfare payments greatly in excess of the niggardly amounts paid by the Indian affairs branch. What they would like to know is if the government will declare that welfare payments payable to native Indian people will be on a par with those made by the various provinces so that this monetary enticement will not be held out to them by the provinces in order to entice the Indian people to come under provincial jurisdiction. This is a serious matter.

Recently, for instance, in British Columbia one of the Indian superintendents, speaking at a conference of the Nishga tribal council on January 1, said the Indian affairs branch would make welfare payments on the same basis as those payments are made by the provincial authorities. This is a welcome announcement. It should have been made many years ago. We would like to know if this is the policy of the government in all of these provinces. Will they treat the Indian people on a basis of equality in so far as the various services are concerned which might be provided by the provinces, and which they might accept at this conference which is about to be arranged? They want to know where they stand. They do not want to be bought off or have it look as if they are being bought into provincial jurisdiction. If this were to be the case, it would be a most disgraceful state of affairs, to have a province offer money to the native people to get them to come under their jurisdiction and relinquish what they feel in their hearts are their rights under the crown, and under the jurisdiction of the government of Canada.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when speaking on his estimates on August 14 the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration made the following statement, as recorded at page 6864 of Hansard for that date:

> Concern has been expressed about the apparent disparities between the amount of public assistance provided to Indians as compared to that received by other residents of the various provinces. On the surface there appear to be such disparities. However, they are more apparent than real. Indian assistance rates cover food only. Fuel, shelter, clothing and other forms of assistance are provided to Indians as extra items on the basis of need. On the other hand, provincial scales, though varying greatly from province to province, generally include a lump sum payment for food, shelter, clothing, fuel and other needs.

From the minister's statement it can readily be seen that the difference between the welfare rates used by the Indian affairs branch and the rates used by the provinces are more apparent than real. The Indian affairs branch rates cover food only, with clothing and other necessities provided separately, as required, while provincial rates cover all items including food.

However, I want to assure the hon. member that the department has decided to adjust its welfare rates to conform with those of the provinces concerned, and this will be done as quickly as possible or as soon as the details can be worked out. Indians will not be brought under the jurisdiction of the provinces without their own consent.

I think that, Mr. Speaker, answers the questions asked by the hon. member for Skeena and I am sure that so far as this government is concerned he need not fear about the treatment of Indians. In other words, they will be treated fairly.

Mr. Howard: In other words, there is no difference but you are going to adjust it anyway.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF APPEAL BOARD

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on July 27 I asked the Minister of Justice, who I am disappointed not to see in his seat tonight particularly because of the gravity with which I view the situation, to provide an answer to this question. On that date I suggested that the minister give consideration to setting up an appeal board procedure similar to that which is used in the armed forces court martial appeal board, so that there could be impartial and rapid disposal of charges which have been brought against members of the R.C.M.P. under rules which at best can be described as rather archaic.

The minister said he would consider the matter as one for government policy. I presume the parliamentary secretary will be answering for him tonight and I wish to suggest it is a matter of great urgency, as pointed out by the recent developments in Montreal with respect to two highly placed officers, one the commanding officer of the whole subdivision, who have been dealt with by a trial procedure and convicted.

An appeal was brought before three other officers, as is the procedure under the act. The appeal was dismissed and a recommendation was made by the commissioner of the mounted police, which the minister has not yet dealt with, notwithstanding the fact that it was made shortly before Labour day. For two and a half months these officers and their families have been kept in suspense waiting upon the minister's decision. The minister has to decide, of course, whether or not to recommend to his cabinet colleagues that the recommendation of the commissioner be carried out. I put it to the parliamentary secretary that this procedure is archaic. It is time it was changed. Justice delayed is justice denied and no further delay can be justified in this particular case.

It has not been my intention to jeopardize the individuals concerned or the good reputation which the R.C.M.P. enjoys not only in this country but throughout the world. But national press stories, particularly one which appeared on November 13 in the Toronto Star, have now publicized details of the case and it is time the minister or someone in authority spoke up. Any further delay would amount to a complete neglect of the responsibility which the minister has for making a decision. Since the recommendation was made, two and a half months have gone by and the individual officers concerned should not, in my opinion, be held any longer in suspense with regard to the unfortunate developments which have placed them in the position in which they now find themselves and their families. An impartial appeal procedure similar to that available to the armed forces would do away with this kind of injustice.

My purpose in raising this matter on July 17 continues to be my purpose. As matters have developed there appears to be a need for the minister to say something which will restore morale which has deteriorated seriously within the force. I see the parliamentary secretary laughing at that, but I am serious when I say to him that the morale of the force has been jeopardized by this delay. The minister has a responsibility to restore it. It does not take two and a half months for all the surrounding circumstances to be investigated so that the minister can reach a decision. I know I shall probably be told that all the surrounding circumstances are being investigated and that when this investigation has been completed an announcement will be made. But even if only two months had elapsed there would have been ample time for the minister to have acted responsibly.

The delay is having a serious effect also on the confidence placed by the minister in the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. who made the recommendation based on the advice of four senior officers of the force. Either the minister has confidence in the commissioner or he has not. It is time this house and the public knew. It would also be good for the morale of individuals in the force if they, too, knew how the minister stands in this regard.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): It seems to me there are two things to be said with respect to the hon. member's observations tonight. The first is that it is a sad and grave misfortune both for the individuals involved in this particular situation and for the proud service to which they belong that these incidents should have arisen. I know all right thinking people would agree that the fact these circumstances have come to pass should not be the basis for any type of unfair yellow journalism or for any type of political exaggeration.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

It comes as a surprise to me that the hon. member should have described the rules as archaic and the procedure as being out of date, because he should know that the statute which governs this situation was enacted by parliament in 1959, at a time when the hon. member was a member of this house and a supporter of the government of the day and if, indeed, the rules are as fraught with injustice as he maintains, it is extraordinary he should have sat through that debate so supinely and done nothing to assert what seems to him now to be a basic principle. If this was not evident to the hon. member in 1959 it should certainly have been evident to him and to the government he supported in 1961.

I would refer the house to the case of re Walsh and Jordan, reported in volume 31 Dominion Law Reports, second series, 1962, at page 88, a justice of the Ontario high court held that the Canadian Bill of Rights had no application to the procedure which was involved in that case, which also related to disciplinary action against an officer of the R.C.M.P. It was held that this much-vaunted statute was here again just a dead letter and had no application. If indeed the government which the hon. gentleman supported felt at that time that there was a question of justice involved here, one would have expected they would have taken some action on it. However, I think a further important characteristic here is that you are involved in the cases of two men with, respectively, 34 years and 15 years service in this force. I do not think any member present who stops to reflect on these matters would want any kind of drumhead justice—would want them to lose, for example, the pension rights which they have accrued—without a full consideration of their cases.

AGRICULTURE—OTTAWA VALLEY—EMERGENCY LEGISLATION RESPECTING DROUGHT CONDITIONS

Mr. J. J. Greene (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, today I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) and, in his absence, the parliamentary secretary with regard to the very serious situation of drought which exists in eastern Ontario generally and in Renfrew county in particular. Yesterday the hon. member for Pontiac-Témiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) asked a question with regard to a similar situation which apparently exists in Pontiac, in the province of Quebec. At that time the Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé), who replied to the question, felt that some action should be taken in this regard by the province of Quebec.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that this matter is of some national moment as well as of great importance to the farmers of Renfrew county, by reason of the statement of the hon. member for Battle River-Camrose (Mr. Smallwood), who indicated that the forcible sale of cattle by farmers of eastern Ontario, and in particular Renfrew county where the drought is most severe, might result in affecting cattle prices across the nation as a whole. I think, therefore, the problem is one which affects not only the particular area of drought, which is largely in Renfrew and Lanark counties, but possibly the national economy in so far as it pertains to the sale and price of cattle across the country. I would point out that I appreciate there is a constitutional difficulty in these matters; that unfortunately national legislation pertaining to crises in various provinces where, through no fault of their own the farmers of this country are very hard hit by drought or other disasters of this nature which stem from an act of God, is possibly lacking in this parliament by reason of the fact that to date no national policy has been evolved with the co-operation of the provinces.

However, Mr. Speaker, I do submit that in a situation such as this, which affects not only the economic well-being of these farmers but even involves the possibility of the wells being dry and the water tables being extremely low, and which might affect the question of health and welfare in these areas, surely when a crisis of this kind occurs some action can be taken under the federal powers to remedy it. This is a very serious situation which exists in the counties of Renfrew and Lanark by reason of the very serious drought existing at the present time and the very bad conditions with regard to the wells and water tables. I would point out that the entire season has been dry to the extent that the hay crop has been short, so that at the present time feed is extremely short. Accordingly these farmers have to sell cattle at below their market value almost on a forced sale basis. Not only will this create very serious economic difficulties for them but it will possibly depress the market generally.

I would also point out the serious emergency situation existing not only with respect to cattle but with regard to the tobacco growers of the area. Theirs is very nearly a total loss this year by reason of the drought, and I suggest that some action should be taken by the department not only to remedy the situation regarding the shortage of hay, but to enable these unfortunate tobacco farmers to recover from the blow they have suffered. I may say that tobacco farming in this area is in its infancy. I think it is well known that this area is not a rich economic area. It is an economic area where any industry, such as tobacco farming, which is beginning to show some signs of good prospects, should be encouraged. Total loss in one of the early years could prove fatal to this burgeoning industry.

The Minister of Agriculture has displayed, I think, a dynamism and capacity for action. I think he has come to be known as the farmers' C. D. Howe, and it is to be hoped that in a situation such as this some action will be forthcoming along the lines we have become accustomed to from the dynamic Minister of Agriculture who is in office at the present time.

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for Renfrew South for bringing this important matter to the attention of all hon. members. I wish to offer him my congratulations for his very deep concern for the farmers of his constituency. This provides me with an opportunity to restate the policy of the government and also to relate some first hand experiences which I had with you, Mr. Speaker, in the county of Stormont, where I had the opportunity of viewing some of the serious conditions existing in your county, which I know are typical of the problem areas of eastern Canada.

The policy of the government, as was the policy of previous governments, has been that the federal government should not interfere unless requested to do so by the province concerned. A province would not normally ask for federal assistance unless it felt that any loss occasioned was beyond their financial capacity to absorb. But the federal government has recognized that many of these problem areas do present a serious drain on the finances of the provinces and therefore the government has been only too willing to enter into consultations with the provinces and to reach agreement on a policy whereby federal assistance can be made available, provided the province concerned initiates the request. The policy is simply that the federal government and the province concerned would enter into an agreement whereby they would pay collectively 75 per cent of the cost of transportation of fodder into these areas up to a maximum of $10 per ton. In addition, the federal government would assist the provinces in paying the transportation of livestock back to the market. This, of course, clearly places a responsibility for initiating any measure of assistance in drought stricken areas on the province.

I think there is also one other responsibility here and I make this statement entirely on my own. I believe that where there is dire need, and hardship has occurred, it is the responsibility of the municipality to take some action and to give some leadership in assessing the over-all needs of the municipality. It should also give some leadership in seeing to it that the policies of the province and of the federal government are clearly understood and used by the farmers in the area.

The hon. member of Renfrew South has referred to tobacco. I think he is probably aware, as are other hon. members, that this government has instituted a policy of crop reinsurance whereby the principle of crop insurance has been broadened. This would offer some degree of protection for specialized crops in specific areas such as he has mentioned. This could also apply to other crops in a similar way. In concluding I wish to thank the hon. member again for bringing this matter to the attention of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CHANGE IN SEATING ARRANGEMENTS OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and I may say it is a very pleasant one. I should like to express the thanks of our party to the hon. member for Chicoutimi and to his party for the kindness they have shown in making available a seat in our area of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles: One of my hon. friends is asking me to express my thanks to the Progressive Conservative party, too, but that was not part of what I intended to say.

In the light of all this may I ask that the following changes of seating be noted: the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway to seat No. 214; the hon. member for Winnipeg North to seat No. 239; the hon. member for Danforth to seat No. 240; the hon. member for New Westminster to seat No. 241; the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond to seat No. 267, and the hon. member for Hamilton South to seat No. 268. This will leave seat No. 269 available for the new member for Waterloo South, Mr. Max Saltsman.

Mr. Speaker: Will the Clerk please take note of the seating changes.

PRIVILEGE

MR. COWAN—REMARKS IN DEBATE BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO JUSTICE MINISTER

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I rise on a question of privilege at this time on behalf of myself personally and of other newspapermen in the house to protest against the language used by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice last night in endeavouring to answer a question raised by the hon. member for Yukon.

It is bad enough to have a newspaper accused of yellow journalism when it practices deceit, but when a newspaper gives a straightforward, honest statement of the facts as was the case in the report regarding those two high ranking R.C.M.P. officers in Montreal, no one in the Department of Justice has any right to refer to it as yellow journalism. The hon. gentleman also suggested that no member of this house would want any kind of drumhead justice considered, since the Department of Justice has been studying the pension rights of the two men who have been tried and convicted. I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether arrangements are being made for pensions for printers who are on strike at La Presse, Montreal and at the Telegram, the Star and the Globe and Mail in Toronto. These men have forsworn their pension rights though they never stole anything from anybody.

WATER RESOURCES

ELLIOT LAKE—STATEMENT ON REPORTED RADIOACTIVE POLLUTION

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): As minister through whom the atomic energy control board reports to parliament, I should like to make a statement on radioactive contamination in waters in the Elliot Lake area and to reiterate the assurance given last Friday by the Prime Minister that there is no immediate hazard to the public and that adequate steps are being taken.

The question of pollution in provincial waters is of course one primarily of provincial jurisdiction, and to this end the province of Ontario has given the Ontario water resources commission the task of monitoring pollution in provincial waters. To safeguard the health of the public, the commission works in close co-operation with the Ontario department of health. Because, however, of the radioactive element in the present case the atomic energy control board has a direct interest.

Since 1957 the Ontario water resources commission has been actively engaged in carrying out investigations in the Elliot Lake area directed primarily toward minimizing the chemical and physical effects of uranium ore waste on the Serpent river watershed, and during this period has kept the atomic energy control board informed as to the presence and levels of radioactive elements in the waters of the area.

In order to rectify the existing situation, which has some long term dangers but no immediate hazards, the commission has been discussing with the mining companies concerned the taking of measures necessary, both in their view and in the view of the atomic energy control board, to bring about an abatement of the existing pollution. I am advised that the steps taken by the Ontario water resources commission to date and the future plans to deal with this situation are fully supported by the atomic energy control board, and further that the atomic energy control board endorses the conclusions reached by the commission and the Ontario department of health, namely that there is no immediate hazard to persons in the affected area; rather, these agencies are concerned with the possibilities of a long term—that is, many years—hazard that could develop should the situation not be brought under control at this time.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to table, for the information of hon. members, an official statement by the Ontario water resources commission outlining the steps being taken in this regard and their plans for the future.

In so far as other areas in Canada are concerned where uranium mining is being carried on, I am advised that radioactive contamination of water supplies as a consequence of these mining operations is not a problem. A recent report regarding the spreading of dust from the piles of tailings is also unduly alarmist. I am advised by the atomic energy control board that the concentration of radioactive material in this dust is so low as not to constitute a hazard to health.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct two questions to the Minister of Industry regarding the report he made to the house this afternoon, which to my mind was far from reassuring.

First, how does it come about that the atomic energy control board, which has some measure of responsibility, has allowed this situation with reference to radiation pollution to go as far as it has without more effective measures being taken? Second, has his attention been drawn to the statement which appeared in the Globe and Mail of November 17 by Mr. Frank Wright, former health inspector in that area, who said that he drew the situation to the attention of the mining companies and the health authorities and was told to mind his own business, and was able to get no action whatsoever? I want to ask the minister whether any machinery is being set up to tighten inspection so the situation will not become worse.

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam will take the time to read the statement on the situation which I have tabled, I think a number of his doubts will probably be resolved. In regard to his question as to how come this situation has been allowed to arise, I might say that a situation has arisen which does present a long term hazard to health if nothing is done. It does not present a short term hazard to health today. The long term hazard has been some time in arising, and it is being dealt with in time and adequately.

In so far as the statement of the health inspector is concerned, as I recollect the report it was to the effect that he had left that particular job last June and was entirely unfamiliar with what has happened in the Elliot lake area since June. If both he and the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam will read the statement I have tabled I think both he and the hon. member will be satisfied.

Mr. Douglas: I listened to the statement very carefully, and all I could gather was that the minister was sure the danger had not reached serious proportions. Will he tell the house what has happened since June in the Elliot Lake area which makes the situation any different from that described by Mr. Wright.

Mr. Drury: In the paper I have tabled the steps which have been taken or which are being taken are outlined, steps which are designed to lead and which will in fact lead to the abatement of this pollution.

1. What subsidy was paid in 1963 out of the federal treasury to the Canadian railways?

2. What subsidy has been promised for 1964 and/or paid?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Payments made subject to order number 96300, dated November 17, 1958, of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, which provides for payments to companies of an aggregate amount of $20,000,000 in respect of the period April 1, 1963, to March 31, 1964, to be paid in instalments at such times as may be determined by the said board for the purpose of reimbursing the said companies for such diminution in their aggregate gross revenues during the said period as in the opinion of the said board is attributable to such companies maintaining the rate level for freight traffic at an 8 per cent increase instead of 17 per cent as authorized by the said order; and to provide payments to the said companies of an aggregate amount in respect of the calendar year 1963 of $50,000,000 to be paid in instalments at such times and in accordance with such methods of allocation as may be determined by the said board for the maintenance by such companies of the rates of freight traffic at the said reduced level, $68,086,164.

Further payments in respect of the period from April 30, 1962, to March 31, 1963, to companies as defined in the Freight Rates Reduction Act in the manner and subject to the same terms and conditions as payments made pursuant to that act in previous fiscal years, $14,761.

2. No action has yet been taken on interim payments for 1964-1965; $7,000,000 has been provided in the main estimates for 1964-1965 for payments to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Canadian National Railways Company in respect of the annual cost of maintaining the trackage between specified points in Ontario on the transcontinental lines of the said railways.

FAILURE TO PROSECUTE UNDER INCOME TAX ACT

Question No. 2,074—Mr. Smith:

Since April 8, 1963, have there been any instances when the government has not initiated, or continued, prosecutions under the Income Tax Act when such action had been recommended to the government prior to that date and, if so, how many such instances?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): There have been three instances since April 8, 1963 when the government has not initiated, or continued, prosecution under the Income Tax Act when such action has been recommended to the government prior to that date. In one instance, through a misunderstanding of instructions, the taxpayer was led to believe that the payment of a penalty would conclude the case; in another instance, the evidence was reconsidered on the advice of counsel and it was determined to indicate a civil matter rather than fraud; and in the other instance, key witnesses died and before alternative evidence could be obtained, the time within which a prosecution could be initiated had expired.

They also provide transportation for police personnel where other means of transportation are not available. The Department of Public Works is rectifying this deficiency and, as an added precaution, will build an outside fire escape to ensure the safety of the occupants of the building.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS ON BEHALF OF FISHERMEN

Question No. 2,233—Mr. Crouse:

Will the government give consideration to amending the unemployment insurance regulations which specify that a fisherman may have a contribution of unemployment insurance stamps paid on his behalf by a buyer only in respect of a catch which is delivered to that buyer in a face to face transaction?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): In those cases where fishermen have no actual employer, the buyer of their catch is responsible for the payment and recording of unemployment insurance contributions on their behalf, but only if he is dealing with the fishermen face to face.

This limitation is considered essential in the absence of a real employer-employee relationship. In order that the buyer may make the proper contributions for self employed fishermen, he must know what persons actually participated in making the catch, he must obtain their names and insurance numbers, he must ascertain that no other person is legally acting as their employer in respect of that catch, and he must verify several other particulars specified in the regulations. This can only be done adequately when one of the fishermen who has made the catch delivers it in person to the buyer. It is not considered practicable to maintain control over the plan without this restriction.

Question No. 2,235—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. As of October 31, 1964, what is the financial state of the unemployment insurance fund?

2. What are its future prospects?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1. On October 31, 1964, the unemployment insurance fund showed a credit balance of $56,750,970.82.

2. It is expected that the contributions to the unemployment insurance fund will continue to increase the financial state of the fund until some time in December 1964. From approximately January 1965, during the heavy claims season, it is expected that the outgo from the fund will exceed its income.

4. At what date was the work to commence?

1. How many people have registered with the national employment service in each two week period in 1964?

2. What proportion of the unemployed workforce is this estimated to represent in each two week period?

3. How many people have successfully been placed in jobs by the national employment service in each two week period?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour):

1. Data are not available by two week periods nor is information available for number of persons registered. The number of applications for employment at N.E.S. offices during calendar months of 1964 including workers who may have made more than one application is as follows: January, 398,043; February, 293,408; March, 290,283; April, 325,655; May, 296,023; June, 344,310; July, 349,349; August, 296,775; September, 316,718.

2. Data are not comparable. N.E.S. data represent number of applications for employment during calendar months while labour force data represent estimates of persons unemployed and seeking work during a particular week of each month. Also N.E.S. data do not represent unemployed persons by labour force definition.

Labour force estimates of persons unemployed and seeking work during survey weeks indicated in 1964 are as follows:

January 18, 466,000; February 22, 467,000; March 21, 456,000; April 18, 403,000; May 23, 293,000; June 20, 282,000; July 18, 265,000; August 22, 247,000; September 19, 218,000.

3. Data are not available for two week periods nor is information available for number of persons placed. The number of placements in employment during calendar months in 1964 including workers who may have been placed more than once is as follows:

January, 73,471; February, 66,673; March, 74,756; April, 104,380; May, 109,669; June, 109,134; July, 123,827; August, 111,407; September, 133,281.

2. What was the total number of acres to be cultivated and grassed?

3. How many tons of fertilizer were used on this project?

4. Were public tenders called and, if so, how was it advertised?

5. How many tenders were received and the tender prices of each?

6. To whom was this contract awarded and for what amount?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): In so far as Defence Construction (1951) Limited is concerned, the answer is as follows:

1. A contract was awarded for the aerodrome fencing, grading and seeding at R.C.A.F. station, Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, on May 29, 1964, at an estimated cost of $123,919.55 based on unit prices and estimated quantities.

A portion of this contract was let by the prime contractor to a subcontractor for the field seeding. This included cultivating, fertilizing, sowing to oats, sowing to grass, harvesting the oats and baling straw. The amount of this subcontract is not known.

2. 1,121 acres for the entire project of which 850 acres were cultivated and grassed by the subcontractor.

6. Sprayturf Limited, Delaware, Ontario, $123,919.55.

ONTARIO—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO EXPANSION OF MEDICAL TRAINING FACILITIES

Question No. 2,252—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Does the government plan to contribute financially to the recently announced expansion of medical, dental and nursing training facilities in Ontario and, if so, what will be the extent of their contribution?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The federal government has not been officially informed on the details of the Ontario proposals for the expansion of medical, dental and nursing training facilities. However, officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare have been working closely with Ontario officials in a careful study of health needs. This is part of a continuing program of appraisal.

As far as the federal government is concerned, it is hoped to be able to establish a nation-wide picture of needs in this area, and this forms part of the analysis of the royal commission report on health services. This analysis is nearing completion and, as mentioned earlier in the House of Commons, it should be possible to make proposals to the provinces early next year.

POSTAL INFRACTIONS OBSERVED UNDER SURVEILLANCE

Question No. 2,254—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Since the Post Office Department began its policy of peepholes for observing postal employees while at work, or in washrooms, have any postal employees been charged either by the department or in the courts with being guilty of theft and, if so, how many and in what cities?

Questions

2. Have any postal employees been charged and penalized by the Post Office Department for any other offences such as smoking, as a result of infractions observed from the peepholes and, if so, how many and where?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): 1. Observation galleries were installed in post offices many years ago. Since their installation, employees have been charged with theft but there is no record of the number of charges and the cities involved.

2. The Post Office Department cannot recall any cases where as a result of observation from galleries postal employees have been charged and penalized for such infractions as smoking in the prohibited areas of post offices. Normal supervisory steps are taken where regulations of this type are violated.

Question No. 2,268—Mr. Coates:

Is it the intention of the Department of Agriculture to close out the operations of the experimental farm at Nappan, N.S. and, if not, will operations of the Nappan experimental farm in any way be curtailed?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): It is not the intention of the Department of Agriculture to close out the operations of the experimental farm at Nappan, N.S.

The operations of the Nappan experimental farm will not be curtailed with respect to work of practical importance to the area which it serves directly. As a general policy it proposed to concentrate basic research at fewer stations. Over a period of time this will involve the transfer of certain basic research studies from Nappan in the interests of providing a better and more efficient research service to the entire Atlantic region.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

REMOVAL FROM CITIZENSHIP COURTS OF PORTRAITS OF QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he will now answer the question I asked yesterday, in addition to tabling the directive to which I drew attention, concerning his instruction to remove the portraits of Her Majesty the Queen from the citizenship courts.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I see that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill) has not yet been successful in reaching the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, but I will be glad—

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Monteith: Who do you think you are?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: —when the Leader of the Opposition is in the house, to give a complete answer to the question asked by the hon. member.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Using the words of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration himself, has he the courage to answer the question I asked yesterday?

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to table the directive given to the citizenship courts in Canada by the citizenship registrar. I reserve the right to answer later the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

[Text]

Mr. Churchill: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would reply to the members of this house rather than trying to dodge the issue. May I ask him this question. Is he accepting full responsibility for the directive which he has now tabled, or is he shifting the burden to a civil servant who is not here in this house to answer for himself?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I assume full responsibility for a decision which was made without my consent but which I find in accordance with protocol instructions.

Mr. Jean-Pierre Côté (Longueuil): Could the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration tell us who is responsible for the protocol, as far as this matter is concerned?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, those instructions are transmitted from one department to another. I do not think that the minister should reveal who gave advice in this instance.

[Text]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): A further supplementary question. I wonder whether the minister in a few words would tell us the reason these pictures were removed from these courtrooms.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member insists, I have no objection whatsoever to explaining the matter fully. Since the right hon. Leader of the Opposition raised this matter, I thought it was proper to wait for his return. However, and with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection at all to give all the facts in this matter.

When the right hon. Leader of the Opposition gave his press conference, accusing the government of having ordered citizenship courts to remove portraits of the Queen, he knew very well that no such instruction had been given either by myself or by the government, since I had informed him by telephone that this instruction had been given by the citizenship registrar.

It is customary for the citizenship branch of my department to supply citizenship courts with coats of arms of Canada, flags and portraits of Her Majesty the Queen.

In reply to questions asked by judges of citizenship courts to ascertain where those items should be placed, officials of my department obtained the advice of experts on the matter who said that the coat of arms and flags should be placed in the courtroom while it would be more appropriate to place the portrait of Her Majesty in the judge's chamber, where applicants for Canadian citizenship are interviewed and where the judge can more adequately explain the role of Her Majesty.

May I also add that in our federal courts, such as the Supreme Court of Canada and the Exchequer Court of Canada, only the coat of arms of Canada is placed in the courtrooms.

It is most unfortunate that such unfounded accusations were made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, which is affecting national unity.

[Text]

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Would the minister indicate to this house the department to which these specialists belong?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I answered this question before. I do not think that a minister has the prerogative to reveal from what other department advice was received with regard to a decision made, in full responsibility by the officials of my department, even if advice was sought and received from other departments.

[Text]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: I have a further supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We started off this afternoon on a happy note, and I do hope that we can continue in that vein.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. Did the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration not receive some objections from the officers of these courts in reference to this matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker. To my knowledge no objections were addressed to me. Anyway, as I said before, the decision was not my own, but was made by an official in the discharge of his duties as citizenship registrar. But I now assume full responsibility for this decision.

[Text]

Mr. Woolliams: No responsibility.

Mr. Smallwood: Get a new minister. You should resign.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to indicate the portions of his department for which he is responsible.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Until further notice, the whole department, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is becoming a debate, and I do not see any purpose in continuing it.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

HULL, QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Public Works.

Several weeks ago I asked the minister if his department was contemplating the possibility or opportunity to build public buildings in Hull, Ottawa's neighbour on the other side of the river. The minister told me then that the matter had been agreed to in principle and that we should get an answer within a few days or a few weeks.

Well, several weeks have elapsed since the minister told us that the principle had been accepted. Is he in a position today to tell us what his department or the government intends to do in this respect?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think I will be in a position to make a statement on that matter any time now.

[Text]

TRADE

OIL—PRESSURE TO REDUCE EXPORTS FROM CANADA TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister or the government received any representations or communications from the United States government with regard to oil imports into the United States from Canada, to the effect that the pressure is on to have the quantities reduced?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, the only reference I have seen to this matter recently has been the same newspaper report which I am sure the hon. gentleman saw this morning.

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—MAINTENANCE OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Queens): In the absence of the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question—

An hon. Member: He is here.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I am sorry; the Minister of Agriculture—I should like to address a question to the acting minister or to the minister's parliamentary secretary. Can he assure the farmers of Prince Edward Island that the supervisory zone office of the Farm Credit Corporation for the province is not being moved to Moncton, New Brunswick?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving notice of his intention to ask this question. I am advised as follows. In February, 1961, the Farm Credit Corporation centralized control of its operations in the Atlantic provinces in a branch office located in Moncton. However, the corporation retained a sub-office in Charlottetown, with a supervisor for the province who also performed the function of assistant branch manager for the Atlantic provinces. In order to improve the operations of the corporation within the Atlantic provinces, the assistant branch manager has been moved to the branch office at Moncton. The supervision office will be retained in Charlottetown and a new supervisor will be appointed, whose sole responsibility will be to supervise the corporation's services to farmers in Prince Edward Island.

PROPOSED MARCH ON OTTAWA BY ONTARIO AND QUEBEC FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry, in his capacity as minister responsible for eastern agriculture.

Has the minister been informed of the proposed march of 10,000 farmers on Ottawa to be organized by the Ontario farmers' union and the Quebec farmers' union, to protest against the government's inaction with regard to their problems and especially the water shortage and the cattle they are forced to sell?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): No, Mr. Speaker, but together with the Minister of Agriculture, I shall be glad to welcome them in Ottawa.

[Text]

Mr. Peters: Will he be here?

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL STUDY CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Inasmuch as a committee of the Quebec legislature is well advanced in its study of the Canadian constitution and proposed changes thereto, is it the intention of the federal government to initiate proposals in the near future to set up a constitutional study conference on a national basis, designed to propose positive suggestions which will result in a modern constitution suited to modern times?

Mr. Speaker: Surely this is a question for the order paper, important though it is.

Mr. Grafftey: May I rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. The urgency of the question is based on the fact that the province of Quebec is the only province at the moment that is carrying out such a study. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether any other province or provinces have indicated to him that they intend to initiate studies of the constitution, as Quebec is doing at the present time.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this question also could be put on the order paper.

Mr. Grafftey: I have no intention of putting it on the order paper or debating it at ten o'clock, but I felt it was an important question at the moment.

CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE OF AMENDMENT FORMULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. On Friday, November 6 he assured me that he hoped to be able to make a statement "next week" in regard to the setting up of a parliamentary committee to deal with the amendment formula and the whole procedure as to amending the British North America Act. The week has passed and the Prime Minister has not been able to make a statement. Does he anticipate that he will be able to make it in the near future?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I apologize to my hon. friend; I had the statement ready last Friday and unfortunately he was not in the house that day. I meant to make it yesterday but I forgot about it. The question was asked, as my hon. friend said, on November 6 whether the house will be enabled to make a detailed examination of the proposed white paper on constitutional amendment and whether there is to be a parliamentary committee to look into the subject. Similar suggestions have been made to me by some other hon. members.

The situation is that a white paper is in the course of preparation, and it is hoped that a draft will be ready for consideration by the government next week. Also, Mr. Speaker, the final text of the amending formula as settled at the conference just held has been sent formally to the governments of all the provinces requesting their formal concurrence in the terms of the text.

It is felt, Mr. Speaker, that it would not be desirable to make a final decision on the procedure to be followed in dealing with the white paper or the amending formula in the house until the replies that have been requested from the provinces have been received.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he arrange for every member of the Conservative party to receive a copy of the editorial published in the December 2 issue of Maclean's, which is entitled:

This isn't opposition, Mr. Diefenbaker, this is sabotage.

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Surely the hon. gentleman does not wish me to use my frank for that purpose.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the past, questions which have been asked about the welfare of unemployed workers in my own particular constituency have not been allowed. This afternoon we have had examples of facetious questions being put which, before they were completed, the Chair must have realized were definitely out of order, yet the Chair permitted such questions to be asked.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister in making his most recent appointment to the Senate receive any advice or suggestions from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who I understand promised several people in the Windsor area that this appointment would be theirs?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should not worry about these matters.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Could the minister tell me if he will soon table document No. 180, as he promised on October 28 last?

[Text]

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that I was not able to hear what the hon. gentleman said, but perhaps he would allow me to read it in Hansard and answer tomorrow.

FINANCE

RENEWAL OF U.K.-CANADA TAX AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Are negotiations now going on seeking renewal of the Canada-United Kingdom tax agreement, and will they be concluded satisfactorily in time so there will be no interruption of the situation in regard to that treaty?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, negotiations were being carried on with the government of the United Kingdom and, as sometimes happens, an election intervened. They are now being renewed with the new government of the United Kingdom. I have no reason to think they will not be concluded with reasonable dispatch.

BANK OF CANADA HOLDINGS OF BONDS TO BE REDEEMED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to reply to a guestion asked me yesterday by the hon. member for Cariboo having to do with Bank of Canada holdings of certain issues of securities.

I find on inquiry that details by issues of Bank of Canada holdings are not a matter of public record; therefore I am not in a position to provide details of the bank's holdings of the issues maturing on December 1 and December 15. The Bank of Canada does provide on its weekly and monthly balance sheets broad category classifications of its holdings of government of Canada securities. I might point out that, as I indicated in my public announcement of the new government financing last Friday, the Bank of Canada has agreed to acquire a minimum of $125 million of the new issue.

Mr. Bert Leboe (Cariboo): A supplementary question Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell me whether there is any reason in the public interest why the Bank of Canada does not keep these records or supply this information?

Mr. Gordon: In the operation of monetary policy, which is conducted on a day to day basis by the bank, it is not thought desirable to give full details of the securities which the bank is buying and selling from time to time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF LABOUR AND FLAG LEGISLATION, ESTIMATES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister regarding the labour standards act, which is a piece of legislation in which more than 500,000 workers in Canada are vitally interested. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether we can be given some assurance that this legislation will be proceeded with before the flag debate is recommenced, in order that we may be sure it will be passed before Christmas.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I can give the hon. gentleman no such assurance.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in the event the amendments which are being prepared are ready, will the Prime Minister assure this house that he is prepared to interrupt the flag debate, if it takes up a great deal of time, in order to make sure that this legislation is dealt with prior to Christmas. I am assuming that the Prime Minister is genuine in wanting this legislation passed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, there should be no necessity of interrupting the flag debate in order to get this important legislation through before Christmas.

[Later:]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the government house leader and ask him, in view of the statement made a moment ago by the right hon. Prime Minister that the flag debate is of prime importance between now and Christmas, whether he thinks there is any purpose in holding additional meetings of house leaders to try to arrange the business of the house.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I do not agree with the hon. member's statement concerning what has been said here today. I thought it was made quite clear that there are two matters of prime importance to the government which we expect to have done before Christmas. One of these is the flag question and the other is the labour standards bill.

An hon. Member: How about the Canada pension plan?

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. McIlraith: Well, the pension plan is moving very precisely and very well. I hope the estimates are moving very well also. I do not accept the hon. member's statement or interpretation of what has been placed on the record. Since I do not accept it, I cannot answer the question.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact there has been no agreement about a limitation of time on the flag debate, we can only assume that if the government decides to put the flag debate first there can be no guarantee that the labour standards bill will be passed before Christmas. Is this the interpretation we are to take from the statement of the minister and the statement of the Prime Minister?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is trying to interpret things in a particular way to suit his own purposes. There has never been at any time an indication by the government that the house will do certain things. The responsibility of the government is to submit legislation to the House of Commons, and the House of Commons disposes of it. All the government can do is submit legislation in the order that it thinks is the most appropriate way in dealing with its responsibilities of office.

When agreement can be reached on the limitation of debate, that is very acceptable. I feel it is common knowledge that the Prime Minister has been on record for at least two years, when these things were the proper subject of debate, as saying he thought there should be limitation of debate on the items of business coming before parliament. However, be that as it may, we have obtained limitation of debate rather successfully, I think, in the eyes of all hon. members, in the last couple of weeks on some subjects. I personally hope we might get it in the future. We cannot give any commitment at the moment as to what the House of Commons will do with the items of business that are submitted.

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the house leader's statement that the government's responsibility is to introduce items in their order of importance, am I to take it from his statement and that of the Prime Minister that the flag debate is now much more important than the labour standards act?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has no right to draw such conclusions. The remarks I made will appear in Hansard and they can be analysed and deductions drawn from them, but the hon. member has no right to put such an interpretation on them. The government has consistently made it very clear that it regards these items as of major importance.

Mr. Howard: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has no right to place a particular interpretation upon what the Prime Minister said, neither has the President of the Privy Council any right to do the same thing.

[Later:]

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of his statement a few moments ago that he recognized no necessity for interrupting the flag debate in order to ensure the passage of legislation that many members feel is more important, are we to assume that he has had firm assurances there will not be a prolonged debate on the flag issue when it comes up?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should not inadvertently misrepresent what I said. I did not say there would be no necessity; I said there should be no necessity to interrupt the flag debate.

[Later:]

Mr. McIlraith: If I may have the indulgence of the house I wish to make a short announcement which I think will be of interest to hon. members. It concerns the business before us.

Following the discussion in the house last night when I announced the business of the house as reported at page 10203 of Hansard, and after consultation with the Prime Minister, I called a meeting of the house leaders of the various parties to discuss house business. I am happy to advise hon. members that agreement has now been reached among the parties that there be an order of the house to the effect that starting tomorrow we shall consider estimates, that they shall be considered each sitting day, and that not later than November 27, all estimates, that is the main estimates and supplementary estimates A, B and C, shall be dealt with, as well as the necessary appropriation bill at all stages. It was understood that the Speaker would be able to leave the chair without question put on Monday and Tuesday of next week, and that private members' hours would be waived during this period.

I would ask, Mr. Speaker, whether you would so order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house in agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

The time for the question period has expired, but through a lapse of memory on my part I forgot to call the hon. member for York-Humber, who spoke to me some time ago and who would like to pose a question. So, with the consent of the house, I propose we have one more question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: I rise on a point of order. When the proposal was made by the President of the Privy Council with respect to the business of the house for the remainder of this week and next week, both the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and I rose to make some comment about it, but you did not offer either of us the opportunity to make that comment indicating whether or not there was agreement with that proposal.

Mr. Mandziuk: But didn't you?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might be heard on the point, namely the suggestion that the house agree to the order which has been proposed by the leader of the house.

The statement that there was a meeting of the house leaders of the various parties this morning and that we gave favourable consideration to the program as outlined in the statement just made by the leader of the house is correct. Our party was concerned about one point, and I reported this back to the leader of the house. This one point had to do with the order of priority, after the estimates have been disposed of, as between the flag debate and the Canada labour code. An assurance was given to me that no decision was being taken on that question, that all we were agreeing to was the order of business until a week from Friday. There was no assurance that the Canada labour code would be brought forward, but neither was there any exclusion of the possibility of our still discussing with the government the fact that we might have it ahead of the flag debate. It was on the understanding that this matter was left open that I reported our agreement back to the house leader.

Obviously there is some concern in this party this afternoon because of the exchanges which have taken place. I can only say our agreement was conditional on there not being a decision at this point beyond what is actually set out in the statement made by the President of the Privy Council, namely that all we are agreeing to at this point is to spend the next seven days on estimates. The business for the rest of the session is left for further discussion.

Mr. McIlraith: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Howard: The Prime Minister made some comments today bearing on the priority to be accorded to the other two items, and I do not think we should proceed now to make an agreement when it is only a half-hearted agreement and when the Prime Minister has in effect destroyed it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: It would be far better, in my opinion, if the President of the Privy Council were to withhold his proposal until later in the day and allow further discussion to take place.

Mr. Speaker: As the Chair understands the situation, it is this. The President of the Privy Council read a statement which had been agreed to by the different parties and their representatives, a statement which I have in my hand. At the request of the leader of the house I asked whether it should be so ordered, and it was ordered.

An hon. Member: It was not ordered.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: As far as I understand it, that is the situation.

Mr. Knowles: May I have confirmation from the Prime Minister that the statement I made a moment ago is correct, namely that no decision has been made as to the priority of house business beyond a week from Friday?

Mr. Pearson: Of course it is. The order covers only the business for next week. That is clear. No decision has been made as to what will be done after next week, one way or the other.

Mr. Howard: I do not want to be obstinate about it.

Some hon. Members: You are.

Mr. Howard: But it is quite obvious that the government, because of its concern about this rag of a flag, is trying to make a sucker out of parliament.

Mr. Hellyer: On a point of order, may I ask whether the order was passed by the house?

Mr. Speaker: Yes, the order was passed. I said so twice.

[Mr. Knowles.]

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—INQUIRY AS TO PROSECUTION OF TAXI DRIVER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ralph Cowan (York-Humber): I have a question I should like to put to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house what progress is being made by the government in its prosecution of Gabriel Robert Johnson, the taxicab driver who has been accused of picking up a fare at Stevenson field, Winnipeg, despite a monopoly contract given to Moore's taxi service in that city.

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

PENSIONS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CONTRIBUTORY PROGRAM

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 17, consideration of the motion of Miss LaMarsh for the second reading of Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of old age pensions and supplementary benefits in Canada payable to and in respect of contributors.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I had the floor at ten o'clock last evening, and my remarks will take a few minutes to complete.

Mr. Speaker: That is so. It was a mistake of the Chair. The hon. member for Essex West had the floor. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich next.

Mr. Gray: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I will only take a minute or so more and then I will be happy to yield the floor to the hon. member.

I find it strange that some of the business executives to whom I was referring last evening as expressing concern over the possible effect of the decisions of politicians on the funds of the Canada pension plan should regularly invest large amounts of the money of their firms and the money of other people in government bonds whose soundness is based on the decisions of those same politicians.

Of course a somewhat different type of criticism, and perhaps a more substantial one, has been made, and it arises out of the possibility that the provinces in using their share of the pension fund may make investments in a way which could be at cross purposes with the investment policies of the federal government aimed at influencing the entire economy on a national basis. However, because of the present freedom of the provinces to borrow for their own purposes, this possibility already exists and would continue to exist even if a portion of the Canada pension plan fund was not available to them.

I for one feel that the trends of economics, social welfare and technology call for the continued existence of a strong federal government capable of dealing with these matters on a national basis in the interests of all Canadians, and I certainly do not rule out the possibility of constitutional changes to enable our federal government to carry out effectively the role required of it by existing and future circumstances. However, so long as our country continues to be of a federal nature a certain portion of the central government's efforts to deal with the economy on a national basis will have to be made through the continuing use of improved techniques of consultation and discussion with the provinces. The proper use of these techniques through bodies such as the economic council of Canada and a federal secretariat for federal-provincial affairs will enable a cohesiveness in economic and social policies to develop and exist in such a way that we should be able largely to eliminate this risk that the federal government will not be able to act effectively as required to maintain the national economy at a high level.

Fears have also been expressed that the plan would remove savings otherwise available for private investment; but I think it has been made clear that in other countries where similar social welfare plans have been in existence there have not been declining rates of private savings. It cannot be overlooked that the money paid out in pension benefits will be quickly spent on consumer goods and services; it will add to the effective demand which is needed for an active and buoyant economy. The firms that receive the money for these goods and services will thereby have it available to meet some of their own private investment needs. As the Windsor Star put it in an editorial in its edition of November 11:

> It is not by chance that the countries with the most advanced social security systems generally are also the most prosperous and with the highest standards of living. These two facts are associated.
> Money spent on social security measures does not disappear; it quickly and continuously is placed back in the economic bloodstream of the country.

I think the same can be applied to what happens to money invested as social capital. Also the Canada pension plan will help workers to meet the possible threat of displacement by automation in several important ways. Since the pensions will be completely portable, it will be easier for workers to seek out new job opportunities wherever they may be, and it will make it easier for employers to hire employees who may be close to but not yet of pensionable age. Also by making it possible to take a pension between the ages of 65 and 70 it will in fact encourage earlier retirement, and not the reverse, thereby increasing job opportunities for younger workers.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, this Canada pension plan will enable steps to be taken for the provision of reasonable standards of income for the retired, the disabled, orphans and widows all across this country. I am therefore pleased to be able to support the second reading of this bill as a measure serving the interests of all Canadians.

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I will not be as fluent as the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) because I will not be reading my speech word for word. However, I will not take up too much of the time of the house. I am very pleased to have this chance of saying a few words on the fourth Liberal Canada pension plan. It is obvious that the government and its supporters on the other side of the house are preparing the people of Canada for an election within the next few months. It is obvious, by the travels of the treasury bench members across the country, making partisan, political speeches and attacking the one man they are afraid of, that it will not be too long before we have an election.

We know what happened in the last election campaign with regard to the promises the Liberals made; and being Liberals, they cannot change and will do the same thing in the next election campaign. But I think it is our duty to point out to the people in advance that they should not trust the promises that the Liberals are going to make. To convey this message, Mr. Speaker, I want to read from the Victoria Daily Colonist of March 31, 1963. This is a full page advertisement; they obviously have a lot of money. It is headed, "The policies of the Liberal party". As I say, it is a full page ad with a large number of items that the Liberal government promised to put into effect. I could spend possibly 20 minutes reading off items here that they have promised, have not fulfilled and which of course they have no intention of fulfilling. For example, there are municipal loans for schools; national housing loans for existing houses—there are a great number. However, I will refer only to the promises pertinent to the question we are discussing today. Under the subheading "Pensions" there is another heading that says, "Make possible retirement at half pay at 65". This was the first Canada pension plan the Liberals proposed. I ask hon. members to just compare that with the proposal that is now before us. This advertisement also mentions a maximum pension of $296 per month for a couple. It goes on to say that the Liberal party would establish a new national minimum of a $75 a month pension. In this regard the advertisement says that the pension will not be a tax on the people, in effect, because it will come out of contributions.

I would ask the house to remember what actually happened to the $10. On July 18, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) introduced the second Liberal plan into the house, we moved that the $10 be paid immediately. At that time, of course, every Liberal member in the house voted against it; but in due course, because of constant pressure from members on this side, the government finally gave in and on September 30 last they brought in an amendment to the Old Age Security Act. However, that increase which we all supported cost the taxpayers of Canada $116 million a year; in other words, it was not paid out of contributions, as was promised by the Liberals.

There has been a great deal of bungling on the part of the government—that is of course no surprise; it is quite common with it—particularly with regard to the Canada pension plan. As I said, the first plan was introduced by the minister on July 18, 1963. Last night the hon. member for Essex West tried to justify all these convolutions the government has gone through in arriving at the present plan by saying that all this was necessary in order to arrive at the best plan possible. But this of course is not what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) said at the time she introduced the first plan. I quote from page 2343 of Hansard for 1963, where the minister is reported as having said:

> This government has taken three months.

She had said before that it would normally take other governments that are not as smart as the present government two years to prepare a plan.

[Mr. Chatterton.]

> I say without partisan taint that the exact time of payment is dependant upon the speed with which this chamber adopts the plan.

In other words, according to the minister it was entirely a matter for the house as to how soon this offspring of theirs would be given life. Again I quote from page 2346 of Hansard, where the minister is reported as having said:

> Since taking office, we have been working steadily to explore the best type of scheme for Canada. We believe that the scheme now placed before parliament will commend itself to the house—

That was what the minister said at the time; this was the ultimate creation and test of the ingenuity of the Liberal government. Then of course the second attempt was made on March 17 this year, when the minister introduced another resolution for the Canada pension plan, and then the bill, Bill No. C-75. Right up to the very end there has been bungling and fumbling on the part of the government, because even as of now the appendices to the actuarial report are not available to us. We did not get a copy of the actuarial report until the night before last, and at the time of first reading only 100 copies of the bill were available. This brings to mind the fact that during September last the government was obviously anxious for us to continue the flag debate. At that time we demanded that it discontinue the flag debate and bring on the Canada pension plan. As a matter of fact, on two occasions—September 3 and September 8—there was a motion before the house to adjourn the flag debate, presumably so that we could go on with the Canada pension plan. On both these occasions every Liberal in the house voted against the motion, and of course every Conservative voted for it. It is now obvious that the real reason the government wanted to continue the flag debate at that time was because the legislation was not ready.

I will now refer to some of the provisions of Bill No. C-136. We are at second reading stage, which means we are dealing with the principle of the bill. I want to outline for the government what I consider are some weaknesses in the bill as presented. However, I will start by saying that in spite of what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) tried to imply last night no member on this side has opposed a contributory pension plan. We have tried to show up weaknesses, we have tried to suggest improvements and we have asked questions. I repeat that we are in favour of a contributory pension plan, but we feel that the proposal made by the government can be improved.

The first weakness which I note in the plan —I have spent a fair amount of time studying not only Bill No. C-75 but the two white papers and Bill No. C-136—is that there is nothing in this proposal for those who perhaps need it the most, namely the people who are already retired. Shortly after the second white paper was released, which I think was around August 10, I was invited by an old age pensioners association in my riding to explain to them the Canada pension plan. I did this, basing my explanation on the white paper which was issued at that time. When I had gone through my explanation of the plan they said to me, in effect: "Is there nothing in this for us?" I said: "That is the way it is." I am sure that since the white paper was released this kind of reaction must have been received by the government.

Then again, last week I was home for Remembrance day, and on the Tuesday morning when I saw the morning papers they carried a headline to the effect that a new departure in the Canada pension plan was that the old age security pension would from now on be tagged on to the cost of living index. There was great jubilation at this; it sounded wonderful. While I was travelling back from British Columbia by plane I read many papers from right across the country, and it was significant that every one of those papers had almost the same verbatim release, obviously emanating from the public relations branch of the department.

Then when I got back to the house and read the provisions of Bill No. C-136 dealing with the amendment to the Old Age Security Act it immediately became obvious to me—and I would use the words of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Douglas)—that this is an absolute, complete, cruel hoax on these older people. In the first place, this particular proposal is not part of the Canada pension plan. It was a very clever trick to include in Bill No. C-136 the amendment to the Old Age Security Act so that the government could say that they had done everything for those already retired. But it is actually an amendment to the Old Age Security Act, in the first place, and in the second place the assistance it gives to these old people is negligible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how can this proposal in Bill No. C-136 be changed so as to do something for these people who need it most? I should like to refer here to the fund which is being built up. The fund, according to the actuarial report, will build up to $8.4 billion in 1985. It is true that from then on, unless the contributions are increased there may be a reduction in the fund. According to the forecasts there undoubtedly will be a reduction in the fund.

These old people to whom I spoke said to me: "Why not use some of the fund built up to give us something? Is it necessary to have as large a fund?" According to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh)—she has now changed her mind, or perhaps, had it changed for her, I do not know—when the first masterpiece was presented, and when talking about whether or not there should be a fund, she said, as reported at page 2342 of Hansard for July 18, 1963:

> These were the arguments balanced by the government in coming to its conclusion that this plan should not be funded; thus the plan is framed on a pay as you go basis.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, if that was the position at the time when the first pension plan was presented some amendment can be made to the present plan so that the fund does not build up as quickly and some of the money can be diverted to help those who are already retired.

Yesterday I received a letter from a lady in my riding who is just over 60. She has a small pension which is just enough to disqualify her from local social welfare. She wrote to me and asked me what was in the pension plan for her, and I had to reply regretfully that under the present government proposal there was nothing in it for her, at least until she reached the age of 70. Even at age 65, with the little income she has—it is barely subsistence income—she cannot qualify for old age assistance, so she has to wait until she is 70 before she gets anything at all. That is the type of person who needs it most, along with widows, aged 60 and many others aged 65 who do not quite qualify for old age assistance. They are the people who need help most.

I should also like to refer to one other group of those already retired, and I am thinking of the superannuates, the ex-employees of the government. The government recently released on November 10 last a bulletin which clearly indicates to the superannuates association that they have no hope of getting any help. The government refuse to accept its position as an ex-employer of these superannuates, and the superannuates' proposal has been turned down by the government on the basis of a principle.

What did the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) say on December 27, 1963, in a letter which he wrote to Mr. Whitehouse, the secretary-treasurer of the federal superannuates national association? He said this:

> With reference to your letter of November 18, as I indicated in my letter of October 4, 1963, the government was not prepared to make any basic change in the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act while the ultimate form of the Canada pension plan has not been decided by parliament following consultation with the provinces.
> The Canada pension plan, as explained in the House of Commons and to the public, contained no provision for the adjustment of pensions payable under it once those pensions commenced. This was a point of considerable interest to all concerned and the government was not prepared to propose the introduction of any automatic pension adjustment factor in legislation dealing with the pensions of retired civil servants when none was provided under the proposed Canada pension plan. This, I would say, was the basic amendment most frequently proposed for the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act in the representations which had been received by the government and were under review when I wrote to you in October.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said, in effect, that since there was no provision in the Canada pension plan for automatic pension adjustment according to the cost of living index the government could therefore not amend the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act. This Canada pension plan does provide for such automatic adjustment by way of a pension index; yet the Prime Minister refuses to help these people who are already retired and in great need.

As I understand it, Bill No. C-136 includes civil servants. The example I am going to quote now is not by way of criticism. At least I am not trying to take anything away from the civil servants. What I am trying to do is to compare the amount with which the present civil servant will retire with that received by those who have already retired. For example, if the Canada pension plan is created as it is now proposed, and if the superannuation act is not amended, it could happen quite frequently that a civil servant will retire with a combined pension greater than his salary. I will give two examples of this situation.

Assuming that a civil servant, who is 55 years of age when the pension plan begins operating, retires at age 65, and assuming that his average salary for his best six years, on which his superannuation is based, was $5,000, he would receive from his superannuation $3,500 per year and from the Canada pension plan, $1,860, or a combined pension of $5,360, which is $360 more than his salary.

The second example is of a man who continues to work in the civil service to age 70, and this is possible because the minister has the authority to extend employment beyond age 65. This happens quite frequently. Assuming that man had 35 years of service and retired at age 70, he would receive $3,500 in superannuation, and $2,148 from the Canada pension plan, giving him a combined total of $5,648, or $648 more than his salary.

This is the kind of thing that might happen in the case of civil servants who retire in future, as compared with those who retired some years ago; and I have used the example of a principal clerk who retired in 1953 with 35 years service. The figures I intend to give are approximate only. His pension from superannuation would be $2,660 per annum. Another civil servant occupying that same position as principal clerk, with the same period of service to the people of Canada, retiring some time in the future, say 1976, would receive $3,650 in superannuation, and in addition, having contributed ten years to the Canada pension plan, would receive a Canada pension of $1,200. In other words, he would have a combined pension of $4,850, as compared to the individual who had the same job but retired in 1953 with a pension of $2,660—a difference of over $2,000. Those are the individuals who need assistance but for whom the Canada pension plan does absolutely nothing. The first weakness I see in this plan is that it does nothing for the old people.

The second weakness, in my opinion, is that great discrepancy between pensions payable to people who have only paid in for ten years, and pensions paid to those individuals who have paid in for up to 52 years, the maximum time. As I read the bill, an individual who pays in for ten years receives exactly the same pension as the man who has paid in for 52 years, provided of course their average annual salaries were the same. There will be many modifying factors which will creep in during the 52 year period, but that is the situation.

Let us consider the example of two men, one from each of the two categories, the man who has paid in for ten years and the man who has paid in for 52 years. Let us call the ten year man Mr. Abel and the 52 year man Mr. Baker. In each case I am comparing only the related earnings part of the pension, because of course they would both be eligible for old age security at age 70. Assuming that Mr. Abel and Mr. Baker had an average annual earnings of $5,000, Mr. Abel during the ten year period would pay in a total of approximately $800 and receive a pension of $104 per month. Mr. Baker during his 52 years would pay in approximately $4,100, which is more than five times as much, and he would receive the same pension as Mr. Abel.

If Mr. Abel purchased a government annuity with his $800 he would receive at age 70 a pension of $9.90 per month. If Mr. Baker purchased a government annuity with his $4,100, he would receive a pension of $136 per month. Yet under the Canada pension plan they would both receive the same pension.

Just as a matter of interest, if Mr. Baker, the 52 year man, purchased a private annuity with his $4,100, he would receive a pension of $175 per month, or if he purchased a private annuity worth $2,500 in life insurance, he would receive a pension of $152 per month. If Mr. Abel at age 60 purchased a government annuity which would give him the same benefit he would receive under the Canada pension plan, namely $104 per month, it would cost him $10,700 instead of the $800 under the Canada pension plan.

Surely the minister should consider changing this proposal so that some of the fund could be used to help those individuals who have already retired. Why not stretch out the transitional period a little more, say to 15 years or longer, or whatever is required, so that some of the revenue can be used to help those who have already retired?

Another weakness I see in this plan, which I think should be considered, is that those people who are earning $10,000 per year or more are also covered by the Canada pension plan. It is true that they will pay only up to the first $5,000, but in order to help those individuals already retired, why not increase the upper limit, with a greater variation in contributions, so the additional revenue could be used in this way?

The fourth weakness I see in this plan is the method of disposition of the fund moneys. The minister has indicated that this money will be lent to the provinces. Last evening the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) indicated that there is a great need for social capital. He suggested these provinces would use this money for technical and vocational schools, hospitals, urban redevelopment, university buildings, transportation and so on. In other words, the fund money which will be advanced to the provinces could be used for these purposes. However, what assurance is there that it will be used for these purposes? I think the lack of such an assurance is another weakness in this plan.

It seems to me that some of these problems, for example urban renewal and growth of our metropolitan areas, have become national in scope, and will continue to be so in Canada in the future. The central government must accept a certain measure of responsibility. If the government insists on establishing this fund, and lending some of it to the provinces, surely they should tie certain tags to the moneys so that solutions may be found to these problems which are national in scope. That is not the case under this proposal. Some provinces may use the money for higher educational purposes, by building additions to universities, while other provinces may not, and again a situation of inequality will develop throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, I have certain questions I should like to put to the minister, and I hope when she replies in closing the debate she will give some answers. If the minister is not in a position to give answers to some of these questions in her closing remarks, perhaps at the committee stage she will be able to give them.

The first question is related to portability. The minister indicated that there will be agreements with the opting out provinces providing for portability, so that if an individual moves from the province of Quebec to another province his pension will be completely portable. My question is, will these agreements also ensure that the opting out provinces will not materially change their plans, thereby destroying or disrupting this portability? Will these agreements cover that situation?

Clause 115 requires that, by order of the lieutenant governors of the provinces, two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the population must agree to all changes in rates and benefits. What will be the position if in 25 years this plan goes into the red—in other words, if expenditures are greater than receipts so that the fund is used up? What is the position then of the federal government if one province, for instance Ontario, vetoes an increase in the contributions?

Another question I should like to ask relates to the R.C.M.P. and the armed forces. Can the minister indicate to us what were the government's reasons for including civil servants but excluding the R.C.M.P. and armed forces? This is the way I understand the bill, but I do not know if I am right. If I am right, why is that so? Incidentally, when it comes to the civil servants, yesterday the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) was speaking about the integration of private plans and the Canada pension plan, and he indicated that plans have already been worked out for the integration of the civil service superannuation plan. If that is so, it seems to me that this house or the committee should be given a fairly detailed accounting of how the superannuation act is going to be amended, since Bill No. C-136 now includes civil servants. As I explained earlier, it could happen that a civil servant could retire with a greater pension than his earnings. I believe therefore the minister should advise the house or the committee as to the changes proposed in the superannuation act in order to integrate the civil service pension plan with the Canada pension plan.

Yesterday the Minister of National Revenue referred to clause 87 of the pension bill and said that the pension appeal board would hear disputed cases if the provincial law provided for that. In this way a common jurisprudence could be developed. My question is, if a province that opts out does not pass such a law, will the appeal board then not have jurisdiction in those disputed cases and will we then lose this common jurisprudence? I would appreciate an answer to that question.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, the minister will give these questions consideration. In closing my remarks I again appeal to the government and to the minister to seriously consider amendments to this plan so that those people who need it most, the retired people, will get some benefit from the plan.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, the motion for second reading of Bill No. C-136, to establish a comprehensive program of various pensions in Canada, is rather interesting, and the bill is particularly fat.

The Canadian people will get their money's worth trying to find their way in this hodgepodge nobody seems to understand. Since people on all sides are asking the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) for explanations, the bill must be confusing.

But if you study the schedule which deals with the monthly pension which varies according to age, you see that at 65 the amount of pension will be $51 and that it will be increased by 40 cents each month until 70, that is over five years, when the pension will reach $75 a month.

Mr. Speaker, we sincerely believe that the Canadian social legislation should be improved considerably. We believe that the Canadian people could benefit more from Canada's economic development. That is what we have been maintaining for the past 20 years. Now, this pension plan introduced by the minister would have the Canadian people and parliament believe that the government is prepared to help elderly persons in Canada. We are told that this plan will improve social legislation, social benefits, when the main purpose of Bill No. C-136 is to permit the government to find the necessary funds to administer its social legislation, and nothing else.

The purpose of this pension plan is to permit the government to force the ordinary Canadian citizen to give money to the government all his life, money which the government will probably never return to that Canadian citizen.

As a matter of fact, this is a glaring example. The Canadian who is 25 or 30 years old and who works in a factory or in an industry will start paying, because this is a compulsory plan. He will start to make his contributions to the government in order to get a pension at 65 or 70. All his life, that is for 40 years, this Canadian worker will be making contributions to the government and when he will have reached 65 or 70 he will not then get back the money he is now contributing, because the government will then be taxing the children of this chap who, today, is 25 years old, in order that a pension may be paid their father when he reaches 65.

We could call that a sort of national "barbotte". Pay now, and you will not be reimbursed the money you will have paid in; instead we will give you the money that your children will contribute for 40 or 50 years. That is what we will use to give you pensions of $51 to $75—in between, there is an increase of 40 cents a month.

Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I listened to the hon. member for St. Maurice-Laflèche (Mr. Chrétien) commending the government for wanting to impose a plan on all, in order to create a fund for the economic development of the country.

It is taxing workers today in order to create a fund for the future economic development of Canada, by promising a pension to those workers when they are 65 or 70 years of age.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the whole thing means an allotment of poverty that is being collected today under this Bill No. C-136. That is the kind of proposal which is put to us today in this bill: to tax the earnings of workers who can hardly meet their obligations and whose salary is mortgaged for three, four and five years; to mortgage their salary further and to deduct from this salary the contributions required to give them a pension in 30 or 40 years hence.

This is indeed to collect, today, poverty from people who cannot possibly pay anything more, in order to redistribute this poverty in 30 or 40 years hence.

We have also other cases where the pension plan is not too clear. In my riding, there is the Noranda company where miners have been working for 25 or even 30 years. At Noranda mines, there is a pension plan to which the employee contributes $1; the company agrees to contribute the same amount. At this point, many Noranda miners have a pension of $7,000 to $8,000. These people are wondering whether this pension plan will be involved in this accumulated fund. They do not know where they stand.

Even if the national pension plan does not affect the pension plan to be adopted in Quebec, it remains that the principle of the two plans is the same. They are worth approximately the same thing. And I maintain that this pension plan proposed by the government is far from being as advantageous as the plans provided today by private enterprise for workers, labourers, all classes of society in Canada. Insurance companies, other types of companies, industries, have pension plans for their employees. I just mentioned the Noranda mine. I worked in an industry in the northwestern part of the province where we contributed a weekly amount of $1, and the company was pledged to double that amount, that is to add another $1. I believe that plan was more advantageous than the one which the government is offering us today.

Before the government intervenes in such a matter, why did it not transact with those who at the moment have pension plans? Then we could see what plans are the most advantageous and the less expensive for the population as a whole. That was not taken into consideration. The government wishes to justify Bill No. C-136 by saying that private enterprise failed miserably in an area where the government had not yet intervened.

Mr. Speaker, let us beware of the government and of the promoters of government interference in this social legislation, because I am convinced that private enterprise can better help human beings and the Canadian society than the government or the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

At present, there exist all kinds of plans on a national basis or joint plans on the national-provincial level. Those plans cost the Canadian citizens and taxpayers twice what they would pay if we turned to private enterprise instead of applying measures with an ever-increasing socialistic character. In a country like ours, where we can guarantee economic security and personal freedom to every citizen, why, Mr. Speaker, do we need a bill like this one which states: You shall pay all your life and, when you reach the age of 65, we will give you $51?

What will we do with the 45 year old men who will lose their jobs at that age?

At the present time the government is faced with the problem of people over that age. Employers are being offered, especially in the winter in a period of unemployment, $75 a month to hire a man over 45. What will the government do with these men between 45 and 65 and its pension plan established under Bill No. C-136?

What security is there for the men replaced by machines, for instance? Does this bill provide a measure of security for the worker who will be put out of a job by automation? No, Mr. Speaker, we fail to see anything in it.

What we see is a pension at 65 or 70. Mr. Speaker, Social Credit has been saying for a long time that all those government measures, all those plans are absolutely powerless to solve the problem.

To reach into the pockets of a group of citizens to redistribute their poverty to another group who need it still more is not a solution. To take from those who have something and give it to those who have nothing is not an answer: the government is not a public charity agency. What the government should do is to balance the Canadian monetary system according to our large physical possibilities, instead of setting up a plan to pay pensions at age 65, and to establish immediately a national dividend for all the citizens who build and make this country. That would be a solution. They are afraid to consider it.

Yesterday I read in the Canadian Labour magazine the statement of an economist which appeared in a publication of the federal government:

> Report of a conference by Robert Theobald, a British economist in the employ of the American government, before the International Association of Employment Security Personnel.
> This report was published in the September 1964 issue of the Labour Gazette, which is a federal publication.
> This is what the article says:
> "A guaranteed annual income for each child and each adult, as well as the payment of a salary to university students were the main recommendations of Robert Theobald, a British economist, who is now adviser to the American government.

Mr. Theobald said that we are on the threshold of an era with demands as different from those of the previous industrial revolution as the exigencies of the industrial era were from those of the agricultural age."

Today, in Bill No. C-136 we are still thinking in terms of the agricultural age, or even in medieval terms.

Speaking of the consequences of automation and cybernetics, Robert Theobald stated:

—their consequences will be so deep and will happen so fast that full employment will be impossible.

And I am asking my friends of the New Democratic party to think about this:

—in other words, will the combined production system of machines and cybernetics be so effective that employers, governments in their capacity of private contractors, will prefer, from an economic point of view, to purchase or rent machines instead of hiring workers.

Mr. Speaker, we have come to that point and the government is taking steps to the contrary. We are doing away with the machine in order to hire workers under the winter works program. The pension plan provides also that a person has to work hard for 40 or 50 years of his life in order to receive a pittance at 65 or 70 years of age.

And Mr. Theobald continues:

—full employment will never be attained and even if it were, certain groups of people should have a guaranteed revenue: those who are too old or too young to work; those whose responsibilities prevent them from working, such as widows with children and young people in schools or universities.

Concerning minimum income, Mr. Theobald states—note that the suggestion does not come from Social Credit members but from an economist who does not suggest a monthly pension of $50 or the distribution of misery among the poor people—that this minimum income should be $1,000 per annum for each adult and $600 for each child. That is what an economist suggests for the rehabilitation or the improvement of the economic situation in the United States.

With respect to a salary for students, Mr. Theobald said:

We must admit that the student already works at least as much as the factory worker. The time has come to introduce the new concept of a salary for students, possibly starting at the age of 14, with increases until students finish their university studies.

That is perhaps a revolution along the lines of the social legislation we must contemplate here in Canada.

Let them stop introducing bills which reduce or minimize the economic importance in our country, bills which suggest absolutely nothing new, bills which tend only to levy taxes in order to distribute what is left after paying the administration costs. Millions of dollars, even billions are at stake and the people will get nothing out of it, because tremendous administrative costs will have to be paid to apply this pension plan under Bill No. C-136. Now, we are fed up with all that.

A while ago, I heard the previous speaker say that the government stated it needs social capital. Does the government not recognize that the Canadian worker also needs social capital? Do not the farmers, white collar workers, professional men, also need a personal capital, although it is not social nor supplied by society? Why, under the pretence that social capital is required for Canada, as I said a while ago, take away from one group, while trying to persuade them that we must act in this way to help another group?

Private enterprise is generally attacked, but Bill No. C-136 does not recognize it. It will be said that private enterprise and insurance companies exploit the public, etc. What difference is there between exploitation of the public by a private company and exploitation by a government which does not know where it is going with its pension plan?

Fantastic amounts are obtained in an attempt to alleviate poverty among the Canadian people. When these people are taxed less, they do not spend their time accumulating money in the banks or institutions here and there, or hiding money in the corners of their bedrooms and in basements or vaults. These people work, expand their industries, their private enterprise, and, often enough, they allow other private enterprises to appear here and there.

The government will keep this money from circulation among the population, by accumulating that money itself and trying to socialize us further, by all possible and imaginable means.

When I see bills like that, which spread hardship in Canada, I wonder why the government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare do not take into consideration the economic realities of our country? We are told—the economists, with statistical data in support of their case—that Canada's gross national product will be over $46 billion this year, while the total national income will amount to about $32 billion. Are the minister and the government not aware that Canada will be short $14 billion in purchasing power? While the government prepares to levy more taxes, instead of giving impetus to the Canadian economy with new credits—not credits bearing interest and forcing us to pay twice the amount in 20 years—why is the government not making use of the Bank of Canada, which is a Canadian institution, which belongs to the Canadian people, which has the authority to create the necessary credits in order to distribute, not a pension at the age of 65, but a dividend from birth to death? The government and parliament would then respect all the human beings which constitute our Canadian nation.

We, in this corner of the house, have had enough of these starvation bills in the midst of plenty. This is not a bill increasing the old age pension by $10. This is a bill providing for a pension at 65 years of age which it will be compulsory for workers, farmers and everyone to pay for 30, 40 or 55 years of their life, in a rich country like ours.

Did we not hear the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) say, recently, that the Bank of Canada was authorized to grant loans to England to reinforce her financial position or to give some kind of guarantee to the pound sterling? The Bank of Canada must create funds for that, and it would not have the right to create funds to give to the Canadian people an adequate pension system and free dividends? Let the minister give us an answer on that.

Once again we may be called utopians, people chasing after the moon, but the two old political parties in Canada have been on the moon for a long time and are no longer able to produce results for the Canadian people. We hear promise after promise, but when the time comes to take some action we are presented with concrete results of $51 a month.

I wonder whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare could live on $51 a month at the age of 65? And what are they going to do with those aged between 45 and 65 and who do not have any job?

Those are the considerations I wanted to bring forward respecting Bill No. C-136 which, I know, will not interfere with the pension plan to be introduced in the province of Quebec.

If I take part in the debate on this bill, it is because I am not entitled to speak in the Quebec legislature, and I want them also to know what we think, we of the Ralliement Créditiste, about those programs of poverty amidst plenty. What we want for our Canadians is that production should be used for the Canadian people, that the financial system should no longer be the master, but rather that Canadians should be the masters of their own destinies from an economic, political and social standpoint.

[Text]

Mr. Lawrence T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): It is not my purpose to intervene in order to debate the merits of the legislation now before the house. That aspect has been extensively dealt with in the course of many able contributions from both sides of the house including, if I may say so, the admirable address of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh). I rise for the purpose of giving such assistance as I can by explaining some of the technical matters which may arise in relation to the integration of other plans, in particular the Public Service Superannuation Act, with the Canada pension plan.

It goes without saying that all persons covered by pension plans, either private or those for which the government is responsible, have a special interest in the development of the legislation now before us. The proposals contained in Bill C-136 leave untouched the question whether private plans will be adjusted so as to integrate or co-ordinate with the Canada pension plan.

Those responsible for each of the private plans are left free to decide according to their particular needs whether and in what way modification should be made in their plans. This bill does not affect the control of private plans in this respect, and indeed it is open to question whether parliament has constitutional authority to regulate private plans in this way.

There are two basic situations that most readily come to mind in any discussion regarding the integration or co-ordination of private plans. In cases where the rates of contribution are already relatively high it may be felt that the over-all rates of employer-employee contributions should not be increased and that benefits under private plans should be adjusted accordingly, but not in such a way that the combination of the two plans would lead to an over-all reduction in benefits. I understand it may be possible in some circumstances that integration could lead to a modest increase in the total benefit without an increase in the total contributions. In other circumstances it may be felt not unreasonable to completely superimpose the Canada pension plan on the existing private plan.

Canada Pension Plan

I now turn by natural transition to the nature of the adjustments which will have to be applied to the numerous existing plans for which the government is responsible. The largest of these is the Public Service Superannuation Act, which covers some 175,000 employees. It would perhaps be convenient if I outlined in a very summary fashion the scope of this act. Males working in the public service pay 6½ per cent of their salaries into the superannuation fund, and female employees pay 5 per cent. The government matches these contributions regularly and from time to time contributes additional amounts which are required in respect of the liabilities created by pay increases which are not covered by the ordinary matching contributions. Subject to certain detailed conditions, pensions are calculated by multiplying the average salary over the best six years by 2 per cent for every year of service up to 35 years. In other words, the act provides an employee with an opportunity to secure a generous pension as high as 70 per cent of his average annual salary over the best six years.

Bearing in mind the substantial existing plan, and with a desire to deal equitably with the legitimate interests of the civil service, the government decided to apply two principles in adjusting the superannuation act to the Canada pension plan. The first principle is that the total contributions paid by the employee and the government should not be increased, but instead a portion of the contribution should be diverted away from the superannuation fund in each case to the Canada pension plan. To balance this diversion, the benefits earned under the superannuation act after the Canada pension plan goes into effect will be reduced. The second principle is that this reduction in benefits under the superannuation act would not bring the total level of benefits below the level that would have prevailed under the superannuation act before adjustments.

At the risk of oversimplification, I would point out that the total contributions by the employees would not increase, and their total benefits would not decrease. So far from decreasing the total benefits, the relationship between benefits, contributions and the funding under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canada pension plan are such that if the combined rates of current contributions for the two plans are the same as the present rates under the Public Service Superannuation Act—that is, 6½ per cent for male employees and 5 per cent for female employees—then a formula might be devised whereby the combined benefits in some cases would exceed modestly the benefits, and at no time fall below the benefits, which the present superannuation act will provide.

As a result of these relationships the government has decided to recommend to parliament at the appropriate time that the Public Service Superannuation Act be amended so that the following method of co-ordination could be applied: First, the combined contributions under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canada pension plan should be equal to the present contribution rates under the Public Service Superannuation Act, but the contributions paid into the public service superannuation account would be reduced by the amount of the contributions required under the Canada pension plan. It follows that the government's matching contribution into the superannuation account would be correspondingly reduced by the amount the government pays into the Canada pension plan.

In the second place, superannuation benefits paid before age 65 to persons retiring between the ages 60 and 64 will be the same as is now paid under the Public Service Superannuation Act; that is, by multiplying the average salary for the best six years by 2 per cent for each year of service. In the third place, superannuation benefits paid to persons who become eligible for a pension under the Canada pension plan at age 65 or on subsequent retirement will be determined by a formula which I shall shortly attempt to explain to the house. I apologize for resorting to a tedious formula method of explanation but I find myself unable to deal adequately with the matter in any other way. The formula divides itself into two parts:

(a) A portion of the public service superannuation pension would be calculated at the rate of 1.3 per cent instead of 2 per cent on the average salary for the best six years up to the earnings ceiling of the Canada pension plan for each year of service after the Canada pension plan commences, while

(b) the portion of the superannuation pension benefit based on that part of the salary above the earnings ceiling of the Canada pension plan would be calculated at 2 per cent for each year of service as is presently determined under the Public Service Superannuation Act. It would be entirely wrong to suppose that the formula I have outlined to the house for the co-ordination of the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canada pension plan could be applied without alteration or refinement to other existing pension plans. I wish to make it abundantly clear that the full 2 per cent will be paid in respect of services rendered prior to the start of the Canada pension plan, since there is to be no reduction in the pension rights which have already accrued to a contributor.

Perhaps I may be allowed to say a word about disability benefits. The method by which the superannuation pension benefits are calculated in the case of ordinary retirement would be applied immediately in the case of a disability retirement where the disabled person was entitled to disability benefits both under the Canada pension plan and the Public Service Superannuation Act. In other words, a person becoming disabled would be dealt with in the same manner as a person reaching age 65. I am also concerned to make it clear that there would be no reduction in widows' and children's benefits under the Public Service Superannuation Act following the co-ordination of the two plans.

Mr. Speaker, may I sum up by stating that the co-ordination of the two plans will provide civil servants retiring on immediate pension with at least equal, and probably slightly higher, over-all benefits for some years at no extra cost to them. I should also add at this juncture that the approach I have attempted to explain to the house was recommended to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) by the advisory committee under the Public Service Superannuation Act, representing the official and the staff side of the public service.

Before concluding there is one other point which I might bring to the notice of the house. A similar review will be carried out wherever this question of double participation comes up under pension plans for which the government is responsible.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I can usefully employ the time of the house any further on this subject. I hope that my few remarks may have been of some help to all hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I found the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Pennell) most interesting. They have brought some enlightenment on the bill now before us. As last speaker of the official opposition, I should like, at this stage of the business of the house, to make a few observations concerning this very important measure.

Several hon. members criticized, so to speak, the government of the province of Quebec for wanting to secure the full and complete control of the large amount of money which will accumulate through the contributions paid in the province of Quebec.

May I point out to the house that the British North America Act gives full and complete jurisdiction to the provinces in the field of social security, and if the province of Quebec wishes to administer the fund and distribute it as it sees fit, this is consistent with the constitution, it is its concern. Furthermore, there is nothing to prevent any other province from doing the same, from following the example set by the province of Quebec.

Instead of borrowing $200 million from British Columbia as it did recently, the government of the province of Quebec will be able to draw from this fund the money required to meet the educational, material and economic needs of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec, perhaps more than all the others, needs funds to stimulate its economy, for it is now in a rather unfavourable economic situation, especially considering the fact that somehow Quebec seems to have the unemployment monopoly.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it might not be important for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) and the committee to which the bill will be sent to study certain details of this very important measure. There is some fear with regard to this pension plan, and I am of the opinion that it will constitute too heavy a burden for the farmers of Canada, especially those of eastern Canada and the province of Quebec, whose annual income is $1,200 or less.

Under this bill workers will pay a contribution of 1.8 per cent of their earnings and the employer will pay the same amount. But what happens to the farmer? He will have to pay 3.6 per cent, that is twice as much as the worker; the married farmer will pay 7.2 per cent, while the married worker will pay only 3.6 per cent.

In my opinion, it would only be fair and reasonable for the farmer in this country to be on equal terms with the worker and to pay only 1.8 per cent of his income as his contribution. Moreover, the Canadian people as a whole should absorb the 1.8 per cent contribution that would have to be paid by the farmer.

Mr. Speaker, one must also take into account the fact that, with this pension plan, contributions may increase from year to year. No provision in the act provides that contributions must be static or remain at the level established in the bill. They can increase by 1, 2 or even 3 per cent, over a four- or five-year period. Then, the farmer will have a double burden to carry, because he does not have the protection enjoyed by other social classes.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it would only be fair and equitable if the farmer, like the worker, paid a contribution of 1.8 per cent of his income in order to be on an equal footing with the latter.

I hope, when the legislation has been referred to the committee, that the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, of the catholic farmers' union and of the co-operatives will come and express the views of the farmers, in order that the latter be treated fairly and on the same footing as the other classes of citizens as far as contributions are concerned.

Mr. Speaker, I also wonder if it would not be possible to amend section 66, in order that the pension be paid when one becomes 60 years old. The hon. members know very well the problem which arises presently for the workers aged 45 years and over. Besides, it is practically impossible for those who have already reached the age of 60 to obtain employment.

Therefore, I think the pension age should be reduced to 60 years, in order to give social security to this class of citizens, who, at the present time, face a serious problem when they want to find employment.

Such are, Mr. Speaker, the remarks I wanted to make, and I believe it would be very important that the farmer be treated on the same footing as the worker and that the contribution he will have to pay be the same as the one paid by the worker, in brief, that the extra assessment of 1.8 per cent which the farmer has to pay be paid altogether by the Canadian taxpayers at large.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. member allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. Pigeon: Yes.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member mentioned that certain members were opposed to Quebec having its own pension plan. Could he identify these members?

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to indulge in personalities in this house. Some members were opposed to this, and I said so quite frankly; whether they are from the government or the opposition, it does not matter. I said what I thought, according to my conscience and, as I said, the provinces have priority in the field of social security. In fact, the provinces have no lesson to receive from the federal government and from members of the house whoever they are, from whatever side of the house they are.

[Text]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian public have waited many years for a change in the system of social security welfare. In the area I come from the adoption of a portable pension plan operated by the government will provide security for the elderly, and many employees who under no circumstances would have been able to receive this type of benefit. I refer mainly to people such as miners, woodworkers and in many cases farmers.

In the area I represent we have been suffering from the disadvantage that persons working on a particular contract are not eligible for a pension because the operation does not continue for the minimum required length of time to permit the establishment of a pension plan. Second, governments over the years have been plagued with regulations made by the federal Department of Finance, which were set up to provide for vesting, so as to allow the carrying forward of employers' contributions into a pension plan for retiring employees. The fact that this government has decided to implement a social security system not unlike those of many other countries is, I think, a very good thing.

I hope that what was said by the hon. member for Essex South (Mr. Whelan), and the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Pennell), will be taken into consideration by those who read about the pension plan in the records of parliament. The hon. member speaking for the Minister of Finance did add considerable detail, and further confused my understanding of the supplementary benefits of this plan. However, upon further study of what he said I am quite sure it will prove to clarify some of the points that previously were confusing.

On the other hand, the hon. member for Essex South, who probably took some direction from the political pundits of his party, wrote a purely political pension speech. That speech should be examined by the members of this house, because it is probably the type of election propaganda we will hear during the forthcoming election campaign, whenever that may take place.

Mr. Whelan: Thank you for the compliment.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member has thanked me for the compliment. I should indicate that it was a compliment. I think both speeches have enlightened the members of this house and have clarified what was a confusing situation.

Mr. Speaker, I think the reputation which parliament has established during this session, and the attitude of the government in particular toward the business of this house, and the disrepute this country generally feels toward this parliament, has been reflected in the presentation of the Canada pension plan. That is a regrettable situation. It is a shame that a limitation has been suggested for the debate on second reading. Second reading is actually the stage during which a bill is accepted in principle. With such a limitation many contributions which might be made will not be made.

I am also disappointed because this Canada pension plan is not nearly good enough for Canada. Had we adopted a pension plan years ago when the Unemployment Insurance Act was passed, we would at that time have gone to the provinces, held federal-provincial conferences, and come to some kind of a compromise on the part of all governments, including the government of that province which was least willing to accept unemployment insurance, and found a solution to the unemployment problem of much greater advantage to the Canadian worker than would have been possible in any other way. What is being done today by the Liberal government, is adopting legislation as a result of provincial-federal conferences, followed by a request that parliament rubber stamp what that conference has decided.

I give the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss LaMarsh) full credit for the additional plan she introduced, and while we may or may not agree with its terms, the plan was being offered to all the provinces. On the other hand, the bill now before us does not qualify as either fish or fowl, but is a plan developed at federal-provincial conferences, after taking into consideration the wishes of a province which has decided not to participate. I have heard many members who represent that province stand in their place and attempt to make some contribution to this debate, just as though they were going to participate in this plan.

Miss LaMarsh: They are.

Mr. Peters: The minister says they are going to participate. They are going to participate only because the federal government has agreed that provinces can develop similar comprehensive plans, but I suggest that one province has already put into effect the plan which the federal government is going to adopt.

Miss LaMarsh: Mr. Speaker, if I may, I would remind the hon. member that all members of this House of Commons will become contributors in respect of their indemnities in this place.

Mr. Peters: The members from Quebec may be able to do that, and that creates another round of arguments as to who is going to make contributions, and to whom.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the government of Canada should have been prepared to propose a plan to be administered in a manner similar to the Unemployment Insurance Act, even though the development of such a plan would require more time and effort. The government should establish an act, even though requiring an amendment to the British North America Act, which amalgamates old age security and old age pensions. Such a plan would provide basic pensions, and all provinces would have to participate, or would not receive any old age security or old age pension.

I see the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) shaking his head. He probably will not agree with my suggestion because such a plan would not involve negotiation with the provinces, and the provinces would have to accept it or reject it. I think that situation will eventually exist.

Many people in this country are becoming tired of this parliament rubber stamping the agreements negotiated at federal-provincial conferences. It seems impossible for the federal government to stand up and say, this is the legislation we are presenting and Quebec can either like it or lump it. This government is afraid to say that what it proposes must be accepted and participated in by all provinces, and that it could not care less which course the provinces followed, but that if a province did not wish to participate, that is its prerogative, and it would receive nothing. Someone else I am sure will say that such a proposal would involve an amendment to the British North America Act. This bill now before us involves two amendments to the B.N.A. Act, in order to provide for some of the supplementary benefits.

This social security scheme has certain benefits, advantages and disadvantages. I believe the main advantage is its portability. That is a very important aspect of any national pension scheme. It will allow Canadians to take their pensions from one job to another job, and from one province to another province. This involves a significant step forward, and is a step which no federal-provincial plan could neglect.

This aspect of the proposed plan will provide mobility of the working force of this nation. This mobility has not existed in recent years, even in government agencies, because applicants over 40 years of age have been turned down on the basis that if they at that age began to contribute to existing pension plans, this would throw out the actuarial studies already being made by those agencies. This plan will allow individuals to take their pensions from one job to another and remove the disadvantage to older employees, who are unable to obtain new jobs.

Many individuals, including one Créditiste who spoke yesterday, have suggested that we should share our responsibilities toward poverty stricken areas. I would not suggest that pensions of $104 per month, plus old age security, would represent abject poverty, if this plan were put into operation immediately; but I do believe that greater contributions would be welcomed by employees if suitable and graduated increases in benefits were made applicable.

In Germany for instance you are able to retire on at least half of the amount you earn in the highest five year period of earnings. They are much more advanced than we are. If you examine some of the pension plans in Europe you will find that for 50 or 60 years there has been portability between provinces, as we are suggesting here, and between other countries as well. I think the door should be left open in this regard in our pension plan so that there will be portability of sections of our social security system. Then those who wish to return to their homes will be able to carry their pensions with them. This scheme of course involves a great deal of negotiation by the external affairs department with other countries in order to make this interchange possible. Perhaps the minister is going to be able to do it; I hope she does. She probably has in mind the Geneva conventions as a possible means. I strongly urge her to consider it. I know that I, personally, have received a number of letters from persons in sunny Florida, England and other places to the effect that these persons have been prevented from receiving even their old age pensions under the terms of our legislation.

[Mr. Peters.]

There is no interchange between Canada and other countries that would allow portability of pensions at the present time.

Mr. Gray: It is in the bill.

Mr. Peters: It is partly in the bill; this mobility is only partial. Our pensions are not portable to the extent that pensions are portable in Germany, Luxembourg, Denmark and so on, where it is 100 per cent. They are referring of course to the employees pension plan and not to the whole social security system. I understand, however, that in recent times there has been a move in these countries toward portability of all of their social security.

Mr. Gray: Would the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Peters: Yes.

Mr. Gray: Is he not aware that there are provisions in the bill permitting the government to make agreements with other countries regarding this international portability to which he is referring?

Mr. Peters: I am in agreement that there are such provision. When the minister nodded her head, I assumed some steps would be taken in this direction by her department, I would assume through some of the existing agencies. I am not saying we have closed the door on this possibility. I am saying that I strongly urge the minister to proceed with these arrangements as quickly as possible so there will be portability with other countries. This has been a drawback of the plans we have had in Canada so far.

I am quite pleased with the fact that this plan is available, when it goes into effect, to those who are less than 65 years of age. We have been plagued with many persons who are not able to find employment after they reach the age of 50, sometimes even less. It is going to be absolutely necessary to provide them with assistance, either in the form of welfare payments through provincial governments as we are doing now, or through some form of contributory pension. I know that if we can reduce the pensionable age to 65, as we have done in this bill, it is quite possible that when the plan is fully in operation adjustments will be made to reduce the age still farther. I suggest that this be considered as soon as it is feasible.

One of the disadvantages of this plan, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that it is not universal. It is compulsory for some categories, but it is not universal. Many persons who are self-employed, whether they be farmers or businessmen, will have to make a decision. I know many businessmen who say: I can look after myself; I could use this money to better advantage in my business today. Some of these people will find when they reach retirement age they are not able to make contributions to their retirement. They are not all going to be in the favoured position of the member of the Liberal party who received an old age pension the other day, calculated at about half a million dollars, by being appointed to the other place. Some of these people are going to have to make their own arrangements under this plan. I suggest the plan should have been made universal, and that the government should have arranged for everybody to contribute to the plan.

I notice there is great consternation about this. I believe that it is the right of a farmer to contribute to the plan if he wishes. This is the right of the self-employed. Arrangements can be made whereby they can do so, but it is not compulsory.

There has been considerable discussion, and I think it is worth-while discussion, about whether or not we should have a fully funded plan or the semi-funded plan that we have. I am not really committed to either side because I feel there should have been a great deal more consideration given to the point and more information available to members of parliament about it. I know there are many who say that in 20 years this plan will have $8 billion in it, and that this is a sizeable amount of money that can be used to advantage in the development of our nation. There are of course those, and I share their view, who say this money should have remained with the federal government, and that the federal government should have used it for the development of new industries. One such development which I hope will come into being in my lifetime is the Grand canal, which it has been indicated will cost about $2 billion. The indications are that this will be a self-liquidating plan in 50 years. It seems to me this is the type of development that a fully funded plan would have made possible for the federal government. However this money has now been allotted to the provincial governments. I believe this will cause some consternation. There will be provinces that will use it and other provinces that will leave the money with the federal government to invest in federal bonds and other securities.

I am of the opinion that we are not really qualified, as members of parliament, with the information available, to decide whether or not this should have been a funded plan. I know the minister's department has considered this matter at great length, but I believe that she had to consider it in the light of the discussions that had taken place with the provinces and the fact that the provinces themselves said they would only participate in this type of plan if they were allowed to invest the money that was raised in their own provinces. I feel that our hands were bound before we faced a decision as to whether or not to accept the principle of this bill as a result of the discussions that took place between the federal and provincial governments.

There are many other parts of the bill, Mr. Speaker, upon which I feel the minister is to be congratulated. I am not completely in agreement that they should all have been brought into one bill. I am not sure that the Canada pension plan should not have stood on its own two feet without taking into account all these other things. If I had been the minister I would have kept the pension plan separate and distinct. I would not have referred to it as a social security system but would have called it a Canada pension plan.

However, I am not in disagreement with the additions that have been made. I think the minister is to be congratulated on making provision for survivor benefits in the Canada pension plan. In my opinion this is something that would normally have been included in a straight pension plan. However, in my view supplementary benefits do not really fall within the jurisdiction of what I would consider to be a pension plan. So far as disabled persons, widows, dependants of widows, and widowers in some cases are concerned, we have had joint federal-provincial plans which have been highly unsuccessful. They have provided very limited benefits to people who are totally dependant on such contributions for their very welfare.

I know that the Speaker should have some knowledge of this matter. I deal continually with a member of his family who is responsible for a very large area of this supplementary field at the provincial level and has to do with disabled persons allowances, mothers allowances and so on which are administered by the provincial government. Recently there has been a terrific deterioration in this field. These matters are now back in the provincial office rather than being dealt with regionally, and inasmuch as the law says a person must be totally and permanently disabled the administrator has not in the past been able to exercise any leniency. The matter now comes before a board. A person may say, "I am totally and permanently disabled, I have lost a leg and I am crippled with arthritis and can hardly move around". The doctors' reports all indicate this is the case, but the board says, "Well, you got here, didn't you?".

I am happy that under this new social security scheme the federal government will give consideration to such cases. Certainly all you have to do is to read the new provision and you will see the difference. I congratulate the minister on this because I have seen a great hardship and abuse under the present federal-provincial plan. The controlling words up to now have been "totally and permanently disabled" but in the white paper these are the words used:

> —if an examination reveals a medically determinable impairment in which physical or mental disability is so severe and prolonged that he is unable to secure regular, substantially gainful employment.

Then he is considered to be disabled. Let me tell the minister that there will be thousands of persons throughout the nation who will be found to be disabled to the extent that they are not able to earn a living, not able to look after their families and in many cases not able to look after themselves. It would seem that with this change thoroughly fair and reasonable treatment will be accorded to them, and the minister is to be congratulated. I do not want to take the time to go into the other changes in these federal-provincial shared plans but I think that all the changes are advantageous.

I wish that parliament and the government had been strong enough to develop a completely federal plan because I believe that when we take into consideration the whims, the wishes and sometimes the eccentricities of ten provincial governments we cannot end up with the best plan possible. In my opinion the federal government should have had the audacity and the guts to introduce a completely federal plan and to tell the provinces that they could either participate in it or not but that the federal government intended to provide for those who wished the best plan possible for the money available from every Canadian who wanted to subscribe to the plan. If the government had done this I believe that the disagreement with the province of Ontario in particular would not have arisen.

But I was particularly surprised to find at the time of the second plan or possibly even the third plan that the province of Quebec had developed a much more humane and advantageous pension plan that the federal government was providing. When I found this out I agreed that the government of Ontario should also say "me too". I think the minister should have disregarded the pressures that were being exerted by the insurance companies, pressures that do not appear to be evident at all today because members of the Conservative party have not risen in their seats to oppose the plan in any organized fashion. Therefore I presume that the insurance companies have abandoned their opposition to the plan. But as a Canadian I do wish that sooner or later the government would have the guts to present a plan on a national basis for the money that is available to them at that time. I also wish that they would then say to the provinces: You are welcome to participate in this plan if you wish, but this plan will be provided for every person in the country who wants it and we are not going to make any other arrangements. We will provide the right for you to opt out if you wish, but that will be final. You will not be allowed to come in and opt out as is the case with this plan.

Surely one day, Mr. Speaker, we will have a federal plan that every Canadian in every part of the country will be proud of and that we can brag about throughout the rest of the world as being the best pension plan in the world. I am sure we cannot do so today with the plan we have before us, but I believe that we have the facilities and the growth in productivity that should have enabled us to say that about the present plan.

Mr. Gray: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Peters: Certainly.

Mr. Gray: Is the hon. member not aware that the bill before us provides for compulsory coverage of the self-employed and the farmers? Perhaps the hon. member's speech was founded on the previous bill.

Mr. Peters: Well, there have been so many of them. I agree there is a clause with regard to limitation of income but having regard to the incomes that most farmers report under the Income Tax Act I do not believe they will meet the compulsory requirement and therefore they will not be covered.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it was my understanding that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare also wanted to speak, but as I did not see him rise I will proceed to make a few remarks with respect to the bill before us. In the first instance I want to indicate that because there are a number of bad features in the bill, because, as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and others have pointed out, it is not really adequate enough for the people of Canada, my support of the bill is conditional at this stage. I say "conditional" because this bill is to be referred to a committee where presumably there will be an extensive presentation of briefs and arguments for or against either the bill itself or with respect to particular provisions in it and I would hope that as a result of the work of this committee and the examination given to this legislation the bill will be reported back in a better form than the one in which we see it now. It is with this in mind that I say the support I give to it is conditional and qualified.

A number of people have indicated—I will not name them at the moment—that because we have raised doubts about the efficacy of certain provisions in this measure, because we have sought to point out where the bill fails and the extent to which it fails, we are really opposed to the bill itself. In order to prevent any attempt at misrepresentation of this sort we hope at the conclusion of the debate when the vote is taken to have a recorded vote so that everyone in the house may have an opportunity to stand and be counted either for or against this measure, because we know from past experience that politicians, being what they are, tend to take a position and misrepresent and distort it for their own political advantage. We would not like that sort of thing to occur with respect to the particular item before us.

A number of members have spoken about this bill as though they really believe in their hearts that it will finally be enacted as the law of Canada. There is some doubt, at least in my mind, that this bill will ever get on the statute books of this country. It is one of the most important that parliament has had before it for many, many years. It is also one of the most complex. It affects, or will affect, every person in Canada. It affects too a great number of organizations, companies and corporations across this country to a far greater extent than has any other single bill in recent years. Millions of people are concerned with the legislation and will be involved in it. There is the relationship between the plan proposed and private plans. While at the moment there seems to be some solution to this problem there will, nevertheless, in the future be continuing concern about this relationship. There is the possibility of provinces enacting their own plans. There is the influence of the attitude of the various insurance companies of Canada, and there are the billions upon billions of dollars involved as well as the way in which this money will be used during the time it is contained within the fund.

Because we are at this particular point of our proceedings approaching, perhaps, a Christmas recess; because we are approaching, perhaps, the prorogation of this session in anticipation of the start of another, and because a number of Liberal cabinet ministers in recent weeks have been making noises at public gatherings about the possibility of an election in the early months of next year, we could be facing the dissolution of this parliament. We all know what would happen to any piece of legislation before parliament or before a committee should dissolution take place. It would be the end of it. In accordance with our normal practice should even the prorogation of this session take place in readiness for the start of a new session in the early part of the year, this too would mean the death of the bill now before us—it would have to be started all over again. There is a way out—and I commend it to the government—in the report of the committee on procedure submitted a few weeks ago to the effect that we should not have a new session of parliament but merely a recess, in order that the committee charged with the responsibility for considering this bill might have as long as possible in which to carry out its work and hear witnesses, and so that this parliament would still have the bill in existence at the time when the committee reports its proceedings. Failure to make such an arrangement would simply mean that when we do begin another session of parliament we shall have to start all over again from scratch; the bill would have to be preceded by a resolution, given first reading, and we should be back again doing what we are doing today. That seems to me to be a senseless waste of time, especially when one is dealing with a subject as vitally important as is the Canada pension plan presently before us.

If, as is expected, the government intends on its own initiative to ask for the dissolution of this parliament some time in the early months of next year with the result, of course, that an election must follow, and the committee has not completed its hearings by that time, it would mean the death of the Canada pension plan, and this would be a regrettable state of affairs. But past experience of the Liberal party both here in Ottawa and in various provinces leads me to suspect that this may happen. In that way the Liberal party would be able to sell the idea of the Canada pension plan to the contributors, or potential contributors, in this nation in exchange for votes and support while at the same time allaying the fears of the insurance companies that the plan would actually be put into effect. If what I am suggesting does take place it would be another blot on the record of the Liberal party, a record which is filled with instances of chicanery and double dealing in such affairs as this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard: Hon. members opposite may chortle but they need only read a little of the history of their party to realize that this is the case.

An hon. Member: What about the C.C.F. party?

Mr. Howard: Occasionally we hear these bleatings from the other side when they feel their honour is pricked and wounded, but I am merely telling them something which is a fact. I do not have any great expectations at the moment that this bill will finally get on to the statute books of Canada, if it is correct that the government is doing all it can to engineer an election this spring, and my doubts will not be allayed unless steps are taken to guarantee that this committee which is already established will be able to continue sitting continuously from now until its hearings are completed, and find itself in the position to be able to report to this present session of parliament. This would mean having to forgo the usual arrangements for dissolution and the calling of a new session of parliament. The present session would have to continue, and if we arranged for this to happen only because of the pension plan it would be a worth-while undertaking. It would mean we should have to continue the present session of parliament, even though it might extend into the middle of next year. By agreement—and agreement appears to be available any time the leader of the house wants it, these days—arrangements could be made for the resumption of private members' hours on Mondays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, and for the putting forward of the various supply motions so that we could consider the estimates of the next fiscal year and so on. Some agreement could be reached about arranging for a speech from the throne, if we really needed to have one, as well as about those other proceedings in parliament which normally follow the calling of a new session.

I submit that the only course open to the government at the moment is to attempt to keep this session of parliament in being until such time as the committee which is studying this bill has an opportunity to report back to us. We can thus guarantee that at least it will not die on the order paper as a result of prorogation, and can hope that dissolution will not take place until such time as we have the law on the statute books. Unless the government are willing to do this, I think we are quite justified in making the accusation against them that they are not really sincere about proceeding with even this watered down version of a pension plan. Mr. Speaker, I had other remarks that I would have made, but these in essence were made by my colleague the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and others in this party who have spoken; therefore I will not take the time of the house to repeat those contentions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Marvin Gelber (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to introduce my few remarks on the Canada pension plan with a quotation from Psalms which has been chanted through the ages:

> Cast me not off in the time of old age: forsake me not when my strength faileth.

Provision for old age through the social welfare state expresses not alone our social conscience but reflects the transformation of our society from a rural to an urban one. The patriarchal society which was historic presented no special problem as long as the moral responsibility for old people was recognized. The aged and the young lived together and respect for the fathers was the norm of the civilized community. On the other hand we must provide through these present special measures, partly because of our growing individualism. We no longer think in family terms to the extent that our ancestors did. The young wish to be free and the old do not wish to be dependant. In the patriarchal society and in rural society, the older members of the family participated as of right and not by grace of the good will of their children. We have moved away from that and we think ourselves advanced. In fact, we have created many problems and only in the last decades are we really beginning to face them. The generations live apart. The filial bond is at something of a discount. To many of the young, it is a burden; to some of the old the toleration of their children is itself intolerable. One of the great problems of the aged is loneliness. This is a real challenge. Age itself has not fashioned this yoke; it is our society that is lacking—and this is a comment on an age that prides itself on its social consciousness.

We in this parliament and particularly in this generation must do something for a group of Canadians who reached their prime in the great depression of the 1930's. As late as 1935, one out of every seven Canadians was on relief. We hear appeals for self-reliance and advice to all to provide in advance for unhappy vicissitudes, and particularly for years of declining economic productivity. But how could a generation condemned to idleness through forces much larger than its own capabilities provide for the future when the impoverished present was so very terrible? Now in its later years we must take measures for those who were the victims of the economic holocaust that swept so much of the western world 30 years ago. This gives special urgency to enacting an additional measure at this time to provide for people in their older years.

There is another special problem which is most compelling. Our economy and our society is in the throes of a great revolution. It is a revolution based on the most sophisticated techniques of production and control. It goes by the name of automation. Automation is transforming not only our industrial and distributive processes but forces us to examine our concept of the value of work and the place of work in society since the dawn of history. We have glorified the biblical dictum that "by the sweat of thy brow shalt thou earn thy bread". One of the great humane values of the social revolution that swept Europe commencing with the middle years of the 19th century was the idea of the dignity of labour. This was not only a great egalitarian doctrine but held aloft a moral precept which is central to the highest ethical ideals of our civilization from its beginnings thousands of years ago. Now hyper-efficiency is forcing us to examine this central thesis of our society. It is forcing us to look to our directions and to prepare for results that we never really anticipated.

Some months ago in this house I mentioned the fact that 14 glassblower operators tend machines that produce all the glass bulbs and all the radio and television tubes, excepting picture tubes, for the United States. With that one exception, 14 tend machines which produce 90 per cent of the total. Some weeks later a colleague in the house, who apparently was paying careful attention to my remarks, was discussing this information with friends and they found it unbelievable. What was my authority? I told him I was quoting the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen).

In point of fact, this is the core of the problem. The direct relationship of commodities to labour expended fascinated the classical economists. It provided ideas for Adam Smith and David Ricardo, and inspired the revolutionary and evangelical economic theory of Karl Marx, who stood the labour theory of value on its head. Tomorrow we may not be relating directly commodities to labour expended. Fourteen men tend machines that produce 90 per cent of the bulbs and tubes—they might easily produce all that is required, plus a surplus. The measurement of output in terms of labour hours could become an obsolete concept. This is something quite revolutionary and goes to the root of our society, which is so intimately related to our economic processes.

We live in a country of abundance, despite the poverty which is too widespread. The representations made by the Ontario federation of labour on poverty in Ontario in 1964 are a challenge to all. The Minister of Forestry (Mr. Sauvé) has also pinpointed this problem and proposes to do some things about it. The Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) has special programs to stimulate growth in designated areas, and the over-all economic program of the government has taken certain important steps. It is a paradox that we have these areas of impoverishment in a society of abundance. It is also a most serious consideration that with a great potential in the western world much of the world community lives in abject poverty. Hunger is the first problem for more than half the human race, and our country which has increased its participation in foreign aid must continue to do even more. The fact remains that the new processes are producing great bounties and the problems of automation oblige us to examine with great seriousness the organization of the labour market.

I have been an advocate of more serious programs of industrial training and larger attempts to upgrade our labour force. However, we are also faced with the necessity to abstract from our labour force aging workers who, through their own efforts and those of all of us, can provide for their older years. This pension plan means that the bounty of automation will not exact too great a price for older workers. We are not as yet really facing the challenge of obsolescence in the skills of our workers. Every day thousands now working are finding their means of livelihood destroyed because the skills that have stood them in good stead for most of their adult lives have become obsolete. In part, this can be met by retraining, but for many of the older workers it will be necessary to withdraw them from the labour market in dignity and with security.

This is the greatest aspect of the Canada pension plan; we are protecting the dignity and the self-respect of our workers. We not only give them a greater mobility by ensuring the portability of pensions, but we are saying: In your declining years it is not to the state which you are looking but to the provisions which through the state you were able to make for yourself, together with the contribution of your employer, to security and well-being.

If we have moved from the patriarchal society to a highly individualized community, the older worker is entitled to all the dignity which his son, who with his skill and his two arms is able to provide for his wife and children and himself, has in his prime. Not through the toleration of his children, but through his own provision, the older worker can hold his head high and face his later years with a sense of dignity and well-being.

Our problems do not end here We shall have to give thought to organizing the leisure which a society of automation affords us. We shall have to make it creative and satisfying. Canada has a challenging present and a great future, and the Canada pension plan is a step towards its realization.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a question before we proceed any further; she can deal with it when she is replying. Can the minister tell us whether she has any assurance from the nine provinces that they will participate in the plan at this stage?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now she would, of course, be closing the debate.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I was seeking to ask the hon. member who has just concluded his speech whether he would permit a question before he took his seat.

Mr. Gelber: Certainly.

Mr. Barnett: I listened with interest to his speech and I noted that earlier in his remarks he made reference to the generation of Canadians who were in the prime of their earning years when they were caught in the holocaust of the great depression. I should like to ask the hon. member whether he would not have to agree that it is precisely that generation of Canadians for whom we are not making provision in this bill, because of the age they have now reached.

Mr. Gelber: I would say it depends how old they were then.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those against the said motion please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And five members having risen:

Mr. Scott: Mr. Speaker, I and my colleagues would like to record a vote.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

Mr. Churchill: It is too late.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No; the Chair did not declare the motion carried. I called for yeas and nays, and five members having stood the Chair has to call in the members.

The house divided on the motion (Miss LaMarsh) which was agreed to on the following division:

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Rinfret: I move:

That the members of the House of Commons on the joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to consider Bill No. C-136, approved November 16, 1964, be composed of: Messrs. Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader about the business for tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, perhaps before announcing the business for tomorrow I might take the opportunity to thank the house for its co-operation in the last three days in dealing with the important piece of legislation which has just been given second reading. Tomorrow we propose submitting the estimates of the Department of External Affairs for consideration—

Mr. Churchill: Will the member for Red Deer be back tomorrow?

Mr. McIlraith: —and on Monday we propose submitting the estimates of the Department of Justice. There has been a request that time be allocated as between the department proper, the penitentiaries branch and the combines branch, but perhaps that can be dealt with later. I am not able to announce the business to be submitted on Friday. I should like the opportunity to consult with the house leaders of the other parties before announcing business for that day.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, if I have missed something I am sure I will be corrected, but were we not going to refer Bill No. C-136 to the joint committee, now that it has been appointed?

Mr. McIlraith: That was done just a few minutes ago.

Mr. Knowles: Good.

It being fourteen minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
