> I'm a strong supporter of our Canadian plant breeders. Their efforts have contributed a great deal to the success of Canadian agriculture today. I want to see them encouraged, and I want to see them get the protection for their work that they deserve.

This legislation will give them the protection for the work they do. They deserve it.

It is surprising to realize the number of people in the House on the opposition side who actually support this legislation. Unfortunately, they are not here tonight. There are a few ragtag renegades from their Party—I am not referring to the Member for Gloucester (Mr. Young) who is a good New Brunswicker. There are a few on that side of the House who support this legislation but they are very silent tonight. I am very pleased with that silence.

It is an historical fact that the settlement of the Canadian West was to a large degree facilitated by the development of a single superior variety of wheat, Marquis, produced in Ottawa by a plant breeder with the federal Department of Agriculture. Members opposite do acknowledge that this was a result of the Canadian Government. It is interesting that they would do so.

Farming has always been crucial to our country and new and improved varieties are the foundation upon which it is built. It is embarrassing to see the role which plant breeders have played in Canada's history when one notes how Canada ommitted itself from the history of plant breeders' rights. The agricultural sector has been waiting for a long time, while other nations passed the legislation they so desire.

In 1923, the Canadian Horticultural Council recommended legislation for plant patents. However, nothing was done at the time. Meanwhile, the Netherlands passed plant breeders' rights in 1941, Germany in 1953, and Denmark in 1962.

By 1961, the International Convention for the Protection of New Varieties of Plants was drawn up among six European nations to promote continuity and the exchange of plant breeding and germplasm. In 1964 the United Kingdom passed its legislation.

In 1970, the United States introduced the Plant Variety Protection Act. France also adopted plant breeders' rights in 1970, as did Sweden in 1961. During that decade 11 other countries passed similar legislation.

That same year in Canada, the University of Guelph sponsored a conference on plant breeders' rights which was attended by interested organizations. That conference recommended that PBR was essential to our country and that legislation be passed.

In 1972, the Canadian Agricultural Services Co-ordinating Committee agreed that plant breeders' rights would be desirable in Canada. The committee is a broadly based organization with representation from provincial Departments of Agriculture and industry. It also includes deans of agriculture from Canadian universities. That prominent organization asked Agriculture Canada to draft proposals for legislation.

In 1980, Hon. Eugene Whalen who was an ardent supporter of plant breeders' rights, introduced Bill C-22. It was essentially the same Bill that we are introducing, but it died on the Order Paper. In that same year, Australia and Ireland acted and passed its legislation.

In January, 1988, the Hon. John Wise introduced into Parliament a plant breeder's rights Bill, essentially the same as Mr. Whelan's. Again, it was not passed because an election got in the way.

Mr. Milliken: The Government never got around to doing anything.

Mr. McDermid: You were not even here.

Mr. Thompson: Had their not been an election, I am sure the Senate would have held it up like it did with so many other Bills that we introduced which were good for the country but which the Senate obviously did not want to pass. That is what they did with the Free Trade Bill and the Child Care Bill. I am sure they would have done that with the plant breeders' rights Bill if it had passed this House.

Except for some minor legalistic changes, it was the same Bill we are debating today. The agricultural sector is behind us and it is time for the Government to adopt that legislation. It will create an incentive for further development of plant varieties, which we need in Canada.

Plant breeders from Hungary, Japan, Ireland, Sweden, Switzerland and Australia have already gained from breeders' rights legislation in their own countries. We as Canadians can do the same thing.

Let Canadian breeders benefit from this proposed legislation too. We know that in order to obtain some return on their varieties, Canadian breeders need reciprocity. Many of their products can sell well elsewhere, but we must act to give them the mechanisms to protect their work domestically and internationally.

Without Bill C–15, our producers are being denied the best varieties from Canadian and foreign sources. The absence of plant breeders' rights legislation leaves Canada out in the cold. Our country and Norway are the only developed nations in the world not to have some sort of mechanism to protect the work of their breeders. We must recognize this fact and move forward with this proposed legislation. I trust that Members of the House will help us do so.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, we have been listening to the twisted malinformed ragtag minds of the group who call themselves Progressive Conservatives. It is unfortunate that none of the regressive convertibles have taken the time to read Bill C–15, something that many Canadians would be interested in knowing about. There was only a couple of hours of debate before the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Mazankowski), who calls himself a western Canadian, and calls himself the Minister of Agriculture, brought in the guillotine, the savage choking off of debate before Canadians know what is really being brought before the House.

This is a very important debate because it is about the privatization of life forms and genetic material for profit. Of course, this is just the second chip. We saw the drug patent legislation brought forward by the so–called Progressive Conservative Party. That was, of course, just a chip in relation to the free trade deal, a piece of legislation which is now known from coast to coast and from north to south in this country to be harmful to Canadian consumers in terms of drug pricing.

The only Tory plank that we have heard in here all evening is that Eugene Whelan liked the idea. If that is the sole foundation of Conservative policy it should be enough for a few of the rank and file on the government side to smell a rat and to vote against it.

Let us have a look at the Bill, Mr. Speaker, something which I am sure no one on the government side has done. They do not want to be confused with facts. Clause 5 says:

> Subject to this Act, the holder of the plant breeder's rights respecting a plant variety has the exclusive right
> (a) to sell, and produce in Canada for the purpose of selling, propagating material, as such, of the plant variety;

I think there are a lot of Canadians out there who would like to know what that means. Let us go on to Clause 6 which says:

> The term of the grant of plant breeder's rights shall, subject to earlier termination pursuant to this Act, be a period of eighteen years,

Now we know what the Act is for and how long the period is. Let us now look at the offence section. It is always interesting to know where Conservatives are coming from. Let us have a look at what would happen to the granny on the Prairies growing daisy seeds, British Columbians on Vancouver Island who are growing some pear trees and have been giving them away or selling them for many years, or New Brunswickers who are producing their own spud varieties, if they wanted to continue selling or propagating seed and were not participating in this new bureaucracy, this massive red tape being proposed by the Conservatives. They can be convicted under a lot of clauses but Clause 53(4) says:

> An individual who commits an offence—
> (a) is liable on summary conviction to a fine of not more than five thousand dollars; or —if the Minister of Justice decides that he does not like the person particularly—

> (b) is liable on conviction on indictment to a fine of not more than fifteen thousand dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three years,

So you go to jail for three years and pay a $15,000 fine for giving somebody some asparagus.

Let us have a look at what some people have to say about that. The cart is, as you know, way before the horse, as is always the case, it seems, with this Government which is wandering all over the map in terms of policy.

We know that Canada desperately needs a debate on genetic engineering and biotechnology. I have had it on the Order Paper for more than one Parliament. Does the Government ever take the opportunity to get involved in an important and fundamental debate that this country and many countries around the world need? Not a chance, it wants to privatize and give it all over to their pals the multinationals.

How many Members in this House know that already 10 per cent of world trade is in chemicals, pesticides and herbicides? This comes at a time when Canadians are demanding a change in terms of the products that we collectively eat, chemical and pesticide-free food. For example, in the Province of Quebec a provincial poll was done earlier this year. Twenty-five per cent of the residents of the Province of Quebec want chemical and pesticide-free food.

I know that the Deputy Prime Minister often reads Harrowsmith, one of his favourite publications. An article entitled Profitable Patents reads:

> While the proposed patent system appears logical and fair on its face, there are those who believe it to be neither necessary nor desirable from the public's point of view. Plant patents will have one inarguable effect: greater profits for those who sell seed. Holding ironclad rights to a particular new seed gives the marketer a new selling tool, with guaranteed royalties—often 10 per cent of the seed price for the breeder, his sponsor or the organization which has bought the patent.
> The prospect of these greater profits, along with a growing awareness of the potential value of good seed in an increasingly hungry world has suddenly lured a number of unlikely corporate players into the seed breeding and marketing arena.
> As soon as plant patenting systems were planned and legislated in Europe and the United States in recent years, seed companies began to be snapped up by mega-corporations, often those already having interests in agricultural chemicals and food products. Britain's plant patenting system was instigated in 1964. At about that time Ranks-Hovis-McDougall, one of the "Big Three" in baking and flour milling in the British Isles, purchased scores of agriculture-related businesses.
> In his report to company stockholders in January, 1964, the chairman of Ranks said that the corporation had "secured substantial additional interests in business trading directly with farmers and we have been engaged during the year in building up this activity—by the acquisition of further businesses and by strengthening the links between the various companies".
> Ranks, incidentally, owns several businesses in Canada, among them Georgian Bay Fruit Growers Ltd. and the Gattuso Corporation, manufacturers of spaghetti and pasta products.

This is a very interesting part, this is why I know that the Deputy Prime Minister read this section of Harrowsmith before he came up with this dire Machiavellian plan of bringing this in hoping that Canadians would not know that second reading was going on under the threat of closure. The article continues:

> Seed patent legislation was the subject of a 40-year controversy in the United States, with critics predicting dire consequences if the law were passed. Nevertheless, on Christmas Eve of 1970, the Plant Variety Protection Act was hurriedly approved in Washington. Bernard Leese of the U.S. Plant Variety Protection Office, now says that it was "rather an expeditious act on the part of Congress—everyone wanted to get home for the holidays".

Also in the Harrowsmith article, which I think is particularly true, under "Transient Politicians" is the following:

> What very large corporations want, they generally get. Leonard Silk wrote in a March, 1974 editorial in The New York Times, "The danger is not that corporations will pursue their pecuniary interests—but that they will corrupt and capture the powers of government and transfigure national values and institutions to serve their corporate interests."
> It is interesting to note that both Ranks-Hovis-McDougall and Ciba-Geigy were known contributors to the Conservative party in Britain and that party, under Sir Alexander Douglas-Home, was in power when the Plant Varieties and Seeds Bill was passed there in 1964. In Canada, both the Liberal and Conservative Parties have expressed support for plant patents.

We are now starting to get to the interesting material, Mr. Speaker. Let us take a look at what actually happens under the heading "Out with the Old".

It reads:

> Public breeders routinely produce standard varieties that are economical for the farmer or gardener. It takes seven or eight breeding generations longer to develop a standard rather than a hybrid tomato, for instance, but after that it is very easy to produce additional seed. Hybrid vigour, the aspect that makes hybrid corn so attractive, is more prevalent with some crops than others, and is determined in part by the plant's method of reproduction. While hybrid corn is often markedly more productive, standard tomatoes and peppers may be little different from their hybrid counterparts.
> "We've tested a thousand or so different hybrids," says Dr. Ernest Kerr, "but none of these were equal to the best standard varieties of tomatoes."
> Nevertheless, standard Canadian-bred tomatoes like Veeroma, Sub-Arctic Maxi and Moira may eventually disappear from the catalogues to make room for new, lucrative hybrids and patented varieties—hybrid or standard.

Maclean's of March of this year points out what happened in the United States last year in an article called "A harvest of toxin". It reads:

> Readers who waded through the exhaustively researched 6,500-word story—

> —learned that last summer's drought may have left up to 30 per cent of the United States' corn crop—which provides more than one-third of the world's supplies—contaminated with a natural toxin 100 times more deadly than industrial polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs).
> In fact, the story, in part at least, was already known to most American growers and processors of food, as well as to the Canadian agencies charged with safeguarding the country's food supply. They have known since last autumn that summer-long high temperatures and low rainfall produced ideal growing conditions for Aspergillus Slavus, a fungus that attacks ears and kernels of heat-weakened corn.
> There was less to reassure Canadians, however, about the safety of more than 340,000 tons of American corn—and no fewer than 32 varieties of processed corn ranging from cornmeal to tacos—imported in Canada each year. That corn is supposed to meet standards set by the United States Food and Drug Administration, Blewett told Maclean's. But, as Journal reporter Scott Killman noted, "Those who regulate grain elevators lack money and manpower."
> The Quaker Oats Co., which owns the world's largest cereal mill at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, tests six samples from each truckload of corn—and last fall was turning away as many as one in five because of aflatoxin contamination. The danger is greater for Third World consumers who are major buyers of U.S. corn, and often lacks sophisticated testing facilities or strict food-quality regulations. Indeed, medical journals record the deaths of about 100 people in Indian in 1974—

And it goes on. So we know what some of the problems are with some of these hybridized, highly patented and restricted varieties that are controlled by the chemical companies.

Tories do not want to talk about monopoly control, but let us have a look at the facts. There have been 1,008 corporate take-overs of seed companies since 1969. Many of the purchasers also sell fertilizers and chemicals. In the 1970s there were 30 companies that produced crop chemicals. Now there are about a dozen and within a decade the industry itself says there will only be six remaining. Under the European and U.S. PBR legislation, 90 per cent of all seed patents are held by a handful of multinationals. After the year 2000, it is forecast that from 10 to 20 major corporations will dominate the seed markets. Seed and fertilizer companies may continue to buy up and hold patents on seeds, making it harder for farmers in Third World countries to get the seeds they want. These companies are focusing greater research efforts on developing pesticide resistant seeds rather than pest resilient ones.

Let us take a look at how long this debate has been going on. I refer to an article written a decade ago by Carol Allen called: "Life is Not a Bed of Patents". This was written in respect, of course, to the now Conservative icon, Eugene Whelan—the Conservative icon on plant breeders' rights.

> What is the difference between patenting a tomato and patenting a light bulb?

That is a question that not too many Tories could answer.

> This question was put to me by a querulous Seed Trade Association officer who thinks we should permit patents and royalties on new plant varieties. He appears baffled that the idea of levying royalties in living, growing things, the source of human food, is repugnant to me.
> If he really does not understand the difference between living and inanimate matter, he must be vastly perplexed that his 30-watt bulbs do not seed themselves and grow into 100 watts. The self-evident fact is that no one invented the tomato. We do not "invent" life. Nevertheless, many industrial countries (the U.S. and the U.K. among them) do grant plant patents, euphemistically called plant breeders' rights or PBRs. Since Bill C-32, which would give such rights to Canadian breeders, has been placed on the parliamentary order paper by Agriculture Minister Eugene Whelan, this particular bit of lunacy could become a domestic reality unless we scrutinize its implications. The fact is, we may be about to leap on the band wagon just as others, chastened by experience, are preparing to leap off.
> Agriculture Canada insists patents are just basic human rights extended to breeders and that they will not affect farmers significantly. But farmers in other countries who have lived with patents are already disillusioned. Swedish, Swiss, U.S., British and German farmers, for instance, are disgruntled about higher seed prices.
> Since the advent of patents and the move away from public breeding in the U.S., the National Farmers' Union has complained that seed prices rose 150 per cent between 1972 and 1977, more than any other component of the agricultural inputs. Many of the new patented varieties of seeds, though they do produce higher yields, are more vulnerable to disease.
> Furthermore, wherever patents exist or are pending, they have created a virtual stampede to the seed business by multinational chemical and pharmaceutical corporations in pursuit of royalties. Small seed companies are vanishing as motes into a vacuum run by companies like Ciba-Geigy, Upjohn and Royal Dutch/Shell. In the last decade, roughly 40 small U.S. seed companies engulfed in this acquisitive romance. In Canada, Stewart Seeds is now owned by Ciba-Geigy, while Warwick Seeds is owned by Pfizer.

It all makes corporate sense, but not necessarily good farm policy. What could be more manifoldly profitable than to market seed, fertilizer and pesticide, all neatly interdependent, from one tidy carpetbag? But do we really naively expect the seed arm of a multinational corporation to search eagerly for a patentable variety of plant that requires little input from its pesticide and fertilizer arms?

Patents attract multinationals: multinationals flourish by mass-marketing uniform products, not by custom-tailoring products to small, specialized markets like Canada. Two thousand traditional vegetable varieties were dropped last June from the European Common Catalogue. Britain alone lost 500 vegetable varieties in July when the country's seed regulations made it a crime (punishable by a fine of 400 pounds) to sell or catalogue any variety not on the list.

I suppose this will be the next step by the Tories.

It is estimated that Europe is faced with the loss of three-quarters of its vegetable material in the decade.

Yet Eugene Whelan and Bill C-32 are still holding hands. As prominent a body as the Food and Agricultural Organization Secretariat to the United Nations opposes patents because they restrict free exchange of information and plant material among world breeders. An internal FAO document also states that patents have resulted in monopolistic practices, crop epidemics in the Third World and a narrowing of the genetic base upon which all plant life rests. And this in a field where tolerances are astonishingly thin: though there are 300,000 higher-order plants on the planet, more than 90 per cent of human nutrition derives from only 30 of them; only 30,000 have been studied, and by the turn of the century 50,000 may have vanished forever. Nevertheless, Canada ignores the warnings of informed bodies such as the U.S. National Farmers' Union and blithely considers turning over this fragile balance to a multinational-dominated business.

Why should Canada join this demonic parade to genetic wipeout? To be as neglected in the global seed market as we are in the pesticide field, where we make do with the products designed for warmer climates and larger markets? Make no mistake: in the political world of multinational agri-business, a tasteless tomato can bounce pinkly through a harvester like an Indian-rubber ball and survive a 2,000 Km truck trip undented and collect royalties will win every time over a tastier, more nutritious but squashable and unpatentable tomato. Mass production and mechanization have already produced the rubberized tomato and make traditional varieties shockingly scarce. They have also routed 6,000 small Canadian growers in the last 25 years.

Greater profits and increased uniformity are not everything.

Quality counts, as does designing a crop for its growing conditions; as does, most crucial of all, preserving old plants in the genetic pool that we may need to correct our mistakes. To say nothing of the quaint notion that many of us share that living plants should be accessible to all humankind, without royalties.

This is what I consider to be a truly excellent article by Carol Allen.

There is a growing coalition to which the Government does not want to listen. Let me just give one final quote from a letter by Susan McIntosh, the Coordinator of the Grow Coalition on Pesticides. In 1988, the economists reported:

> Chemical companies have spent $10 billion or so in as many years buying up seed companies worldwide—

She lists Pioneer Hi-Bred, Sandoz, Dekalb-Pfizer, Upjohn, Limagrain, Shell Oil, ICI, Ciba-Geigy, Orson and Cargill as the world's ten largest seed companies.

> Seven of these ten are also involved in crop chemicals and at least six sell seeds in Canada already. This trend will escalate if PBR should become law.

No Member of Parliament, no Canadian citizen should support Bill C-15 as it is proposed. It is a scurrilous and wrongful Act.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to rise again in the House and have a major debate for our fellow Canadians to judge us all by.

This is a Bill that should have been passed by this Parliament, I submit, at least 10 years ago. The question is really whether Canada and young Canadians are going to participate in the future of the world because biotechnology is here, plant breeders' rights are here and it is not going to go away. The question then is which Party can best take Canada into the 21st century.

The question then is which Party can best take Canada into that 21st Century. If the NDP had been in control of this country when the industrial revolution came about, we would not have participated. When we switched from water to rail, from rail to airplanes and trucks and cars, Canada would not have played a part in it if the NDP—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Thacker: The NDP are clearly more than neo-conservatives—nothing would have ever happened the first time.

Mr. Funk: We would be a country like Japan.

Mr. Thacker: I would like to see the New Democrats get back to its roots when it was thinking of the future and coming up with ideas. They were reformers. It was interesting and a lot of us were excited by many of the reforms they came up with. Now you dare not change the time of day without having the NDP up yelling at you.

An Hon. Member: There are no farmers over there. What are you talking about?

Mr. Fisher: Hey, hey!

Mr. Thacker: We were through this same debate in the last Parliament over drugs. And before we get into that, what really let the western world develop so that even people who were classified as being in poverty live a standard of life that is higher than aristocracy and how kings and queens lived 200 years ago?

Mr. Funk: That is because of the Wheat Board.

Mr. Thacker: That indicates the level of debate which some of the NDP Members are able to achieve. They think that nationalizing everything is the answer.

Mr Funk: Don't you like the Wheat Board? It must be doing something right.

Mr. Thacker: They honestly hold that view. In spite of the fact that in every socialist country of the world socialism has failed and failed dismally.

What was the secret, Mr. Speaker? As you well know, it was when we tried that experiment in the western world. It was to say to people "You can own a piece of property. You have the fundamental right to speak. You have the fundamental right to association and you have the fundamental right if you come up with something new and creative, whether it is an industrial design, a piece of music, or whether it is a car or a truck, you have the right to own that and for a period of 17 years you get to develop that product and collect a royalty if someone else wants to build it".

Under that system of private property, of land, fundamental rights, including the rights to patents, we developed wealth and created a lifestyle that has put all of us at a standard of living that is truly incredible. But it all goes back to those fundamental rights.

Then governments came along. During the 1970s, because some drug companies were charging too much, different nations responded in different ways. Some of them took away their patent rights, which is the way Canada went. Other countries handled things in a different way. They put in price review boards so that they were more regulated. Canada took away those patent rights and we lost tens of thousands of high tech jobs. We got that fixed up in the last Parliament. Now young Canadian men and women can come out of our universities and colleges, take specialized training, do the research and create this new wealth for the 21st Century, Mr. Speaker. It is exactly the same way with patents.

Let me ask the NDP this: what other countries now have plant breeders' rights. You would think that it is all going to go away. It is not going to go away. You either play in the modern world or you become a has-been. Do you want to have Canada as a Third World country? Do you want to have no jobs for your young people, especially the bright ones?

Mr. Fisher: You either steal from the Third World or you don't survive.

Mr. Thacker: What about Australia, Belgium, Denmark, France, all socialist nations? Then there is the Federal Republic of Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, New Zealand, many being socialist. What about Spain and Sweden? Great Sweden. The New Democrats continually push Sweden as their example of Utopia.

Mr. Fisher: You said socialism was a failure. Now you are praising it.

Mr. Thacker: The New Democrats push Sweden on us from every angle. Sweden has plant breeders' rights. Why should the Swedish people get jobs and the small royalties rather than us? On that point of royalties, Mr. Speaker, it permits a proprietor to collect a royalty. Estimates are about $4 million a year. Royalties go back into research and development. If we had had ten years of this we would have had over $40 million worth of research. If we had had a 4 per cent royalty on canola, which was developed in Canada and is now marketed all around the world, we would have had no trouble financing all the research and development in the entire Department of Agriculture. We could have dozens of plant varieties like that. Canadians understand that the New Democrats will permanently lock this country into a state of underdevelopment whereas the Progressive Conservative Party will take it into the 21st Century and create the wealth so that our children and grandchildren will be able to have the same high standard of living that we have. That is a benefit to this nation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fisher: Just like Sweden.

Mr. Thacker: I could go on.

Mr. Fisher: Please do.

Mr. Thacker: There is this talk of uniformity as if there is something wrong with uniformity. That is what Marquis was. That is what Thatcher grain was. They are all uniform crops. We have millions and millions of acres that we grow with uniform crops and we feed the world because of Canadian research and development.

The New Democrats would block that research and development and as a result we would slowly fall further and further behind. It is a question of whether things will be done by public or private people. Canada is a young country still charging up the mountain and creating wealth, and the New Democrats would make us old before our time. They do not want corporations or private individuals to do anything. With the New Democratic Party everything would be done by a government.

Let us look at what has happened in Argentina. Why don't the New Democrats read the history of Argentina? It got further and further into crown corporations and government control. Only 60 per cent of Argentina's industry was controlled by government but that brought on deficits and a national debt which led to hyper inflation. Argentina cannot get out of the mire. That situation has happened in dozens and dozens of countries. The trail is deficits, high debt, high interest rates and then hyper inflation. That is what the New Democratic Party's policies would do to this country, Mr. Speaker. We are not going to let it happen.

The debate by the New Democrats goes back to anti-profit. God, they cannot stand it if someone makes a profit in spite of the fact that they themselves have enormous profits just from their own salaries. They have savings too. They don't spend everything they make. Then they go after big corporations, especially multinationals. Their final glory is socialism, in spite of the fact that tens of millions of people are trying to get into this country to get away from socialism and the totalitarian aspect of socialism.

New Democrats are not content to take over part of the economy, they want to remake men and women into the perfect ideal as was done during the French Revolution that led to massive slaughter.

That is what happens when we get down that road to socialism.

An Hon. Member: They are against immigration now.

Mr. Thacker: Against immigration too. My gosh, at 11.10 at night, the NDP Members go absolutely berserk on us. I do not know what gets into them. It must be late.

It is a fundamental question and Canadians will listen to the debate on second reading when it gets into the committee stage. I want to have no doubt at all that I think that some of our churches and the NDP have blocked this Bill for far too long. By the time we get it through, once again Canada will be 10 to 15 years behind. That has been the problem with this country. We are always too far behind. We have to get ahead of the game so that we can continue to have the high standard which we have enjoyed. When the Liberal Party was the once mighty Liberal Party and it was prepared to create wealth and then at the same time be fair on the redistribution of that wealth, it was a great Party and many of us voted for the Liberal Party and were proud to be a part of it. It has let itself go down that socialist path. It might as well join with the NDP gang because it has no original creative thoughts. It is only the Progressive Conservative Party that has them now, and with the creation of wealth we believe in that Conservative principle. It has to be done by individuals and private enterprise.

Of course, we have a progressive aspect to redistribute, to tax away from the people who do well to provide for the people who are truly needy. That is what developed this country into a great country. The Liberal Party played a role in that for some time but they have not done so for the last 15 years. In spite of the fact that they brought in the Bill originally, they are now standing up and opposing it. They must have a hard time swallowing that. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I will look forward to this Bill passing.

Mr. Soetens: On a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Ontario on a point of order.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, the news media in Canada has tremendous ability not only to report the news but to make the news. It was just announced on CTV not five minutes ago that earlier this evening this House had adjourned for the summer. I find it rather interesting. I hope it was a portent of things to come this evening.

My point really is to make sure the House Leaders here are aware that we have already adjourned for the evening and that they get the message. The speeches which you have heard from the Progressive Conservative Party are of course live. I cannot comment on the others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Prince Albert—Churchill River. I know he is alive.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to lead off the late show tonight for the benefit of those of us who are still here participating in this important debate.

It is an interesting debate for a New Democrat or any Member from Saskatchewan to be participating in because it very much parallels what is a very hot debate in that province. That is the debate between two competing visions which are becoming more and more clearly into focus.

Mr. Schneider: One is foresight and the other one is hindsight.

Mr. Funk: The Hon. Member for Regina Wascana (Mr. Schneider) said one is foresight and the other is hindsight. Those are my sentiments exactly.

I do not think the Members opposite do know any more and that is why I think they will no longer be the government of Saskatchewan, for example, after the next provincial election. I will put any money on that, although I am not a gambling man. What this debate is all about is the privatization of seed versus a vision of the modern family farm which can survive a corporate onslaught which the Progressive Conservatives are unleashing on the farm community.

As I stand up to speak here tonight, I am not only standing up as the Member for Prince Albert—Churchill River, approximately 20 per cent of that population are farm families. There are quite a few of them because they are relatively small farms, probably averaging four quarters of land in our constituency. About half of the farmers are combined income farmers and work off the farm. It does maintain a large rural population, with 3,000 people in the area of Buckland alone.

I speak also as a Member of the Spruce Home wheat pool committee, something I have been on since 1975 when I moved there. My father was the chairman of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool committee in Laird, Saskatchewan for 46 years, which I think is the record tenure for any president in that job within the wheat pool. He fought very hard to keep the railway, when Ray Hnatyshyn, the former Member for Saskatoon West, who was defeated in Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, was their Member. That was one of the reasons. He promised that if the Progressive Conservatives were elected there would be heavy steel on the rail line to Laird. That steel is still not there. The elevator company no longer has the confidence on that point and is letting it run down. My dad feels that his 46 years as chairman of the wheat pool has gone down the drain because of the type of philosophy that is embedded in this Bill.

It is not because I believe that profit is a dirty word or that Members on this side of the House believe that profit is a dirty word. It is a methodology that from time to time Conservatives do manage to sell. They sold it successfully in 1982 in Saskatchewan. They sold it again in the last federal election to a large portion of the population, certainly not though in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and the Maritimes. Nevertheless, they do sometimes try and convince people that people on this side of the House, be they New Democrats or Liberals, somehow or other with New Democrats profit is a dirty word.

There are all kinds of business people who are members of the New Democratic Party, including the MLA for Prince Albert—Duck Lake, whose campaign I managed and who had strong support from the Prince Albert business community. When we speak of Prince Albert, that is the seat that I represent. I do not have to remind the Members whose seat that was up until 1979, until his death: the Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker. The first election I remember hearing anything about is when I went to the polls with my dad at the Ebenfeld school in 1957. I had the feeling in that election that my dad voted for John Diefenbaker. We were in that constituency. Years later, it turned out that he had. That was something he did because he believed in John George Diefenbaker, as a lot of people in that part of the country did.

The reason they believed in John Diefenbaker in 1957 is because of what happened in this House when an arrogant Liberal government at that time invoked closure for one of the few times in Canadian history in the pipeline debate. John George Diefenbaker led the charge, not only in this House but in the country. There were a lot of people from all kinds of different philosophies who followed him.

That is why I am saying to these Hon. Members opposite that their use of closure is starting to remind me a bit of an acquaintance of mine whose marital philosophies are other than mine. I was asking the acquaintance, in a discussion of our mutual lives, why it was that he did not feel guilty in the course of the romances he pursued. He said that the first and second time he felt a little guilty, and by the third time it was pretty well passing. He no longer felt guilty about the kind of relationships he was carrying on. I guess I could understand that. I knew the person fairly well.

That is the way the Members opposite have become about closure. They have used it once, they got away with it in free trade, so all the way through this session it is closure, closure, closure. It is not a crisis like the pipeline debate was. Nobody is arguing that. I think the fall of this Government in the polls—we are not high either, but the Government has fallen very dramatically—is because of the perception that is spreading through the country that there is an element of arrogance and shoving things down people's throats about this Government that they just simply do not like.

I could understand why closure was being brought in if there were some kind of crisis in the country. If we had just got through this seeding season and the farmers had run out of seed, and there was not good seed for the people to sow, then there would be a crisis in the country that would perhaps justify taking a radical measure like this on an issue which is not particularly earth-shaking as far as the general health of the country is concerned, but it is an important symbolic issue. There is no crisis. We do not need new seed next year or the year after. We are doing very well.

Is there a crisis in production? There is no crisis in production. We had a problem with drought last year and we are still working out the details of that. Canadian farmers can produce. The Canadian research establishment has done very well for us. We run one of the most modern and efficient farm economies in the world. That was with public seed production. That was with institutions like the Canadian Wheat Board. That was with a country elevator-based railway system. I do not think those ideas are particularly old fashioned. I think those ideas just do not fit in with the philosophy of Members opposite.

Another thing that would have called for closure is if there had been such a crisis that it required this kind of radical action. If the farmers themselves were clamouring for this legislation, it might have been justified. However, I have not seen any farmers marching on Parliament Hill lobbying for plant breeders' rights. Not one farmer from my constituency has written me a letter saying that he wants plant breeders' rights, and there are some former Conservatives in that constituency as well as plant breeders.

The Government says that it has consulted with farm groups. One of the authors of the very good report on Indian post-secondary education which came out tonight had a chance to see for himself what the people thought of the Government's consultation process. That is just one example, but he must also have talked to farmers who were members of the Alberta Wheat Pool, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Manitoba Wheat Pool, Unifarm or the National Farmers' Union. Farmers were not pleased when the Government took oats out of the Wheat Board. They did not think that they had been consulted.

We heard about pensioners being consulted on taxing away 100 per cent of the pension benefits, something which discriminates against them because all income should be treated alike. Why should pensions be treated any different from dividends, for example? The Government said it had consulted with pensioners.

Mr. Fisher: Couldn't name one, though.

Mr. Funk: My hon. friend points out that when asked to name one, that was the end of that argument.

Earlier in this debate, the Hon. Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia (Mr. Wilson) said that there were several reasons for this particular legislation. He said that one was to enhance our exports and another was to practice better husbandry. However, he offered no compelling argument other than that Conservative Members think that is true.

We are producing lots of grain for export and we could produce a lot more. We could invest more in plant breeding, and I think we should. It does not matter whether it is private or public investment. The point is that those resources should stay in the public domain so that seed is available to everyone as it has always been. Farmers can afford high quality seed. It is a national and international resource and should be treated as a public resource.

Then the Hon. Member said that some of the provisions in the Bill, including the 18 years of the patent's lifespan and the exchange of information, were because of an international convention that we needed to become a part of. The international convention is made up of those countries which, as the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) so eloquently outlined, took their cues from large multinational corporations and did their bidding. Sure enough, a farming system evolved which followed that kind of philosophy.

The Hon. Member mentioned 18 countries. What about the other 160 countries in this world? Only 12 per cent of the countries of this world belong to that convention. If we join that convention, we will have to play by the rules of those 12. If we become the lucky 13th, we will not be able to do anything with the other 159 countries where much valuable work is going on. If Hon. Members think we will be better off with the 12 than with the 159, they should check out which countries those are and what kind of agriculture they support.

The Hon. Member also said that this Bill was not related to free trade. He said that no matter what happens, if there is a tornado or some other natural catastrophe, Members of the Opposition will jump up and down and say it is about the Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Althouse: This isn't a natural catastrophe, this is a man-made one.

Mr. Funk: As the Hon. Member has pointed out, this is a man-made disaster, not a natural one. It is linked to the Free Trade Agreement, if not precisely to the language of the free trade legislation, though there is some evidence that that might well be true. This Bill represents a philosophy that is very much a part of free trade.

I fully accept the Hon. Member's criticism of people wrapping everything up in free trade, but that is because free trade is symbolic of the Government's whole philosophy, which is that large foreign corporations are more important than family farms, that the jobs of people in Ohio are more important than the jobs of people who work at the Inglis plant in Toronto. Those are the kinds of judgment calls Members opposite are prepared to make. Government Members will have to excuse us if, whenever we see that philosophy in action, we start talking about free trade. I think that is something Members opposite will have to get used to because Canadians everywhere see it in those same terms.

We have been told that we have to adopt this line of thinking to become competitive in the modern world. We have been told that the agricultural industry can only survive in the modern world if we adopt that kind of thinking. Government Members go so far as to say that Members who might oppose this Bill might be reactionary and might not want change or progress. That is relatively hard to take coming from a political tradition that has brought many of the institutions that have contributed immeasurably to the agricultural wealth of Canada, ideas like the Canadian Wheat Board which a Conservative Government brought in. The Hon. Member said that it was an old-fashioned idea which symbolized the NDP, and I think in some ways it does. We do not think that the Wheat Board is old fashioned, we think it is doing very well. If Canadian farmers are to beat American farmers, they will do it through the Canadian Wheat Board, not through Cargill, because Cargill has a conflict of interest. We are better off with our own Wheat Board, and I think most farmers believe that as well.

The difference between us is whether we see the farm community as being composed of owner-operators and large enough numbers of them to support small communities, or whether the rural community is seen as a series of large agri-business corporations. We think that the modern approach to the Saskatchewan economy has to be that the small farmers have access to the technology, the capital and the export opportunities as well as the large farmers. It is becoming very clear that with the philosophy of this Government, along with the philosophy of its colleagues in the Saskatchewan legislature, that kind of small farming community will no longer exist and the Government makes no apologies for that.

The reason I am opposing this Bill is because I want to see a competitive modern farm sector in Canada. With the Progressive Conservative approach, we will not get that.

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House at this late hour to speak to Bill C–15, Plant Breeders' Rights. This legislation is long overdue. Plant technology has changed as much in the past 25 years as have medical advances and computer technology.

Canadian farmers are demanding hardy, high–yielding seeds and plants that work in concert with modern farm management practices. To compete in the world market, Canadian farmers require seeds that are stable and predictable, that have a specified growing period and that are disease and pest resistant.

These seeds are the result of extensive research and years of experimentation. Currently, the bulk of this expensive, painstaking research is done by Agriculture Canada and universities. The private sector has been unwilling to put time and resources into research whose results are not protected by law. Canada lacks a legal mechanism to protect the inventors of new and better varieties of plants and seeds. This need has not gone unrecognized. Plant breeders' rights have been advocated by a number of agricultural groups in Canada since 1923, when it was recommended by the Canadian Horticultural Council that legislation protecting plant breeders' rights be created. More recently, plant breeders' rights legislation was introduced in the House of Commons in 1980 and 1988.

The Bill now before the House dealing with plant breeders' rights has the same intent as the previous Bills. The purpose of the legislation is to grant the breeder of new varieties of plants control over the multiplication and the sale of productive material. The breeder will be entitled to a royalty if others sell the variety he has produced. The rights in this case work like a patent or copyright.

The implementation of plant breeders' rights in Canada will have a positive impact. The beneficial effects will include increased investment in plant breeding by both public and private sectors; improved varieties available for Canadian producers from both Canada and from other countries; and a return of royalties on Canadian varieties sold at home and abroad.

Plant breeders' rights legislation applies to new, distinct varieties. Varieties already on the market are not eligible for protection. Once a new variety comes on the market, a breeder cannot prevent others from using it in breeding programs.

The demands of the modern world, complete with pollution, international subsidy wars, and highly technical agricultural practices, make the protection of plant breeders' rights absolutely necessary to encourage the development of high–yielding, disease–resistant crops. This legislation is designed to encourage research and plant breeding in Canada.

One of the most important benefits of plant breeders' rights legislation is that it offers financial incentives to the private sector to become involved in plant breeding. Presently, the majority of research and plant breeding is done by universities and Agriculture Canada. Unfortunately, those institutions cannot keep pace with the world–wide gains in plant technology.

To date, the private sector has steered clear of plant breeding research because their results would not be protected. This legislation will encourage the private sector to become involved in research. The royalties from the sale of seed or plants would ensure research funding on both a public and private level. In this way, Canada can be competitive on the world agricultural market.

Ten years ago while visiting Britain, I had occasion to visit canola test plots. The British refer to them as trials. The area covered 100 acres, and was owned and operated by the research division of a seed retail company. Of course, in England, plant breeders' rights legislation exists and the private sector receives royalties on plants.

Competition between the organizations involved in the development of new varieties of plants will ensure that seed prices are not substantially increased. Any cost increase in new varieties would be offset by the benefits of improved yields and increased disease and pest resistance.

There are also safeguards in the legislation to prevent excessive pricing or restrictions of seed supplies. Farmers will always have the option of using their own seed, using unprotected seed, or using the protected new varieties. I believe that many farmers will be willing to pay a little more at the outset to reap the advantages of new varieties.

In the late 1970s when I was with the Alberta Agriculture Research Council, the Alberta Government, together with a number of other provinces and Agriculture Canada, spent large sums of money on plant breeding and research of rapeseed. As a result, the canola plant was developed. This development was beneficial to producers and consumers. For farmers, it was a cash crop and allowed them to diversify. Canola seed-crushing plants were built to produce canola oil for cooking and meal for animal feed. Canadian consumers had a Canadian-made oil second to none in the world for quality and at very competitive prices. Canola became the Cinderella crop of western Canada. We were able to capture 65 per cent of the oil and fats market in Canada. That is an outstanding achievement. If there had been plant breeding rights at the time of the canola development, the private sector would have played a large role in the research and development, thus saving taxpayers millions of dollars.

Canada is one of the agriculturally developed countries that does not have legislation protecting plant breeders' rights. Canada now is in a position to learn from the experiences of other countries and implement the very best and most effective legislation. Most countries have noted very positive effects. For example, the United States documented, 10 years after the implementation of plant breeders' rights, that the legislation provided farmers and consumers with a large number of plant varieties yielding larger and better quality crops. In addition, the United States found that the plant breeders' rights inspired the private sector plant breeding that resulted in the development of more and better varieties of plants.

Certainly, the United States is not alone in recognizing the benefits of plant breeders' rights. Australia implemented legislation in 1987. The International Convention for the Protection of New Varieties of Plants established an international union to protect plant breeders' rights. The international union has some 18 of the leading agriculturally developed countries in the world as members. Plant breeders' rights legislation has found tremendous support in Canada's agriculture sector. Nationally, the supporters of plant breeders' rights include the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Canadian Horticultural Council, SeCan Association, the Canada Seed Growers Association, and a number of other associated groups.

In closing, let me emphasize the importance of plant breeders' rights to all Canadians, producers and consumers. I strongly believe that this legislation is imperative to the future well-being of Canadian farmers.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, tonight we have had an opportunity to see very clearly what is wrong with Canadian politics. Let me start first with the disingenuousness of the Liberals who have had the nerve to rise and criticize this piece of legislation. Granted, some of them were new Members, and perhaps the old Members have not told them what the Liberal position used to be on plant breeders' rights. I have been around here for a while. I remember that the Liberals were intending to bring in this legislation prior to their defeat in 1979, and had it on their legislative agenda from 1980 to 1984. The fact that they can get up and make the kind of speeches that they have been making tonight goes to show one of the major problems of Canadian politics, that is, the insincerity, the duplicity, the hypocrisy of the Liberal Party when it comes to this and many other issues.

An Hon. Member: Rip Van Winkle.

Mr. Blaikie: The Liberal Members who are upset about this happen to be sitting on the other side of the House at this moment, which seems to me to be a great symbol of just exactly what I am talking about.

I listened with interest, as I always do, to the Hon. Member for Lethbridge (Mr. Thacker), whose former riding was Lethbridge—Foothills. That used to be the name of his riding. I have not quite mastered all the names of the new ridings.

I think he puts the government case very well. I do not agree with the government case for this particular legislation. However, as I listened to the Hon. Member from Lethbridge he started out by giving us an interpretation of Canadian history which is fundamentally flawed. He said that the way we built this country was only through individual enterprise, through the exercise of private property and entrepreneurs taking risks—the whole Conservative mythology about how Canada came into being.

The fact of the matter is that that is not how the country came into being at all. If one wants to be an advocate of that particular view of private property, and how economic activity is generated, and how particular countries have been built, then that is fine. However, do not distort Canadian history in order to make the case. The fact of the matter is that the country developed as a result of a very creative mix of both public money and political vision and private property and private investment, the CPR being an example thereof, as well as Canadian institutions, Crown corporations and other things we have come to see as part and parcel of the fabric of the country, like the Canadian Wheat Board for example. These do not conform to the Tory mythology about how Canada was built.

They are making a serious error when they get up and try to lead us to believe that that is how the country came into being. They may want to take the country in a particular direction—that is fine. It is their right to argue for that direction. It is the right of the Government to bring in legislation which takes us in that direction. However, please do not pretend that this is perfectly in keeping with Canadian history because Canadian history is something else all together.

Our argument on this side is that the public sector, whether it be in the form of Crown corporations or in the form of research done by universities and government Departments, have played a vital role in making us the kind of country that we are today. Many of the victories that we have won in the agricultural sector, whether it is the more recent one concerning canola or whether it is other former victories with respect to the development of various kinds of wheat, are things that happened because there was a public commitment to this kind of research and because the results of that research were made widely available. All this happened without the desire for profit that the Hon. Member from Lethbridge says is so absolutely indispensable to anything good happening.

The fact of the matter is that societies can do good, productive and creative things without being motivated purely by money. I know that goes against the Conservative view of the world. The fact is that many good things have happened in this country without that kind of motivation. What we are saying is that we would like to preserve the mix of public and private, of things still being done for the good of the country or for the good of agriculture, or as the case may be.

The Member from Lethbridge says that we do not want to enter the modern world, that the NDP wants to keep the country back from modernity. If the kind of modernity that the Conservatives want us to enter into is a world in which everything is motivated only by the desire for profit, in which everything is regulated by the market-place, then, yes, that is the kind of world that we do not want to enter into and that we do not want our country to enter into. Unfortunately, that is the way of the world. The Member from Lethbridge is right about that. The question is whether or not in Canada we are going to acquiesce to these global trends, whether we are going to have what I would call an accomodationist stance toward these global trends, or whether we are going to, in concert with other countries, resist these global trends.

It may be difficult to do this. It is going to be particularly difficult for us to do this after the Free Trade Agreement because the Free Trade Agreement for many of us is the symbol of Canada giving up on that tension between public and private, giving up on a mixed economy, giving up on what has made Canada a particularly successful country.

I think members of the Government should remember that the kind of country that we have is not the kind of country that has been created only by individual enterprise. It is the kind of country that has been created by this creative mix of the public and private sector. What they have done through their actions in the Free Trade Agreement and through this action, and through many other acts that they have taken and some that they still plan to take, has broken that tension. From here on in it is the market-place alone. If that is the kind of brave new world that the Government wants to lead us into, then we make no apologies for resisting that brave new world.

What is that new world all about? It is about control. It is about who is going to make the decisions that determine the very nature, in this case of plant life, on the planet. I cannot for the life of me understand why Conservatives who are very concerned about government control, who are very concerned about unaccountable power, want to turn over to a handful of global corporations the power to determine the whole botanical life of the planet. On what possible grounds would people who are concerned about excessive control by anyone want to do that?

Yet that is what the Government is asking us to do in this particular instance. It wants to worsen a situation that is already with us. That is the fact of these large global corporations, which as far as I am concerned are analogous to the biblical powers and principalities. These are the institutions which in a very short time will control everything, if there is not a will on the part of Governments to defend the public interest, whether that is the environmental public interest, or, in this case, the genetic public interest in terms of preserving various kinds of species or plant species in the Third World or elsewhere. We have this very tragic trend in absolutely the wrong direction.

It is all part and parcel of the globalization of the economy. With that globalization has come increasing concentration of power. These are the people who want to talk about competition all the time. However, their policies lead to more and more concentration of unaccountable power, global corporations which are accountable to no one, which have assets in many cases bigger than any nation state in the world, corporations which can play one country off against the other, one province in a country off against the other, one state off against another. This is called free enterprise. This is called freedom. This is not freedom. This is the newest and most diabolical form of tyranny that one can imagine, that this kind of power should be in private hands and should be beyond the reach of Governments and that the only occasion on which Governments become involved is to facilitate this kind of control, which is exactly what this Government is doing tonight by bringing in this legislation.

I think it is unfortunate that the Government will get away with this. It has been a long battle. One of the first speeches I made in the House of Commons in the fall of 1979 was on this particular issue, when the Conservative Government of the day tried to bring it in. We have seen since then how the Government has succeeded in doing this with respect to drug patent laws. Now it is doing it with respect to seeds for plant breeders' rights. I heard the Hon. Member from St. Albert, I believe, say that public investment will continue. We heard that during the debate about the drug patent laws.

Mrs. Sparrow: And it is. Admit it.

Mr. Blaikie: Not public investment. One of the first things that happened after the drug patent law was passed is that Connaught Laboratories, which used to be a publicly owned corporation and something of which Canada was proud because of its good research, was sold to an American company. That really helped a lot. That was part and parcel of the vision of Canada the Conservatives say they will preserve.

Mrs. Sparrow: You don't like success.

Mr. Blaikie: The Member from Calgary says that I do not like success. I do not call having all the new kinds of plant life in the world owned by a handful of corporations success. She and I have a different view of what success amounts to. I don't think success is something that can be measured in terms of the quarterly or annual profit margins of a variety of different multinational companies.

I do not believe it is success to carry vertical integration to its extreme so that there would be what I call bio–integration, the same multinational corporation owning everything, beginning with the seed put in the ground. It will be bred to use that company's herbicides, to respond only to its fertilizers—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fisher: It's happening.

Mr. Blaikie: All the way from the furrow in which the seed is placed to the kitchen table owned by the same multinational corporation. If the Member from Calgary calls that success, then I reject that success. I call it tyranny. It is turning over our lives to a handful of unseen people in a boardroom who make decisions about the whole country while we sit here and have to listen to people like her call it success. It is disgusting. That is not success, it is failure of the worst possible kind.

It is failure to imagine a world in which people can do things co-operatively, through the public sector, and do things as part and parcel of a vision of what the country should be rather than how institutions can make money in the country or the world by developing a monopoly on new kinds of seeds, drugs or whatever the case may be.

We managed to be very successful in many respects with the Government involvement. The Government was involved, along with universities in the development of canola. Is the Member saying that was a failure?

The Member for Calgary Southwest (Mrs. Sparrow) is so psychologically damaged by the National Energy Program—

Mrs. Sparrow: You are right.

Mr. Blaikie: —that she cannot imagine anything good happening in the public sector. In the name of that paranoid reaction to the National Energy Program, the whole damn country is to be destroyed in order to satisfy Tories from Alberta who developed an aversion to the public sector in the early 1980s. For that, the whole country has to go down the drain. It is disgusting.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CSIS—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the Parties. I think you will find unanimous consent from me to put the following motion immediately, and for it to be voted on without debate. I move:

That, pursuant to Section 56 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Services Act and Section 7 of the Security Offences Act,

That, a special committee of the House of Commons be appointed to be the committee to undertake a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act with a committee empowered to meet after July 16, 1989, and with the committee to report no later than July 16, 1990; and

That, the committee have all the powers of a Standing Committee and;

That, the membership of the said special committee to be as follows;

Mr. Thacker, (chairman), and Messrs, Brewin, Horner, Lee, Littlechild, Nunziata, Tremblay (Lotbinière), Tetreault.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the Hon. Government House Leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PLANT BREEDERS' RIGHTS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-15, an Act respecting plant breeder's rights, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to rise on a point of order while the Government House Leader is still here. He has introduced a closure motion tonight and has sought to limit debate on the Bill before us. I know that there are a great number of Members who would still like to address the House on this matter. Would the Government House Leader be prepared to seek unanimous consent of the House to extend the sitting beyond one o'clock so that Members who wish to speak could have an opportunity to do so?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, when I saw my learned friend speaking on plant breeders' rights, I knew it was time to call closure.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to put on the record clearly that there are 43 Members of the New Democratic Party in the House of Commons, and all 43 Members wish to speak at this stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Regina—Lumsden (Mr. Benjamin) has the floor.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I was particularly anxious when I had the floor that the Hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday), the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Belsher) and the Hon. Member for Lethbridge—Foothills (Mr. Thatcher) were here because I wanted to ask them a couple of questions about this Bill.

However, I am glad to see there are a couple of Hon. Members here who proclaim that they are Christians, who believe in a philosophy that they are their brother's keeper, who believe in the parable of the good Samaritan. They believe in the teachings of Christ.

I have not been known in my 21 years here to make speeches regarding religion. However, I want to submit to you tonight, after listening to all these Christians, bible thumpers, some of them born again, who support this legislation that it seems to me they have more than given hypocrisy a good name.

I find it difficult to question and really do not want to question the sincerity of the beliefs of my hon. friends and colleagues in the House, but with this legislation they do no more than increase man's exploitation of man. I do not give a tinker's damn how many other countries have gone this route of royalties on food.

I don't give a tinker's damn how many are socialist, capitalist, communist, or whatever. By the way, there are only 17 out of 160 nations in the world which would go along with this. There are a lot of Conservatives, a lot of so-called Liberals in the Canadian context, and even a few who claim to be NDP. I do not care what those other countries are doing. This is another case in which this country could set an example for the rest of the world, particularly our fellow men and women in the underdeveloped and poorer nations of this world who will pay dearly, not to mention how much our own food producers will pay.

We in the NDP recognize that there is nothing intrinsically wrong with making a reasonable profit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Where were you in 1937? That is what the CCF said. You couldn't have been a day over 60 then.

There is a difference, Mr. Speaker, between a reasonable profit and sheer, crass exploitation of people.

The reason I mentioned the Hon. Members for Oxford, Fraser Valley East, and Lethbridge Foothills is that I have received letters from them over the last number of years inviting me to prayer breakfasts. Don't any of you Tories ever invite me again to a prayer breakfast. Don't any of you do your praying in the morning at a breakfast and then pass legislation that flies in the face of the things that you pray for. The nerve. How dare you? It is bad enough to be a hypocrite but to flaunt it in the law of the land is a low not even reached by the Liberals, and they were the ones who started all this.

My new hon. friend from Thunder Bay—Nipigon was not here when the Liberals tried to put this through, and oh did they work at it. You should have heard those Christians on the other side. Some of the faces I see now, which look just as ugly as mine, were here then; some were not.

The Hon. Member for Lethbridge—Foothills had the unmitigated gall to mention Marquis wheat tonight. Who perfected Marquis wheat which saved wheat producers not only in Canada but in many other countries of the world for decades? It was Dr. Saunders.

Either listen or leave. I am trying to talk about the contribution of our country and the development of food production for the last 125 years.

Dr. Saunders developed Marquis wheat. Where did he develop it? It wasn't at the Kraft food company, it wasn't at Libby's, and it wasn't at any other corporation. It was at the Experimental Farms in Ottawa and Saskatoon, public operations. Dr. Saunders never asked for and never collected a royalty, neither did the Government of Canada or the Government of Saskatchewan.

The latest developments in canola came out of the Government experimental station in Saskatoon and the University of Saskatoon. That plant development is now available to everyone and no one is worried about royalties.

Surely if you claim to be a Christian, Mr. Speaker, you will believe that this is a public domain, that it belongs to all the people. God Almighty, why would you want to exploit the people in need, whether they are our own farmers, the farmers of other countries or, most important, the people in the nations of the world who starve? Why in God's name would you want to make it more costly for them to eat?

I would have expected that my hon. friend from Winnipeg—Transcona, a clergyman, might have made remarks I have made. I do not belong to any churches, but I think I am a Christian. I try hard to be a Christian and it is not easy. It is hard to watch others who claim to be Christians bring forward this kind of legislation which would go along with other countries that have made the same mistake. Surely that is less than this Parliament of Canada is worth.

I want to remind the House that all the major developments in the development of better food and better food production in this country and most other countries has never been done by private corporations. Invariably, even indirectly in the great U.S. of A., it has been done with public funding.

I would like to make a couple of alternative suggestions, Mr. Speaker. First, if the Government wants to pass a Bill, would it at least be Christian enough to amend it so that the Government of Canada collects all the royalties in this country and then passes on to the inventors only the cost of their invention including a decent living?

Another alternative would be to say to all the world that we will take the moneys from royalties and put them in a world-wide pool which would make available the latest developments in nutritious and healthful food.

For the last 20 years, the developments in rapeseed and canola occurred the University of Saskatchewan. What about our universities and our experimental farms? They get the royalties. What for? It would be for further experimentation.

Why should some damn corporation get it? We do not pass those costs on to farmers and to hungry people anywhere in the world. You just do not do that. If you claim to be a Christian you would not bring forth this Bill. I never meant anything more seriously in my life than what I am saying to now. I do not know how you could do such an unconscionable thing. Why?

I will not use the NDP moral statement about multinational corporations. Why would you want to minimize the opportunity of people to grow a lot of good food? Why would you want to limit it to only a few? Somebody from the Government should rise and tell me why they would want to do that. Whether it is an individual farmer in the Himalayan Mountains, somebody in Saskatchewan or New Brunswick or wherever, why minimize their ability to produce food unless they pay a certain number of dollars to buy the seed to produce that food? Would someone please explain why? Why in God's name would you want to do that?

It is not a question of what the hell do you think you are doing. It is a question of you better think about what the hell it is you are doing.

We had this argument with the previous Government. There were members from the Conservative Party who got up and said much of what I am saying. Why not say that this Bill shall stand at second reading and that the subject matter be referred to a Standing Committee on Agriculture or Science and Technology? I do not care; it could be looked into some more. I think that is the least we can do. I have avoided getting into all the great depths of the technology involved in plant breeding.

My final word is that I listened to a scientist the other night indicate that legislation includes genetic experimentation including human life. I thought he went a little bit far. He told us about various and sundry genes which as an ordinary prairie boy I did not understand completely. He told us how we could take certain genes and use them in terms of adjusting human existence. Once one gets into something like plant breeders' rights, I don't give a damn about a patent on a widget or a refrigerator. However, when you get into something like this, for goodness sake, think about it some more. You can't do this.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, for being somewhat emotional about this. It is not often I do that. I get angry, but tonight on this Bill, I am heartsick.

I close by saying to the three gentlemen from whom I get frequent letters and any other Member of this House who invites me to a prayer breakfast, claiming to be a Christian, claiming to support the teachings of Christ "Don't ever send me another invitation".

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in this House we always have activists, lobbyists, and other interested Parties who are constantly asking politicians to pass legislation. Often this legislation has to do with changes in technology such as this Bill before us today.

However, this is not a Bill that is tinkering with an established procedure. This is not a Bill that is ironing out a new wrinkle in an existing process. We are, on this Bill, breaking completely new ground. We are embarking on a new course.

Biotechnology is fundamentally different from any other aspect, any other Bill that this House has introduced before. This is a new technology. This is a technology that is codifying the development of new variety of species of plants.

Biotechnology, generally, deals not only with plants but certainly the development and improvements of animal species. In fact they present to us an opportunity for a better society. There are some very good benefits with respect to biotechnology. A better aspect of biotechnology is that of profits. This is an area of research and development that promises to provide those who are making the development massive profits. In fact, it has been said that it is going to be like a new unit of power.

We used to have, at one time, the gold standard. Now we will have the gene standard. Why do we want to move in such a direction? The answer is patently obvious. We want to move in that direction because we want to solve real problems that exist in society in this country and elsewhere in the world today. We want to prepare and develop a better world. We want to develop an easier life. Those are very laudable goals. Those are things that we all strive for. We must be careful in solving the problem that we do not create new and different problems, ones that are actually worse than the problems we are attempting to solve. My caucus and I have a concern with this particular Bill. The Government is endorsing a process and is setting out on a path that it does not comprehend. It does not realize what kind of road it is sending this country down.

Biotechnology offers us a means to solve many agricultural problems. It offers to solve production problems for farmers to provide better varieties of grain that will grow in shorter periods of time and avoid frost. It will provide better yields, allow producers to utilize new and other varieties that otherwise would not have been able to be used. It perhaps will provide the consumer with safer, cheaper and possibly healthier products. At the same time this technology threatens not to aid producers but make producers a slave to this new technology.

We are dealing here with plant life. This is the thin edge of the wedge of biotechnology. We welcome biotechnology if those who control and steer the direction of this instrument do so with the benefit of mankind in mind. This Bill dealing with plants only asks and presents some very fundamental questions. Who is controlling this new technology, the massed propagation of plants, plant tissue culture, the monocolonal antibodies and cell fusion?

Is it going to be the Ph.Ds that are working in universities, those who we expect are going to control that? That is not going to be the case. It is going to be a handful of large companies, so-called agri-business which are going to control, develop and monopolize this area, not only plant breeders' rights but later animal breeders' rights. We are just on the threshold of this massive technology which Canadians should not only look forward to but look forward to with some caution.

This has been the subject of much discussion and much debate. There have been numerous conferences held on biotechnology. Certainly one of the most well known was the 1987 Dag Hammarskjold seminar on the socio-economic impact of new biotechnologies on basic health in agriculture.

Let me state one of its conclusions. The greatest threat in the new biosciences is that life will become the monopoly property of a few giant companies. In the key countries the products and processes of biotechnology either are or are becoming patentable beyond the wildest dreams of the industrial barons of the past. The whole gene revolution is on the verge of becoming private property. Of all technologies this life derived technology must remain in the hands of the people.

This is a conclusion of a conference of scientists from around the world, scientists including people from Canada. In fact, the Government would have received a report from this conference. This Government has chosen to ignore these experts and individuals who devote their lives to science. This Bill codifies what the Hammarskjold seminar feared most.

We should be looking at plant breeders' rights and biotechnology, but we should be very careful about how that development proceeds. The Government has ignored that conference, those conclusions of world experts as it has ignored other experts in the world. If the goal of science is to serve humanity, then let science serve humanity.

Many countries are dealing with this problem. Members opposite spoke of this much earlier. They spoke of numerous countries, including the United States which has a tremendous influence and effect on Canada. The United States not only allows plant breeders' rights but also plant patents, plant cell culture, and engineered organisms.

The Americans have taken a step ahead of us. The United States considers a lack of patent protection to be an unfair trading practice. That was brought up at the GATT negotiations. Canada has been under pressure from the United States about the subject. The United States has demanded that Canada adopt similar laws to the United States for pharmaceuticals and plant varieties. You can see in the recent past that this Government caved in to U.S. demands on pharmaceuticals.

We had a nation that for 20 years had some of the cheapest drugs in the world. This benefited Canadians, but Canada passed a law providing protection for drug corporations.

Mr. Soetens: And it created all kinds of jobs.

Mr. Laporte: The Government promised that this type of legislation would create research and development and hundreds of jobs.

Mr. Soetens: Thousands.

Mr. Laporte: These jobs simply have not materialized.

Mr. Soetens: Come up to Ontario and I will point them out to you.

Mr. Laporte: The Government is now caving in to the pressure of the United States Government on plant breeders' rights. Mark my words, this is the beginning. Certainly there will be pressure from the United States to have treaties not just for plant breeders' rights but for animal breeders' rights. That would be the next stage. Perhaps legislation will be introduced next year or in the next session.

We want to improve the quality of life and have a better community, but this Bill does not provide the protection needed to guarantee the decent quality of life Canadians deserve and have come to expect.

Canadians attended the Hammarskjold seminar. Reports were presented to the Government which indicated that plant breeders' rights promised to increase production and reduce costs, but the conclusions of experts, not politicians, of people who work in that field and devote their life to it, said that that was not likely to be the case. They concluded that it will aggravate genetic erosion and likely to increase the dependence of farmers. It will further concentrate the power of transnational agri-business. In other words, there will be a concentration of power into fewer and fewer hands at the ultimate expense of producers.

There is more. Certainly plants go into producing a large number of drugs that are utilized in the pharmaceutical business today.

That is why it is not uncommon to have a company which is involved not only in pharmaceutical drugs or chemicals but also in seed production. This Bill simply allows them to further concentrate that monopoly which they are developing.

In health, Mr. Speaker, the drug companies will say that they will provide more effective diagnostic tools and new ways to prevent disease. The Hammarskjold Conference concluded differently. These experts and these people who devoted their lives to this type of work—and not politicians—have concluded that the pharmaceutical industry more likely will focus upon the most profitable opportunities and divert attention from basic health requirements. In other words, the bottom line. These are experts who have reported to government and who have lobbied governments. There is one tragic flaw and one tragic problem that these experts do not have. They do not have a lot of money. They do not have the power that the dollar bill brings when we are talking to people like Cargill and Shell Oil and other companies, like the Eli Lilly Company. Those are the companies to which this Government listens. Those are the groups on which this Government focuses its attention. That is who it listens and responds to, as opposed to experts and people in the field who are devoting their lives to this problem. That is what is wrong with this Bill.

Members opposite tonight with respect to plant breeders' rights, were saying that this will be a benefit to farmers and producers. It is already happening in other countries where plant breeders' rights has been established. Seed corporations who have patented their particular seed and who have the protection—and in this case it is going to be 18 years—are lobbying governments to say that farmers should not have the right to retain seed.

It is expected that in certain countries there will be the introduction of laws to demand that if farmers retain seed they should pay a royalty to the companies. Is that benefiting farmers? Is that a government which is doing what it can for the small producer? Is that a government which is devoted to maintaining agriculture and a rural structure? I do not think so. That is a government that is passing legislation that is simply going to concentrate the wealth of this nation into fewer and fewer hands. That is the difficulty that I have with this Bill.

The idea is fine, but it needs massive amendments. This is a government which is setting a dangerous and potentially destructive course for this country. The potential profits in this area are mind-boggling. There are millions and millions and millions of dollars to be made in this area. The potential benefits are there as well.

However, when a small group of corporations have a monopoly, they dictate what sort of production will be happening in the rural areas of this country. Contrary to Members' saying, "don't worry, don't worry", if this Bill is allowed to pass unamended, unchanged, it is going to be destructive to the family farms in this country. It is going to be destructive to rural Canada.

Members opposite talked before about when the Drug Patent Act was passed there would be jobs created in research and development, but they have not materialized in this country. They are not going to materialize under plant breeders' rights either.

These companies are in the business of making a profit. We cannot blame a company for being in the business of making a profit. Its shareholders appoint directors to work each year to make the company a profit. If those directors do not make that company a profit, those directors should be fired. That is how the system works and it is fair. There is nothing wrong with making a profit.

This Government should not be passing legislation which is simply giving the agri-business corporations of this world a licence to print money which is going to put a lot of dollars in their pockets and going to show a lot of increased revenue for those corporations. It is going to simply spell one more expense. It is going to mean one more expense for family farmers and one more in which they are being controlled. This is a government which talks about free enterprise. This is not free enterprise. When this materializes down the road, these corporations will have a say in what people plant, when they plant it and how they should plant it. That is the problem with this Bill.

These corporations are not trying to develop a plant which is resistant to various insects and other problems which exist in fields and in crops. Rather than developing a pest resistant variety, they are focusing on gene transfer for pesticide resistance because that is where the money is. If they can develop a crop variety and show that it produces well and convince producers to buy it, they will do that.

What will happen is that as varieties disappear, as they inevitably will, then producers will be forced to follow the tune that these agri-business companies maintain. That is the conclusion of the conference. That is the conclusion of experts who are concerned with this area.

This is a Bill which is only at second reading, thank goodness. I certainly hope that in committee we can effect some changes to the Bill and come back to this House with some recommendations so that it provides some protection for the producers of this land that does not give everything to agri-business and does not cave in to agri-business.

I and my colleagues will be working very hard to see that this Bill is either defeated, or if not defeated, that it is presented to this House in a fashion which reflects and represents and is responsive to the needs of average

Canadians and not agri-business. It is my hope that that will be the ultimate result of this Bill. The objective is the same, to provide a better lifestyle, a better world for all of us. This Bill is not a Bill for Canadians, it is a Bill for agri-business.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak to Bill C-15 at this late time and at the last event and speech that we will be giving in the House of Commons as we wrap up for the summer session.

We will have the opportunity of going home and seeing the wonderful plants that are growing which have been the fruits and work of many of our plant breeders.

We have heard many arguments against Bill C-15 over the course of second reading debate. Some have suggested that plant breeders' rights will destroy world gene resources or adversely affect less developed countries, or lead to the patenting of human life. Bill C-15 does not do these things, and during the course of debate, my hon. colleagues in the Opposition have at times forgotten what plant breeders' rights are all about.

Bill C-15 is about joining with 18 of our most significant trading partners in signing the international convention for the protection of plant varieties. Bill C-15 is about ensuring a place in the world for Canadian varieties so that Canadian efforts can be rewarded abroad. Bill C-15 is about allowing farmers and horticulturalists to import exciting new foreign varieties which are unobtainable until we have our own plant breeders' rights legislation.

Bill C-15 is about offering private breeders incentive to undertake this important work despite its risks and its expense. Bill C-15 is about ensuring that Canadian farmers have access to the best possible varieties, whether they be foreign, private or public. In short, Bill C-15 is about benefiting Canadian agriculture which in turn benefits all of us. When agriculture is prosperous, Canada is prosperous and everyone does well.

Let me begin with the suggestion that this is patent legislation. In fact, it is quite obvious that this is not patent legislation, nor will it lead to any. If it were, we would be debating an amendment to the Patent Act. Instead, we are discussing plant breeders' rights legislation.

Because the Government recognizes that this is a sensitive and complicated issue, we have chosen to deal with it separately. In such a manner, we believe we can best protect the interests of breeders, farmers and the country as a whole.

Equally, this Bill in no way authorizes anyone to patent human life forms. It merely allows plant breeders an opportunity to be rewarded for their hard work, and 18 years has been designated as the period of protection for a variety under Bill C-15.

There are a number of reasons for the choice of 18 years. Generally, out of one million initial crosses, plant breeders find only four potential varieties. These will take 10 to 15 years to develop at a cost of $3 million to $5 million. Out of this work will arise varieties which often last only a few years before they are superseded by other new plants.

It is essential that the really outstanding varieties help to pay the costs of plant breeding programs. There are varieties which have lasted well beyond the 18-year period. For example, Thatcher spring wheat was registered in 1935, Selkirk wheat in 1953, a red clover called Alataswede in 1923 and Climax, a timothy variety in 1947. Those of us in the agricultural industry know the value of Climax, one of the best timothys that has ever been developed in this great country. I think that says something for the early plant breeding programs and for the dedication of plant breeders many years ago who did not have the technology and tools to work with we have today in developing varieties.

After the 18 years, these successful varieties would, of course, become public, but if breeders are not given time to recoup their investment, seed prices would necessarily go up. Currently, in other countries with PBR, royalty rates are approximately 6 per cent to 8 per cent, but the length of protection is essential to maintaining this low level.

The Hon. Member from Regina said that he accepted the principle of royalties. A Member of the NDP said that, though he did not say how the royalties should be paid.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), has suggested that the period be reduced to seven years. Not only would this tend to have an inflationary effect upon prices but it would do nothing to improve our external situation.

We have indicated our intention to join the 18-member international convention so that we might enjoy the benefits of reciprocity with these major trading partners. Lowering our period of protection in this way would no longer meet the requirements of the convention and we could not ratify the agreement. We would remain incapable of securing foreign imports or of protecting our varieties abroad.

The absence of variety protection can also have a detrimental effect on the industry by artificially restricting and extending attempts to control seed. Contractual arrangements are currently made between growers and some seed companies in an attempt to ensure some return on their product. Members of the House of Commons who are farmers know that to grow a variety of seed that they know by name, they have to sign a contract to obtain that seed and they have to agree to return it back to that supplier because there is a lack of patent protection for the variety. To me, that makes a mockery of the system and is not fair to farmers because it restricts good seeds to certain individuals and puts us in an uncompetitive position.

This creates a great deal of paperwork and complicates matters for the grower and the company alike. The agreements have no cut-off. This Bill C-15 offers. Nor does the current situation allow the Government to intervene in the national interest. As well, foreign countries do not recognize this contractual agreement as a parallel system and will not enter into reciprocal agreements.

We need plant breeders' rights. I am very happy to see this legislation read the second time tonight and go to a legislative committee for deliberations. This issue has been debated for many years. Finally, it will provide great assistance to the agricultural producers in Canada in competing on the world market.

The Government has been far-sighted enough to ensure that some means exist by which we can maintain the system in an equitable manner. Clauses 32 and 33 provide for a compulsory license which could be granted in the event of unnecessarily high royalty rates or unfair distribution. This system is in place in many UPOV nations but its use has rarely been necessary.

The enforcement of this Act will not be applied to our grandmothers who wish to trade plant slips. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) referred to the clauses in the plant breeders' rights Bill relating to penalties for offences. He implied that the penalties applied to people giving away seeds of protected varieties, and this is not so. The offences in Bill C-15 relate to such issues as false representation and abuse of trust. They do not relate to the selling of protected varieties. If someone sells another person's protected variety, it is a civil and not a criminal offence.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I suggest that the Hon. Member who just misquoted me read Clause 6 of the Bill and Clause 51, the offence clause. He just misquoted the legislation his Government has brought in. I think that is quite improper and quite misleading to those viewing these proceedings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is debate. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has the floor.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say again that if someone sells another person's protected variety, it is a civil, not a criminal offence. It would be up to the owner of the rights to enforce his or her own rights, and that is quite clear in the legislation.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I know what the Hon. Member just said. What he said was false. It is improper for a Member of the House to impute false statements to another Member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary has the floor.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, to make compulsory automatic licensing as effective as possible, we have chosen the route of maximum flexibility. By selecting an advisory committee and implementing specifics by species with regulations, we have allowed for a system which will take the nuances of this vast nation into account. With this method, the unique situation of maritime potatoes will be handled in a manner different from that of Red Spring wheat or that of a new breed of red roses, or of any roses.

It has been suggested that those provisions are not enough, that multinationals will take over and gain a strangle-hold on our farmers. At this time, seed development and marketing in Canada is largely in public or small private hands. Large multinationals do not at this time play a significant role in the industry. The ongoing global process of mergers and diversification in all sectors may have an impact upon the industry, but this is not anticipated to be a direct result of plant breeders' rights legislation. There have also been suggestions that the chemical companies associated with those multinationals would try to breed varieties which are dependent upon specific pesticides and fertilizers.

Before I was elected to Parliament, I was the chairman of a marketing board in the Province of Ontario marketing white beans. In 1977 there were extreme weather difficulties in the same manner as we had a drought last year. In 1977, particularly in Ontario, there was a strain of enthracnals that was new and came into our white beans along with the wet weather. Our plant breeders responded very rapidly. We said that we were going to use chemicals to control the disease. However, within three years, our plant breeders worked together and chemicals were used for a very short time until a variety was bred with resistance to that strain of Delta enthracnals.

I know that we have dedicated public breeding programs in this country. I want to acknowledge the fine work that they do, and the effort that is being made to breed varieties with resistance to the many diseases that are there to rust and smut.

Mr. Milliken: How is this Bill going to help?

Mr. Cardiff: This Bill will help do all those things, because it will allow the plant breeder to recoup and put more dollars back into the development of the breeding resources, and resistance is as important as new varieties. Many times, it means taking present varieties and assuring their continued viability by breeding in resistance to the various sectors.

I do not know if the Hon. Member lives on a farm or is familiar with the growing of beans, barley, corn, or any of those products. I invite the Member to come to my farm and look at the crops that we grow. I would be very happy to have the Member come to western Ontario some time and look at some great crops in that area.

Mr. Milliken: I would be delighted to do so, and I will make a speech when I am there.

Mr. Cardiff: I invite the Hon. Member to come when we are baling hay.

Mr. Nunziata: Is that where you learned to shovel it?

An Hon. Member: You fork it, you don't shovel it. We have to teach these guys everything.

Mr. Cardiff: It has been suggested that those provisions are not enough, that multinationals will take over. I do not agree with that. The ongoing global process of mergers and diversification in all sectors may have an impact on the industry, but this is not anticipated to be a direct result of plant breeders' rights legislation. I want to reinforce that point, as much as I can.

The task of plant breeding is so complicated that it is highly unlikely a plant could be bred for a specific chemical. That is not what the interests of our plant breeding programs are, and have not been, and will not be.

In the event that this did occur, the variety would still require registration under the Seeds Act to verify its merits and suitability before it could be sold. There is a process of licensing before that could ever happen. There would also be competition in the market-place from other private breeders and public-sector programs that would be producing varieties without such limitations.

Ultimately, the decisions must rest with farmers. Those decisions should stay with the farmers, because they provide the bread-basket of this great nation of ours. Many of them came as immigrants, and perhaps for some people it may be a long time ago, but when one looks at world history, the farmers are pioneers. Many were our grandfathers or our great-grandfathers. I believe that the farmers have responded to the needs of this country, helped it grow, and will continue to make it grow if we give them the room to do so.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cardiff: Farmers will not buy a product which requires high input unless the benefits are sufficient to support the initial investment. Farmers are good shoppers and good buyers. They have always had choices and they will continue to have choices, because the farmers will demand that that choice be there. I have lived on a farm all of my life, worked with farmers, and I know how they feel.

At one time I represented all the white bean farmers in the Province of Ontario, and I do know how they feel about plant breeders' legislation.

White beans are like little white pearls. They are the greatest product one could ever get hold of. They are an exportable product. In 1972, 20 per cent of our white beans were exported. By the year 1980, 80 per cent of our beans were exported at no sacrifice to human consumption. This happened because we were leaders and because we had varieties acceptable throughout the world. It is one thing to grow beans, but quite another to have varieties that are acceptable with good cooking qualities and storing qualities.

We must never forget that farmers are intelligent customers. Farmers are businessmen. Farmers have to carefully consider factors such as input yield, and ratios. They look at all those things when they look at what varieties they are going to choose from. They do have many varieties to choose from. Let us never underestimate farmers, because they do make intelligent decisions.

As a result, farm organizations are supporting this Bill in large numbers. Groups such as the Western Canadian Wheat Growers, the Canadian Grains Council, Canadian Nursery Trades Association, United Grain Growers, Canadian Seed Growers Association, Canadian Ornamental Plant Foundation, and one close to my heart, the Ontario Bean Producers Marketing Board, to name only a few are supporting this Bill.

When my hon. friend is helping with the hay, we will give him a good feed of beans.

Mr. Milliken: Beans are good for the heart.

Mr. Cardiff: All those people feel that this Bill will benefit agriculture and benefit Canada. The Hon. Member for Northumberland (Mrs. Stewart) has suggested that this is not enough, that we must benefit the Third World as well. Like all Hon. Members, I too wish that there were easy solutions for the social and economic problems facing the developing world. Even if all Members of the House devoted all their time and energies to the issue, we could not solve all the problems. Why should we expect Bill C–15 to solve all those problems? Plant breeders' rights are designed to address issues in our country and in our dealings with our major trading partners.

Mr. Milliken: It's a kowtow to the U.S.

Mr. Cardiff: While we are doing that, it strengthens the viability of our farms and our agriculture industry in this country. Who could argue against strengthening the opportunities for agriculture? In fact, the difference between our northern climate and the tropics prohibits effective seed trade with the Third World. Even if a distribution system were in place, and the equipment was there, places such as Uganda and Malaysia would still not become major markets.

However, our Government is concerned about their food resources, and to ensure that varieties are developed for their countries, we offer them our fiscal and technical support. CIDA contributed $18,250,000 in 1988 to 17 different research institutes specializing in developing agriculture. That is a lot of money. There are also a significant number of bilateral agreements which offer technical advice or specific services between our country and less developed ones. The International Development Research Council has also funded seed projects worth almost $3 million in 1988.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 57, it is my duty at this time—

Mr. MacWilliam: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no point of order. It is one o'clock.

In accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 57, at this time it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the second reading stage of the Bill now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the Members:

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Mazankowski) which was agreed to on the following division:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, I would like it noted that I was in the Chamber at 1.30 a.m., but because I have been appointed Chairman of the legislative committee on Bill C-15 I abstained from the vote on second reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before adjourning, I think it would only be right to give the Pages some last applause for a job well done.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 1.33 a.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, this House stands adjourned until Monday, September 25, 1989, at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 1.33 a.m.

President of the State of Israel to Both Houses of Parliament
HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA
Tuesday, June 27, 1989

The President was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. President, that was the kind of warm welcome that I receive every day in the House of Commons.

Members of the Senate, of the House of Commons, distinguished guests, dear friends.

[English]

We are gathered here today to mark the first address to the Parliament of Canada by the Head of State or the Head of the Government of Israel.

We mark as well the first state visit to Canada by a President of Israel.

On behalf of all Canadians, Mr. President, I tell you simply: welcome, you are among friends.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Your ties to our country predate the foundation of the State of Israel.

You were a brother-in-arms to thousands of our fellow citizens who, in history's darkest hour, risked—and, in all too many cases, sacrificed—their lives to defeat the Nazi terror.

The British unit in which you served, from the beaches of Normandy until V-E Day, was attached to the First Canadian Army.

The wreath you will be laying this afternoon at our National War Memorial is therefore an especially moving expression of our personal and national solidarity. Canadians remember that threat to our freedom. And we will never forget the diabolical attempt to exterminate the Jewish people.

The Holocaust is burnt indelibly into our souls, as it must live on in the minds of our youngest children—and then, theirs—so that it can never be forgotten.

You pursued your destiny, Mr. President, in an era that brought about the birth and consolidation of the State of Israel.

Canada played a part in that process by participating in the United Nations Commission that proposed the partition of Palestine, by voting for Israel's membership in the UN and by contributing to the Middle East peacekeeping forces in the hope of stabilizing the region and of bringing peace to your country.

Most of all, in the daring and difficult period of Israel's infancy, when your nation needed friends—true friends—Canada was there. Canada was there over 40 years ago and our friendship and support remain with you today.

[English]

The bonds between Israel and Canada are numerous and deep.

Like Canada, Israel is a land of immigrants which has become a home to a host of courageous spirits from around the world. Canada owes a great deal to the contribution of its Jewish community, whose members have distinguished themselves in an outstanding manner.

I can tell you, Mr. President, that there is hardly a dimension of our national life—from the arts, research, to medicine, the humanities, commerce, politics, to labour, and the law—that has not been improved and enriched because of the dynamic presence of a large and impressive Jewish community in Canada.

Jewish immigrants have laboured and sacrificed and have dreamt great dreams for their children—and on this continent so far away, their fondest hopes of freedom and tolerance, of fairness and opportunity have come true. May I tell you, Mr. President, on behalf of all Canadians, that Canada is an incomparably better nation because of their presence.

Canadians understand the aspirations that have shaped Israeli society from its origins. Canada and Israel share a fundamental commitment to liberty, through respect for individual rights and responsibilities. Common human values and democratic principles lie at the root of everything that unites us.

In all the world, there are few Parliaments as open, as democratic, and as fractious as the Knesset—although this House of Commons comes dangerously close on occasion. Too often for my liking, Mr. President. To listen to the raucous debates in the Israeli Parliament is to hear the pure and persuasive sounds of freedom.

And in all the world, there are few parallels to match the astonishing feat of Israel coming alive, of deserts being made to bloom, of a nation being bound together, in the shadow of hostility and in the agony of war.

The values on which Israel was founded, and which have been tempered in the fire of her national experience, have never been tested more than at this moment. Canadians are deeply concerned because of their friendship for Israel and because of their profound conviction that human rights must be respected.

Indeed, Mr. President, as you so eloquently stated, some three years ago, and I quote:

> Israel must be the absolute denial of the theories of discrimination and racism, the loss of human dignity and the negation of man's honour.

The death of a child—Israeli or Palestinian—is an overwhelming human tragedy. Forbearance and restraint—even in the face of intense provocation—are the hallmarks of a strong and a confident nation. Canadians who understand and sympathize with Israel urge nonetheless moderation and reasonableness, in the belief that ultimately such a policy will bring about an equally responsible attitude on the other side.

The name of Israel resounds in human history with the promise of liberation. Mr. President, I can tell you on behalf of all Canadians that you can be assured of Canada's unswerving commitment to the security of Israel and to its status as a legitimate and independent state.

Canada is more anxious than ever to help create in your region a peace based on the security, well-being and legitimate rights of the people of Israel and her Arab neighbours.

[English]

Since the UN Security Council passed Resolution 242 in 1967, Canada has been working in the Middle East to promote a peace based on territorial accommodation, so that in exchange for occupied territories, Israel's legitimate rights will be recognized by its neighbours.

We have continually insisted that the Palestinians and the Arab countries recognize, unequivocally, Israel's right to exist. We have been encouraged by events in recent months which demonstrates this essential pre-condition is being met.

Our conviction is that recognition and respect for Israel's rights is the essential counterpart for the Palestinians realizing their own legitimate rights, including the right to participate fully in the determination of their own destiny and the future of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

We are pleased by the growing acceptance of this principle throughout your region. In this respect, we consider it significant that the Israeli Government has proposed holding elections in which the Palestinian people would be able to make their views known clearly, elections that could be a step on the way to breaking the cycle of violence and leading to a just and durable peace.

[English]

The creation of the State of Israel is one of the epochal events of this century. For Canadians, Israel is not simply a place on the map. Israel is a tribute to the deep spiritual beliefs and the unfailing personal courage of a remarkable people.

Israel is a monument to the indomitable spirit of man.

Chers amis, colleagues, it is with great pride that I present to you the President of Israel whom I now invite to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

His Excellency Chaim Herzog (President of Israel): Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, Honourable Senators and Members of the House of Commons, Distinguished Members of the Diplomatic Corps, Ladies and Gentlemen.

I thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, for your very kind personal remarks about me. As I heard you, I recalled the comment of the late President Lyndon Johnson on a similar occasion. He said: "My father would have been pleased. My mother would have believed it."

You, Mr. Prime Minister, have been a tried and trusted friend of our people and of our country over the years. As a statesman of world stature and as the Leader of this great country, you are highly respected in our country as elsewhere, and I look forward to your comments and observations on the current situation with great interest.

It is my privilege to reiterate publicly our invitation to you to come to our area and to honour us with your presence in Israel.

You understand how moving it is for the President of Israel, a people with thousands of years of history and a young democracy reborn, after centuries of struggle and prayer, to have the privilege today to address your illustrious assembly, which is witness to the most exciting aspect of the Free World.

I am very touched on this first presidential state visit in the annals of Israel–Canada relations by the honour these two Houses have granted my people, with all it means in terms of dreams, accomplishments and hopes.

[English]

As a fellow democracy, we are proud of the fact that despite five wars, despite the defence and economic burden which it has borne since its inception, Israel has never compromised on the issue of its basic values. Like you, we have never known one minute without democracy. Our democracy faces the most involved challenges—a constant state of readiness, long military and reserve service, and the complex problems arising out of the refusal of our neighbours to enter into negotiations for peace with us, and to understand that we do have the right to live in the area and in our country.

Too often are our problems viewed facilely out of the context of all that is happening around us in the Middle East. In this decade the longest war in this century has been waged in the Persian Gulf—a brutal bloody war motivated by fanatic religious fundamentalism on the one hand, and the ambitions of a megalomaniac dictatorship on the other hand. Tens of thousands of prisoners were shot on both sides out of hand. An unconventional weapon, poison gas, was introduced, and the world stood by in mute helplessness. The number of those killed and wounded was in the millions.

How blind were the so-called experts in analysing the developments in our area. The obsessive fixation with every stone-throwing incident in the West Bank led to a situation whereby the real ominous developments in the Middle East and the real threats to Western interests were overlooked by most observers. Thus again and again the Western World was taken by surprise when the real focus of danger erupted. How can we forget how the free world was taken by surprise by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, by the Khomeini revolution in Iran, by the outbreak of the Iran–Iraq war?

It is against this background that we must view the sole bastion of democracy in our region—Israel. A glance at the map of the Middle East must surely emphasize the vital significance for the security of the free world of this solid island of stability, loyalty and friendship to the West.

We see as our major challenge the achievement of peace between us and our Arab neighbours, including the Palestinians. In our Declaration of Independence we held out our hand to our Arab neighbours in a quest for peace. It was rejected, and instead the armies of seven Arab states combined with the Palestinian Arabs in an effort to destroy the embryonic Jewish State before its birth and to drive us into the sea. We fought back desperately without adequate arms, outnumbered, outgunned, and embargoed by most of the countries of the free world. Thanks to our sacrifice of 1 per cent of our population killed and the leadership of Ben Gurion, we managed to survive.

From the moment of its birth Israel stretched out its hand in an offer of peace, but it was rejected. The Palestinians continued along the road of tragedy.

For 19 years, from 1948 to 1967, the West Bank was occupied by Jordan and the Gaza Strip was occupied by Egypt. But the Palestinians were not granted independence, nor was a State established, because then as today the last thing the Arab countries wanted, their protestations to the contrary notwithstanding, was a Palestinian State.

Ten days after the conclusion of the Six-Day War in 1967 the Israeli Cabinet offered to return to Egypt the Sinai Desert and to Syria the Golan Heights in return for demilitarization and peace. The Government prepared for negotiations with King Hussein. The Arab reply to this approach was the Khartoum Summit Conference with its three noes—no to negotiations with Israel, no to recognition of Israel, and no to peace with Israel.

In 1977 the program for full autonomy for the Palestinians proposed by the then Prime Minister Menachem Begin was rejected out of hand. Had this proposal been accepted then, we might by now have been well on the road to a permanent settlement.

We are irrevocably committed to the inexorable process moving toward peace in the Middle East. I am convinced that we will achieve it. For I only have to look back to 12 years ago today when most of Israel's borders were hermetically sealed and there was no passage of people or trade across them. Who would have dreamt then that today the Israeli flag would fly over an Israeli Embassy in Egypt and an Egyptian flag over an Egyptian Embassy in Israel? Who would have dreamt that 10 years after the signing of the Israel-Egypt Peace Treaty, Egypt would be accepted back into the Arab League while remaining loyal to its commitments to Israel and would, indeed, rightly reassume its position as leader of the Arab world?

Who would have dreamt that this year some 120,000 Israeli tourists would be thronging Egyptian resorts and tourist sites, and that joint Israel-Egypt agricultural projects would be taking place in the Nile Delta and in the Negev in Israel?

Who would have dreamt that over a million people would be crossing annually over the bridges of the River Jordan in both directions, and that daily hundreds of trucks would be carrying produce and exports in both directions? And who would have dreamt that thousands of Israeli Muslims would be making their way to and fro in performance of the Holy Pilgrimage to Mecca?

We have reach a new crossroads. We are experiencing a period of unrest in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza. We deeply regret the bloodshed on both sides as we strive to maintain law and order. We have had to overcome repeated onslaughts in the past, and I have no doubt that we will overcome the present wave of violence which in our eyes poses a threat to the basis of our society and to the peaceful coexistence between Jews and Arabs in the land of Israel. We dare not underestimate the feelings expressed in the unrest, nor should we sanguinely expect it simply to fade away. Irrational and self-destroying persistence has tragically marked previous Arab attacks on Israel. Hatred and violence have led only to bereavement and disaster without solving any problems. Understanding has come too late in every case.

There is no desire in Israel to rule over another people and to direct its life. Let us however not forget that this issue is the subject of a major political debate in Israel. Israel has to face fateful decisions, and I am only too aware of the agonizing reappraisals taking place today both in our free society, and among the Palestinians who live with us in Israel and in the territories.

It is easy to discuss our problems at a distance, to pass judgment, to make speeches, to write articles, and to offer solutions. It is, to say the least, less easy for those who together with their children will have to bear the consequences should they err. Remember, what for others is a matter of foreign policy, is for us a matter of existence. In the current outbreak of civil unrest in Judea, Samaria, and Gaza, the choice facing us is unfortunately not between law and order on the one hand, and negotiations on the other hand. The choice is between maintaining law and order as a basis for bilateral negotiations, or allowing the situation to deteriorate into a new edition of Beirut or Teheran. That is the cruel choice which faces us today.

There is criticism at times of Israel's handling of the maintenance of law and order, and nowhere more pointedly than in Israel, in the Knesset or in the media. However, I have yet to see other countries facing similar situations without the use of force. What more effective methods should we use? Those used by our neighbours including, for instance, the killing of 30,000 people in the Syrian town of Hama by President Assad, or the killing of 500 demonstrators in two days in Algeria last summer? Or should we adopt the methods using during the riots in the inner cities of Britain, or in Northern Ireland, or in the streets of Western Europe, or those that were used once in Watts or Detroit or Kent State?

What other armed forces in the world than ours would exercise more restraint in coping with a society that cynically and cruelly sends its children to carry out acts of violence endangering life on both societies? Remember, a mother burnt alive together with her three children in a civilian bus are no less tragically dead because the perpetrators who threw the molotov cocktail were youngsters. A society's strength is tested by its ability to face crises. I believe that given all the difficulties and with all our shortcomings our society has shown as much maturity and humanity as any other society in similar circumstances. As Golda Meir once said she cannot forgive the Arabs not so much because they kill our children but because they force our children to kill theirs.

Looking around us, how can we ignore the thunderous silence of the world as the city of Beirut has been, and is being, pounded mercilessly by Syrian artillery day in day out, night in night out, as the Christian refugees trying in small boats to reach ferries offshore to take them to safety in Cyprus, are shelled indiscriminately, as the Lebanese nation is slowly destroyed, as the Christian community of Lebanon largely ignored by the rest of the Christian world, is slowly being decimated and is in dire danger for its very existence? How can we ignore the apathy of the world in the face of this cruel destruction of a nation? Surely the lesson for us must be obvious.

Already 25,000 refugees from Beirut—Christians and Muslims—have crowded into the security zone adjacent to our northern border, instinctively coming to Israel for protection and security.

My friends, all of this is going on at the moment, and has aroused little reaction in the civilized world. In the cruel, distorted, prejudiced coverage by the media of events in the Middle East, the slaughter in Beirut does not warrant the coverage given to children throwing stones in some West Bank village.

We are a free society facing a dilemma. Is it not understandable that Israeli society is torn by doubts and hesitations, and that there is no small degree of scepticism coupled with a legitimate debate in our society on the PLO's real intentions?

In the past few months, the Government of Israel formulated a plan for the movement forward in the peace process in the Middle East. The plan consists of four parts:

1) Reaffirming the Camp David Agreement;

2) A call for the Arab countries to join in the peace process and recognize Israel;

3) That an international effort be mounted to solve the festering problem of the Arab refugees in Gaza and Judea;

4) Elections in the Judea and Samaria Districts of the West Bank and in Gaza, whereby the Palestinian Arabs residents of these areas will elect in secret ballot their own representatives. These representatives will be thereby empowered to enter into negotiations with Israel in order to establish self-rule for the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza.

Under this self-rule, which is envisaged for a five-year period, the Palestinian Arabs in the territories will rule themselves and will be responsible for everything but foreign affairs and defence.

After a period of three years, negotiations will open with the Palestinians who have been elected, in order to achieve a final settlement.

Unfortunately the situation on the Arab side is not at all clear. Their protestations to the contrary, a large proportion of the Palestinians living in the territories administered by us would accept the Government of Israel's proposal. But since the official PLO line so far has been to set out conditions which in effect negate the spirit and the essence of the Israeli proposals, no Palestinian in the Judea and Samaria district of the West Bank and Gaza will dare risk being lynched or a bullet in his head in order to express his views and support the proposal. In the course of the current year some 50 per cent of all the Palestinian casualties have been inflicted by Palestinians. In the past few months, some 50 Palestinians suspected of views different to those of the PLO have been cruelly and summarily executed. When a Palestinian mayor suggested a truce for Christmas, he was publicly threatened by Arafat that he would end up with 10 bullets in his chest.

What is more, the recent Arab Summit Conference in Casablanca reaffirmed the negative position adopted by the PLO. The PLO policy from a practical point of view, from our point of view, must be irrelevant as long as they are not prepared officially to amend the Palestine Covenant which calls for the destruction of Israel.

We are by now immune to the double-talk which characterizes many of the statements issued by the PLO, each statement adapted to the audience to which it is delivered, immediately to be followed by another statement issued to another audience saying just the opposite.

Thus, Arafat publicly forswore the use of terror. However, acts of terror continue unabated. How can we tamely acquiesce in his declaration that the burning of a Jewish family on an outing in a car is a "military operation" and not an act of terror. The fact is that he does not in effect control his organization. Indeed, in addition to the break-away Abu Mussa group in Syria, components of the PLO such as Talaat Yakub, Habash's Popular Front, Khawatma, Gibril, refuse to go along with him. What validity can one give to the statements made by an individual who obviously does not control constituents of the organization which he purports to lead and represent?

I emphasize, again, that the people of Israel want nothing more than peace. I know of no way to achieve peace without negotiation with the other side. One day a great man arose in the Middle East and came forward, the late President Anwar Sadat, made his demands to the Knesset, entered into negotiations, and today buses leave Jerusalem and Tel-Aviv daily for Cairo and vice versa.

Yes, we are moving inexorably toward peace and that is the major goal of our people, reflecting as it does the prayers of millions who cannot express themselves freely in our area, torn by fundamentalist religious fanaticism. That peace will be achieved because we want it and because the people of the Middle East want it and need it.

In the meantime, as we pursue our struggle in the ongoing search for peace, we continue to develop as a free vibrant society, which stretches out its hand seeking co-operation with all.

In a period of 41 years we have created an open, democratic society in Israel in which the dignity of man is enshrined as a supreme value. We have a free and independent judiciary, a democratically elected Parliament, a free press, and a system of universal education. We have created a highly developed system of agriculture, and an industry which is capable of producing some of the more sophisticated high technology and bio-technological engineering, supersonic planes, and some of the better medical scanning equipment existing today in the world. Israeli-manufactured items are in space ships, and in more advanced planes produced in the United States. We are one of the three more advanced countries in the world—the other two are the United States and Japan—in the development and use of solar energy. We are among the leaders in the world in the field of irrigation, desalination of sea water, and cloud seeding. We are one of eight countries of the world which has been represented in space by its own satellite.

We know our shortcomings, we know our failings, but as a free, vibrant, multi-ethnic society, we are conscious of a continuous effort to overcome them. No society is without its weaknesses, but every society must be judged by the freedom of its population to deal with these inadequacies, by the consciousness of its people of its duty to moral imperatives, and by its willingness to accept the vote of the majority in support of the Rule of Law and of the dignity of man which must be the supreme value in any modern society. Because, as Thomas Jefferson pointed out, "nothing is unchangeable but the inherent and inalienable right of man". By this criterion we, a small country beset by problems from within and without, constantly maligned in the Community of Nations, are proud of our record in forging a free, open, democratic society.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the people of Israel, I salute Canada for the major role your country has played over the years for human freedom, for values that are dear to us and are the foundation of your society as they are of ours. We know Canada's remarkable contribution, both on this continent and in all countries of the world, and the growing importance of Canada's voice in international bodies. Relations between Canada and Israel, which are growing all the time, are of course based on common interests, but also above all on deep affinities.

For a country like ours, you are an example and a source of inspiration. You have opened the doors of freedom to immigrants from countless countries. You are an outstanding model of coexistence between individuals of different cultures and backgrounds who live here in a climate of mutual tolerance and respect for their original identity.

[English]

You have been endowed with the great gifts of nature and have demonstrated how to be worthy of the blessings of Providence by a national concern for a healthy environment which you preserve with fervour and devotion.

In the words of the Sour Dough:

> There's a land where the mountains are nameless,
> And the rivers all run God knows where—

He goes on:

> Wild and wide are my borders, stern as death is my sway,
> From my ruthless throne I have ruled alone for a million years and a day;
> Hugging my mighty treasure, waiting for man to come;

Yes, you came and you have succeeded in meeting the challenge of nature and in harnessing it in the cause of the march of progress, science, technology and agriculture for the benefit of mankind.

Your society is distinguished by a special emphasis on aesthetic beauty, cultural advance, and cultural innovativeness in literature, on the stage, on the screen, and in the arts. We share with you immense pride in the impressive Jewish contribution to your cultural and national life.

I thank you, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House of Commons, and the distinguished Members of both Houses, again for your most kind welcome. I trust and pray that my visit will serve to strengthen the relations between our two peoples sharing our common values in the ongoing struggle for peace and the advance of man.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, Mrs. Herzog, it is a pleasure to welcome you in our midst and to listen to a Head of State who has had a remarkable career as a soldier, lawyer, businessman, author and politician and who, incidentally, served during the Second World War with British troops under the First Canadian Army, at the Battle of Reichswald.

[English]

Your explanation of the situation in the occupied territories and of the policy of the Israeli Government is very timely. Canada has been actively involved in the search for a just and lasting peace in the Middle East since the era of Lester Pearson.

As recently as 1985, Canada responded favourably to an Israeli–Egyptian request that she participate in the peacekeeping force in the Sinai area returned to Egypt in 1982 under the Camp David Accord, thus ending a decade-long refusal to participate in peacekeeping operations not sponsored by the United Nations.

The Canadian encouragement of efforts toward peace in the Middle East has thus been constant down through the years, as has been the commitment to the right of Israel to exist within secure and recognized boundaries.

Your participation in this exchange of views between parliamentarians does us great honour, Mr. President. It is all the more significant in that, to our eyes, your personality matches that of your country. Neither you nor the State of Israel can be squeezed into any of the usual categories.

Both you and your country seem to be under the signs of paradox and contrast. Israel never ceases to accomplish natural miracles, a contradiction in terms that makes perfect sense when applied to Israel. This familiarity with paradox has led your countrymen to excel at anticipating the unexpected and preparing intelligently for it.

In your distinguished career, Mr. President, there are also paradoxical elements. Who could have guessed that Catholic Ireland would give birth, in you, to a future President of the Promised Land? On the outbreak of the Second World War, although you were committed to ending the British mandate in Palestine, you did not hesitate to join the British Army. Although a labour stalwart, you were re-elected in 1988 as your country's Head of State by a Parliament in which the right predominated.

Israel has consistently chosen its Presidents from among politicians distinguished for their intellectual activity. After hearing your address today, here in a place where opposing ideas and positions are debated every day, we can see why your parliamentary colleagues once again entrusted you with this high office.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Charbonneau: Well aware of the opposing currents that flow freely in your parliamentary democracy, the Knesset wanted to raise, over those currents, an ironclad guarantee that the society where such diversity of opinion can flourish will be preserved.

[Translation]

Mr. President, your presence here today testifies to the close relationship that exists between the governments, parliaments and peoples of our two countries. These ties should be seen, by you yourself and the people of Israel, as a guarantee of our understanding and our desire to see peace and harmony reign once more in this troubled area of the Middle East.

[English]

On behalf of the Senate of Canada, I thank you for sharing your thoughts with us, Mr. President.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Mr. President, colleagues of the House of Commons and the Senate, and distinguished guests: on behalf of all Members of the House of Commons, I wish to thank you for your presence here today, and for coming to visit our country.

I had the great privilege of visiting your country on three occasions, the last being in January 1987, at which time you and I, Mr. President, had a chance to speak privately about your country's problems and our concerns with respect to those problems.

[English]

I think that in this House of Commons it should be remarked that democracy is a constant and open debate on the great issues which confront us. This, I suppose, is accepted by Canadians, because we have created here in our country, at least, one of the most open and free democracies that exists anywhere in the world.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: That does not mean that there will not be discord and division, but it does mean this: that on the most difficult issues that face us there will be strong and vivid debate. Mr. President, the House of Commons is not a tea party. It is an adversarial forum and, Sir, you will understand that there is no monolithic view in our country about issues whether they are domestic or beyond our shores.

But we in Canada are deeply committed to a concept of free discussion. You are here, Sir, because you represent a sister democracy which has steadfastly maintained the principle which owes its origins back in the mists of our British heritage, that it is better to debate openly our concerns than to repress them by secrecy, or censorship, or indifference.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Your country, sir, which from its inception has had to maintain its democratic traditions through some terrible and difficult events, is an example to the rest of the free world.

We are not unaware of the anguish you are presently experiencing. But we are conscious of the fact that your Parliament, your Knesset, debates these issues, that your press is free, that those who support or criticize are free to speak their minds, and that the press is free to report their views. Mr. President, that cannot be said for many parts of the world.

There are here in Canada many people who care very much for your country, and who also pray and hope that with skill, intelligence, decency and compassion, you will be able to resolve the extraordinary challenges that face you.

[Translation]

Mr. President, it is our wish and our earnest hope that peace will come to Israel and its neighbours. I hope that following your visit to this country you and your fellow citizens will realize that Canadians nurture a loyal and constant friendship for Israel and also that they are very much concerned about the safety and well-being of your country.

[English]

We have long insisted that Israel's existence must be maintained and must be secured. We are not, because after all we are not living in a dream world, unaware of the situation of others who aspire to dignity and self-respect.

We have done things in Canada that were not believed to be possible. We have created a nation of peoples from everywhere in the world, including our native peoples. We have not been perfect, and the ideal we are following is far from being perfected, but we have come this far by patience, and some competence, but, basically, Sir, as a consequence of the deep regard for the rights of individuals and their traditions.

This approach, however imperfect, has created with all our faults one of the best countries in the world. It is nonsense to say that Canadians are dull. I am tired of such shallow mutterings. If we are dull, I do not know what I have to do every day in Question Period. But, Mr. President, we have always tried to move to a moderate position. Moderation and a very deep respect for each other has created and I believe will maintain our country.

We say to you, Sir, that perhaps our almost instinctive sense of moderation within a framework of a viable democracy may give you and your colleagues some sense of hope as you face challenges that are more difficult than ours. Mr. President, we are your friends, and because we care for you and your children, our wish, and our expectation, is that you will resolve your difficulties with wisdom, generosity, and compassion.

Many, many thanks, Mr. President for your visit and your friendship! Shalom!

POINT OF ORDER

HOUSE PROCEDURE

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I rise again on a point of order that is the same as a point of order I rose on some months ago. When the House adjourned for the summer, if my memory serves me correctly, Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Chairman of the Committee of the Whole said that the House now stands adjourned until September 25 at eleven o'clock. At no time did the Speaker say to the House that pursuant to an order made earlier, we would be subject to be recalled, to remind us of that. The order of the House, for your perusal, Mr. Speaker, was made on June 27, 1989. It is very clear that we are here today pursuant to that order.

In order to avoid me rising again on the same point of order, I propose, as I proposed once before, that we look into this so that in the future, when the House adjourns, some comment is made. No other comment was made. I am not going to say whether or not what we do today is legal, but I am getting close to saying that.

We were supposed to come back here September 25. Just prior to saying goodbye until September 25, we should have been reminded that there is an order of the House requiring that we may be recalled to give Royal Assent to certain Bills. That is my interpretation, but I am sure Your Honour may wish to take that under advisement. I am in Your Honour's hands. I do not need an answer today.

It troubles me because we are called here today for a full meeting. The Speaker reads the prayers for the sole purpose of waiting here to be called to go to the Senate. I consider this to be a full meeting of the House. My proposal would be that in the future, the House suspend its activity until we are called back to give Royal Assent to certain Bills and it is understood that the House will then be adjourned without any other business taking place until September 25 or whenever the case may be.

That is the point I wanted to bring to your attention, Your Honour, so that in the future or today, you might comment, but I do not need an answer on that today, so that we can deal with that once and for all.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, it is certainly not my intention to debate the matter with the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme). He is a far more experienced Member of this House than I am. However, I think there is a distinction to be made between suspending the business of the House and adjournment, and he made that point in his comments. I think suspending the business of the House would require the Speaker's chair to be occupied almost constantly, during the time the business of the House is suspended. If the House is adjourned, that is not necessary. So this is an option we have, and I imagine the parliamentary House leaders have thought about this, and I think that of the two, namely adjournment versus suspending the business of the House, adjournment is more convenient and more realistic than asking the House to suspend its business until the Senate has finished considering its bills. It is not my intention to criticize the Hon. Member but if the Chair has any comments on the subject, I think what is at issue is the difference between adjournment and suspending the business of the House.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, when the people elected me, they elected me to take my parliamentary responsibilities very seriously, which I do, and that is why I am here, to help the House of Commons give Royal Assent to Bills we debated until one o'clock in the morning. However, we are setting a very dangerous precedent here.

There is a debate going on in this Chamber. I do not ever recall in my time a debate going on in this House without simultaneous translation. The proceedings are going on in two official languages but we are not operating in two official languages.

I am looking for my earpiece in the desk, I am looking for an earpiece in the desk next. This is the first time since I came to this Chamber that proceedings are going on without them being available in two official languages. I think we are setting a very, very dangerous precedent.

I am also very disappointed that the Government which controls the agenda, and it is up to the Government to see that there is a quorum to walk over to the other House to get Royal Assent, has so few Members present. If we on our side walked out, they would not even have a quorum to get Royal Assent.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With reference to the point of order raised by my colleague from Parkdale—High Park while I too was astounded that the earphones were not here, I know that this had to be an oversight on the part of whoever happens to be responsible, because of course, never would anything like this take place deliberately. I would also like to say that I personally did not have a problem as the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has such clear diction that the problem was non existent.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I spoke in English, as is often the case in my case, and some object to that, but I choose that language first. I would hate to ruin the beautiful atmosphere of the summer for the staff. I do notice that the translation that we do not have. I appreciate my colleague from Toronto having reminded us that he could not listen to my words of wisdom in French, and I thank him for that. I would hope that the staff would not take that as being their mistake. Of course, the translation is available. I can see the translators through the window. However, it is the mechanics that we do not have on our desks.

I would not like this point to be mixed in with the point I raised earlier. I would like to thank my hon. colleague from Ottawa—Vanier and that is why I prefer your Honour rule on my point some day or send it to the appropriate committee to look into it. I could make a long speech on the words of the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), but I will not do it today, as long as I have the assurance of Your Honour that this will be looked into because Your Honour knows that it is not the first time I have raised this point.

[Translation]

That being said, I want to wish all Canadians the very best for Canada Day, in the other official language, since I notice that our translation problem has now been solved. Thank you.

• (1400)

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on this point of order. First, it is a delight to see many of my colleagues on both sides of the House, even on the day before Canada Day.

The tradition of being called together for Royal Assent after a summer adjournment is not something new. In fact, the Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), who started here even before I did, and several other Members, including the Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) and the Member from Toronto, were all members of a Government which on a regular basis, after we had completed our regular business, called Members back briefly for what is really a formality on the part of the House of Commons, that is going to meet our colleagues in the Senate and to observe Royal Assent.

I think it would be a mistake to turn this into a major public debate. I know that there are other colleagues from both sides of the House who are otherwise occupied in meetings. I am sure they would be more than happy to participate in the completion of this public business by being present for Royal Assent.

However, I think that what the Member for Saint-Denis has raised is in fact not a different tradition. We are in fact observing one of the oldest traditions in Parliament with which Members on all sides are all familiar. If the language used by the Deputy Chairman of Committees in adjourning the House at an early hour on Wednesday morning was not exactly correct, I think the sense was clearly understood by Members on all sides.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I object. I do not want to debate, but I certainly object to what the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. MacDonald) has just said. For Marcel Prud'homme, Member of Parliament for Saint-Denis, Royal Assent is not just a formality, far from it.

Second, I have always claimed that for the House to sit we should be 20 Members. Mr. Speaker said the prayers so I consider that a full meeting of the House even though it is for the purpose of only one thing. For the House to sit, there should be 20 Members. There may be 20 and on the eve of Canada Day, in the British parliamentary system, I see 20. However, there are not 20.

I regret that the Hon. Member has said that Royal Assent is just a formality. According to my learning of the British parliamentary tradition, Royal Assent is not only a formality. Yes, some day we may say: "Who cares about Royal Assent?" However, if we start on this road there will eventually be Members who say: "Who cares about the Speaker's Parade?" And then eventually they will say: "Why does the Clerk dress like a Christian brother?" And then perhaps you, Mr. Speaker, should start wearing a wig.

We have tradition. I have made no secret of my great respect for tradition. If people want to change tradition, I have a long series of proposals. However, I like the traditions of the British parliamentary system and I believe we should enhance them.

I see one of my most esteemed colleagues and I am sure he will allow me to put his name on the record to show that he is here. He is the Member for Parry Sound—Muskoka (Mr. Darling), my good friend. I see his nice smile and he is such a polite gentleman. He approves of what I say.

Therefore, I will give the floor back to you, Mr. Speaker. Some day we will not have to go through this kind of debate. Again, I extend to the Hon. Member for Rosedale my most sincere wishes for a happy Canada Day.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make just a brief comment. I listened with interest, as a new Member, to all of this. I just happened to be passing by. The only point I would like to make is that if we can do this after one day's rest, imagine what we will be able to do by the twenty-fifth of September.

The second point I would like to make is a slightly more serious one. A point has been made and there are many Members who are not here who may have some strong views on the issue raised by the Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme). I hope that you will invite other Members of the House to make submissions to you, Mr. Speaker, before you pass judgment on the important issue which the Hon. Member has put to you.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed that visitors from Montreal who were supposed to meet the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) and listen to his performance in the House were denied entry to the House of Commons. I wonder why the doors of the galleries are shut and why these distinguished visitors were not allowed to admire their excellent Member of Parliament from the visitor's gallery. I think the point raised by the Hon. Member deserves to be considered, and I certainly think the public should have the right to visit the House.

[English]

Mr. Prud'homme: Your Honour, I hate to abuse your kindness. I thank very much my esteemed colleague and friend, the Member for Papineau—Saint-Michel (Mr. Ouellet). I was totally unaware of what he was going to add. The people who are visiting Ottawa did not know that I was going to speak. I did not know myself. When I heard the bell I knew it was my duty to attend in the House. The Hon. Member's comment must be taken in the atmosphere of Canada Day. I had nothing to do with his comments, although I appreciate them. It is true that the galleries are closed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: A very short point of order. The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Mr. Milliken).

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

[English]

The Hon. Member for Leeds—Grenville (Mr. Jordan) and the Hon. Member for Haldimand—Norfolk (Mr. Speller) have asked me to indicate their interest in this subject as well. I think that what we are witnessing here is further evidence of the contempt of Parliament on the part of the Government to which I referred in my speech the other night. I agree with what the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) has said. In light of what is going on outside I think it would be appropriate to defer any further comment until after we have returned from the other place.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can respond briefly. I first want to remind Hon. Members of the comments of my colleague from Victoria. He said that if this spirited debate which has just taken place is any indication of what can happen after the gruelling days, weeks, and months which have preceded, it certainly gives one reason to ponder just how exciting the session may be after September 25. I want to assure all Hon. Members that it absolutely terrifies me, let alone giving me a chance to ponder on it.

First, we have a point of order raised by the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), a very intelligent Member of this House with a great deal of experience in parliamentary procedure. In fact, perhaps he was right to raise his point of order, because if you look at the order for the adjournment of Parliament, you will notice that I used the word "ajournement". But in English:

By unanimous consent it was ordered: "That, when the House completes, later today", that was yesterday, "—proceedings on the motion for second reading of Bill C-15" et cetera, "—it shall stand adjourned until Monday, September 25, 1989, provided that—

And in French: "Loi concernant la protection des obtentions végétales, elle s'ajourne jusqu'au lundi 25 septembre 1989, étant entendu que:"

[English]

"If at any time a Bill or Bills be ready for the granting of Royal Assent" et cetera, which is exactly what we are doing now.

The Hon. Member has raised a point of interest. It is not——the first time the Hon. Member has raised matters of this kind, and I think he is entitled to have this point looked at during the summer, and subsequently, it would of course be appropriate for me to comment more specifically on this issue.

I want to thank the Hon. Member, especially someone with his vast experience of Parliament, for rising in his seat this afternoon and raising a point that is very important to our great parliamentary tradition and to the future of this country.

However, we have another problem and I must say I am very sorry. I realize that the earphones for listening to the simultaneous translation are not available at each Member's seat. I very much regret this oversight, but the point is well taken by the Chair.

And now, perhaps we can proceed with this afternoon's main event.

The House adjourned at 2.33 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, September 25, 1989

The House met at 11 a.m.

Prayers

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that I have received some questions of privilege, and I will commence by recognizing the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

PRIVILEGE

CONTENT OF NEWSPAPER ADVERTISEMENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which both my House Leader, the member of parliament for Windsor West, and I have given you notice.

I wish to deal with a contempt of the House, a matter which under our proceedings as described in Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, Chapter 12, is properly brought before the House as a question of privilege.

On August 26 of this year the Department of Finance placed two full-page ads in each language in major newspapers across the country. The type face was so large that it jumped right out at you. These Tory ads in big type were paid for by the people of Canada and read: "On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change. Please Save This Notice". It explains the changes and the reasons for them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the same text appeared in French in French newspapers across this country, reading as follows:

> On January 1, 1991, Canada's Federal Sales Tax System Will Change. Please Save This Notice.

It explains the changes and the reasons for them. Now on the second page, we see a full page indicating the main changes that are being proposed, in detail, with the text of the amendments to the Act, and all this in the same ad, in the newspapers and in both languages.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, because you will need these before you in order to deliberate, I will at the conclusion of what I have to say to the House deposit these through you with the Clerk of the House, as I believe the rules require. It may be that at the conclusion of what I want to say the Clerk will want to read these into the record. That will be his and your judgment.

I intend to outline at the outset why I believe that these advertisements constitute a contempt of the House of Commons. I submit to Your Honour that the advertisement not only misrepresents the substance of the text but the procedure to which it is subject under parliamentary rules. It prejudices the proceedings that are now before a committee of the House, the Standing Committee on Finance, as well as prejudicing future proceedings and decisions of the House itself.

Your Honour, I will expand upon this point and if you find that a prima facie case of privilege has been established, I am prepared to move at the convenience of the House, under your order, the appropriate motion.

The wording "Please Save This Notice", followed by chapter and verse of the alleged tax changes, constitutes a basis for a question of privilege. Those words "Please Save This Notice" constitute a contempt of Parliament, constitute an intimidation of Parliament, because the only inference to be drawn from the words "Please Save This Notice" is that it does not matter what members of parliament do in dealing with these taxes. It does not matter what the committee on finance does with respect to these taxes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It does not matter what the people of Canada are saying with respect to these taxes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It does not matter whether the hon. member for Mississauga South decides in his good judgment that it does not work. It is not worth the public money, the public purse, he says, to take this committee to Newfoundland. He has since recanted, but it does not matter what the people of Newfoundland say, the people of Nova Scotia, Ontario, British Columbia, and Quebec. "Please Save This Notice. You are wasting your time. Do not bother to appear before this committee", that is what the government is actually saying.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): "Please Save This Notice". According to these ads these are the proposed changes which are going to come into effect. That is it. That is contempt of Parliament by those who write these ads. That is contempt of Parliament by those who authorize these ads. That is contempt of Parliament because only this House can authorize tax changes, only the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): This is the fundamental basis of the question of privilege before you. "Please Save This Notice". The ad states that specific measures will come into effect on a specific date—t does not matter what parliament does—when in fact no such tax legislation has been passed by the House of Commons. Nobody except perhaps the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance wants to see any such legislation introduced into the House of Commons. Certainly not the Tory back-benchers who have had something to say about it this week.

The House of Commons committee on finance is going across the country seeking the advice of taxpayers on a technical paper to decide whether or not to recommend to the Minister of Finance whether or not to introduce legislation, which this ad says is already written in stone, because "Please Save This Notice"; nothing is going to change.

These ads are a flagrant circumvention of a fundamental parliamentary principle that it is the House of Commons, the representatives of the people from every province and territory in this country; that it is we as mandated by the people of Canada; that it is we the fiduciary of the people and only we on behalf of the people of Canada, who will have full control over what the taxes in this country are going to be.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That right rests with parliament. It does not rest with a few slogan writers in a Tory advertising agency.

These advertisements violate our parliamentary tradition in two more ways. They prejudice the proceedings that are now before the Standing Committee on Finance as well as prejudicing future proceedings of the House itself.

Mr. Speaker, these ads constitute a breach of the rights and privileges of all Members and a contempt of Parliament.

A government that wastes millions and millions of dollars on newspaper ads not even a canary would want to see on the floor of its cage, and keeps saying that it is trying to cut spending in order to reduce the deficit, that Government is both hypocritical and utterly ridiculous.

Mr. Speaker, what we have here is not just a flagrant breach of parliamentary privilege but a flagrant case of government stupidity.

The harebrained scheme proposed by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance is a contradiction of every word they ever said about tax reform, both in the House of Commons and across the country.

What we have here, Mr. Speaker, is not just an obvious case of a breach of the privileges of this House, it is a flagrant case of breach of good faith.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are backing a ridiculous proposal which is not only not tax neutral, as they promised, but is in fact the most flagrant tax grab in this country's history. It does not reflect the simplicity promised by this Government and would in fact create an administrative nightmare we would not wish on our worst enemies. It does not provide for provincial participation, as promised, and will make Canada the only nation in the world saddled with two entirely different sales tax systems: a federal and a provincial system.

Mr. Speaker, what we have here is not just a flagrant violation of parliamentary privilege, it is also an obvious case of political fraud perpetrated by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker, I know that in the light of these facts, you would kick these scoundrels out the door, if you could, but I also realize you have very little leeway since you can only apply the Standing Orders as they concern questions of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I want to read to you an important citation from page 543 of Bourinot's second edition, a quotation which will be of importance to you in your decision and of no interest to any Conservative cabinet minister because it was not made up by some Tory slogan writer at some Tory advertising agency. It represents the historic traditions of this House.

> The principal purpose of the House of Commons, in fact, is the consideration and criticism of the Estimates and the taxes required to meet the public expenditures and the committees in question are the parliamentary machinery by means of which the House chiefly exercises its political and constitutional functions.

That is the citation from Bourinot.

When the House of Commons committee is currently conducting hearings on a technical paper on the proposed sales tax, how can it expect to get a complete range of opinions from Canadians when millions of our fellow citizens read these two-page newspaper ads which state blatantly that certain tax changes are going to come into effect? Many Canadians who might otherwise be prone to submit a brief to the committee have taken the conclusion and taken the message from this ad of why bother. We have read the ads that say no matter what we say the Department of Finance has said changes are coming into effect, no matter what any individual Canadian may think. I would go on to cite for you, Mr. Speaker, Maingot's Parliamentary Privilege in Canada, a citation at page 192 which reads as follows:

> While privilege may be codified, contempt may not, because new forms of obstruction are constantly being devised and parliament must be able to invoke its penal jurisdiction to protect itself against these new forms.

Mr. Speaker, the none too hidden message of the ads is we are doing what we like whether you like it or not, whether your members of parliament like it or not, whether the House of Commons likes it or not, or the members specifically on the committee of finance like it or not. "Please Save This Notice", no changes allowed. I know that is what the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance really believe.

I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, the definition of contempt contained in the twentieth edition of Erskine May's Parliamentary Practice, Chapter 10, page 143:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as a contempt even though there is no precedent for the offence.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and their Conservative propaganda gurus who come up with new forms of obstruction obviously believed when they inserted this ad that they did not need to wait for any final parliamentary approval. They did not even need to wait for approval on second reading. They did not even need to wait for the parliamentary committee to report. They did not even need to wait for the act to receive first reading in the House of Commons as a bill. They ran the ads. They ran the ads not in order to help Parliament but to obstruct, impede, and threaten Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have read some of the citations from the authorities and I now want to give some references from leading members of parliament over the years within our lifetime. There are hundreds of quotations I could cite on the basis of the tradition that the House of Commons and only the House of Commons can pass upon a tax measure or an expenditure measure.

I will cite a few of these important historical references because I know, Mr. Speaker, that you share my concern and my understanding that the rules which we apply today rest upon our traditions and our history even though the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance have no belief in history. Their motto is: "Why worry about history or traditions of the House of Commons when a good advertising copywriter can write one for you?"

I quote the late John George Diefenbaker, cited in Hansard on page 189 on December 11, 1947. It was a debate about tax changes announced over the radio by then Finance Minister Doug Abbott. Here is what Mr. Diefenbaker had to say in this House:

> When a government utilizes powers—in a way never contemplated by Parliament, we have a right to ask that Parliament and the country be given an explanation.

Mr. Diefenbaker went on to ask whether there is, and I cite him again:

> —in any country—an occasion where taxation has been imposed by a minister by Order in Council.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. Diefenbaker would be stunned.

• (1120)

This government has not only the arrogance to contemplate taxation by Order in Council, it contemplates taxation by newspaper ads. Mr. Diefenbaker would roll over in his grave if he saw his successors on that side of the House consenting to this kind of action.

Later on March 9, 1948, on page 2028 of Hansard, Mr. Diefenbaker had this to say:

> The statutes of the realm provide in most emphatic language that no tax should be levied on a subject without the consent of Parliament.

In no way, shape or form has parliament given its consent. Mr. Diefenbaker, as partisan as he was and as partisan as he could be in this House, would be appalled that our current Prime Minister and Minister of Finance run ads purporting to say and suggest that parliament has given its approval.

Mr. Speaker, I now draw your attention to Hansard for April 20, 1961, where we see that a pamphlet published by the Department of Agriculture—and I do mean a pamphlet and not a massive advertising campaign for the reform of our tax system—led Walter Pitman, who was then the New Democratic Member for Peterborough, to raise a question of privilege. In his statement, Mr. Pitman asked, and I quote page 3825 for April 20, 1961: "How can the people of Canada be told how A.R.D.A. will operate when this bill has not received second reading? Is there a suggestion that second reading has no effect? Is it the contention that a debate in this house amounts to nothing more than the rubber-stamping of a measure?"

I draw the attention of this House to the fact that this question of privilege concerned only an agriculture bill which had not yet been presented to the House for second reading but which had already been tabled for first reading. But the question that concerns us today has not even been presented to Parliament for first reading. The question that concerns us here is the publication of advertisements in newspapers for a bill that has not even been drafted yet.

Mr. Pitman's position was supported by the late Lester B. Pearson, who said that the publication of the pamphlet indeed constituted an example of contempt for the House of Commons. Mr. Pearson said: "The question dealt with the circulation of a pamphlet dealing with an act of parliament before that act was passed. Therefore, undoubtedly, that action on the part of the minister is treating Parliament with contempt."

[English]

Mr. Speaker, your predecessor at that time was the Right Hon. Roland Michener. He did not have to rule on the issue because no formal motion was submitted, but he nonetheless took the trouble to address the House on this issue of contempt. Mr. Speaker Michener stated at page 3826 of Hansard on April 20, 1961 the following:

> There is a point that no one should assert that Parliament has acted before it has done so, particularly a Minister. If it is borne out by this document, I think the Hon. Members would have a point to deal with by Motion.

In other words he conceded the prima facie nature of the case. The ads run on August 26 of this year by the Department of Finance which said "On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change. Please save this notice", meet the criteria set down by Speaker Michener because they implicitly assert that Parliament has acted before it has done so.

I fear that this intellectual discourse goes beyond the contemplative powers of Conservative members opposite. What do these modern masters of our destiny care what John Diefenbaker thinks or Roland Michener thinks?

Perhaps I can quote some of their most recent contemporaries. The instant copywriters of the Conservative party with their instant preachers, the ministers of the current government, might be interested in what some of their recent contemporaries had to say.

I want to quote from the now Lieutenant-Governor of Newfoundland and Labrador, representing the Crown and a province that the member for Mississauga South did not want to waste public money out of the public purse to visit so that the people of Newfoundland and Labrador could give their submissions before that committee.

In any event he is the Hon. James McGrath, known to yourself Mr. Speaker and me, formerly the hon. member for St. John's East, and the person responsible for some of our most recent procedural reforms. During the debate on the propriety of constitutional ads placed by the government in 1980, and by the way after debate had taken place in the House of Commons, Mr. McGrath stated his views on such government advertising on page 3528 of Hansard dated October 9, 1980:

> The purpose of such advertising can only be to inhibit the Opposition in its attempt to debate government policy or the assumptions on which it is based.

Of course the current situation is far worse than anything Mr. McGrath could have been contemplating, because we are not yet even debating a bill in the House of Commons but the government is calling it a fait accompli. The now Lieutenant-Governor must have seen what was coming when he referred to, and I quote him again, on page 3528:

> —the modern equivalent of the corruption and intimidation which contaminated the House of Commons at an earlier stage of its development.

Mr. McGrath has been gone from the House for a few years. Perhaps I should cite a more recent departure, a former Conservative Minister of Justice, the Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn, who has been gone for only 10 months. He is still actively practising law in this city. I would like to quote Mr. Hnatyshyn. He said at page 3529 of Hansard, October 9, 1980, during the same debate, and I quote him:

> A multi-million dollar advertising campaign—is contrary to every fundamental principle upon which Parliament has been developed and fought for over the years.

I can only say to him, through you Mr. Speaker: "Well said, Ray".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An Hon. Member: We are going to miss him.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Now out of respect for the Prime Minister, although heaven knows why, I will restrain from quoting the former member for Yukon, the Hon. Erik Nielsen.

Some Hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I would be willing if Your Honour and the Clerk wish that I deposit those citations with you, but I do not want to trespass on the goodwill of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. gentleman has referred to a recent book and the Chair of course would be interested in knowing which quotes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, Erik Nielsen has enough ammunition that he could run a loose-leaf service. I am not citing his book, which I do not expect you to read in the course of your duties. I am just saying that I do have citations from Hansard attributed to the former hon. member for Yukon, but I will not, as I say, trespass on the goodwill of the House here.

Let us just talk about some contemporary members of the House, some ministers who have been in the House for some time. Let us hear what they had to say during the same debate about those constitutional ads. The current Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources must have had his own Prime Minister and his own colleague, the Minister of Finance, in mind when he said on the same day, October 9, 1980, at page 3531 of Hansard:

> What the government is attempting to do is—make the point—to everyone outside the House that no matter what argument is raised, legitimately or otherwise, that argument is not valid and that the plan of action has been completed.

Another minister who believes in taking the high road must have been in High River the day the cabinet authorized these ads, for the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs had this to say in the same debate, at page 3534:

> I think that an attempt to spend public money, to manipulate public opinion on public questions that have not yet been decided is an improper practice that offends the rights of the House of Commons.

In the same debate, the Secretary of State, at page 3532 of Hansard, had this to say:

> What the Government is trying to do is suggest that its advertisements reflect a decision that has been taken. That is false; > that decision has not been taken. Those advertisements cannot be justified as being in any way a reflection of a decision taken here.

In 1980, the now Secretary of State for External Affairs flew into a rage in the House of Commons over one single ad proposing constitutional change which had been debated in the House of Commons, which he and his Party later voted for and which became the Constitution Act, 1982. He was furious at that one single ad which portrayed Canada geese floating across a Canadian sky. To him, that was a most dangerous type of ad.

I want to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, that what was sauce for the goose in 1980 is sauce for the gander in 1989.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I want to go to the ultimate authority here. I want to quote the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): For once in his political career, he was not throwing around red herrings.

I challenge him to appear in his full academic regalia and repeat the words he spoke in the House of Commons on October 9, cited at page 3537 of Hansard. I am sure he has memorized what he said. He memorizes most of what he says.

He said:

> My privilege, my reputation and my honour as a member of this House have been degraded because members of the government have been proclaiming around the country, in my name, and in the name of all members of this Parliament, slogans and view points that I believe not to be merely misleading but in many respects to be downright dishonest.

There are days I wish cabinet ministers would get up under the rules in Question Period and put a question or two, because then the Minister of National Health and Welfare could repeat his famous question of October 22, 1980, and pose it to the Minister of Finance. This is what the Member for Wellington—Dufferin—Simcoe, now the Minister of National Health and Welfare said then.

> May I ask the Minister how he can justify this double standard of exempting the Government from provisions regarding false and misleading advertising, where false and misleading advertising by the private sector would result in criminal charges being laid by the Government?

If private citizens can be prosecuted for misleading advertising why not the government of Canada?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I know that the Minister of National Health and Welfare was in on the decision to place these ads because we all know that he has to be part of every important decision. The only thing to change faster than the views of the Minister of National Health and Welfare was the decision to nuke his submarine plan. The only reason I have to feel sorry for the Minister of National Health and Welfare is that I understand he recently went to see the movie Batman and found that the role of Robin the Boy Wonder had been scrapped from the latest version of it.

What happened to all those criticisms, to all those objections that members of Parliament, now sitting on the government side of the House, now cabinet ministers of the Crown, must have raised to this advertising campaign about the goods and services tax proposal? Did they raise the same objections in Cabinet that they raised in the House, or were those objections lost in the panelling of the cabinet room? Did they simply fall on the deaf ears of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, a Prime Minister, after all, who doesn't really care too much about the fundamental principles of parliamentary practice and prefers a presidential stance.

Perhaps the Prime Minister himself dreamed up that phrase: "Please save this notice". The only reason people will save this notice is because they will want it as a reminder to vote against the Conservative government in the next election.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

I move from quoting certain honourable hypocrites to the serious ruling of a serious person. The then Speaker and now Her Excellency the Governor General, Madam Speaker Sauvé, outlined to the House how advertisements such as the one in question may be seen as a contempt of the House. She said that the advertisements would constitute contempt of the House if there was, and now I quote her, "some evidence that they represent a publication of false, perverted, partial or injurious reports of the proceedings of the House of Commons". That is found at page 3781 of Hansard of October 17, 1980.

I submit to Your Honour that the present case clearly meets the criteria established by Madam Sauvé and clearly constitutes a contempt of this House. What could be more false, perverted, partial or injurious than to place advertisements in daily newspapers across the country implying and saying directly that certain tax changes would come into effect when such tax changes had never been considered in any proceedings of the House of Commons?

The advertisements are not partially false, they are totally fiction. If publication of any partial proceeding of the House constitutes contempt, then fabrication of tax changes which can only be made by proceedings of this House must also constitute contempt of this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, Madam Sauvé, when she was Speaker, continued as follows:

> —when a person or a government attempts to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, or acts in contempt of the House, such action would constitute a prima facie case.

That was on October 17, 1980, as reported on page 3781 of Hansard.

The advertisements in question today bear the following headline, I remind you:

> On January 1, 1991, Canada's Federal Sales Tax System Will Change. Please Save This Notice.

These advertisements contain several paragraphs on the other side which precisely and concisely describe and explain the tax changes which are supposed to take place. These advertisements, Mr. Speaker, are a breach of the privileges of the House, not only because they present an erroneous, distorted view of our deliberations, but also because they state that the tax system will be changed and that it will be changed in a very specific way.

Under the Finance Department's imprimatur, which any right-thinking Canadian would take to be true, we find sentence after sentence containing flagrant untruths.

How can one publish such notices announcing that certain changes will be made when no bill to that effect has yet been presented to the House of Commons?

Madam Speaker Sauvé said this in another related ruling found at page 4213 of October 29, 1980:

> In the context of contempt, it seems to me that to amount to contempt, representations or statements about our proceedings or of the participation of Members should not only be erroneous or incorrect, but, rather, should be purposely untrue, improper and import a ring of deceit.

It is with great regret that I must state that the advertisements placed by the Department of Finance under the authority of the Minister of Finance do indeed import a ring of deceit. The advertisements were knowingly placed by the very people who were best placed to know that they were untrue, who knew they were misleading, who knew they smacked of nothing but deceit and who knew that there was nothing that Parliament had done in any way to validate the statements in the advertisements.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, the only possible serious purpose of the advertisements was to attempt to influence the Canadian public not to bother attending committee hearings, not to bother giving their views to members of Parliament, not to bother with the reports of the Finance Committee of the House of Commons, but to believe what was in those advertisements was the truth, even though it was not the truth.

• (1140)

It was an attempt to influence the Canadian people into believing that the ads represented an alleged fact, a parliamentary fact, even though they did not, and that the ads constituted the will of Parliament and expressed in the text a decision of the will of Parliament even though there had been no decision, no bill, no deliberations, no debate and probably not even a drafted text. That is only possible argument to be offered for placing those ads.

This is not only a breach of members' privileges, it is a contempt of Parliament. It is a fundamentally dishonest move to deceive the public by people who should know better.

The House of Commons has not considered any bill on the goods and services tax. The Department of Finance which placed these ads is responsible for drafting any such bill. The Minister of Finance, who is responsible for introducing the bill, is the same minister who is responsible for allowing the ads to be placed, knowing that no legislation has been drafted, knowing that no legislation has been presented, knowing that the committee of finance under the chairmanship of the member for Mississauga South is seeking the opinions of Canadians. All of that is a flagrant contempt of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Centre): As manipulative as it would have been for the Minister of Finance to place ads stating what he would recommend to Parliament, that is not what he did. He went one step further. He allowed ads to be placed which indicated in specific terms that his recommendations had already become law. As misleading as it would have been for the minister to place ads stating that the tax system would change in some way or other, that is not what he did. He placed ads saying that the tax system would change in a specific manner, and in the ad he lists proposed changes in specific terms, pre-empting the work of the House of Commons, pre-empting the role of members of Parliament.

Now, the minister cannot claim that the ads merely provide information to the Canadian public about his proposals because, according to the ads, it is not a proposal, this is law. "On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change," and he lists the specific changes. And, "Please, save this notice," because nothing is going to change, nothing that members of Parliament can say, nothing that Canadians can say, nothing is going to change, so please, save this notice.

The minister cannot claim that he is merely giving notice to the Canadian people of future tax changes. The Standing Committee on Finance, acting on Standing Order 108 (2) of this House is conducting hearings to advise the minister whether he should draft legislation on any goods and services tax. Until such time as he hears from the committee, the Minister of Finance is not in a position to give any detailed notice unless he is willing to admit contempt for the very House of Commons committee set up to advise him.

In our submission to you, Mr. Speaker, misrepresentations contained in the ads prejudice in a fundamental way the proceedings of this House of Commons. We have offered to you detailed precedents on the question of privilege. My colleagues will offer parliamentary analysis of the specifics contained in these newspaper advertisements. I put before you and submit to you, Your Honour, that this is a significant question of privilege covering the issue of contempt, under which it has always been placed. If you find a prima facie case, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Now, you do not need a precedent on the issue of contempt, but I attempted to outline for you earlier parallel proceedings which support our claim. Again, I am prepared to submit the appropriate motion, if you should so find.

Thank you for your indulgence and for the indulgence of the House. Nothing is more fundamental than for members to stand on their feet to defend the issue of privilege of the House, because only when we do it on behalf of the Canadian people can governments be held to account. This type of presidential largesse, this type of contemptuous treatment of the people's representatives on the fundamental issue of Parliament, the issue of taxation, the foundation of Parliament, cannot be tolerated by you, Sir, or by any of us who sit in this Chamber.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a copy of an ad that appeared in newspapers across the country in the middle of the summer. It says, and I quote:

> On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change.

That is misleading, it is false, it is wrong and above all, in a democratic parliamentary system, it is contempt of Parliament and contempt of the people of Canada. That is what that ad is all about.

The people who put that ad in newspapers from one coast to the other are precisely the same people who, when they were on this side of the House, accurately pointed out that parliamentary tradition, if it means anything, means that a government of the day cannot use the funds of the people of Canada to advocate public policy that has not yet been approved by the Parliament of Canada. That is the point that is at stake here.

I want to say in making this point that I listened with interest to the Leader of the Opposition and support almost everything he had to say, but I also note that he said at one point that what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander. He was quoting the Conservatives at length in their criticism of such action in the past. What he did not point out, of course, is that the Conservatives, when they were critcizing this action, were criticizing the Liberal government that was performing in precisely the same manner.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the reality is that there has been an evolution toward this kind of advocacy advertising on the part of governments that was opposed by the New Democratic Party when it was done in 1980 by a federal Liberal government following a referendum in the province of Quebec, a referendum, the federal side of which had been supported by the then Leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Member for Yellowhead, and the government and the New Democratic Party. We believed that advertising that advocated a certain policy before it was approved by the Parliament of Canada, even if it was a policy we advocated, should not be supported by the spending of public funds. We said it in 1980; we repeat it now. I just wish the Liberals were a little more consistent.

Mr. Simmons: I cannot take it.

Mr. Broadbent: No, the Liberals cannot take it. They have trouble with the truth. The Liberals have a lot of problems with that.

Mr. Simmons: What would you know about that?

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the reality is that not only has the government proceeded over the summer in utter contempt of parliament by saying that changes are going to come into effect in 1991, but it has in the same ad listed a whole number of alleged elements of this change, the factual claims of which are totally at variance with the documents that were produced during the summer pertinent to the 9 per cent increase.

I want to deal both with the matter of parliamentary legitimacy which is being violated by the Government, and, in that context, with the misleading nature of the ads themselves in terms of what the government claims it is doing with this 9 per cent tax. It is full of outright misstatements, to use parliamentary language, that outside the House might be called by ordinary people, lies. Let me say it is misleading in terms of what is in there.

The ad says that this change that will go into effect at the beginning of 1991 is going to, among other things, help low-income Canadians. The reality is that some 300,000 families at or below the poverty level are going to be paying more taxes, not lower taxes, as a result of this 9 per cent change. So the government is misleading the people on that claim itself.

Mr. Oberle: Be honest!

Mr. Broadbent: I am, and the minister should be honest. He should go through these ads and listen to the interest groups who have appeared before the parliamentary committee, not supporters of the opposition parties, stating their views. He would then find out the truth about what is involved.

Not only is it inappropriate for the government to be spending money in advance of Parliament taking a stand on a policy matter, whether it is a tax matter or any other, but it is also the case in the given instance that the government, having done this, subsequently agreed with changes proposed by opposition parties to have hearings outside of Ottawa and even to have these hearings televised so the people of Canada can have their views known. If all these changes that the government asserts in its advertising are going to take place with the considerable detail outlined in the advertisements put in the papers, what, we ask, is the relevance of the hearings.

Does it make sense to go to the people of Canada? According to a decision reached, the committee is going to eight provinces as well as to Whitehorse. There surely is a contempt of Parliament by proceeding with these ads before Parliament has agreed. Beyond that, there is a contempt of the people of Canada if they say they are going to have hearings across the country and not pay the slightest attention to what the people of Canada have to say.

that almost all groups that have attended the hearings here in Ottawa have clearly indicated that they are against this sales tax. Groups, corporations, poor people's groups, women's groups, all groups here in Canada, are against this sales tax.

[English]

The other day, the Prime Minister was seen on television saying that he speaks for the people of Canada, while these people only speak for interest groups. When you have interest groups from Newfoundland to British Columbia representing women, the poor, large and small business and virtually all of Canada, we in this party say that it is the interest groups in this instance who speak for the people of Canada and not the Prime Minister, and he ought to listen.

It seems to us that in terms of parliamentary tradition, whether it was your predecessor or Mr. Roland Michener when he was Speaker of the House who spoke on this, the principle is very clear. The government ought not to be using the funds of the people of Canada for a political, partisan position of the government of the day in advance of a parliamentary agreement. This process started with the previous Liberal government, and to be fair, it was not used widely then, but it was started then. It was the beginning of the view that the government of the day can use the people's own money to advocate essentially political policies before they are approved.

If it was started by the Liberals in the 1980s, the practice has been extended and multiplied almost ad infinitum by the Conservatives on almost every major issue that has come up since the Conservatives were elected in 1984. They have used the people's money to do through public expenditure what they ought to have been doing as politicians, which is to persuade the people of Canada directly themselves. This process has got to stop.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In rising in support of this question of privilege, I repeat that the point is of fundamental importance, but it has been something that other governments have pursued. If we are to put an end to it, Your Honour, there can be no better time than when there is a tax proposal that is unfair, inequitable and counter-productive in terms of economic growth. In almost every aspect, the tax proposal is not desirable.

What is at issue is the right of Parliament to decide and, after a decision has been reached, then it is permitted for a government to use its offices to declare in an informative way what a factual situation is in terms of the law of Canada.

Your Honour, you have the right, and some of us believe the obligation, to rule against the government on this particular occasion. In so doing, I say not only would you be taking a major step in the process of stopping an inequitable tax to be brought in by this government, but more fundamentally, in reaching such a decision, you will be reasserting the basic principle of parliamentary democracy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Before hearing from the Hon. Minister of Justice, I think it is necessary for the Chair to say for the record that the debate which is taking place is on the question of whether or not the publication of this ad and its contents constitutes a contempt of the House. It is not a debate on the relative merits, whatever they may be or not be, with respect to a proposed piece of legislation. I think that has to be carefully kept in mind and that is what I have to keep in mind in making the decision which is sought in this chamber.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I start out by welcoming the comment you just made and indicating that I will deal with the argument put forward. However, I would appreciate the same latitude that was accorded to my colleagues who spoke earlier. I do that because I appreciate that they feel it is a serious matter.

I want to preface my remarks by welcoming the House back. I know that members have had an active summer and are anxious to get back to the business of government. We, as you know, Mr. Speaker, wanted to start off today with debate on the bill to establish the Ministry of Forestry. We informed the opposition of this two weeks ago and our speakers are ready. I am not sure whether this is a delaying tactic because their speakers are not ready, but ours are ready, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister tells us he is ready to debate the bill.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): So what!

Mr. Gauthier: So what! We have before us a question of privilege, a question of contempt of the House. I think it has precedence over the minister's disposition to debate a bill. We are ready, too, to debate any bill he brings forward.

Mr. Lewis: It is always nice to know when you have struck a nerve, Mr. Speaker. I cannot help but notice that that brought my friend to his feet. I regret the delay just as he does and his members who want to debate this very important bill on the ministry of forestry act. I appreciate that as Whip he has brought his members back and they are now cooling their heels.

I cannot help but in opening my remarks refer to the fact that my hon. colleague, the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, made liberal reference to Mr. Diefenbaker. There is one other quote that he should remember. Mr. Diefenbaker said: "When you are hunting bear you shouldn't be distracted by the rabbit tracks". I think what we are seeing here today is two parties distracted by the rabbit tracks, because the essence of the GST debate should be handled elsewhere.

I think it is fair to say that the replacement of the present federal sales tax with the goods and services tax is a fundamental change in the way sales taxes are applied in Canada. We appreciate that. We felt it was our job and our responsibility as a government to see that all individual Canadians, whether they are employers or employees, understand the changes that we are proposing.

When one places ads one always wants to know that they are being read. I appreciate the publicity that my hon. colleagues have given this issue by referring to the ads that were placed across Canada. We are pleased that they have had that impact on the Canadian people and on my colleagues in opposition.

Reading the text of the ads has never been a great strength of my colleagues opposite. So if I may, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to point out one thing. I do not want to read the entire ad. I could go on to say that it is a major program to reduce the deficit. I could say that it will strengthen our international competitiveness, but what I would like to focus on are the words "proposed changes".

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I appreciate the comments of my hon. friend and I listened with interest. I just want to bring to his attention that it says in the headlines that the federal sales tax system "will" change. There is no proposed. There is no maybe. There is no likely. It is "will". It is very clear.

Mr. Lewis: My hon. friend only reads the left side of any newspaper. This is on the right side.

Mr. Gauthier: If the Minister would read the article or text we are talking about, I may remind him that Citation 83 of Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, reads as follows:

> Should a question of privilege be based on published material, the article in question must be submitted and read at the Table.

It makes no difference to us whether the Minister wants to read the right side or the left side of the ad. If he doesn't want to read it, he should ask the clerk to do it for him. We read the ad, and we say it is unparliamentary and undemocratic.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: While my hon. friend was out rounding up his critics on the forestry act, his leader made liberal reference to the advertisement in question. I was just picking a point out that perhaps my hon. friend had missed.

I think that what we have here is an effort by the government to inform Canadians about proposed changes. It has resulted in a great number of calls from interested Canadians, many of whom I understand are supportive of the act and the suggestion. We have had a flood of requests for overview documents and technical papers, and I know that right now the department is anticipating another flood of requests for information as a result of the fact that this has been raised by the Hon. Leader of the Opposition.

There is a bit of a contradiction here. My hon. friend says on the one hand: "You should not distribute material, you should not advertise it is available for distribution", and at the same time members of the committee last week were calling for further debate and further hearings. You cannot have it both ways. He either wants full and open hearings with full and open advertisements as to proposed changes or he does not. What we have to do is decide that.

In the interest of exposing this issue to the House and enabling you, Sir, to make your decision, I would point out that on March 16, 1988 there was a report of the finance committee which recommended unanimously that if the government were to proceed with a value added tax it should publicize the details of that tax and the relevant social policy transfers.

It is hard to say who was the finance critic for the Liberal Party at that time, just as it is today. In any event, that committee when it reported said to publicize the details, so we are taking that unanimous recommendation and we are publicizing the details. I think that is in the interest of what we are trying to do.

Great comment has been made here today that the House has never made any decision on whether or not to go ahead with the goods and services tax. I realize that the opposition was distracted last spring. Last spring we brought in a budget and the opposition was distracted for about six weeks or eight weeks. How long was it? They completely missed the fact that in that budget there was a goods and services tax. I am sorry that they missed that. The quotes in there are: "These measures will be replaced by the new sales tax to be implemented on January 1, 1991".

I would also refer my hon. friend to the fact that on May 15 of this year the House approved in general, and I quote, "the budgetary policy of the government". The goods and services tax is included in the budgetary policy of the government and therefore has been approved by the House.

I know that my friends will not be persuaded by that political argument, so let me move quickly to the procedural argument. This is a political argument and I do not have any difficulty with that. We will make the political argument. We are making it in committee, we are making it in the House, and we are making it in the country. Let us look at what the well-known experts say about parliamentary privilege, and I shall read from Erskine May, page 143, where it states:

> It may be stated generally that any act or omission which obstructs or impedes either House of Parliament in the performance of its functions, or which obstructs or impedes any Member or officer of such House in the discharge of his duty, or which has a tendency, directly or indirectly, to produce such results may be treated as contempt even though there is no precedent of the offence.

The committee is sitting. The debate is going on. Nobody is impeded. Nobody yet in this debate has suggested to you, Mr. Speaker, they are impeded from doing what they should do as members of parliament.

The same point is made also in Abraham and Hawtrey on page 80. It has to impede the member and the member's abilities.

Let us talk about advertisements. We are fortunate in this to be able to produce some comments from a well-known Canadian presently listed as a three to two favourite, the Hon. Jean Chrétien. I know that members of the House who are at five to one, ten to one, and twenty-five to one, the hon. members for Hamilton East and Gloucester, will be interested in these comments. This is not post time. Post time is on a weekend in June, but that is where they are.

Let us deal with what Mr. Chrétien said. He said that it was the goal that the House of Commons was pursuing at that time in order to have constitutional reform come quickly and effectively to Canada. He said: "I do not think that the privileges of the members have been affected". He is referring, of course, to an advertising campaign put on at the time by the government of the day to promote constitutional reform just as we are promoting tax reform. That was defended vigorously—and I notice he stepped out for a minute—by the present member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold. He said, and these are great words: "There is a need to achieve understanding of Canada's evolution, the integrity of the federal system of the Government." This is on page 16839 for my colleagues who will want to read those citations in full. I have other citations, but I want to close.

My colleagues made great reference to the arguments that we made in opposition. I want to close with the ruling of the Speaker of the day. Let us get to the issue of advertising in advance of a parliamentary decision was decided. What is the precedent that the House is looking to? What is the precedent, Sir, that you will look to in making your decision?

Let us look at the precedent at page 3780 on October 17, 1980 of Hansard. Madam Speaker said:

> On Thursday last the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) raised a question of privilege, the gist of which is set out in his proposed motion where he asked:
> > That the matter of the financing of public advertising campaigns at taxpayers expense on behalf of a partisan policy or opinion, before such policy or opinion has been approved by the House of Commons, be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The Speaker dealt with it in a very well reasoned judgment. I remember thinking so at the time. She said in brief that the issue is whether that allegation of using public funds to publicize a matter is a breach of privilege, prima facie I might add. She commented that the privileges of Members are: freedom of speech in the House and the right to attend their parliamentary work without being subject to subpoenas to be a witness in other arenas, without being called for jury duty, without being subject to civil arrest.

She said:

> In addition, the House itself has the power to provide for its own constitution, its own procedure, to discipline its members and to punish for contempt.

Those are the privileges that my hon. friends claim are breached. They are certainly attending their parliamentary work. They are at committee. They are here in the House. Life goes on. We tried to get the forestry act on but we were impeded. I guess if there is anybody being impeded it is the members who support a department of forestry. Those are the people who are being impeded. Those people who depend on the forestry economy are being impeded, not the members here.

The Speaker concluded:

> The spending of public money cannot be the issue, but when a person or government attempts to interfere with our deliberations through spending public money, or otherwise, directly or indirectly, or acts in contempt of the House, such action would constitute a prima facie case. However, the inference must be such that the member or the House is truly hindered or intimidated.

I say this to my friends opposite. None of them are intimidated. None of them are hindered. They are all here.

Mr. Broadbent: I am.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member for Oshawa is intimidated. Nonsense. There have been things a lot more intimidating than this.

This is public debate and I close by submitting to you, Mr. Speaker, that there has been no prima facie case of privilege. The ads were for proposed changes. They were for informational purposes. In fact they have done their job and we have hundreds and thousands of requests for information. We are trying to inform the people. As a result they are going to the finance committee. There is debate at committee. There is debate in the country. That is what we wanted.

This is no quickie through the night. This is reasoned debate and information. I say to you that that is where the debate should take place. It should take place at committee, in the country and in the House of Commons when the bill comes forward, but not under the guise of a prima facie case of privilege, which it clearly is not.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the legislation this House is asked to consider is important, but even more important is the very concept of the House itself and its ability to do its duty in a free, fair and untrammelled manner. I say this not simply in conjunction with its debates but in terms of the interaction between the members of this House and the people of Canada.

I think it very wrong for the government through the Minister of Justice not to recognize that when members of this House raise a question of privilege they are not impeding in any way its process but are making sure this process can operate in the most fundamental and beneficent sense in terms of the interests of this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This House cannot function if its privileges are not respected. This House cannot function if the government of the day treats it with contempt as we submit it has done by putting these misleading and inaccurate advertisements in newspapers across this country.

The Minister of Justice came here crying crocodile tears about the fact that in an effort to preserve the foundations of our parliamentary system we are raising this question of privilege and asking you to rule as to whether there is a prima facie question of privilege before we get on today to the matter of the setting up of a department of forestry.

The Minister of Justice said that he had told us in our House Leaders' meeting two weeks ago that this bill on forestry was to be the first item of business called. I want to remind the Minister of Justice and this House that well before that, on August 28, we gave formal notice in writing to you, Sir, that we intended to raise a question of privilege about the advertisements that the Department of Finance put in a number of Canadian newspapers on August 26, 1989.

The Minister of Justice talks about the well-known saying of the late Mr. Diefenbaker with reference to distraction by rabbit tracks. I say that when one looks at the flimsy and superficial argument offered by the Minister of Justice he is really giving rabbits and their tracks a bad name.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The Minister of Justice, in a desperate attempt to find some hook on which to place its justification for the ads in question, says: "Let's take a look at the ads". He notes that in very small print in one spot the word "proposed" occurs. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take a look at the advertisement as a whole and the over-all impression conveyed and I think intended to be conveyed by the advertisement.

One of your distinguished predecessors, Mr. Speaker, has already been quoted here. Madam Speaker Sauvé in her ruling of October 17, 1980 said, and I want to quote this again:

> The fact that certain members feel they are disadvantaged by not having the same funds to advertise as does the government, which could possibly be a point of debate, as a matter of impropriety or under any other heading, does not constitute a prima facie case of privilege unless such advertisements themselves constitute a contempt of the House, and to do so there would have to be some evidence that they represent a publication of false, perverted, partial or injurious reports of the proceedings of the House—

Madam Sauvé, a few weeks later, on October 29, 1980, giving a ruling on a related question said:

> My role is to interpret the extracts of the document in question, not in terms of their substance, but to find whether on their face they represent such a distorted interpretation of the events or remarks of our proceedings that they obviously attract the characterization of false.

It does no good for the Minister of Justice to desperately dredge out from the bowels of this ad, buried somewhere in it, the word "proposed". When one looks at the ad on its face one is drawn irresistibly to the conclusion that it is false in the sense referred to by Madam Speaker Sauvé.

Now we look at the ad itself. It covered two full pages in the newspapers and on one page we found only these words: "On January 1, 1991 Canada's federal sales tax system will change. Please Save This Notice." Then the ad on the same page goes on to say: "It explains the changes and the reasons for them".

It does not say it explains the proposed changes. It does not say we are giving you some ideas to help you come before the finance committee. It says in effect: "This is it. Do not bother expressing your opinion. This is the message. Do not bother expressing your opinion to the finance committee. Do not bother expressing your opinion to your members of parliament". Canada's federal sales tax system, the ad says, will change. It explains the changes and the reasons for them and says: "Please Save This Notice".

I do not think it helps the government in any way to have been able to find the word proposed, as I have said, buried in the bowels of this ad, this abomination of an ad. I do not think it helps the government at all to say that a parliamentary committee two years ago, or a year and a half ago—anyway before the last election—talked about the goods and services tax because there is nothing in this ad on its face or in its substance that says its purpose is to tell people about the parliamentary committee report.

I do not think it helps the Minister of Justice to say that the government presented a budgetary statement to this House which made some reference to a new sales tax. It does not help the government to say that this House, or rather the Conservative majority in it, adopted a motion approving the budget in general terms because the budget statement in question did not contain the information purported to be conveyed by the advertisements in question.

For all anybody could know from reading the budget statement, what was going to eventually come forward would have been a 1 per cent tax on caviare or a 2 per cent tax on stock exchange transactions. Because every time we asked the government what was going to be in this tax, because we said we could not get any information about it from the budget statement, the Minister of Finance said: "Well, you will just have to wait for the technical paper, wait for the technical paper", which did not come out until months after the budget statement was presented, after the House was adjourned for the summer.

I respectfully submit that it is not an answer to the point of privilege raised by the Leader of the Opposition today to say that there was some reference to a new sales tax in the budget statement, because the details of the government's tax which were contained in the ad we are talking about today were not in the budget statement.

On the contrary, the government went out of its way to write its budget statement in a form which hid the full, devious, unfair and harmful intentions it had about its new goods and services tax.

The fact there is a budget statement and it was approved by the Conservative majority in this house is not in any way an answer to our concern that this advertisement is a contempt of the House, because on its face it is false in that it conveys to the public the idea that a decision has been made which is final and irrevocable and all that people are now supposed to do is save the ad so they will be able to know the awful fate in store for them through the Conservatives' goods and services tax.

I might say that the government cannot have it both ways. On the one hand, at one point in his remarks the Minister of Justice was saying this ad was simply designed to tell people about the report of the finance committee in 1988. In the next breath he says: "Wait a minute, I am not certain about that. What I am really trying to say is that this ad tells people what was in the budget". He cannot have it both ways. The fact is it does neither. It is intended to convey on its face, by people who obviously knew what they were doing, that there had been a final decision which the people of Canada would have to submit to.

It might be asked whether the people of Canada, in reading this advertisement, understood that it was conveying the impression there was a final decision which involved this House of Commons. I am not suggesting that every Canadian is an expert in parliamentary procedure, but I am sure that Canadians generally, if we asked them how a tax like this comes into effect, would say this happens because the House of Commons votes in favour of it.

Therefore, when this advertisement in question says in effect there will be a new tax on January 1, 1991, and that is it, the advertisement is intended to convey the idea that parliament has acted on it because that is, I am sure, the ordinary understanding of Canadians about how a tax like this is finally adopted and comes into effect. That being the case, it is clearly a contempt of parliament because it amounts to a misrepresentation of the role of this House in this matter at the time the ad was presented and even today as we speak.

We know that at the time the advertisement was presented no bill for adopting this tax had been approved by the House. No bill for that purpose had been even given first reading. In fact, in the technical paper that appeared a few weeks before the ad, the Minister said the bill had not even been drafted yet. There was not even a Ways and Means motion which, if adopted, might have given some foundation for an ad of this type, but even that had not happened. I submit what we have here is a case that falls squarely within the principle enunciated by Madam Sauvé. We have in this ad a misrepresentation of the role of this house.

Next we ask: Was this purposeful, was this intended? We are not dealing here with an offhand comment made by a minister facing a group of reporters in a scrum outside this House after Question Period. We are not dealing with an offhand comment by a minister in a quick radio or television interview. We are dealing with what is obviously a very fully thought through and deliberate act by people who are in many ways the elite of the Public Service of Canada, the officials of the Department of Finance acting on behalf of one of the senior ministers, the Minister of Finance, and therefore on behalf of the entire Government of Canada.

An advertisement of this type does not slip out without thought and reflection. It is not an accident. On its face it is a purposeful and deliberate act. Clearly, what we are talking about is the situation contemplated by Madam Sauvé when she laid down her very useful principles with respect to what, when it comes to an advertisement, would constitute a contempt of this House.

I want to deal with one other point. The Minister of Justice attempted to enumerate what constitutes the privileges of this House. He said, "Well, nobody has suggested yet that anything involving this advertisement affects one of these enumerated privileges".

We are dealing with something more serious and more profound than what is ordinarily considered under the heading of privilege. We are dealing with the matter of contempt, contempt of this House. It is true that when one asks the Speaker to deal with the issue of a contempt of this House it is raised through the vehicle of a question of privilege, but contempt is not exactly the same thing as the privileges of this House. It is something that goes further. It is more profound. It is more substantial. To quote Madam Speaker Sauvé in her ruling of October 29 she said:

> I can assure all hon. members that the dimension of contempt of Parliament is such that the House will not be constrained in finding a breach of privileges of members or of the House.
> This is precisely for the reason that, while our privileges are defined, contempt of the House has no limits. When new ways are found to interfere with our proceedings, so too will the House, in appropriate cases, be able to find that a contempt of the House has occurred.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is totally irrelevant for the Minister of Justice to enumerate what has commonly been defined as being among the privileges of this House because we are dealing with something, as I have said, more broad, more profound, and which is not required to fit into existing definitions of privilege that is the matter of the contempt of this House.

Therefore, I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that while on the one hand what we are talking about here—this abomination of an advertisement that appeared in newspapers across Canada last August—falls within what Madam Speaker Sauvé has said would constitute a contempt of this House, it is also open to you—and I invite you to do so—to look at this advertisement and the arguments made about what is wrong with it and find that it is a contempt of this House because it is within your power to define, in terms of new situations and new circumstances, what constitutes a contempt.

I stress, Mr. Speaker, that if you would prefer to deal with this on the basis of precedent in terms of previous rulings, then you have that opportunity clearly in terms of the language of Madam Speaker Sauvé. What we have here in this advertisement is something which is false on its face in terms of of what purports to be a report of the proceedings of the House of Commons or representation of what members have done. I repeat, the only way that the statement on the face of this ad, which reads: "On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change, please save this notice"—it explains the changes and the reasons for them—the only way it could have meaning is if it is intended to convey the idea that this House has acted in a way which would make the changes in the ad possible, and we know this has not happened. Therefore I predict that if this government has the interests of this country at heart and listens to the Liberals and to the New Democrats, but above all listens to the people of Canada, these changes will not take place and in fact they must not take place.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I may be able to assist members by indicating that I have been listening very closely. As the members will notice, I have been taking notes. I think I have the arguments. The Hon. Member for Kamloops is rising. I will hear him briefly.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I do have some brief comments to make, to add to points already put forward by members of the opposition and the hon. member from Oshawa.

I want to begin by suggesting that what we see before us when we refer to the advertisement that is being discussed here today, is something that I think we must also recognize as being libellous and defamatory against the House of Commons and against the members of the House.

When a government department does not accept a decision made by Parliament, the ultimate form, if you like, in our decision-making, the question is: Does it have a right, then, at the urging of their minister, to use taxpayers' money to challenge the decision of Parliament? I will use an example. If the Minister of Justice did not support or would not accept the decision made by the House of Commons on the decision of reproductive technology, would he feel it appropriate, then, to use taxpayers' money in his department to take out full page ads condemning the House of Commons, condemning the decision made by the duly elected members in the House?

I think we would agree as parliamentarians that that would not be appropriate. It would not be an appropriate use of the authority given to the minister. It would not be an appropriate use of taxpayers' funds allotted to that department. Have we not had exactly the same situation occur here? The ad in itself, as others have pointed out, indicates that there will be a tax change. There is no question about that, if you look at the ad.

Recognizing that this ad was taken out by the Department of Finance, presumably with the authorization of the Minister of Finance, it points out a number of items. It points out that the federal sales tax has been pushed beyond its limits. Therein lies the criticism, that, presumably, this ad is suggesting that the House of Commons, in its wisdom, in terms of amending the tax legislation, has increased the tax system, in this case the federal manufacturers' tax, to such an extent that it has been pushed beyond its limits, that it becomes meaningless, that it is not functioning appropriately. Is that, then, not a question about the decision-making of this House? While we in the House would disagree, when the decision is made, when the vote is taken, and time after time when the government has increased the manufacturers' sales tax—and since 1984, it has increased it four and a half percentage points to 13.5 per cent—that was, whether we in the opposition liked that initiative or not, a decision of this House.

Here we have the Minister of Finance criticizing that decision. We have the Minister of Finance, as a result of this ad with the support of the Finance Department, saying that that decision was wrong-headed, that that decision was a bad one, an inappropriate decision.

We go on in this advertisement. It comments on the tax system as being structurally weak. The House of Commons, over the years, has determined what kind of tax system we have. Is it the right, then, of the Minister of Finance, after he or she has been a part of that decision-making, to condemn the decisions taken by that government, by using taxpayers' money in terms of a propaganda machine to achieve another agenda item.

He goes on in this advertisement to suggest that the tax system is unpredictable and unreliable. Again, what he is doing is criticizing the decisions of his government. He is criticizing the decisions taken by this House. I suspect, Mr. Speaker, that while many of us may agree that the decision itself was that this is the tax system we have, here we have the Minister of Finance condemning the decisions of the House of Commons, and using taxpayers' money on top of that.

I think we all agree that if a particular political party wishes to launch an advertising campaign to promote a certain idea, they have a right to do that. I think it is perfectly clear, if the Conservative Party of Canada, who presumably wanted to introduce this tax, and if that is part of their political agenda, then they should be using party funds to promote this idea. But that did not occur, Mr. Speaker. That is why we believe that there has been an act towards contempt of this Parliament.

• (1240)

Mr. Riis: In a previous decision on this matter Speaker Sauvé in her explanation of her decision pointed out that for her to find a prima facie case of privilege it would only exist if there was a publication of false material. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no question that that has been the case, on two counts.

First, it is impossible at this point for the government to say that there will be a tax change. The government has no right to suggest that until the documentation has been properly introduced in the House of Commons. I want to refer specifically to some items that have not yet been introduced.

We recognize that our fundamental right as a House is to grant money and to impose taxes. This right, Mr. Speaker, as you are well aware, is the prize of centuries of struggle and even wars against monarchs and governors. In Canada, this important democratic right and privilege has been cemented right into our Constitution. The Constitutional Act of 1867 reads under section 53:

> Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, when it says "originate in the House of Commons", it does not mean originate in a government advertisement using taxpayers' money to suggest that there will be a different tax.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, the next section of the Constitution is also relevant to this discussion. This is a balance, if you like, which ensures that the House does not grant or tax without recommendations of the Crown. Again, I quote from section 54 of the act:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

As previous speakers have indicated, the Governor General has not recommended to this House that such an initiative be taken. That in itself, Mr. Speaker, ought to encourage you to recognize we have sufficient evidence for a prima facie case of privilege. I do want to suggest that we are not asking you to decide if the matter that is raised before us ought to go to the committee for consideration. We are simply asking you to determine whether there is sufficient prima facie evidence about the question to permit a motion to go before this House so that the House of Commons can decide whether or not this item should go to the appropriate committee. I think it is appropriate, Mr. Speaker; we are simply asking for the opportunity to have the question placed before the House.

When one goes on and looks at the precedents before us, I want to simply draw to your attention Standing Order 80 as it presently reads. It states that:

> (1) All aids and supplies granted to the Sovereign by the Parliament of Canada are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the House, as it is the undoubted right of the House to direct, limit and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants which are not alterable by the Senate.

Again, this has not been done. The House Leader for the government indicated that it had been indicated in the House that this would be an intention of the government as a result of a finance committee report. We all remember well the contents of that report and the recommendation. The recommendation was simply if the government proceeds with a consumption tax of some sort that it should make every effort to inform the public as to its implications. There was no mention that this is a 9 per cent tax; no suggestion that it would be a multi-level tax; no suggestion that there would be rebates and exemptions. I think we have to simply clarify the point that the government House Leader made in his argument.

Clearly, the House has not received any Royal Recommendation that such a goods and service tax be imposed. I think that is fundamental, Mr. Speaker. For years and years the tradition of this House has been that no initiative would be taken unless a Royal Recommendation was received in advance, and such has not occurred.

I want to quote a recent parliamentary counsel who wrote the following, "When by some act or word a person disobeys, or is openly disrespectful of the authority of the House of Commons or Senate of their lawful commands, that person is subject to being held in contempt by the House of Commons or Senate as the case may be".

On two counts, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Minister of Finance had no authorization by which to proceed with this advertisement suggesting to Canadians that on January 1, 1991, a federal sales tax system will change. There is no authorization, again, because of the lack of any royal initiative.

Second, the Minister of Finance was acting in contempt of Parliament, again, for suggesting that there were all sorts of problems associated with the existing federal manufacturers' tax, when it was in fact his Government that is responsible for the nature of that tax as it is today. In a sense, it was the Minister and his officials publicly condemning outside the House of Commons actions and decisions taken by this House. For that reason I believe that we do have a prima facie case of privilege before us. If you would find that to be the case, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in an earlier letter to you, it would also be my intention to move the appropriate motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I want to reiterate that the Chair has been listening very carefully, and I think I probably have most of the points.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier has a brief matter which I am prepared to hear, and then I will hear the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the debate this morning, and I would now like to explain very briefly why this ad, published at great expense in newspapers across the country, in English and in French, is open to a very specific interpretation, at least in the French version.

I want to go back to the text of the ad which appeared in the newspapers on August 26 this year. In French, it reads as follows: "Le 1er janvier 1991, le régime de la taxe fédérale de vente connaîtra des modifications. Veuillez conserver cet avis." So far, I believe the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner), the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and others said what needed to be said. However, the ad goes on to read as follows: "Il explique les modifications apportées et les raisons qui y président —".

In the French text, the word "apportées" indicates that the changes were made, were adopted. That is not the case in the English text.

[English]

It explains the changes made. We do not say that in English. We say that it explains the changes and the reasons for them. But in French, Mr. Speaker, it says the changes "made". It seems to me a very clear point of intent. If that is true, then it changes the whole dynamics of how one speaks to Canadians in one's language.

I will send you the appropriate text, Mr. Speaker. I think you have the French text, but I will send it to you.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I could mention Maingot's comments on contempt and privilege. I think Hon. Members already heard my leader and my parliamentary House Leader speak with considerable eloquence on the subject. My point is simply that this Government cannot use its majority to make Canadians believe that they and they alone can change taxes in Canada. Parliament, Mr. Speaker, has that authority. I maintain it is a violation of the privileges of Parliament, of this House of every single Member, both on the Government and on the Opposition side, to have paid the princely sum of $800,000 for a newspaper advertisement which says: The changes in the Income Tax Act have now been made. Make way for the 9 per cent tax!

• (1250)

Mr. Speaker, my Leader in the House reminds me that both languages, both in this advertisement and according to our custom here in the House, are equally valid. If I look at the French text, it is clear we have no choice: The die is cast. The tax will become effective on January 1, 1991, come hell or high water. Mr. Speaker, I object to this practice, and I am absolutely against an interpretation that is not reflected in the other language.In fact,only one message should be given here, and that is a message from the House to Canadians who are listening, a message which I think must be clear. The Government has violated the privileges of this House by going to great expense to place an ad that is false and inaccurate and conveys a message that is entirely incorrect.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I have indicated to the House that I think I have probably heard sufficient argument. If the hon. member is rising because he feels that there is some point that has not been touched upon, I will hear him very briefly, but I think we should move on.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, yes, I will respect your clarification at the beginning as to just what we are debating. It is not the content of the tax bill, but just the contempt of Parliament.

I rise to add something that has not been stated in this debate. Prior to making your decision, Mr. Speaker, I request that you or your staff walk across from your office to the parliamentary reading room. You will see that the same ad has been put in all of the major ethnocultural newspapers in Canada. I just had an opportunity to look briefly yesterday at the same ad given in the Novy Domov, the Czechoslovak bi-weekly; the Zwjaz Kowiec, the Polish bi-weekly; Meie Elu, Our Life, the Estonian weekly; Latvije-Amerika; Kanadsky-Slovék, the Canadian-Slovakn; Homin Ukrainy, the Ukrainian Echo; the Téviskés Ziburiai, the Lithuanian weekly; the Corriere Canadese. These are just a few that I looked at. The same ad appeared in all of these major ethnocultural newspapers across Canada.

When Canadians who subscribe to these newspapers see an ad from the government, they believe it is fact, that it is already legislation. And it is not. If the ad would at least read, "federal sales tax system may change" or "the government is proposing changes", I would accept it. I would have no argument. But the ad said: "On January 1, 1991, Canada's federal sales tax system will change." And because it will change, "Please save this notice." And this ad explains the changes and the reasons for them.

Why are we wasting all the money sending a parliamentary standing committee across Canada? Why are we getting our salaries here? Why are we going through this fiasco, Mr. Speaker? Let us respect authority, the authority of this House of Commons which the government has lost. It has lost all respect for the authority of Parliament. That is exactly what we are debating. That is exactly what I would like you to add to your decision because I know, Mr. Speaker, you are going to be looking for precedents. You may not find any.

No other government in the history of Canada would dare pull such a stunt when they are bringing about a major tax change in this country. It is a heavy burden on your shoulders, Mr. Speaker. You may be the one who may have to set a precedent to protect the authority of Parliament; to protect my individual privilege and work as a member. The hon. House Leader said we are free; our privileges as members have not been affected. Yes, my privilege has been affected. Sixty per cent of my constituents are Canadians who read these newspapers. They are saying, "Mr. Flis, we thought we elected you to parliament". They are saying, "But decisions have already been made. Why did we send you there?"

So, yes, my privileges as an individual member have also been denied and tampered with. But the major debate here—and it is a very heavy burden we have place on your shoulders, Mr. Speaker, and this is why I am adding this additional information—is that we must protect the authority of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I will need to take more than just a couple of minutes to make a couple of points that I think are important. I do not want to get involved with much of the debate that has gone on because I think it is largely political in nature and dealing to a certain degree with the substance rather than with the question of privilege that is before us.

The point I want to make is this. First, the opposition seems to have tried to make a case of the distinction between a case of privilege and a case of contempt. I want to deal with that very quickly because I think it is important that we look at that.

First of all, the question that is before the Chair at this point really is, very essentially: Have the privileges of this House or an individual Member been tampered with? If we look at Erskine May, at the beginning of Chapter 5 it states, "The privileges of Parliament are rights which are absolutely necessary for the due execution of its powers".

The question we have to ask ourselves is: Does this advertisement in any way infringe upon Parliament's absolutely necessary powers? No, I think it is very obvious that that has not happened.

Secondly, it states, "They are enjoyed by individual Members because the House cannot perform its functions without unimpeded use of the services of its Members".

Are the Members in any way impeded from appearing in the House or in committee? Obviously, they are not. So the definition of privilege has obviously not been met in any way by the presentation that has been made by either of the opposition parties today.

But let us look at the question of contempt. According to Abraham and Hawtrey's definitions, the parliamentary dictionary, we see it states on page 80:

> Contempt of either House of Parliament—Any act or omission which either directly obstructs the due proceeding of that House or has a tendency to produce that effect by bringing its authority into contempt, e.g. the publication of reflections on the character or conduct of a member in his capacity as a member.

Whether they guise it in the words "privilege" or "contempt", the bottom line is that nothing has been done in these advertisements that would in any way directly or indirectly obstruct the due proceedings of this House. It is obvious—we are doing it today. A committee of the House of Commons continues to look into the subject. The process is ongoing. It has not in any way been impacted by those advertisements. So it is very clear that in fact we have neither a contempt nor a case of privilege.

Finally, I want to say this. I think Madam Sauvé's ruling on a case very similar to this is in fact very pointed. I would like to refer to one quotation at page 3781 of Hansard. She said:

> Rather, the advertising referred to by Members seems to deal with the issue of the constitution rather than the proceedings of the House.

We could take exactly the same words here, changing one. Rather, the advertising referred to by members seems to deal with the issue of the GST, as opposed to Constitution, rather than the proceedings of the House. In other words, Madam Sauvé found that the issue that she was dealing with at that time was not a contempt, was not a privilege; and, of course, we are in exactly the same situation today. Our proceedings continue whether they be here in the House of Commons or whether they be in committee. Our individual Members have not in any way been hampered or tampered with or intimidated in any way to prevent them from participating in this debate. The debate continues today. The debate will continue for some time to come, and the House will come to its decision. There is in no way either a privilege or a contempt. I think Madam Sauvé's ruling applies very specifically.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF CFB SUMMERSIDE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the closing of CFB Summerside is one of the most callous moves that the Conservative government has ever made. It is devastating Summerside and, indeed, the economy of Prince Edward Island.

I had an opportunity first hand on Friday to visit the town council and the people of Summerside and found jobs are disappearing; homes, savings, tax base, merchants, and young people, will all disappear from Summerside and leave Prince Edward Island.

The Prime Minister's refusal to consider other military uses for CFB Summerside displays an astounding disregard for the people of Prince Edward Island. Summerside is not a "bullets and bombs" operation. It protects our country's sovereignty: surveillance of overfishing, surveillance of environmental danger, surveillance of the importation of drugs.

Premier Ghiz and the citizens of Summerside are working to find an alternative use for the base. I urge the Prime Minister of Canada, just for once, to stop and listen to the people of Summerside. Let us give them some help.

FINANCE

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, the greatest challenge faced by Canada today is the annual deficit and the accumulated national debt. Balancing the books needs exactly that, a balance. Our nation needs to balance incoming revenues with outgoing expenditures.

Many Canadians in my riding of Macleod tell me that we need to go further on both accounts. They say we need to balance the proposed GST with the kind of spending restraint started by this government.

The following are a few examples of recent achievements: selling off 18 Crown corporations raised more than $3 billion; new or increased user fees recover some $300 million annually; and cuts in spending for defence, the CBC, VIA Rail, FBDB and other programs, grants and contributions will save billions.

No one likes taxes, no one likes cutting services, but friends and colleagues, Canadians with common sense know that Mike is right.

VIAL RAIL

REDUCTION OF SERVICES

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance announced the five-year $1.2 billion cut to the operating budget of VIA Rail, Canadians have strenuously expressed their opposition to any reduction of VIA Rail services.

To date, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport have received, been made aware of, or will shortly receive over 300,000 cards, letters, and signatures on petitions of Canadians who support VIA Rail. These are just the ones we know about.

My colleague, the member for Sault Ste. Marie, and I have also received notice from over 300 municipalities that have passed motions supporting VIA Rail. Many of these motions have been passed unanimously, showing the depth of support Canadians have for VIA Rail.

In light of this massive outpouring of support for VIA Rail, I call on the Minister of Transport to recommend to cabinet that support for VIA Rail not be cut and, in fact, assistance to VIA Rail be raised to a level suitable to bring VIA Rail into the 21st century.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SALUTE TO NEWSWORLD

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the new fall season on television has produced one genuine surprise for Canadians. CBC's all-news channel, Newsworld, has been up and running, occasionally stumbling, since July 31, but one can only marvel at how professionally a staff of 190 people has mounted an ongoing newscast from Newfoundland and Labrador to the west coast and, next month, Yellowknife.

Despite technical growing pains, Newsworld is providing national programming done by the regions, from the regions, and that is certainly a change from the southern Ontario based networks.

The viewer is electronically whisked across several time zones for live coverage of inquiries into the Mount Cashel Orphanage in Newfoundland, the Dryden air crash in Thunder Bay, Ontario, to the tragic J. J. Harper slaying in Winnipeg, to the Pattie Starr scandal in Toronto, and, of course, to this place, Mr. Speaker. It is happening now, it is exciting, and it is addictive.

Newsworld is showing Canada to Canadians, and as a former private broadcaster I am proud to salute the CBC for this truly national service.

FINANCE

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, about a month ago some 100 small business people in the city of Windsor, Ontario, got together and of their own accord paid for a full-page ad in the Windsor Star opposing the Conservative government's goods and services tax. The ad had coupons in it which people could send to the government in the form of petitions. These coupons read: "Mr. Wilson, we the undersigned are strongly opposed to your new 9 per cent goods and services tax. Stop Wilson's added tax. Where will the taxes end?"

I received, to deliver to Mr. Wilson, in the course of only three or four days, some 2,400 coupons, as did my colleague, the member for Windsor—St. Clair. Unfortunately they are not in a form that could be tabled in the House as petitions. However, I ask the government to treat them as such petitions and to respond to them favourably. I will be delivering them to the Minister of Finance and I ask the Minister of Finance and the Government to listen to these voices of the Canadian people, listen to these voices of Windsor and Canada, and withdraw this tax before it does irreparable damage to this country.

ABORTION

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, in the riding of Elk Island, and indeed across this country, Canadians have expressed a view that Canada must have a law that restricts abortion. It is our obligation as members in this parliament to take a common sense approach in dealing with the abortion question.

In order to pass in this House of Commons a successful abortion law must include two fundamental elements: Number one, a genuine concern for the health of Canadian women and, number two, protection for unborn children.

Canadians from sea to sea demand an abortion law. Canadians will accept nothing less than a law that significantly reduces the number of abortions performed in Canada.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST SALMON AND HERRING

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the House's attention another sell-out by the Conservative government in its inadequacy in dealing with the resources of Canada.

In the federal government's attempt to protect west coast fisheries it made a ruling that all salmon and herring would have to be landed in British Columbia, inspected and then sold. GATT opposed that agreement. We lost at GATT, and what did the federal Government do? Instead of going back to GATT, it went to the free trade panel and said that this will be solved there as promised by the Prime Minister.

We know now that we have lost again. This government has sold out British Columbians. This government has sold out Canadians. Our fishing industry is threatened and they are gutless to do a single thing about it. Scrap the free trade agreement. Save Canadian jobs. That is what needs to be done.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

ALLEGED RACIST REMARKS OF MEMBER

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I want to express my feelings of revolt and sadness concerning the remarks made recently by a Member of the Opposition who criticized a fellow Canadian running in an election and called him a black man just released from a psychiatric hospital.

I feel personally involved because my husband and children are of Haitian origin, therefore black. The black community of this country—4 per cent of all Canadians—and all Canadians have been insulted and humiliated by the irresponsible remarks of the Hon. Member about Mr. Jean Alfred.

By remaining quiet and silent about such undignified behaviour, do Members of the Liberal Party of Canada not endorse this statement?

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully urge the Leader of the Liberal Party to repudiate immediately in this House the racist statement of one of his colleagues.

FINANCE

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, "While a balanced federal budget is desirable, what good is a balanced budget to the next generation if they inherit a dead planet?" These are the words of Mark Cullen to the Minister of Finance on behalf of 3,000 concerned Canadians.

We ask you: Does it make sense, considering that all the oxygen we breathe is produced by green, living plants, that landscape plants and indoor plants will be taxed at the same 9 per cent rate as many pollution producing products? Does it make sense that the home composters will be taxed, while it is proven that home composting can reduce residential curbside garbage by 30 per cent?

Does it make sense that a head of lettuce from California will be tax-free at the supermarket, while Canadian produced lettuce seeds and transplants will be taxable?

We believe that the exemption of these and many other environmentally friendly products from the proposed federal goods and services tax is a serious oversight.

Please say no to tax on plants and encourage Canadians to take an active role in cleaning up the environment.

The undersigned have said: "please, say no to tax on plants."

HUMAN RIGHTS

COMMENTS OF MEMBER

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I want to inform this House about outrageous remarks made by an hon. member when he referred to a fellow Canadian as a noiraud qui revient de l'hôpital psychiatrique.

It is simply not acceptable to sink to this level of personal attack on a man seeking elected office and it is not acceptable to refer to any Canadian in this cruel manner. This is the language of apartheid and of fear and ignorance. This is the language we might expect from other elements of society, not from a man to whom Canadian people have given their trust.

We in the Conservative party are serious about combating racism. Let us see whether the members opposite are serious about eradicating it as well, wherever it is found. Let us see whether the Liberal Party has the courage to stand for human dignity, or whether it encourages such excesses.

• (1410)

We as parliamentarians have to stand up and be counted. I challenge the Leader of the Opposition to take strong measures and remove the member for Hull—Aylmer from his caucus responsibilities.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

NEW WATERFORD OPERATIONS—LINGAN MINE

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the Government of Canada to provide a real commitment to the Cape Breton Development Corporation and in particular its operations in New Waterford, namely, the Lingan Mine.

Some months ago the Government of Canada entered negotiations with the province of Nova Scotia to provide moneys to a Pictou county coal mine. I am informed that these negotiations have progressed to the point whereby the Government of Canada will be providing money to that particular operation. The Cape Breton Development Corporation will be in direct competition with this particular facility. As a result, 275 jobs will be lost at the Lingan Mine in New Waterford, Nova Scotia.

The municipal council of the town of New Waterford and all of its citizens, as well as the local MLAs and the Conservative Premier of Nova Scotia, have come out in support of the longevity for the Lingan Coal Mine.

I ask that the Government of Canada, through the minister responsible for the Cape Breton Development Corporation, provides a clear and unequivocal commitment to the Cape Breton Development Corporation but, more important, to the Lingan Mine, its viability, and the protection of some 1,200 jobs in a small mining town in Canada, namely, New Waterford. I seek that commitment today .

TRANSPORTATION

PASSENGER RAIL SERVICE

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues from southwestern Ontario, I rise at this time to remind the Minister of Transport and our cabinet colleagues of the particular importance of local passenger rail service for our area.

On a number of occasions our message to the minister and the cabinet has been clear and concise. Passenger rail service is very important to our area and must continue to be a component of the local transportation fabric. Our residents count on the train. Ridership and revenue statistics clearly reflect that people in southwestern Ontario have and will continue to use it rather than lose it.

Two other facts are equally evident. First, there are opportunities for further improvement in ridership and cost recovery through administrative and scheduling changes and fare increases. Second, the less than adequate condition of local on–road and air transportation networks preclude these from being viable alternatives for increased volume.

It is for these reasons that the particularities of southwestern Ontario should be taken into full consideration prior to any decision being made on changing the north and south lines of passenger rail service in southwestern Ontario.

FINANCE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we all are aware that a tidal wave of opposition is sweeping across the country against the government's proposal for a goods and services tax.

For example, some of those groups include the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Organization of Small Business, the Consumers' Association of Canada, the National Council of Welfare, the Canadian Home Builders Association, Wood Gundy, the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens, the One Voice Seniors Network, the Canadian Conference of the Arts, the Canadian Association for Universities of Continuing Education, various groups in the reading industry, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian food industry, the Conference Board of Canada, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Institute for Policy Analysis, the Canadian Bankers' Association, an increasing number of Conservative back-benchers, and the New Democratic Party.

Not only do we oppose the tax; we have an answer: tax those individuals and corporations that are not paying their fair share of tax today.

EMPLOYMENT

PRESENT SITUATION IN ERIE

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, the government has created a serious problem in my riding. There is a shortage of workers in my riding.

In the Fort Erie Times Review, the headline read: "The boom is on: employment galore". There is a tremendous demand for construction workers, for electricians, industrial personnel, hospital personnel, word processor operators, payroll clerks, technical writers, and financial managers.

To alleviate the shortage, Manpower Temporary Services is assisting seniors, UIC and welfare recipients, by teaching them new skills and upgrading old ones.

The success of these programs is evidenced by the fact that 80 per cent of the temporary positions lead to full-time work. These are the kinds of problems we need.

Mr. Speaker: Before we commence Question Period I want to draw to Members' attention the fact that today we welcome 42 new parliamentary pages to the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Again this year more than 500 young men and women from various regions of the country applied under this program. We are very lucky to have these young Canadians with us.

I know Hon. Members would want me to wish them the very best, both here and as they study at Carleton University and the University of Ottawa. Merci bien.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister intends to impose the largest single new tax in Canadian history since the creation of the personal income tax. It is a new sales tax of billions upon billions upon billions of dollars.

With one tax this Prime Minister is setting a record for broken promises. He promised that the tax would be fiscally neutral. It is not. He promised the tax would be simple. It is not. He promised the tax would be involved with provincial taxation. It is not. He promised the tax would be visible on sales slips. It is not. He promised the tax would be brought in at the same time as the personal surtax was dropped. It was not. He promised the tax would be fair and he, above all, knows it is not fair.

I put to the Prime Minister, why is the Prime Minister bringing in this sales tax which is in violation of every single principle he described as being essential to tax reform?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of things in the preamble to that question which are quite inaccurate. If the Leader of the Opposition wants to put them individually, I would be happy to respond to them one by one. I do want to deal directly with his question. He asked why are we bringing this in?

I want to quote Mr. Wolfe Goodman, QC, who is one of the pre-eminent sales tax experts in this country, a man who was asked by the previous government, the Liberal government, to do a study on sales tax reform at the request of Mr. MacEachen and Mr. Lalonde who knew that the sales tax had to be changed.

He did refer to the technical paper that I released a month ago as "a virtuistic triumph, an extraordinary piece of work, a major contribution to Canadian tax policy". Now this gets to the point that the Hon. Member has raised. "We can only look at the existing sales tax and say it must go. It is a thorough bad tax and, in fact, the Minister of Finance is being far too moderate in his comments about it, in my view. It is a vicious tax, one that has no place in a democratic community and I am grateful that the glacier is finally beginning to move, that we are approaching an era of major sales tax reform."

That says it as eloquently as I can as to why this sales tax must go.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, any member of the House could quote from hundreds of briefs that are being amassed before the committee on finance chaired by the hon. member for Mississauga South which are unanimously against the tax that was just praised by the minister.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE PUBLICITY CAMPAIGN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Prime Minister would rather stay quiet and keep some room to manoeuvre just in case he might have to get rid of his current Minister of Finance. Again my question is directed to the Prime Minister. His Government is waisting millions of dollar in a publicity campaign which it intends to pay for by imposing a national sales tax: A tax on learning, a tax on illness, a tax on child education, a tax on staples and a tax on death itself.

How can the Prime Minister justify such a spurious publicity campaign before the Canadian public?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is concerned about the Minister of Finance's future. He wonders whether I intend to fire my Minister of Finance. I can tell you that the only Minister of Finance ever to be fired in this House was the Liberal Party critic who was fired by his Leader because he was essentially in favour of the policies put forward by the Minister of Finance.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Prime Minister takes the usual high road and we will try to follow his example.

Here is a Prime Minister who has raised the taxation 31 times since he was sworn into office. The total amount of personal income taxes collected by all 10 provincial governments plus the two territorial governments combined is less than the amount contemplated to be collected by the federal government under this new sales tax. It is the largest single tax grab in Canadian history, and the Prime Minister is trying to pretend to the Canadian people that it is really a tax cut.

Why does the Prime Minister not recognize that it is so flawed that it does not respond to his own criteria for fair taxation? Why does he not go back to the drawing board and begin all over again in a spirit that is fair to the people of Canada?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, just in case there is any doubt or mystery as to why the member for Etobicoke North, the finance critic, was fired by the Leader of the Opposition—

An Hon. Member: He quit.

Mr. Gauthier: You had seven or eight ministers who quit on you, too.

Mr. Mulroney: The member says that he quit. If he quit, or if he were fired, I can say in respect to the member for Etobicoke North that he is a great loss to the Liberal party because they need sane voices in matters of finance and taxation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Last year the position of the Liberal party was this, and I quote:

> In short, a single-rate value-added tax on the broadest possible base is a desirable objective—in the context of the Canadian tax and social welfare system, it can be an important source of revenue without distorting economic decisions and with rather low administration and compliance cost.

That was their position last year. That is what the Minister of Finance is attempting to do. If they were consistent, they would be giving the Minister of Finance the same kind of support now that he obviously deserves.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER WITHDRAW HIS TAX PROJECT AND CO-OPERATE WITH THE PROVINCES

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, Canadian men and women by the thousands are against this tax as proposed by the Minister of Finance. Business people, boards of trade, small and medium-sized businesses, consumers, students, senior citizens, trade unions, everybody in Canada is concerned about the enormous consequences of this tax. My question is very simple and it is directed to the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that we have two parallel tax systems, something which had not been foreseen in the report he has just mentioned and which had been approved by the Liberal Members sitting on the Finance Committee, could we have today a commitment from the Prime Minister that he will get off this terrible tax which threatens all Canadian citizens and do what he had promised to do us first place, namely, to cooperate with the provinces and set up a national sales tax in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that we promised a national sales tax. He knows that that is not correct. He knows that we put in the White Paper of June 1987 three options. One of them was a national sales tax and the two other were federal only options. One of those federal only options was put forward to the Canadian people in the last budget and was amplified in the technical paper.

The hon. member asks why do we not go back to the provinces. The simple fact is that our tax, as I indicated from the comments of Mr. Goodman, is a very bad tax and there is general agreement that it must be replaced. I think that the hon. member would agree with that. He stated on August 8 that it is replacing a bad tax. I think most people understand that the manufacturers' sales tax was not a very healthy thing for the country.

The hon. member himself says that we must make a change. We must and we agree with that. The provinces do not have to make a change to their sales taxes, as I think a former politician from a province will understand because there is not the same necessity. We have to move ahead. They do not. That is why we were not able to get this federal-provincial agreement.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister and every man and woman in small and medium sized business know that the goods and services tax that he has proposed creates an administrative nightmare both for the government and for business: two separate taxes applicable on two separate sets of goods in at least nine provinces of this country.

If he is not going to listen to us, I suggest the Minister has to listen to the Federation of Independent Business and the Chamber of Commerce.

My question is: Will the Prime Minister order the Minister of Finance to recognize his obligation to have a fair and equitable tax system in this country that can be supported by Canadians, withdraw this tax, and go back to the drawing board?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I acknowledge what the hon. member has said. I would have preferred not to have had the two levels of sales tax.

The simple matter is that we were not able to get together because the interests of the provinces were not such that they wanted to do that. I have said to the provinces that we are prepared to sit down at the table, if they can come up with a proposal that their governments support and that they agree to, including their Premiers. I think that if they do that then we can sit down.

I am not hopeful of this because of the attitude that they have demonstrated in their comments in August where they had lots of things to say in criticism of this tax, but they had no alternatives and no other options that we should be prepared to consider. That is why I do not think we can achieve that.

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who just a minute ago was quoting Mr. Goodman on tax policy. As is frequently the case, it was selective quotation.

I want to remind the Minister that the same Mr. Goodman had this to say about his tax: "It takes money from the poorest and most vulnerable people in Canada. It is shameful".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I want to ask the Minister of Finance this. Considering that this regressive tax has its most negative impact on the poorest people of Canada, and considering the government took months to indicate that its original plan was not to put a tax on food, and recently both the Conservative chairman and vice-chairman of the committee looking into this issue have talked about reimposing this tax on food, will the Minister give unequivocal assurance to the House of Commons that the government has no intention of making a bad tax worse by broadening it to include food?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the proposal is very clear. It does not tax food and it does not tax basic groceries.

What I do want to say to the hon. member is that when he says the proposal that we have on the table is very damaging for low income people, I point out to him that he is very, very wrong and he is misinterpreting and misrepresenting what the tax system said.

The goods and services tax itself would be a regressive tax. It would hurt the poor. But we have attached to the goods and services tax the low income tax credit which provides an offset. It keeps low income people whole so that families who are earning less than $30,000 will be better off after tax reform and they will pay less as a result of tax reform. That is a fundamental element of this tax which has been widely acknowledged as being a major step forward and will make sure that this sales tax system as a whole, will be one of the best in the world today.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I say to the minister I was quoting his expert, not mine. The expert was talking about the inadequacy of the compensatory measures to which the minister has just referred. The reality is that even after these changes are made in tax credits, 300,000 families living at the poverty level are going to be worse off, not better. That is the reality and he said it.

IMPOSITION OF TAX ON FOOD—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The Minister has not answered the question concretely. The question concerns suggestions made by the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Committee on this subject and they raised the problem of imposing this tax on food. I repeat: Would the Minister assure Hon. Members of this House that the Government does not intend to impose this tax on food?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me quote Mr. David Perry, who says: "The refundable sales tax credit system that he has outlined in the paper is probably the best system that any country has come up with to produce a sales tax that is not horrendously regressive".

That is exactly what we are proposing in this paper. We believe that the combination, not just of the sales tax credit but the combination of the exemption on basic groceries, the reduction of the middle-income tax rate, the rebate for housing, the payment we are making to small business people to offset the impact of the compliance cost for them, all of these produce a very solid fairness package that we have put before the committee. Now it is up to the committee to listen to the views of Canadians. We heard some last week. We are going to hear views from all sides of the question as the committee completes its work over the course of the next six weeks.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister having selectively quoted from one expert has now switched to another. We will follow that up. In neither case, in the answers he has given so far, has he answered the question. The question is straightforward and what he implied by his last answer is that the government is in fact considering once again putting the tax on food. If it is not the case, I want the minister to come to the House of Commons and make it clear today that whatever the government plans to do with this tax, he, the minister, will guarantee us unequivocally that this tax will not be put on food. Will he say it or won't he?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have made it very clear. We are putting forward a package, a fair and balanced package, a package that provides a number of very important fairness elements. This government has stated that it is very firm in the support that it provides for the package that is on the table today. That package includes the exemption of taxation for basic groceries.

IMPOSITION OF FEDERAL SALES TAX—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Since he claims to promote national reconciliation, how can he justify his unilateral action in imposing a federal sales tax? How can he justify this action faced with the unanimous opposition of the provinces and how can he explain this action to us when all experts agree that without the provinces' involvement, this new tax will be an indescribable administrative mess?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance and his colleagues met for about two years to find a way for both levels of government to agree on such an important tax. It became obvious that the provinces, for their own reasons, could not deal with such an important subject, in view of certain time constraints they were under.

Therefore, the federal Government, based on the options outlined in the White Paper, decided to proceed with an option in the national interest.

The Government and Parliament of Canada make every effort to reach agreement with the provinces in important areas of our national life, but ultimately, it is the federal Government and federal Parliament that speak for the national interest. Here in this House, we speak for the Canadian interest and we acted according to what Canada needs.

COLLECTION OF TAX—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he thinks that the interests of Canadians and the interests of taxpayers will be served by the fact that anywhere between 5,000 and 10,000 new public employees will have to be hired to collect his famous tax?

Is it in the interest of Canadians to set up a new parallel tax collection system when the provinces already have 50 years of experience in that field? Does the Prime Minister think that is showing respect for the taxpayers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the figures may need official confirmation. Contrary to the administration to which my friend from Shefford used to belong, since this Government took office the number of federal public employees has been reduced by roughly 12,000. I would suggest this is a significant achievement.

If over the coming years we should need a heavier tax to promote Canada's economic growth, we will not hesitate to do just that. Our responsibility is to protect the national interest and promote the Canadian economy, and since we took office we have brought renewed prosperity to this country. We want Canada to remain competitive in the next century, and this can only be done by getting rid of a harmful tax and replacing it by another one which will make us more competitive and be fairer to all Canadians.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER OF FINANCE WITHDRAW HIS TAX PROJECT

Mr. Paul Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

In the course of its work, the Liberal task force on housing met with builders, landlords, tenants, co-ops, unions, municipal authorities and bankers, all of whom vigourously condemned the new sales tax on housing.

Six months ago, the Minister promised the tax would not have a negative impact on rental prices.

Mr. Speaker, my question is—the Minister did not keep his promise and the consequences will be disastrous. Is the Minister willing to go back to the drawing board? Is he prepared to withdraw his tax? In other words, will the Minister keep his promise?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear that rentals would not be taxed under this proposal.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister. The reality of the situation, according to the Canadian Home Builders' Association and other experts, is that the cost of the average house in Canada will increase by $3,000 due to the goods and services tax, even after the rebate. This represents an increase six times larger than the minister's own figures.

Will the minister finally admit that he has failed in his commitment to Canadians not to increase the cost of home ownership because of the ill-conceived, irresponsible and hurtful tax?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me make two points. First, when I made the commitment on housing in Saskatoon last year, I said that the impact of the goods and services tax would not adversely affect the affordability of housing. I believe that we have met that commitment.

As far as the numbers that have been produced by the Home Builders' Association are concerned, the proposal that we have put forward is based on the largest data base in the country today, the data base of Canada Mortgage and Housing. It sets out very clearly with a very careful analysis what the impact in the price of a house today, what the effective tax rate in the price of a house today is and we have based the rebate program on this, taking into account the effective tax on a house today. It is on that basis that we feel that the impact on housing, quite unlike what the hon. member has just quoted, is going to be marginal one way or the other in most markets in the country.

We do acknowledge that in the city of Toronto and to a lesser extent, Vancouver, it is a somewhat larger amount but it is about 1-1/2 per cent of the price of a house.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance about his grief and suffering tax as well.

I have here a copy of a document that we obtained under the access to information legislation. This document says that the Treasury Board has approved spending in this fiscal year some $5.1 million to advertise the GST and another $2.5 million in the next fiscal year to advertise the GST.

How can he justify spending $7.6 million of the public's money to advertise a proposal that is a partisan proposal of the Conservative party when there is no bill before Parliament, no program passed by this House? It is only flagrant propaganda for the Conservative party. How can he justify that?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): First of all, Mr. Speaker, let me quote the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle. He said: "Our existing sales tax is a total mess. I do not have to be convinced that the sales tax regime which now exists is in need of reform. It is as I mentioned, very arbitrary and confusing". Clearly, the New Democratic Party and the government are in agreement that there must be reform of the sales tax system.

I can tell from the nodding that the Leader of the New Democratic Party agrees with the conclusion that I have just drawn.

Now, why are we budgeting moneys to make sure that Canadians understand what we are doing with this proposal? A year ago February the finance committee of the House of Commons went to New Zealand and one of the conclusions that they came back with was "make sure that you explain to the Canadian people why you are changing the sales tax system and how you are going to change that sales tax system". Mr. Speaker, that involves brochures. It involves advertising. It involves a wide range of the various tools that have been used by government from time to time to enhance the understanding of Canadians about government policy.

Mr. Nystrom: What I want to know, Mr. Speaker, is how the minister can justify spending $7.6 million of the public's money, of the taxpayers' money, on a proposition that has not even passed Parliament?

[Translation]

How can he justify spending as much as $800,000 for the ad that appeared on August 26, Mr. Speaker? Is the Progressive Conservative Party prepared to reimburse the Treasury for this expenditure?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, governments for a number of years have used brochures; they have used technical papers; they have used a wide range of publicity tools in order to provide understanding and information to the Canadian public. What the hon. member has just held up is an advertisement which draws from the overview of the technical paper, which draws from the brochures that we have used to help Canadians understand this.

Mr. Tobin: Tory propaganda. Shameful!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The members opposite are bleeding about this. Let me remind hon. members opposite that Liberal governments as well as Conservative governments have used brochures and other forms of material, with budgets, many, many times to do one thing: to make sure that Canadians understand what is the nature of budget policy. We are following the same process with our sales tax reform.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Last week we were told by the food services industry that the cost of restaurant meals and basic food services would increase by at least 8 per cent and that other foods would have little change in price.

Given that the average Canadian family spends 39 per cent of its food dollar on meals outside of the home, this means that the over-all impact of the goods and services tax will increase the price of food. Why does the Minister of Finance not come clean and admit to Canadians that the goods and service tax will increase the price of food?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have made quite clear that prepared foods such as would be served in restaurants will be subject to the tax. There is no surprise there. It is very clearly set out in the technical paper. But what we also said in the technical paper was that we were going to sit down and consult with the food industry to discuss with them whether the line between taxed and non-taxed foods should be based on the type of preparation, the type of foods they are, or whether it should be based on the establishment where the food is acquired. Those consultations still must continue and once they have been completed then we will have a response on that.

Mrs. Marleau: Mr. Speaker, the minister's own staff and his own department cannot tell us the definition of a basic grocery. Regardless of where the government decides to tax food based on where it is sold or what kind of food it is, there is no doubt that the tax will be unfair to Canadians and a nightmare for store owners. Will the minister agree to scrap the tax and come back with a proposal that is fair to all Canadians.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have considered all of these aspects and we have put the proposal to the Finance Committee. We believe very firmly, very strongly, that that proposal is a balanced proposal, a carefully calculated proposal, in terms of its impact on various people in society and that is why people have said that it is one of the fairest forms of a sales tax system that is available in the world today.

Mr. Lapierre: Who has said that?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says who. I just quoted someone who said that. There are many others too. I will give the hon. member more quotes.

FISHERIES

OVERFISHING ON GRAND BANKS

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. This summer the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Fisheries have all failed to convince the European Community to stop their overfishing on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks. Our fishermen are now without fish, stocks are depleted, workers are unemployed and plants are closing. How critical must the situation be for people in Atlantic Canada before this government takes decisive action to protect our fish stocks?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a very serious problem in the fishery in Atlantic Canada. That is why the government of Canada has entered into extraordinary negotiations with officials of the European Economic Community. That is why we have taken our case to NAFO, to the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization and where we have had some success in terms of quotas not with the European Economic Community, but with others. That is why the Prime Minister has established a committee which he has asked me to chair, to look into questions with relation to cod stocks and to also consider other questions in the fishery.

We have enjoyed, I might say, very constructive co-operation from provincial governments in Atlantic Canada who realize the seriousness of this matter and who realize that it is too serious to be treated as simply a matter of partisan accusation and debate.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We are dealing here with a matter which goes to the heart of the livelihood of Atlantic Canada. That is recognized by provincial governments in Atlantic Canada. That is recognized by this government. That is why we are acting in ways that are unprecedented in Canada, and we hope to be able to make some progress.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ATLANTIC ECONOMY—$1 BILLION SALVAGE PLAN

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what we want to do: protect the interests of the people of the Atlantic provinces. All sectors in the fisheries industry are stagnating. There is no more cod, no more lobster, there are no more markets for our herring, and fishermen and plant workers will not even be eligible for unemployment insurance. When a situation as serious as this occurs in any other sector of our economy, a rescue plan is brought in immediately. My question is: Where is the billion-dollar rescue plan mentioned by certain ministers last spring? How much longer do we have to wait for the billion dollars?

[English]

Where is the billion dollar program for the fisheries of Atlantic Canada. Where is it?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is a crisis, perhaps an unprecedented crisis, in the industry in the Atlantic Region. That is why the Canadian Government supports the initiatives, the steps that were not taken by any previous governement to cooperate with the industry, to cooperate with the provinces, to negotiate with the European Community, to seek a long-term solution to what is really a crisis. It is not a partisan issue; it is a matter of policy. It is a major crisis. It affects the lives of Canadian citizens in the Atlantic Region. It is an issue that we are taking seriously and I hope that the Hon. Members will offer us the same sort of cooperation that we received from the governments of the Atlantic Provinces.

FINANCE

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses.

In discussions with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Organization of Small Business and other business persons throughout Canada it has become clear that small business is diametrically opposed to this goods and services tax. Why is that? Because it will be disastrous for them. Will the Minister of State for Small Business tell his government colleagues that this tax will be devastating for small business and will he tell them to withdraw and go back to the drawing board?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not tell my hon. colleagues this. I have been working with the small business community and the various organizations that speak for small business. I have been working with them from day one on this and they have asked for the following things: They have asked for help with the compliance costs. They have received that. They have got a capital cost allowance which gives them 100 per cent write-off in the first year. That is the first thing.

They have also asked for an exemption for small businesses and small traders. They have got that exemption for those who earn under $30,000 a year. Five hundred thousand small businesses will not have to participate in this tax. Small business organizations have also asked for streamlined accounting that is simple and straightforward. We should continue discussions on this. We have brought in two proposals in the technical paper for streamlined accounting. There are many other things that I could mention. Small business organizations have asked for these things. They have received it. The Hon. Member opposes everything and proposes nothing. We have got constructive proposals and we have acted on them.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, what this tax does is effectively turn every small business into a tax collector for Revenue Canada. It is forcing the small business community to carry the enormous burden of the financial administration and implementation. When is the minister going to listen to the community he is supposed to represent? When is he going to speak up for small business in Canada and demand his cabinet colleagues withdraw this tax?

Mr. Hockin: Well, Mr. Speaker, the first thing the small community understands is that if they ever elect an NDP government centuries from now the taxes will be so high there will be no small business.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. minister complete his answer.

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a question of collection of the tax. Under the sales tax now, small businesses have to collect it. It is very biased and unfair the way it is applied. We are going to broaden the tax, lower the rate and simplify things.

But I also want to tell the hon. member that on the cash flow side for small business there are great improvements in this scheme under cash flow. I want to make this very clear to the House, that under this particular scheme you get your credits back on your inputs very, very quickly before you sell your inventory. That is a great improvement over the present method.

CANADA–U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

POSITION ON ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Leader, leader!

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): The last thing I need is a Tory endorsement. I have a question for the Prime Minister if his members will allow him to answer.

I understand the fear and trembling of the Prime Minister over the tax pratfall by his Minister of Finance but I would like to draw attention to another serious economic problem and that is the unravelling of the free trade agreement. We have had the worst trade figures in 10 years. The regional subsidy program is being threatened by the pork decision; fishing is threatened by the west coast processing decision. We have serious dairy problems. We have just had 300 workers laid off that the Outboard Marine plant in Peterborough as a direct consequence of the free trade agreement.

I ask the Prime Minister, when is this government going to wake up? Does he understand there is a lot of human suffering being felt because of the free trade agreement. In particular, when does the Prime Minister intend to live up to the commitment he made seven months ago when he said that Canada would have the most massive, largest, best adjustment program? We have no adjustment program. I ask the Prime Minister, when will you live up to at least one of your promises?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that one way the opposition often measures the efficacy of government action in the economic field is by the job creation numbers. I think that still remains a fairly objective barometer. I know that my hon. friend, having predicted there would be serious job losses on January 1, will be pleased to know that since January of this year, 209,000 new jobs have been created in Canada—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: —and that 95 per cent of those jobs have been full time. That is very important for my hon. friend to remember, because in the previous Liberal government 89 per cent of jobs created under his administration were part time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he is prepared, because none of his ministers have been prepared so far, to give us the figures of how many high–paying industrial jobs for technically skilled workers of this country have been lost as a direct result of this government's programs and the free trade agreement. Will the Prime Minister gives us those figures? At the same time, will he also tell us how many more jobs will be lost as a result of the secret negotiations that are continuing on the accelerated tariffs where all kinds of companies are asking for new deals on the free trade agreement that will bring about more lay–offs, more closures of the kind that we experienced in Peterborough this weekend.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman as usual is one election too late.

Here are just a couple of stories from the Financial Post of the weekend: "Signs point to trade upswing"; "Ontario's vintners confident they can thrive on free trade, surprised to discover that almost a year into free trade their sales are running ahead of 1988's. So far so good." That is Chateau des Charmes' manager and I hope the messenger is as charming as his report. The International Monetary Fund said that the free trade agreement, planned reforms to UI and the finance minister's proposed goods and services tax should help bring about a significant improvement in economic performance over the long run. As well, new plant and equipment investment is up 13.6 per cent in all industry and up 27.9 per cent compared to last year in the manufacturing industry. Still the hon. gentleman weeps and moans and complains.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

CO-OPERATIVE AGREEMENTS

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. Nova Scotians welcomed the announcement last Friday that three more co-operative agreements have now been signed with the province of Nova Scotia, for which I commend the minister. Notwithstanding the allegations made last spring by members opposite that there would be no money for co-operative agreements because of the reprofiling of ACOA, can the minister advise us that co-operative agreements have now been signed with all four Atlantic provinces? Can the minister tell us if he anticipates more agreements with Nova Scotia.

Some Hon. Members: The best question today.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is yes. I might say that we have made substantial progress in reaching co-operative agreements in all of the Atlantic provinces. Some have been signed, some will be signed soon and others are under negotiation. This is contrary to the gloomy prognostications that, as my colleague said, have been constantly made by the opposition.

Mr. Speaker: I should advise the House that pursuant to Standing Order 34(a), the House will now proceed with the daily routine of business until the completion of all items under Introduction of Government Bills, after which the House will proceed to Orders of the Day. Before that, I have to advise the House that I have a question of privilege from the Hon. Member for Skeena.

PRIVILEGE

HOUSEHOLDER OF MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES – RECYCLED PAPER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege relates to a press release in a householder provided to the offices of all members of parliament here on the Hill today from the Minister of Supply and Services. It is both false and contemptuous of the House. It says: "SSC minister's householder first to be printed on recycled paper. The Hon. Paul Dick, Minister of Supply and Services announced today that the latest edition of his constituency householder is the first MP householder to be printed on recycled paper."

Frankly, all of us should be very proud to see this. The problem is that it goes on to say: "As part of a pilot project launched co-operatively by the House of Commons and the Queen's Printer, the householders, newsletters sent to constituents from their Members of Parliament, have been printed on Canadian made de-inked recycled paper."

I have contacted the House of Commons distribution and printing. This recycled paper is not available to Members of Parliament. It has only been made available to the Minister of Supply and Services. In fact, the members of the Board of Internal Economy have not dealt with this issue. This press release goes on to say: "Approximately 900 householders are printed annually on behalf of the House of Commons, and using this format will result in a 30 per cent cost savings."

Again, it is very nice, but the minister has pointed out a variety of other falsehoods within the householder itself.

The point I would like to make is that this recycled paper, which is a good idea and I am sure is supported unanimously by the House of Commons, is not available for any other member to put out a householder. We cannot get it for letterhead, we cannot get it for our business cards and we cannot get it for anything else.

It is very good that the minister is promoting something that is environmentally sound, but as we in this place know, the kinds of services available on the Hill for letters, householders, et cetera, must be available to all members of the House, not just to a minister of the Crown.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I just want to join in for a very brief moment to inform the House that on Friday last, I had asked my staff to submit my householder to the print shop in the Confederation Building. We were advised at that time that it was not possible for me to have it printed on recycled or non-bleached paper. We reconfirmed that at 12.55 today in a call to the print shop in the Confederation Building.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be pointed out that over the last period of time, a number of members of Parliament have made inquiries as to whether or not they could have their printing done on recycled paper. A pilot project was undertaken. I used my own print plant to try that. We had to make sure that we could get the proper level of de-inked paper.

I am very pleased that we were able to find a source in East Angus in the province of Quebec. Cascade Paper Company has now provided that. We anticipate that this ability will be open to all members of Parliament who would like to use this. I am looking forward to that and I congratulate the other members of Parliament who made this application to use recycled paper. I know that many will want to use this in the future.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. minister has missed the point completely. The point is surely that if a householder printed by the House of Commons says in it that something is a policy that has been adopted by the House of Commons, namely that the document itself can be printed on recycled paper for anyone who wants it, which is not true, is, I would respectfully submit, contemptuous of the Board of Internal Economy of which you, Sir, are a member. On behalf of all of us, you are the chairman and the custodian of our rights in that regard.

If the Minister wants to say that his own department made a special try-out in order to see whether or not his householder can be printed on recycled paper, that is fine. He has the right to say that. He is the Minister of Supply and Services. Of course, we could demand at that point to receive equal treatment. Because he is the Minister of Supply and Services does not, however, give him the right to pretend that something is a policy when it is not. In that regard, I believe that the document printed under the name of the Minister of Supply and Services, printed under the auspices of this Parliament, was done in a manner which is inappropriate.

I would ask that you, Sir, and the Board of Internal Economy examine this and report to the House as to whether or not the minister has abused his privileges in making that kind of a claim and to ensure that if such a policy is going to be the policy, then all members be notified of it and, of course, more fundamentally, that it be true.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, we do not want to argue with the minister's intention to conduct a pilot study to encourage all members of Parliament to use unbleached letterhead or recycled paper. The point that my hon. friend from Skeena made was that this was a householder, a member's householder. In the letter to his constituents, the minister points out that this is in fact a pilot study and that he plans to encourage all members of Parliament to do the same as him. We cannot do the same.

As you have heard, members of Parliament who have wanted to do this cannot do this. Presumably the Minister of Supply and Services is in a position to enact a policy to enable us to do this. To suggest that this is something that any member of Parliament could have done had he or she wished is mis-stating the fact. The important thing is that this is a householder and if the householder is going to be made available on recycled paper, surely it is in the interests of all of us who will want to do that to have our next householder published using such paper.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to recycle an old argument. In this particular case, the reason I would like to speak to the issue of the householder is that I think we should give credit where credit is due. Undoubtedly, the Minister of Supply and Services wants to latch on to what is a very good idea. I think he should have at least acknowledged the fact that the reason for this was that the Speaker of the House of Commons, in a non-partisan fashion last spring, upon consultation with the Environment Committee, moved to make the House of Commons an environmentally friendly place.

One of the things that the Speaker did—and since he cannot speak for himself, I will speak on his behalf—was to write to Supply and Services and ask if it would please change its insane policy of not making environmentally friendly products, including recycled paper available. I am glad the minister has got the word out via his householder. Certainly the claim he makes in the House may not stand up to the light of day. It may be transparent and bleached white.

However, I think it should be pointed out for the benefit of all in the House and in the country that the person who is really moving to make this Parliament an environmentally friendly place is the Speaker of the House of Commons, and for that he should be getting the credit and we should be getting off our partisan high horses.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I naturally thank the hon. member for Hamilton East for her very cogent intervention.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There are other members seeking the floor, but I do not know whether I dare, after that, let anybody take away from the stirring phrases which all members of the House have heard.

I will take this matter under advisement and report back to the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rose on the point of order prior to other speakers, and I guess it was just an oversight on your part that you did not recognize me.

On the same point of order, prior to seeing the minister's householder, I advised my staff to check to see whether or not our next householder, which is going to print very soon, could be printed on recycled paper and we were told yes. Today I hear that that is not so. Therefore, it would be of great help if we could get a clear answer very quickly as to whether we can use this paper. The same privileges should be extended to all members of this House, not only to the Minister of Supply and Services.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park. I did not realize he was rising on that point of order. I thank the hon. member for his intervention.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-5, an Act to authorize the Safeguard Life Assurance Company to be continued as a corporation under the laws of the Province of Quebec, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

Hon. Frank Oberle (for the Prime Minister) moved that Bill C-29, an Act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am of course very pleased to be able today to begin the second reading debate on Bill C-29, the bill which establishes a federal Department of forestry.

The introduction of this bill today as the first item of business is perhaps a statement of the importance that our government attaches to forestry generally and in all its manifestations.

This is not entirely an historic event. Perhaps it should be pointed out that in fact what I am doing here this afternoon is not new. In June 1960, the then Prime Minister, the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker, rose in the House to introduce a similar bill which also established a federal department of forestry. He said at the time that if we are to increase our production and if forest devastation is to be overcome, research will be needed.

On July 11, 1960, 29 years ago, the House gave second and third readings to the bill which was, incidentally, passed unanimously. Royal Assent was given on August 1, and almost 29 years ago to the day, on October 1, the bill was proclaimed and the department began functioning.

Forestry was not a partisan issue then and ought not to be today. That is perhaps another reason why it is introduced as the first item of business. It is intended to establish the atmosphere that will be required by this House over the next few months as we deal with other equally important and critical issues.

Nevertheless, it is instructive to review what happened subsequently, since I assume that some of my opposition critics will be responding to what I am saying. The Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson spoke strongly in favour of the bill in 1960. He said that there can be no question about the importance to this country of forestry and the forest industries, or indeed of the desirability of the government doing everything it can to support and strengthen that industry. Yet, tragically, six years later when he was Prime Minister, he and his ministers began to plan the demise of the new department of forestry, and they effected the near demise of the once proud Canadian forestry service.

It started by moving forestry to a new department called rural development. I suppose that set in motion the kind of attitude that you and I, Mr. Speaker, found when we came here in the early 1970s; namely, that forestry was an activity like agriculture, that it was a sort of rural unsophisticated kind of endeavour, that it ought to be transferred to the Third World and that we were, after all, a nation in search of a much more modern image, so forestry needed to be relegated to something else.

In 1968 it was shunted off to the department of fisheries and forestry. Finally, two years after that, in 1971, forestry disappeared altogether into the bowels of a newly formed Department of the Environment. In the years that followed, 50 per cent of the entire person-year strength of the Canadian forestry service was phased out. I will speak a bit about the earlier history of the Canadian forestry service and forestry generally, but this more recent history is important to place in proper context what I am sure my friends in the opposition will be saying here today.

There is little to record in the way of forest management in Canada up to the time of Confederation. Shortly thereafter, a forest conservation movement began to organize itself in our country. The forests of eastern Canada were being subjected to devastating misuse, and these are words that were used by some eminent spokesmen of the time. By 1883, the loss of beech, maple, oak and basswood was so shocking that the Ontario government commissioned a report entitled "The Necessity of Preserving and Replanting Forests". John Croumbie Brown wrote in 1884 about the injurious effects on the Canadian climate which he attributed to the excessive clearing of our forests.

In the same decade a century ago, William Saunders was advocating reforestation, warning of the disastrous consequences of a dearth of timber in Canada. He said it would be difficult to describe. Saunders said that at first sight, forests appeared to the settlers of a wooded country as obstacles to advancing civilization, to be removed as rapidly as possible, with unwearied zeal and persistence in the use of the axe and fire to remove these encumbrances at a rapid pace.

Saunders described in eloquent terms 110 years ago what now seems to be clear to everyone. He described the effects of deforestation. Shelter against storm is lost, he said, temperature and moisture are not moderated and the air is not purified. Winds are not arrested, forests exercise a governing and conservative influence on the humidity of the atmosphere, and of course, forests therefore influence rainfalls.

These voices, Mr. Speaker, as you and I both know, seemed slow to be heard. Heavy cutting had taken place for nearly a century before Canada's first forestry congress was called in 1906. It was at about that time as well that the University of New Brunswick and the University of Toronto established their first forestry schools.

In 1907 in British Columbia, the Hon. Frederick Fulton, who was incidentally the father of the Hon. Davey Fulton who carved such an important niche for himself in this place, was appointed to the royal commission on the conservation of our forests.

The reason for this slow progress was explained in more recent time by H. R. MacMillan, one of the great foresters of Canada, in an address that he gave on the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the faculty of forestry at the University of Toronto. He said that Canadians still believe today that the forest is inexhaustible and self-perpetuating. It is expected to continue automatically performing its role as inevitably, as cheaply and as dependably as the tides. Canadians do not yet fully recognize that the forest as a crop is continuously most productive only if there is investment in silvicultural management.

Well, Mr. Speaker, you would agree that it is important that these facts be seen in light of the history of the Canadian forest products industry. Industry began, of course, at the earliest time of our history in Canada. The early settlers needed trees to build their homes and their barns and then made masts and timbers for sailing ships.

Our modern industry began writing its history perhaps back in 1803 when the first Canadian newsprint was made in Quebec. Groundwood paper was made for the first time in the western hemisphere in Halifax in 1841. In 1864, soda pulp was being made in Sherbrooke. The year before confederation, Canada's first groundwood pulp mill was erected in Valleyfield. Up to this point, all that happened, of course, without anyone giving any thought to forest management.

Perhaps it can be said that any government relation to forestry had its beginning on July 24, 1899, when an Order in Council created the post of Chief Inspector of Timber and Forestry. That was the first evidence of any federal initiative in this important area.

That modest move was the forerunner of the Canadian forestry service. The chief inspector called a meeting in 1900, the turn of the century, a meeting which gave birth to the Canadian Forestry Association which still thrives today. I know that you would agree, Mr. Speaker, that if anyone deserves credit for what we are doing here today from outside this place, it is the Canadian Forestry Association. Throughout our country, it carries on youth programs, and I want to attest to the fact that I have received no better advice and no better counsel from anyone than my friends in the Canadian Forestry Association.

The next milestone in Canadian forest history, I suppose, came during the Second World War when forestry matters across Canada came under the so-called federal timber control board. In 1949 the Canadian Forestry Act was passed. In 1955 we hosted a Commonwealth Conference on Resources which gave impetus and produced a call for urgent action, a call, which of course, as I already said, the then Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, answered in 1960.

I think there is hardly an argument that it is once again time to address this important issue of giving forestry in Canada the attention it must be given, the attention it merits, as a driving force in Canada's economic, social, environmental and ecological future.

We can no longer be complacent and feel that Canada is somehow exempt from events which have devastated other nations that did not manage their forests properly. In fact, the history of some nations is often the history of their forests. Fertile lands in the Middle East, flowing, as it is said in Biblical poesy, with milk and honey and favoured with a pleasant climate, were stripped of their forests. It did not take long before life-giving rivers became insignificant streams and valleys were washed away leaving an arid and a desolate land.

A similar fate hit portions of Sicily, Greece, Italy and Spain, to name but a few. Even in central Europe, there were threats. In the 1600s a Frenchman by the name of Colbert cried that France would be lost if the forests were not saved. "France perira en faute des Bois," he cried. France passed the celebrated Forest Ordinance Act in 1669, an Act which was so far-sighted that every modern system of scientific forest management shows signs of its influence.

Will we have to suffer from failure to learn these lessons of history? Will we here give added weight to Hegel's maxim, we learn from history that we learn nothing from it? Well, Sir, I say not. Looking around the world today, one cannot be entirely sure. Just listen to this. During the last 10 years, the area of our planet which was populated by trees has been reduced from 25 per cent to just over 20 per cent, in just 10 years. If these trends are not arrested and reversed, our children will ask why we permitted their lives to be jeopardized by our failure to protect our forests which sustain our lives.

Those who understand global ecology understand that our planet cannot survive itself nor can it sustain the life which we enjoy without our forests being in good health. That is what this bill before us is all about.

The bill before us would require the minister to report to Parliament annually on the state of Canadian forests. Having reviewed the history, and contemplating a situation where today I would have to make such a report, I would have cause for concern. At the same time, I would be able to report significant progress in the steps that we have already taken to put things right.

I could report that forests occupy 40 per cent of the entire Canadian landscape. They are stocked by 130-odd different species of trees of which about 30 or so different species have any kind of commercial value. Below the 60th parallel, in fact, the total area stocked with trees is 68 per cent. Only about 60 per cent of that land base is capable of producing any kind of commercial timber and only 85 per cent of that, through our best records that we have today, would be economically accessible or would lend itself to industrial conversion.

Canada's forests represent 8 to 10 per cent of the entire forest reserves in the world, some 864 billion cubic feet of wood and fibre. Although on the one hand this appears to be a considerable resource my report would also have to include the fact that not sufficient care was taken so far to make sure that all of the areas that we have harvested over time have been properly restocked. As a result, in some regions of our country we are experiencing shortages of raw materials today, something, incidentally, Mr. Speaker, that I predicted in my publication in 1983 to happen within this period of time.

About 7.5 million hectares of productive land is not properly restocked and we have been, over the last few years, adding to this backlog at the rate of about 300,000 additional hectares every year. In the past we would have relied mainly on natural regeneration and, of course, that worked. We were careful, I know in our province, in leaving seed blocks to allow natural regeneration to take place and it all depends on the rate of cutting and the rate of conversion to allow nature to do this work for us.

But I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that at the rate that we are cutting today, the way we are allocating our fibre, our only hope of a solid future is to practise more intensive forest management based on sound silviculture practices taking into account ecological and environmental concerns and other non-timber values which are becoming so important to most Canadians. That again is what this bill is all about.

It is a further step in the process which we began five years ago to return to traditional, conservative practices of exercising custodial responsibility, not only on behalf of future generations of Canadians and our own children but also in a global sense. I alluded to that earlier. Naturally it has to be recognized the provinces have an exclusive right to own and to administer the forests which are located on public property within their boundaries, and this is clearly laid out in section 92(5) of the Constitution Act.

Mr. Diefenbaker recognized this as well in 1960 when he said, "Not for a moment would I countenance any interference or invasion in the constitutional responsibility of the provinces". But we can respect provincial jurisdiction and have a federal act and a federal role in forestry as well. In fact, I say that it is critically important that we do because diminishing forests in any region of our country affects the health of all of us.

So initially we worked, of course, to establish the necessary partnership with our provincial colleagues together with the important linkages and the strategic alliances that were necessary with the private sector, private woodlot owners and the industry. We offered our resources, we offered our national perspective, we offered our international contacts and we offered leadership.

From this position we can reconcile and manage all aspects of our forest heritage, be they industrial, environmental or social. We entered into forest resource development agreements with the provinces which were designed to begin the costly and painful transition to much more intensive management of Canada's forests. These agreements called for long-term planning and forecasting for the production of better data using the very latest in geographical information systems. And this is where the federal government can play an important role because we cannot have every province equipped with a satellite that would send back important data or high altitude remote sensing facilities.

The agreements established principles and they established targets. These targets are consistent with new environmental standards, they are consistent with new ethics and they are consistent with some of the new demands the Canadian public is making on our forests. Of course they are based on the overriding principle which we now call the concept of sustainable development.

Over $1 billion, Sir, was spent during this initial period. Thousands of jobs were created; satisfying, rewarding jobs. Do you know that we discovered that silviculture and forest farming is in itself a very exciting, highly productive and wealth generating industry? Hundreds of businesses throughout our country were created. Contractors did the silviculture work for integrated businesses and for provincial governments.

We have achieved impressive results, results in improving our forest inventory. Equally as important are results which can be measured in terms of more enlightened public and more enlightened corporate attitudes, attitudes which we now hear expressed every day. As we all know, the environment is now the key issue and the first priority that Canadians have identified for us.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, we will see the best demonstration of the reflection of these kinds of attitudes right here in this place after I sit down. The opposition will get up to berate us for not doing more, scold us for not establishing another stronger mandate for the new minister of forests, demand that we spend even more on forestry than we do now or than we intend to spend in the future.

As I said, this is reflective of the new attitudes toward forestry that Canadians are expressing. Of course, Sir, I can say to them in return how happy I am that belatedly both the opposition parties have discovered their interests in forestry. I can also say how sad I am that we have wasted all those years when governments and administrations previous to ours made it a practice to play fast, loose and liberal with Canada's most precious heritage.

It is perhaps a coincidence of history, or perhaps there is some significance to the fact, that when the department was established in 1960 there were prospects that the Canadian industry could double its production in 15 years .That would be by the year 1975. Of course, always having been a strong Conservative, Mr. Diefenbaker's predictions were too conservative because the industry did much more than double its output in that time.

The coincidence or significance is that Canada faces the same opportunities, the same challenges and the same prospects today. As you know, my department has just published a report that gives an outlook to the year 2010. World pulp consumption is expected to increase by over 60 per cent in the next 20 years. Canada's forest industry has a clear opportunity to double its output of paper and paper board, high value added products. By the year 2010 all of this is possible to meet the anticipated increases in global consumption.

Now, Sir, that would put our paper exports alone well over $30 billion annually. This is nothing less than spectacular, particularly when one considers that already our forest products industry sustains a $30 billion to $40 billion a year manufacturing sector which contributes over $18 billion a year to our balance of trade.

Just contemplate this; compared to the total of Canadian exports to Britain our forest products to the United States are seven times greater. Our exports to the United States alone are 15 times greater than all our exports to France, and they are about equal to the total of all Canadian exports to all of the rest of the world. Thirty per cent of pulp and paper sold internationally comes from Canada and so does 22 per cent of the world's solid wood manufactured products. Forest products as a whole make up 30 per cent of the value of Canada's shipments to other countries. In fact, the forest products sector contributes more to our positive balance of trade than does the combination of agriculture, mining, fishing and energy.

All this activity supports some 350 cities and towns throughout our country. Whole regions of the country depend on this industry, having less of an opportunity to strive for a more diversified economy. Expanded markets and intensive management offer the exciting potential of new employment opportunities for hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers. But, Sir, there will, of course, be new pressures and new demands which the industry will be placing on the available fibre. There will be more demands for feed stock for an industry which is already among the most efficient in the world.

These demands will be strong because we want to capture these new opportunities, these new markets and create these new jobs. Dealing with these demands today against the new demands which will have to be met, which are even more insistent, more imperative and more compelling, will be very hard, and I speak here, of course, of the demands that the environmental movement is making.

Until now the industries using trees have held primary claim to our vast resources, but it is no longer a matter between industry and the trees. Forest users are being held accountable today for the environmental effects of their own operations. They are having to share the forests more and more with other users and to take into account the impact which their forest operations have upon the environment. A multi-billion dollar tourism sector is supported by our forests.

I only cite these facts to point to the tremendous pressures which our forests must face, not only to maintain the strong contributions, but in addition to respond to new demands, new opportunities, and to do so meeting higher standards.

Now how are we to cope with these pressures? How are we to take advantage? What choices are we to make and how do we cash in on these opportunities? Well, hon. members would have discovered this morning when they came to work that they had a blue basket next to their desk. We had an argument just before I started to speak, about recycled paper. We have to find the best of all of these ideas to stretch the resource. The industry has to adjust to more value-added products, increase and broaden the milieu of their products which are sold throughout the world so that they can get the proper returns and pay for the costs that are associated with getting into intensive silviculture.

Well again, Sir, this is what this bill is all about. The bill before the House calls for expanded forest research. Now research has always been, as you know, a federal responsibility. We fund almost all the research that goes on in universities. My department has six research stations which have earned themselves a reputation throughout the world, and they are strategically located throughout the country.

We intend to give the research we are doing new direction. The first thrust, of course, would have to be in technology transfer, more site-specific research, transferring the ideas to the field. Our research would have to concentrate, particularly in the universities and in other centres, on the area of the environment, creating and producing new products, organic products that will help us replace in the forests the harmful agents which we had to use in the past to spray against insects and disease. Our research will be targeted at improving the efficiency of our mills, increase their utilization and the utilization of the resource. And of course, as we all know, some of these efforts are already under way. We are building a new foreign tech centre at the University of British Columbia and we are contributing to that facility in a respectable manner.

Other mandates in the 1960 bill are once again introduced here in order to promote development of national principles and policies for forest conservation. Another one is to generate federal-provincial co-operation in forestry and I have talked about that.

Finally, the bill calls for the new department to educate and to inform Canadians so that public opinion will support integrated balanced forest management of the highest order. This is a very important aspect of the work that I anticipate doing in the coming months because, unfortunately and tragically, public opinion is misinformed and some of the public attitudes are formed from a basis of poor information.

The experience in other countries shows that such kind of management regimes I have outlined could produce much higher yields and much higher earnings for our industry. In fact, in some areas of the United States, and in Sweden and Scandinavian countries generally, well-managed commercial forests produce up to three times more the volume of fibre from a certain area of land.

I should point out here that in the United States and Sweden it is the practice to engage one professional forester for every 15,000 hectares of forest land while in Canada we have one for every 450,000 hectares of forest land. That points to yet another urgent necessity; the training of highly qualified people and the experts we will require to do the work.

This is something the opposition might like to keep in mind, particularly those people who always thought that all we have to do is throw money at a problem and it will go away. Even if we did have $5 billion to do the work which perhaps needs to be done on the forests, we would not have the people who could direct this work properly. Money is not a good nutrient by itself. In fact, when the Liberals managed our money it was biodegradable but that didn't make it a nutrient for our forests.

In the manifesto which I published in 1983 entitled "A Green Ghetto" I promoted the concept of putting more emphasis on private management of small woodlots. I promoted the concept of community forests, and I hope that the new department, together with the provinces, can give impetus to that objective as well.

The fact is that it will take the combined efforts of private and public sectors, federal and provincial governments, universities and labour, the mobilization of a national thrust and a national commitment to meet the challenges of simultaneously increasing the annual allowable cut for our industry—and some say it can be doubled with intensive management— supplying more fibre for the industry so that they can meet the opportunities and challenges that offer themselves in the national market-places, regenerating the forests, accommodating new demands for multiple use, even setting aside pristine areas for wilderness preserves, and doing all this in an environmentally sound way.

Provinces, I can report today, are spending more. Nine of the ten provinces today spend more on silviculture and forest management than they take in as revenue from the forests. They need our help and I am here to commit our help to them.

In some parts of our country it will take some time for us to correct the sins that we have inflicted upon our forests in the past. There are some regions in the country where it is too late. In most of Canada, particularly in my part of British Columbia and the west generally, we have the good fortune of being able to exercise all of the options that are still available and cash in on all the exciting opportunities. But we also must exercise strong federal leadership, particularly in developing and implementing creative national strategies which sense new trends, respond to new standards, meet strong challenges and realize attractive opportunities. As we deal with these realities in keeping Canada healthy we must be conscious of a rapidly shrinking globe. Every 10 years 100 million new souls are added to the population base of the planet; that is a new Mexico, a new Bangladesh every year. All of these people will be putting their demands on the scarce resources that are available.

Our Prime Minister has emphasized that all our national policies and strategies should henceforth be built on the principles of sustainable development. If there is any sector which lends itself to sustainable development it is forestry. We can exercise world leaderhsip with a policy framework designed to meet the requirements of our own generation without depriving future generations of the opportunity to meet theirs.

So, Sir, I invite my friends opposite, and I invite all Canadians, to join us in mounting the effort and the thrust which is required to meet all the objectives in Canadian forestry. And I ask the opposition to join me in giving this Bill passage, in correcting the sins of the past that led to the demise of a department in the past. To do that we will need a federal department of forestry which is described in this bill. Again I ask this House to give this legislation speedy passage.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, the forestry minister told us that his new department will give the forest industry the cabinet clout it deserves. Not only does he believe that it will provide national leadership in the development and co-ordination of forest policies and programs, he actually thinks that it will help him promote sustainable development and that it will help him conduct the research and development that the forest sector needs and deserves. I only hope it will.

The minister also went on to tell us that it was first on the Order Paper today and, as such, that is how important it was to the government. He also went on to give us a history lesson. The only problem with it, Mr. Speaker, is that he stopped a little short. History goes a little further than that. He forgot to tell us the history of the Wilson Budget last spring. I am going to tell you that history right now Mr. Minister and Mr. Speaker.

Last spring the Budget presented by Wilson cut the forestry department. Does a budget reduction of $28 million raise forestry's profile, I ask you, Mr. Speaker? Definitely not. Does a minister running to other departments to beg for money to fund the foresty development agreements confirm the sector's profile? Definitely not .Does a reduction of 47 person-years help the forestry department fulfil its mandate? Definitely not.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to believe that the Government is serious when dealing with the forest industry. The Department of Forestry suffered an 11.9 per cent cut in the budget 1989-90 while natural resource based programs have received increases. On the other hand, the staff of this very department has suffered a reduction of 47 person-years. Moreover, the Department has no control over the agreements concerning forest development. This is not a department which I would call very vigourous.

[English]

Canada needs a strong forestry department, there is no doubt about it. Although the Constitution grants provincial legislatures the exclusive power to manage and tax their public lands and forests, a strong federal presence is needed to provide leadership and service in many important areas such as regional forest resource development agreements, market enhancement, international trade intelligence, policy analysis, support of national forest research interests, statistics, pollution control, conservation, parks, recreation and public awareness.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not provide the forestry sector with the representation it deserves. It is nothing more than a cosmetic and superficial move. Some people would probably say, "Where's the beef?"

The government is creating a forestry department yet it is reducing its resources. In fact, this new department is the only natural resource-based program to have seen its budget dwindle. Forestry suffered an 11.9 per cent cut in the 1989-90 budget while all other programs that are based on natural resources grew. For instance, the environment department grew by 9.4 per cent; energy, mines and resources received a 22.9 per cent increase; fisheries and oceans had its budget raised by 6 per cent, and agriculture received a 21.5 per cent increase.

Why the double standard? The minister tells us today that his government puts an importance on forestry. That is the only sector based on natural resources that was cut. Why the double standard? Why does the government claim that it will be doing more for forestry when it is actually doing less?

Forestry deserves better. It is the industry on which much of our country was built. It has been the backbone of our economy. To this day it remains a cornerstone of our country as well. The importance of the forestry sector to Canada's economy is undeniable. Canada has 4.36 million square kilometers of forest, or approximately 176 square meters of forest for each of our 25 million inhabitants. Its forested territory is more than twice the size of the European Economic Community, nearly double the surface of Mexico, and it accounts for 15 per cent of the earth's woodlands.

The industry employs nearly 300,000 people directly and approximately 750,000 others indirectly including railworkers, truck drivers, and machinery operators that are employed by associated industries. Last year productive forest lands yielded more than $30 billion in the value of goods shipped. One out of every seven manufacturing dollars in Canada is forest-related and the sector contributes more than $17 billion to Canada's net trade balance which exceeds a net trade balance from agriculture, fisheries and mining combined.

Forestry is larger than the auto and petroleum sectors. Moreover, the foreign and domestic sales of forest products means close to $25 billion annually in trade for our country. On top of that Canada has the second largest stock of softwood in the world, after the U.S.S.R. It is the third largest producer of softwood after the United States and the U.S.S.R., and it is the largest world exporter of lumber products. It produces one-third of pulp exports and 63 per cent of all newsprint.

[Translation]

Because of the major contribution of the forest industry to the Canadian economy, the government should demonstrate much more leadership in promoting and enhancing the development and health of this industry. But this bill provides the Minister of Forestry with no power or weight, since he has to beg for money to find the forestry development agreements by running to other federal departments and agencies. As to the agreements concerning Quebec and Ontario, he must call upon the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. As to the agreements concerning Western Canada, he must seek funds from the Minister responsible for the Western Diversification Agency. In the case of the Atlantic provinces, he must beg for money from the department responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Mr. Speaker, I ask you again, can this new Department have give the forest industry the importance it deserves? Mr. Speaker, the federal-provincial forestry agreements expired on March 30 of this year in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

On the other hand, next March 30, the agreements with Newfoundland, Quebec and British Columbia will also expire.

It is inconceivable that a government which claims to support the forest industry should allow such a situation to exist. To date, only one agreement has been renegociated. Yet, such agreements are vital for the future of our Canadian forests.

• (1600)

[English]

Forestry agreements have provided more than $1.1 billion for forest renewal and management activities since 1983. More than 50 per cent of this funding comes under the federal government. These agreements have helped to increase Canadian forest management activities by providing the resources to promote site preparation, tree planting and tending of stands.

The agreements have had resounding success. In 1977, for example, their treatments were applied to 350,000 hectares, and by 1987 this figure nearly tripled to more than 1 million hectares.

Moreover, the agreements fund many related activities. Approximately $70 million has been provided to sponsor forest research and technology transfer in areas including control of forest pests, silviculture, timber supply modelling, forest inventory and tree improvement. For instance, the agreement with the province of Alberta has been very successful in developing new products and uses for species commonly thought of as useless, particularly poplar and aspen.

The agreements have also helped create the Maniwaki Technology Transfer Centre in Quebec which disseminates fire research information and technology.

In most other provinces the agreements have promoted the use of computer-based geographic information systems. Moreover, forest seedling nursery facilities have been improved considerably. Funds have also been dedicated to national and regional public awareness.

In 1987, the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers issued a document entitled the National Forest Sector Strategy for Canada. This called for the improvement and continuation of the forestry agreements, these very agreements I just finished speaking about.

In fact, the 1988 implementation progress report pertaining to the 34 recommendations of this very same strategy clearly outlined that the provinces, territories and industries strongly urged the federal government to renew the forest resource development agreements. However, and this is a very crucial fact, in determining the future of our resource, the progress report determined that the federal government was not very strongly committed to establishing a second round of forestry agreements. They were not seriously committed.

As you and my hon. colleagues will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, forest renewal necessitates a long-term commitment since programs cannot be sustained without continuity. For instance, the reforestation stage may take up to 10 years. Obviously, five year commitments are a beginning, but a more comprehensive and pervasive strategy needs to be implemented.

The federal government must take the upper hand in order to ensure that forest resource development becomes the cornerstone of the forest industry in Canada. Agreements in the future must continue to promote and ensure the health of Canada's forests for all concerned.

Moreover, the agreements must ensure that the resource is sustained. The Canadian Institute of Forestry has said that forest renewal must remain the essential element of future agreements, and that the federal government should ensure that funding is available for forest inventory and land classification, multiple-use management, forest research and technology, transfer and public awareness. Funding must not only be made available to promote sound management practices on provincial and Crown land, but also for private lands as well as aboriginal lands and municipal lands.

Since this legislation does not give the Department any financial control over federal-provincial agreements, the new department will certainly not be in a position to coordinate the application of these valid methods across Canada in order to improve and increase our resources.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that in the past, forestry methods have had a serious negative impact on Canada's forests, and that the Government needs a department with sufficient clout to do something about this problem. Since our forests were first put to commercial use, they have been exploited mercilessly. Canada is now facing a very serious timber shortage.

One of the objectives of our federal-provincial agreements is to reduce the number of forests that are not satisfactorily restocked. The Government's statistics confirm there is a problem in this area.

The number of lands that are not adequately reforested continues to grow.

Mr. Speaker, Canada's forests, formerly considered to be an unending resource, are disappearing at an alarming rate. According to statistics published in 1985 by the Royal Commission of Inquiry on the Economic Union, approximately 25 million hectares of land formerly covered with abundant forests now lie bare, and between 25 and 50 per cent of the 770,000 hectares of forest cut each year does not regenerate.

[English]

The urgency of dealing with Canada's timber supply problem becomes apparent when we consider that world consumption on paper and paperboard, wood-based panels and lumber is expected to increase substantially within the next 20 years.

Surprisingly enough, the Canadian Forestry Service commissioned a study, the Wood-Reed report, designed to forecast the performance and output of the forestry sector over the next 20 years, which neither addressed the environmental ramifications of forestry practices in Canada nor the urgent necessity of implementing adequate reforestation. All it mentioned was that the forestry industry's output would increase over the next 20 years. That is all fine and dandy. However, if we continue with the present rate of harvesting, there will be no usable wood supply left in the next 20 years.

Consultation involving the federal government and many groups involved in forestry has taken place over the last few years concerning such issues as timber supply and market potential, as well as research and manpower issues and needs. The urgency of forest renewal and a formulation of new forest strategy has also played a great part in these discussions. The basis of these consultations pertains to the application of intensive forest management, with the federal government being urged to provide the leadership necessary for permitting Canada to remain competitive in the forest industry.

The only means to improve our sorry record in the forestry area is through the implementation of intensive forest management. This form of management needs a strong hand at the helm, which means that the federal government could do more for this vital sector. Experience suggests that gains of between 50 per cent and 100 per cent in wood volume can be obtained by applying intensive forest management practices, including improved site preparation, the use of genetically superior planting stock, fast and efficient planting after harvest or natural loss, thinning, fertilization and weed control.

If intensive forest management is to be practised in Canada, the Department of Forestry must exercise a much stronger role in co-ordinating, managing, controlling and implementing the forest resource development agreements.

At present, intensive forest management is not being strongly encouraged. Only one of the six forestry agreements which expired in March has been renewed. This has caused numerous headaches for the provincial reforestation programs which have had to cut back and eliminate replanting programs. Some provinces have even had to destroy or have come very close to destroying their seedlings because of flaccid commitment by the federal government.

The Liberal Party supports the renewal of federal-provincial forestry agreements. We urge the federal Government to transfer control over these agreements to the Minister of State (Forestry) (Mr. Oberle). Quite frankly, the forestry sector needs strong representation within Cabinet, not just cosmetic representation. Furthermore, if the Government takes the trouble to create a department of forestry, it should be given the necessary resources instead of having its budget cut.

• (1610)

The government claims that it is providing the forestry sector with the leadership it needs, but its words and actions do not necessarily correspond. Last May, the forestry minister indicated during a meeting of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries that his government will be reducing its share of the federal-provincial forest resource development agreements.

Canada's forestry sector is at the crossroads. It can continue with present harvesting techniques and witness the depletion of its timber supply, or it can ask its government to take the lead by providing it with a strong department complete with the manpower, financial resources and the resolve to repair the damage already inflicted upon the environment. This needs courage, it needs commitment and determination on the part of the federal government.

However, the budget papers tabled by the Minister of Finance show a drop from $1.4 billion for regional development spending during the current fiscal year to about $1 billion annually for the next four years. That is hardly the courage, the commitment and the determination needed to ensure Canada's future.

Everybody agrees that the forestry sector needs to be improved if it is to remain competitive with the rest of the world. According to the Auditor General's report, three considerations directly affect decisions involving investment in reforestation. First, the vastness and great dispersal of the forest demand necessitates large expenditures for forest management. Second, federal investment in forestry usually also involves the provinces. Third, the growing cycle for mature forests involves a time span of between 40 to 80 years. If the government claims that it wants to take the lead in the forestry sector, then its decision to manage and invest in forestry must reflect a commitment to a long term view of the resource.

Not only is the government's commitment to forestry agreements somewhat shaky, current program planning and delivery procedures do not ensure that funds are being spent according to the guidelines in the agreement. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, each agreement contains guidelines which describe methods for carrying out various types of forest development work.

The Auditor General's report of 1988 reviewed five agreements and determined that these guidelines are not consistently followed. For example, between 1985 and 1987 the Canadian Forestry Service found that $10.5 million of the $15 million in plantation expenditures under one agreement was spent on sites not in compliance with distance guidelines.

Moreover, the Auditor General noticed that only two of the five agreements surveyed contained local and regional plans needed to outline the work to be done under the agreements and how this work related to over-all forest development strategies. In short, implementation guidelines do not provide an adequate mechanism for national control purposes; and this is more proof that the forestry department has to be given the responsibility for the forestry development agreements.

Moreover, forest resource development agreements do not contain clear standards for collecting data on reforested areas or for the follow-up work. If proper care is not provided as a result there is a high risk that seedlings planted during the agreements will not survive.

This could have a substantial bearing on the future of wood fibre.

During the 1984 election campaign, the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party promised to acknowledge the tremendous importance of the forestry industry to our economy and to raise the subject in the House, with a view to appointing a minister of forestry. His government stated that a department of forestry would provide the national leadership required to develop and co-ordinate forestry policies and programs in line with its commitment to durable enhancement, to promoting research and development in the forestry sector and to promoting federal co-operation with industry, the universities and provincial authorities in a wide range of activities related to forest management and protection.

That is what this Government should have done. However, instead of setting up a department with the resources and authority that would enable it to exercise real leadership, the Government preferred to cut the department's budget by $28 million. It cut the department's personnel, and failed to give the Minister of Forestry control over federal-provincial agreements. Mr. Speaker, again I ask you: is the new forestry department more than just a façade?

[English]

Given the government's commitment to this industry, and given the need for strong national leadership in the area, the federal government should at the very least provide the new forestry department with a budget increase similar to those given to other national resource based programs.

The new department should undertake a stronger co-ordination role in managing, controlling, and implementing forestry agreements to ensure that improved forestry practices are implemented more consistently across Canada, thereby improving and increasing the resource base.

Forestry Canada must address the backlog of unsatisfactorily restocked forest land in Canada which continues to increase by 200,000 hectares per year.

The department must also revise program planning and delivery procedures to ensure that funds are spent in accordance with agreement guidelines.

Finally, forestry Canada must address the need for a complete national data collection system to monitor and report the status of Canada's forests. It must review its role in the area of information with particular emphasis on the use and dissemination of research findings.

The future of Canada's forestry sector is at stake. I beseech the government to reconsider its lack-lustre commitment to this area. Bill C-29, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, is not strong enough.

We support the formation of a department of forestry. We want a department of forestry. Industry wants a department of forestry. But we want one that is going to work from day one, not one that has to be amended and amended.

I propose to you, Mr. Speaker and Mr. Minister, that we will be looking at the bill in some detail and in an objective fashion to try to improve it. We will be making recommendations. You were trying to give the opposition in your speech some hints for co-operation or whatever. I submit that you will need to have some of your own co-operation in looking at some of the amendments that the opposition want to put through. We feel that C-29 is just not strong enough.

The future of Canada's forestry sector is at stake. I beseech the government to reconsider its lack-lustre commitment. Canada's forests will only be able to respond to the challenges of the 21st century if the Canadian government provides the leadership and co-ordination which the forestry sector deserves.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Before I recognize the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Drummond—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—War against drugs; the hon. member for Surrey North—Housing—Personal housing costs—position; the hon. member for The Battlefords—

Meadow Lake—Canada Post Corporation—Remarks of constituents—Minister's position/Public relations activities.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-29, an act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to be able to speak on Bill C-29 as my party's forest critic, and to speak today about forest issues as they affect this particular bill, and our country. Also, I would like to be able to make some comments on forestry and, perhaps, being from what many of us from British Columbia talk about as the number one forest province, and also being from the area of that province that I represent, the Prince George area, the riding of Prince George—Bulkley Valley.

It is an honour to be here today and to speak on this bill because, as all members of this House know, it has been a long time coming. I intend to make some specific references to the bill and then to make general comments on some of the forest issues that I believe we are facing today.

I think it is important for all of us who are debating the issues today, such as the goods and services tax—the grief and suffering tax—to note its impact on forestry.

When we go to our ridings, those of us who are in the chamber today who are lucky to be members of Parliament and to have this platform to speak about important issues in our country, what is the issue that we face and talk about all the time? I venture to suggest that forestry, if not the first issue, as well as the demands on the resource, is certainly the second or third issue that commands the time of members of Parliament in our ridings and in our discussions with our constituents.

While we are supporting support this bill at second reading, I am pleased that there is a good contingent of New Democrat members who will be speaking on this bill. Members of our party represent many of the over 300 communities that depend solely on the forest industry for their survival. I think it is good to speak of our caucus in the sense that we will be presenting a number of speakers on this particular issue. While not all members of the public are with us today, some are watching on TV at home. In our communities people are paying attention to what forestry means at the national level. We want to take that message to Canadians.

I said at the outset that this has been a long time coming. Indeed it has. It was first promised by the Conservatives in the 1984 federal election. Of course, prior to that the the Canadian Forestry Service acted under a number of different departments, primarily agriculture and environment. The minister said that as an early framework we can do more. We will be tabling amendments in committee that will strengthen the mandate of this bill.

We have waited, Mr. Speaker. Some members have been here longer than I. Some time before 1984 there was debate about such a bill. In fact, in the August 30, 1984 issue of the The Prince George Citizen the member who is now the Minister of State for Forestry is quoted as saying: "There is no doubt there will be a department of forestry immediately". I do not know the Tory definition of "immediately" but we have learned that it must be about five years in the Tory sense.

While this bill is here today and we are pleased with that, we want to not only speed things along, but add to that as well. Reasoned debate does not mean delay. Reasoned debate and suggestions to improve this bill will we hope improve the process and the federal mandate in forestry.

We are concerned, of course, because now in our country and all across the world forestry is perhaps the number one environmental concern. If there is an issue, department of government or resource that should be considered along the framework of sustainable development, it must be this department and this industry. Forestry is critical to our environment and the lives and jobs of the many people who depend on it for their future.

We are starting to see some of the Conservative government's approach to forestry, and there are some concerns. I noted a recent article in the Financial Post hinting at a market-driven approach; that the Minister of Finance will be bringing in new policies in the new year regarding the government's approach to the environment and the economy. But I am concerned over some of the comments around that area when one particular group suggests that the answer is to privatize our forests. I suggest that is not the approach to take. The approach to take is to ensure that legislators, members of Parliament, MLAs and MPPs ensure that when they represent their area, their government, they represent the interests of our forests.

The minister talked about wasted years. Perhaps it is when we talk about the Liberal record we see the wasted years,the wasted time of the Conservatives since they promised an immediate department and the wasted time under the Liberals. In that same election in 1984, the current leader of the Liberal Party came to the home town of the minister and I, saying that there was no need for a full department of forestry. We in this country have grown accustomed to the Liberals shifting their positions from time to time. In this case, in the sense that they are supporting this bill, we are pleased that they have had a shift in opinion and are joining our party in supporting this bill, I trust we will see further amendments to strengthen the department in the committee.

I want to touch on some of the proposals and ideas that our party and I have that I will be bringing before the committee. I am pleased to, on an historical note, point out my own personal involvement in this. At the 1983 federal New Democratic Party convention in Saskatchewan, I presented a resolution from my riding, which passed unanimously at that convention, for a full department of forests. I am pleased that now in 1989 we are debating that bill. We are not pleased at the time that it took for the government to bring in this legislation.

At the 1985 convention, we reaffirmed our commitment to a full department and promised to provide an active forest industry and department in the last election campaign. We will be presenting some amendments to strengthen the mandate of this department. I think it needs strengthening to give that voice for forestry that we have all talked about. I propose to add to the annual report provisions of this bill. I think we must lay out in the legislation some of the concerns and issues that must be dealt with on an annual basis in a report to Parliament.

We will also be moving amendments in co-operation with my colleague, the Member for Skeena, our party's environment critic, relating specifically to sustainable development as it relates to the forest industry.

We will also be moving amendments that enhance the role of the federal government in co-operation with the provinces and the forest resource development agreements. I will be making some comments on that later.

I also propose legislating an annual forest minister's conference and a First Ministers' conference on forestry every five years. I think for the number one industry, the number one environmental issue in this country, we must ensure that our First Ministers, the Prime Minister and the Premiers, meet on this and are aware of the critical concern this particular resource area has to our country.

We will also be proposing amendments for the establishment of a forest trade commissioner. The concerns that we have had in British Columbia and other parts of this country in terms of the Conservative government's sell-out to the Americans on the softwood lumber tariff means we feel that there must be a more ongoing presence in forestry in the trade area. In light of the fact that forest trade in Canada brings in such revenues to this country, it is our view that it requires a permanent official to follow along in that process; and we will be providing amendments to that effect.

As well, in discussions with some of the witnesses that we hope will appear, we will move provisions to create more employment. That was commented on by previous speakers. We can do better. We intend to bring amendments to the legislation to see that that happens. These and others, we hope, will help strengthen the mandate of this department.

We have also called for this committee in dealing with such a critical issue to have the opportunity to travel through the country and hear Canadians' views on forestry. I have on a number of occasions advised the chairman of the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries of that. Within the last two weeks I have written to Canadians, groups, individuals, unions, industry and environmental groups inviting them to make submissions to the committee so we can discuss these issues. I suggest if there is not a willingness on behalf of the Conservatives to have this committee travel, I sense an obligation on the part of our party to travel across this country to hear the views of Canadians on forestry. We have to be realistic in that this is likely the last significant forestry-related legislation that we will see for some time. If it has taken five years for a bill that is comprised of 10-15 paragraphs, how much longer will we have to wait for a bill that really addresses many of the needs and concerns of forestry all across the country?

We have been joined by a number interest groups that support the call for this committee to travel; the Canadian Institute of Forestry, for one, and the International Woodworkers of America, have also made representations.

That is the general framework that I see for this bill and some of the discussions that we are going to have in the committee when this legislation gets there from this chamber.

But before that, if we go on to some of the specific issues in forestry that should define a bit what we are talking about in terms of the forests what they mean to our planet and to our country. We should, of course, refer to some of the figures about what forestry means to us in economic terms and also to touch on some of those issues that we have to deal with when we talk about forestry in an environmental sense.

We checked to see what would be a good definition of a forest. The Canadian International Development Agency, CIDA, provided a descriptive paragraph on forests. They were talking about forestry in a global sense, and when we talk about the definition of a forest I think that is how we have to think. There is an old phrase, as you probably know, Mr. Speaker, about "thinking globally and acting locally". Well, locally for us is our country, our provinces, and our ridings. But let me read this into the record, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is important to give us a sense of what we are dealing with. "Ranging across some 30 per cent of the planet's land surface forests have been described as the climax ecosystems of a green and flowering world. The most exuberant expressions of nature, forests perform protective, productive and regulative functions. They play a vital ecological role in the planetary recycling of oxygen, nitrogen and carbon. They influence temperature and rainfall. They act as enormous sponges, water and wind erosion is protected. They maintain biological diversity and they actively contribute to economic development. "

That shows just how critical our forests are, not just to us, but to the world. I think there is a new awareness of forestry. There is a short note in today's Globe and Mail, where it states that the former President of the United States thought that trees actually contributed to pollution. Now, I suppose, Mr. Speaker, the new President and his awareness of forestry gives us some hope in that there is an awareness at the highest level of our adjoining nation, the United States, of the importance of forestry.

What does it mean to us in the chamber today? Before we started this debate, there was a brief discussion about having our householders through which we communicate with our constituents printed on recycled paper. That is something that all members in this House would like to do.

Let us take a look at how else people read and hear about what we do. With the co-operation and the quick action on behalf of the Hansard staff this morning, Mr. Speaker, I asked just how many copies of today's speeches as printed in Hansard will get out to Canadians. We are looking at roughly 10,000 copies. I did a quick calculation. How many trees have to be cut down today so that our words in this chamber can be read by Canadians? My calculation, as we speak, is that some 35 trees will have to be cut down to ensure that today's English and French Hansard is printed. That means that our words should be economical and to the point. But there is also the hope that the words we say in this chamber today can help replant those forests and plant some additional trees for those wide areas of some of our provinces that need to be reforested. Let us think about that in our proceedings, about the 35 trees that will be used for today's Hansard.

Of course, that gets us into what are our forests: the products that they provide and the coverage they give. Half of the total land area of Canada is covered by forests; 79 per cent of the area within the 10 provinces; 60 per cent of forest land is productive, some 243.7 million hectares, by comparison to agricultural land of some 67.8 million hectares.

Let us take a look at some comparative figures that forestry relates to in our trade figures, something I referred to earlier that we will be presenting and dealing with in the legislation when it comes to the committee with some amendments.

Forest products provided a net balance of trade of $18.3 billion in 1987. Following are comparative figures: Farm products, $1.4 billion; fisheries products, $2 billion; energy exports, including natural resources like petroleum and natural gas, $5.5 billion. Now, that is not to belittle the contribution to the economy of those other resources, but it is to point out just how important our forests are to us. For example, the number of people employed in this industry, the workers who help to produce the wealth so that we can be here today and talk about the generation of tax revenue, dollars and wages that are created. Over 800,000 Canadians are employed in the industry, over 300 communities depend on it for survival. What does that mean in terms of the demands on that resource?

Previous speakers have referred to the Woodridge–Reed report commissioned by the previous government in its time, but pointing out some of the significant demands that there will be on our resource. For example, they calculated all of the particular products that would come from the forest industry, an increase in output of 55 per cent over the next 20-year period. Quebec, for example, ranks highest of all regions in Canada in terms of the value of its forest products output, heavily oriented to pulp and paper.

Not everyone agrees with the outlook that this report provides, but even, Mr. Speaker, if you have what they are suggesting will be the increased demand on our forest resource, you can see that we are going to face incredible demands on our industry and on our resources to provide that demand in the economy.

How are we meeting that? We have talked earlier, as all members have, about the provisions of funding toward the forest department. Is this government really giving this new department the dollars to match its words? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the work that our committee will do will ensure that that message gets across to the government. We will ensure through our debate, our amendments and our discussions that that message is delivered to the highest levels so that they are aware of how important this legislation is.

One of the chief vehicles for delivering forest services, the administration of forests between the federal and provincial governments, is the Forest Resources Development Agreements. They are critical, I would say, in terms of the contribution of the federal government to forestry between the provinces and the federal government. We have already outlined some of the concerns we have had in this House over the current level of support to those agreements by this government. To date, we are concerned, and I think there is evidence to show that that concern is real. For example, in my own province of British Columbia, there is a request for a new agreement when the current one expires at the end of March of next year.

Right now, despite all comments by the minister and staff, it would appear that negotiations at best are at a snail's pace. This government is placing tremendous effort and value in these new agencies that it has created. For example, the Western Diversification Fund and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. I suggest that what we have ended up with and what has been created is a second level Treasury Board. The major funding decisions that must be made in forestry to renew these agreements is not going to be made by the Minister of Forests. The minister in western Canada for Western Diversification is going to make those decisions. We have called for the Minister of Forests to have that independence to ensure that the minister deals alone with Treasury Board and with cabinet for forestry funding; that it does not have go to through another level. One of the concerns expressed by the forest community is that it is always second rate with this government when it comes to forestry. That is not good enough. That is why we will be moving those amendments in committee to enhance and improve this legislation to give it the clout that we feel it needs.

I do not want to belittle those agreements or carry on with them, but I want members to know just how important they are to the provinces and to work with the different areas of our country to see that forests are reforested. They are critical. I know you know, Mr. Speaker, that we will continue to press in the House to see that those agreements are signed.

What about trade? We have talked already about the forest product shipments and the amount of dollars that they provide to our country and the need, for which we will be bringing in an amendment to the legislation, for a full-time forest trade commissioner to ensure that that particular area is protected. I refer, of course, to the decision by this government to sell out to the Americans on the softwood lumber tariff, the Memorandum of Understanding, as it is known.

That has created havoc in the forest industry. Perhaps something is getting through over there because in the summer 1989 issue of the Weststar Timber Magazine the Minister of State for Forests said: "It is not at all a desirable situation that a foreign jurisdiction would determine whether or not we are properly managing our forests or charging an adequate economic rent". I wonder if Pat Carney is listening today because of what that has done in our province in terms of the additional measures taken by the province of British Columbia. I guess we will see if the current government is still in office in the near future. In any case, that Memorandum of Understanding has dealt a stealthy blow to our industry in Canada.

After spending some time thinking about this issue and researching it, it is my view that if we believe in this country that we are right, that we have managed our forests as best we can, and we have acknowledged where we have had problems, then we should rip up the Memorandum of Understanding and be prepared to defend our forest practices at whatever level is needed so we do not sell out our forests, like the Conservative Party did, again. We must ensure that we manage our forests and not someone else in another country telling us how to run our forest policy in this country.

The Canada–U.S. Interparliamentary Group met last June, discussed some other trade issues and the plywood standards dispute .I gather some progress was made. No progress was made in the softwood lumber tariff which shows that more work must be done. I know members will likely support our amendment to have a full-time forest trade commissioner deal with these issues to ensure that our forests are represented properly at the trade level.

Just recently over the summer, on the decision that was taken by the Los Angeles City Council on our cedar shakes and shingles, where were the government members? Perhaps they were on holiday somewhere. It took four weeks to finally get a word from this government about its intention to assist the industry in this area. Now workers are helping to contribute to a campaign to ensure that our cedar shakes and shingles go into that American market, a major market for our shakes, that the decision can be overturned, and the product that our people ship into the United States is recognized to be the valuable product that it is.

Earlier this summer, my colleague and I travelled into the Maple Ridge area and visited a shake and shingle mill. It was educational. In fact, my colleague suggested that the Minister of State for Forestry join her in a tour of one of those mills so he could get a first-hand understanding of what the decisions and the lack of direction by this government has done to the people who work in that industry. He has gone as far as to say that we do not have the people, if you can just throw money at problems. We are not suggesting that we throw money at problems. I suggest that we have many people prepared to make their contribution to forestry in this country. With proper spending, with proper and adequate information and decision-making early we can do something about it.

Given the incredible demand that we will have on our forests for the various products we produce, we face an incredible demand for increasing the annual allowable cut in our provinces .The current debate in different parts of this country is over preserving parts of our forest to ensure that they are there for future generations and to meet, where we can, the challenge that the Brundtland Commission on sustainable development identified which is the 12 per cent needed. They are major challenges which can be met with this legislation and with the debate around this department.

I am concerned over a recent interview with the minister stating that the Minister of the Environment can intervene in his department. Let us see what that means. I am concerned that if we do not have the debate about forestry on the Forest Department's terms in our legislation that we are talking about today—and will be dealing with in the committee—who knows what this department is going to end up as? It will not have the strong mandate that I think it needs.

We will have these incredible conflicts. Many members know that the debate is ongoing now in terms of our old growth forests primarily on the coast of British Columbia. There is a debate in northern Ontario. What we can do is to assist and provide the leadership and the opportunity where possible at the federal level to work with provinces and with those groups involved to ensure that proper decisions are made. These decisions involve process. Often one will hear politicians talk about process, because it is a convenient way to avoid taking a stand on something. In terms of resource conflict, process is important.

In our province there is currently no policy in place that can resolve these resource conflict differences. When my colleague from Esquimalt was the premier of the province, we had a process in place, but it has been emasculated by the current government. I have not checked the clock or the news today. I assume that the minister is still in charge in British Columbia. If he has not been changed yet, he certainly should be. He gives forestry a bad name, and I think a new attention, a new direction, to forestry is needed at the provincial level as well.

I said at the beginning that we will be proposing a number of amendments to this bill. I have also said that we will be calling for this committee to have an opportunity to travel through the country to give Canadians a chance to talk about forestry at a national level. If we do that, it will be the best show in town. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we will have an attendance at those meetings because people are so concerned and interested in our forests that they want to have a say and present their views.

I want to wrap up on an international approach, a global approach. We have read in all of the magazines, or heard on the news, of rock stars and others who have travelled primarily to South America where the rain forests are being threatened. Obviously, we have a concern to protect our forests and work on our rain forests, but we also have to think about the concerns we have about those forests in other parts of this world of ours.

They are, Mr. Speaker, to use the words of the minister, "perhaps the lungs of the earth". We have to ensure that we have those lungs. If we can help our forests at home here, we can ensure forests in other parts of the world are protected as well. We will be calling on that in the committee when we are dealing with this legislation so that we can give this department the strength and mandate that I think it needs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I liked the idea of the Hon. Member that the shorter the speeches, the less trees we will cut, which is going to be very fine for the Speaker in the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that Canadians from coast to coast are glad that the Government has decided to create a Forestry Department. I rise not only to speak in favour of the Bill but also to exhort my colleagues on both sides of the House to pass this legislation quickly and enthusiastically.

The Minister gave the background of this Bill. He also described in detail the challenges and opportunities which show convincingly why Canada must have a Forestry Department without delay.

Québec is one of the major forestry provinces of Canada. About 229,000 people work in fields of activity directly or indirectly related to forestry; that is one worker in thirteen. Forestry is the leading industry in more than 120 municipalities in the province. Forest products are the province's largest export. For example, exports of forest products in 1987 amounted to $49 billion, 25 per cent of Québec's total exports.

I am therefore particularly proud to show you, Mr. Speaker, how the new Department will keep Canada a world leader in forestry, how we will remain among the leaders in forest products and conservation and how this new institution will maintain our world reputation as a people who cherishes and knows how to administer this vast resource of which we are the guardians and beneficiaries.

Indeed, given the importance of forests for our country, it seems almost inconceivable that we do not yet have such a federal Department. I think that the Department should have six main tasks. I give considerable importance to the first one, which is to lead the nation to an awareness of the value of our forests and to educate the public about this.

Canada is becoming increasingly urbanized. It is therefore urgent for Canadians to understand the economic, environmental, ecological and even social importance of the forests for every one of us, whether we live in a large city or one of the 350 communities in Canada for which forestry is the main livelihood.

At a time when other countries are losing their forest heritage and Canadians are expressing new concerns about theirs, we can expect vigorous debates over the next decade. In this context, it will be important for Canadians to reach conclusions supported by logical arguments after weighing all the known facts. Only in that way will passion and concern result in practical and productive policies and programs.

I see a federal Department of Forestry which will be a leader in deepening this national awareness, a leader in informing everyone of the necessary facts in order to reach consensus nationally and regionally.

Canadians insist more and more that their forest heritage be used for a variety of purposes. This is very positive and it is most encouraging.

Our country, Mr. Speaker, stands out because of its concern for the environment. And in Canada, this concern applies especially to the forests. Many businesses and governments and even forestry professionals took time to recognize this reality.

Increasingly, Canadians are stressing the need for recognition of the many ways in which our forests can be put to good use, and not just logging. Our new department of forestry will help us give this factor serious consideration as part of the forestry equation.

Perceptions are also important outside politics, Mr. Speaker. I hope that creating a department of forestry will also help get rid of two erroneous ideas that are prevalent among Canadians. In fact, these preconceptions are related and persist, despite a heightened awareness of the importance of our forests.

The first erroneous perception is that our forests are in decline and represent an interesting aspect of Canada's past, a past we are leaving behind us as quickly as progress permits. Of course, nothing could be further from the truth.

Competent management of our forests is not only essential to our future as Canadians. It is also consistent with our responsibility to other nations and to mankind.

The second perception is prevalent among Canadians who would like Canada to have a high tech image. These people see our forests as a sector overrun by poorly-trained loggers whose saw and ax are the embarrassing relics of a distant past.

The proposed department of forestry will be in a position to change that perception. It can show the public and even politicians that they have a unique opportunity to combine advanced technology and modern science in meeting the challenge of managing our rich forests.

We are doing so already, Mr. Speaker. However, very few Canadians are aware of the tremendous progress we have made in applying biotechnology, communications techniques, computer programming and lasers to the forestry sector.

Mr. Speaker, the most important task of the new department will be to play a leading role at the national level, in order to heighten our awareness of the forestry sector and make us more knowledgeable on the subject.

The second task of the new department of forestry, Mr. Speaker, will consist in forging links between the various partners, organizing concerted action and co-ordinating resources.

To meet the challenge facing the forestry sector requires a range of resources that are beyond the capabilities of the individual entrepreneur.

It is only by combining the know-how and resources of the Federal and Provincial Governments with those of the private sector, that we may achieve that goal. This is the necessary condition which we must meet if we are to remain in front or even part of the pack.

The Federal and Provincial Governments are well aware that we must all act together and that if we want to take up this challenge, we will have to seize every available opportunity.

Through the Canadian Forestry Council, Governments have made their relation official. They have created a framework which will make it possible for universities, the private sector, trade unions and vested interests to co-operate towards a common goal.

The Federal Government should be able to communicate efficiently with the other industries. It should give Canada the impetus it alone can provide. To achieve this purpose, we need a full-fledged department with a full time Minister.

For us to act otherwise would be to demonstrate that we do not fully realize the importance of our forests for the future of our nation.

How could the Federal Government manage otherwise and fully participate in this country's major industry?

The major steps which the interested parties can take under the direction and with the participation of the Department include the development of higher standards for the intensive management of productive forests in Canada. Such standards would permit the development of management plans integrating the important ecological role of the forests, good conservation practices and a diversified utilization of this resource.

The Department should play a determining role in the establishment of a consensus between the partners on the manner to achieve the sustainable development of all our regions.

The Department may contribute—

BILL OF RIGHTS

SUGGESTED CHILD PROTECTION COMMISSION

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis.

She said: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise to speak in anticipation today that my colleagues on all sides of the house will agree with the spirit of the motion that I present today.

Motion M–254 reads and I will repeat it even though the Speaker has spelled it out for us:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of negotiating with the provinces to provide a comprehensive bill of rights for children which would standardize laws throughout the country, and that this Bill of Rights include a child protection commission and an emergency hotline which children could contact in times of crisis.

I want to speak today about the intent of this motion. During the remaining four hours of debate on this votable motion, my New Democrat colleagues will expand on our position on a comprehensive bill of rights for children. In the world view, Canada is a country without equal when it comes to a tradition of social justice. Canada has always been a leading nation in speaking out for human rights, the dignity of the person and on behalf of democracy.

Canada has seldom been found wanting in speaking out for the protection of the world's children. Our reputation is outstanding. Our own social contract within our own boundaries is the envy of the world. Indeed, Canada is one of the leading countries of preference for those wishing to immigrate. For these reasons I ask members to give favourable consideration to the motion.

In the past, a number of private members' bills have been presented which wanted to establish federal–provincial task forces in order to negotiate legislation. They were never fully debated. The bills either languished on the Order Paper or were referred to committee where they stayed in limbo.

Events are now overtaking us. It has been 65 years since the League of Nations first adopted a declaration concerning children. It has been 30 years since the United Nations adopted its declaration of the rights of the child. It has been 10 years since the International Year of the Child.

Later this year the United Nations General Assembly, following long and difficult negotiations in the UN Commission on Human Rights, is expected to examine and hopefully adopt a convention on the rights of the child.

Canadians can be proud that we have played a role in the drafting and negotiating of this convention. It is imperative that we ensure that our own house is in order so that the rights guaranteed by this international charter are available to all Canadian children. It is important to clarify that this motion does not suggest a specific Canadian charter of rights for children. I am well aware of the jurisdictional problems involved in the detailed negotiations that must go on between the federal government and the provinces to achieve such a charter. It is imperative, however, that we begin negotiations with the provinces to pave the way for Canada to become a signatory to the United Nations convention when it is presented to the UN and for Canada to subsequently ratify the convention.

One of the difficulties we face is that in Canada, among the 10 provinces and two territories, there is a wide range of legislation for the protection and administration of children. Often the legislation varies, sometimes minimally but often substantially. For example, Canadians would agree that a child has a right to an education but education services and educational standards vary from province to province to the territories and falls within the jurisdiction of the provincial and territorial legislatures. In Ontario, children's programs are delivered by three different levels of government. They involve eight administrative bodies located within six government ministries with different criteria determining who gets what from whom. It is not the intent of this motion to provoke a debate on when a child exists. The Prime Minister has promised Canadians a debate on that question and it should quite properly be discussed at that time. In this and any following debate on this motion attention must not be diverted from the needs of Canadian children now.

In putting this discussion in the correct context, we must discuss the draft convention on the rights of the child that is expected to be adopted by the UN General Assembly at its forty-fourth session. In so doing, it is necessary to discuss the situation of children around the world.

It has been widely recognized that children have special needs during their physical and mental development and therefore require special care, protection and their own rights.

The family plays a fundamental role in the education and development of the child. It is appalling that more than 40,000 children, primarily in developing countries, continue to die each day from common childhood diseases which we can prevent. It is of deep concern to all Canadians that millions of children live in extreme poverty, suffer from malnutrition, hunger, illness, maltreatment, environmental pollution and lack of social provisions for their physical and mental development.

We as Canadians should also be concerned that they are also the victims of war, are refugees, are homeless and that they suffer as a result of apartheid, other racial discrimination, or of colonial or foreign domination, that they are subject to neglect, physical abuse, abduction, illegal trafficking, drug abuse, or are exploited for the purposes of labour, prostitution or pornography. Even the most basic needs of children for food, clothing and shelter are not guaranteed anywhere in the world.

I mentioned earlier that 40,000 children a day die from starvation, diarrhoea from polluted water, and disease that could be stopped by a single vaccination. UNICEF calls this the silent emergency of 15 million avoidable child deaths each year. It is of particular concern, because the money required to provide adequate food and water, education, health and housing for everyone in the world has been established at $17 billion. It is a huge sum of money. It is as much as the world spends on weapons every two weeks.

We in Canada cannot afford to be too smug or too complacent about conditions here at home. In Canada it is estimated that one child in five lives below the poverty line. One child in five lives in poverty in this great country of Canada. That is surely preventable.

The recent report of the Canadian Council on Social Development in its 1989 fact book on poverty pointed out that the poverty among young Canadian families has doubled since 1973. The report found that 30 per cent of those living in poverty in Canada are children. That is approximately 1.12 million Canadian children.

There is probably not a community in Canada where children are not among the largest users of food banks.

There is probably not a community in Canada where a good number of children are not going to school hungry.

Recently a report from the Social Planning and Research Council of B.C. noted that using Canada's food guide, B.C. welfare rates would only allow a parent to feed a child properly for two and a half weeks each month. Surely since much of the administration of social service assistance is within the purview of the provinces, indeed in some provinces the municipalities, it is imperative that there be some standardization required to ensure that children under their jurisdiction be maintained in such a way that they are able to rise above the poverty line in their lifestyles.

Currently Canadian children are guaranteed certain rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and under federal and provincial legislation, policy and procedural manuals, standards, contract for services and through the adherence of rules of natural justice and administrative fairness as interpreted by the courts, or through the office of the ombudsman in those provinces where there is an ombudsman.

Attitudes about children and youth have progressed in our society, from a view of the child as a chattel to his or her parents, to the more modern view of a child as a person in his or her own right. Canadian laws, policies and practices have reflected this historical evolution while maintaining a recognition of the family, however defined, as a primary unit responsible for the care, nurturing and development of the child.

On April 27, 1982, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into force. While the charter was intended to apply to all Canadians, it has been used most often in cases involving adults. The Canadian Youth Foundation has observed that society has recognized that the needs and capacities of children and youths differ from those of adults. Although children and youths are individuals entitled to constitutionally protected rights, these rights must be defined somewhat differently for adults. The courts will have to define these rights and interpret the charter in a manner that will benefit the children and youths of this country.

The federal government, on behalf of all Canadians, has responsibility to all children of Canada and the guidance required by the federal government is considerable. It is not good enough to leave the equitable administration to the provinces. Other federal responsibilities include a universal affordable child care strategy for all children in Canada who require child care, taking into account all options that will fill the needs of the family and the child, a national child abuse strategy that will include the proper funding and will include a child protection commissioner and a federal commitment to support the Kids Help Line.

Let me be more explicit about the areas I have just mentioned. A growing crisis in child care in Canada was first acknowledged by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in 1970 which pointed out that parents require supplementary child care to allow them to fulfil both work and parental responsibilities. The commission pointed out that society had a role to play in providing these services and without provision of these services the equality of women would be meaningless.

In the 1984 election even the Conservative party recognized there was growing demand for action in the area of child care. Then opposition leader Brian Mulroney responded by making a a commitment to a national child care program. Again, during the 1988 campaign, this government pledged its commitment to the caring of Canada's children. We are still waiting. As recently as July the Prime Minister told Conservative party faithful that: "We recognize for many Canadians, especially single mothers and fathers, getting child care spaces is not just a question of lifestyles or personal fulfilment but of basic economic necessity. For working mothers proper child care is an essential investment of economic fairness and equality". And for children it is an absolute must.

This commitment, it seems however, only comes during election campaigns. By the time Michael Wilson presented his Budget the Tories had shelved their child care promises.

Canadian families will be hard hit by the government's failure to fund new spaces and the Conservatives have displayed a total lack of understanding for the real needs of parents and children in this country and for the real needs in terms of the rights for the children of this country to be protected. Working families and their children will suffer, particularly in households headed by single moms and those single moms who earn only two-thirds of the wages earned by men.

In my call for a national child abuse strategy which includes a child protection commission, I want to draw attention to the deplorable situation that exists in Canada with regard to child abuse. It is appropriate to know that September has been designated Child Abuse Prevention Month. Daily we hear horror story after horror story about child abuse in this country, particularly about child sexual abuse. The Metro Toronto Catholic Children's Aid Society reported last month that the number of child sexual abuse cases has risen by 59 per cent this year.

As recently as June 20 the government, through the Minister of National Health and Welfare, rejected criticism that this government is not moving fast enough to counter the growing problem of child sex abuse. The minister said that there is no cure to protect children from sexual predators. The minister indicated that the government has acted on the majority of recommendations contained in the 1984 report of the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youths. There were 52 recommendations in the report and I would be interested to have the minister report to the House which of the 52 recommendations have been implemented.

We do know that recommendation one, which calls for the office of a commissioner, has not been implemented.

The report puts it very clearly:" The problem of child sexual abuse in Canada is so pervasive and deep rooted that in its response to our recommendations we believe that the Government of Canada must establish a means to deal adequately and on a co-ordinated basis with these issues.

The problems identified and documented in the report are so far reaching and complex that they extend well beyond the jurisdictional authority of one or two federal departments or one level of government alone. In relation to several significant issues pertaining to sexual offences, the committee found that many of the well founded recommendations of earlier distinguished advisory commissions had never been implemented."

What is required to bring about the reforms that are needed is an administrative mechanism which co-ordinates the efforts of federal, provincial and municipal governments. In our judgment it is unlikely that this work can be achieved within the existing organization of public service.

I agree with the call for a commissioner. The report suggests that the commissioner should report directly to the office of the Prime Minister and that the commissioner should initiate and co-ordinate the work of various federal departments, work in conjunction with related departments at the provincial level, and establish the means needed to assure the full participation of non-governmental agencies in these activities.

Our governments in the past have, when special need has been recognized, established special bodies which were assigned special responsibility to respond. That surely is needed now. The problem of sexual abuse in Canada is so pervasive and deep rooted that the only way to begin to address the problem, much less the consequences, is with a commissioner. It is time to recognize that these problems are real and to address them.

On the matter of the reference in the motion to an emergency hot line which children can contact in times of crisis, let me refer the hon. members to the Kids Hot Line.

It is a national bilingual telephone counselling and referral service that has been operating for just four months. It was launched by the Canadian Children's Foundation, a national non-profit fund-raising organization concerned with the health and welfare of children. It has handled over 30,000 calls in just over four months, averaging 650 per day from children across the country, including the Yukon and Northwest Territories. Four hundred of these calls have been suicide calls. The callers range from four years old to 19.

Preliminary statistics show that 10 per cent of the callers were francophone; 48 per cent of the calls concerned interpersonal problems, family and parental conflict, peer relationships, isolated and lonely children, those with non positive relationships in their lives and kids in rural and remote areas. Twelve per cent of the callers are abused. For many it is the first time they have talked about their abuse. The majority of these cases are serious in nature. Counselling and referral to community organizations is imperative in these cases. Five per cent are related to alcohol and drug abuse. Other issues include health, sexuality, legal rights and helping kids who are suicidal.

Initial funding came from corporate sponsorship. However, the kids' help line has applied to the Department of Health and Welfare for aid and discussions have been held directly with the minister. Still, there is no announcement. Organizers have expressed their concern that without federal dollars the project is in jeopardy.

We can spend $2.7 million to advertise the budget, but the government will not come up with the funds for kids' help line. What are our priorities in this country?

Canada will soon have the opportunity to join other member nations in ratifying the proposed convention on the rights of the child. This document is currently being reviewed by Canada and its provinces. By signing the convention, a state signifies its intention to comply with the provisions and obligations contained therein.

The proposed convention recognizes the special vulnerability of children, their needs for special safeguards, protection and care. In reality, the children do not have political rights or influence.

The proposed convention also recognizes that the family is the fundamental group of society and the natural environment for the growth and well-being of all its members, particularly children, and should be afforded the necessary protection and assistance so that it can fully assume its responsibilities within the community.

Canadians can be justly proud of the role we have played in the development of the UN code. But if it is adopted, there will have to be some changes made to some of our own laws so that we too can sign the convention.

The convention sets very high standards. The articles in the convention cover three areas: survival, protection and development. This document emphasizes children but is directed at adults and makes the statement about adult responsibilities.

One might wonder why it has taken so long to legalize the rights of children. The answer is very simple: Children, regardless of where they live, have no political power. They cannot vote; they cannot organize resources in their own defence; they are extremely vulnerable to exploitation, and almost entirely dependent on the good will of adults for their well being.

The bottom line is that there is no effective, international court of law. There is only the court of public opinion and I appeal to my colleagues to vote in favour of this motion.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech by the Hon. Member for Mission—Coquitlam (Ms. Langan), who moved a Private Member's Motion and made disturbing statements that the Progressive Conservative Government does not give children priority. Let me say that this accusation is rather simplistic, moving a Private Member's Motion and using a trick like that to say that the Government has done nothing. I can say that the Government is very interested in children. I can also tell you that the Members on this side, the Government Members, and the Minister responsible are very active on children's issues.

Obviously, do we think there is a group in society that is more vulnerable and needs more protection than children, Mr. Speaker? Of course not. I too have nephews and nieces and my friends have children whom I like a lot and I do not know, Mr. Speaker, how I would react if someone hurt these children. I can understand the great sorrow and suffering of parents whose children are mistreated by neighbors, relatives or friends and I think that if I were in their place, I would surely feel terrible. Ensuring that every child grows and develops in a healthy way is our commitment to the future and also a very challenging and complex responsibility.

Concern for children and their well-being is an issue that cuts across many jurisdictions and disciplines. All levels of government, educators, service providers, professionals and volunteers have a role and responsibility in providing for the needs and well-being of children.

In 1979, The International Year of the Child, helped Canadians to focus on opportunities for action on behalf of our children. National Health and Welfare, Mr. Speaker, coordinated the federal response to the report of the Canadian Commission for the International Year of the Child.

Currently, National Health and Welfare is actively involved in the Federal–Provincial/Territorial Working Group on the United Nations draft convention on the Rights of the child. This working group is an example of the wide recognition that is being given to the needs and rights of children, in Canada and throughout the world.

The Department has a direct and ongoing impact through income security programs, such as family allowances, and cost–sharing of eligible provincial expenditures on child welfare services through the Canada Assistance Plan, among others. More specifically, National Health and Welfare has taken special measures to pinpoint and begin the fight against the serious problems of mistreated or negleted children, including those who are victims of sexual abuse.

In the last ten years, Mr. Speaker, and this is quite overwhelming, Canadians have gained an awareness of the sexual abuse of children. In 1980, National Health and Welfare, in cooperation with the federal department of Justice, established the committee on sexual offences against cheldren and youths. This committee's work, now known as the badgley report, described, in startling terms, the real and potential extent of childhood vulnerability. It is not rather unbelievable when you think about it, Mr. Speaker!

It reported that 42 per cent of the population have been victims of unwanted sexual acts at some point in their lives; One in two adult females and one in three adult males. Eighty per cent of these incidents took place before the age of majority and 25 per cent involved a family member or guardian.

To state it mildly, these revelations, combined with the fraser report on pornography and prostitution, heightened public awareness and created a demand for action.

This government, Mr. Speaker, has taken specific action to deal with child sexual abuse. Among other things, Bill C–15 became law in January of last year. The purpose of this project is to reduce and prevent the secondary victimization of children by the court system. This project bears witness to the special dimensions associated with a problem like child sexual abuse.

The child sexual abuse initiative launched by this government in 1986 included $25.1 million over five years, to address the problem. Of course I think that is not much. We would need twice that amount, Mr. Speaker.

The Government is confronted with budgetary problems. National Health and Welfare, through the Family Violence Prevention Division, is responsible for the administration of $20 million to develop innovative projets that will help us to prevent and treat child sexual abuse. Mr. Speaker, need I insist on the need to work on prevention, since a child who has been abused sexually or otherwise has a hard time readjusting to normal life. That is why we must focus on prevention.

Mr. Speaker, since 1986, the Department has funded more than 170 projects across Canada in awareness, training, prevention education as well as research and evaluation. Of course, Mr. Speaker, the eradication of child abuse is our main goal. More than 10 national youth serving organizations are working with the Canadian Council on Children and Youth on a National Health and Welfare funded project to develop a national training program for the prevention of child sexual abuse. I could elaborate on that project but it would take too long; I only want to mention it so that the Hon. Member can find out more from the Department.

The Canadian people are concerned about the abuse, exploitation and neglect of our children, Mr. Speaker, as Hon. Members are aware.

Since 1987, Mr. Rix Rogers, a well–known volunteer, has been serving as the Minister of National Health and Welfare's special advisor on child sexual abuse. Mr. Speaker, I took the time to read the report and I can tell you there were some incredible things in it. I told the Minister that, as Parliamentary Secretary, I would devote most of my time to trying to help him and his provincial counterparts— The issue was raised last week at a meeting of federal and provincial Ministers of Health which took place at Meech Lake. Of course, it also concerns provincial Ministers responsible for enforcing health legislation. But Mr. Rodgers' report is alarming and I would encourage the Hon. Members to read it to become more aware of the serious problem of child sexual abuse, Mr. Speaker. I gives me the shudders just to talk about it.

I know that my time is limited. The Hon. Member's motion proposes the establishment of an emergency hot-line for children. I would like to take a few moments, Mr. Speaker, to address the matter of telephone hot-lines. Many provinces have now recognized the need and are offering this type of service, as the honourable member, who is from British Columbia, must be aware. Mr. Speaker, Manitoba has a network of telephone lines. There are a number of hot-lines and crisis telephone services for children in Ontario. Alberta offers a 24-hour child abuse and neglect hot-line. Quebec also has a province-wide child abuse line.

By now, Mr. Speaker, members of this House and the Canadian people will be aware, or will learn if they don't already know, that the Canadian Children's Foundation has launched the "Kids Help Phone" to reach out to chilren in distress. With sponsorship from the corporate sector, this toll-free, national hot-line offers 24-hour a day, year-round service to children who don't know where to turn for help. The child's anonymity is preserved, and the Foundation is working closely with the provinces.

Finally, Mr Speaker, the federal government is currently taking action to develop measures to protect Canadians from abuse and neglect. In June of 1988, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister responsible for the Status of Women announced the $40 million family violence initiative. Again, Mr. Speaker, the ministry is cooperating with the provinces and the territories. A lot has to be done. Right now, we are trying to develop a long-term action plan and to make sure we all agree that sexual abuse and family violence must come to an end. It will take money and efforts, but you can be sure that I will pay special attention to this matter. I want to thank the honourable member for giving me the opportunity to address this issue.

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was very disappointed to hear the response of the government to this private member's motion. I listened very carefully as she ignored the essential point being raised; that is, will Canada lend support to the UN General Assembly debate on a bill of rights for children this fall. The response of our party today and for the last several years is that we will support the UN resolution and we ask the government of Canada to take the initiative in working with the provinces to see that this happens.

I would just take us back a little bit to understand the genesis of this debate. The Liberal Party has for years worked within the General Assembly to assure that children's rights are promoted and protected. It comes as a great surprise, though perhaps not, that this government chooses to talk about anything else except its international responsibility in a matter so fundamental to the future of our country as children's rights.

Back in 1959, the UN General Assembly adopted a declaration of the rights of the child. Included in this declaration were the right to affection, love and understanding, the right to adequate nutrition and medical care, the right to free education, the right to a full opportunity to play and recreation and the right to a name and nationality. That takes us back 30 years of fighting for this basic principle.

Canada was a signatory to this bill. However, the UN lacks the legal authority to enforce the principles enshrined in this bill. Hence children's rights in Canada were nothing more than a statement of principle. This is not to say, however, that policy and law-making in Canada did not take into account the welfare of children. We all know of the progressive legislation presented by one Liberal government after another since that time to promote the rights of children.

A private member made an effort in 1979 to present a piece of legislation. James McGrath, a Progressive Conservative member from St. John's East presented Bill C-204, which was then sent to a committee and was never enacted. This party across from me has some semblance of conscience but has not been able to pull itself together to do anything as the government.

Mr. Friesen: Who killed it?

Mr. Walker: It was killed by your party. The Canadian Government should take the responsibility in three ways for enhancing the rights of children. First, it should take the responsibility for working with the UN to ensure that this piece of legislation gets through this fall. The bill of rights for children has a number of principles which are absolutely important for Canadians. Here are some of the highlights from it.

Every child has the inherent right to life and the state shall ensure maximum child survival and development. Children shall not be separated from their parents unless competent authorities are there for their own well-being. Parents have the primary responsibility for the child's upbringing, but the state shall provide them with appropriate assistance and develop child care institutions. The state shall protect children from physical or mental harm and neglect. Disabled children shall have the right to special treatment, education and care. The state shall ensure health care is provided to all children. Primary education shall be free and compulsory as early as possible. Discipline shall respect the child's dignity. Children should have time to rest and play and equal opportunities for cultural and artistic activities. The state shall protect children from the illegal use of drugs. Capital punishment or life imprisonment shall not be imposed for crimes committed before the age of 18. Children of minority and indigenous population shall freely enjoy their own culture, religion and language.

Although in Canada we have often talked about these objectives as a country, we have also had a great deal of difficulty reaching these goals. Part of the problem, and I think this is the origin of this particular private member's motion, is the fact that so many of our responsibilities dealing with children are in fact split between the provincial and federal governments.

Think of the way we have distributed responsibilities. Family allowances are federal; child welfare is basically provincial. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms is federal; education is provincial. The Criminal Code is federal. Income support is both provincial and federal, depending on the particular piece of legislation. Municipal services which affect children in areas such as recreation are under the umbrella of the provincial governments. Housing can be either federal or provincial. Disability assistance can be either provincial or federal and child labour laws are provincial responsibilities. For this reason, it is important for the federal government not to sit back but to take the initiative to ensure that the provincial governments which must assume responsibility for this international piece of legislation understand the importance of it for all Canadians so that we do not get locked into a Balkanized state and have one or two recalcitrant ministers refuse to sign.

I think of some of the pressing problems facing us with our children. Let us just go through the list quickly. It is enough to disturb any Canadian. There is the plight of native children, particularly in western Canada, on reserves and off reserves, and little action is being taken there. In the native community, the baby boom has come later and these problems will only get worse and worse if we do not act. The plight of young prostitutes in our cities, the emergence of street gangs, crime and drug-related activities, ethnic and racial tensions, the problem of homelessness among youth who have no place to go and wander the streets night after night. There is the impoverishment of families, particularly since this government took control. There are the single-parent families and the problems they have dealing with the responsibilities of their children. There is sexual abuse, which was already mentioned by previous speakers.

For these reasons we think that the government should not sit back and make speeches about what it has been trying to do but should admit, as all clear-thinking Canadians would admit, that in fact a great deal has to be done in the near future to protect our children.

This motion represents but one small step in the activities that the Canadian government could be taking, and in fact will represent a first step in a very, very difficult process of ensuring provincial co-operation. We have seen that the strategy of this government in one domain after another has been to allow the provincial governments to do whatever they want. This is not a time to wait for the provincial governments to do what they want but in fact is a time to establish federal authority, federal leadership, and ensure that Canada becomes a signatory to this agreement as well as the provincial governments.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for allowing me the opportunity to participate in this debate. No political party has a monopoly on what is best for the children of this country, but all of us as legislators have a responsibility to understand that for years, there has been neglect in this field and it is within the power of this small chamber to affect the lives of over 1,200,000 children in this country who do live below the poverty line.

My reason for coming into politics some 30 years ago was that I am a social worker. I worked with the Children's Aid Society in the city of Vancouver and also in correctional institutions. When I first started as a social worker, case loads were 78 children per worker. Now case loads average 250 to 300. We have not made progress, Mr. Speaker, we have lost ground. We were putting children as young as 12 years of age into prisons, known as training schools in this country. Mercifully, in the last 30 years some of that attitude has changed, but it has not changed on racial lines. There are still indigenous peoples in this country whose children are placed, on the basis of the fact they are indigenous people, far more readily than the rest of the population into child care in provinces right across this country.

Furthermore, when we talk about children's rights we must understand that they are part of families. Essentially the poverty end of those families is the single parent family. We can all make pious statements and platitudes about the necessity of caring for children, but the bottom line is sufficient money for a family to survive and provide the necessities of life for every child who should be given equal access to every necessity in this country. I do not blame the government for this situation, or the opposition, or our party. We talk about the necessity for these things, bringing a sense of unanimity to our concern for children. The facts is that there is only one body in this House that has the authority at this moment, delegated by the citizens of this country, to do something about it and it is that government over there.

It is not good enough to blame it on the Liberals. It is not good enough to say we hope to do better. What is good enough is to stand up and say that we, the Government of Canada, supported by the two opposition parties, intend to make right that which has for so long been wrong.

During my administration in British Columbia, I was attacked for being a social worker. I was attacked for being concerned about the rights of children. I was told that I was spending too much money on welfare. I will never apologize for upping the budgets for the care of children that we were responsible for as a government of the province of British Columbia.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Barrett: I deeply regret that the succeeding government destroyed initiatives in the province of British Columbia parallel with some of the provinces, including the province of Quebec, that were innovative, new and daring in preventing problems with children rather than institutionalizing them and paying for the problems afterwards.

My colleague, the Member for Mission—Coquitlam, has made an outstanding statement here in this House, delineating through hard facts the passion and the anxiety of people in this country who do work with children every single day. We will not get another chance, perhaps, in the very short time of this parliament to discuss an issue that is as important as this in my opinion, and we do have a chance to vote on it today.

There are voiceless people who expect and hope and dream that somehow a good government will do something decent. This is a chance for all of us to participate in good government and in doing something decent, but it means backing it up with money.

My colleague spoke about the need for a hotline for children. The hotline is operating, Mr. Speaker. What is missing is the money to keep it going. I do not want to cast any aspersions on the way government chooses to spend, but surely a little bit from travel budgets could drift down to this kind of program. Surely a little bit from advertising budgets could drift down to children. Surely a little casual knocking off of some of the spendthrift attitudes of some of the ministers would trickle down to this problem.

Kids do not have a chance to speak. Kids do not have a chance to stand up in this House and ask for the things they want. Indigenous children who are the victims of inherent and incipient racism in this country do not have a chance to speak. We used to grab kids simply because they were indigenous kids and they were better placed in white homes than they were in the indigenous people's homes. Fortunately, that practice is almost gone in this country, but it still exists.

There is a need for standards to be set, as my colleague said. There should be basic minimums. The tools are there to do it under the Canada Assistance Plan. If this government really were concerned about children, it would say no money under the Canada Assistance Plan to any province that cuts down in terms of education, health care or social services for any child.

A similar experience happened in the United States when singing Jim Folson, the governor of Tennessee, decided that he was going to use welfare money for children for other purposes. The federal government in the United States had enough guts to cut off the money and force him to meet the standards. We can do the same thing with reluctant premiers here in this country. They are not reluctant because they are mean people, Mr. Speaker. They are reluctant because they are largely unaware of how serious the problem is for children in this country.

I want to comment about some of the changes that I have seen as I conclude my remarks. Some of the changes are in the use of alcohol and other drugs.

I hear pious words about a war on drugs. The most serious drug affecting children in our society and almost condoned by many parents is alcohol. There are some parents who actually believe that they are relieved that their kids are drinking beer or booze and not using drugs. Alcohol is a drug and it is a violently abused drug here in this country simply because in many instances it is pushed on kids through some of the advertising that is subtle but direct.

The last comment I want to make is about child sex abuse. The Badgley Report initiated by the Liberal government is a masterful example of the use of the House to bring information to legislators. The government is to be commended for releasing the Badgley Report, an outstanding piece of work showing unanimity about gathering facts. The Badgley Report, after gathering facts, is now gathering dust.

The statistics on increasing sexual abuse of children in this country are alarming and inexcusable and regrettably have reached into institutions where we never expected to encounter such behaviour. We have never as a nation made a commitment to ensure that a whole range of services are available for every child in this country regardless of race, creed or colour and that the services are available on the basis of the needs of the child rather than having the child fit into the services that the state thinks it needs. That means flexibility. It means some caution, some prudence and some understanding that at the bottom of all of this is money and a commitment.

I will be the first to go public and praise the Tory government if it accepts this motion, passes it and puts its money behind it. But if this is just to be another exercise for an afternoon, all of us being good and talking about the needs of children, then forget it. It will go down as another cynical and hypocritical afternoon. This is a rare chance in the legislative process to do something that means something for all of us and to back it up with money. I beg the government to take the chance.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by thanking the Hon. Member for Mission—Coquitlam for placing this motion before the House because it gives us a chance to visit a subject sorely in need of greater attention. I rise to speak because I share her concern that we must do all that is possible to protect children and ensure their rights.

There are a lot of things that have happened in this century that would make us wonder whether civilization is advancing. But one of the marks of civilization perhaps is the extent to which we take care and consideration for the weaker, the more vulnerable, the voiceless, be they minorities, individuals with disabilities, the environment, animals, and most of all children. An effort to curb the strong is sometimes needed but efforts to uphold the weak is very much always there. A mark of how we can make progress on that is perhaps more than anything a mark of how civilized we are.

A comprehensive Canadian bill of rights for children is an admirable concept. But, in fact, there is a more immediate and practical alternative before us to accomplish the very same objective. I refer, as the hon. member herself did, to the United Nations Draft Convention on the Rights of the Child. This important international convention is expected to be adopted by the United Nations General Assembly later this year. Once adopted, the convention will be open to ratification by all countries, including Canada. States that become party to that international convention will be bound by the specific provisions, as the hon. member has pointed out, and the obligations that are contained in it.

How does that convention affect the debate within Canada? I think it is precisely that way. The hon. member herself referred to the high standards that are in that draft convention. I believe, to answer my own question, that this instrument developed through the comity of nations can serve as a bill of rights for children not only internationally but also domestically. We will go through the process to which she referred of seeing that all Canadian laws and policies reflect the new rights and obligations set out in that charter.

In the thirty-third Parliament I chaired a committee of this House on equality rights that went through essentially the same exercise dealing with Article 15 of the Charter. We looked at existing Canadian laws and programs to see that they in fact comply with the guarantees of equality enshrined in Article 15. A similar process is contemplated here.

I listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who, unfortunately, put a negative cast on his remarks in referring to the government because the reality is that this country has taken a very active role in the development of this convention. He also gave a list of issues that affect the position of children in our society indicating which fall under federal and which fall under provincial jurisdiction. We are not hearing of that for the first time. Our government is more than mindful that these are mostly shared jurisdiction or provincial jurisdiction issues. That is why for some many months now the Government of Canada has worked closely with provincial governments to see that in the drafting of the convention itself their interests and concerns were adequately reflected. This is something that has been proceeding with care, pressing on toward this goal of having an instrument that can serve both the international community and, most assuredly, our own domestic situation with the best possible statement of the rights of children.

Mr. Speaker, we may ask here whether it is really necessary to have an international or national charter of children's rights. After all, children are human beings and as such should enjoy the rights provided in international instruments and national charters like our own Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Some states expto have an international or national charter of children's rights. After all, chilldren are human beings and as such should enjoy the rights provided in international instruments and national charters like our own Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Some states expressed this opinion when the question of a convention on the rights of the child arose in the late 1970s.

Although we all agree that children enjoy the same basic rights as adults, we must still admit that they cannot exercise them all in the same way as adults and that furthermore, children require special protection much more than adults. The international community has recognized this fact since the beginning of the century. For example, The Hague Convention on the Laws of War adopted in 1907 is one of the first international instruments to deal with children's rights. This document and those that followed it set forth what protection must be given to children in wartime. The signatory states are required to provide this protection. The standards were considerably improved after the horrors of World War II, when the international community, meeting under the auspices of the Red Cross, wrote the four Geneva Conventions in 1949.

[English]

Outside of those specific areas of protection of children during armed conflict to which I have just referred, the international community took an early interest in the broader rights of the child. For example, in 1924, it was the League of Nations that adopted the first declaration of the rights of the child which, in these circles, is commonly referred to as the Declaration of Geneva. Although its content was only declaratory in nature, it did provide a necessary focus that has since guided the international community's work in this field of children's rights. It is worth noting that back in the mid-1920s a statement was made which says—and I think back to what the hon. member from British Columbia just said—that mankind owes to the child the best that it has to give—a simple, but a high standard. Sadly, in practice, that duty has often not been fulfilled.

It was because of those failings and the failings that other hon. members have documented here, Mr. Speaker, that the international community recognized it was necessary to ensure better protection for children. That is why in 1959 the UN Declaration of the Rights of the Child went some way toward achieving the goal of setting standards. Still, by the 1970s, as new issues affecting children came to the attention of all of us, it was recognized that a number of those provisions were simply out of date and that we had come to an era where a legally binding instrument was the order of the day.

It has been 10 years since then that this UN convention has been in the making. There have been countless difficulties and problems that probably would have derailed a less noble venture. There was the early problem of skepticism. Drafting this new convention was also plagued initially by cold war ideological disputes, not to mention the cultural differences of participating states which periodically resulted in quite a strong difference of opinion.

The working group in which Canada was very much an active participant persisted. This perseverance has resulted in a remarkable document that itself is testament, I believe, to the international community's continuing concern for the rights of the child. That is our closest, best hope to move forward because it already represents a strong response by Canada, both federally and provincially. If we get that convention ratified this year, and Canada becomes a signatory and we bring our domestic laws into line with it, I think that a great distance will have been covered to bring the aspirations expressed here this afternoon into a reality.

Mr. Maurice Tremblay (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, as did the Hon. Members who just spoke, I wish to congratulate the Hon. Member for Mission—Coquitlam (Ms. Langan) for presenting this motion.

However, Mr. Speaker, I doubt I will have much time to speak in this debate.

I will give it a try, Mr. Speaker, because if any vulnerable group in our society needs the Government's protection, it is our children.

This Government, through various departments including National Health and Welfare and the Solicitor General's department, continues and will continue to live up to its commitment to protect and provide for the welfare of Canadian children.

Our commitment is straightforward and simple, Mr. Speaker. Every Every child in Canada should have a chance to grow up and develop into a healthy individual. This is a very stimulating and also a very complex responsibility.

The challenge becomes even greater when we consider the needs of those who may be handicapped or otherwise disadvantaged. Everyone, Mr. Speaker, has a responsibility and a role to play: all levels of governments; educators; professionals; suppliers of services; and so forth, to ensure that our children's needs will be net.

Mr. Speaker, earlier we heard the Hon. Member for Argenteuil—Papineau (Mrs. Bourgault) explain the various programs provided by the Minister of National. In fact, I would have liked to expand on the measures proposed by the Solicitor General's department. Unfortunately, I do not have enough time.

Nevertheless, I may recall, Mr. Speaker, that there are some very important measures in this area and that this is a responsibility not just of the government but of society in general.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

• (1800)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that I did not see both members rising but the next time the bill comes in the House the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands and the hon. member for Winnipeg North will be recognized.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to standing order 93 the order is dropped to the bottom of the list of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—WAR AGAINST DRUGS.

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that today's question was postponed several times, although on several occasions I stayed in the House as late as ten o'clock at night, hoping to express my views on the very important subject of drug trafficking.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to thank you for this opportunity to pursue the subject raised in the House on May 31 in a question to the Solicitor General of Canada (Mr. Blais) about the war against drugs, further to the national annual report on drugs for 1987–88, published by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The report showed that enforcement techniques had improved and that international co-operation and the passage of new legislation on the profits of criminal behaviour will have a severe impact on major drug trafficking organizations. In the Western world, the RCMP has a solid reputation for its drug awareness programs.

Compared with 1986, the RCMP seized 41 per cent more cocaine and 94 per cent more cannabis in 1987. In Quebec, as part of its campaign against the profits of crime, it confiscated 25 per cent of those profits in the form of money and goods. These seizures concerned a total of $18.6 million, of which $4.8 million in Quebec. International trafficking in illegal drugs has increased spectacularly over the past few years, and apparently, drug profits are being used partly to finance terrorism.

The major organized groups that control the drug trade in Canada have established elaborate money laundering systems and are thus becoming increasingly powerful. In Canada, drug imports and sales generate between $5 and $10 billion annually. Montreal, where the number of users has tripled in the past two years, has confirmed its position as a focal point for the drug trade. Mr. Speaker, Montreal has between 10,000 and 15,000 of Canada's 25,000 heroin adddicts, while their number was estimated at only 5,000 at the beginning of 1987. Drug-related problems, including daily stress, personal and family problems, a higher incidence of criminal offences and traffic accidents as well as the rising cost of enforcement and health care, are a major social concern.

According to the Drug Addiction Research Foundation, the cost of drug abuse in Canada in 1984 totalled $11.5 billion. From 1976 to 1986, the number of violations of the Narcotics Act totalled 691,713. The number of persons convicted of these offences totalled 561,248.

The number of young people charged with a criminal offence under federal drug legislation was 4,767 in 1986 alone. More crimes, deaths, and disease will be inevitable in most Canadian cities if the expected increase in cocain and crack in the 90's materializes, since a report published by the mayor of Ottawa in June, Drug Abuse: Not my kid, revealed an increasingly serious problem with drug abuse.

Worse still, there is a shortage of treatment centres for youngsters under age 16. They must be sent to the United States, and that entails astronomical expenditures. Every day we can read newspaper articles on drugs and their devastating effects. Proliferating drug use creates a new threat to national security: the value of life is minimized, crime soars, and youg people ruin their lives for ever.

Police forces in the riding of Drummond have given priority to the fight against drugs. I am proud indeed to say that a commendable effort is being made in schools and within the whole community under the supervision of Director General Marcel Lefebvre and constable Rémi Thibault.

Training programs have also been made available to the Drummond Penitentiary staff, and theirs is the most elaborate drug addiction program in Québec.

In 1987 the Solicitor General of Canada announced the adoption of measures aimed at putting an end to drug trafficking. The Government has earmarked $210 million for this new strategy.

The Department of National Defence will provide more direct support in operations against drug dealers by making Canadian Forces aircraft and ships available to the RCMP.

The Minister of National Revenue announced that beginning last May 9 civil sanctions would be applied to discourage drug smuggling.

Other measures are to be taken to promote co-operation and an approach which reflects the national anti-drug strategy.

Awareness and prevention programs alone however will not put an end to the availability of drugs and the dependence they create.

Mr. Speaker, here is my question to the Solicitor General. Is it the Government's intention to introduce a stricter policy to fight against this insidious threat to our collective well-being by implementing strong measures to thwart drug dealers and users whose ranks have tripled over the past two years? All the more so because of the fact that, since President Bush unveiled his new antidrug program last September 5, drug dealers have been using Canada as a back door to gain access to the American market.

Considering that our media regularly report drug-related incidents, we have to come to the conclusion that we are before a fait accompli, an everyday occurrence.

In light of such deep concern, does the Government expect to increase border surveillance in an all-out antidrug war?

[English]

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to compliment the Member for Drummond for his consistent and his persistent interest and concern about the plague that has hit Canada and western countries, indeed around the world, and that is the drug abuse that is going on that is killing, injuring and maiming children all around the world.

I think the member will recall that a few years ago our Prime Minister spoke in Vancouver about the epidemic proportion of the drug problem in Canada. He was criticized and lampooned by editorial boards across Canada for his alarmist statements regarding this problem. I think Canadians now realize that he was right and that the hon. member for Drummond is correct. I listened carefully to the remarks he made in his statement just now. He has done careful research on this subject. It is indeed a war that we are engaged in. The member has shown concerns in various levels about the welfare of children.

I have a letter from a very articulate mother regarding the plight of her 14-year old child whom she had cared for carefully. But she did not realize that in a matter of four months the child had moved from the use of marijuana, unknown to the parents, to the use of hard drugs. Not even her best friends knew that the child was using this drug. This is the kind of a war that we are into.

The government is concerned that we attack it from every area we can. That is why the Department of Health and Welfare has initiated the national drug strategy and invested $210 million to educate young people and to attack this problem. That is why we have passed legislation, I think it is Bill C-61, whereby the government is now entitled to confiscate the profits from crime and in the first six months that that bill has been invoked, law enforcement officers have been able to confiscate $20 million across Canada from the profits of this crime.

That is just the beginning. I am sure that that is just the tip of the iceberg. The federal government is working with the provincial governments, through the RCMP, through the various agencies all across Canada, to educate, to apprehend and to confiscate. Those are the areas that we have to deal with and make sure that all levels of the government are co-operating in this war.

Again, I compliment the member for his intense pursuit of this subject because it is only if we in this House and people across the country take this same kind of intense interest in this subject that we will beat this war on drugs.

HOUSING—PERSONAL HOUSING COSTS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to expand on my question to the minister responsible for housing that I asked last April, and that was why he abandoned his position of principle and why he was no longer holding out the 30 per cent ratio of personal income as a realistic figure for housing. I think over the last number of years we have seen an increase in housing problems in this country, particularly in affordability.

I want to make it very clear when I express concern about the 30 per cent guideline that has been in place by CMHC as a maximum amount that a family should be spending on shelter, I am not in the least bit worried about the family that has an income of $6,000 a month and is spending $3,000 of it on a quarter of a million dollar home. My concern is for the woman who is looking after two children on an income of $1,000 a month and is spending $600 a month or 60 per cent of her income, leaving the family with only $400 and living in poverty because on $400 she cannot buy the basic necessities of food, clothing and medical care.

We have seen in the last years a number of things happening in housing in this country. There has been a sharp increase in the price of housing, particularly in Toronto and Vancouver. However, the real estate board, last Thursday, at the finance committee said there are 22 markets, not just two in Vancouver, where a serious problem has arisen because of fast escalation of housing prices.

We have seen since 1980 a decline in real family income. Sixty per cent of all single parent families now are headed by women who live in poverty. One point two million children in this country are now living in poverty. The number of two parent families that live below the poverty line has doubled since 1973. What we are facing is a growing number of Canadians, not the wealthy but middle and lower income Canadians, who because of poverty cannot afford housing or because of the high cost of housing are being driven into poverty. They have always had at least the federal government saying you should not be paying more than 30 per cent. Some hope. And the minister has backed away from that.

This federal government has done a number of things that almost seem to be designed to take a bad problem and make it worse. Let me just list a couple of them. They have continued with their high interest rate policy. Every increase in the interest rate of 1 per cent adds $100 per month to the mortgage payment on a mortgage of $150,000. The other thing that they have done is they have backed away from social housing programs. They have reduced their commitment to provide non-market housing. We have seen that in the reduction in the number of units that they are willing to build under co-op housing and the doing away with the rental RRAP program. Rental RRAP was a significant program for the poor in some cities. It did not work universally well. We have an increased problem of poverty with renters in this country. Forty per cent of all renters now start with an income below the poverty line.

In my riding, in the last six months, as vacancy rates have gone down developers have taken over peripheral housing rental units, given them a coat of paint, put cheap carpets on the floor and have increased rents anywhere from 30 per cent to 50 per cent to 70 per cent, taking them totally out of the ability of people on fixed or marginal incomes to pay.

Now we have probably the most devastating blow on housing that anyone could take, and that is the GST. The government said it would give a rebate that would make housing not change in price. It estimated that there would be a net increase of only $480. Nobody believes that. The Home Builders Association has done its own independent calculations and it shows the price on a typical house costing $150,000 will increase $3,025, an increase over what the government said of 630 per cent.

I have had a tax firm, Oates Anderson, do some calculations for myself, considering not only the increase on the cost of housing, but the impact of inflation on the GST and the driving up of interest rates by GST. What Oates Anderson show is that it is not going to be the $480 that the federal government says, it is not even going to be the $3,000 that the Home Builders say, the increase could be as high as $14,000 on an average house in Vancouver, which means an increase in down payment of $3,600 and an increase in monthly mortgage payments of $230 on the average price in Vancouver.

So, I ask the minister again: What hope does he hold out? Instead of simply saying, "If the goal is not attainable, let us move the goalpost", I think he has to hold out some hope for Canadians for affordable housing, particularly those in the middle and lower income brackets .

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to make it quite clear that neither I nor the government have backed away from anything as far as helping Canadians with their housing problems.

I think the hon. member referred in his original question and has referred this evening to this 30 per cent figure. I would like to make it quite clear what that 30 per cent figure is all about.

There really are two aspects to the magic number of 30 per cent. First if a Canadian goes out to apply for a mortgage to a bank or a trust company, he or she will not get that mortgage unless his or her income is in excess of the total principal interest payments that that Canadian will make on the mortgage plus municipal taxes. That is one part of what the 30 per cent figure means.

The second relates to the question of assisted housing. That means you are not eligible for assisted housing under the rules and regulations in place unless your income exceeds 30 per cent; unless you are paying greater than 30 per cent of your income for your housing needs. Those are the two aspects referred to and to which the Hon. Member has been referring as far as the number 30 per cent is concerned in relation to housing.

I was quoted in The Globe and Mail back on April 24, with respect to this as follows: First, that Canadians can no longer assume 30 per cent of their income will buy reasonable accommodation. Second, that 30 per cent of income for housing is no longer realistic for many Canadians. I do not really believe that the hon. member can quarrel with those two statements. In fact, that is the case. Today, many Canadians have to spend much more than 30 per cent of their income on affordable housing. We need to try to make sure we can house as many Canadians as we possibly can. There is no question of backing away from the 30 per cent figure whatsoever.

What the government did when it came to power in 1984 was to put in place a new policy, a policy whereby all government housing money was directed toward the neediest, those who were spending in excess of 30 per cent of their income on housing. In fact, that was not the policy of the previous government. In fact, it has meant that about 40 per cent more needy people get housing assistance from that government funding than got assistance under the previous government's policy.

That sort of policy and the money that is spent by the government at the present time on assisted housing means that some 600,000 units or homes across the country receive assistance with housing. It means that this year will add something like 45,000 more assisted housing units to the total inventory of housing across the country.

That is the sort of thing we need to do. Unfortunately, that is not enough, obviously, and we have to do other things as well. Some of the things that the hon. member is aware we are trying to do at the moment are, first, make some more surplus government land available for housing that is affordable to Canadians. Hopefully, we will be doing it in the Vancouver area. We have done some in the Toronto area. Hopefully we will be able to do more.

Second, we have put in place some tripartite committees, federal, provincial and municipal. There is one in Vancouver. It met on September 12 and it is aimed at getting more land in place to produce more housing that is affordable to Canadians.

Third, we hope very shortly to have in place a regulatory reform process aimed at cutting the cost of housing through cutting the red tape involved in putting housing on the market and also in trying to improve the zoning regulations so that the housing being built will not be monster houses as are many of the homes in Vancouver, but starter ones affordable to Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. minister's time has expired.

CANADA POST CORPORATION—REMARKS OF CONSTITUENT—MINISTER'S POSITION/PUBLIC RELATIONS ACTIVITIES

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, June 21, I rose in this chamber during Question Period to ask the minister responsible for Canada Post about newspaper advertising carrying the signatures of community leaders from across Canada, including one from my own constituency.

What prompted me to rise was that preceding that date, on June 15, the Minister had quoted from this advertisement in this House of Commons naming my constituent and identifying his community of residence. I later contacted my constituent to find out more concerning the Canada Post ads of which the minister was most proud. To be clear, the ads in question state: "People in my community are benefiting from this postal service. It is good for the community". That statement is followed by 80 signatures of reeves, mayors and councillors from across the country.

Before proceeding with the problems with the specifics of the ad itself, I would like to mention the context in which that ad occurred. That context is an odious one. The advertising campaign of which this ad is a part aims to convince rural Canadians that Canada Post is in rural Canada to stay. As rural Canadians with whom I am familiar know all too well this is not the case.

Canada Post and the federal government along with it is pulling out of rural Canada. Why, Mr. Speaker? Canada Post and this federal government are using rural Canadians as scapegoats in their single-minded pursuit of profits for Canada Post at the expense of service, at the expense of jobs for rural Canadians, and at the expense of the communities themselves.

My constituent named in this House of Commons, Mr. Edward Kjargaard, is listed from Alticane, Saskatchewan, where some changes in postal service have taken place. What used to be a thriving community with three grain elevators is now just a hamlet with maybe 15 people. Mr. Kjargaard is not the reeve of Alticane, he is the reeve of the RM of Douglas in which the hamlet of Alticane is situated. He lives 30 miles from Alticane and gets his mail not from outdoor boxes at Alticane but from a rural route delivery service which originates in the urban centre of North Battleford. Mr. Kjargaard made this all very clear to the Optima Research employee who visited him to discuss post office services in Alticane. To make a long story very short, my constituent said he had a good conversation with the person from Optima, but had he known it would turn out the way it did, he never would have signed the release they gave him to sign. In fact he admitted it seemed that Canada Post was more interested in his signature than in his opinion.

To substantiate his words, Mr. Kjargaard has sent me a letter in which he states:

> Canada Post published my name in an advertising campaign but they never mentioned my concerns.

While all this was going on media reporters and politicians have called others quoted in that advertising campaign. As many as 10 of those 80 people have said that their signatures were used in a manner different than what they expected.

I asked the minister to apologize to my constituents, and to all of Canada, for allowing Canada Post to carry an advertising campaign which misrepresents the truth. I asked the minister to explain how Canadians could be expected to trust him and Canada Post in the future if this is the way they conduct their public business.

The government has chosen to place the interests of big business and the Conservative quest for privatization at any cost before the day-to-day needs of all Canadians for an efficient, reliable, accountable postal service. This government has chosen to condone Canada Post's ill-conceived attempt to fool all of the people all of the time with its multi-million dollar advertising campaign and to condone Canada Post's misrepresentation of rural Canadians as they have done with this ad in question.

Therefore, I call on the government to listen to rural Canadians, to listen to the communities of Elbow, Lintlaw, Dubuc, Denzil and Wilkie, Saskatchewan as well as all the other rural communities across Canada including those in Prince Edward Island where this summer municipal leaders across the island said "no" to retail postal outlets.

I call on the government to listen to these Canadians, to put service and jobs before profits, to fulfil the mandate of Canada Post to provide service and, therefore, to put an end to costly ad campaigns which misrepresent Canadians and to insist that Canada Post get back to providing and expanding service to all.

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I find it somewhat strange that the Hon. Member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake (Mr. Taylor) would seem fit to raise this question again, since it already was put in exactly the same terms and the Minister gave a very clear answer, both as to the procedure followed to canvars luminaries or municipal elected city officials as to whether they supported an advertising campaign, whether they were willing to have their names published during an advertisement campaign they were very clearly informed as to the nature of what that campaign, its theme and advertisement contents. They were asked in the questionnaire to sign a release for their names to be published.

Although unhappy if someone mistakenly signed such a simple statement, I can only repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the statement on which the ads were based reads: "People in my community are enjoying this new postal service, it is good for the community". They were asked to sign the following form: "I basically agree with the above statement and I hereby authorize Post Canada to use my name as a municipal representative who believes that people in my community are benefitting from the new postal service". That very simple form was indeed signed.

I would therefore ask the Hon. Member to understand. His question was duly answered. Now he raises the matter again. Now, his statement includes a number of unsubstantiated allegations. We had a scientifically-made survey, the data are available, it was done by Gallup—97 per cent of rural Canadians are satisfied with the Canadian postal service and the reform of the postal system. Let me now repeat what the Minister told him.

Presumably he represents the other 3 per cent, which would explain his question, but our policy is based on the other 97 per cent of Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

NUCLEAR WEAPONS ECONOMIC CONVERSION ACT

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-256, an act to provide for the conversion to civilian uses of technologies and skills used in the nuclear weapons industry.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to prepare for the termination of contracts for the production, repair, modification, storage or handling of materials used for nuclear weapons by encouraging the conversion of technologies and skills developed in or used in those nuclear weapons contracts to projects that serve the civilian sector and by preparing for the employment of individuals whose jobs may be lost by the termination of those nuclear weapons contracts.

I move that this be adopted.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA REFERENDUM AND PLEBISCITE ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore)moved for leave to introduce Bill C-257, an act respecting referendums and plebiscites in Canada on questions of public importance.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, we have in Canada an Elections Act which permits the holding of general elections as required. We do not have enabling legislation to permit the holding of referendums or plebiscites when required in the national interest. This legislation would be the enabling law for that purpose.

I think it is important to complete the panoply of democratic instruments at our disposal by having such a law enacted by this House, and that is why I introduce it at this time.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-258, an act respecting the establishment of the Centennial Flame Research Award to publicize the contributions to Canadian public life of persons with disabilities.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Boyer: Mr. Speaker, there is a Centennial Flame out in front of the Parliament Buildings and every year tourists who come here throw coins into it. I learned some months ago that all of that money is collected and simply goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I felt that there might be something more appropriate and symbolic that could be done with it. The purpose of this bill is to establish a fellowship using the proceeds from that which are collected annually, a fellowship to be administered by the Speaker to provide research into the contributions made to the Parliament of Canada and the public life of Canada by persons with disabilities.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-259, an act to amend the Parliament of Canada Act (privileges and immunities).

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member shall have leave to introduce the bill?

• (1110)

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, the members of this House have had undying privileges and immunities which we need to protect, but the public outside of this Chamber also has rights and privileges, civil rights and rights to privacy. This bill is designed to address those rights and to amend the immunities and privileges of the members of this House.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PROPOSED ADDRESS BY KING OF JORDAN—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the three parties of the House and I believe you will find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That, on Wednesday, October 11, 1989, His Majesty King Hussein I of Jordan address members of the House of Commons and Senate, in the Commons Chamber, at 11 o'clock a.m.; and

That His Majesty's address and customary related remarks by the Prime Minister and Speakers of both Houses be printed as an appendix to the House of Commons Debates of that day and form part of the records of this House, and shall be televised according to the House guidelines.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. parliamentary secretary have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens of Windsor, Ontario. This petition humbly prays and calls upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

In tabling this petition I want to note that several weeks ago the Liberals began a national campaign to enable Canadians to have their say directly as part of the parliamentary process through signing petitions.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the House Leader for the Liberal Party is going way beyond what our Standing Order say members are entitled to do in the presentation of a petition. I think it is obscene.

Mr. Speaker: I think I had better deal with this right away. I regret the hon. member's comment. I do not think that is necessary.

There are a number of petitions coming in this morning and they will deal with matters of great importance to the country. There is, however, a rule that those introducing the petitions must do so in a brief manner and cannot stray beyond appropriate comments. I say, of course, with regret that the hon. member for Windsor West is perhaps going beyond that. I anticipated an interruption, and it has been made. I ask all hon. members to comply with the the practice in the House.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the point of order, I had simply wanted to conclude and explain that the petitions we were tabling today were in response to requests by large numbers of Canadians to have their say directly as part of the parliamentary process by signing petitions.

We were beginning today to table petitions in conformity with the rules. We have very large numbers of petitions. We do not intend to try to table all of them today, but for days and days to come we will be giving Canadians a chance to plug directly into the parliamentary process to express their opposition to the government's goods and services tax.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the government through the party Whip has just shown its contempt for the views of ordinary Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I am going to have to be strict here. I know the hon. member for Windsor West is rising on the same point of order as the hon. member from the government side rose on. I can allow some leeway, but I think this is getting into debate and I am going to move strictly to petitions.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I give you notice now that I respectfully ask you to request the Whip to withdraw the term "obscene", as I think it is a contempt of Parliament to say that a member in carrying out his parliamentary duty on behalf of Canadians when it comes to tabling petitions is doing something obscene. I think this is unparliamentary and it is an insult to the people of Canada, and I ask that you rule that the hon. member should withdraw his words.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to withdraw any remark which the House Leader of the Official Opposition finds offensive. I do think that respect for Parliament requires all of us, and especially people charged with additional responsibility such as House Leaders, to respect the traditions of the House and the rules of the House, and I would hope that we will do so.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This gentleman is the last person to give me, of all people, lectures on parliamentary traditions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Calgary West has I think withdrawn the word which has been complained of, and again, I would ask that hon. members get on with presenting their petitions.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, before I present my petition I would like to rise on another point of order, and that is regarding the processes of having our petitions certified.

I think all members would have found that there is an incredible backlog at the moment in the office where the petitions have to be certified. I want to make the point that this is in no way a reflection on the people involved in the office that certifies our petitions, but many of us have had petitions in for at least three weeks and are still waiting for them to be processed.

Perhaps I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, and your office, to examine the problem and see if there is not some action that can be taken to rectify it.

We have an obligation to present the petitions that are signed by our constituents as soon as possible. To have them sitting in some office for three, four or five weeks is not acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: I take seriously the intervention of the hon. member for Kamloops, and I know that other members have had the same problem.

I would advise the House that four more people have been assigned to deal with the petitions and, as the Hon. House Leader of the Official Opposition made clear in his earlier remarks this morning, there are going to be a lot of petitions. We will make every effort that we can to ensure that they are expedited as efficiently as possible.

The point is well taken, and I say to other hon. members, including the hon. member for Windsor West, that we will try to move these petitions as quickly as possible. It is not lack of concern for the importance of the subject matter or for the numbers; we are doing the best we can. If we are still having difficulty in a day or two, I would expect hon. members to make representation to me and I will see what we can do.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your comments, and to assist the House, when the the government Whip rose to his feet I was simply trying to explain that we have a large number of petitions and why we have such a large number of petitions, but to assist the staff of the House we did not intend to try to table them all at one time.

Rather, because of their volume, representing the feelings of so many Canadians, we were going to try to space them out over a period of time to assist the House and yet, at the same time, do our parliamentary duty. If the Whip for the government had simply allowed me to complete my remarks, we would have made a lot more progress than we have so far in the work of the House.

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker: Before we proceed, I think I am still correct that the hon. member for Windsor West did not yet present his petition. In the spirit of Parliament, I would not want to see a distinguished member of this place let this slip by, despite the fact that he, of course, on the basis of other duties which he occupies, had to take a part in the recent exchange.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate your fairness in this regard.

Actually I have to say, to be fair about it, the petition I was presenting has been accepted by the House because one of the clerks has received it, but now that you are giving me this opportunity I am delighted to rise to my feet to present another petition from a number of people in the Ottawa—Vanier area.

—they speak French and they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Just to assist hon. members, since there are a lot of petitions we might as well concentrate on what the rules are.

I am reading from the Annotated Standing Orders, page 111:

> Several conditions apply to the presentation of petitions in the House during Routine Proceedings, the most notable of which is the prohibition on "debate on or in relation to" petitions presented in this way noted in Standing Order 36(7). In 1986, the Speaker issued guidelines which not only reiterated the provisions of Standing Order 36(7), but also invoked the practices which had evolved on the manner of presenting petitions:
> When presenting a petition during Routine Proceedings, the Member may make a brief summary of the Prayer of the petition, state the parties from whom it comes and the number of signatures it contains, but may not make a speech or enter into debate on or in relation to the petition. The Member should also indicate that the petition has been certified in order, pursuant to the Standing Orders.
> The Members should also note that they will be given the floor only once in a sitting to present all of their petitions.
> It has long been deemed irregular for the Speaker to present a petition—

That is not applicable.

I do ask for the co-operation of members, and I make quite clear that there are a great many petitions and that in the interests of those who have signed these petitions we should move with dispatch. We can do that best by sticking to the rules.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 that has been certified correct on behalf of a number of Canadians who point out at some length the unfairness in our tax system.

They are of course concerned with the recent decision to initiate this general sales tax of 9 per cent on every Canadian. They are simply asking the government to have some understanding in terms of the tax burden that citizens already face, the fact that it is so unfair and that this 9 per cent simply makes it more unfair.

That is the first petition.

VIA RAIL SERVICES

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition signed by a number of western Canadians who are very concerned that the government has decided to curtail a good deal of VIA rail passenger service.

Again, I point out at some length all of the reasons that they feel this is a rather stupid idea. They are simply calling upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, and they are calling upon Parliament to ensure that VIA equipment is upgraded to allow them to compete in the transportation market. They want to guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate, which is of course to provide passenger rail service in the country.

FOREST RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have petition on a totally different topic having to do with the legislation before the House today dealing with the forest industry.

These petitioners are from British Columbia. They are concerned that the government seems to be dragging its feet on signing the federal-provincial forest resource development agreement.

Mr. Oberle: You're dragging your feet about this tax.

Mr. Riis: The minister now is dragging something else.

The petitioners are pointing out that they need to receive a signal from this government that it will continue to take the forest industry seriously.

The fact that it has been dragging its feet and is not prepared to make any commitment has encouraged them to sign this petition asking it to smarten up, basically.

REVISION OF EXTRADITION LAWS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting petitions to the House today, certified by the clerk, pursuant to Standing Order 36. Despite the statements made here today, we have had 72,431 such petitions certified without difficulty through the help of the Speaker's office.

Today's petition contains 7,135 signatures. It calls on the Government of Canada to revise the extradition laws which would allow the Minister of Justice to order the extradition of fugitives, either immediately or after they have been dealt with fully by the Canadian penal system, not having to wait until they have served all of their sentences.

I am pleased to present these petitions, most of which came from Ontario, and this brings the grand total to 72,431 petitions.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of people in the Windsor area. They ask the government to rescind its 9 per cent sales tax and to come forth with a policy that is fair to all Canadians. They petition this House to be heard and humbly pray that the government is listening to this petition.

I have another petition, which I will present at the same time with your permission, Mr. Speaker. This petition is also from the Windsor area. The petitioners ask the government to rescind its 9 per cent sales tax and to bring forth a fair system for all Canadians, and they feel that the government is being unfair to the middle and lower income people of this country.

The petitioners ask the government to look again at its whole tax system and to bring forth a fair system for Canadians, and indeed, to rescind this 9 per cent sales tax which they look upon as the ruination of the economy of Canada and of the middle and low income people of this country.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians. I think this moment is particularly significant as I believe these people and I, who of course have signed the petition, are going to be some of the signatories of one of the largest petitions in Canadian history ever to come before this Chamber when the throngs of petitioners now out there in the shopping malls get a chance to sign their names to voice their opinions on this particular issue.

The prayer of the petitioners is that Parliament reject the proposed goods and services tax. I hope Parliament will hear that prayer.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I present a certified petition to the House of Commons on behalf of those residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right to present a common grievance to this House.

These Canadians strongly oppose the new goods and services tax that is an unprecedented tax, a tax grab from the pockets of Canadians, which will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to rise on behalf of the good residents of the riding of Timmins—Chapleau. I have a petition, duly certified, dated May 3 of this year—not the summer but May—from the good residents of Timmins—Chapleau opposing the goods and services tax which has been put forward by this government.

The petitioners humbly pray that the government will review the goods and services tax to ensure that there is no taxation on goods and services such as loans, the arts and other non-luxury items among other things. It is my pleasure to present this petition.

• (1130)

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present petitions which have been certified by the clerk.

The hon. member for Peterborough mentioned that there have been 72,431 names. Here are 4,318 more signatures which call on the Government of Canada to revise the extradition laws which would allow the Minister of Justice to order the extradition of fugitives either immediately or after they have been dealt with fully by the Canadian penal system.

I have the honour to present this petition.

OPPOSITION TO GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents in the riding of Ottawa—Vanier, who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

The Conservative Government wants to force a new and universal 9 per cent tax on goods and services on Canadians. The tax will be hidden in the sale price. It will not be fair to consumers and will put small businesses to considerable expense.

Mr. Speaker, petitioners strongly object to the proposed goods and services tax which they feel constitutes an unprecedented attack on the incomes of Canadians and would not only raise the level of taxation but also subject Canadians to higher inflation, higher interest rates and a very high unemployment rate.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I, too, have a petition. I am happy to present it on behalf of a number of Canadians who are concerned about the proposed goods and services tax and who call upon Parliament to reject the tax.

I also have a second petition duly certified by the clerk, and this petition, too, is signed by a number of Canadians who want no part of the tax. They feel that it will cause higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by the residents of Hamilton Mountain.

The petitioners have spoken out overwhelmingly against the Conservative government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax. The petitioners humbly pray and call upon the House to reject the Conservative government's 9 per cent goods and services tax proposal.

REVISION OF EXTRADITION LAWS

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions which have been certified by the clerk, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

This petition, which contains 5,088 signatures, calls upon the Government of Canada to revise the extradition laws. This would allow the Minister of Justice to order the extradition of fugitives either immediately or after they have been dealt with fully by the Canadian penal system.

This brings to over 80,000 the number of petitioners' names that have been presented in the House of Commons calling upon the government to do this.

VIA RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 40 residents primarily of Victoria and Vancouver which has been certified by the clerk of petitions.

The petitioners point to the value of VIA Rail and the importance of not only maintaining, but increasing the service and the operation. They call upon Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade the equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

I also have petitions bearing 5,000 names that have been forwarded to me by Canadians from across the country. Unfortunately they are not in a form that allows us to table them here so I will be passing them over to the Prime Minister to let him know how the people of Canada feel about his policies.

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House a petition on behalf of the constituents of Windsor West, Ontario. In fact, thousands of constituents in my riding of Hamilton West add their voice to these concerned Canadians who have signed petitions calling upon the government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to rise and present to this House of Parliament on behalf of many concerned Canadians, like the residents of Winnipeg North, a petition confirmed by the clerk, pursuant to Standing Order 36 with respect to the government's proposed goods and services tax which, if allowed to pass, will harm most Canadians including the petitioners who now seek a remedy from this House to reject the proposed GST, perhaps best to be known as the "Gouge and Squeeze Tax."

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by Canadian citizens, pursuant to Standing Order 36. The attached petition is certified correct in form and content and co-signed by myself.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this summer I had the privilege of drafting a petition and sending it to all Canadian ridings, to the presidents of riding associations and to the members of my party. I have started to receive copies of this petition which it is my privilege to present. The petition is against the Government's proposed legislation regarding the GST, in other words, the goods and services tax.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche–Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege of presenting this petition, which conforms to Standing Order 36.

[English]

It is a petition, Mr. Speaker, which was duly signed by a number of Canadians who are opposed to the government's goods and services tax because it is going to cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. I have the honour of presenting this petition.

BACKLOG OF REFUGEE CLAIMANTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition from a number of residents of Toronto, Willowdale and Etobicoke who are concerned that because of underfunding and mismanagement of the refugee program in Canada, a number of people in the backlog are being denied work permits. Therefore, they petition this House to ensure that all those who have claimed refugee status will get immediate work authorization and that when they are considered on humanitarian and compassionate grounds, those grounds will include the presence in Canada of relatives, the successful establishment of the claimant and the circumstances of war or oppressive governments and natural disasters in their home countries.

LOW LEVEL MILITARY FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): I have also a petition of about 250 names from Canadians living in Toronto, Kingston, Regina, several cities of Ontario, British Columbia and the prairies.

They are concerned for the Innu people and the low level flights and other military air training carried on, or planned to be carried on, in their area. Therefore, they ask Parliament to support the request of the Assembly of First Nations and of the Innu of Labrador in stopping all NATO and NORAD low level flight training in Canada, opposing the establishment of NATO operations in Canada such as at Goose Bay, and redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding towards enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood, promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by average Canadians who are objecting to the GST, otherwise known as the general suffering tax.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition on behalf of citizens of Canada who are opposed to the goods and services tax. I think we all realize that Canadians are opposed to this tax, and it is with pleasure that I present this petition.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present this petition signed by many Canadians opposing this goods and services tax. I have the honour now to present this petition.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege of presenting, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by several Canadians who object to the proposed legislation referring to the goods and services tax. Thousands of people spoke to me in my riding in opposition to this proposed legislation and begged that something be done to demonstrate on their behalf here in the House, and I am pleased today to be able to present their objections to this proposed legislation.

• (1140)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise also under Standing Order 36 to present a petition by a number of Canadians who are concerned about the goods and services tax. They are concerned about the tax of the government opposite and they feel deeply betrayed by this government.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and indeed my pleasure to present a petition that was gathered in Sudbury in my riding. It was gathered with the help of a number of senior citizens who are extremely upset with the proposed goods and services tax. Would you please accept this petition on their behalf.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to you a petition from some constituents of mine who live in a part of Cartierville that lies within my riding. They are deeply concerned about Government Bill proposing a tax.

They ask:

That Parliament reject this new tax on goods and services.

[English]

And as well, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition under Standing Order 36, also from the Saint-Laurent part of my riding. The citizens are concerned because they feel that it will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians and they also humbly request Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in this Parliament today. I wish to present a petition on behalf of the citizens of Canada who oppose this goods and services tax. This tax will create a large burden on small business, agriculture and fisheries.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker. I too rise today in accordance with Standing Order 36 to present a duly certified petition to the Parliament of Canada from a number of concerned Canadians. They are concerned about the excessive taxation regime of the government opposite, who since 1984 have on 31 occasions raised taxes. But mostly they are concerned about the proposal for a new goods and services tax and humbly ask this Parliament to ask the government to reject this regressive tax.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the privilege today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is properly certified, I advise, Mr. Speaker, by the clerk. It is signed by several hundred petitioners from my adopted city of Windsor, Ontario. It gives me great pride to indicate their opposition to the proposed goods and services tax, or as my friend properly indicated, general suffering tax.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and a privilege to rise today to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of the people of Nipissing which takes in the cities of North Bay, Sturgeon Falls, and Mattawa. The petition deals, of course, with the unfairness in our tax system. We call upon the Conservative government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to present a petition in accordance with Standing Order 36, duly documented and certified by the clerk. This petition is from Canadians who are worried, upset and disillusioned by this unprecedented tax measure and they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the government's proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present two petitions today, and first of all, to remind members of the number of trees that will be cut down to print today's Hansard.

My first petition, Mr. Speaker, calls upon the government to live up to its original pledge to support VIA Rail, to abandon plans for further cuts to VIA's budget and to provide the necessary resources to allow VIA to operate as a modern, effective transportation company rather than a museum.

This petition is signed by residents of Smithers, Houston and Telkwa in northern British Columbia.

FOREST RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): My second petition concerns the subject matter that we are dealing with today, the forest legislation. This is a petition signed by residents of northern British Columbia; Fort St. John, Dawson Creek and Prince George, urging this government to review the forest resource development agreement with the province of B.C. because of its contribution to the reforestation of our lands in B.C.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): I have the honour to present a petition under Standing Order 36, along with hundreds of thousands of other ordinary citizens, objecting to the 9 per cent goods and services tax. The petition has been duly signed, endorsed and signed by the required number of petitioners. It is a pleasure to present this.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of numerous Canadians, protesting this terrible gouging tax which is about to be imposed upon us.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition signed by 30 residents of the city of Ottawa who object to the goods and services tax that has been proposed by this government. The petitioners urge the Parliament of Canada to reject the tax.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present to this Hon. House a petition from people in the Ottawa region.

These people of Ottawa, just like the people in Beauséjour, object to this taxation project because they worry that this new tax will cause great and unfair hardships for low-and middle-income families.

They humbly ask Parliament to reject this new tax.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of concerned Canadians I have the privilege and duty to present a petition under the provisions of Standing Order 36, duly certified by the clerk.

This petition expresses the outrage and betrayal felt by Canadians at the government's latest proposed initiative of imposing the goods and services tax.

The petitioners humbly request that their plea be heard and that this government reject this regressive tax.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the senior citizens of my riding and all the small businesses, I have the honour to present a petition under the provisions of Standing Order 36. The petitioners call on parliament to reject the goods and services tax as they do not want to be turned into accountants and bookkeepers.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present a petition under Standing Order 36, on behalf of Canadians who clearly implore this government to cancel its proposed goods and services tax, a tax which will hurt every man, woman and child in this country.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of concerned Canadians of Ottawa—Vanier who are not in favour of the goods and services tax. The petitioners humbly request the House to reject this bill.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great honour and pleasure to stand before you and present a petition under Standing Order 36 on behalf of the residents of Kenora—Rainy River and those tourist operators who know that in 1991 there will no longer be any jobs for them.

It gives me great pleasure to ask the government opposite to consider not imposing a tax that will do severe harm to the tourist industry of Canada.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great honour today to rise in the House to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a group of concerned Canadians.

The concerned Canadians strongly oppose this new goods and services tax and, on behalf of them, I humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a certified petition on behalf of concerned Canadian citizens, specifically the constituents of the riding of Western Arctic, who oppose the proposed goods and services tax which will create an onerous burden on small business and which will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians.

• (1150)

Northerners cannot afford to have an increase on transportation, communications, and other basic goods and services in an area already burdened with an extremely high cost of living.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present to Parliament a petition duly signed and certified pursuant to Standing Order 36 from the residents of the federal riding of York North.

The residents, workers, seniors, students and business persons strongly oppose this proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax which they feel will have negative social and economic impact on their lives.

The opposition is based upon the fundamental economic and social realities that this tax will increase inflation, increase unemployment, increase interest rates, and is a nightmare to administer. On their behalf I urge this Parliament to reject the proposed tax.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of many Canadians who are very concerned about the goods and services tax. They believe it is a tax grab that has an adverse effect on tourism and that it will be a nightmare for small business to administer. Therefore they humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the new proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my honour and privilege to present to the House a petition calling upon the Government of Canada to reject the proposed GST, or goods and services tax, or grief and suffering tax. This petition is signed by 30 residents of the great constituency of Windsor West, so ably represented by our very distinguished, honourable and learned colleague sitting immediately in front of me.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present two petitions from constituents of mine. The first one, with about 120 signatures, reads: "Whereas the RCMP has a long and honourable tradition known and admired around the world, and whereas the distinctive uniform is recognized and respected by the public and other police forces in Canada and other countries, we see no merit, or value, or reason to allow changes in the RCMP uniform or dress code."

It goes on to address their disagreement with the proposed changes to the RCMP dress code.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): I have a petition with about 40 signatures from a group of citizens in the Newton area of Surrey who disagree strongly with the government's proposal to deal with the $50,000 ceiling of retired people and withhold OAS payments.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have the honour of presenting petitions from Canadians who oppose the government's proposed goods and services tax. The petitioners claim that the proposed new tax will create undue hardships on low and medium income families and on small businesses. The petitioners are, in plain language, asking this government, telling this government, to scrap the GST.

Since I am the last one presenting a petition today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate you on the efficient manner in which you accepted these petitions from right across Canada on this important topic.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 53, 64, 85, 88, 92, 94, 95, 98, 99, 101, 103, 104, 105, 107, 108, 110, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 123, 124 and 125.

FRUIT PRODUCTS

Question No. 64—Mr. Whittaker:

For (a) Veterans' hospitals (b) prisons under the authority of the government (c) Armed Forces bases (i) what is the total consumption of fruit products (ii) in what locations are they purchased?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed as follows:

(a) Insofar as the Department of Veterans Affairs is concerned, the total consumption of fruit products for the fiscal year 1988/89 and locations they are purchased are as follows:

Ste. Anne's Hospital:

(i) Total $252,752.00; (ii) Breuvage Moccomat Limitée; Produits Star Appetizing; Dellixo Inc.; Les Aliments Trois Frères Limitée; Metro Richelieu Inc.

Rideau Veterans Home:

(i) Total $35,374.72; (ii) Fine's Fine Foods; Slipacoff's

Saskatoon Veterans Home:

(i) Macdonald Consolidated; Pride Beverages Limited; Sunspun Products Limited; Scott National Products; Kawanis; Real Canadian Super Stores; Palm Dairies; Canadian Safeway

(b)Insofar as the Ministry of the Solicitor General is concerned, the total consumption of fruit products in dollar value by region for federal institutions for the fiscal year 1988/89 is:

Region	Fresh Fruits	Canned Fruits	Fruit Juices	Total
	$	$	$	$
Atlantic	39,118.84	14,886.94	13,806.16	67,811.94
Quebec	106,560.00	76,576.00	48,000.00	231,136.00
Ontario	104,331.00	124,805.00	10,221.00	239,357.00
Prairies	86,880.30	85,639.94	23.158.60	140,294.40
Pacific	53,702.40	63,434.40	23,157.60	140,294.40
Total	390,592.54	365,362.28	146,458.82	902,413.64

(ii) All fruit products are bought through food product suppliers in the regions where the institutions are located. Standing offers are established through Supply and Services Canada. A small portion of the fruit products, such as seasonal fruits are purchased through local suppliers.

Locations:

Atlantic: Moncton and Halifax; Quebec: Montreal and Quebec City; Ontario: Toronto and Kingston; Prairies: Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon and Edmonton; Pacific: Vancouver, Victoria and Abbotsford

(c) Insofar as the Department of National Defence is concerned:

(i) The exact quantity of fresh fruit consumed by the Canadian Forces in a given year cannot be specified, but it was estimated at one million kilograms during fiscal year 1987/88. Data is unavailable for fiscal year 1988/89. In addition, Canadian Forces personnel will consume some 134,000 cases of canned fruit products over a typical one-year period. This data applies to Canadian Forces units in Canada only, as overseas units do not normally receive Canadian food products.

(ii) Fresh fruits are purchased through regional offices of the Department of Supply and Services. The purchasing period does not correspond to the Government's fiscal year, nor does NDHQ have any ready means of capturing the precise dollar value of the purchases. Canned fruit products are procured annually through national contracts, awarded on the basis of lowest tender, by the Department of Supply and Services. Both fruit producers and fruits distributors bid on these contracts. It is not possible to specify the location of these purchases, as a distributor may acquire produce from several sources. The total dollar value of these purchases was $2,429,697.

CHARLES NG

Question No. 85—Mr. Kindy:

To the knowledge of the government, what is the overall cost to all levels of government of the (a) incarceration of (b) prosecution and defence of (c) court proceedings involving (d) meetings and negotiations with United States officials concerning (e) government hearings concerning (f) person-hours involved of all agencies concerned with (g) all other expenses incurred with regard to Charles Ng in Canada?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): The following Departments were requested to provide information:

Department of Justice

It is not possible to estimate the costs, person hours and all other expenses expended on the Ng case. The case is ongoing and costs are continuing to be incurred on a daily basis.

Canada Employment and Immigration Commission

No direct costs have been incurred by the Commission with respect to Mr. Ng. The Commission's only involvement has been in keeping abreast of the case and the responding to of representations.

Department of External Affairs

There have been no direct expenses incurred with regard to Charles Ng in Canada. The Department did respond to letters from the public concerning the case but the cost factor is relatively negligible, as it involved only about 20 person hours. The Consulate General in San Francisco also expended about 30 person hours replying to inquiries from the American public.

Correctional Service of Canada (CSC)

Based on the average annual cost of maintaining an offender in a maximum security institution, the overall cost of incarceration from the date of admission to a federal institution, December 17, 1985 to May 16, 1989 is $206,753.18.

CSC cannot calculate individual person hours required for the maintenance and control of an offender due to the number of institutional staff involved. An inmate incarcerated in a federal correctional institution is involved with his case management officer, may require to see the physician, is seen by the psychologist and/or psychiatrist, is escorted by correctional officers, etc. All institutions are manned on a 24 hour basis.

All these factors and others from part of the above average annual cost.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP)

To the date of the question, the RCMP has recorded 2,426 hours and expended $26,023.15 (excluding salary costs) in relation to the Charles Ng proceedings/investigation. Expenses continue to be incurred; however, they are not captured in a manner that provides a breakdown by activities as requested.

BUSINESS EXPENSES—FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Question No. 88—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Did any (a) corporations (b) individuals claim as a business expenses any contributions made to any agencies, organizations or individuals working in support of the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement and, if so (i) what number (ii) what was the value of each claim (iii) what percentage of each claim has been allowed?

2. Did any (a) corporations (b) individuals claim as a business expense any contributions made to any agencies, organizations or individuals working against the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement and, if so (i) what number (ii) what was the value of each claim (iii) what percentage of each claim has been allowed?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): 1. and 2. The Department is aware, through the routine audit program examination of the books and records of corporations and individuals carrying on business, that claims have been made as business expenses for contributions incurred in support of or to oppose the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement.

These expenditures would not necessarily be specifically identified in the financial statements filed with the income tax return. Further, there is no special audit program directed at business expenses in support of or against the Canada–United States Free Trade Agreement. These business expenses are reviewed in the normal course of audits of taxpayers books and records. Accordingly, no aggregate statistical information is available.

PROJECTS SUBMITTED TO ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT AND REVIEW PROCESS

Question No. 92—Mr. Caccia:

For (a) the Daishowa pulp and paper mill in Alberta (b) the Alberta Pacific Forest Industry pulp and paper mill in Alberta (c) Repap's expansion of Manforest's pulp mill in The Pas, Manitoba (d) the Husky heavy oil upgrader in Lloydminster (e) the Vancouver Island Gas pipeline (f) the Oslo oil sands (g) the Hibernia off-shore oil development (h) Phase II of the James Bay hydro development (i) has the project been submitted to the environmental assessment and review process and, if so, at what stage of the process is it and if not, on what date will it be submitted (ii) on what date will the assessment be completed (iii) will the results of the assessment be made public?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment): (a) (i) Yes, initial assessment has been conducted and completed by the Department of Western Economic Diversification.

(ii) Initial assessment completed on March 7, 1989.

(iii) Yes.

(b) (i) Yes, a cooperative Federal/Alberta Environmental Assessment and Review Process (EARP) was announced in July 1989.

(ii) The Environmental Assessment Board plans to hold hearings this autumn and complete the assessment in late 1989 or early 1990.

(iii) Yes, if applicable.

(c) (i) No, the sale of the mill does not trigger the EARP. However, discussions are underway with Manitoba regarding Repap's announced expansion plans.

(ii) Unknown.

(iii) Yes, if applicable.

(d) (i) Yes, initial assessment was completed in August 1987 by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

(ii) Initial assessment completed in 1987.

(iii) Yes.

(e) (i) Yes, it was reviewed under B.C. Utilities process and Energy, Mines and Resources is conducting its assessment of the proposal under the Environmental Assessment and Review Process.

(ii) Unknown.

(iii) Yes.

(f) (i) Yes, currently under preliminary initial assessment by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

(ii) Unknown.

(iii) Yes.

(g) (i) Yes.

(ii) Public review completed and panel report published in December 1985.

(iii) Yes, December 1985.

(h) (i) No.

(ii) Discussions are underway with Québec on a joint federal/provincial assessment process. Guidelines for environmental studies will be issued to Hydro-Québec this fall. Earliest completion of the assessment process would be the end of the 1990.

(iii) Yes if applicable.

Question No. 94—Mr. Manley:

1. Are directions being given to assessors or auditors within Revenue Canada Taxation to ensure that amounts paid for advertising for or against the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, or to umbrella organizations such as the Canadian Alliance for Trade and Job Opportunities or the Pro-Canada Network, are identified and, if so, what are they?

2. Is Revenue Canada Taxation applying any criteria in order to determine the deductibility of such amounts and, if so, what are they?

3. Have any such expenditures been declared by taxpayers to date and, if so what total amounts (a) have been declared (b) have been (i) allowed (ii) refused on assessment?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

Business Expenses—Contributions in support of and against the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement

1. There is no special audit program directed at business expenses in support of or against the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement. These business expenses are reviewed in the normal course of audits of taxpayers books and records.

2. The Income Tax Act does not specifically deal with the deduction of these expenditures. The Department applies normal expenditure deductibility criteria. Deductions from business income are limited to the extent that they are incurred for the purpose of gaining or producing income from a business and are reasonable in the circumstances. Consideration is given to the facts and circumstances of each individual case. The Department's general views are expressed in Interpretation Bulletin IT-487.

3. The Department is aware, through the routine audit program examination of the books and records of corporations and individuals carrying on business, that claims have been made as business expenses for contributions incurred in support of or to oppose the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement. These expenditures would not necessarily be specifically identified in the financial statements filed with the income tax return. Further, as there is no special audit program directed at business expenses in support of or against the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, no aggregate statistical information is available on these claims.

PCB STORAGE SITES IN THE CONSTITUENCY OF ABITIBI

Question No. 95—Mr. St-Julien:

1. Are there polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) storage sites in the constituency of Abitibi and, if so, (a) in what number (b) what is the frequency with which these sites are checked to ensure they comply with health and safety guidelines?

2. Have any of these sites failed to pass inspections and, if so, (a) which sites (b) on what dates (i) did they fail (ii) will they be tested?

3. Are PCBs in Abitibi being transferred for destruction and, if so, (a) to what location (b) by what means?

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment):1. Yes.

(a) There are fifteen private industrial plants that store PCB waste in the constituency of Abitibi.

(b) Environment Canada inspects these sites once every two to three years to verify the inventory under 3(1) of the Chlorobiphenyls Interim Order (PC 1989-296, 23/02/89). Environment Canada also provides advice in accordance with existing codes of practice. The provincial government conducts an annual inventory under its hazardous waste regulations and applies the provisions of the federal government's Storage of PCB Wastes Interim Order in keeping with the concept of equivalency of provisions.

2. No cases of noncompliance have been detected by Environment Canada with respect to the inventory.

3. To our knowledge, no PCBs covered by the inventory were shipped for destruction.

MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT ACT, 1987

Question No. 98—Mr. MacWilliam:

Has the government taken any action to review the reverse-onus procedure found in Chapter 35, Part II, Section 8, sub-section 4 of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, 1987 and its impact on the nature of the transport industry in Canada and, if so, what action?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Procedures are now in place to evaluate the impact of the reverse onus provisions, among other things, of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act, 1987 (MVTA). Specific provisions in Canada's new transportation legislation ensure that an assessment of the effectiveness of the legislation be made on a continuing basis. For example, the National Transportation Act requires that annual reviews be completed by May 31 of each year. In addition, a comprehensive review will be completed in 1992.

The National Transportation Agency (NTA) has recently completed the review for 1988, including the sections on new entrants, expansion and consolidation. These of course reflect the effect of reverse onus procedures.

Furthermore, additional monitoring procedures, under the auspices of the Canadian Council of Motor Transport Administrators (CCMTA) and performed by Transport Canada, the NTA, Consumer and Corporate Affairs and provincial agencies are being put in place.

These procedures will examine the effect of "reverse onus" on a province by province basis to determine if, by 1992, sunsetting of "reverse onus" is in the best interest of both shippers and carriers.

Sufficient time has not yet elapsed, nor sufficient data collected, to enable a substantial analysis of "reverse onus" to be accomplished. However, by 1990 some initial trends will have been established.

HIRE A STUDENT CAMPAIGN 1989

Question No. 99—Mr. Allmand:

1. On the occasion of the launching of the annual Hire a Student campaign by the federal minister for Youth in Ottawa, on Wednesday, May 10, 1989, were (a) T-shirts (b) buttons (c) balloons purchased and, if so (i) from what persons were they bought (ii) what person printed them (iii) what number were left over (iv) what price did the government pay, including the price of printing?

2. Were any other costs to the government involved and, if so (a) in what amounts (b) for what purposes?

3. Were any other promotions like this one (a) held anywhere in Canada during the Hire a Student Campaign (b) cancelled after May 11, 1989 (c) held for any other Job Development Program (d) planned for, and cancelled after May 11, 1989?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): 1. (a) Yes.

(b) Yes.

(c) Yes.

(i), (ii) & (iv)

—3,500 French first T-shirts were produced and printed by Dome Advertising Ltd., Regina, Sask. at a cost of $15,653.45.

—6,500 English first T-shirts were produced and printed by Dome Advertising Ltd., Regina, Sask. at a cost of $29,280.86.

—130,000 100,000 English and 30,000 French buttons were purchased from and produced by Maison Basilières Inc. of Montreal, Que. at a cost of $13,712.00.

—10,000 Balloons were purchased from H.A.S. Novelties Ltd. in Ottawa, Ont. at a cost of $1,330.03.

(iii) None.

All materials distributed at the national launch of the Hire-A-Student campaign were also produced for national promotion and distributed to all 450 Canada Employment Centres for Students across the country. The Centres used the T-shirts for staff identification and in their promotional activities. Cost savings were achieved by centralized ordering of national quantities.

2. (a) Yes.

There were other costs amounting to $30,588.15 for a contract to Continental Golin/Harris Communications Ltd.

(b) To create national awareness for Hire-A-Student, Continental Golin/Harris Communications was retained to organize, produce and orchestrate a national launch in Ottawa. (M.P.s from all three political parties took part in the event, along with representatives of C.P. Hotels and the Ottawa Construction Association, the sponsor for the National Capital Region's Youth Action 89 program. In addition, Dave Smith, owner of the Place Next Door restaurant donated 1,500 hot dogs for the event. As a special part of the promotion 120 rugby shirts with the Hire-A-Student logo printed on the front were produced to be worn by M.P.s participating in the event.)

3. (a) Yes.

Of the 450 Canada Employment Centres for Students (CECs–S) operating this year across the country, more than 60 were officially opened with the participation of Members of Parliament from all three federal parties. In addition, almost all of the remaining centres were opened by way of a less formal open house where student staff invited the community into their offices. Student staff of these offices have continued to hold events to profile their activity throughout the summer. As well, Award of Merit certificates produced by the government of Canada were given to Hire–A–Student sponsors at the end of the summer.

All CECs–S received promotional material for staff and guests to assist in creating a dynamic, energetic and professional atmosphere. The Hire–A–Student campaign is part of the Challenge program.

Opposition members, the Honourable Bill Rompkey (Labrador) and Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt) have hosted official openings and many others participated in open houses to assist in raising community awareness of the 1989 Hire–A–Student campaign. The government appreciates the ingenuity and energy of all students and the support of all members for their efforts.

(b) No.

No official openings were cancelled before or after May 11, 1989. On occasion, obligations prevented a member from attending an event, in which case the CEC or CEC–S manager would officiate at the opening on the M.P.'s behalf.

(c) No.

(d) No.

See answer b.

SPECIAL FEDERAL INQUIRIES UNIT OF THE ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Question No. 101—Mr. Kaplan:

Has the government set up a Special Federal Inquiries Unit of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, if so (a) on what date was it set up (b) what is its mandate (c) what continuity of personnel has it enjoyed (d) what number of cases has it established?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): (a) 1985

(b) The Branch deals with high profile cases involving crimes against the Government of Canada and serious crimes committed by public officials. Pursuant to a Treasury Board Directive, it also investigates cases referred by the Auditor General or federal departments and agencies where losses of public funds are suspected to be of criminal origin.

(c)The Branch started as a unit of four personnel. Two additional people have been added. Three of the initial group were transferred and their positions filled with new members.

(d)The unit has opened 65 investigational files to date.

MARKETING OF LAMBS AND SHEEP IN QUEBEC

Question No. 103—Mr. Assad:

1. Does the government intend to grant a produce quality allowance to Quebec sheep and lamb producers?

2. Is the government in a position to assure the Federation of Quebec Sheep and Lamb Producers that the pilot project which has been under consideration for eight months will be implemented?

Hon. Donald Frank Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes, Agriculture Canada has worked in conjunction with the Fédération in developing regulations regarding this specific type of product.

2. The pilot project has an implementation date of September 15, 1989.

Is the government aware of the existence of a pilot project involving the Federation of Quebec Sheep and Lamb Producers, in which a sum of $100,000 each was invested by the Quebec Department of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Union des producteurs agricoles du Québec and, if so, what has become of the project?

Hon. Donald Frank Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Agriculture Canada is aware and the project is being undertaken in conjunction with the Fédération. Training of staff is presently being performed and administrative preparation is now occurring with an implementation date of September 15th, 1989.

CANADIAN CONSULATE IN KIEV

Question No. 105—Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East):

Is there a Canadian consulate at Kiev in the Ukrainian S.S.R. and, if not (a) for what reasons (b) will the government open one within the next two years and, if not for what reasons?

Right Hon. Charles Joseph Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): At the present time, the Canadian Government does not have a consulate in Kiev in the Ukrainian S.S.R. We have an agreement with the Soviet authorities which will allow us to establish a consulate in the Soviet Union. We plan to open this consulate in Kiev, but because of financial constraints, we have not been able to advance our plans at this stage.

LANGUAGE AND CITIZENSHIP TRAINING PROGRAMS

Question No. 107—Ms. Mitchell:

Will language and citizenship training programs be available for immigrants after April 1990, when the CILT program is no longer funded and, if so, which ones?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada and the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission as follows:

The decision to terminate the Citizenship and Language Instruction Agreement and the Language Textbooks Agreement as of March 31, 1990 is part of the Government's overall deficit reduction strategy which, in a time of fiscal restraint, involves making very difficult decisions. Language training for immigrants is a shared federal–provincial responsibility. There are a number of alternative programs that will continue to provide language training for adult immigrants despite the cancellation of CILT.

On the federal level, the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission has two programs to meet the language training needs of immigrants. Under the Direct Purchase Option of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, CEIC purchases language training seats from provincial educational institutions to provide English or French training so that immigrants who need such language ability can access the labour–market. In the past six fiscal years (from 1983/84 to 1988/89) 70,745 training seats were provided for immigrants and refugees at a cost of some $321 million. This is an ongoing program that will continue beyond April 1990.

Under the Settlement Language Training Program (SLTP) non–governmental, voluntary organizations are funded to provide up to 500 hours of community–based instruction in coping language skills to immigrants not immediately destined to the labour–market, primarily immigrant women with child–care responsibilities. Since the program's inception in 1986 some 8,500 persons have received language training for a cost of $4.5 million. The SLTP is continuing to operate in 1989/90 as a pilot project with a budget of $3.5 million.

FARES ON MARINE ATLANTIC FERRIES

Question No. 108—Ms. Callbeck:

To the knowledge of the government, for each year since 1984, have fares on Marine Atlantic ferries between Borden, P.E.I. and Cape Tormentine, N. B. increased, and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what percentage of Marine Atlantic's revenues do these figures represent (c) what are the fare increases, if any, for (i) cars (ii) passengers (iii) trucks and what percentage of revenues do these figures represent?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): a, b and c. See below.

(a) Fares and Fare Increases

Fares have increased each year since 1984 by the following :

	1984 Fares	1985 Incr.	1986 Incr.	1987 Incr.	1988 Incr.	1989 Incr.

(b) Transportation Revenue (Excluding Freight)

In 1984, fares for passengers, passenger related vehicles and trucks generated $5,933,407 which represented 13.4 percent of the total revenue (including federal subsidy) for the PEI service.

In 1985, these fares generated $6,988,245; 18.1 percent of the total revenue. It should be noted that the percentage change from 1984 was due in most part to the discontinuance of a profit allowance in the subsidy calculation.

In 1986, these fares generated $7,924,703; 22.5 percent of the total revenue. The further increase in percentage was due mainly to the discontinuance of depreciation in the subsidy calculation.

In 1987, these fares generated $8,912,950; 24.2 percent of the total revenue.

In 1988, these fares generated $9,772,450; 25.0 percent of the total revenue.

(c) Fare Increases

The fare increases for cars, passengers and trucks are as shown in (a) above.

Cars represent 43.1 percent of Transportation Revenue Passengers represent 39.1 percent of Transportation Revenue Trucks represent 17.8 percent of Transportation Revenue.

WHITE CEDARS

Question No. 110—Mr. Milliken:

Is the government aware of reasons for any large number of white cedars north and west of Ottawa dying during the spring of 1989 and, if so, what are they?

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State (Forestry): The Forest Insect and Disease Survey, Forestry Canada, has reported damage to cedar trees in areas north and west of Ottawa and in particular from Ottawa–Hull to Brockville and vicinity.

The browning of cedar foliage is the result of two years of severe damage caused by an insect called the cedar leafminer, last year's drought, and winter drying or "winter kill".

Feeding by cedar leafminers has caused severe browning of the foliage and often subsequent twig, branch, or tree kill. Fortunately, however, severely injured trees will often produce new foliage later in the growing season. On individual ornamentals the infested twig tips can be pruned and destroyed in early spring.

"Winter kill" is characterized by tips of twigs or entire foliage turning yellow or brown in early spring.

Also, two years ago, there was a bumper crop of cedar cones which are retained by the trees and gives a brown appearance when viewed from a distance.

Cedar trees should recover if watered during dry weather. However, in natural forest conditions some mortality may occur.

CHEMICALS DEPOSITED ON ROADS

Question No. 116—Mr. Milliken:

Has the government promulgated any environmental regulations or guidelines governing the kinds of chemicals that may be sprayed or otherwise deposited on roads or road allowances and, if so, are any substances prohibited pursuant to them and, if so, which ones?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Environment Canada's only regulation relating to the spraying of substances on roads is the chlorobiphenyls (PCB) interim order, which prohibits the application of any liquid containing more than 5 ppm by weight to a road surface. There are no federal guidelines governing the application of substances to roads. Normally, this activity is addressed by the provincial government.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Question No. 117—Mr. Gardiner:

Does the government estimate that new jobs will be created to administer the proposed goods and services tax and, if so, what number?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue):

Taxation

It will be necessary to create new jobs in order to administer the Goods and Services Tax Credit program. Unfortunately, it is not possible to give a reliable estimate of the number of jobs until such time as draft legislation is available.

Customs & Excise

The Goods and Services Tax has a much larger client base than the current Federal Sales Tax. As a result it will be necessary to establish additional jobs to administer the tax.

The number of staff required for this tax are dependent on the number of vendors involved, the complexity of tax and other such factors. Until details of the tax and the draft legislation are made available it is not possible to speculate on the number of resources required.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES AT SHEDIAC, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 118—Mr. Robichaud:

1. How many (a) full-time (b) part-time employees are presently employed in the Superannuation Branch of the Department of Supply and Services at Shediac, New-Brunswick?

2. Does the government intend to reduce the number of (a) full-time employees (b) part-time employees (c) person-years at the Shediac office?

3. If so, (a) how many jobs or person-years will be cut (b) when will those cuts be made (c) which subdivision of the Superannuation Branch will be affected (d) which activity will be affected?

4. Has a plan been set up to provide assistance to affected employees and, if so, what is it and, if not, is such a plan being considered?

Hon. Paul Wyatt Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. At the end of June 1989, (a) 396 full-time (including 26 Leave Without Pay and 38 casuals) and (b) 25 part-time employees were employed by the Superannuation Branch, at Shediac, New Brunswick.

2. This fiscal year, the number of person-years in the Branch was reduced by 6. The planned reduction for fiscal year 1990-91 is 5 PY's. The budgets for future years are not known at this time. The number of part-time and full-time employees will be adjusted as required to meet our allocated budget.

3. (a) Six person-years have been cut for this fiscal year. (b) Two were absorbed in Support and Management Services through regular attrition. Exactly when the other four PY's will be cut is unknown because a final decision is pending. (c) While a number of proposals have been put forward, no final decision has been reached and this matter is still under review. (d) This cannot be determined until the review mentioned in 3 (c) is complete.

4. The Superannuation Branch management is committed to make all possible efforts to place the incumbents of affected positions in other available positions. The Treasury Board Departmental Workforce Adjustment Policy would apply to the affected employees. The policy includes provisions to help the employees such as priority status, re-training for other positions, etc. As well, all provisions of the applicable Collective agreements will be adhered to.

CHEMICAL PRODUCTS OR TOXINS IN CHEDOKE STREAM

Question No. 119—Mr. Keyes:

Since 1984, has the government carried out investigations to determine whether any chemicals or toxins have been leaching into Chedoke Creek at Princess Point from the Kay Drage Park in Hamilton and (a) if so, have they discovered any and, if so (i) what are the types of chemicals or toxins (ii) what is quantity of each chemical or toxin found in the Creek in parts per million (iii) has the government undertaken to contain the chemicals or toxins from leaching into the Creek (b) if not, is the government prepared to do so at the earliest opportunity and report back as to its findings?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): a) No test was performed. b) The federal government does not plan to carry out such tests, as these activities fall under provincial jurisdiction.

LANDSLIDE ON CN RAILS

Question No. 120—Mr. St-Julien:

On or about June 13, 1989, did a landslide occur betwen mileage points 106 and 107 on the Chapais subdivision, between Miquelon and Chapais and, if so, on what date (a) was CN advised of the landslide (b) did CN managerial staff take photographs of the landslide (c) did CN employees go to the area between mileage points 106 and 107 to repair CN's track?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): The Canadian National Railway Company advises as follows:

On June 5th, 1989, it was discovered during a regular CN track inspection of the Chapais subdivision, that the roadbed at mileage 106.20 had been eroded by heavy rainfalls.

(a) The incident in question was immediately reported by the inspection officer.

(b) On June 6th, CN management took photographs of the site and evaluated extent of damages.

PASSENGER TRAIN NUMBER 135

Question No. 121—Mr. St-Julien:

On or about February 20, 1989, was VIA Rail forced to cancel a passenger train (No. 135) at mileage point 82.4 on the La Tuque subdivision, between Montreal and Senneterre, because of a problem with engine No. 6504 and, if so (a) what was the cause of the problem (b) what was the number of passengers carried on the train (c) how much time did the train remain in La Tuque (d) how many taxicabs were dispatched by VIA Rail to Québec City, Hervey Junction, Garneau, Shawinigan and Montreal (i) for what number of passengers and (ii) at what cost (e) how many buses did VIA Rail rent to transport the passengers (i) to which destination (ii) at what cost (f) what was the cost to VIA Rail of meals and rooms provided to passengers in La Tuque?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Via Rail Canada Inc. advises as follows:

(a) to (f) At 23:15 on 20 February 1989, train number 135 en route from Montreal to Senneterre with 66 passengers on board advised the dispatcher from mileage point 82.4 on the Lac St-Jean subdivision that locomotive 6506 was experiencing a problem due to blown fuses.

At 23:55 the locomotive was shut down at mileage point 87. CN called to obtain a crew and replacement locomotive from Fitzpatrick, as the train was stopped in a remote area with no road access. The only locomotive available was facing the wrong way and it was estimated that it would take two hours to turn it around and put it in service on account of the heavy snow in the yard. The rescue locomotive departed Fitzpatrick at 02:00 and arrived at mileage 87 at 03:15, where the situation had deteriorated because boiler problems had developed on locomotive number 3542. At 04:30 the steam generating unit shut down.

Via contacted the La Tuque station to inquire about accommodation and food for passengers, 44 of whom were bound for Weymount and 12 for Parent. At 06:05 the train arrived in La Tuque, but steam power was still unavailable.

Two buses were chartered from nearby Chevrette, one bound for Weymount, at a cost of $544, and the other for Parent, at a cost of $533.

The 10 remaining passengers headed to remote areas beyond La Tuque were given the option of staying in La Tuque at Via's expense until the next frequency (two days later) or being taxied to their points of origin: Grand'mère, Shawinigan, Hervey and Héberville. All passengers opted to return home. The fares for the five taxis totalled $720. Also breakfast was served to all passengers at a cost of $287.

APPLICATIONS FOR PROJECT FUNDING

Question No. 123—Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine):

Since 1984, did UNIGEC of Chicoutimi, Quebec, make any applications for project funding to the Canadian International Development Agency and, if so (a) what was the title of each project (b) what was the nature of each project (c) what was the location of each project (d) what was the amount of funding requested for each project (e) what service was UNIGEC to provide to each project (f) on what date were the applications made (g) on what date were the applications approved or rejected (h) if rejected, what were the reasons given for the rejection (*iti*ro) subsequent to any of the applications being made, did any person or persons make an intervention with respect to the application, and if so, what is the name of such person(*ros) and what was the purpose of the intervention?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): No.

APPLICATION FOR PROJECT FUNDING

Question No. 124—Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine):

Since 1984, did UNIGEC and Anthony Pau and Associates make a joint application for project funding to the Canadian International Development Agency and, if so (a) what was the title of each project (b) what was the nature of each project (c) what was the location of each project (d) what was the amount of funding requested for each project (e) what service was UNIGEC and Anthony Pau and Associates to provide to each project (f) on what date were the applications made (g) on what date were the applications approved or rejected (h) if rejected, what were the reasons given for the rejection (i) subsequent to any of the applications being made, did any person or persons make an intervention with respect to the application, and if so, what is the name of such person(s) and what was the purpose of the intervention?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Yes.

UNIGEC and Anthony Pau and Associates

(a) Wind Energy Development Study, Qibei County, Yunnan Province, China.

(b) Engineering feasibility and technology options analysis.

(c) Qibei County, Yunnan Province, China.

(d) $205,107.

(e) Project administration services and participation in the engineering study with Mr. Pau.

(f) October 9, 1987.

(g) CIDA conditional approval given October 24, 1988, with a deadline February 24, 1989 for the signing of commercial contracts with the Chinese client. Conditional approval is standard Industrial Cooperation Program (INC) practice.

(h) The two firms were unable to reach a contractual arrangement within the above time frame stipulated by CIDA. As such, it was not possible for CIDA to continue to offer support for the study.

(i) Yes. Mr. Greg Giokas, Special Assistant to the Minister for External Relations and International Development asked that CIDA issue a letter to the consortium outlining the conditions that had to be met before a contribution agreement could be signed.

Since 1984, did Anthony Pau and Associates of Toronto, Ontario, make any applications for project funding to the Canadian International Development Agency and, if so (a) what was the tile of each project (b) what was the nature of each project (c) what was the location of each project (d) what was the amount of funding requested for each project (e) what service was Anthony Pau and Associates to provide to each project (f) on what date were the applications made (g) on what date were the applications approved (h) if rejected, what were the reasons given for the rejection (*iti*ro) subsequent to any of the applications being made, did any person or persons make an intervention with respect to the application, and if so, what is the name of such person(*ros) and what was the purpose of the intervention?

Hon. Monique Landry (Minister for External Relations): Yes, two applications were received by CIDA, Industrial Cooperation Program (INC).

Anthony Pau and Associates

(a) (i) a wind energy demonstration project.[1]

(ii) a Canadian Project Preparation Facility engineering study proposal.[2]

(b) (i) the engineering study, purchase and installation of a wind turbine.

(ii) an engineering analysis of wind conditions and technology options.

(c) both projects were located in Yunnan Province in Southwestern China.

(d) (i) $500,000

(ii) $99,000

(e) (i) engineering analysis, equipment purchase, equipment installation supervision and results evaluation.

(ii) engineering analysis, study of technology options.

(f) (i) discussions in late 1986.

(ii) proposal was received in CIDA on February 8, 1987.

(g) they were not approved

(h) (i) a meeting with Mr. Pau was held in late 1986 to explain to him that the CIDA Industrial Cooperation Program could not support the equipment supply and demonstration project idea since the Program had no mandate to fund equipment purchases.

(ii) the engineering study proposal was received February 8, 1987. In June 1987, CIDA wrote to Mr. Pau communicating the results of the CIDA Professional Services evaluation of the engineering study proposal and suggestions as to how it needed to be strengthened in order to be approved.

(i) No

1 The wind energy demonstration project application was submitted in 1986, but was never formally reviewed as it did not meet the basic criteria of the Industrial Cooperation Program.

2 (i) refers to the wind energy demonstration project throughout the text.

(ii) refers to the Canadian Project Preparation Facility engineering study proposal throughout the text.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, if Questions Nos. 83, 91, and 113 could be made Orders for Return, these returns would be tabled immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Questions Nos. 83, 91, and 113 be deemed to have been made Orders for Return?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

TAX REMISSIONS

Question No. 83—Mr. Kindy:

1. For each year since 1970, what was the total received by any company or corporation in tax breaks or remissions?

2. For each year and, in each case, what was the name of the company or corporation and the amount of the tax break or remission obtained by (a) regulation (b) Order in Council (c) negotiation?

Return tabled.

PURCHASE OF DISPOSABLE UTENSILS

Question No. 91—Ms. Copps:

For each year since 1985, has the government purchased styrofoam cups, plates, trays or bowls for use in government offices, cafeterias, agencies or institutions and, if so (a) what number of each item was purchased (b) at what cost (c) who were the manufacturers (d) did any of the items contain chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and, if so, what percentage of the (i) cups (ii) plates (iii) trays (iv) bowls contained CFCs?

Return tabled.

APPOINTMENTS TO CANADIAN PAROLE BOARD

Question No. 113—Mr. Kaplan:

Were any of the current members of the National Parole Board appointed by Solicitors General and, if so, for each Solicitor General what is the (a) name (b) background, in brief résumé form, of each appointee?

Return tabled.

CFB MONCTON

*Question No 86—Mr. Rideout:

1. Has the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion made any studies of th economic impact, both locally and on the province of New Brunswick, of a closure or reduction in service at CFB Moncton?

2. Were there full consultations within the government with regard to the possibility of a closure or reduction in service at CFB Moncton?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Regional Industrial Expansion and National Defence as follows:

1. No.

2. Consultations were conducted within the constraints of budget secrecy.

DECISION TO ANNOUNCE $100 MILLION REFURBISHMENT FOR CFB MONCTON

*Question No. 87—Mr. Rideout:

1. Did the government rely upon particular facts or reports in deciding to announce a $100 million refurbishment for CFB Moncton in June 1988, and, if so, which ones?

2. Were any steps taken by government staff following this announcement and, if so, what were they?

3. Did the government rely upon any particular facts in deciding to close CFB Moncton and, if so, which ones?

Hon. William McKnight (Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, in 1983 a comprehensive survey of CFB Moncton infrastructure was carried out as part of the Base Development Plan. This study recommended the construction of a new 5 Canadian Forces Supply Depot (5 CFSD) to replace present inadequate and widely dispersed facilities. These findings were supported by the recommendations of the Depot Modernization Task Force (DMTF) created in 1985 to analyse deficiencies in the Canadian Forces Supply System. The proposal to replace 5 CFSD Moncton was formalized with acceptance of the projet submission by the Construction Priority Screening Committee (CPSC) in February 1986 and reaffirmed by a review of DND infrastructure carried out in June 1988. The estimate of $100 million reflects the projected cost to construct and equip a stand alone depot.

2. Yes, Defence staff is continuing with the development of a Statement of Requirements initiated in January 1987, an evaluation of the options to reorganize CFB Moncton into a more efficient posture initiated in May 1988, and the finalizing of a Program Development Proposal (PDP) to achieve Departmental and Treasury Board approval for the project.

3. Yes. (a) The reductions in the base support functions will permit overall personnel reductions of an estimated 77 military and 139 civilian. Attendant savings have been estimated at approximately $100 million over the 15 year planning period.

(b) The reductions to the base and the lease costs for the proposed new depot facilities will result in net additional operations and maintenance costs estimated at $90 million over fifteen years. These additional costs, however, will make it possible to avoid substantial capital construction expenditures.

(c) One-time costs for personnel relocation, retraining and other benefits have been estimated at $1.5 million. Potential costs relating to the disposal or removal of existing facilities have not been estimated, nor have potential revenues from the sale of excess properties.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, September 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-29, an Act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Charles-Eugène Marin (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I shall continue this morning with my speech on Bill C-29 creating a Department of Forestry, since I had to interrupt it yesterday because of time at five o'clock.

Among the initiatives which the partners can accomplish with the Department's leadership and participation is the development of the highest standards of intensive forest management for Canada's productive forest lands. Based on these standards, management plans can be developed which respect the important ecological role of forests, good conservation practices, and multiple use of the resource. The Department must take a leading part among the partners in developing a consensus about how sustainable development can be achieved in every region of Canada.

The Department can assist in developing a national inventory of the forest resource because we know accurate information is a key element of good management. We need this reliable database. It must contain site-specific information. To be meaningful, it will have to be developed according to agreed-upon standards. Without this kind of information, we cannot do the careful, rational and effective planning which will be necessary if we are to maintain our competitive edge. A federal department of forestry is essential in working with its provincial and private sector partners on this task, and in making such a database accessible to industry, government, and non-governmental public interest groups in every part of Canada.

We on the government side are well aware of the constitutional division of power and provincial prerogatives regarding forestry, and a new Department of Forestry in no way violates these principles. Our way of doing business is cooperation. We are already working with our partners within the framework of the National Forest Sector Strategy which finds implementation in Forest Resource Development Agreements between the federal and provincial governments.

In Quebec, those agreements were used in particular to finance site preparation, regeneration and tending activities over more than 650,000 hectares of land. At least 45,000 private woodlot owners have benefitted over the last four years and each year an average of 600 projects are carried out on Crown lands. We are now in a position to examine the last generation of agreements and to review what has been accomplished through this type of public management. Long-term goals and forest management standards are defined. More than $1.1 billion have been allocated for reforestation and forest management at the national level.

Federal resources committed for renewal and regeneration were strictly reserved to deal with the current backlog, not for lands currently being harvested which are 100 per cent the responsibility of the provinces and the industry.

The Minister has already announced that these accords, some of which are currently being renegotiated, will encourage the provinces to extend their planning timeframe toward more distant horizons as is befitting of a resource which takes eighty years of more to renew.

There is another task involving the provinces and private sector which the new Department can fulfill. It can develop manufacturing technology to add greater value and increase the variety of our forest exports.

The forest products industry must focus its attention on this task if it is to realize its potential for growth and expansion.

• (1200)

Canada's prospects in the paper and paperboard sector are strong. New technologies can keep our pulp production high. Solid wood products will remain a major component of the industry, expecially in panels and reconstituted boards. And the greatest opportunities open to us are in the value-added products.

We in Quebec, for example, have a major development opportunity in production of printing and writing papers, products which need inexpensive energy and abundant hardwood resources.

Since most of the products of Canadian forests are exported, it is a federal Department of Forestry which is needed to help industry and the provinces on a nation-wide basis coordinate and accelerate efforts to keep Canada competitive in a rapidly-changing global marketplace which is constantly shifting beneath our feet. This means sharper marketing, focusing on specialty products, increasing product quality, shifting emphasis to a new mix of products. That brings me, Mr. Speaker, to the fourth mandate, the fourth task of the proposed Department of Forestry, namely to keep Canada on the cutting edge of research and development so that we can keep on top. The task is not ours alone. The private sector must also allocate more of their own resources for research. Our industry spends 60 cents on research for every $100 of wood we sell, while the Americans spend over four times that amount. One American company alone spends over 60-million U.S. dollars annually, which is comparable to Forestry Canada's entire research budget.

But it is not just increased spending: the research we do must become better focused, better coordinated, and become target-oriented. Our federal forestry labs and labs to which we contribute already are considered world leaders in certain critical areas that show best promise.

We can show, Mr. Speaker, by own example in research conducted or sponsored by a federal department of forestry that forestry research and development is regarded as a national priority.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, the Federal-Provincial Forest Resource Development Agreements have contributed to some 70 university research and other projects in the province of Quebec.

If we act and spend wisely, the dollar value of our forest exports could rise 55 per cent above current levels over the next twenty years, if, among other things, we emphasize new products and markets, and if we develop the technologies that will allow us to utilize our special Canadian advantages.

In addition to all these tasks, the new Department of Forestry will have special responsibilities in directing the management of federal forest lands, again setting an example with respect to sustainable development and multiple use of forests.

If we can show with federal lands that sustainable development pays off, that it is an investment in the future which pays handsome dividends, then perhaps we can influence those in the industry who act as if there is no tomorrow.

Last of all, Mr. Speaker, as its sixth task, a federal Forestry Department will be of great assistance to the other government departments having involvement with forests and forest issues. I can think of at least nine departments which are involved with significant aspects of forestry in their mandates, and it is vital that there be a lead Department to develop cooperative arrangements within the federal Government.

First, there is Environment Canada and Parks Canada, which have an interest in forest policy which might have an impact on wildlife or migratory birds or the effects of forests on the atmosphere and climate.

Second, agriculture and forestry have had a strong relationship in Canada over the last century.

Third, where it is requested to do so, the Department of Forestry could assist the First Nations of Canada with regard to forest management on their lands.

Fourth, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has other responsibilities as well which relate to forest management.

Fifth, there are Department of National Defence lands on which the Department of Forestry can demonstrate state-of-the-art forestry practices.

Sixth, a cooperative liaison with the Department of Industry, Science and Technology can keep forestry in the picture when it comes to research and development, industrial planning, regional development, and aboriginal economic development programs. And there is that all-important area of international trade, where access to export markets is of the highest importance to our economic well-being.

Seventh, Fisheries and Oceans understand very well the impact of forestry practices on the fisheries. Energy, Mines and Resources has an interest in biomass energy development. The Atlantic and Western development agencies are involved in ensuring that forestry reaches its full potential in economic development and employment in those parts of Canada.

In summary, then, Mr. Speaker, by introducing this Bill to establish a Department of Forestry, the federal Government is positioning itself to accelerate Canadian forestry's ability to fulfill its full potential in Canada's future.

Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to set out six of the major essential functions which the new Department could fulfill. This Bill is a further indication of the priority which forestry has for the Government. Indeed, over the last four years, this Government has increased the federal investment in forestry by 300 per cent.

As I mentioned when I began, Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support this Bill, and I urge my colleagues to make this House unanimous in passing this Bill without delay.

[English]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, is there a question and answer period following this speaker now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, there is. The hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester.

[Translation]

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Gaspé is to be commended for supporting the creation of a new department of forestry as proposed by the Government in Bill C-29. The Hon. Member spoke at length about reforestation, and I was glad to hear what he had to say on the subject, since our Canadian forests are the lungs of our environment. The Hon. Member had a lot to say about the United States and was lavish with his praise. He also praised what was being done in the province of Québec. However, although I may have missed parts of his speech, I did not hear him refer to the other nine provinces. He seemed to be concentrating on the province of Québec. I was also disappointed that he had nothing to say about the Gaspé area, his own riding where I am sure forests and a forestry industry exist.

My question to the Hon. Member is as follows: What kind of activities are we seeing in the other provinces at this time? Where is the Government going to make improvements, and above all, how does it intend to go about improving forestry activities in Canada if it is already faced with budget cutbacks and federal personnel cuts?

Mr. Marin: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for his kind words about my speech. Obviously, I spoke mainly about the province of Québec, because I am better acquainted with the situation in that province. Of course the federal Government, through its new department, will be active in all other provinces as well. I may remind the Hon. Member that the riding of Gaspé is part of the province of Québec, and so what I said about the province of Québec, also applies to the riding of Gaspé.

I may remind him that in Québec, 94 million hectares of land are covered with forest. That is probably why I concentrated on my own province. Its forestry industry includes 8 pulp plants, 49 paper mills, 121 sawmills, 4 plywood plants and 10 particle board plants. I think he will realize that the importance of this industry was one more reason for me to talk mainly about my own province.

In Québec, forestry is responsible for 229,000 jobs, which means one out of thirteen. Sales of forestry products total 10.8 billion. Mr. Speaker, I think I had good reason to be somewhat partial to the province of Québec, and I can assure the Hon. Member that when I say Québec, I also include the riding of Gaspé.

[English]

Mr. Kilger: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the remarks of my hon. colleague from Gaspé. Given that the department of forestry received an 11.9 per cent cut in its 1989–90 budget, that 47 person–years were trimmed from the department, and that the new forestry department to be created by Bill C–29 does not have control over its own funds, in having to go a multitude of other departments and agencies, I would submit that the government is creating a department of forestry but not in the fullest sense. I humbly recognize this bill as being a modest beginning.

• (1210)

I would just like to ask the member for Gaspé, if he could possibly look ahead to the not too distant future, next year, whether the department of forestry would have greater autonomy by having its own budget. Would it be allowed to mature into a department that would have the fiscal resources it requires to protect and serve one of Canada's most precious natural resources?

Mr. Marin: Mr. Speaker, obviously, if we had been able to create a full department we would have done so.

The purpose of the Bill before the House today is to provide a framework. In fact, the department's authority will be quite considerable at the level of co–ordination. Later on, with the help of nationwide consultation, we will be able to give the Minister what the Hon. Member suggested and perhaps suggest a number of other aspects the Government might consider, to give the department greater responsibility.

Mr. Champagne: Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to my colleague from Gaspé (Mr. Marin) and I must say that his speech in general is very well thought.

One of our colleagues in the Opposition raised the subject of the Eastern Plan, saying that Dr. Marin, the Hon. Member for Gaspé, did not talk enough about it. Mr. Speaker, I know very well from a visit I made with the Forestry Minister this summer what people told us about the Eastern Plan; they were very glad to have the federal Government participate in a forestry program and they urged the federal Government to pass a bill to set up a full–fledged department as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, if it is possible, I would like to ask my colleague from Gaspé to describe the federal Government's involvement in quater detail and also to describe the reason those concerned want a full–fledged department, one that will really look after forests throughout the country, instead of going through a junior minister. So I would ask my colleague from Gaspé to give us some explanation of this.

Mr. Marin: Mr. Speaker, for someone, who did not want questions, I am doing very badly.

It is quite obvious that our experience over the past few years in eastern Québec with the plan known as the Eastern Plan has been wonderful and this forestry program, we spent $40 million recently on private forests alone. On public forests, under the Canada–Québec ERDA agreements, we spent a great deal of money—$150 million. Obviously, if every region could develop at this rate—the advantage is that all these funds, these programs must come under a federal department.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments is over. Debate. The Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Bélair).

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, before starting my speech, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Restigouche (Mr. Arseneault) and congratulate him on the excellent speech he made .yesterday. It was very well researched and contained a lot of information that will certainly be useful in the years to come.

Bill C-29 will also have a major impact on my constituents. I would like to mention that my riding has four paper mills operating at top capacity and also a large number of sawmills which will be able to take advantage of what the new Bill has to offer.

Ever since Jacques Cartier set foot on Canadian soil, the lumber industry has played a very important part in our country's economy and still does. A century ago, there was practically nothing in the way of regulations that applied to the forestry industry. At the time, the Crown, through the provinces, gave individuals tracts of land which they worked very hard to clear, using the wood for the construction of buildings on their property.

Briefly, these people farmed the arable land they had cleared during the summer and worked as loggers during the winter, supplying saw mills and pulp and paper mills with the raw material they required.

At the time there was no advanced technology. In other words, tools and means of transportation were primitive, and that is why clearcutting forests was not as serious a matter as it is today. What I mean to say is that when forests were clearcut, the bare expanses were not as readily visible as they are today.

The forest was also a source of food, which shows how important it was at the time and still is today. Aboriginal people living on reserves depend on the forest, especially for their hunting grounds and trap lines.

The situation has changed today. The speed with which our forests are being cut has a dramatic effect on the Canadian Government's future vision and policy.

[English]

The forestry industry provides one in ten jobs in Canada directly or indirectly. In fact close to 800,000 people work in the industry, 350 communities depend on it, and huge chunks of income tax are paid to the federal government. Therefore it should only be fair that a lot of that money be put back into Canada's forestry to ensure its economic stability.

Yesterday the minister outlined the department's history which I do not intend to repeat today. Please allow me one comment.

It should be noted that since the turn of the century the department was bounced around on nine different occasions which explains its lack of continuity, competence and national involvement. There should be a strong federal presence to provide the much needed leadership. In this case it is better late than never for the federal government to impose its presence. Indeed, the creation of a department of forestry is a step in the right direction.

One cannot argue the generalities the bill offers, except in clause 6(c) where it only refers to the promotion of the forest industry but does not include enforcement.

I whole-heartedly encourage the minister to pursue the idea of hiring inspectors to oversee and supervise forest management. For example, he has mentioned that in Canada there is approximately one inspector for every 450,000 hectares of forested land, whereas in the United States there is one for every 15,000 hectares of forested land.

What I am saying is that it is not enough to advocate a forest management policy. It has to be enforced. The question is how.

The department does have the leverage power through the forest resource development agreements to impose its conditions on the provinces, namely in the area of reforestation and silviculture.

We have a lot of catching up to do. Canada's productive forests cover a total area of 220 million hectares.

• (1220)

Over the years, 12 per cent of those lands have not been satisfactorily restocked. We are looking at an increase of 200,000 hectares or nearly 1 per cent per year. Granted, 88 per cent has been reforested satisfactorily.

However, it means that next year, it will be 13 per cent and the year after, 14 per cent, and so forth. We cannot let a situation like this develop. We must act instead of constantly blaming the provinces. It is the only way to enforce the rules of sound forest management, as described in subsection 6(c).

[English]

Not enough emphasis can be put on silviculture and reforestation. Harvested land must be restocked. The notion that our forests are inexhaustible is totally false. This is where the concept of sustainable development is universally accepted. It is the means by which we can save our forests and prepare for tomorrow.

Subsection (d) of Clause 6 deals with sustainable development. In very simple terms it means ensuring that in 50 years to 100 years from now there will still be trees to harvest in Canada. We can no longer take for granted that our forests will exist forever.

As the minister is saying in The Green Ghetto, published in October of 1983, "The federal government must begin by putting its own house in order. Federal forest lands have the poorest inventories, the worst neglect of regeneration, and virtually no protection from fire and insects." Mr. Speaker, co-operation between the provinces, the federal government and the industry is a must.

I would go so far as to propose that the federal government enact strong legislation to lead the companies involved in clear cutting to reforest any area that has been harvested. If stiff penalties are the only way to get the message across, then let us not be afraid to impose them. Our future needs to be protected because jobs depend on it. The survival of those 350 communities previously mentioned should benefit from the vision that we, as legislators, have today. The minister's view in The Green Ghetto fully supports the statement, "Rapid action is needed just to protect the industries and their employees. Without significant improvement in our forest performance we will not only forfeit opportunities to expand, we will suffer rapid and painful deterioration".

Sustainable development should also be promoted because some regions depend on forestry as a means to develop and promote tourism. One example comes to mind. A few weeks ago I visited the town of Tofino, British Columbia, with my hon. colleague from Hamilton East. We were greatly impressed by the scenery. It is easily understandable why the local residents express such a strong desire to keep their surroundings intact. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, 57 per cent of the town's population depends on tourism. Can you imagine the devastating effects of clear cutting the steep hills that sculpt the background? Erosion of the top soil to the bedrock would undoubtedly prevent any regeneration. It spells disaster. The spectacular sight it offers today would disappear forever.

I maintain that there is room for compromise, especially if forest companies across Canada would agree to selective harvesting, intensive reforestation and preservation of specific areas where nature would be forever stripped of its assets.

Another fascinating example would be the preservation of the Carmanah Valley with its prestigious spruce grove. These trees took 300 years to 400 years to grow; it would be a shame to destroy all of that within a few days.

Clause 7 of Bill C-29 stipulates that the minister should:

> (a) promote co-operation,—with the governments of other countries—

Co-operation, though, should not be a giveaway as it is the case with the softwood lumber issue. The government via the forestry minister has acknowledged that the 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber is terribly hurting the industry in Ontario and in Quebec. If I were an American, I would also be very reluctant to terminate the softwood lumber deal struck in December of 1986.

The forestry department should indeed stand up for the industry and demand that the deal be abolished. Failing the Americans doing so, the forestry department should request a hearing at the bilateral procurement board and take it from there. We should not go down without a fight when so many jobs are at stake.

Subclause 7(b) refers to the possible creation of a national data bank of forestry. According to the last Auditor General's report, "there is little information to assist Parliament in making judgment on the national Canadian forestry service program priorities as to how successful CFS has been in meeting its objective".

It is clear that with the rapidly growing importance of the industry such a bank is a must.

[Translation]

Bill C-29 does not mention unemployment in the forestry industry. Together with the Department of Employment and Immigration, the new department should set up a new training program for workers who have been laid off as a result of mechanization and advanced technology. It is alarming to note, Mr. Speaker, that in the forestry industry's logging and transportation sectors alone, unemployment increased in 1987, rising to 22 per cent. This is extremely high if we consider that at the time the national average was 8.9 per cent.

[English]

I could not conclude my remarks without referring to the desperate situation which is currently unfolding in the rain forests of the Amazon. Western leaders are creating a dependency by forcing Third World countries to blindly exploit their natural resources, namely forests.

It is hopeful that Canada will remain sovereign in its exploitation of its natural resources. A strong forestry department is the only insurance against the forceful hand of other industrialized countries.

The new department should have a clearly stated national responsibility for federal leadership in forestry matters, research and technology transfer, forest resource development agreements, forest resource data, industry marketing, trade and employment and public awareness.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has another five minutes left so he does not need to rush through his speech.

Mr. Bélair: I thought Your Honour was letting me know that my time was over.

To conclude, Bill C–29 has its weaknesses. I would like to think that the government in next year's budget will allocate the necessary funds to allow the department to completely fulfil its mandate and to exercise its responsibilities toward the most significant single industry in Canada.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the member of Parliament for Cochrane—Superior on his speech in support of Bill C–29, that is, the establishment of a ministry of forestry. I thought his subjects of tourism, forest industry and especially employment and job training were très à point.

He mentioned also about the depletion of trees. I wonder if he would elaborate on the importance of reforestation vis–à–vis the environment.

Mr. Bélair: Indeed, it is a pleasure for me to answer that question. Reforestation, of course, is the major component of this new concept that has been thrown around for the last couple of years, namely sustainable development.

From the beginning of the century until the early 1960s, reforestation was not a major aspect of the forestry industry. For the last 20 years, companies and governments have started to realize that if there is not a very strictly adhered to program of reforestation, in 20 to 50 years from now there will not be trees to harvest in Canada.

Maybe I should be more specific. Now, most of the companies are within 50 to 100 miles from their plants. In 20 to 50 years they will be 200 miles from their plants. It is going to be extremely expensive for them to harvest and bring the product back to either the sawmill or the pulp and paper mill.

If we are going to endorse sustainable development, reforestation is a must. It is a major factor in ensuring the industry's future.

Mr. Worthy: I would like to ask a question of the member for Cochrane—Superior. Actually, I would like to ask several, but I probably will not have time for that.

He was talking about that beautiful part of Canada, British Columbia. I do not happen to live in that actual area, but I have spent some time working there. There are beautiful stands of trees. Any one of us would stand in awe at what nature has wrought.

There are many, many groups of people advocating the preservation of such lands. But there are also many groups and many people whose jobs and livelihood is dependent on the forest industry. For example, the leadership and the membership of the IWA in British Columbia are very concerned that proposals to preserve these beautiful trees will also be taking their livelihood.

I wonder if the member would suggest how he would approach that situation.

Mr. Bélair: I thank the hon. member for his question. Indeed , I addressed the same issue briefly in my speech.

What I saw in B.C., and I am going to use your words, was awesome. We have met with some environmentalist groups as well as with people from the industry. This is why I mentioned in my speech that there is still room for compromise.

I will come back to the same two examples I gave to you. In Tofino, the hills surrounding the town itself are absolutely beautiful. Right now there is a possibility that a company which has a tree farming licence may strip those hills completely, clear cut them of all wood. So, if you are on one side of the issue, can you imagine promoting the tourism industry and having those stripped hills to show to the people?

On the other hand, this is where the compromise could be. What if the companies strip only the side of the hill which is not visible to the tourists. That would be number one. In that manner it would not affect the tourism industry. There is also the possibility of selective harvesting. This would mean that one tree could be cut and one left to make sure that those steep hills do not erode. It is a very simple matter to say that if there is no topsoil on top of that bedrock it will not be able to grow another tree. If a hill is clear cut, then forget it, it is impossible to reforest that particular area.

At the same time, we could talk about sustainable development. The industry and the workers have to realize that today, yes, there are trees to harvest. But the way it is going now, in 20 or 50 years there will not be anymore trees to harvest and, therefore, some jobs will be lost. So now is the time to sit down and try to reach a compromise depending on each and every specific situation.

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, I just want to make a few comments. I could not resist listening to the fine question from a member on the government side. That is one of the weaknesses of the bill. Bill C–29 does not address some of those issues. It provides for conflict all the way throughout.

There is a problem with a logging road in northern Ontario. There are problems in B.C. Environmentalists and industrialists are at odds with each other. What is the government doing about it? Nothing. It is just sitting back doing nothing about it. Bill C–29 should make the Forestry Department a little bit stronger.

My hon. colleague for Cochrane—Superior mentioned in his speech the replacement of jobs because mechanization and advanced technology is putting people out of work. What is the government doing about it? Bill C–29 does not address any of those issues.

Sustainable development is the key to the future. We hear the government preaching about the environment time and time again. What is it doing about it? It is mentioned briefly in passing in Bill C–29. The government talks about how important this bill is, how it was first on the order paper yesterday. It was promised in 1984 and there have been a lot of Order Papers since 1984. We have been waiting for this bill.

We support a strong Forestry Department. This is what the industry needs; this is what Canada needs, a strong Forestry Department.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary has a fast short question. I will entertain one more question and then it is tout fini.

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the comments by the hon. member for Restigouche about northern Ontario and logging roads, I would just like to make it abundantly clear that it is a provincial matter, not a federal matter, and it has to be dealt with by the province of Ontario.

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, this is a comment for the Hon. Member for Restigouche. I believe that by tabling this Bill, the Government wants to strengthen the position of the department of forestry so that it can negotiate with other departments that are indirectly involved in forestry.

The Hon. Member for Gaspé pointed out earlier that there were at least nine departments that were either directly or indirectly involved in forestry. I am thinking, for instance, of the National Research Council which has a budget of $38 or $39 million for certain programs, money that is spent mainly on forestry research.

I would like to point out to the Hon. Member for Restigouche that since 1984, the federal Government has not acted unilaterally to force its vision on the provinces and on the industry. We have consulted with each province and all parties concerned. And this is exactly what the Bill tabled by the Minister of Forestry is intended to do: achieve a degree of co–operation, harmony and development that will be far more rational and more effective, instead of acting unilaterally as suggested by the Liberal Member for Restigouche.

[English]

Mr. Bélair: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief comment. Under the Constitution Act, 1982, natural resources including forests are a provincial jurisdiction. From an environmental point of view, this does not mean in any way that the federal government should divest its responsibility for the forestry sector. The industry needs us and national parks need the federal government. We should take our responsibilities also.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on bill C-29. It is a piece of legislation that has been an awfully long time coming. I can recall on August 30, 1984, during the election, the present Minister of Forests was quoted in the Prince George Citizen as saying that a full forest ministry would be be initiated with legislation immediately after the election. But this is only five years later, so it has been a while coming.

There are problems with the bill. I know it is going to be amended in committee. I am hopeful that the minister will see the light and see that there are areas of the bill that are very much in need of being properly beefed up because the bill shows little sign of a holistic, ecological approach to our forests. We have had for several centuries, in some areas of this country, all kinds of investment on the extraction side, on the manufacturing side, and on the technological side of the harvesting and manufacturing of products from our forests.

There has been little effort and certainly little money, either by the forest companies or by the provincial or federal governments, on the biological side. That is why we face the crisis that we do, which is something that has been identified by everyone from the Auditor General to the Science Council of Canada, to the Canadian Institute of Forests, and many other organizations from coast to coast.

I predict—it is awful to have to predict such things—but I predict that in 10 or 15 years from now in this Chamber, there will be another debate about whether or not to use the peace, order and good government constitutional powers of the Government of Canada, of Crown Canada, to invoke an entirely new approach to Canada's forests because of the crisis we have in our atmosphere. I do not think the Government of Canada or governments around the world are yet taking seriously enough the problem with the whole carbon cycle and the dramatic impact that healthy growing forests have in reducing that crisis.

Let me take a quick look at the bill, before going on to one of my favourite documents entitled The Green Ghetto authored in 1983 by the present Minister of State for Forests, soon, I presume, to be the full Minister of Forests. What concerns me, is that the bill is awfully thin gruel, when one thinks of the size and value of this industry to this nation. One in 10 Canadians is directly or indirectly employed by it. It is our largest source of balance of trade.

The federal government, under Liberal governments and under Conservative governments, continues to return less than five cents out of every dollar taken from that sector. You cannot find another sector in the Canadian economy taxed in the way any of those areas are that get such a low rate of return from government, whether it be provincial governments or federal government.

One thing we have seen in recent months is the dramatic drive by the forest giants. There are only four major companies left in British Columbia. They pretty well control the whole of the forest land base in B.C. It is a similar situation right across the country. Certainly it is in New Brunswick where a very small number of companies control about half of the land in the province.

They have attempted to take hold of the words "sustainable development" and to change that in the public mind to mean "sustained development", sustained harvesting, without ever dealing and yielding to the biological reality of what sustainable yield really is in terms of the ecological wholeness of our forests, whether deciduous or coniferous forests anywhere in this country.

That section has to very clearly be expanded to send a signal, not just to provincial Crown authorities, but to the forest companies, both private and public sector, right across this country, as to what sustainable development really means. We know that even when one goes to the third page to clause 9 and finds what the minister has agreed to have in there through his legal draftspersons in relation to inventory.

There is not an accurate, adequate inventory, not only of our regional forests, but certainly not of our national forests. That has to be one of the fundamental roles taken on. I know the minister believes very strongly in proper, adequate, understandable, sound inventories. I would hope that he would be very co-operative in committee in seeing that that section is properly amended.

Let me deal for a moment with The Green Ghetto. I am sure you have read this document by my friend from Prince George—Peace River. It certainly makes good reading. This was written a couple of years ago but I will quote from the introduction which states:

> Over the next two decades millions of people will work in forest related industries while millions more will use the forest for recreation and escape. But, on our present national course, by the end of those two decades, the jobs will be vanishing, leaving hundreds of communities with no other industry, and boaters and campers will find their activities confined to increasingly crowded "forest ghettos" called national or provincial parks. Disputes between industrial and environmental interests could become bitter. The social ramifications of reduced government services in provinces presently dependent upon forestry tax revenues will also be considerable.

Those are prophetic words, Mr. Speaker. That is exactly what has happened. In my home province of British Columbia, over the last five years, 25,000 jobs have been lost in the forest sector and we did not hear a peep out of Ottawa as to what could or should be done. We have had a $300 million jointly shared FRDA, made up of $150 million in federal funds and $150 million in provincial funds. The province wants to sign a five-year FRDA for $1 billion. But, as the minister knows, the actual amount put forward for forestry for the whole of Canada is down in the estimates. It is down, not up. I certainly have not heard the kind of remarks from the Minister of Forestry that one would expect from someone who published such a prophetic statement and has seen so little action in the last five years, entirely under a Conservative government, in terms of money going out there.

So what is going on is a bit of a shell game with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Forestry saying, "Well, maybe we will sign a 10-year agreement. We will see if we can fool the public. We are only going to put up a little money so we have a $300-million FRDA over five years. Let us do one over 10, so at least we can have a $300-million FRDA over 10 years", or perhaps it is something a little bit more.

It is clear, contrary to what the Minister of Forestry has said in B.C. in my own riding, that there are not adequate numbers of trained technicians for intensive forestry, to get out there and to husband the forests. In fact, there are. People have been preparing themselves very well right across British Columbia and right across this country under the existing FRDAs to actually get into the big expenditure years which we have all expected. Certainly, I trust the minister will be signing a $1 billion FRDA prior to March, 1990 when our existing FRDA runs out.

> There are dozens of measurements of forestry activity by which our performance can be compared to other nations. One simple one is the number of foresters currently managing our forests. In 1982 Dr. Marcel Lortie, Professional Forester, estimated that only about 500 professional foresters were engaged in "on-site forest development. While our chief competitors (the United States, Sweden and Norway) have approximately one forester to every 15,000 hectares (34,000 acres) of land, Canada has one for every 450,000 hectares (1,111,000 acres). Moreover, as we improve, so do they. "If, in 10 or 20 years, Canada has attained the ratio of 15,000 hectares per forester—the ratio in these countries will have increased to around 10,000 hectares—per forester."—He noted that some countries practice even more intensive management—i.e. Czechoslovakia, with one forester to every 300 to 400 hectares (750-1,000 acres).

I have not seen much sign, Mr. Speaker, in relation to the expenditure plan we have, that there is any plan at the national level for a serious new body of professional foresters to conduct an inventory. You cannot run a popcorn stand unless you know how much popcorn you have. You cannot run a tire store. You could not be a farmer. But here is the federal government touting this new act, but without putting the financial muscle forward and saying: "Yes, we are going to take an inventory; we are going to do something serious about fires."

Almost as much land was burned so far this year as was harvested in this country. The military were never mobilized. Some comments were made by the Minister of Forestry years ago about the need for a broader base in terms of water bombers and the sharing of high-level aerial infra-red photography so that we can locate those fires before they start to spread. The technology is available now to isolate, through various forms of photography, areas that are having problems with disease or with insect infestations. We have to get much more serious about putting in the money that needs to be put into the largest industry in this country so that we can protect the forests that are there and manage them properly because they have been horribly mismanaged throughout all of Canada's short history.

At page 7 The Green Ghetto further states:

> In 1983, the Science Council of Canada warned "The forests are essential to our social and economic well being; yet we have allowed them to degenerate to a dangerous point. We have been felling, selling and shipping timber for so long, and at such a rate, that today a 23-billion dollar industry is facing economic stagnation."

I am not going to quote too much of it, but at page 8 The Green Ghetto further states:

> Almost 12 percent of our productive forest land is now in this dismal condition, and each year 300,000 hectares (half a million acres) are added to the backlog. If properly stocked this land alone could sustain Canada's harvest for about 30 years.

Again, let me deal with my own province about which I know the most in terms of forestry matters. The professional foresters in that province, through the ministry of forests, say that the sustainable yield in British Columbia is about 57 million cubic metres a year. The harvest this year, including private land that is being harvested, will come very close to 100 million cubic metres. COFI, the Council of Forest Industries in B.C., has predicted that we could harvest 166 million cubic metres.

As Dr. Bill Reese pointed out in B.C. this week, in a public meeting that I attended, the over-harvest that is going on in British Columbia is an over-harvest of almost 100 per cent. Professional foresters say 57 million cubic metres can be harvested and have sustained yield and we are cutting almost double that.

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? We know about the fall-down effect. We know that our "nsr"—not satisfactorily restocked—lands are growing, not shrinking. We have the government playing coy, playing a shell game about how much money is going to go into the next phase of FRDA. We need to plan in British Columbia. We need to know what sites we are going to intensively manage; what areas we are going to get into seriously dealing with the existing soil erosion; what areas we are going to have to deal in a serious way with the kinds of undergrowth that have come up that are keeping the kinds of timber that are most suitable for those sites from growing back.

When I say holistic forestry, we are so far behind countries like Sweden that not only replant marketable, merchantable species of timber, they are also now planting seed grasses for songbirds; they are planting willow for moose. In Sweden, three times as many moose were harvested last year as were taken in the whole of Canada, and Sweden has less moose habitat than the province of British Columbia.

When we are talking about the forest we have to realize that we should not only harvest it and then just go in and plant a few coniferous or deciduous trees that are good for today, but we have to be forward looking now. The greenhouse effect has started. There has been a one degree Celsius change. We know how long it took the forests to move back up all of North America following the last ice age. It is a very slow rate of movement. We have to recognize that some of the sites that we are presently planting with certain kinds of species, will not likely even survive to maturity if the greenhouse condition continues at the rate that it is.

There is no sign that the Government of Canada, the Government of the United States, or the Government of the Soviet Union, the three largest producers of carbon into the atmosphere, are likely to dramatically reduce the amount of carbon going up in that cycle. That is why I make such a dire prediction that the next major debate on forestry in this chamber will be to use "pog" power: peace, order and good government, in relation to the severity of the crisis in our forests throughout the world.

On page 28 of The Green Ghetto, it states:

> Not since Nero has there been so much fiddling, while so much burned.

Well, nothing could be more true this year, Mr. Speaker. If you look at the amount of money spent and the number of people, and the amount of equipment mobilized to fight the forest fires that went on in this country, it is absolutely pathetic, if not criminal, that the governments in this country are so pathetically inclined to deal with fire and so pathetically inclined to deal with disease. It is something that this bill should be seriously addressing because it is in the nation's interest. If the provinces will not do it, I believe very strongly in a strong national government that takes these kinds of things on.

Here is what the minister had to say just five short years ago: "In addition to the water bombers, Canada needs high altitude aircraft with infra-red scanning equipment to detect fires as soon as they start". We still do not have one.

Mr. Oberle: Yes, we do. Lots of them.

Mr. Fulton: "Lots of them", says the minister. I would like to see the hours they flew while those fires were going on.

The Minister also stated: "Extraordinary work is being done in this area around the world today, but it is expensive and more shared cost programs will be needed if we are to have the technology available here in Canada."

Here is the ending. This is how the minister, while he was a private member, ended his report:

> The paper was intended to show that our national policy has been to avoid decisions, allowing neglect to make the choices for us. Years of indifference have restricted the number of options now available and we are close to a time when it will not make any difference what we do.

Prophetic words, Mr. Speaker, because that is exactly what has happened over the last five years. Forestry has been neglected at the federal level, at levels that will have incredible burdening consequences, not only upon our generation but upon generations yet to come. Let us look at why I say that.

Every year between 200,000 and 400,000 hectares are being added to what is called "nsr" land, not satisfactorily restocked land. One-eighth of Canada's productive forest land has deteriorated to the point where it can no longer regenerate productive forests. What happens is that the very thin topsoil, as other members have talked about, is often eroded following the kinds of forest practices we have allowed to go on to this point.

In 1983, 350 million seedlings were being planted annually in Canada. In Sweden, a country smaller than Alberta, 400 million seedlings are planted annually.

Sir John A. Macdonald, on June 22, 1871, 128 years to the day that this bill was introduced in June of this year, had this to say, and I quote:

> The sight of immense masses of timber passing my window every morning constantly suggests to my mind the absolute necessity there is for looking into the future of this great trade. We are recklessly destroying the timber of Canada and there is scarcely the possibility of replacing it.

Again, prophetic words. Again, a Conservative, but in 128 years the Conservatives have not come forward with policies to deal seriously with forestry in this country.

We heard questions posed by a B.C. member and we hear them often from the minister. Why are we facing crises such as those in Temagami, Carmanah, the Stein, and the battle that went on over South Moresby? Only 2.6 per cent of this entire nation is adequately protected in conservation areas. The Prime Minister is quick to go to the United Nations and state that we adopt all of Prime Minister Brundtland's recommendations, and the World Commission Report, but that means we have to set aside 12 per cent of the lands in this nation for conservation purposes.

If you look at British Columbia that means we have to double the amount of land, parks, and ecological reserves in that province. We have to settle aboriginal title in the whole province of British Columbia. There needs to be a much broader, forward-looking, land use management strategy at the federal level to say what lands are going to be necessary to deal with the conservation strategy, to deal with the issue of aboriginal title, to deal with the crises we are facing in terms of marginalizing so much land that could and should be productive forest land.

Forestry can be and should be the bulwark of Canada's economy, but it soon will not be because of the irresponsibility and incompetence in both the private sector, and in what we obviously should have been doing in legislatures which simply has not taken place.

Even this year the Auditor General for Canada reported that "lack of adequate forest management has much depleted the forest resource. Significant shortages of wood are reported at the local level in every province. Restocking of productive forest lands has not kept pace with the harvest."

Those are the words of the Auditor General. So we have the Science Council of Canada, and the Auditor General, the minister in his former incarnation as a true believer in what could and should be done, but now he is having to deal with a cabinet who have recklessly kept him on the back burner. Why has he not been given a full ministry, and a deputy with long, sharp teeth, and a budget that can actually deal with these kinds of things? What kind of a reckless Prime Minister would keep a minister like that hidden away behind the curtain for so long? Why has there not been debates in this chamber on forestry? Why are we not taking the kinds of proper approaches that we should be? Where is the billion-dollar FRDA that should be signed some time this month? Why is the minister playing the shell game about a 10, or a 20, or a 50, or a 300-year FRDA to try and cover the fact that his colleagues are being cheap and are chiselling the money away so that Michael Wilson can have $7 million to advertise the GST in The Globe and Mail?

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Fulton: We know his voice is not being heard yet, but from this side of the House we will speak up for the forests and encourage him to come forward with the kind of legislation that every professional forester in this country wants to see. They are waiting; they are listening. Those 400 single-industry towns are waiting to see whether the minister can deliver anything other than a small chicken egg. The seeds of revolution have been sown in this country in relation to our forests. We have to conserve. We have to properly treat our forests.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that the hon. member's time has expired, but he still has 10 minutes for questions and comments.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE PRESS

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): Mr. Speaker, on September 6 this year, an article in the newspaper La Presse reported some comments I made about the PQ candidate in the riding of Chapleau which were also quoted by two of my colleagues yesterday here in the House.

These comments were labelled as being racist, and I am very sorry if anyone's feelings were hurt. That was certainly not my intention, and it was certainly not the purpose of the private conversation I had with the journalist in question, and I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

THE LATE PAUL ANTHONY JOHNSTONE

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, last July 30, Nova Scotia and Canada lost an outstanding citizen with the sudden death of Dr. Paul Anthony Johnstone.

Dr. Johnstone came to Canada from his native Jamaica 22 years ago. He became one of the pioneer leading figures in the fields of multiculturalism and human rights in this country. Indeed, his work at home and abroad contributed significantly to the position of leadership that is attributed to Canada internationally in the field of multicultural education.

At home in Atlantic Canada he was known as the father of multicultural education; indeed, as a prophet in our time. As executive director of Nova Scotia Human Rights Commission Tony Johnstone was one of Canada's very few, if not only, black deputy ministers. His contributions to intercultural and interracial understanding of our country was profound. He will be greatly missed by those of us who knew him, but all Canadians present and future are the beneficiaries of his work, his leadership and his contribution.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, this morning the finance committee heard from One Voice, the national non-profit organization for seniors. Since August, One Voice has been contacting every major Canadian seniors' organization to hear their reaction to the proposed goods and services tax. What it learned is that seniors organizations in Canada are opposed to the goods and services tax.

Why, Mr. Speaker? Quite simply seniors do not trust this government. They do not trust a government that promised to protect universality and yet has introduced a clawback on old age security pensions that will each year deny more and more seniors their rightful entitlement to universal social benefits. They do not trust a government that promised to make the tax system fairer yet has introduced a consumption tax that hits hardest at seniors on fixed income who will be forced to pay more and more of their income on basic necessities.

Seniors in Canada have learned that they can count on this government for only one thing, and that is the continued erosion of their income security.

CYSTIC FIBROSIS RESEARCH

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this summer's news that a team of scientists at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto has found the fatal gene defect that causes cystic fibrosis is great news for all Canadians.

Led by Dr. Lap Chee Tsui, this medical team has made what someone called one of the most significant discoveries in the history of human genetics. Finding this gene holds out the prospect of an assault on cystic fibrosis from an understanding of its cause, the basic genetic defect, and its discovery will lead not only to diagnostic testing for carriers but also to the perfection of prenatal testing for the disease.

Our thanks to Dr. Tsui and his team for their dedication and hard work. Godspeed for their continued success.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on June 5, 1989 we rose in this House to unanimously condemn the Chinese government for the use of brutal and excessive force against its own people in Tianamem Square. Within one month, the government approved approximately $230 million in loan money to the Government of China.

Since 1985 we have been hearing about the leadership role our country is taking with respect to economic sanctions on South Africa, and yet this year we see that our imports from that country have jumped up by an incredible 62 per cent.

These are only two in a series of inconsistencies that are giving our country a reputation not of credibility but of hypocrisy.

As Canada prepares to take up its seat as president of the United Nations Security Council, I urge the secretary of state to take this opportunity to prove that we are deserving of the position by reversing the trend and starting to honour our promises and to live up to our commitment.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, environmental concerns form without a doubt the most serious concerns of all parliamentarians in the world. Every nation on this planet is affected and could be permanently damaged if we do not deal with these problems soon. I have on one or two occasions voiced my opinion on what we should do to combat acid rain, so I am very happy to see other members finally coming on side. Canadians from across the country can be pleased at the recent emphasis everyone in the House is placing on the environment.

I rise today in order to praise a colleague from across the floor. The member from Broadview—Greenwood is to be commended for his efforts at the recent Conference on the Environment held in Toronto. All parties were present and even though all the problems of the world were not solved, we did take a few more steps in that direction. Every world class conference like this only helps us as Canadians show the world we are facing up to our responsibilities. This will only help in our negotiations in the future. To all those involved in the conference I say congratulations.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak about the now deceased spirit of free trade. Spirits are elusive and invisible. Canadians caught the spirit but the Americans have effectively killed that spirit.

I want to tell the House that the American steel industry is harassing the Canadian steel industry. Rulings two weeks ago imposed 100 per cent punitive duties against Sysco Steel and 39 per cent against Algoma Steel. If the ruling is upheld by the disputes mechanism panel, Canadian steel rails will be effectively excluded from the American market.

Everyone agrees the ruling against Algoma Steel was unwarranted, unjust, irrational, even stupid, but it is true. And what does the minister say? Absolutely nothing, not even a press release that his staff prepared. There is no guarantee that the ruling will be overturned, suggests the minister.

In conclusion, if the ruling is upheld we hope that the trade minister will join with Algoma Steel, probably all Canadian steel producers across this country, and with me and my colleagues, not only to bury the spirit of free trade but also the body of the free trade agreement.

WEST COAST FISHERIES

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative government has maintained a very strong commitment to the management of our west coast fisheries, a commitment that has been demonstrated very well this year by the record levels of Fraser River sockeye both caught by our fishermen and returning to the spawning grounds. The estimated horse-fly run of sockeye to the Fraser this year was over 18 million, the best since 1913. Over 11.7 million fish were caught and approximately 5 million fish were allowed to spawn to ensure that an excellent run will appear four years from now.

The Fraser River is a major beneficiary of the government's Salmonid Enhancement Program with over $42 million being spent on the west coast this year on salmon enhancement. Hundreds of British Columbians, including many school children, are involved with local salmon enhancement funded by the government. Successful management requires co-operation of the government, fishermen, industry, native groups and all British Columbians.

I congratulate the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his staff for their outstanding work in the area of fisheries management and salmon enhancement and tell him that the fishermen who work the mighty Fraser River in my riding of Delta are looking forward to even better runs in the future.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, as the associate critic for the disabled, I was outraged to discover that a disabled veteran was recently forced off a VIA Rail train beside a highway in the middle of nowhere after accidentally sleeping through his stop. The constituents of Hamilton Mountain and I—in fact all Canadians—are very concerned about this incident. That this shocking event took place at all shows how cut-backs to VIA Rail are affecting its employees.

I find it hard to believe that this incident would have occurred with a contented train crew. We all know that staff at VIA Rail has done its best to provide excellent service to Canadian travellers for year, so when a 76-year-old blind man is victimized I think we can presume that quality service including service for the disabled is now being derailed by anxieties over employment security at VIA Rail.

The disabled in this country are already being burdened by this government's cut-backs. Need they suffer more?

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, I would like to highlight the impact of the free trade agreement on a very important area of the Canadian economy, that is, investment in Canada.

Canadians were told by the pessimists that free trade would cause investment to dry up and that our industries would close their doors and move to Alabama or Georgia to take advantage of inexpensive labour.

In the riding of Elk Island we can see that the opposite is happening. In Elk Island we see a $300 million new development in advanced industrial materials, a proposed $600 million expansion in the petrochemical industry, a new $60 million plant to produce environmentally friendly pulp industry chemicals, and a new pharmaceutical chemical operation. There is more, much more to come in the future. It is a future made brighter by free trade, a future that will mean more investment in Canada.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, when 174 East Indians landed at Nova Scotia two years ago, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Employment and Immigration launched an hysterical campaign, calling it an invasion threatening our sovereignty. Yet, when a rich businessman brags about buying a visa for $200,000, we don't hear a peep out of our brave Prime Minister or any of his ministers.

The Globe and Mail has again exposed a scandal of so-called investor visas for rich people who are not seriously interested in investing in Canada and may not even live here when they get their visas.

This Tory government issues thousands of these visas, over 3,000 in 1988 alone, while it deports seven times as many people to poor countries as to rich countries.

I call on the government to stop the investor and entrepreneur visa programs, investigate these rackets, close the loopholes and revoke the visas got under false pretensions. After all, if the minister deports penniless refugees when she does not believe their stories, why welcome rich cheaters? They are not the kind of people who build our country.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the government's proposed goods and services tax is totally unacceptable to the people of the north, as my colleagues from this side of the House already know.

The people of the north already bear the burden of this country's highest cost of living. The food price index in Yellowknife is approximately 35 per cent higher than in Edmonton. Spence Bay has a food price index 96 per cent higher than Yellowknife. Living costs in the Keewatin range from 50 per cent to 70 per cent higher than the supply base of Winnipeg. Kitikmeot residents face costs that are 70 per cent to 139 per cent higher than Edmonton. The cost of transportation is the greatest factor in our higher cost of living. We simply cannot absorb an additional 9 per cent tax on necessities that are already many more times expensive than in southern Canadian cities.

This unfair tax will punish northerners in ways the government has obviously not thought about. I remind the government that a northern income cannot purchase what a southern income can. The government must reconsider. It must give special attention to the effects of this tax on northern Canadians. I invite the Minister of Finance to go to the north to see for himself.

LIBERAL PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have some sad news to report. The previously announced Liberal leadership stakes have run amok. They refuse to break from the starting gate. Race officials are now searching Canada's bushes looking for suitable entries.

The also-rans are just snorting that the $1.7 million entry fee will be for the rich and famous only. There is new speculation that the losers of the socialist turtle derby presently being run and difficult to follow will be invited to enter the gate of the Liberal leadership stakes. That disenchanted fans are calling for an inquiry and now the bookies are refusing all bets. Where is a dark horse when you need one?

CANADIAN INFRASTRUCTURE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, as the co-chair of the national Liberal task force on Canada's infrastructure I spent the last two months meeting with Canadian officials and environmental groups in several Canadian cities to find out the severity of problems with regard to deteriorating roads, bridges and sewers.

The actual statistics in all regions of the country indicate that the problems are far worse than ever could have been anticipated. With virtually no money to repair them, roads are deteriorating at an alarming rate. Raw sewage is being pumped into our rivers and oceans. Historically the federal government has always been involved, along with the provincial and municipal governments, in the cost of financing Canada's infrastructure. The federal government should share in the cost of construction and separation of sewers. Our beaches must once again be used for recreation and swimming, not for waste disposal.

Canadians realize that a healthy environment is the foundation of steady economic growth. When will this government commit to resuming its traditional role with the provinces and municipalities in saving our cities and towns.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, in western Canada the RCMP uniform is a symbol of our heritage and must be preserved in respect for our forefathers and as a legacy for the future. It is imperative that we retain the distinct heritage and tradition of the RCMP by maintaining the uniformity of their dress code, with all the recognizable colour and trappings that have had such great historical value for this country.

I strongly urge the Solicitor General to undertake the necessary steps required to declare this uniform a national symbol of Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He will undoubtedly know that on CBC Newsworld last night the Minister of Finance laughed when asked about taxing food. He said the reason he refused to answer the question put to him yesterday in the House of Commons was because it was "a little parliamentary ploy by the opposition". He went on to say that to answer questions about a tax on food, and I use his words again, "just starts down that slippery slope".

We know that the Minister of Finance has already broken his word by putting a $2.5 billion tax on fast food and restaurants.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Broken my word?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Well, he intends to do this.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): You better check that, John.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Yes, indeed. And he is unable to define, even after two years, what the definition of basic groceries is. We know that he is now playing a game in refusing to say to the House of Commons whether or not he is going to expand that tax on food.

I ask the Prime Minister if he will give a solemn, unequivocal undertaking to the House of Commons and through us to the people of Canada ruling out any tax on food.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that he check his words very carefully as to me breaking a promise. I said very clearly in December of 1987 that we would not tax basic groceries. He is now twisting what I said to his political benefit. He knows that that is true.

What we have put forward to the Canadian people is a proposal in the technical paper, which is a very well balanced and carefully structured proposal. This involves the goods and services tax, plus a number of fairness features, as part of that over-all tax system. Those fairness features include the exemption from taxation of basic groceries. It involves a very generous refundable tax credit. It involves a reduction in the middle income tax rate, a housing rebate and a payment to small business to offset the cost.

We in the government feel very strongly about that balanced package, but it is very important that we allow the finance committee to operate by not ruling out this or any other of the specific items which the Leader of the Opposition or the Leader of the New Democratic Party ask us about because as sure as we are standing here, it will be on food today, tomorrow it will be something else, then the next day it will be something else. Before we know it, the chairman of the finance committee will be saying: "What are we meeting for?" We say that there is a very important role for the finance committee.

• (1420)

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are already asking that very question, but I believe that today we got the answer. Despite the fact that the Minister's intentions were kept under wraps, it would seem that he does want to put a tax on food.

Mr. Speaker, on June 23, 1987, while making one of his more insulting comments, the Minister of Finance told the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie that there would be no tax on food, and he accused the Member of scaring senior citizens and the poor by talking about a tax on food.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance why he doesn't have the courage to say again today what he said to the Hon. Member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie two years ago. Why is he playing cat and mouse with the tax on food? Why doesn't he act on the recommendations made this morning before the Finance Committee by senior citizens, and refrain from putting a tax on food? Why doesn't he say quite frankly: There will be no tax on food here in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, there is no game of hide and seek here. Our proposal is on the table and it is very clear. I think that the hon. member has pointed out precisely why we should not get into commenting on individual items that come before the finance committee.

Ms. Copps: Like food.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Yes, on food. He pointed out this morning, on food, that there was a group before the finance committee that said: "Don't tax basic groceries". Last week there were others who said: "Tax basic groceries".

Some Hon. Members: Who?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): All of them. Last week they said: "All food".

Some Hon. Members: Oh. oh!

An Hon. Member: Nobody said that.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the point that I want to make is that we will hear, in the course of the debate before the finance committee over the next few weeks, people commenting and making proposals on all sides of this.

It is not the responsibility of the government to comment day by day on these individual items. There will be a report by the finance committee and when that report comes out the government will respond to it. Until then, we will not be responding to individual statements that are made before the committee.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we are putting questions to the Minister of Finance on very important issues before the House of Commons. We receive answers that are either ambiguous or contradictory to those he has made earlier to the House.

Since he won't answer on food, I want to put a question to the Prime Minister on one of his priorities, on education.

The Prime Minister, through the Minister of Finance, plans to put the first ever federal sales tax on newspapers. He plans to put the first ever federal tax on books, including university students' text books. Further, most students will not be eligible for the low income sales tax credit since it is only available to people who make more than $6,100 per year.

Will the Prime Minister explain why, for the first time in Canadian history, there will be a tax on education, a tax on learning, a tax on literacy, a tax on instruction in this country? I thought that education and literacy were among his top priorities.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me clarify one thing that the Leader of the Opposition has just said. Students will be eligible for a $275 sales tax credit. That is very clear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): All students?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The Leader of the Opposition obviously has not read the document. It is $275.

The proposal that has been put before the House is a proposal with a very broad tax base. We have taken the decision as a government that we should not be in the position of making choices or influencing choices of individual consumers.

We have put forward that tax proposal with a very generous refundable sales tax credit so that low income people will not be disadvantaged by this. They will be protected by that credit.

We have also provided for exemptions for educational services, for libraries so that those entities will not be subject to additional tax as a result of the GST.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The minister knows full well that his proposed action on VIA Rail flies not only in the face of reason but common sense and public opinion as well. It is patently obvious that the people of Canada want VIA Rail and they want it enhanced and improved.

Will the minister commit himself to give a reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and then use that committee report to modernize and enhance VIA Rail, to make it a modern transportation system, rather than trying to decimate it and wipe it off the face of the earth?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will obviously not make that commitment. We have considered many proposals. We have looked at many possibilities for VIA Rail and as soon as it is possible to make the announcement we will do it. But we will not return to the report of the committee.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, we have in Ottawa today over 50 mayors and municipal leaders from across Canada. They will be faced with the responsibility of providing alternative means of transportation when VIA is cut.

My question is to the Minister of Transport. It will cost $1.4 billion in severance and unemployment benefits to cut VIA, and it will cost $7 billion and even more to provide additional airport and highway facilities.

These figures are from the review on VIA Rail that the minister commissioned for $4 million. Will the minister refer to the business plan, the report on VIA Rail, and his recommendations to the transport committee for an interval and in-depth analysis before any move is made on VIA Rail?

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my colleague can think what he likes about the option we will choose for VIA Rail; it is not necessarily what we will do, but again, I do believe that we did consult. We recently met with the provincial ministers. We met with the Union of Municipalities. I met with the mayors of cities like Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal, etc. I think that we are now in the process of making a decision and, again, I do not intend to refer in any way to the Transport Commission or Committee.

[English]

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday when I attempted to get the minister to clarify the government's position on the taxing of food, simply to recommit the government to its own promise on the subject, the minister said I was playing a parliamentary trick. It is rather bizarre for a cabinet minister to say that someone who wanted the government to be honest about its policy was committing a parliamentary trick.

In light of what he has just said in the House, that he had no intention to respond to statements that were made in the committee or within recent memory in the House of Commons, would he respond to a commitment he made in the election last year on this subject, which was unequivocal, in a public debate and discussion on this matter on television. When one member from my party indicated opposition to a food tax, the Minister of Finance then responded on behalf of the government: "So have we, so have we", in response specifically to the commitment that there would be no tax on food without exception.

I want to ask the minister today: does he stand by that commitment that he made to the people of Canada in the election campaign last fall?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have made that commitment in the document itself that is presented to the House of Commons.

Mr. Broadbent: Then, is the House correct in understanding that if the government proceeds with this new sales tax there will be no new sales tax in any shape or form on food in Canada, as the minister said last fall publicly? Will he give us a clear answer to that? Yes or no? That is the issue.

• (1430)

Mr. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is responded to in the document itself. Let me just make sure that what the leader has just said is taken accurately. We have made a distinction in the document between basic groceries and processed prepared foods. Those prepared foods, as we have said, will be taxable. They will not be tax free as will basic groceries.

We will also have further discussions and consultations with the food industry to decide precisely how that is done, whether it is because of the establishment where they are purchased or whether it is because of the nature of the product itself. Those consultations still must take place.

[Translation]

Mr. Edward Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister also indicated that with the sales tax credit system, this sales tax would not impact negatively on seniors and other people. But would the Minister confirm today that in spite of this credit, 570,000 seniors will be hit harder by this tax?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): On the contrary, Mr. Speaker, I will not make that statement whatsoever because we have put into the sales tax system a number of very important elements that address themselves directly to the needs of senior citizens. The $275 per adult credit I think is available to some 80 per cent of senior citizens in full. In addition to that, the exemptions that have been put in the new system, including the exemption on medical devices, on basic groceries, on health care, on prescription drugs, on non-profit homemaker services, on meals on wheels, all those types of items, are specifically designed to address the needs of senior citizens. For that reason, I totally reject what the hon. member has just said.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, just a few weeks ago war was declared on workers and consumers in Canada when the minister announced his goods and services tax.

The Minister of Finance says that workers in this country must accept lower wage settlements regardless of what is happening with the cost of living increases that will occur as a result of the GST or Canadians will face higher interest rates, higher inflation, higher unemployment.

The minister says we have to have "wage and price moderation." My question to the Prime Minister is very simple. Will he explain to the workers of Canada what "wage and price moderation" means?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Hon. Member will admit to the House today, as he has done on other occasions, that he believes that it is important for us to move from the existing federal sales tax to the multi-stage, value-added type of tax that we have, the goods and services tax. The key here is how we make that transition. We have set out very clearly in the technical paper how we believe that should be done to achieve the economic benefits that all the observers, all the economists say are there, provided we have a proper transition, a non-inflationary transition.

We believe that if business people and people in the labour sector will exercise moderation, then we will have that transition. We have said that if that is so, there will be a 2.25 per cent one time only increase in inflation, but because of the low-income tax credit and the middle-income tax reduction, the after tax impact of this is only 1 per cent. I do not believe that this is too much to ask of Canadians, both on the business side and on the labour side, to accommodate in terms of achieving those long-term benefits.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, in the technical papers the department keeps referring to wage and price moderation. The question is very simple. Does the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance really believe that workers across this country are just going to lie down and accept this vicious attack on their standard of living?

We are asking the Prime Minister what his response is going to be when Canadians say: "This is not fair, we cannot survive, our families cannot survive". The government is not being moderate but it is asking Canadians to be moderate. I am asking the Prime Minister what his response is going to be when the workers across this country say no to the goods and services tax.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think one of the first places that we could start exercising moderation is with the language that we use in the House of Commons. The hon. member has referred to the goods and services tax as being a vicious attack. I have just set out the fact that the vicious attack that he talks about is an impact on people's income of 1 per cent. Surely that is not a vicious attack.

Let me go on to say that families earning less than $30,000 are going to be protected from the impact of inflation and that they will be better off after the change from the existing sales tax system to the new sales tax system. Surely that is a basis on which Canadians can show moderation.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and I will try this time in French to obtain a clear, precise answer.

Can the Minister of Finance assure me that he intends to exclude food from the tax permanently or not?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have set out very clearly and very concisely what the proposal is for sales tax reform. It is set out in a technical paper. There is an overview paper that covers the broad parameters of what we are proposing to do. We have set that out as government policy.

If I am going to be asked to comment on every specific element of that particular paper and say if we are absolutely committed to this and this and this, then there will be no work whatsoever for the finance committee to do. The hon. member would be the first to be up on his feet saying: "Why are you pre-empting the work the finance committee is about to do on sales tax reform".

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question. I think that you can tell the Finance Committee right away not to waste its time considering a tax on food, and I think that all the members of the Committee would be prepared to admit that. So I ask the Minister of Finance once again: Stop evading the issue. Will you tax food or not? Are you changing your mind and going back on your election promises? That is the question!

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times I have to answer the same question. I have answered that question to him, to the Leader of the New Democratic Party and to his leader. Surely the answer is clear. It has not deviated from one to the other.

Oral Questions

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. When the government found mayors and reeves across the country who supported the dismantling of Canada Post, it bought newspaper advertisements to herald the fact. I have in my hand a list of over 300 municipalities that have passed resolutions calling for full public hearings on any cuts to VIA Rail. Will the Minister of Transport listen to that request and ensure that there are full public hearings before any cuts are made?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have as much respect for municipalities as my colleague could have. That is the reason why I met with the Canadian Federation of Municipalities last June for more than one hour as I did also with the mayors of major cities in Canada. I will do what I have to do.

I believe, however, that the time is coming to make a decision and I will not postpone the decision about VIA Rail. As soon as the decision is made, it will be given and I will not change the timing of the decision.

• (1440)

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the minister has had on his desk a request from the mayor of Saint John, New Brunswick, and the mayor of Mississauga which I communicated to him on September 15, for a meeting with a delegation that is here in Ottawa today. This delegation is from Atlantic Canada and from the Windsor–Quebec corridor. They would like a bit of time to talk with the minister about why it is wrong for the government to dismantle VIA Rail. Will the minister either meet with them privately, today or tomorrow, or will he join others from the transport committee in the Railway Committee Room at 3.30 p.m. to hear their appeal?

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, when I met with the Canadian Federation of Municipalities in June, the mayor of Saint John, New Brunswick, was there. When I met with the mayors of major cities, the mayor of Mississauga was there, I listened to them and I repeat: as soon as a decision on VIA Rail is made, there will be an announcement. Until then, I have no intention of holding further consultations.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): My question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Under the minister's direction, Canada has followed sound conservation practices with respect to the harvesting of fisheries resources on Georges Bank. Unfortunately, the groundfish that inhabit the waters over the bank do not know that it is to their advantage to stay on the Canadian side of the line. Far too many are taken by the devil-may-care. irresponsible attitude of the Americans on the other side.

Given that it is unacceptable for Nova Scotian fishing boats to be tied up while Americans rape the fishery in Georges Bank, what actions are being taken to see that these resources are properly protected?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I believe I heard the question.

The hon. member is right to be concerned about what is perhaps the most abundant groundfish resource in Canadian waters. It is divided by a boundary between Canada and the United States. The determination of The Hague line boundary some years ago brought great benefit to the Nova Scotia groundfish fishery in particular, and we insist that Canadian and American fishermen alike abide by our regulations and our enforcement measures.

It is a fact that the resource is much richer on our side of the line because we manage it well. We will continue to manage that resource well and we cannot tolerate over-fishing of the Georges Bank groundfish resource in any form it may take.

PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. On June 19 of this year in Halifax, Nova Scotia, the Prime Minister was his usual very eloquent self.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: He said:"Either we ride the crest of the technology wave into the 21st century or we exhaust ourselves in the rip-tide of history".

In light of the government's complicity in the take-over of Connaught by the government of France, will the Prime Minister admit to us now that his Halifax words were as hollow as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the question of the merging of Connaught with another company is currently before Investment Canada. The hon. member knows that no decision has yet been made. Confidentiality provisions of the Investment Canada Act prohibit me or any minister from discussing that in this House, but I will tell the hon. member that the decision on that matter, as in all other matters, will be the same, that clear net benefit to Canada must be evident, and it will not be accepted unless it is evident.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, the government is missing the point. Even Investment Canada has said that Connaught is the strategic flagship for Canada's biotech industry.

What France needs surely Canada needs even more, and that is the point.

[Translation]

Even with the Government's promises regarding the sale of Connaught—and we know what to expect from this Government when it comes to promises—the question is quite straightforward: The French Government needs Connaught to secure France's technological future. Why are you helping them to achieve that goal?

[English]

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, the question is wild and confused. We are not having a bid by the Government of France. We are having a bid by a company that is chartered in Europe that is going to merge with the Canadian company if it is approved by Investment Canada. That is what is before the House. For the hon. member to go from there into histrionics is really not called for at this time. Wait for the decision of Investment Canada.

However, I would advise the hon. member that Investment Canada not only will make sure there is clear, direct benefit for Canada on any decision of this sort, but in fact it will continue to encourage foreign investment in Canada which has been running at about $3 billion a year from the United States, whereas Canadian investment in the United States has been running at $4 billion a year. Our investment around the world is strong. We believe in proper investment around the world including this, as long as there is net direct benefit to Canada.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that the 414 Electronic Warfare Squadron stationed at North Bay, Ontario, which, according to the Budget papers, was supposed to go to Ottawa will now remain in the best location for it, North Bay, Ontario. I am very happy that the people of North Bay will not have to go through the same ordeal that the people of Summerside are now going through. Now that the Minister of National Defence knows the cost of transferring the 413 Search and Rescue Squadron from Summerside to Greenwood, will he apply the same standard used at North Bay and leave the 413 squadron at its best and most economic location at CFB Summerside?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the change in 414 was a change in the number of aircraft included in that squadron. That meant there was an additional cost for infrastructure which was not identified at the time of the Budget because of additional aircraft being placed in that squadron.

If we can get to the question to which I am sure the hon. member would appreciate an answer, the relocation of 413 to Greenwood will serve the maritime region, will continue to provide search and rescue services to the province of Prince Edward Island and will continue in the most cost-effective and operationally effective manner in the best area of Atlantic Canada, that of Greenwood, where it was located in 1968.

Mr. McGuire: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Minister knows that 80 per cent of the rescue operations which have taken place over the past year have taken place in the general area of CFB Summerside in the gulf, while 20 per cent of the rescue operations took place in the new location which is Greenwood, Nova Scotia. I cannot understand how he can say that Greenwood, Nova Scotia, is a better operational base than CFB Summerside.

Since the decision to close the base has not yet been reversed, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that in six months' time, the tracker surveillance which does 600 of the 900 hours of surveillance presently being done in Atlantic Canada will be gone, would the Minister of Fisheries tell the fishermen of Atlantic Canada who will be doing the fishery surveillance in Atlantic Canada? What is the projected cost of this surveillance and where will the surveillance operation be based?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I should remind my hon. friend and colleagues that the decision to end the tracker service was a decision taken by my colleague, the Minister of National Defence, because of the obsolescence of the aircraft. I can assure the hon. member that a full replacement surveillance capability will be installed before the trackers are removed, and I will have further details on that within the next few weeks.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The Minister has said repeatedly that no Canadian family with an income of less than $30,000 a year would be worse off because of his new tax. Our figures from Statistics Canada indicate clearly that 300,000 two-parent families with children are going to end up paying more in taxes than they will get back from the credit.

• (1450)

How can the minister justify picking the pockets of poor Canadians with this very unfair tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of elements in that calculation. The hon. member has mentioned one. She has mentioned the goods and services tax credit. There is also the reduction in the middle-income tax rate. There is also the permanent increase in indexation related to the one-time only inflation impact that we expect from the tax. Those combined are what is behind the statement I made as to the impact on families earning less than $30,000.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, none of that has anything to do with the sales tax. The only way that the government can come up with these figures is by cooking its own books.

Would the minister confirm today that 300,000 Canadian families with children will be worse off when this tax is instituted? That is the bottom line.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): No, Mr. Speaker, I will not say that. The hon. member referred to sales tax. The whole point I have been trying to make to this House is that it is not a sales tax, it is a sales tax system. It involves the goods and services tax, the goods and services tax credit, the reduction in the middle-income rate, the housing rebate, the payment that is made to small business to help offset the compliance costs plus the exemption on groceries. All of these are designed to provide very clear benefits that will improve the competitive position of the Canadian economy, that will allow us to get on with reducing the deficit, and also that will improve the fairness of the tax system, particularly to those low-income people to whom the hon. member has referred.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the crisis that faces the Canadian dairy industry today as a result of the yogurt and ice cream decision.

Last year the Minister of Agriculture promised dairy farmers across the country that they had nothing to fear from the free trade deal because he would be protecting the underpinning of marketing boards by transferring ice cream and yogurt and similar dairy products from the tariff list to the import control list.

We now know that this was not provided for in the free trade deal. The United States challenged it immediately and the challenge has been sustained.

I want to know why the government misled Canadian dairy farmers by saying that it would protect the marketing boards, when in fact it has not.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is inadvertently, I am sure, misleading the House when he makes that suggestion. This has nothing to do whatsoever with the free trade agreement. It has everything to do with GATT.

As a matter of fact, Article 11 was enshrined in the free trade agreement to ensure that supply-managed systems would be protected now and in the future. This is a GATT ruling. It was a very narrow ruling based upon an interpretation of like product. The panel determined that yogurt and ice cream were not like products and therefore did not impede the maintenance of the supply-management system for raw milk.

We have taken exception to that particular ruling. It has to be ratified by the total council. We have met with the industry and have worked out a strategy wherein we intend to pursue this with all the vigour that we can. The Minister of International Trade and the Minister of Agriculture are seized with this issue in consultation with the dairy industry. I think that the dairy industry is fully satisfied with the actions that we have taken to date.

Mr. Foster: This is not a GATT problem. It is a problem created by the free trade agreement. The minister knows that.

The Minister of Agriculture promised Canadian dairy farmers that the underpinning of supply management would be protected by the transfer to the import control list. It has not worked. The Americans have challenged this and that challenge has been sustained.

When will the minister and the government live up to their commitment to Canadian dairy farmers to protect their supply-management system? He knows that the entire supply-management system is in jeopardy because of this decision.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, of course we are concerned by the GATT panel decision, and it is a GATT panel decision, not a free trade decision. The hon. member should make it very clear. The hon. member is a fair-minded man. The underpinnings, as contained under Article 11 of the GATT are enshrined in the free trade agreement. Article 11 is in fact the underpinning of supply management and it is in place both in GATT and in the free trade agreement. We are going to defend it. We are going to defend it on behalf of the farmers of Canada, the dairy farmers, chicken farmers and all of those who are desirous of maintaining supply-management systems in this country.

OLD AGE SECURITY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Last week members of the Prime Minister's own caucus stated quite clearly that universality is a thing of the past. In September of 1989, the National Council on Welfare stated:

> The clawback on child and elderly benefits is the most significant change in federal social policy in a generation because it marks the end of universality, a fundamental and long-standing principle of Canada's system of social benefits.

I ask the Prime Minister to explain the fairness in dismantling the old age security system and the family allowance system, thereby ending universality and replacing it with a tax grab on young families and senior citizens of a 9 per cent GST.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's premise in the question is simply untrue. The old age security system has not been dismantled in Canada, nor are we undermining the basic principles that underscore the family allowance or the old age security systems.

There is a fundamental principle here though and it is that the government believes that when Canadians are being asked to do something about the federal deficit, those of us who can afford to do so should be asked to carry the highest share of the burden. Those people who are most in need of assistance should be the ones who should be receiving the most.

The position taken by the opposition is that the wealthy should be immune from being asked to carry these burdens. What they are saying is that the top 4 per cent, in the case of senior citizens, should receive all of the benefits instead of being asked to carry some of the burden in trying to ensure that Canada's social programs can be maintained. We believe they are wrong.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I remind the Minister that his own appointed National Council on Welfare said on page 7 that a social program that delivers benefits to everyone and then collects them back from some recipients is not universality.

That is very clear from your own people you appointed to the welfare council. I say to the minister that you are discriminating against one-earner families—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put the questions through the Chair and to keep in mind the time.

Mr. Dingwall: My question to the minister is this: Why are you discriminating against one-earner families? You have a one-earner family—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. The Hon. Member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca has the floor.

FISHERIES

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries. It concerns a recent free trade dispute panel hearing on a GATT decision that was opposed to Canadian fish landings in the province of British Columbia.

The minister promised the House that every effort would be made by the Government of Canada to protect the west coast fisheries against U.S. attempts to stop landings in Canada. The Inside U.S. Trade Today statement says that the Canadian Government has lost its first appeal to the free trade panel.

I want the minister to stand up and tell the fisheries people in British Columbia that no jobs will be lost and that the ministry is prepared to end the free trade agreement if this deals goes through.

• (1500)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is dreaming in Technicolor if he thinks he will get my positive response to that question.

In fact, we have put in place new landing regulations in order to enhance our ability to conserve and properly manage our west coast salmon stock. A free trade panel was established at the request of the United States to review these measures. That panel has not yet reported and, until they do, no further discussion or comment is appropriate by a member of this government.

The Late Dan McKenzie

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, is the minister suggesting that Inside U.S. Trade Today and spokespersons out of the U.S. Department of Trade are incorrect in their interpretation that the panel has already met and the Canadian position has been totally rejected? Are you saying that you have not had a report to that effect in your office?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. minister heard the question and could respond.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that is yes, it is incorrect.

THE LATE DAN MCKENZIE

Mr. Speaker: It is my unhappy duty to advise the House that in view of the recent death of one of our very recent colleagues, there will be some appropriate statements given at this time.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today as we all pay tribute to the memory of a man who has been a symbol of dedicated service and continuing commitment to the constituents of the federal riding of Winnipeg—Assiniboine.

The people of Winnipeg—Assiniboine will miss Dan McKenzie greatly. It didn't matter which party was popular at election time, Dan always came through with flying colours because of his proven record of speaking out for the grass roots right across Canada.

The loss is hardest however for his wife Marion and children, Karen and John. We offer them our most sincere condolences.

Dan will be remembered as a member of Parliament who anyone could call on any time they needed help in dealing with government matters. He would respond to their requests in a straightforward manner. There was no hedging or dodging the issues with Dan McKenzie.

He often endangered his own political future in the pursuit of satisfying his constituents. Dan never wavered when he spoke in the House of Commons. He never gave a thought to the political consequences that might result from his frank and honest statements on actions of government. He could always be counted on in the House of Commons to add to the debate and often bring a message that reflected the views of ordinary blue collar Canadians in coffee shops, taxicabs and pubs.

Parliament was greatly enriched and as a result Canada served better because of the contributions Dan made in the House of Commons. Parliament needs more outspoken men and women prepared to stand up for the concerns of ordinary people.

In my relatively short time as a member of Parliament, my life has been enriched by the contributions of Dan McKenzie. I am proud to count Dan as a friend and colleague. I am sure Dan will always be remembered as one of the few outspoken members.

All of these qualities were clearly evident to the people of Winnipeg—Assiniboine when they elected him first in 1972 and sent him back to this House with enthusiasm at each subsequent election.

All members of Parliament express their condolences to his constituents who will miss the tradition he had established. More particularly, we offer our sympathy to his wife Marion and to John and Karen. May he rest in peace.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I too rise today in the House of Commons to pay tribute to Mr. Dan McKenzie who passed away suddenly on August 15, 1989.

Dan was not only a colleague; he was also a friend. When I was first elected in 1979, Dan was already a veteran on the Hill having been elected as a member of Parliament first in 1972.

I remember fondly his willingness to help out us new kids on the block, as he used to call us, in any way he could. As the years went on and as Dan and I worked on a number of issues together, it became very obvious to me, and I am sure other members of this House, that Dan McKenzie was no ordinary member of Parliament.

He was a true spokesman for his constituents of Winnipeg—Assiniboine, often risking his own political future to ensure that the views of his riding were well represented in this House. To say that Dan was an outspoken Member of Parliament is indeed an understatement. But when he spoke out, it was on issues of importance to his constituents. At the same time Dan always held a great respect for this House, recognizing the honour and privilege it is to be able to stand here and serve this country.

A letter which appeared recently in a local newspaper really sums up what I feel best describes Dan McKenzie, and I quote:

> —when all was said and done he was nothing short of a hero. If I could write his epitaph it would say, "he stood tall on principle when it was unfashionable to do so—Courage is easier to pronounce than it is to display—

To his wife Marion and two children, Karen and John, I would like to offer my sincere condolences and I would like to express on behalf of all colleagues of this House of Commons what I hope is their wish for happiness for the remaining family. Thank you very much.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute on behalf of colleagues in the House and particularly the Manitoba Conservative caucus members, the caucus in which Dan served for many years and a caucus he chaired for some period of time.

Dan McKenzie was elected as the Member of Parliament for Winnipeg—Assiniboine in 1972, a year when a number of us from that province came to this House. Prior to that Dan had been an employee with Manitoba Telephone Systems. As well, he had been a member of the Winnipeg city council. Dan was elected in 1972 and held that seat continuously until 1988 when he chose not to offer his name for election.

As has been mentioned, Dan held many firm views. Those views were often in the issues which dominated the agenda of this House through those years. Those firm views were often very controversial, and I think for the record it is also important to note that he often was in a minority, both within our caucus and also within the House, on a number of those issues. But as has also been mentioned, he held those views not only firmly but consistently.

We can all take a look at our careers here and at that for which we will possibly be remembered. Dan will be remembered for two things, I believe; first of all, service to his constituents. I think he taught a lot of us the value of service to constituents, and he did that not only with pride but tenaciously. I recall as Minister of Health if there was an issue relating to pensions or family allowance, Dan would be at my doorstep immediately looking after the interests of his constituents. It was I think in that service in which his political success also lay.

Additionally, I think Dan will be remembered for his loyalty to Canada's armed services and particularly the membership he held in the Royal Canadian Legion. He spent many happy hours with his colleagues reminiscing not only of that war service but also the country as they saw it develop.

So may I, on behalf of all of us, extend our condolences to his widow Marion and to his children.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I too rise as my party's regional whip for northern and western Canada, from where the deceased member, Mr. Dan McKenzie came, so that I may also convey my colleagues' and my family's profound sympathy and condolence to his family, to his wife, to his children and to his many friends for his service to the constituency and for his service to our country.

• (1510)

Death is the one chapter in the human journey that erases barriers and differences among people, even when we have differed. I am honoured to convey my colleagues' deepest sympathy to his family for the great loss.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, both as a Member of Parliament from Winnipeg and as a member of the New Democratic Party, I would like to join with my colleagues in remembering the life and work of Dan McKenzie.

Those of you who knew him, and you are many, will know that Dan was a very partisan guy, and I have no illusions that he belonged to my fan club or I to his. We often disagreed. I can imagine, if it is in the nature of things for people to know what is said after them, what Dan might be thinking about the fact that I am even on my feet.

I think, however, it is appropriate to remember the things that unite Members of Parliament in this institution, even though we disagree, and sometimes quite vociferously, with each other. I can remember many occasions on which I would receive mail from Winnipeg in which people would write: "You and Dan McKenzie are the only two sticking up for us," and these kinds of things. What did it refer to? Well, it referred to Dan's concern about veterans and pensioners. It is in that respect that I think so many Members of Parliament have come together and have worked together.

Despite all the differences, I think we are called upon to respect each other as members of Parliament and members of this institution and to take cognizance, as we are here today, when one of our colleagues has died.

On behalf of my colleagues, I extend our condolences to Dan's family and recognize the work which his constituents recognized time and time again in re-electing him.

Mr. Speaker: I ask hon. members to rise for one minute of silence.

[Whereupon the House stood in silence].

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-29, an act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock p.m., the hon. member for Skeena had completed his speech. The question and comment period following the hon. member's speech is now available to members, otherwise the Chair is prepared to recognize hon. members for debate. The hon. minister on questions and comment.

Mr. Oberle: Mr. Speaker, I will not want to prolong the debate, having had a chance yesterday to say my piece, but I would be remiss if I did not thank the hon. member for Skeena for the incredible service that he has given to my work. As he and others know, us authors sometimes have difficulties getting our works recognized. The hon. member has quoted liberally and extensively from my publication entitled The Green Ghetto and I will send him another copy with my autograph. Incidentally, it is used widely throughout the country for fund-raising purposes. If the hon. member wants to use it for that purpose, he has my permission.

What I do not appreciate is having my record and that of my party mixed up with that of the previous Liberal administration. The hon. member was quite wrong when he said that nothing happened after The Green Ghetto was published and after the Progressive Conservative government came into being in 1984.

A lot happened, as he knows, in our province. The forestry resource development agreement was entered into which spent three times as much money as we ever spent before; $300 million. Quite an impressive record. One hundred and sixty-four million trees were planted in British Columbia; 137,000 hectares were planted; 871,000 hectares put in a management regime were surveyed. That is an incredible success story. We committed $31 million to a research facility in UBC, quite an impressive record.

Not only that, but the Prime Minister, immediately after the cabinet was appointed in 1984, appointed a minister of state for forestry who was immediately made responsible for filling the promise that was made previously, to organize and co-ordinate the activities of the federal government in forestry and to set in motion what we did in 1960 under the Right Hon. John George Diefenbaker. You have a full federal department of forestry.

If the NDP had their way what they would be doing, I suppose, would be shutting down all the industry. There would not even be enough paper left to print their protest placards. They would have to carve it all in stone plates again. All I want to tell the hon. member is that it has been a long time since Moses, and a lot has happened.

I do want, in a positive way, to appreciate the positive attitude that he brought to the debate. I know I can rely on his support as we begin to go on to even bigger and better things.

Mr. Fulton: The minister sounds like he is quite keen on Bill C-29. I guess he did not listen too carefully, but he is right on one point. I was interested in listening to the Liberals in the House today talking about where they really stand on this issue because during the 1984 federal election their current leader in fact came to Prince George, British Columbia, to a community dependent on forestry, and said that the Liberals were against, and I guess would continue to be against, a full department of forests. So I will have to listen with interest to how they try to set that part of that record straight.

As to the minister's remarks that an NDP government would shut the industry all down and so on, I know the minister knows better than that. That is basically what has happened to his shop, under the present Prime Minister. He has not been given the levels of funding that there should be at the federal level. As a matter of fact his budget has been cut by $28 million since last year. Of course there is no money there for the next phase of FRDA. As they say it is going to have to come from western diversification.

As you will recall from this morning, Mr. Speaker, I pointed out rather well the shell game that the minister is trying to get into with his friend Dave Parker from B.C. although I think Dave Parker has the minister cornered now. The provinces are very clear. They are prepared to enter a $1 billion, that is a one thousand million dollar, five-year FRDA. The premier is on the record and the Minister of Forests is on the record. It would be irresponsible of the minister not to make sure that $500 million comes forward from the federal level so that we see that kind of a five-year FRDA go ahead.

I do not object to British Columbia putting more money in. The minister has quite correctly time and again in B.C. pointed out that with the replacement stumpage regime for the 15 per cent unnecessary countervail brought in by the Conservative government on behalf of the United States, many hundreds of millions have been collected. Stumpage in many areas such as the minister's own riding has gone from around $1 a cunit to anywhere from $7 to $20 a cunit that is being paid. So stumpage has gone up dramatically and Victoria has a great deal of money.

When the minister talks about the department and talks about where this bill is going to take us, I think we should keep in mind that there are not enough foresters and there is not enough technical equipment with the minister's department to complete an adequate inventory of what our forests really are.

The minister should keep a few things in mind. The same amount of forest in recent years has been lost to fire, insects and disease as has been harvested; something Canadians should be reminded of time again. Half of the harvested forest in Canada is not regenerating properly. There you have another half. We are already down to almost a quarter of the quality forest lands that we have.

The backlog of not satisfactorily restocked land is 25 million hectares. That is probably a very conservative estimate of what it is in this country now. Because of the GATT demand in every region of the country it will exceed supply by 1995, only five years from now. For every dollar generated by the forest industry in tax revenue, only five cents is returned. Of course, that is the combined return of the federal and provincial governments. That is not much of a return in terms of any other industry in the country.

Let us look at some of the other things the minister touched on in his question to me. In relation to inventories, the last inventory of Canada's forests was published in 1986 and prior to that in 1981. I hope the minister is not suggesting that we will not have another inventory nationally published until 1991.

Mr. Oberle: Next year.

Mr. Fulton: The minister is on the record now. He says it will be published next year, a complete inventory. That will be the tabling of the inventory.

I would point out to the minister that the problem with the current inventory information system being used by the federal and provincial governments is that some of the physical count information on which the inventory is based is 40 years old and the average on which the entire inventory is based is now almost 15 years old. We are dealing with terribly antiquated systems, terribly antiquated base information.

Even the latest information includes some startling facts. Fifty-five million hectares of forest land in Canada is not yet inventoried. We have never had a professional forester look at it. There is a total of 453 million hectares of forest land in the country. Over 500 million hectares of forest land in Canada was idle as recently as 1976 because it had just been burned over, and 200,000 hectares were gobbled up by pests.

We know that the Auditor General reminded the government what needed to be done but it looks like so far, and I would like to stress this point, the minister has been losing the battles in Cabinet. One thing I like to do from this side of the House is, through debate and through the minister, remind those reckless colleagues in cabinet, and in particular, the reckless Prime Minister.

I am sure if a reporter stopped the Prime Minister outside of the House today and asked him what is the largest industry in Canada, he would get it wrong. He would suspect that it was something other than forestry. He might think it was Gucci shoe sheds, or he might think it was agriculture—not a bad mistake to make but terribly erroneous.

He certainly has not recognized his responsibility fiscally in terms of the support he should be giving to the full ministry of forests in terms of budget, staff, technical equipment and funding for universities and inventories. It simply has not been done.

Let me give another example. I know you are interested in factual examples so that the people of Canada know just how badly this Conservative government is handling forest issues. Let me use my own province as an example. Between 1979 and 1987 the annual cut volumes increased in B.C. by 20 per cent while employment dropped by 25 per cent. The minister did not have much to say about that while he was speaking yesterday. Since 1950, in B.C. volume cut has increased 400 per cent and employment over all, over almost 40 years, by 22 per cent.

In 1950 B.C. had 2.64 jobs for every thousand cubic metres harvested. In 1986 the same thousand cubic metres produced only nine-tenths of one job. By contrast, California creates 5.2 jobs per thousand cubic metres harvested and Sweden generates 2.7 jobs per thousand cubic metres of wood harvested.

I am sure my friend from New Brunswick or my friend from Quebec, who sit on the forestry committee, would very much like to see this legislation amended so that we could get some kind of tie between areas that are harvested and the rate of reforestation, the kind of mixed ecological, biological reseeding and tending that should go on in those areas. We would like to see it tied to value added. I certainly trust that the government side will assist in properly amending this legislation which really needs to be amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no other member I would love to listen to more, if there was more time and we would be able to give him more time.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak this afternoon on Bill C-29, legislation to establish a new department of forestry in Canada.

I would like to just take a moment to make a point that the hon. member for Restigouche, the Liberal critic for forestry, commented on this morning when he criticized this bill as merely establishing the department of forestry. I would like to point out that this bill, which re-establishes the department of forestry in 1989, follows on the heels of the first department of forestry which was established by a conservative government back in 1960. A New Brunswicker by the name of the Hon. Hugh John Fleming was the first Minister of Forestry at that time.

I would like to make the point as well that in 1966 the department of forestry was diminished into a department of forestry and rural development and then in 1969 it was further diminished into the department of fisheries and forestry. Then in 1971 the Liberal government placed it under the jurisdiction of the department of the environment where it resided until 1984 when this government reappointed a minister of state for forestry and proceeded in the directions that we now are establishing with this bill.

I think that history reveals that it has been conservative governments, both the conservative government in 1960 and this conservative government in 1984 and 1989, that have acted to recognize, through a full department of forestry and a full minister of forestry, the very great importance of this resource and all it represents to Canada; a total of $40 billion in annual shipments, 800,000 jobs, capital expenditures of $6.4 billion, and all that flows from those facts and factors.

I would also like to take a moment to comment on some of the words of the hon. member for Skeena in his remarks. I think he also should be congratulated for recognizing the contribution of The Green Ghetto which our present Minister of Forestry authored several years ago and about which the hon. member for Skeena spoke with some disparaging inference. I would just like to say that for all of the wonderful factual words the member for Skeena delivers to this House, few, if any, have ever led to anything concrete, positive and creative, nothing to be compared at all to the creation of The Green Ghetto which has led the hon. Mr. Oberle through his years in this House to the point where he is now about to become the first full-fledged Minister of Forestry for Canada in almost three decades.

We have heard how vital the forestry sector is to Canada. I would like to speak about what a giant of an industry it is in Atlantic Canada. In New Brunswick the forest sector provides 38,000 jobs, that is one out of every seven jobs in the province. The forest industry has been an integral part of New Brunswick's way of life since the late 18th century. Today the economic importance of the forest is immense to our province.

The value of all forest products shipped within and outside New Brunswick total $1.9 billion per year, representing 40 per cent of all our manufacturing shipments and 47 per cent of the province's total exports. It accounts for 7.4 per cent of our gross domestic product. Close to half of New Brunswick's extensive forests belong to the provincial Crown and are harvested by leasing to forest companies.

Again, the hon. member for Skeena made a disparaging remark about the New Brunswick legislation and the New Brunswick approach to forestry. Again, he has missed the facts of the situation because in the management legislation pertaining to the Crown forests in New Brunswick, the New Brunswick Crown Lands and Forest Act, the structure, the system and the approach is established as the best example toward sustained forestry and sustainable development in all of Canada and has been acclaimed by experts throughout Canada and North America in those respects.

I would suggest to him that he go to New Brunswick and check his facts. He will find an approach to sustainable development that is well out in front of many of the experiences that obviously he has had. I would urge him to read the Dr. Baskerville paper on sustainable development in New Brunswick forests which I have sent to him and which he obviously has not read, or at least has not remembered. I think he will agree, when he has apprised himself of those facts in that paper and all the facts on the ground in New Brunswick, that the New Brunswick Crown Lands Act is a model of government legislation toward sustainable development in forestry in this country.

The federal government in recognition of the contribution which New Brunswick makes to forests and forestry has just recently completed the new federal co-operation agreement for forestry, an agreement that will commit $91 million between the federal and provincial governments to forestry over the next five years in New Brunswick with a federal contribution of $50 million. That new agreement will have a special emphasis on the 36,000 private woodlots which are such an integral and important part of forestry in New Brunswick.

In that respect, Mr. Speaker, again in recognition of the deep commitment which our present Minister of Forestry has to forests throughout Canada, to the private woodlots of Canada, I would like to emphasize the action which he has taken this spring and summer in New Brunswick where, in anticipation of the delays and extensive changes required through the new co-operation agreement structure of federal-provincial financing which has been a fact of life in this year, 1989, he made a $2.5 million commitment to the private woodlot producers in New Brunswick. He assured them—literally putting his neck beyond the ground that most ministers would be prepared to cover—that he would provide to them the kind of ministerial assurance that would permit them to bank their activities for almost a whole year's work in reforestation and silviculture in anticipation of the agreement which now is about to be signed. For that I would like, on behalf of all New Brunswickers, to extend sincere appreciation to the minister for the commitment he has made and for the commitment he has delivered.

I would now like to go on to Nova Scotia where the forest sector is also an economic mainspring. In Nova Scotia, the value of all forest shipments approach $825 million per year. That constitutes 17 per cent of all manufacturing shipments in Nova Scotia, and represents 2.8 per cent of the Gross Domestic Product of that province. It constitutes 24 per cent of the total provincial exports, and a total number of 17,000 Nova Scotians are employed in the forest industry.

One of the big features of forestry in Nova Scotia is that it is in many respects a family affair with about 76 per cent of the forests in Nova Scotia being privately owned. One of those energetic parts of the entire forest industry in Nova Scotia is the Christmas tree industry. Nova Scotia's Christmas tree industry mainly uses balsam fir. About a third is cut by big operators with 500 to 2,500 acres in holdings, another third by medium-sized operators with lots averaging 100 to 400 acres and the remainder from small woodlots of less than 100 acres.

The people of the industry have that old Nova Scotia virtue of self-reliance. The industry benefits from research and technical assistance on disease and insect control. But the men and women in the industry in Nova Scotia are not looking for grants or hand-outs. In fact, they have conscientiously and publicly refused anything that smacks of a subsidy.

There are about 2,500 Christmas tree growers in Nova Scotia, Mr. Speaker, and most are woodlot operators who do other kinds of growing. About 95 per cent of the crop is exported to the United States, representing a $30 million economic activity annually, providing 500 full-time jobs and up to 3,000 part-time jobs.

Every year these Nova Scotians cut and ship 1,750,000 Christmas trees. They make and ship upwards to 300,000 wreaths, and about 50,000, 25 pound bails of brush. The Christmas tree business and the Christmas tree forest industry is a big thing to Nova Scotia. The federal government has recognized the value of forestry in Nova Scotia. Over the past five years it has contributed a total of $57.7 million toward forest management and renewal with a new agreement now in the latter stages of negotiation.

In Prince Edward Island, Canada's smallest province, a lot of woodland during the 1920s and 1930s was cleared for farming. The stands that were left were allowed to decline and have become overgrown with white spruce, poplar and white birch. These are species with limited commercial value. They are now overly mature and susceptible to disease and insects.

These stands are now being replaced by stands of more commercially useful species such as black spruce, white pine and eastern larch. The plan is to manage these new stands on a sustainable basis.

What is happening to the old stands that have been cleared away? That wood is being used in an interesting biomass conversion project. It is, in fact, chipped and fuels Charlottetown's district heating system which heats much of the city's downtown core. This was the first such system in the entire country and is an example of the creativity of islanders.

The forestry sector is important to the island. It employs 2 per cent of the labour force and generates $1.4 million in exports.

In Newfoundland, the forest industry provides 10,000 jobs. It represents 6 per cent of the total labour force. One in eighteen workers depend on forestry. Exports alone come to $372 million, or 25 per cent of all exports from the province.

Again, federal-provincial co-operation have been the watchwords. Since fiscal year 1986-87, the federal government has contributed $24.6 million toward forest management and renewal under the Canada-Newfoundland Forest Resource Development Agreement.

This year, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency signed a $53 million agreement with Newfoundland to benefit Labrador; $6 million of which involves the development of the forest industry in the Goose Bay region around the upper and lower Churchill Falls.

Forestry Canada is co-operating in that initiative. It is working with the provincial Forestry Department in Newfoundland to accomplish some specific things: first, to carry out a forest inventory of the region; second, to establish a forest management program for the region; and, lastly, to perform an environmental sensitivity analysis which will allow us to cut in a way that is reconcilable with the principles of sustainable development.

This region of Labrador, where there is almost no cutting now, is a region that will help Canada meet the anticipated jump in world demand for our forest products. The program in Labrador is an example of federal-provincial co-operation.

But Mr. Speaker, there is a lot more. This is just a sample of what sustainable development will be like. We can see how Canadians are facing up to the trade challenges of the next century as they prepare to increase their productivity while preserving the environment.

There is an important message in that program. Before making major cuts, we must analyse any relevant data to minimize the impact of operations on the environment and to ensure optimum economic spin-offs for the regions.

That approach will meet the future needs of Canadians. Through federal–provincial co–operation, we will decide on the best course to follow before taking action.

[English]

I have tried to show how important the forest sector is to Atlantic Canada. What we do in Atlantic Canada is a mirror, a model for the rest of the country. In a region where most economic activity flows from nature's gifts, every initiative that protects nature will be enthusiastically embraced.

Others have talked about the need to ensure environmentally sustainable economic development. There is not an Atlantic Canadian for whom that notion does not have special meaning. How can we extend that model and pursue that concept in a national manner across Canada? How can we bring ten provinces and two territories and the federal government to some semblance of a common approach? How can we motivate industry to participate in a consistent manner with all jurisdictions? How can we exert a parallel influence on private industrial land and smaller woodlots? How can we establish sustained development in all of Canada's forests?

The federal government recognizes that most forests are provincial responsibilities. It realizes that each jurisdiction will probably have its own unique options to consider. But there can be an integrated approach and a common commitment to the principles of sustainable development in our forests.

For example, the Council of Provincial Resource Ministers is certainly one avenue for this approach. In particular, I believe the new federal department of forestry should have a binding role to play, to be the glue in the process, much in the same manner as it has consistently provided research and development assistance to the provinces in such areas as forest biology, fire control, and insecticide and herbicides treatment. The Canadian Forest Service can build on the New Brunswick model and the Labrador model to help the rest of the country in specific ways; first, by co–ordinating technological practices with regard to such things as forest inventories and geographic information systems. It is a fact that consistent forest data is difficult to obtain for all 10 provinces in any integrated manner.

The federal department of forestry can help to develop common methods for analyzing management problems. The federal department of forestry can write model specifications on both environmental and developmental goals for adoption by each province within their respective jurisdictions leading to sustainable development.

The Government of Canada could help set an example with more sustained development of its own lands. This might necessarily require extensive consolidation for forest management responsibilities among such departments as Forestry, Environment, Indian Affairs, Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Department of National Defence.

As well, industrial development and international marketing functions for forest products might well be integrated eventually within the new department of forestry so that the concepts of finished product and added value would be in context and harmony with the state and the management of the resource itself.

Sustained development demands that we marry the end uses to the available resources. Such a transfer of these responsibilities from the present Department of Industry, Science and Technology would provide the forestry minister with a vital and consistent linkage to the forest industry and would extend his opportunities for influencing industrial participation in the process of sustained management of our forests right across Canada.

The present administration of federal—provincial forestry agreements should be intensified under the forestry minister, preferably on longer–term schedules to match the nature of the forest resource than is the case for the present five–year cycles. His influence in terms of a national program for sustained development can be made to reach Canada's private woodlot owners who are among the primary beneficiaries of the funding agreement.

In these and other ways, Mr. Speaker, the federal minister of forestry can play an important guiding role for sustained development in Canada's forests. It seems a special opportunity that, at almost the same moment in history when the concepts of sustained development have come to the fore of public consciousness about our forests, the federal government has given rebirth to a national department of forestry.

Our job now is to pass this legislation to create this department of forestry, and then to embark upon the road that the standing committee on forestry has already anticipated when, on May 31, we reached agreement in principle for an approach to a list of the kinds of examinations to help to develop on a national basis in Canada, hopefully to assist the minister of forestry and the staff of the department of forestry, in building, flowering and flourishing their future role on behalf of this most important of Canada's resources.

I would like to read two or three of the subject areas that we propose to address to the new department of forestry in terms of promoting public awareness of and support for the significance of Canada's forest resources in all aspects: economical, environmental, ecological and recreational. They are co-operating with provinces and industry to develop the highest standards of intensive forest management on a multiple use and sustainable development basis for all forest lands in Canada; co-operating with the provinces and industry to develop the highest potential of manufacturing technology and added-value utilization for Canada's forest resources; maintaining and expanding the research and development activities of the Canadian Forestry Service, by directing intensive management of federal forest lands on a multiple-use sustainable-development basis; and co-ordination and co-operation with all of the other government departments—Environment, Parks Canada for wildlife, migratory birds, pesticides, herbicides, and so on.

They also include co-ordinating with Agriculture with respect to herbicides and pesticides, with Indian and Northern Affairs, with Fisheries and Oceans, with National Defence, with International Trade, with Industry, Science and Technology, with Energy, Mines and Resources, with the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Western Diversification Fund. In all of these manners the new department of forestry can help to lead the way for the enhancement and the sustainabililty for for the long, long-term future of Canada's forests.

We should now be ready in all areas of Canada to do something about sustainable development in our forests. With Bill C-29, when we get it passed and passed quickly, when we get this new department alive and in action, we will take a big step forward. Now let us get on with the job.

Mr. Bélair: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member from Fredericton on his speech. There are a number of issues that the member forgot to address—I do not know if it was intentional or not—namely, the decrease of 11.9 per cent budget dollars for this year's forestry department.

Would the member not agree that if we are going to have a strong forestry department in Canada that at least we should have the budget to support it?

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, I think that in due course we will have the budget to support it. I have some figures here that I would like to use to respond to the very legitimate question.

As I said in my remarks, we, on the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries of which the hon. member is a member, discussed the fact that this legislation was the beginning. It was to give rebirth to the structure of the department of forestry. It is really a very short piece of legislation and does not have the encompassing purposes which we will some day see the department of forestry co-ordinating in the near term and perhaps in due course fully conducting on behalf of the Government of Canada.

The Main Estimates, however, for 1989-90 do not take into account the resources which have been negotiated as part of the process in establishing the new department of forestry. In addition to those figures I am told that 35 person years and $1.7 million have been transferred from Agriculture Canada. As well, the new Department will receive an additional 30 person years and $2.3 million in operating funds this year with an additional 30 to 45 person years in 1990. Forestry Canada this year has received $2.5 million in additional funding for research and development. This will increase by another $5 million next year. Forestry Canada has also received 37 person years for this year to help wind down the recently expired forestry agreements.

So there have been some significant numbers and person years not contained in the Main Estimates that are at work in the transition from Forestry Canada to the new department of forestry at this time. As I say, in terms of developing and broadening the influence, the scope and the impact of this department over future years in the subject areas that we have discussed on the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries I see that it will grow in significant stature, influence and in the impact it will have on Canada's forestry sector and in the creation of our best example of sustainable development.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments of the member from Fredericton, who is also a member of the forestry committee, as well as to some of the earlier comments made by the member from Skeena, who I think has brought forward a very enlightened view about forestry from a biological perspective. His concerns that he certainly had both as a forestry critic and currently as our party's environment critic are well known.

I have two questions for the member. The first one concerns his wrap-up comments. He suggested that this Bill needs some work and that we are to do some studying for the flowering role that we anticipate from the department. In light of the fact that it has taken some five years for this government to finally introduce this legislation based on a commitment made during the 1984 election campaign, I am wondering if this government's definition of a flowering role is as immediate as the definition prior to that. Will it take five years for us to see that?

Second, I am interested in knowing the member's comments in terms of the representations that have been made to the committee and earlier when this legislation was introduced to the hon. government House Leader inquiring about the opportunity for the forest committee to have a chance to travel the country to hear Canadians' views on this legislation. The Canadian Institute of Forestry, which I believe is monitoring the debate today, has called for that. I wonder if the member from Fredericton would join with us in supporting that call from the CIF.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first question, this bill merely establishes the department of forestry. While I use the word "merely" I do so advisedly because it is in reality a very profound commitment, a very profound creation of a full-fledged federal government department. That must be accomplished before we can start to address the purposes that it will serve in the future. As I said earlier, Liberal governments over a period of almost 15 years dismantled the federal department of forestry which was established in 1960. This government over the past five years has delivered on its commitment. It has delivered on its commitment to create a department of forestry.

That is the starting point we must have in order to pursue the purposes which the hon. member from Prince George has proposed and referred to subsequently, that being the opportunity for the standing committee to travel the country to hear from the Canadian Institute of Forestry and from the forestry sector broadly, to hear all who are interested in forestry and the environment, about the kinds of purposes which the federal department of forestry can ultimately fulfil. Yes, I would support such a mission by the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries. I have already indicated I would support it.

In fact, I did inquire of the government, as we had committed to do, about the prospects of having this bill referred to the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries. I have been advised that the government would prefer to see it dealt with in the normal legislative committee format that it has quickly offered to ensure that every member of the standing committee who wishes to participate on that legislative committee will be invited to do so. So I think we have delivered on the spirit of the undertakings which we unanimously agreed to in the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries.

I would urge the House and particularly the members on the standing committee, to support the referral of this bill to a legislative committee and to support the passage of the bill as quickly as possible. Then let us take this new department of forestry and go on the road across Canada as a mission to determine how we can best use that department to influence sustainable development in forestry for the good of all Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is a minute and a half left.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member from Fredericton on his most comprehensive address. I am not at all surprised that he would provide a comprehensive address in view of the fact that he has extensive experience in the field as a former minister of natural resources in New Brunswick.

I particularly appreciate his comments with respect to the Christmas tree industry in Nova Scotia, a $30–million industry which sees approximately 1.75 million trees exported annually from our province. I would like to advise all members that two–thirds of those trees come from my South Shore riding.

Some of the things that we are looking forward to in our forest products industries on the South Shore are the possibilities with respect to marketing and, indeed, with respect to research. I wonder if the hon. member might just expand on his remarks with respect to what he sees as the role of this new department regarding marketing and research.

Mr. Bird: Mr. Speaker, presently there is a very extensive overlap among many federal government departments with respect to forestry. I mentioned them in my remarks. With respect to marketing and research, and I presume research in marketing and research in commercial activities, a great deal of that presently is in the terms of reference of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology and the Department of International Trade. Certainly, the Canadian Forestry Services had a great deal to do as well with the preparation of the stock and the silvicultural preparation of the trees for marketing. I think there is an integration of activity required there. I believe that those are the kinds of things that our standing committee and others can help to influence favourably upon the future of the new department of forestry once we have it established and under way.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before giving the floor to the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Parkdale—High Park (Mr. Witer)—External Affairs—Crisis in China—Mandate of United Nations—Evacuation plans for Canadians in China; the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus)—Transportation—VIA Rail services—Government position; the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall)—Health—Thalidomide—Task Force report—Compensation for victims—Request for early announcement.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C–29, an act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am especially pleased to have an opportunity to speak on Bill C–29, the government's bill to establish a department of forestry. I say to the minister, even though he is five years late that we support the initiative, albeit five years down the pipe. We think that forestry is the most important industry in the country, that a department of forestry, if it is adequately funded and provided for with the minister having control of all the factors relating to forestry, can have a tremendous impetus for good in this country. It is our number one industry. It is bigger than the petroleum industry. It is bigger than the automobile industry. It employs more people.

More important, Mr. Speaker, it is the key industry in many of the northern areas of this country where there is no chance, or very little chance, of establishing an automobile plant such as we have in southern Ontario. So it is an industry that is really on the move.

Through the 1970s and 1980s, when the Liberal government was in office, we put in place massive programs to upgrade. I think of my own constituency of Algoma where we provided some $25 million along with the province of Ontario to upgrade the Eddy Forest plant in Espanola to bring it into line with modern environmental demands. It increased efficiency and improved the productivity of that plant.

We provided assistance under the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion to put in place the most productive sawmill at Nairn Centre, part of the Eddy industry, which produces today over 200 million board–feet of lumber, an amount unheard of in eastern Canada only 25 years or so ago. It certainly has the largest productive capacity in eastern Canada.

Those programs were good. The several hundred million dollars which the former government put in place spawned investment by the private sector of $1.6 billion to modernize and update that industry. There is no question about the importance of this industry. What a tremendous contribution it makes in terms of jobs and technological development. The beauty is that it is a renewable resource. It is not like a mine where you dig the mineral out of the ground once and it is gone. If we properly husband the forest resources of our country; if we provide the research back-up, if we provide the tools for reforestation and research, it will continue to be the most important industry in our country, not only in jobs but export, balance of payments and so on.

This initiative of Bill C-29 can be very important and very productive. Unfortunately, if you look at this bill, look at the rhetoric of the Minister of Forestry, then look at the budget, and look at what the government has done in the past four years and how long it has taken them to do it, you cannot be sure of that. Some people in the industry say: "Look, when I am dealing with a trade problem, I want to deal with the Minister for International Trade. When I am dealing with a tax problem, I want to deal with the Minister of Finance". So, although the bill is there, the department will be there, it will only be effective if the minister has clout, if the minister has the power in the cabinet, if the minister has the influence of the Minister of Finance to ensure that things happen in this industry and if there is that over-all power to co-ordinate the activities that are necessary for the forest industry.

Let us just look at a few of these items. It is very unreassuring. I, along with the Member for Cochrane—Superior, and four or five other members of our caucus from northern Ontario, were members of a task force last winter which travelled across northern Ontario and talked to the forest industry. One segment of that industry, the softwood lumber industry, is in peril of being destroyed. It is a very important industry with tremendous resources in this country. We are very productive, we could compete with the world. Certainly, we can compete with the United States. It is in terrible jeopardy because it was a pawn in the free trade negotiations.

In December 1985, the government gave to the United States, as part of the negotiation of the free trade deal, an export tax that was not indexed to the value of the Canadian dollar. Therefore, that industry's exports to the United States have been reduced from 34 per cent of the American market to 26 per cent. Many plants in northern Ontario have shut down. Many are on short shift. Many having given up selling softwood lumber to the United States. The government has implemented other programs for transportation which have been very harmful to the industry. The industry is under at least a 30 to 35 per cent disadvantage from what it was before the export tax went into place.

We recommended to the minister that the export tax be renegotiated immediately so that that industry could continue to prosper, or if the government in the United States refuses to negotiate that they unilaterally rescind the tax and let the chips fall where they may. The industry is being wiped out in any event. If the Americans were to countervail, it probably would not be any worse than the existing situation which makes it almost impossible for northern Ontario mills to operate.

I was delighted and pleased because the Member for Cochrane—Superior drew to my attention a press clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of July 27 in which the Minister of Forestry said that the government was reviewing the 15 per cent export tax because it had just been pointed out to him that there were over 100 layoffs in Renfrew County alone as a result of this. Speaking about the Americans, the minister said that we will present them with a proposition to test the ground before we send them a termination notice. I am delighted that at least the minister has admitted that there is a big, serious problem with the export tax. It has caused layoffs in northern Ontario, and people have been laid off. It is causing serious problems right across the country. What we want to see is the minister either complete that negotiation or give the termination notice.

This is where we get back to the whole question of clout. The minister says this, and the minister is an honourable man. Even though he is not in the House this afternoon, he is still an honourable man and I am sure he means it. I suspect that if the minister goes to his friend, the Prime Minister, or to the Minister of International Trade and tells them that he is going to unilaterally terminate the export tax agreement, they will politely tell him to buzz off. I do not think the minister has the clout to make that kind of decision. I hope he has, because I think that is the right move. Otherwise we are just knuckling under to the United States and our industry is being wiped out.

You can imagine what a reduction of 8 per cent of the United States market does, because that is a very vast market in the United States. It seems to me that we are big losers. I hope that the minister has the kind of clout that he needs to have a successful Department of Forestry and that he will move to remove that export tax because it is crippling northern Ontario.

The second area where I see that the whole question of strength and prestige of the minister is important is in the forestry agreements. For the past five years, we have had a forestry agreement in the province of Ontario, $150 million, shared by the two levels of government, designed to carry out the necessary reforestation and the necessary research to provide for sustainable development in the production and reforestation of our province.

Regardless of how gloriously the minister talks about these agreements, he has not been able to get the money to reinstate them. That is literally a tragedy. It is not just a tragedy for five years, or ten, or fifteen years. It is a tragedy into the future because it is important that those forestry agreements be maintained.

If we look at the arrangements, we cannot be confident that we are going to have a department and a minister with the necessary clout. For those forestry agreements, the funding comes down through the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion from the ACOA agreement and the Western Diversification Agreement and it just does not seem that the minister is in control. If he were, then those forestry agreements and the funding would be coming directly from his department and not through the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion.

In Ontario we have the FEDNOR agreement and the funding there comes from the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. We are told that the assistant deputy minister for that department is not even located in Ontario. He is located in Montreal in the province of Quebec.

Yet we have, in Sault Ste. Marie, the Great Lakes Forest Research Laboratory, one of the largest institutions in the country for research and the implementation of the Forestry Agreement is carried out from that laboratory. Surely we want the co-ordination for those agreements to be coming from the Minister of Forestry and not coming down through the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion.

If we look at the minister's funding, last year when the government brought in its spending estimates in the budget, it was indicated that the government would be spending in the 1988-89 fiscal year $9.9 billion, the largest budget in the history of Canada as far as the federal budget of $142.9 billion is concerned. There was an increase there of $9.9 billion dollars across the country. Yet, if we look at the Department of Forestry we see a decrease of $28 million.

That does not give anyone confidence that the creation of a Department of Forestry is going to be very powerful. If you remove the funding, regardless of all the names and all the rhetoric from the minister, but do not actually provide additional funding, or do not even give the minister the power to establish the forestry agreements, which, after all, are the agreements which really touch the forests and result in trees being planted, and new hybrid breeds being developed that touch on the whole forest industry and if they are all controlled by the minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, the minister responsible for ACOA, or the minister responsible for Western Diversification, it does not sound as if the minister has much ability to co-ordinate the activities of the department.

We are not only talking about a reduction in the forestry agreements. We are not only talking about a reduction in the budget of the Department of Forestry. We are talking about a reduction in the number of person years, a reduction of 47 person years. It does not sound like a department that is going anywhere if it is being reduced in the number of person years. Regardless of how fancy are the names we give it as a new Department of Forestry, which we are all pleased to see, we want to see the cash. You cannot really be effective unless you have the funds to carry out the responsibility.

Forestry has gone down by some 11.9 per cent in its budget. At the same time, other resource related departments, for example, Energy, Mines and Resources, has gone up by 22.9, almost double. It has gone up by twice as much as the Department of Forestry has gone down.

We are pleased to see a Department of Forestry created. We would certainly like to see a strong department with a minister with clout, to not only do the things that need to be done for this industry, but to co-ordinate what is going on already. Otherwise, we will be going over to the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion to find out what he is planning to do with the department and with these forestry agreements.

What we are concerned about is the government's attitude with regard to ERDA agreements—economic and regional development agreements—and that we are gradually going to be seeing a winnowing down. We will have a minister of departmental status and all this, but he will essentially be a little secretariat effectively running six labs across the country. That is not what we want. We want a minister who controls forestry agreements, controls the labs, has influence in cabinet, has influence on decisions with regard to finance, with regard to matters relating to export trade and with regard to manpower and research. There is simply no evidence that this is what we are going to get with the creation of this department.

First of all, it has taken five years to create it and it is not created yet. All the decisions with regard to export tax, forestry agreements, budget, and manpower, militate against this. We support the bill. We hope that it will be beneficial, but we want to see action. We want to see the government put its money where its mouth is. This is a key industry for us. It provides opportunities for our country in many different ways and it should be supported more than it has been by this government for the last four years.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize members for questions and comments, I believe the Hon. President of the Privy Council has a point of order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise to designate formally as opposition days, or allotted days, Thursday, September 28, and Monday, October 2. It is my understanding that there is a motion which will probably run the two days and it has been designated in that manner for the convenience of the opposition.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Lewis: I appreciate the technicality, Mr. Speaker. So that there is no misunderstanding, that is a government prerogative, I believe, to designate it, and while I am sure my hon. colleagues would agree with me, I do not want to find they disagree the next time.

Mr. Gauthier: Before we leave that point, Mr. Speaker, the minister also alluded to the debate of one motion that could take two days. That is a prerogative of the opposition to decide, and we will probably give notice to the House, as is required by the rules, tomorrow by five o'clock as to what the motion will be and whether it will take two days to debate. There is a lot of interest in it, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-29, an act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions and comments, the Hon. Member for Cariboo—Chilcotin.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Algoma had some serious things to say and I think he delivered them in a serious manner. I have to take exception to some of his comments, but I would like to mention a couple of comments right off the bat. He talked about the government attitude. I was in the forest industry for many years and I can tell you that the government attitude over the last four years has been a one thousand per cent improvement over what it was formerly. There have been many things done in co-operation with industry and with the provinces.

Some of his colleagues this morning, when talking about the forestry bill, said that the first thing they want to do is bring inspectors into the provinces as policemen to enforce what they think should be done with industry and the provinces. It is exactly that kind of action which created such a problem in prior years with the provinces and with the industry.

A typical answer—and I am distressed by it—is that they seem to want to dictate from Ottawa what the solutions are and then they want to take all the money they can and throw it up against the wall and see if it will stick. Their concrete suggestions so far are to throw more money at the bill. Have they not been listening to the people in Canada and what they have been saying? They are saying: "Please, government, don't spend more money unnecessarily."

There is nothing wrong with trying to achieve excellence, even in government. A small, trim, efficient forestry department can do far more than an inefficient, large government bureaucracy. They should be taking their energies, their expertise, and leading this nation in the forest industry. They can do that. The dollars should primarily come from industry and from the provinces where most of the benefit goes. What it requires is a co-operative government and leadership.

The point that I have to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is questions and comments.

Mr. Worthy: I have a question about free trade. He said in December 1985,that this government, as part of its free trade negotiations, gave away the memorandum of understanding. That is absolutely and totally incorrect.

• (1620)

I was one of the forestry executives who heard about the collaboration between industry, provincial governments, and the federal government. The industry spent millions of dollars lobbying Ottawa. It recognized the threat to the forest industry with the countervail. In fact, when it was finally resolved, the Conservative government went to the industry and said: "What shall we do? These are the options." It was industry that said: "We have to accept." It was our unions that said: "Yes, we have to accept." And it was our provincial governments that said: "Yes, we have to accept that. The deal that we can get there is better than the other options."

I would like to know why, in spite of the facts, you misrepresent so terribly the actual situations of the free trade deal and the memorandum of understanding.

Mr. Foster: I would be delighted to respond to the hon. member for Cariboo—Chilcotin. I had a telex from the vice-president of the Canadian Forest Industries Council in December, 1986—I am sorry I said 1985, it was actually in 1986—in which they totally denounce the cave-in of the Government of Canada on the export tax. The industry is variously represented to have spent between $4 million and $10 million fighting the United States countervail threat, as they did in 1982. They are absolutely opposed—and I do not know who he talked to, unless it was some of his Tory friends—to the cave-in which the government did on that agreement. Clearly the industry was opposed to the government knuckling under. If the United States had imposed the countervail duty, it had every opportunity at the International Trade Court or under the GATT to oppose it and would have done so successfully.

Now we are left with an industry which is in terrible straits, at least in northern Ontario. It is my understanding that the level of the stumpage charge is extremely heavy for that industry to carry in B.C. In my opinion, the government knuckled under because the Prime Minister was so hell-bent on getting a free trade deal that he would agree to anything with the Americans.

The member talks about funding, throwing money at a problem. What all of the provinces are asking and all the industry is asking the federal government to do is to continue the federal-provincial forestry agreements that they have had for the past five years. The federal government is unilaterally wiping them out so that the kind of reforestation that needs to take place, the kind of research that needs to take place, is simply not going to occur. I think that that is a tragedy. It is a tragedy for areas like mine in northern Ontario. It is a tragedy, I am sure, for many areas in B.C. and I do not see that as interference.

I have met with federal and provincial people. The management teams that have been put together on those forestry agreements imply no unreasonable interference. It is a co-operative operation in any event. The federal government generally has the laboratory and research capacity more in its bailiwick, or at least in Ontario it has a great deal. They have combined in places like Sault Ste. Marie at the Great Lakes Forest Research Laboratory. They have the MNR labs there now.

It is a case of the federal government abandoning those forestry agreements, cutting the provinces adrift, and short-changing the whole industry now, but more important, short-changing the industry for that research in the future because research is a long horizon. We have to do it now if we want the results at the end of the term, whether it is five years or 10 years.

I completely reject the member's comments in that regard from my experience. We want to see this bill passed, but we want to see the wherewithal dedicated whether it is from External Affairs, going to the proper minister, the Minister of Forestry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

Mr. MacWilliam: I have a question for the Hon. Member for Algoma. He chastises the government for not previously establishing a forestry industry, something which I am in agreement with, but also indicates his strong support and the support of his colleagues for beefing up a separate Department of Forestry, putting some teeth into it, giving it some clout. I want to remind the hon. member that on August 1, 1984, in Prince George, his leader, the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra, in fact, outrightly rejected the concept of a separate forest ministry. In large bold print in the Prince George Citizen it stated: "Turner rejects forestry ministry". I would like to ask the member, in view of the past position of his Party and his leader—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to bring to the attention of the hon. member that he is now on debate. There are no more questions or comments. I will allow this short question. The hon. member's time has expired as far as questions and comments are concerned and I was giving the floor on debate to the hon. member. I will allow a very fast question to the hon. member, but that will be off your time.

Mr. MacWilliam: Just a quick question, Mr. Speaker. It was my understanding I was on a question rather than on debate.

I would like to ask the hon. member, in light of this information, why he and his colleagues decided to do this flip-flop on the issue. I am sure they do not want to be charged as being guilty of political opportunism.

Mr. Foster: As I said, I think it is important just what commitment the government has. The government has no commitment to the industry, as it has shown with the export tax of 15 per cent, which is decimating the industry. It is withdrawing the funding for the modernization and upgrading of industry, and that is what industry in my part of the country is saying is happening. If it is cutting the budget, obviously that is not a very good arrangement.

What we want to see is a Department of Forestry that has a minister who has the power and the political influence in the cabinet to put in place the renewal of those agreements, who has the power to prevent the sell-out of the softwood industry, has the influence in the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion to have programs to modernize and upgrade the industry.

We see, as I mentioned when I spoke, that back in the 1970s and 1980s the government had massive programs to modernize and upgrade the pulp and paper industry to put it in a competitive position, to meet the environmental concerns, to be innovative, and so on. That is the key thing. If we are setting up this department, and we agree with it, then it is important that the department and the minister involved have these powers and this kind of influence in the Government. If they do not, then of course it is irrelevant.

• (1630)

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I am going to rise to support the general principle of the bill although I believe, as do my colleagues, that there needs to be a number of amendments made. It does have a few inconsistencies, a few weaknesses, a few warts.

We will be making a number of these amendments and this will be outlined at a later stage of debate by my colleague, the member for Prince George.

I would like to say that over the years the responsibility for forests has been shuffled in and out of, I think, nine different departments to where it currently resides in the Department of Agriculture. That seems to be a rather strange place to tuck a responsibility that has as its mandate the largest industry right across this country. I think as a result of this there has been a lack of continuity in direction.

Back in 1984 the Prime Minister had proposed some strong support for forestry but it took an awful long time for this government to finally come to its senses to realize the critical situation that our major industry in Canada was facing. To understand and address some of those priorities we needed to develop a separate ministry. I think it is something that is long overdue. We support the spirit of the legislation and we believe that we do need a strengthened department of forestry that can address some of the serious concerns affecting this industry.

I believe that we need strong leadership in a number of areas, such as regional forest resource development, national forestry research in pollution control, in wildlife conservation and in parks and recreation. I do believe that by strengthening and developing a separate ministry for forests, a separate department of forests that we can go a long way toward realizing those goals.

However, what does concern me somewhat is in order to do that you also need to strengthen the level of funding for the department. What concerns me is that we have seen a department created without the financial clout necessary to do the job.

As a matter of fact, in 1989-90 we will be seeing funds available for regional forestry programs actually reduced by the sum of about $24 million. It appears those will now be funnelled not directly into the Forestry Resource Development Agreements, the FRDAs, but through the Western Diversification Programs making, I believe by extension of the argument, even less money available for those extremely important reforestation programs, not only in western Canada, but throughout this country.

I would like to turn to the FRDA agreements for a moment and talk about some of their impacts generally, specifically referring to British Columbia and my area of B.C. which is in the Okanagan—Shuswap.

Historically, the FRDA agreements were negotiated with the provinces because of the recognition that our forests across Canada needed on-going management in order to sustain and to increase our forest resources. Those agreements were started about five years ago and a number of them were signed with provinces across Canada. Six of them have now expired, and many of those have not been renewed.

In British Columbia we still do have an active FRDA program but it does expire in March of 1990. The B.C. government and the forestry industry is looking for a significant increase in funding to these programs which is currently at a level of about $300 million.

If you go back to the Pearse report of a few years back, Dr. Peter Pearse, Resource Economist from the University of British Columbia, in fact stressed that the need for funding for forest renewal was much, much greater than that. There is significant reason for us not to be cutting back on the funding for reforestation programs but to be extending it. Now we see that funding source being depleted. A $24-million cut for the western provinces and funnelled through western diversification. Now it seems that the minister of forestry is going to have to go cap in hand to the minister responsible for regional economic development to try to obtain funding for those very important agreements. We do not believe that to be correct. We believe that those agreements need the full level of funding that has presently been committed in order to sustain the amount of work that has already gone on in restocking those NSR lands, those not sufficiently restocked forest lands. To cut back on those agreements at this point is going to endanger the work that has in fact already been done.

With a strengthened department of forests which this legislation suggests, we have a lot of opportunity to strengthen those kinds of reforestation programs. What concerns us is that although we have created this department, the commitment to the FRDA programs for reforestation does not seem to be there.

Let us consider what is at stake if these programs are cut back or if they are cancelled. British Columbia provides over half of Canada's softwood lumber. We have about $13 billion per year in shipments of forest products from the province. That amounts to about 247,000 direct and indirect jobs, supporting 126 communities. Those are 1988 figures. That amounts to about $530 million of tax revenue to Ottawa. We in British Columbia are already experiencing, and have for some time, a fall down in our annual allowable cut because we are simply running out of mature timber to harvest.

We have seen the closure of mills in my constituency and in a number of other areas throughout the province. Fletcher Challenge in Lumby and in a number of other areas in the province has closed its operations. Why? The reason it says is: "Gosh guys, we just do not have enough good timber available to us. We are running out of timber."

The reforestation programs through the FRDA agreements have the mandate to replenish those timber supplies so that we can lessen the fall down in the future. If we cut back on those FRDA agreements at this point, that program is jeopardized, future jobs are jeopardized in British Columbia and, in fact, right across Canada.

In addition, when we experience a significant fall down in our annual allowable cut, whether it be in the Okanagan or anywhere in the province, the Government of Canada experiences a significant decline in its taxation revenues. We should consider that in terms of setting economic priorities.

The importance of FRDAs to British Columbia, of course, is essentially for the protection and preservation of our forest resources not now, but for future generations, so that in 10, 20, 50 or 80 years' time we still have trees to cut, we still have jobs for people to go to. That will be supported by tree planting now, by weeding and thinning programs, by forestry research and by using integrated methods of resource management that are available through those forest resource development agreements.

I would like to turn to the concept of forest management. This is something I think that this strengthened department of forestry could well look at in terms of strengthening its mandate and some of its priorities, at least in British Columbia. There is the control and growth of alder and aspen trees in regenerating areas that have been disturbed by harvesting, and the planting of trees that are valuable as commercial species, such as Douglas fir and western hemlock. These are elements of the reforestation program that are so vital through the FRDA agreements.

If those agreements are cut back or perhaps, God forbid, cancelled, the work that has gone on over the past five years will be wasted.

I took the opportunity to see a number of FRDA programs in my area in the Okanagan. We toured with a number of forestry and local political officials and saw the kind of work that has been done in our area respecting the provincial–federal FRDA agreement. I must say that I think all of us were duly impressed with the kind of regeneration taking place in those NSR lands.

That program for regeneration has to be nurtured over the next 15 to 20 years to ensure that those seedlings are able to grow into a mature forest. If we were to cancel those programs now the overgrowth of alder and deciduous plants would simply wipe out many of the seedlings that are now healthy and viable plants growing into our future forest products.

It is very critical that we continue to nurture these FRDA programs through the injection of federal funds and through the injection of provincial funds to ensure that the groundwork that we have laid over the past five years does not simply vanish. What a false economy that would be: $300 million dollars of federal investment would be simply wasted if those programs are jeopardized.

In British Columbia, before the FRDA agreement with B.C. was signed around 1985, there were approximately 738,000 hectares of land that qualified as NSR land. This land was lying fallow. It was not sufficiently restocked and had been logged over.

I fly over much of the province many times during the course of the year. I am continually amazed as I fly back and forth over our province of British Columbia, a province that is responsible for half the annual harvest in this country, at the amount of land that lies clear cut, eroding and bare, the top soil being washed away.

I am not sure how accurate it is— I would assume that it would be well within range—but somebody estimated that the NSR lands currently in our province amount to a 200 mile strip that is 50 miles wide. That is a strip 50 miles wide extending from Vancouver all the way past the city of Penticton in the Okanagan. That is the significant damage done to our resource in the past years without a proper restocking program. I submit that these FRDA programs are chipping away at that. We have in the past five years reduced that backlog by some 185,000 hectares. We are making gains and slowly recovering those NSR lands, putting them into production for future harvesting programs. But it is going to take time. It is going to take a long-term financial commitment from this government, one that I am afraid this government no longer sees as being a major priority.

I submit, once again, that we are developing a strengthened department of forestry with this legislation. Along with that we should be making the kinds of financial commitments we must make to ensure the future of our forests in B.C. and in Canada to ensure the future of our industry and to ensure the future of jobs for Canadians.

In terms of British Columbians, the FRDA programs have allowed 500 permanent jobs and 15,000 short-term jobs to be created. Our sustainable harvest, since the development of those programs, has increased by some 600,000 cubic meters each year.

We have had an increase in our Gross Domestic Product of about $56 million a year, and also an increased habitat for wildlife. They are valuable programs. We need the continued funding. Let us not give up on them now.

I want to talk for a moment specifically about the FRDA as it applies to the Okanagan-Shuswap. It is part of the interior British Columbia that my constituency is located in, and the Okanagan-Shuswap is part of the Kamloops forest district. We have a regional total of about 6.7 million hectares, an area that is larger than Nova Scotia.

The Shuswap-Okanagan Forestry Association has been calling for some time now for a commitment, both federally and provincially, to replenish the fall down in the timber supplies through tackling the NSR lands and developing the appropriate reforestation and silviculture programs that we now see through the current FRDA agreements.

During that FRDA tour that I was talking about in regard to my area, there were a number of sites that we looked at. We went to about five through the Lumby, Enderby and Vernon areas. Those five sites indicate the kinds of problems that the Shuswap-Okanagan Forestry Association had been and still is talking about, including the need to replenish our forest stocks. We saw the impact of the FRDA agreements in terms of the kind of work that is being done. We saw the results of the research, the silviculture programs, the weeding and thinning programs.

Those programs are successfully reducing that backlog of NSR lands in our area. People are proud of that. People want to see it continued. The Shuswap-Okanagan Forestry Association wants to see it continued. The forestry companies throughout the Okanagan want to see it continued. They want to practise responsible forest management. We need that financial commitment and we need to maintain it over the next decade, over the next 20 or 30 years to ensure that those goals are met.

I think a strengthened department of forestry can be mandated to look at environmental initiatives that are required in forest management: wildlife conservation, the development of parks and recreation areas. I think that a strengthened department of forestry is going to need to provide real leadership in this area and in areas of habitat conservation, and particularly in areas of resource management conflicts.

Out in British Columbia we have had ongoing problems for some time, largely because of the actions of our provincial government over the past 20-odd years, and partially as a result of the failure of both the federal and provincial governments at resolving some of our native land settlement claims. Areas like the Carmanah, the Stein, and the Stikine,. We all know that South Moresby, the Spatsizi Plateau, and the Kutzimateen are all areas, that, if not actively under contention in terms of resource-used conflict, will be in the future.

It is important that a strengthened ministry of forestry be mandated to work co-operatively with the provincial governments at trying to overcome some of these problem areas. I think it is clearly evident, given the importance of the forestry industry to the Canadian economy, that the prime mandate of a federal department of forestry should be to provide leadership in the areas that are impacted by our forest resource so that we can maintain this resource, so that we can protect it and replenish it for future generations.

I support this bill. I must admit that it has weaknesses and my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley will be making a number of very wise and judicious amendments at a later time that will, hopefully, strengthen many of those weaknesses. The bill does not satisfy all the concerns.

It needs substantial amendment but it is a start, and based upon our long-term commitment as New Democrats for the development of a strong forestry ministry at the federal level, we are going to be supporting this bill.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap for his support of this bill and I would assume that he would join with me in commending and complimenting the Minister of State for Forestry for the leadership and initiative that he has shown in bringing this bill before the House.

I do want to raise a question and perhaps I misunderstood but I do have a great deal of interest in forestry because included within my own South Shore constituency is Queen's County, Nova Scotia, which, as you may know, is known as the forestry capital of Canada.

I want to raise the question of FRDAs. We are very pleased in Atlantic Canada with the success that we have recently achieved with the signing of two very significant Forest Resource Development Agreements, one a $45 million agreement announced last Friday by the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, and a $91 million agreement announced for the province of New Brunswick.

It has been our experience in Atlantic Canada that these FRDAs have worked extremely well. One of the reasons they have worked well is that the provinces themselves identify the priorities within resource development areas. It is clear that in Atlantic Canada forestry is recognized as a major area for economic development and it is a major priority with our provincial governments but it is also a priority that has, and I think quite properly, been recognized by this government.

There was some discussion about the length of time taken to reach the agreements, but I think it is important to note that right at the beginning of the process the minister made it clear that there would be new forest resource development agreements. Again, I commend him. That was very helpful to us, unlike, I might say, in 1982 under the previous government when the last agreements expired and there was no indication as to whether there would be new agreements. As a result, people were laid off and we lost some very valuable people in our industry. That has not happened this time because the minister made it clear right from the beginning that there would be agreements. I think the process works extremely well and I would like to compliment the government on it.

Perhaps I misunderstood my friend opposite but I assume that he also supports this very valuable initiative in the way the federal and provincial governments work together. I assume again that he is joining with me in commending the minister of forestry for his initiative in bringing forward this excellent bill.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. colleague had mentioned that Nova Scotia had received about $91 million in terms of the renewed FRDA and I am pleased for Nova Scotia that it did receive that commitment. I want to point out that Nova Scotia is, in fact, smaller in terms of land mass than the Kamloops forest district.

If you break the regional or provincial FRDA for B.C. down, which is $300 million, the appropriated amount for the Kamloops area, the interior, was only $30 million. If we are looking at $30 million for an area that is in fact larger than what the member opposite is indicating for Nova Scotia, which has $91 million. I would submit that in the interest of regional equity the member would support my suggestion that the FRDA for British Columbia be at least tripled.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to my New Democratic colleague and I am still surprised to hear him say that the Minister has no power regarding the ERDA agreements. I must remind him that clause 9 provides that "The Minister may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, enter into an agreement or arrangement with any person, body or government respecting any matter related to the powers, duties and functions of the Minister." I think that is extremely clear and shows how much responsibility the Forestry Minister will have for such agreements.

Furthermore, my colleague from the Maritimes raised a very important point when he mentioned that agreements had been renewed, one with Nova Scotia and another with New Brunswick. What we have to look at, I think—and my colleague should give the Minister responsible, the Forestry Minister, credit—what we have to look at is what was there before and what is there now. Take New Brunswick for example. New Brunswick had a five-year, $77-million agreement which was extended for $91 million. So when my colleague from the New Democratic Party wonders and is concerned about the Government's real intention to continue the federal-provincial agreements, I think we have an excellent argument to show how conscientiously the Forestry Minister seeks to renew these agreements and to continue to work with the provinces to further develop the forestry sector. The Forestry Minister has already said several times that talks with his provincial counterparts were going on. You know that the agreements with British Columbia expire in March 1990.

So some things can be explained, there are agreements, negotiations are going on now, and I am convinced that the Forestry Minister... And I am convinced, if my colleague from the New Democratic Party lets me finish, that the Minister will negotiate as best he can in the interest of British Columbia, in the interest of his province and in the national interest. Since our colleague raises those questions, I would like him to answer the question for us because the Canada—British Columbia development agreement has yielded excellent results. He mentioned them himself, for which I thank him, and I just ask my colleague for the good of forestry in Canada to support the Bill, to support the Minister's negotiations and to let British Columbia, like any other Canadian province, benefit from these agreements and share the benefits with its people.

[English]

Mr. MacWilliam: Just to clarify, Mr. Speaker, the constituency is Okanagan—Shuswap. I thank the member opposite for his remarks, but I suggest to the member that you can conclude all the agreements you want to, but if the funding is not there, the agreements are not worth very much.

With the funding being allocated through western diversification, I submit that the minister is going to have to go cap in hand to the minister responsible for the appropriation of funding through western diversification to ask if the money is available. That money which supposedly is earmarked for forestry will also be in competition with moneys for the tourism industry subsidiary developments so we are competing for the same dollars.

In addition to that, there is $24 million less going into western diversification, it is my understanding, for this fiscal year than there was before. I submit to you that if the pie is getting smaller and it is divided into more pieces nobody will get more or a larger piece of the pie. I do not know what that means in terms of the forestry resource agreements out west. That is what we are concerned about. We are very concerned that it means less money to go around in terms of those reforestation initiatives, and that spells trouble for the industry in British Columbia.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Comments are now terminated. I had said Kamloops—Shuswap and the former House Leader of the New Democratic Party, I know, appreciated that name very much. I regret that the hon. member's riding does not have the name Kamloops—Shuswap. It is Okanagan—Shuswap.

WOMEN'S EQUALITY

FUNDING

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should refuse funding to groups that are actively working against women's equality as guaranteed in The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in international agreements signed by Canada, such as the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to a motion that I am introducing before my colleagues in the House, and I will read it again even though you have read it:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should refuse funding to groups that are actively working against women's equality as guaranteed in The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in international agreements signed by Canada, such as the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women.

I am distressed that I have cause to bring this motion forward. It really seems unbelievable that it is up to a private member of this House to have to inform the government that women's equality must be worked for and not undermined. In this day and age, one would expect that the Government of Canada would not be actively using its financial resources against equality for women.

I am referring to a particular incident in which this government used funds that are reserved for equality-seeking women's groups. The government granted $21,212 to REAL Women for a conference it held last April. This group has over the years opposed many rights the women of Canada have been fighting hard for. My motion is directed against any further funding to groups that work against women's equality. I will explain why it is important to refuse funds to such groups, and I will use last April's incident as an example.

It is evident to me that the government tried to hide its funding decision from the public and from interested members of Parliament. I tried to get the co-operation of the office of the Secretary of State which granted this funding to answer basic questions about the process and the reasons the decisions were made.

The Secretary of State's office gave me the run-around. They gave us phone numbers of people to call, people who told us nothing but who simply referred us back to the Secretary of State's office. This office refused to discuss the funding, saying only that the decision was consistent with women's program funding guidelines, but even the briefest look at women's program funding guidelines will tell anyone that this group did not conform to the guidelines. In fact, it is because this group does not conform to the guidelines that it was repeatedly refused women's program funding in the past.

I had to do what I did next because my efforts in dealing with this Secretary of State's office as a member of Parliament were really completely fruitless. I applied as a private citizen under the Access to Information law to obtain the necessary documents that would allow me to see how this decision could possibly have been made. I paid the fee and I filled out the forms. Every effort was made to stall my request. The Secretary of State had a thirty day deadline to respond to my request. It asked for an extension.

I finally received the document only a few days before the conference in question was due to take place. The process I had to undergo to obtain basic information about that funding decision was really shameful. The public has a right to know that its money is being used inappropriately, that its money is being utilized to undermine the hard earned rights women have won over the past century.

The report I received of this government-funded conference told me that in one workshop, the credibility of every female Supreme Court justice was questioned simply because they were women. Madam Justice Bertha Wilson, an experienced and respected judge, was touted as an example of the affirmative action gone awry.

People who think women are incompetent are certainly entitled to their opinion, I suppose, but to have the Government of Canada paying for such a forum in the name of equality is outrageous. It is absolutely outrageous.

Another workshop funded by the Canadian government in the name of equality for women was one in which a male psychiatrist claimed that children in child care would grow up to be partial psychopaths. It is really difficult to see how this statement, which has absolutely no credibility, has anything to do with the equality of women.

Also, in the child care workshop, the audience was told by the workshop leader that women must be nurturers because of their potential to breastfeed. The Conservative government, in defending this funding on the basis that it did meet equality criteria, obviously does not have the first clue as to what equality really means. I will endeavour to explain it.

A part of equality is that men and women have the freedom to do what they, as individuals, are best at and what they wish to do. Many women in a free and equal society will choose to nurture small children; some women will choose not to do this. Many men are capable of nurturing and helping children grow into well balanced, responsible adults.

Women should not be forced into nurturing, nor should men be forced away from it. That is not equality nor is it reasonable or realistic. Why does the government defend rigid sex role stereotyping as a different perspective on equality? It has nothing at all to do with equality.

Another workshop leader in a workshop on pornography said that universal day care would lead to a greater pornography problem because of working mothers. First, I would like to clarify for the government and for anti-equality groups that every mother is a working mother. Raising children is work. Second, I would like to explain to the government that pinning the ills of society on women who work outside the home is an abdication of our collective responsibility to deal with social problems in our country.

In the 1800s, movements arose to deal with society's problems. These were slavery, child labour, extreme poverty and exploitation, high illiteracy, high infant mortality and alcoholism among others.

Some of our social problems have changed. However, the fact remains that we must continue to organize ourselves into progressive movements for change such as the women's movement. We cannot sit back and blame one particular group in our society such as women in the paid labour force for all that is wrong in our world today. Not only is that terribly unfair but it is really not at all useful.

I ask myself why this government is defending its funding of workshops which claim that everything bad is the fault of women in the paid labour force, saying that this is equality. Blaming women is not equality. It is anti-equality.

There was a workshop on the United Nations Charter of Equality for Women to which Canada is a signatory. The essence of the workshop was that the charter was not in favour of "true equality" because it encouraged women to participate in the paid work force.

Another theme of the conference was hatred, lies and intolerance of homosexuality. Again, is this somehow connected with women's equality? The government was unable to explain how out and out lies about lesbians and about gay men are related to furthering equality for women. Yet this government paid for it to be said and paid for it to be promoted.

The conference was openly anti-feminist. One workshop leader told her audience that she hoped REAL Women will be able to counter the effects of the feminist movement. Again, the government stood by its decision to fund this conference dedicated to countering the effects of the women's movement.

The effects of the feminist movement, for the record, include women's right to vote, a married woman's right to own property, the right not to be sexually harassed in the workplace, the right not to be sexually harassed by a stranger, by an acquaintance or by a husband, the right to be included in the Constitution as a free and equal being, equal wages for equal work, and the right to disseminate information about birth control. That right was illegal before 1969. These are the proud achievements of the women's movement over the past century in Canada.

Today the women's movement is fighting for homemakers' pensions, for equal pay for work of equal value, for an end to the economic barriers that all women face, for good quality child care and for women's rights to control their own bodies and their own lives. The women's movement has not only lobbied for these rights but continues to provide services for women, services which include information, counselling for abused women, self-defence courses and support for pregnant women and for new mothers. These are the groups from which the Secretary of State has withdrawn funding to give to an anti-equality group.

October 18 is the sixtieth anniversary of Persons' Day. This is the day that women officially became persons in Canada, thanks to the efforts of many women but especially of Nellie McClung, Emily Murphy, Henrietta Muir Edwards, Louise McKinney and Irene Parlby. Sixty years after women obtained legal status as persons in Canada, our government is funding groups that want to turn back the clock, groups which are afraid of the future.

It is understandable that people fear change. It is confusing to many people when they are no longer faced with rigid sex stereotypical roles. They are unsure of what to do or how it is that they should behave. Women at home are justifiably claiming their right to respect and recognition for the valuable work that they do. I worked at home long before I became a politician and I know what it is to raise three children on one income and to try to make ends meet. I cannot advocate a step backward in time, giving up rights that I and so many women before me have fought for and won.

I believe in a woman's right to choose, to choose whether she will raise children at home, whether she will enter the paid workforce, to choose what to do with her life and with her body. These are the ideas that the women's program is supposed to promote; positive, forward-looking strategies so that women and men may have more choices about their own lives.

This issue of choice is an important one in this debate. I have here a memo from the Secretary of State to the Vancouver Status of Women, one of the many valuable organizations whose funding has already been cut, concerning funding of a particular position on abortion. I will read it into the record.

> Just a quick reminder that Secretary of State Department funding may not be used for any activity which takes a position on the issue of abortion.
> This does not, of course, preclude your organization from forming, holding or sharing an opinion, belief or point of view, or taking action if it so wishes. Rather, this requires that these be done with funding other than that provided by Secretary of State Department.
> To avoid any problems with current or planned activities, I again ask each organization to ensure that it understands and adheres to this policy. I would also ask each organization to ensure that if any activities are undertaken, your organization is certain it can clearly and unequivocably demonstrate that resources other than Secretary of State funding are used.

Vancouver Status of Women is a women's group which provides information and other services for women and is pro choice. REAL Women is a self-proclaimed pro-life group. Vancouver Status of Women and all equality-seeking women's groups are prevented from using Secretary of State money to promote a point of view on abortion. Yet Secretary of State has funded an anti-abortion workshop at the REAL Women's conference.

At the conference, a workshop was led on anti-choice interventions at the Supreme Court level. I want to know, did Secretary of State make REAL Women clearly and uneqivocably demonstrate that resources other than Secretary of State funding were used to print up the materials which were used in the workshop or any posters that mentioned the workshop?

Why is it that the Secretary of State is applying a stricter standard to equality-seeking groups than to anti-equality groups? Why is it that the Secretary of State is clamping down on pro-choice groups in favour of anti-choice groups? Is this to promote the government's view on the abortion question, that we should have an ineffective law to restrict abortion but do nothing to help mothers or do anything to reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies? Is this part of a cohesive government strategy to silence pro-choice groups while promoting anti-choice groups?

I note that it is taking Revenue Canada a year to decide on the charitable tax status of the Everywoman's Health Clinic which provides a range of medical and counselling services including abortion. A group called Human Life International already has charitable tax status with Revenue Canada. This is the organization that sent horrific postcards to all members of Parliament. It showed decapitated foetus heads dripping with blood. The same group sent MPs a series of anti-choice articles as well as anti-child care article entitled "Daycareism and Socialism in Sweden".

Why is Secretary of State withdrawing a significant amount of funds for equality-seeking groups and at the same time granting new funds to anti-equality groups? What is this government's agenda for the women of Canada?

A curious thing about this whole incident of funding an anti-equality group is that it shows how very little power the minister responsible for the status of women seems to have in determining the government's policy on women. When I questioned her in committee, she did not wholeheartedly support this funding. Yet I have copies of letters written from the Secretary of State's office to outraged women's groups which wrote to the minister to complain of anti-equality funding. These letters say that the decision to fund REAL women was completely consistent with the women's program equality criteria.

It is difficult to argue with the minister who clearly does not understand what equality means. More to the point, what is evident is that the minister responsible for the status of women, who has a better idea of what equality means, was either not informed of the funding or was not listened to when she explained that such a conference did not promote equality for women.

One argument I have heard in favour of funding anti-equality groups is that they present a different perspective and that all perspectives must be respected. However, the mandate of the Secretary of State's women's program is not to fund womens' organizations, it is to fund equality-seeking womens' organizations.

The Secretary of State's complete disregard of the women's program guidelines leaves the door open to all sorts of really bizarre funding decisions. If the government is going to override its own guidelines and fund anti-equality groups, what will it fund next through the women's program, apolitical women's organization such as bowling leagues, the ladies auxiliary at the Ku Klux Klan? Who else is going to receive money previously earmarked for groups promoting equality between women and men in our society?

This government should really be ashamed of itself. It can no longer even pretend to support the equality of women in our society. It is imperative that this House support the motion to refuse funding to groups that are actively working against women's equality.

The women's program was a victim of the last budget in April. It was cut by 15 per cent. I received letters from every region of Canada. These letters expressed shock at this attack on an already under-funded program and under-funded groups. These groups have served women and communities across Canada on shoe string budgets. These women's groups often provide a service that the government would have to pay a lot more for if their functions were to be taken over by the government.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is the second day that Parliament is back in the fall session and we have before us a motion that shows clearly to the House and the country the line of reasoning and the kind of thinking for which members of the New Democratic Party are famous, for which reason all of us can be thankful that they remain in opposition and have no prospect of forming the government. A fundamental principle of this country is the rule of law, not the rule according to the whim and subjective judgment of individuals.

What we are talking about here are criteria that are set out under which groups in this country can apply for funding. If they meet those criteria, they receive the funding. To say that beyond that there should be bureaucrats, politicians or others who can look in detail at what is said at a particular conference and, on the basis of that, should not allow the grants to go forward when those groups have met the qualifications is to say that the rules and the criteria are not applicable. This is, in effect, another face of the same question of universality which always has members of that party up on their hind legs barking. It is saying that when there are criteria established for grants then all who meet those criteria universally qualify.

Let me give an example of what the problem is with this subjective approach the New Democratic Party is now putting before us this afternoon. In 1985, I was chairing a committee of the House, the Parliamentary Committee on Equality Rights, made up of members of all three parties. We held hearings across the country and we held hearings in the city of Toronto at a downtown Toronto hotel. While we were in the process of holding our hearings, elsewhere in that same hotel NAC convened a press conference to condemn the process by which we were proceeding, to make criticisms of our committee and to generally take a great opportunity for grabbing some headlines through a petulant outburst that I thought was quite unwarranted.

The fact is that a few months later, a report was tabled entitled Equality for All. It contained 75 recommendations unanimously supported by all three parties, recommendations dealing with the equality of women, maternity benefits, armed forces, immigrant women, health issues relevant to women and so on. If I was taking the subjective standard of the member opposite, I would have said that NAC, using money provided by the federal government to launch that criticism of our committee and its workings, was at that time working against the interests of women's equality. That is exactly the reason that we do have rules that set those criteria and we do not indulge in the kind of subjective approach that is being taken here.

Another example is the Ontario case of election financing being provided to all political parties which registered. The Communist party registered in Ontario and qualified under the Election Finance Reform Act of Ontario for public funding. A lot of people in Ontario did not like the fact that their tax dollars were going to fund the Communist party. However, the same point applies. Because it met the criteria, it qualified for the funding and it received it. It was not up to government officials or bureaucrats to get subjectively involved and say: "No, only these main-line political parties will qualify and we do not like the smell of the Communist party. We do not like what they stand for, and therefore, they are not going to get the funding". No, if you set up the rules, they apply to everybody. Either you fund all the groups or you do not fund any of them.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to say a few words about our Government's record on women's equality.

Our Government has every reason to be proud of what it has done to improve the status of women.

For instance, we could look at our Employment Equity Act, the steps we have taken to fight family violence and sexual exploitation of children, our announcement that we intend to increase parental and maternity benefits, the measures we took to ensure that alimony and custody orders are carried out and our decision to improve training opportunities for women.

We have developed programs to encourage women entrepreneurs. We have taken steps to help women farmers and we have opened all trades and professions in the Armed Forces to women.

In co-operation with the provinces, we have looked at women's training needs and their health concerns, and we have also looked into better ways of harmonizing women's work and family responsibilities. Our Government has appointed a record number of women in key positions in federal departments and agencies, the judiciary and the diplomatic corps.

All these achievements are irrefutable proof of our commitment to improving the status of women in all sectors of Canadian society. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, these achievements were the result of a joint effort. In all its initiatives to enhance the status of women, our Government sought the active of participation of the provinces and territories, business and labour, the volunteer sector and, more importantly, women themselves, whether in groups or as individuals.

Our Government is very conscious of the remarkable contribution of women's groups to the development of our country.

As pioneers, women cleared land, established families and communities and took an active part in developing the country's social, economic, political and legal structures. They found their place in factories, offices, hospitals and schools, doing their share to strengthen and expand the Canadian economy. Today, women in increasing numbers are playing this essential role in our society.

Today, as in the past, despite all their domestic and family responsibilities, their careers and community involvement, women still find the time and energy for individual or collective action aimed at improving our society.

By the end of the last century, women united around common causes and formed organizations to fight for such issues as women's suffrage, temperance, abolition of child labour, and better working conditions and social justice for all.

Today, hundreds of women's groups continue this tradition of social struggle and involvement in areas such as family violence, sexual exploitation of children, employment equity and equality rights.

Our Government supports and encourages the work being done by women's groups.

During our previous term, Mr. Speaker, women and women's groups took an active part in developing government policy. Although the Department of the Secretary of State's Women's Program is the main source of financing for women's groups, the federal Government also helps these groups in other ways.

For instance, Mr. Speaker, women's groups have set up a number of projects thanks to the Child Care Special Initiatives Fund, created in December 1987 to promote innovation in daycare. In response to government initiatives to deal with family violence announced last June, women's groups have submittted projects for helping women who are victims of family violence, especially Native women, handicapped women and women who are immigrants or belong to visible minorities.

In Canada today, women and women's groups know that the concept of equality goes beyond the absence of discrimination.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of this motion, but before I return the debate to the motion from whence it has diverted for the last 10 minutes, I would like first of all, through you, Mr. Speaker, to apologize most humbly to the hon. member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore for the uppity nature of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women for having the temerity to exercise its right to free speech when his committee was holding hearings in the city of Toronto.

May I further say that it is an edifying experience for the women in this House to be lectured to by the hon. member on the subject of how well off we are today. I hesitate to speak, of course, for my female colleagues on the other side of the House, but I can say for those of us over here that we just love having this gentleman telling us how lucky we are. I hope he might come some time to my constituency again and I can introduce him to large groups of women who perhaps may disagree with him. However, let us get back to the motion at hand.

I particularly support this motion in its reference to the declaration on the elimination of all discrimination against women, and I would like to note one of the articles of this. I quote:

> Discrimination against women, denying or limiting as it does their equality of rights with men, is fundamentally unjust and constitutes an offence against human dignity.

And this is what we are talking about here today. We are not talking about how well off we are because we are not well off, not even those of us who have had the nerve to invade the sacred chambers normally inhabited by men. We are not well off, and women in this country are not well off. Working and fighting in the battle for gender equality is sometimes very depressing. I may say never more so than during the time I had to listen in the last 10 minutes.

The cuts in funding to hard-pressed women's groups are a travesty. One of those groups, I might mention, is the Canadian Congress of Learning Opportunities for Women, one of the most prestigious and respected groups that is doing a superb job of work for the advancement and for the equality of women in this country.

It is interesting about CCLOW. Do you know that CCLOW has written three times asking to meet with the Secretary of State. Does it have an appointment? Not yet! Has it had an answer to any of its letters? Not yet! But that is okay, we are well off and we do not need CCLOW to meet with the Secretary of State. As yet, no answer to three requests to meet. Yet the Secretary of State gives funding to REAL. I refuse to refer to it as "real". If that is "real" then the rest of us are extremely imaginary.

It is time for someone to get real around here and I say it is this government. This is the 20th century. You may have to be dragged kicking and screaming into it, but it is here. As a matter of fact it is almost over, so you had better hurry up.

The concept of family in this country has changed. The nuclear family with father working and bringing home the bacon and mother living in a rose-covered cottage and caring for the children is not the norm any more. Good or bad, it is not the norm.

The economic exigencies of modern life demand that women work outside the home. They have always worked inside the home, contrary to the belief of some people I have spoken to lately, but now they must work outside the home. The number of women who have the luxury of the choice to stay at home is getting smaller and smaller. Most people realize this, but some do not.

Women do not work for a lark and they do not work for a hobby, they work to survive. They work to support themselves, they work to support their children, they work to support aging relatives and so on and so on. Mainly they do this work for 35 per cent less money than men, and mainly they work in job ghettos.

But I will tell you a secret. Maybe we had better have water! Where are the pages? Just be ready with water Some women actually work in this country because they like to. They want to work, they enjoy it! And indeed these women manage to do a good job in the workplace. They manage, through some superhuman ability, to run their houses, to bring up children who do not turn into young offenders, or drug addicts, or murderers, or even politicians. These women manage to keep all these balls in the air and they do it on less money and less time than anyone else has ever been asked to perform such herculean tasks with.

They do it without proper benefits, in the main. They certainly do it without adequate child care, and they do it in many, many cases without a real chance of promotion. They do it also with the reality of sexual harassment. It is not a pretty picture and, unfortunately, it is often a picture without much chance of advancement.

The declaration on the elimination of all kinds of discrimination against women refers to dignity. Let me tell you, it is an assault upon the dignity of Canadian women for the government to fund groups that do not believe in the principle of equality.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Clancy: It is an assault on this dignity when groups who oppose pay equity, oppose child care and oppose the full inclusion of women at all stratas of society, are given credibility through government support.

There is no doubt that individual Canadians have a perfect right to believe that women should stay at home. Indeed, women who freely choose to work at home deserve our respect and also our support, but no one has the right to say that women must stay at home. No one has the right to deny women in the workforce the action necessitated by 2,000 years of patriarchal sexism, which will bring them to true equality.

There is an old Chinese principle that says women hold up half the sky. Actually it was Mao Tse Tung who said it and I think he was being a little conservative, probably for the one time in his life. Millions of women in this country carry the burden of home and workplace, provider and nurturer.

It has been 22 years since Canada signed the declaration on an end to all forms of discrimination against women. It has been five and a half years since the Charter of Rights and Freedoms came into force in Canada and sadly, unhappily, we are not much further ahead, in spite of the litany that I heard from my friend opposite.

Women have been patient but this patience is wearing very thin. Dignity means human, legal and civil rights. It means fair payment. It means fair opportunity. To a government that funds groups that deny these rights to women, I say, through you, Mr. Speaker, be warned by their works you shall know them. Cuts to groups that work for gender equity, combined with funding to groups who want to return us to the Dark Ages will be remembered.

I would like to close my comments a little early and quote a male poet if I may. If you think women won't remember that no action has been taken, I remind you of the words of John Donne "for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee".

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique B. Tardif (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I may say I listened with great interest to what my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Boyer), had to say. By recalling various projects that were also instrumental in promoting and improving the status of women in Canada, I feel he made a contribution towards achieving the objectives we have in mind, and I must say I appreciate that very much.

I listened earlier to what was being said by my colleague from the Liberal Party, and I find it hard to believe that today, in Canada, there are people who do not realize that the status of women in this country has made significant progress in the last ten years.

We need only look around us to realize that more and more, Canadian women are taking their rightful place, not the place of others but the place they deserve in various activity sectors.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to look at what is happening in education. Today, Laval University, which I happen to know best because it is practically next door . . .the statistics reveal that at Laval University in Québec City, 52 per cent of the student population is female and I think this reflects what is happening across Canada. Mr. Speaker, this is indeed an improvement. My point is that if we want to achieve women's equality in employment and in all other areas, we first have to ensure that all women are entitled to a real education and to the same education as the population of Canada as a whole. Personally, I am proud of these figures, and I think that over the years we will see the results as our society evolves even more rapidly.

Mr. Speaker, Agnes MacPhail, the first woman to be elected to Parliament nearly sixty years ago, would probably be very proud to see that her pioneering efforts have born fruit and that women are getting closer and closer to the common goal they have set for themselves, namely, equality on all fronts.

Mr. Speaker, if we look at the election held yesterday in Québec, 121 candidates were fielded by the various political parties. By the end of the day, 22 women had been elected to the National Assembly. In one riding, people knew even before the results were announced yesterday that they would have a woman representing them in the National Assembly. In the riding of Kamouraska—Témiscouata, three women were represented the various political parties: the Liberal Party, the Parti Québécois and the Green Party. I don't think anyone protested the fact that all three candidates were women, three women who I am sure are trying to promote the status of all women and who do so despite their philosophical differences which, of course, we must respect.

A large number of Canadian women have reached the higher echelons in management and take part in the decisions that concern them as women. They constitute a group of first–rate spokespersons for all Canadian women.

Conversely, I believe that the women's movement's fundamental objectives of social, legal and economic equality are now shared by the vast majority of Canadian men and women.

This does not mean we can sit back and feel that women's equality is now a fact. On the contrary, we must intensify our efforts to pursue and attain the freedom we are seeking, as members of a society that respects the rights of each and everyone.

True to the spirit of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Canadian Government tries to ensure that all Canadians participate equally in all aspects of life in this country. It recognizes the importance of promoting full participation by women in our country's political, social and economic life, and it has shown a strong commitment in the form of various initiatives.

The Government's main priorities with respect to the status of women are largely defined in a document entitled: Dimensions of Equality: A Federal Work Plan For Women. Its objective is to promote women's equality and remove barriers that limit their potential. The Women's Program, created almost 16 years ago, has drawn much of its inspiration from this work plan.

Since 1973, the Women's Program, which comes under the Department of the Secretary of State, has supported the initiatives of a large number of organizations dedicated to improving the status of women.

The Royal Commission of Inquiry On The Status of Women was right to recommend creating this kind of program.

Today, as a major federal program, it offers consulting services, information and financial assistance to groups that work for women, whether they are at home or on the labour market.

One of the goals of the Women's Program is to make governments, large institutions and the general public familiar with women's views on the burning issues of the day. And I wish people would not discriminate against the concerns of women generally. This makes the program an invaluable tool for all Canadian women.

During its first term, the present Government also placed special emphasis on women with special needs. And if you do not believe that handicapped women have special needs, you would do well to go back and see your constituents!

For example, the Secretary of State Women's Program gave financial assistance to the Disabled Women's Network to enable it to conduct a major national survey of the concerns of handicapped women. I think that is important; they are indeed very special needs and those people must be looked after.

In short, in 1987–88, the program financed nearly 750 national and regional projects which all contributed in one way or another to advancing the status of women in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we have accomplished much in very little time. Of course, we firmly intend to continue in this way.

The record of our accomplishments on women's issues is most favorable, but I believe that women deserve most of the credit. We must also point out the sustained efforts of all concerned and hope that governments, institutions, unions and the private sector will continue to work together to make the necessary changes to our national life to promote justice and equal opportunity for all Canadians, men and women, individually and collectively.

Mr. Speaker, it is in this spirit that the Government undertakes to meet the formidable challenge of equality between men and women.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, fortunately, or maybe unfortunately, the member has concluded now, but my point of order was to ask you to rule on relevancy because not once did she address the motion.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my speech in support of my colleague's motion I would like to point out that the members opposite have sent a rallying cry today for the feminist movement. As the feminist movement has always been fuelled by anger, you have given us more fuel for that struggle today in your comments.

I think the motion that my colleague has presented in the House also speaks to the kind of anger that the women of Canada have voiced against this government's actions in funding anti-equality groups. Not only on this side of the House but before the Health and Welfare Committee the Minister responsible for the Status of Women is quoted as saying that she was "damn mad" about that and that she was going to find out. We have not heard anything more, but I can assure you that feminist anger is not necessarily a politically partisan anger. It is an anger throughout this land for people who fund anti-equality.

When the Royal Commission on the Status of Women was brought forth 22 years ago it was for the promotion of equality and we will not be satisfied until that equality is attained, we will not be quiet, and we will not even be polite.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Hunter: This is not a free speech issue. This is an issue on fighting for the kind of equality that we demand. We have a proud history in my party. The first woman member of Parliament, Agnes Macphail, was a member of my party. That long history of fighting for women's equality is something that we on this side, in this party, will be determined to continue, unlike some of the other people in this House.

We will not be satisfied with funding for band-aid solutions, the kind of solutions that the parliamentary secretary was alluding to in his talk. We are talking about funding for the real root causes against discrimination against women.

How will these groups do it with a 15 per cent reduction? They will have to go out and fund raise again. I am sure that is the concerted intention of the government, because the more energy groups put into fundraising the less they do in effecting real change in their communities.

I had the honour this year of writing a letter of support for a woman in my community who has spent her life working for the equality of women. Ms. Kay Armstrong has now just been selected to be one of the recipients of the Person's Award. This kind of lifetime work is what we, in my party, support.

The parliamentary secretary made his speech—I am careful now in my choice of language, Mr. Speaker, because I want to remain parliamentary but to say that I was offended by it is to understate somewhat.

This motion goes to the very heart of what this government talks about when we speak about deficit reduction and about cutting to the bare bones. We have to discriminate on what kind of money we spend. We have to target the use of funds wisely in order to achieve government objectives. So this is why it is not consistent to fund anti-equality groups if the government is sincere in its intention to promote the equality of women. This is why my colleague has put this motion forward. If you are sincere in wanting to cut the deficit and make your use of government funds more effective and if you want to promote the equality of women, the two things do not jive. You cannot have both. It is a shame that this government does not seem to have the real basis of understanding.

Prior to being elected I was active in a women's group in my community and I was privileged to be selected to talk on the funding issue to the standing committee which travelled across Canada. That message came through over and over again. When you are talking about a 15 per cent reduction for women's groups that are struggling for equality you are talking about reducing funds for women's centres that are working on sexual assault, you are talking about rural women who have very, very little opportunity for getting these kinds of resources in small communities. You are talking about women in major urban centres that have been on the vanguard of trying to see the whole infrastructure that discriminates against women.

When you are talking about that 15 per cent reduction you are talking about the real effects, the struggles we are trying to identify. It is child care issues, it is housing issues; all of these issues these women are trying to solve. The women's program is one of the most effective, efficient operations in trying to get the real structures of society changed. They get very good value for their money.

A number of my friends work in women's centres and they work for very little money. I am talking about an annual income of probably $22,000 or $23,000 a year, if they are lucky. They work many long hours for those salaries. So when you are talking about a 15 per cent reduction you are talking about cutting those salaries, cutting their efficiency and their ability to do their work.

This is why we find it so offensive that this government has decided to give a grant for the anti-equality group. It is just so inconsistent with all the government's intentions. I know that this government has a little problem with consistency, but this is one of the most blatant examples of it. The government is trying to talk out of one side of its mouth saying one thing and out of the other side saying another.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I just want to reiterate that the members opposite today have helped us enormously because they have fuelled that feminist anger. I know a number of journalists have now said that feminism is the new "f" word. Well, if that is the way they think of it, they can be assured that there are those women on this side of the House who are willing to say it over and over again.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, the member for New Westminster—Coquitlam has brought forward a motion which objects to the fact that the federal government has recognized the existence of an organization known as REAL and it has funded it, for one event, to the tune of $21,000 over against something like $11 million that was given to other women's groups and organizations. Now I do not know if that is a threat to the other organizations but I do not understand why $21,000 is seen as such a threat, at least as indicated by this motion.

I listened to the remarks of the hon. member from New Westminster. She referred to the inequality that this organization proposes. And then I remembered seeing the masthead—you can understand I have not been active in that organization—of some of their literature and I see lawyers in the leadership and doctors and teachers and other professional people. I cannot imagine that the leadership of that organization considers itself to be in any way unequal to any other women's group and certainly not unequal to any men. They have made it and they have done very well. They have made it because they are good. I do not think they see themselves as being unequal to anyone, because they are professional people, whatever walk of life they are pursuing.

It is characteristic, however, of the New Democratic Party in its approach to life that it espouses causes of such things as tolerance, understanding and broad-mindedness. NDP members really believe that if you happen to agree with them. They tend to be tolerant and broad-minded if you agree with them. But let anybody be different from them, let anybody cross swords with them, let anybody espouse a cause that argues with them and pretty soon we have names like Fascist and Klu Klux Klan coming up in the debate and somehow the tolerance and the understanding, all that goal seeking on the part of the New Democratic Party, somehow evaporates very quickly if somebody disagrees with them.

I happen to believe that there is some merit in this motion. I think perhaps groups that fight for the wrong causes, perhaps even in their definition, should not be funded. I recollect that when this organization put forward its conference there were demonstrations against it by other women's groups funded by the federal government. And I am saying to myself, if these women's groups are being funded by the federal government to fight for equality for women, which is a legitimate cause because we know that there are areas of inequality in the workplace and so forth, should they be using that funding to fight other women's groups who do not agree with them?

An Hon. Member: Don't patronize us.

Mr. Friesen: You see, I happen to put forward another point of view and so right away I am patronizing. Please, I thought we were all equal in this chamber.

So here we have women's groups who fight other women's groups but they do not want the other women's groups to get funds because they say that they are unequal. I tend to think that perhaps there is some merit in this motion and that the minister ought to pay some attention to it.

The other thing that bothers me about the remarks is that I thought they were somewhat inaccurate. I have read some of the literature of this organization and I recall very clearly that they support day care, perhaps not in the formula that the hon. member wants to see it. I remember reading that they—

An Hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Friesen: You can see the approach they take. This is equality of opinions here, you see. I recall that they believe in homemakers' pensions, perhaps not in the formula that some of the other women's groups suggest but they believe in it. Yet we were told in the chamber here that they do not support those causes. If we are going to debate these issues, we at least should be accurate.

I thought that the base definition of equality was that it suggests that we are equal even though we are not uniform, even though we are different we are equal. Surely in a world of diversity of ideas, in a country where there is a free flow of ideas, there ought to be room for diversity of opinion among women's groups. Surely that ought not to threaten the equality of any of those groups and certainly should not cause other women's groups to inveigh on the integrity and the viability of such groups that have a different point of view.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the hon. member's time has expired.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—CRISIS IN CHINA—MANDATE OF UNITED NATIONS/EVACUATION PLANS FOR CANADIANS IN CHINA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I note that you noticed me first this time.

On June 5, 1989, we passed a motion in this House unanimously condemning the government of China for the murder of hundreds of Chinese students in Tiananmen Square.

Two days later, on June 7, I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs what action he has taken to persuade the United Nations Security Council to intervene directly as the crisis, though internal, posed a potential and imminent threat to global peace and security.

On both occasions the Secretary of State assured this House that the situation was being treated very seriously by the government and, in fact, that relations between China and Canada would not be "business as usual", until the Chinese government put, and I quote the Secretary of State:

> —a stop to the senseless killing and adopt a course of dialogue with the people of China.

These are Minister Clark's own words.

He went on to say that all events that were planned in the immediate future had been deferred or cancelled, that the signing of certain memorandums of understanding had been postponed, that nuclear co-operation consultations that were supposed to be ongoing had been suspended, and that visits were being deflected. In other words, everything was put on hold until such a time as the government of China would take some action to justify why in the light of recent events we should continue relations with that country.

Well, as we all know now, this was not to be. Within two months of these assurances, the government decided to go ahead with a $1 million loan for the sale of Canadian telephone equipment. Within two months of these assurances the government decided to go ahead with an additional $130 million loan for a hydroelectric project in China. Within two months of these assurances the government decided to go ahead and send a federal civil servant to a conference run by the Chinese government in the month of November.

All this was after a reported private meeting that the Secretary of State had with the Chinese foreign minister during the July conference on Cambodia. We must also remember that while this private meeting was going on, the House was in recess and the Prime Minister and Mr. Clark were still spewing forth about the tough action that the government was taking against China.

We are now hearing from China's new consul general in Toronto that, and I quote his words: "Both countries' foreign ministries have met and that the Canadian government has expressed its willingness to restore normal relations between the two countries". This is a man who, in the same breath, justified the murder of those students in Tiananmen Square and the ongoing executions by the very fact that they are different concepts of human rights depending on different ideologies.

This kind of action from a country that prides itself on its reputation for leadership in human rights issues all over the world is abhorrent. When the loss of lives is ignored in the interest of a dollar, it is time to re-examine our priorities. It is in the interest of the dollar that this government has decided to turn a blind eye to the atrocities that still continue in China today.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs claims that it would be far more dangerous to stop all relations with China. What he means is that it would not do Canada any good financially to stop relations with China. Our trade with China and the virtually untapped market that is in China may forever be closed to us if we were to be firm and to insist that our continual relations would depend vastly on a change in the attitude of the Chinese Government.

This type of inconsistent and contradictory behaviour brings to mind the future of those Chinese who are still here in Canada. One begins to wonder what the definition of turmoil is to this government. The Minister of Immigration has assumed that no Chinese nationals will be sent back to China while there is still turmoil in their homeland. If the government is so willing to maintain its relationship with China under the present circumstances, how long before it decides either that things have returned to normal or that it cannot afford the wrath of the Chinese government with which it needs to do business so desperately?

It is ironic that the Secretary of State is on a five day visit to the United Nations Assembly, with human rights at the top of his agenda. I hope for his sake that he is not asked to respond to his government's handling of this particular situation.

After much lobbying Canada got its seat on the Security Council. To date we have been shy to use our position to address any crisis that has occurred since then. I am thinking of the China crisis, and the Syrian–Lebanese crisis.

On October 1 of this year we will be presiding over the council for a period of one month. I would question whether for this government all these accomplishments are really anything more than exercises in diplomatics and public relations.

Over the last few years the United Nations has developed into a body that has gained wide acceptance and admiration because it is able to wield great influence. Therefore it gets things done. I sincerely hope the question of China is still on the agenda and, if not, that this government will push to have it put on the agenda as the number of arrests and executions continue to mount. I know that the parliamentary secretary has to reply on behalf of the minister. My criticism is not addressed to the parliamentary secretary, but at the way his government handled this situation. I know of his interest in human rights around the world. He knows that human rights violations have no borders. I know if he were the Secretary of State for External Affairs he would have handled it differently.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park is a thoughtful and experienced parliamentarian. Although this is a sensitive and, in many ways, a difficult issue I am glad that he has raised it.

At the conclusion of the debate in this House, the Secretary of State for External Affairs put forward a resolution which was adopted by all parties. It gave expression to three guiding principles that would try to frame Canadian policy in relation to China, following the tragedy of June.

The three basic principles that the Secretary of State outlined were these. First, to preserve existing links to the extent possible; second, to focus on people-to-people exchanges; and, third, there would be no support from Canada for the military and propaganda apparatus of China.

Now, it is very clear that in this matter we are walking a fine line. It is not an easy matter or always a black and white, simplistic matter to say we are expressing our condemnation of the Chinese regime and those actions. At the same time, we want to see China not revert into isolation where, unfortunately, it was for a quarter of a century, and that the links that have patiently been developed between our country and China not all be jeopardized at the same time. So it is clearly a difficult tight rope or fine line that any government of whatever persuasion would be walking. That, I think, was reflected in the unanimous resolution passed here.

I can say that the Secretary of State has publicly expressed the view that the two subsequent actions to which the hon. member has referred are consistent with the criteria that he has set out.

• (1810)

The further and final point I want to make is that the member referred to an official of the Chinese Government who had referred to a return to normalcy in Canadian-Chinese relations. Those were the Chinese official's words. That was his interpretation. That was in his interest to state, but that does not reflect the position of the Government of Canada. It does not reflect the position of where the government is going on this.

Chinese in this country, the students particularly, the guarantees that were given by the government stand. There will be no mass returning of people or of individuals who participated here. What was committed by the government stands as government policy.

Adjournment Debate

HEALTH—THALIDOMIDE—TASK FORCE REPORT—COMPENSATION FOR VICTIMS/REQUEST FOR EARLY ANNOUNCEMENT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): I rise today with regard to a question posed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on April 20, 1989.

On that particular occasion I requested of the minister responsible for health and welfare that a commitment be made and a subsequent decision thereafter be made in terms of providing compensation to those individuals who were affected with the thalidomide drug some time ago. On that occasion, the minister indicated to the House and to members present that no decision would be forthcoming until a comprehensive review could be undertaken.

I rise tonight to underline the seriousness of the request, the importance of compensation to those courageous young men and women who have been affected with this particular disability.

Some time ago the report of the thalidomide task force indicated the following: "The responsibility of the federal government to provide compensation for the victims of thalidomide was admitted in a statement made to a special committee of the House of Commons on January 29, 1963; by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Hon. J. Waldo Monteith. The minister at that time said: It is our job to ensure that these victims are cared for in the best possible manner. . .and that their needs are met to the fullest possible extent we can devise".

That was a statement which was made by a previous minister of the Crown. The Government of Canada, and particularly the Department of Health and Welfare, have been seized with this particular issue for so many years, in fact, 26 years. Recently, a task force report which was submitted to the minister in February outlined very clearly why they believe, as victims, and the organizers as well, that the Government of Canada ought to share in some of the responsibility for this particular, what I deem, disaster.

Unfortunately, this government, as well as previous governments, have not moved very quickly. Yes, it can be said of the present administration that it only received the report several months ago and is not in a position to make that decision. We should reverse the situation for a moment. We should ask ourselves: "What are these victims doing? What sort of lifestyle are they enjoying in 1989? What are the demands made of them in every day living, from housing, to medicare, to education and training?" Their marketability in terms of the job market must also receive careful consideration. I believe more so it requires action by the Government of Canada. These are men and women who, because of no fault of their own, have had to put up for some many years with the effects of this particular drug.

I am perfectly well aware of the arguments which have been made by legal counsel for the Government of Canada that to admit liability in some way would be setting a precedent. I do not argue on the basis of legal precedent. I argue on the basis of a moral responsibility that the Government of Canada must have towards its citizens regardless of where they live and indeed the circumstances in which they do live.

The International Commission of Health Professionals supports the Canadian thalidomide victims' claim and has done so. In fact, a statement of claim has been submitted to the Subcommittee of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights for its determination.

So this issue has now transcended, if you will, Canadian boundaries and is in the hands of the United Nations for a decision as to what it believes to be appropriate. I would like to ask through you, Mr. Speaker, to the parliamentary secretary, as to whether or not an affirmative decision can be made forthwith in order to provide the necessary compensation to alleviate some of the harm and some of the difficulties that these individuals have been confronted with for so many years. Second, is the minister prepared to stop putting preconditions in terms of compensation, and would he meet again, as he has in the past, with the organizers and the thalidomide victims to discuss in detail as to how compensation is provided and how it ought to be administered over an extended period of time?

In conclusion, I wish to say that this particular issue has received the support of many of my colleagues on this side of the House. I name two in support of what I am saying here today. My colleague from London East, as well as my colleague from Dartmouth, are both very supportive, as is our entire caucus, to the idea of providing the necessary compensation. I suggest, however, to the parliamentary secretary responding on behalf of the minister that that response is long overdue. I would hope that he will provide us with some positive news as to when the compensation will be forthcoming.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, many of us in the House remember the shock and sadness that accompanied the birth of the thalidomide babies around the world in the early 1960s. This unhappy event represented a profound challenge to the understanding and endurance of the medical and scientific communities and ultimately to the spirit and well-being of the thalidomide victims themselves.

At that time the federal government arranged with the provinces a cost-shared plan of assistance and support to thalidomide victims and their families. The program addressed not only the medical needs of the children but also the economic, psychological and social impact of the tragedy on those affected and the enhancement of rehabilitation services. The federal government was able to stimulate these co-operative efforts through four programs: national health grants, national welfare grants, the medical rehabilitation crippled children's program and the hospital insurance program.

The government pursued the recommendations of an expert committee established in 1962 to examine the habilitation of congenital anomalies with thalidomide and funded professional training for clinical rehabilitation workers, the establishment of regional prosthetic research and training centres and schools of prosthetics.

As the issue of financial compensation from the drug manufacturers developed, the government offered families of thalidomide victims whatever assistance they might require in presenting their cases to the company. A number of families took advantage of this offer and received settlement through this route.

In 1988, the War Amputations of Canada gathered together for the first time a number of Canadian thalidomide victims and out of this meeting grew the Thalidomide Victims Association of Canada and the Thalidomide Task Force. The task force prepared an extensive report of the Thalidomide tragedy and submitted its work to the Department of National Health and Welfare on February 14, 1989.

The government's review of the positions and perspectives presented by the task force began immediately. Central to the current issue is the task force's request for financial compensation on behalf of all surviving thalidomide victims in Canada.

On March 30, the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare met with representatives of the task force and the Thalidomide Victims Association in Toronto. The meeting provided all participants with an opportunity to exchange ideas and views. Several members of the task force and the association described the needs and aspirations of thalidomide victims in eloquent terms. The minister explained the process by which he and his officials are attempting to address their concerns and their requests, and those of other groups of Canadians who have represented their cases to the government.

This first meeting was an occasion to learn but the process is by no means complete. There has been substantial correspondence between the minister and the task force aimed at keeping open the lines of communication. We are confident this process can lead toward a shared appreciation of a basis on which extraordinary assistance can be extended.

It would not be true to the spirit of this process to prematurely speculate on the outcome, but thalidomide victims and others with requests now before the government need to be assured that their needs and concerns are being heard and considered with the utmost importance.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

THE PRESS

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I am rising under the provisions of Standing Order 31 with regard to an article that has appeared across the country. The article reports me as saying things that are anti-French and anti-Quebec.

The quotes that were used were taken from an article in Montreal's The Gazette written earlier this month in which I was discussing how my attitude has completely changed from that of when I was living in Montreal in 1978. I spoke of how I supported fostering better relations between the French and the English and how I myself am taking lessons in French. This, however, was omitted from the wire service story.

I want to apologize to those people who read the article and possibly got the impression that I was anti-French and anti-Québec. I am myself a member of an ethnic minority, and I can assure you I harbour no discriminatory feelings.

[English]

I believe that in Canada, being the cultural mosaic that it is, linguistic tolerance is one of the cornerstones of a Canadian democracy.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, the VIA Rail document recently presented to the priorities and planning committee of cabinet and leaked by The Winnipeg Free Press shows this government's blatant disregard and short-sightedness toward tourism, one of Canada's leading industries.

The government spends millions of dollars promoting train travel as part of its tourism product, while it simultaneously does a hatchet job on VIA. The Vancouver–Montreal route which is to be scrapped completely is an internationally renowned favourite with foreign travellers and enjoys an annual booking of over half a million passengers.

Cutting VIA routes to the extent indicated by the proposal will do serious harm to the businesses that rely on tourism and the tourism dollars which of course are generated by tourist travellers using the VIA Rail trains.

This hatchet job to VIA Rail will compromise the future of Canada's tourism industry and its ability to service the international tourism market.

Killing VIA Rail, Mr. Speaker, is indeed a false economy.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the release of the GST technical paper has sparked considerable interest in my riding of Sarnia—Lambton. It has spawned an insatiable appetite for information. Over the past weeks I have attempted to meet this demand with a wide variety of materials. Public forums, talk shows, personal newspaper columns and briefing packages, as well as finance publications have all been made readily available to my constituents.

In the end they are appreciative of my efforts and the information that they are receiving; information that depicts the inequities of the current system, information that gives them a better understanding and appreciation of how the GST will work and benefit our country, information that allows them to know and understand that the present FST is hidden and the GST will be very, very evident.

I think that we all can learn an important lesson from my experience. We as members of Parliament have a duty to provide our constituents with as much factual information as possible on the GST. Only from this type of knowledge base can they formulate fair, accurate and informative opinions.

POLAND

Hon. Steven Paproski (Edmonton North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of all members and all Canadians the fact that September 1, 1989 marks the fiftieth anniversary of Nazi Germany's invasion of Poland. With this tragic invasion one-half century ago the world was plunged into war.

The memory of the horrifying consequences that followed serve to remind all of us of the importance of maintaining peace in the world. It reminds us also of the priority we must place in offering assistance in resolving conflict among other nations through the UN and whatever other means are available to us.

Canada and its allies came to the defence of the Polish people during the Second World War and we, along with other nations, paid a heavy price. Many of our youth never returned to enjoy the life of prosperity that we have experienced in Canada since then. We have not forgotten those fallen heroes who ensured our continuing freedom.

And we also recognize that the Polish people persevere in their struggle for freedom and democracy 50 years later. Their persistence through the years brought some progress, and we rejoiced with the Polish people when we saw the recent election of Solidarity members to the Government of Poland.

On this the fiftieth anniversary of their loss of freedom we salute the courageous people of Poland who go on with their fight, and we wish them continued success.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on August 1, 1989 it was discovered that 27 bags of mail, some of it postmarked as early as December 1988, had remained undelivered in a privatized postal outlet in Woodbridge, Ontario. Upon learning of this, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, or CUPW, reported the incident to the media and then of course Canada Post quickly picked up the mail bags and commenced a damage control exercise.

Canada Post management then launched a grievance against the union accusing CUPW of "direct public criticism detrimental to the corporation's legitimate business interests".

This is simply nuts. Canada Post should have thanked the union for reporting the error and should have apologized to the people of Canada for the sloppy service. But, typically of Canada Post, it chose instead to shoot the messenger.

THE PRESS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a single country made up of different cultures in different regions. Sometimes people forget this and try to drive wedges between us.

Yesterday Canadian Press reported that a member of this national House went to Quebec during the recent election campaign. While there he was quoted as saying disparaging, divisive and unsettling things about Quebec and Quebecers. At a time when all regions of the country are feeling political pressures to pull in their own narrow self-interest this was a distressing report.

If anywhere, national unity has to be felt on the floor of the House of Commons. If anyone speaks for Canada it has to be members of Parliament. So I salute the member, my colleague here, for accepting this reality and apologizing to this House.

You are either for Canada or you are against Canada, and that means all of it. Linguistic tolerance, as my colleague has just said, is the cornerstone this country is built on. None of us can afford to forget that, even for a moment.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the decision last week by this government to move search and rescue from CFB Summerside to Nova Scotia certainly jeopardizes the work of the federal-provincial task force.

When this task force was set up by the federal government to examine the base closure, search and rescue was on the table for discussion. Now the government has chosen to ignore the process which it helped to set up.

I would urge the Department of National Defence to postpone any decision regarding CFB Summerside until the task force has submitted its report. Otherwise it will continue to undermine and compromise the credibility and the usefulness of this task force.

The people of Prince Edward Island are fed up with this kind of conduct.

VIA RAIL

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to comment on the government's plan to axe the passenger rail service in this country. British Columbians are accustomed to being ignored but we will not take it quietly.

VIA cuts to B.C. include reduction of the Transcontinental, elimination of the winter run on the Jasper–Prince Rupert line, and total disappearance of E & N passenger service on Vancouver Island. The E & N is near and dear to my heart. The island has always been my home. Some 9,000 people from only two federal ridings on Vancouver Island sent in petitions demanding that the E & N be saved; saved, expanded and run efficiently.

If VIA Rail had been running all its lines the way it has the E & N, no one can doubt that VIA management has played directly into the government hands. It has run its service so badly that anyone looking at the books would say "Shut it down".

I suggest this has been done deliberately in order to provide this government with the excuse it has been seeking. Some 9,000 from a small part of Vancouver Island would like to be heard. How many across Canada? British Columbians demand open debate and public hearings to voice their views. The government must listen.

ATLANTIC RAIL SERVICE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in 1981 when the then Liberal government cut back Atlantic service the Conservatives claimed to be outraged. In 1985 they reinstated the Atlantic route and issued a challenge to Atlantic Canadians: "Use it or lose it". Some statement.

Atlantic Canadians took these words to heart and in 1988 close to a million passengers rode the rails in the maritimes. A target was set for the Atlantic route—200,000 riders by 1990. That challenge was met in 1987 when 249,000 Atlantic Canadians rode on the Atlantic route. That challenge was met again in 1988 And again in the first four months of this year that challenge was met.

Atlantic Canadians have lived up to their part of the bargain but the government has not. The Conservative government has once again deceived Atlantic Canadians. It plans to eliminate all train service except what amounts to a thrice weekly tourist run in that region of the country where VIA is the most popular, and that is unacceptable. I challenge this government to remember its commitment to Atlantic Canadians. They have used it. They don't deserve to lose it.

ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, the Soviet central authorities have clearly demonstrated that they are unable or unwilling to lift a month long Azerbaijani blockade of Karabagh and Armenia. The delivery of desperately needed materials for the reconstruction of the earthquake stricken regions of Armenia has been blocked by Azerbaijani. In March of this year I saw the destruction and the suffering caused by the earthquake, and I believe that manipulating that tragedy for political ends is unacceptable.

I call on our government to bring the present critical situation to the attention of the UN General Assembly and other competent organs of the United Nations, to appeal to the Soviet authorities urgently to lift the blockade of Armenia and Karabagh, to ensure the security of the Armenian people in the region and, lastly, to organize a referendum in mountainous Karabagh in order to ascertain the majority will of the autonomous region.

BILL C-21

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary committee studying the unemployment insurance bill, Bill C-21, is now in its fourth week of intensive hearings. As of last night 143 out of the 183 groups appearing before the committee in all provinces have strenuously opposed this bill. That is overwhelming opposition.

These groups have pointed out that the cuts proposed in the bill will leave 775,000 unemployed Canadians with no or reduced unemployment insurance benefits. The only alternative for these Canadians will be provincial or municipal social welfare.

When will the Conservative government start listening to the grassroots of this country and withdraw this bill, send it back to the drawing board and present new legislation which will effectively help, not hurt, Canada's unemployed?

UNESCO

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this week the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Secretary of State for Canada, and the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education announced that Canada will soon ratify the UNESCO convention on the recognition of studies and diplomas. They also announced that a commission for the international recognition of foreign studies and diplomas will be created to apply the convention in our country.

The main purpose of this convention is to share information about educational, scientific, and technological resources. The commission will collect information on the education systems of other countries and make it available in Canada. It will also promote our education system internationally.

We welcome the efforts of the commission in the work it will carry out in the interests of fellow Canadians of all origins who have completed their schooling elsewhere. Their qualifications are not always fully recognized. The commission's work will help reduce such inequities by providing up to date and objective information to those who are involved in the recognition of foreign academic credentials.

Let us join in congratulating the ministers responsible for this excellent example of federal-provincial collaboration in an initiative that will benefit all Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

VIA RAIL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of Transport arrogantly refused to meet a delegation of this country's mayors to discuss the future of VIA Rail. The Prime Minister also should know that there are reports right across Canada today that at the very time the minister refused to meet our mayors he was at a cabinet meeting recommending the elimination of VIA routes to Sydney, Yarmouth, Edmundston, Sherbrooke, Brantford, Sarnia, London, and Trois Rivieres.

There are also reports that the minister recommended the elimination of the Halifax-Montreal train service. There are documents to the effect that the minister recommended destroying our most famous train service, The Canadian, from Montreal to Vancouver, across the Canadian Shield, through the prairies and across the Rocky Mountains.

I want to say to the Prime Minister, because we get nothing from his minister, that the time for cat and mouse games played with this House of Commons is over. Will the Prime Minister finally tell Canadians, or order his minister to tell Canadians, what cuts are in store for them on the service of VIA Rail and do it before this Parliament finally runs that minister out of town on a rail?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the Leader of the Opposition is wrong. I met the mayors of municipalities twice in June for a long time. I think they had a chance to express exactly what they wanted to express.

As I said yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition speaks out of both sides of his mouth. He said I refused to consult but he asked me to make a decision immediately. I believe we have to make up our minds. I will make a decision on official documents, not the one that the Leader of the Opposition is referring to. I issued no official document about the decision. When it is made I will be pleased to give official documents to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, returning again to the documents that are abroad in the country today, it is bad enough that the Minister of Transport recommended eliminating VIA Rail service from Winnipeg to Brandon to Regina to Calgary, but he actually recommended that the only train service available from Toronto to Niagara Falls be Amtrak, the American passenger rail service.

How could the Prime Minister continue to justify having in his cabinet a Minister of Transport who recommends that Ontario and the Niagara Peninsula be served only by the American national train service?

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, any representations the Minister of Transport has to make in the decision-making process are made in Cabinet. That is the procedure and it is the procedure I intend to follow, But I repeat, as I said in English, that I think it is essential, and the Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well that in the decision-making process, decisions are not made on the basis of leaked documents but on the basis of official documents. And that is what I intend to do. When the decision is made, I will be happy to give him some documents, but these will be official documents.

[English]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I think on this issue Canadians have come to the conclusion that enough is enough. American Express is going to run our banks and Amtrak is now going to run our rail service. Canadians are beginning to wonder when the United States postal service is going to deliver our mail. That is what Canadians are waiting for.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister mentioned consultation. Yesterday, the Prime Minister said here in the House how important the Finance Committee's hearings were for the future of his sale tax. However, his Minister of Transport, despite what he said today, tells us there will be no public hearings to determine the future of VIA Rail. I therefore have the following question for the Prime Minister: Does he intend to disown his Minister of Transport who, in the past few days, has shown utter contempt for the public consultation process? Will the Prime Minister guarantee that no cutbacks will be imposed on VIA Rail without regular, public consultation with Canadians across the country?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I said earlier. The reference levels for VIA Rail were given to the Department of Transport last April. It is now the end of September, and during that time I met dozens of people. I met mayors, and last week I had a meeting with the provincial ministers. I consulted, and I even had meetings with Members of the Opposition. So in that context, I think that any information that was out there was received. I repeat, a decision will be made as soon as we feel it is necessary to do so and we will communicate that decision, and this will be done, I repeat, according to the normal procedure, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. The 7,000 people who work for VIA Rail, whose livelihoods depend upon VIA Rail, and the millions of Canadians who support a rail passenger service in this country have a right to be heard on the future of VIA Rail.

This question has never been referred to the Commons transport committee for public hearings and it has never been referred to the National Transportation Agency for public hearings.

My question for the Prime Minister is quite simple. Yesterday the Prime Minister himself, on the floor of this House, made a strong case that it was critical in the case of the goods and services tax that the Commons finance committee be heard and that the government give the committee a chance to work and consider its recommendations. If the Prime Minister's principle of yesterday meant anything, will he tell this House today that the future of VIA Rail will be referred for full public hearings to the Commons transport committee and to the appropriate regulatory agency, the National Transportation Agency? Will he do that today?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I myself met with the committee on transport twice in May or June. The committee can have the discussions it wants. It is up to the committee to do what it wants, but at the same time I repeat what I said, that for six months now we have considered a lot of representations from VIA Rail.

Something is clear. The Minister of Finance, I think quite relevantly, has decided for the best of this country to determine new reference levels for VIA Rail, for a mode of transportation that only 3 per cent of Canadians use. I will make a decision within the fiscal responsibility. I think that is what Canadians want.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, "how ironic", in the words of Mayor Elsie Wayne on behalf of 24 mayors who received a collective slap in the face yesterday.

They were left waiting in the Railway Committee Room of the House of Commons for a Minister of Transport and/or a Prime Minister who never showed up. In her words, "how ironic to have a Prime Minister, who on the one hand professes to admire the glasnost of the Soviet Union, practising a dictatorial tactic in this country".

My question for the Prime Minister is quite simple. He has not answered it. Yesterday the Prime Minister said it was an important principle of parliamentary democracy that the Standing Committee on Finance of the House of Commons be heard on an important national matter like the goods and services tax before the government acted.

If he is consistent and sincere, will he give a commitment in this House today that the Commons transport committee and the National Transportation Agency will hold public hearings on the future of VIA Rail before this government brings down the axe?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in regard to glasnost and perestroika I would just tell my hon. friend in regard to VIA Rail and VIA Rail hearings that unless I am badly mistaken he was a member of the government which in 1981 walked in and, without so much as a single hearing, wiped out 20 per cent of VIA Rail service across the country.

Not only did they do it, they did it on a Friday night in the middle of summer. They did not even have the courage to confront the House of Commons. I think this is an absolutely shameful thing to have done.

The Minister of Transport is a model of consultation in a democracy compared with the Liberals.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I too have a question for the Prime Minister in the absence of a Minister of Transport who neither knows nor cares about transportation in this country.

• (1430)

The Prime Minister has just reminded this House of the Liberal tactic of passing an Order in Council in the middle of the summer on a Friday afternoon in order to cut 20 per cent. It was the Minister of Transport's intention, as he told the Transport Committee, to do the same thing in the middle of this summer. Only his dithering has prevented that from occurring. I want to ask the Prime Minister—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Angus: The Tory caucus may think this is funny, but to the seven million Canadians who use VIA Rail it is damned important.

I want the Prime Minister to indicate whether or not the priorities and planning committee of cabinet did consider this document that was referred to in the Winnipeg Free Press this morning, and if so, did P and P approve the recommendations to go to cabinet or did it reject them.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will first of all say to my friend that he knows very well that he asked me not to make a decision this summer. The decision has not been made. It is exactly as he wanted, and he is not happy again. I do not understand.

The process of decision by the cabinet is not made on leaked documents. That is very clear. I believe once again that what my friend wants to know is when the decision will be made. I will be pleased to tell him. But at the time I will give him official documents so the question could be more relevant to me in the House of Commons.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, we have been asking for those documents for a long time. The people of Canada would like to see them before the decision is made and before the Order in Council is passed, because at that point it becomes law.

If P and P has not made the decision, perhaps the Prime Minister could explain why over 130 VIA Rail employees were served notice of permanent lay-offs this morning, some of them with over 20 years of seniority and nothing to rely on. Could he explain how that decision is happening in the absence of any kind of cabinet decision?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, the decision about VIA Rail has been made within the current operations of the corporation. They are working at the present time. The corporation wants to operate within the reference levels we have given. They did before. Years before there were no decisions as we have to make. They will do it again. Regardless of the fact that we have to make decisions today, those people have been laid off in the regular process of the operations of a Crown corporation. That is all.

Mr. Angus: That is a regular process according to the Tory philosophy, I think.

Mr. Speaker, my final question is to the Prime Minister. Again I want to go back to him because we have a Minister of Finance who is dictating the monetary aspects of VIA Rail. We have a Minister of Transport who is taking the approach of elimination of service. I want him to accept his responsibility. I ask the Prime Minister if, finally, he will appoint a cabinet minister responsible for transportation who believes in rail passenger services, not just in air and road transportation.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I think I believe as much as the member believes in rail transportation. But, in my view, it is not necessary to put $700 million into a service which is not used by Canadians. Only the NDP do not worry about where we get the money. You can expend the money. I am trying to see where I would best spend the money for all transportation in this country.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. This country has had experience with leaked documents. One of them became a Budget.

This leaked document will mean the loss of 180 out of 210 jobs in the city of Moncton. That makes a total of 2,000 people who have lost their jobs in Moncton over the last two years.

This government is interested in freight and not people. They have hearings for CN abandonment of lines, but they do not have them for VIA.

Given the Minister of Transport's refusal to meet the mayor of Moncton yesterday, will the Prime Minister give his commitment for full public transportation committee hearings in Moncton and across this country?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question. I said that I met with the mayors of Saint John and Mississauga. If you are from Ontario, you will know very well that when the mayor of Mississauga has something to say she does not need to say it twice. We understand it very well the first time.

I would like to say as well that I believe consultations have been made. We have to make a decision. The people of New Brunswick, like everyone else in the country, have had the chance to make their views known, and I have taken them into account. Now it is time for a decision.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. Given that two million passengers use VIA in the Windsor-Quebec corridor representing 17 per cent of the travelling public, and given that Sarnia-London represents the gateway to Chicago and the mid-west with its great tourist potential, how can this government with its perverted logic even consider cutting VIA service to the corridor?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, very shortly we will know exactly the future of VIA Rail—when the decision will be made. It is just speculation and premature to say what he said.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. We have read that the west is losing The Canadian, our nation's original transcontinental train. We have also read that the Minister of Transport is recommending a so-called luxury service connecting Toronto to Calgary.

Will the Prime Minister tell us today which of his good friends in the private sector will be picking up passengers in Brandon, Kenora, Moose Jaw, Swift Current, Maple Creek, Medicine Hat and many other communities across the west that he is forcing VIA Rail to abandon?

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, once again, the decisions concerning VIA Rail are made following a normal procedure and certainly not based on documents that no one has seen, leaked documents, documents which, again, have not been submitted to me. In this context, any information of that kind is not serious and is not to be considered.

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Transport. Does the Minister of State, who is southern Ontario's voice in cabinet, agree with and support the cuts to VIA Rail in an area where the highways and skyways are already congested and clogged? How can she stay in cabinet under these circumstances?

Hon. Shirley Martin (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, as the voice in cabinet for southern Ontario, and as the Minister of Transport has said, we do not comment on leaked documents. When the decisions are made, then I will make my comments.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is he awake over there?

This Conservative government said to the people of the Atlantic region regarding rail passenger service, "Use it or lose it". In fact, VIA passenger ridership this year to date is up 30 per cent. The people of the Atlantic have kept their end of the bargain.

My question to the minister is this. Will the minister now keep his end of the bargain with the people of the Atlantic and assure them that there will be no slashing or cutting or gypping of Atlantic Canadians of their rail passenger service?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, when I was the Minister of Employment this member was my critic. I think he was a little more serious, because I have already answered that question.

I said, of course, if we consider the philosophy of his party, we will expend all the money we can without giving thought to where we will get the money. We believe Canadians want a system of transportation which is national, which can give the services to Canadians with the affordability we have and in a way that will sustain all transportation systems in the country. That is what we are trying to provide to all Canadians, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rodriguez: My supplementary is to the same minister. I recall that when I was the critic for employment and immigration this minister was a lot more serious and thoughtful about unemployment matters.

In view of the fact that Atlantic Canadians are finding themselves increasingly isolated from this government, first with budget cuts, then with GST, with back-benchers who make all sorts of insulting remarks about Atlantic Canadians, Summerside and a whole host of other matters, I want to give the minister this opportunity, to get on the better side of Atlantic Canadians—one more opportunity, one more try. Can the minister stand in his place and assure Atlantic Canadians that there will be no cut-backs in VIA Rail service in the future?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for Nickel Belt that I will try to manage the Department of Transport in a way that respects the reference levels which have been given to me by the Minister of Finance in light of the fiscal reality of Canada. I believe, as a responsible minister, I have to take into account the reality of the economy of Canada. I have to work out any option which will permit Atlantic Canada, central Canada or western Canada to respect that purpose. It is what I will do.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Over the last number of months over 200,000 Atlantic Canadians have signed petitions opposing any cut-back in VIA Rail service. All four Atlantic premiers have said that they are opposed to such cuts.

Yesterday, in a monumental display of ignorance and contempt, the Minister of Transport refused to meet with Mayor Elsie Wayne and 24 other municipal leaders from across Canada to discuss this very serious issue. Since the Minister of Transport says that he has consulted enough, then either the Minister of Transport is deaf or he is so arrogant that he has refused to listen. Mr. Prime Minister, which is it?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I think once again that it is not arrogant to say that I met Mayor Wayne from New Brunswick. I met also Mayor McCallion from Mississauga. I met a lot of people.

But once again I repeat what I said. I think it is time to make a decision. That is what we will do, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, given that regional rail service out of Halifax is gone, given that students and seniors and the sick will have no recourse, and given most particularly that this government has wreaked more havoc on Halifax and Nova Scotia than the explosion of 1917, I ask the Prime Minister why has he singled out Halifax and Nova Scotia to be blown off the rails?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, once again I ask the hon. member to wait for the decision, wait for the decision and she will have the time to make her comments after. But for now, wait, Mr. Speaker. Wait for the decision, please.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago, we heard Finance Department officials tell us that the cost of food in Canada could go down by about 2 per cent. We no longer hear such affirmations. Instead, Mr. Speaker, we hear food companies talk about food costs increasing by 10 to 13 per cent, if the GST base is broadened.

My question for the Minister of Finance is this: Given Canadians' concerns and their fierce opposition to any tax on food, can the Minister of Finance tell us today, categorically and clearly, that there will be no food tax in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have commented on that particular question on a number of occasions in the House. I do not propose to do so again.

I would say that the comments the hon. member is referring to about the possible increase in the cost of food that we referred to yesterday in the committee hearings are based clearly on a guesstimate of what costs might be incurred. I think he will understand that there are offsets to those costs because of the fact that food will not be taxable under the proposal, and that in the proposal there will be credits that food companies will receive. So they will see some of their costs reduced as well.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, a lot things are being said about the cost of food in Canada, but particularly my question to the Minister is this. Senior citizens in this country feel that they have been under attack for the last four or five years. There have been deindexation of pensions, increasing costs across the board and a claw-back scheme.

Now it seems to me only reasonable that the minister could soothe those fears by standing in his place and stating very clearly to Canadians that under no circumstances will his government tax food. That is a very simple plea on the part of Canadians who feel they have been under serious attack by this government over the last four or five years. Can he say clearly in the House, no, there will be no tax on food for Canadians, seniors or otherwise?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have responded to the concern that senior citizens have expressed with the proposal that is before the House today. I want to remind the hon. member of the ways in which we have attempted to design the package with the concerns and the interests of senior citizens very much in mind. There is the exemption of basic groceries. There are the other exemptions on medical devices, prescription drugs, health care services, non-profit homemaker services and meals-on-wheels. All of these things were designed and put specifically in the goods and services tax package to directly address the concerns of senior citizens.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It has been five months since the announced closing of CFB Portage. With that closure the minister announced that the department was going to secure private pilot training capability. I would like to know if the minister has acted on that promise, and if he is considering Portage La Prairie to train the defence pilots.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and also for his assistance in seeking meaningful economic activity in his community.

With respect to the primary training that is presently done at Portage, we sent out a solicitation of interest to some 260 companies around the world, including several in Canada. We received replies and expressions of interest from some 57. Those are being reviewed now. I can inform the hon. member that several of those expressions of interest included use of existing facilities presently in Canada. After the evaluation has been concluded, I am sure that I will be able to announce to the House and to those interested, the decisions that will be made.

FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a rather sensitive question for the Prime Minister of Canada. I want to know whether or not the chairman of the finance committee was stating government policy when he said yesterday, after seniors appeared before the committee, and I quote, "They, seniors, live at a slower pace and they do not spend money in the same sense that you and I do. Older people don't wear out their clothes, don't wear out their furniture, don't run around, and all that costs money".

I want to know whether or not the chairman of the finance committee was enunciating government policy concerning senior citizens who have built this country and who have paid their taxes. Does he owe them an apology? I want him to get up in this House now and say that he apologizes for this kind of a statement.

• (1450)

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to speak on behalf of the chairman of the finance committee.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The chairman of the finance Committee may or may not have expressed those views. I do not know whether or not he is quoted out of context.

Clearly, as I indicated to a previous question, the concerns of senior citizens have very much been taken into account as we have designed a package for the goods and services tax. I will not repeat the various ways we have done so. But, clearly, if one takes an objective view of the various ways we have responded to those concerns, I think that senior citizens would say this package is a very solid and very sensitive one for the senior citizens of Canada.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, this is not a laughing matter. What I want to know from the chairman of the finance committee is whether or not he was speaking on behalf of the Minister of Finance, whether or not he was speaking on behalf of the Government of Canada when he said that older people don't wear out their clothes, don't wear out their furniture, don't run around, and all that costs money. Will he now apologize to the senior citizens of this country?

Mr. Speaker: The first question was directed to the government. The second question was directed to the chairman of the committee. That, of course, is out of order.

Some Hon. Members: It is not!

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. Minister of Finance wishes to respond, I will hear the minister.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I believe the question the hon. member was putting was, was the chairman of the finance Committee speaking on behalf of me. The answer is simply no.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

Many times, the Finance Minister has not kept his word to Canadian small businesses.

In his White Paper on sales tax reform, the Minister said that a good sales tax system should not impose heavy administrative costs on businesses.

According to the Retail Council of Canada, it will cost $2 billion to administer the new tax, Mr. Speaker.

Is the Finance Minister ready to listen to small businesses and immediately withdraw this planned tax which will really create a nightmare for Canadian small businesses? We will lose 80 per cent of the jobs created by these same businesses.

[English]

Mr. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, no, I certainly will not withdraw the proposal that has been put before the House of Commons. I will also say that there are a number of things that have been missed and have not been emphasized by people who have commented on the impact of the GST on small business.

We have put in streamlined accounting proposals that will address some of the complexities that have been raised by the small business community. The invoices that the small business people use for income tax purposes will also be able to be used without any additional accounting for the GST accounting. There will be a one-page tax form for small business to fill out so that virtually everyone in the country will have a one-page tax form to fill out.

In addition, we are providing for less frequent filing, less frequent calculations of the GST for small business. We are going to provide them with up to a $600 offset fee in order to offset some of those compliance costs.

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I don't think the minister has been speaking lately to his friend John Bulloch. Ninety-seven per cent of Canadian small businesses are against this new sales tax. Why does the minister not listen to the voice of small business in Canada and withdraw the tax immediately before it is too late?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that over the past five years the small business community has received tremendous support from this government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Small businessmen have said to me that if ever there has been a government that understands and has tried to deal with the problems and the challenges that small business face it is this government. We have done so in many ways, in this and other forms of government policy in the last five years.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): My question is for the Minister of Finance. The GST technical paper has stated that the GST will result in an increase in the price of a $150,000 home of only $480. The Canadian Home Builders' Association has calculated the additional cost to be $3,025. A Vancouver tax consulting firm has calculated the cost to be $11,552, or 24 times the government's estimate.

In view of the obvious inaccuracies in the GST paper, will the minister withdraw the technical paper and tell the Canadian public the real truth about the effect of GST on Canadian homes?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think anybody who is listening to this debate will realize that someone who says that the impact that we have stated is out by a factor of 24 times clearly will understand that whoever is using that figure is overstating his case by a significant margin.

I want to comment specifically on where the differences are between the home builders and the figures that we have put in the technical paper. The CHBA has used old data which systematically is understating the existing federal sales tax burden in the price of houses now.

Mr. Pickard: Use 1989 figures.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The hon. member says we should be using 1989 data. We are using the most up-to-date data that is available today. The building association is ignoring the changes that have already taken place in the existing sales tax and they do not assume that they are going to pass on the savings that are there from the existing sales tax in the application of the new sales tax. If those savings are passed on, and I call on the building association to pass on those savings, then those figures are way out of line.

Mr. Karpoff: I think the person who is naive if he makes the assumption that they are going to be passed on is the Minister of Finance, not the home builders association.

My supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance. When factors like GST induced inflation, higher interest rates and increased taxes are all considered, the average down payment on a Vancouver home of $190,000 will be an increase of $3,658, and the average increase in monthly mortgage payments will be $230. How can the minister say that GST will not affect the affordability of housing with those types of figures?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, what puzzles me about the hon. member's questions is that with the statements that he is making he is endorsing the home builders not passing on the savings. Surely, it is up to him to press those home builders to pass on those savings so that the consumers in his riding will benefit from the clear economic benefits that are going to accrue from this sales tax reform.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and concerns the threat to the Canadian dairy marketing system that we have in this country.

• (1500)

On January 28, 1988, the government passed an Order in Council to transfer ice cream and yoghurt from the tariff list to the import control list in order to protect this industry.

Given the fact that the United States had a total ban on these products coming into their country from Canada, why did the government choose this method to provide protection to the Canadian supply management and marketing board system?

Now there is a challenge by the United States. There was no provision in the free trade deal to do this. Obviously, it has been challenged by the United States and that has been sustained by a GATT panel.

Can the minister say why that method was chosen, and why he has placed in jeopardy the livelihood of some 34,000 dairy farmers across the country; not only their quotas, but their mortgages, their farms, their whole livelihood? Why has he placed them in jeopardy like this?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think I answered that question yesterday. The action that was taken to put ice cream and yoghurt on the import control list was done fully consistent with the principles of GATT. There has been a GATT panel ruling on the issue.

I am glad he now acknowledges the fact that this is not a free trade issue but rather a GATT issue. It was the GATT panel that brought down the ruling fully consistent with the GATT process. We intend to fight that issue fully consistent with the GATT process.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the approach or the method was wrong because the United States won the first round of that appeal. In view of the fact that we have lost on ice cream and yoghurt and that we were slapped with a pork countervail, will the minister bring the producers and their organizations into future GATT negotiations as active front line participants, rather than trade away their livelihoods in secret negotiations behind closed doors?

Mr. Mazankowski: I appreciate that question, Mr. Speaker. Because the hon. member is usually up to date on agricultural issues, I am surprised that he is not aware of the fact that we established a dairy task force. We are in the process of establishing a poultry task force. The dairy task force has been fully involved in this issue, and they will be fully involved in the action that we take defending their interests at the GATT.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, in June of 1985, Charles Ng escaped from the United States, came to Canada, crossed the border at Windsor, travelled to Calgary, and shot a security guard at a Hudson's Bay store.

In August 31, this past month, the Supreme Court decided not to hear the case of the Supreme Court appeal on Charles Ng's extradition.

I would like to ask the Minister of Justice: Is it now his intention to sign the extradition request, with all due haste, returning Ng to the United States?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise the House that counsel for Mr. Ng has made submissions. We will be taking those submissions into account and discharging our statutory duty as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Speaker: A single question from the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of defence. In the spring budget the federal government started the process of killing Manitoba's status as a defence centre by announcing the closure of CFB Portage and the transfer of military personnel from Winnipeg to Edmonton.

In addition to these cuts which would seriously damage Manitoba's economy, it is now reported that Manitoba's militia headquarters will be transferred to the city of Edmonton.

I would like the minister of defence to confirm today whether the militia staff will indeed be transferred from Winnipeg to Edmonton and, if so, how many jobs will be a lost in the province of Manitoba.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will review the White Paper he will find that there were four military regions going to be established in the White Paper because of the total force concept. That means that there will be headquarters in his region.

At the present time consideration is being made as to the relocation of the existing militia headquarters. There will be a militia district maintained. Where the headquarters will be located has not been decided, but there will be four mobile force headquarters established for the Total Force concept.

I ask him to review the White Paper so that he can be more familiar with it.

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

PRESENTATION OF REPORTS OF COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, two reports. The first is the report of the Canadian section of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association of the official parliamentary delegation which represented Canada at the first annual Commonwealth-wide parliamentary seminar in Lusaka, Zambia, from June 18 to June 30, 1989.

The second is the report of the Canadian section of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association of the official parliamentary delegation which represented Canada at the twenty-ninth annual regional CPA conference in Calgary and Edmonton, Alberta from July 12 to July 17, 1989.

Routine Proceedings

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-36, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. minister have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Ferguson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member could tell me why he is seeking the floor?

Mr. Ferguson: I wish to speak to the motion to withdraw this bill, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member could check with his colleagues, because I think the point about which the hon. member is concerned may come up a little later.

CANADIAN HERITAGE LANGUAGES INSTITUTE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. minister have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-260, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (spousal agreement).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to correct an inequity that has developed in the legislation governing the Canada Pension Plan.

• (1510)

As a result of a decision rendered by the Pensions Appeal Board in the case of Preece vs. Preece, many spouses lost the right to the division of pension plan credits in the event of marital breakdown, even though they had been informed that the division of the CPP was an unassignable right.

This bill will restore the law to its original intent before the Preece vs Preece judgment.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South—Weston on a point of order.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I believe I gave notice earlier this day of my intention to table a private member's bill.

Mr. Speaker: I want to apologize to the member for York South—Weston who was overlooked. However we can proceed.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-261, an act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of the unborn).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, Canada has been without an abortion law since January 1988. For 21 months there has been a legal vacuum in Canada where the innocent unborn have not been afforded the protection of law.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the last 21 months have caused considerable concern to Canadians across the country with respect to this particular issue. The Supreme Court of Canada has not ruled in a definitive way with respect to this. The government itself has not provided the necessary leadership.

Accordingly I would like to introduce today a bill that would in effect protect the innocent unborn from the moment of conception. This bill would ensure that the unborn of Canada are given the protection of the Criminal Code of Canada from the moment of conception.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: With the consent of the House I would like to revert momentarily to presentation of reports from committees.

FOURTH, FIFTH AND SIXTH REPORTS OF CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the pleasure to present to the House the fourth, fifth and sixth reports, in both official languages, of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I have two motions both of which have been discussed with the House Leaders of the opposition parties and agreed to. The first one is as follows. I move:

> That the order for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be discharged.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Government House Leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion? The hon. member for Algoma.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on this matter because the government House leader has moved to withdraw Bill C-32. The government introduced, as I understand it, a few moments ago—and I objected to it—a new bill to replace Bill C-32. I think it is highly unusual that the government would be introducing a new bill while the other one is still on the Order Paper.

Clearly Bill C-32 is a cobbled up bill. There were mistakes in it. Apparently the government is withdrawing it and replacing it because of technical problems and so on. There is a great ground swell in the country opposing Bill C-32 as well, not just because of the technical flaws in it but because it removes a very important and essential part of the farming support program, the cash advance program which has brought some $25 million to $27 million worth of benefits in interest-free cash advances to prairie farmers which are desperately needed this fall, and similar kinds of support for eastern farmers for corn, grain, and oilseeds.

Although we are glad to be rid of Bill C-32, we are not pleased with the replacement because as far as supporting and assisting Canadian agriculture it is no better than Bill C-32.

Mr. Speaker: I am going to recognize the hon. member who was rising I think on this same point. I must advise the hon. member, though, that this is not the place to argue the merits of the former bill or the one that the Minister of Justice is proposing to introduce. If the hon. member has a point of order of course I will hear it.

Mr. Ferguson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that most of the Canadian harvest is already completed and in the bins and that producers are anxiously awaiting the benefits from the current legislation, I would like to suggest that the minister use the current legislation and sign the agreements with the producer organizations for this year. Then, of course, if he wants to reintroduce a bill later on in the year and through negotiations with the producers bring in something more acceptable than previously tabled here today, I think it would be to the credit of the government.

Most of the western Canadian harvest, however, is already completed. The grain is in the bins; corn and soybean harvests are under way in Ontario at the present time; the tobacco harvest is already completed; the potato harvest has begun in Atlantic Canada, so I think it is an ill-conceived time to try to set aside legislation that has served Canadian farmers for so many years so effectively.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister of Justice is rising on the point of order, and of course I am going to hear him. I know the hon. member for Mackenzie wishes to rise, but this is not the place to debate either of the bills. This is just an absolutely procedural move. If the House does not accept it then the House does not accept it, but it is not a place to argue it. The hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would simply say that the allegations by both members for Algoma and Lambton—Middlesex are unfounded.

As I indicated when I introduced the motion, it was agreed upon by the House leaders in our meeting yesterday that it would go through on the nod. My relationship with the House leaders for the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party is such that I just want the House to know that I attribute none of this to the House leader of the Official Opposition. I think these colleagues are off on a frolic of their own.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: I indicated that I would hear the hon. member for Mackenzie. I recognize the hon. member and hope that the hon. member will keep in mind that this is strictly a procedural matter. If the hon. member has a point of order which I have to take into account then I of course will do so, but I am not hearing debate.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of the House and to yourself that there is some question as to the propriety of the method used by the hon. government House leader today.

I think it would have been a more acceptable practice in this House, had he wished to withdraw the bill, if he had done so before he introduced an alternate bill. Today he did it, I submit, backward.

We have given him the right to withdraw the Bill C-32. It is not an initiative that anyone in agricultural Canada approves of. We are happy to see that being withdrawn, but we think he did it backward in introducing an alternate piece of legislation. He should have waited another day for that, at least.

Mr. Speaker: I have heard the hon. member's point. I think it is my obligation now to remind the House that the motion of the hon. Minister of Justice reads:

> That the order for second reading and reference to a legislative committee of Bill C-32, an act to amend the Advance Payment for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be discharged.

Does the hon. government House leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REVISION OF STANDING ORDERS

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, this motion has also been discussed with the House leaders of the opposition Parties and has been approved by them. I move:

> That, effective Monday, October 9, 1989, the Standing Orders of the House of Commons be changed as follows:
> That Standing Order 104(2) be amended:
> 1) by deleting paragraph (c) and substituting the following therefor:
> "(c) Communications and Culture;"
> 2) by adding immediately after paragraph (p) the following new paragraph:
> "(q) Multiculturalism and Citizenship;" and
> 3) by relettering the subsequent paragraphs accordingly;
> That Standing Order 108(2) be amended by deleting the words "except those set out in sections (3) and (4) of this Standing Order" and substituting the following therefor:
> "except those set out in sections 3(b), 3(c), 3(d), 3(e) and (4) of this Standing Order,"; and
> That the reference in Standing Order 108(3)(a) to "Communications, Culture, Citizenship and Multiculturalism" be changed to "Multiculturalism"and Citizenship".

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if that should not read October 10. October 9 is a statutory holiday. I do not know if you can do any business that day.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I would submit that it is in order to have it read Monday, October 9. The House will not be sitting so I think the question is moot. However, if my hon. friend wants to be here, I am sure he can read the motion at that time.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. government House leader have the unanimous consent of the House to move the motion? The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I just want to take this occasion to say how much we appreciate this motion today. When the decision was to consolidate a number of the standing committees we heard from a number of people who indicated an inclination to have a separate committee as this special order indicates. I want to say to the government House leader that we appreciate bringing forward this motion in terms of recognizing the concerns Canadians brought to the government's attention.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. government House leader have unanimous consent of the House to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians in the London, Woodstock and Windsor areas of the province of Ontario.

It basically is in support of continued VIA Rail service and it concludes: wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound, and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition on behalf of Canadians, including many residents of Ottawa—Vanier, who reject the new sales tax on goods and services which the Conservative Government intends to introduce.

Canadians object to a tax that will raise taxes, increase inflation and interest rates and cut jobs. Canadians, in my riding especially, object to this invisible tax that will bring chaos to business and create an administrative nightmare for small businesses. Canadians object to this new Mulroney tax that will hit essential services.

Mr. Speaker, I have a large number of constituents who want to table this petition, and I do so, sadly, on their behalf.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present 43 names on a petition from the citizens of Belleville who state that whereas the government has decided to eliminate many of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs; that Canadian people deserve a high quality passenger rail service, including modernized equipment throughout the network and a rapid rail system for the corridor, and that rail passenger mode is the safest and most environmentally friendly mode of travel, the petitioners state that the annual subsidies provided by the Government of Canada to VIA Rail are not disproportionate to subsidies required for highway infrastructure or for airports, that many rural communities rely exclusively on rail passenger service, and that the tourism industry in Canada relies on rail passenger service. We have had this since 1885 and it has been an integral part of Canada's public transportation network.

They call on Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger services throughout this country.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Speaker, I have a second petition relating to the goods and services tax, signed by petitioners from Montreal, stating that the Conservative federal government has already imposed 31 new taxes or tax increases on Canadians, increased the manufacturers sales tax from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent, and now wishes to add a general 9 per cent tax on goods and services. This new tax will be hidden from Canadians and applied to everything they buy, virtually.

The imposition of this new general tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians. They therefore suggest that this will be an onerous burden on small businesses and all the other causes and ask us to oppose this tax with vigour. I therefore deposit these for your consideration.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadian citizens who call upon Parliament to urge the government not to cancel, in whole or part, rail passenger services in Canada. This petition has been duly certified and signed.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the duty to submit two petitions, which have been certified correct, from Canadian citizens from St. Thomas, Brantford, Windsor, London, Toronto, Ottawa, and a host of other places in southern Ontario, in which they petition this House.

Whereas the government has failed to provide the resources necessary to fulfil its promise of improved passenger rail service, the undersigned, your petitioners, pray and call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service. As duty bound, your petitioners will continue to pray.

• (1530)

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I have some petitions today on the same topic, all of which have been certified correct according by the clerk pursuant to Standing Order 36. The first group of petitions containing 3,184 signatures of western Canadians is joined with a second group which is also signed mainly by western Canadians but does include some people from Ontario. It contains an additional 4,163 signatures.

These 7,347 Canadians all express concern that Canada not become recognized as a haven for foreign fugitives and call upon the Government of Canada to revise the extradition laws which would allow the Minister of Justice to order the extradition of fugitives either immediately or after they have been dealt with fully by the Canadian penal system.

If my addition is correct, these signatures bring the total to 79,778 Canadians who have signed petitions and submitted them to the House of Commons.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty to present two petitions today that have been certified by the clerk of petitions. These petitions are in protest against the mindless activities of the government to decimate VIA Rail.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present today many petitions. In fact, I have hundreds of petitions containing the signatures of over 9,000 people from Calgary in particular who want to retain the uniformity of the RCMP dress uniform.

These petitioners say that the RCMP has a long and honourable tradition, known and admired around the world. They are not discriminating on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability. The uniform of our RCMP is part of our Canadian heritage and our Canadian culture. It must be protected. It must be preserved.

These petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP by retaining the uniformity of the dress code with all the recognized colour and trappings that have such great historical value for our country.

All these petitions have been certified.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of several dozen Canadians who are very concerned about the goods and services tax. They point out that 31 new taxes have been imposed by the government and that the manufacturers' sales tax has been increased from 9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. They also point out that the tax will be hidden and that it will be very unfair to low and middle income Canadians. It will impose an onerous burden on small business. They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax which this government is trying to impose on Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by several persons from southwest Ontario who are condemning the government for the proposed VIA Rail cuts. They call upon the government not only to restore service but to increase service in an age that is demanding safer and more environmentally friendly modes of transportation, particularly in a part of Canada, southwestern Ontario, where the highways and the airways are becoming increasingly clogged by other modes of transportation.

This petition has been duly certified as correct.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition to this House from citizens of Toronto, London, Waterloo and Woodstock in the province of Ontario.

These petitioners point out this Conservative government has failed to keep its promise to improve rail passenger service throughout Canada and, in fact, it has gone further in its moves to cut rail passenger service. This is anticipated any time now.

Therefore, these people who have signed the petition call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid and economic, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other forms of transportation.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and the duty to present to Parliament on behalf of concerned citizens from my area and the surrounding area a petition denouncing the despicable goods and services tax which this Conservative government will be trying to ram through this House.

As this is an unfair tax, it will be relentlessly opposed in the weeks and months ahead as these petitioners want us to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty as well to present to this honourable House a petition signed by Canadians from the Windsor area who, like my constituents in Beauséjour; object to the Government's tax proposal.

[English]

The petitioners fear and are concerned that this new invisible tax will create hardship for Canadian families and will also be an additional burden to small businesses.

VIA RAIL—OPPOSITION TO BUDGETARY CUT-BACKS

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which conforms to the requirements under Standing Order 36 and concerns the Tory Government's proposed cutbacks at VIA Rail.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger services in Canada.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition regarding the RCMP dress code signed by citizens of the riding of Carleton—Gloucester and duly certified by the clerk of the House of Commons.

The petitioners request the Canadian Parliament to preserve the distinctive heritage and tradition of the RCMP by retaining the uniformity of the dress code with all the recognizable colour and trappings that have such great historical value for this country.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today to present a petition duly certified by the clerk of the House of Commons. This petition is signed by several hundred members of the community of Windsor, Ontario which is my adopted city.

They pray that the government change the proposed terms of the goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition with respect to the proposed changes to VIA Rail. It is a certified petition signed by the proper number of people. This was presented to us from the good citizens of Belleville, Ontario, while we were on our task force on VIA Rail.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure, honour and duty to present a petition certified according to the accepted rules and procedures. It is on the insensitive goods and services tax, another tax on top of all the other horrendous and insensitive taxes imposed by this government on Canadians. It is one that is particularly harsh,

[Translation]

I table this petition for your consideration.

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to present to this House petitions from senior citizens, students, tour operators, people in the hospitality industry, who demand that VIA be kept intact so that this country can have a national passenger rail service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and honoured to stand in the House today. I have three petitions to present. The first one has 296 signatories who strongly oppose the imposition of a goods and services tax which they feel is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

My second petition has 183 signatories and it concerns music education. These petitioners feel that a sales tax on music education will hurt the average family for whose music education would become too costly. The music educators are active participants in the education departments of every province in Canada and their knowledge and expertise prepare students with qualifications.

Therefore, the undersigned petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider music studies as an educational process and therefore exempt music education from the proposed sales tax.

• (1540)

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my third petition contains 45 signatories. It is protesting the proposed cuts to VIA Rail. These petitioners are from the area of Belleville, Ontario. They feel that the rail passenger services have been an integral part of Canada's public transportation and humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel rail passenger services in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty today to present a petition on behalf of the citizens of Canada who oppose the government's goods and services tax. This tax will create a burden on small and medium-sized businesses, senior citizens, all home-owners, tenants, low and middle-income Canadians and many other sectors of our society.

These Canadians are asking this Parliament to reject this unfair tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I too have a petition which has been duly certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It relates to the VIA Rail service in this country.

It has been signed by a group of petitioners who are concerned about the fate of VIA Rail under this government. They want no part of cuts. They want the service retained and they are urging all of us and particularly the government of the day to put a stop to any notion of cutting back on passenger rail service in this country.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by some 46 people from southwestern Ontario who point out that the Government of Canada has failed to provide the necessary resources to fulfil its promise for improved passenger rail service to the region. The government's deregulation of air passenger service has dramatized this even more by pointing out the need for safe, convenient, economical, rapid and environmentally sound alternative passenger service.

The petitioners call upon the government to improve and modernize VIA Rail in the area to provide just those kinds of services.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty as well to join with my colleagues to present a petition to this House with respect to the government's intention to impose a goods and services tax. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians oppose this particular tax and it is with pleasure that I present a petition on behalf of a significant number of Canadians who wish to express their opposition to the tax, and to request the Government of Canada to come to its senses and to rescind this particular tax.

VIA RAIL—OPPOSITION TO BUDGETARY CUT-BACKS

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition, in accordance with Standing Order 36, signed by Canadians who object to the cutbacks at VIA Rail, for the simple reason that everywhere else in the world tremendous sums have been invested to update this transportation mode, while we here in Canada are intent on getting rid of it.

It is with feelings of great frustration that people wonder why, at a time when this means of transportation is expanding to an incredible extent everywhere else in the world, we are going in the opposite direction.

[English]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): I have the honour and privilege to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from citizens from Belleville to Scarborough, Ontario, who are telling us, among other things, that rural communities rely exclusively on passenger rail service. They request that we on this side of the House urge the Government of Canada not to cancel, in whole or in part, rail passenger services in Canada.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition, from a small business that is not in my riding but in the neighboring riding, represented by a Government Member, namely Ahuntsic.

The small business expects problems, serious and unfair hardships that this goods and services tax will impose on it and its customers ask us to have Parliament reject this new goods and services tax.

[English]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present another petition from the residents of my riding of Sudbury. They wish hereby to register their very strong protest against the proposed goods and service tax. They feel that this proposed tax is unfair, unjust, and will certainly impose a very serious burden on them.

This petition has been registered with the clerk of petitions.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of Canadians who are concerned about the loss of their rail service. Bonavista—Trinity—Conception lost its rail passenger service in 1967 and indeed, Newfoundland lost the whole Newfoundland railway one year ago. I can certainly empathize with them.

This petition has been duly certified by the clerk and your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger service in Canada.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I too have the pleasure to rise in the House and present a petition that has been certified by the clerk, and signed by 128 persons, mostly residents of the riding of Kingston and the Islands, who protest the closing of VIA Rail in whole or in part and call upon this government to cease and desist from such a policy.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of the people of Canada as it relates to the destruction of VIA Rail. For those members in the House who are not aware, Kenora—

Rainy River has a large history of railroaders because of the railways that run through the northern Ontario district. They are very worried that not only will it reduce service and reduce jobs for the people of Kenora—Rainy River but they are also very disturbed that the deficit will increase because of the fact that it will cost more to replace those jobs with other programs than it will to maintain the service that we have now.

I present this to you and humbly hope that the government will pay attention to what Canadians are saying.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of people from Kamloops, British Columbia, who want to draw to the government's attention their disappointment that the government plans to reduce VIA Rail service. It means that a number of jobs will be lost in Kamloops and 55 businesses will be adversely affected as a result of these cutbacks.

They are asking the government to reconsider the decision and upgrade VIA Rail as opposed to downgrading it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have petition on another matter, the general goods and service tax. It is from people from Kamloops, Chase, Barrière, Little Fort and a variety of places, who point out their concern that this tax will be applied to reading, hair cuts, diapers, coffins, home heating fuels, and many other areas which will increase the cost of living to ordinary Canadians. They point out that it is a regressive form of taxation and they ask the government to reconsider and abandon the pursuit of the general sales tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 and present to the House three petitions calling upon Parliament to maintain, to improve, and to modernize VIA Rail in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient and environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

FORESTRY RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): I have a fourth petition, duly signed and authorized being from petitioners of the province of British Columbia who are requesting the government to continue the Forestry Resource Development Agreement currently in effect in British Columbia.

The petitioners call upon the Parliament of Canada to renew this important agreement with British Columbia, therefore providing for renewed commitment to restocking our forest lands, advancing forestry research, promoting silviculture and assisting the forest industry in developing the new products and markets that will provide forestry jobs for the future.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and pleasure to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present two petitions signed by people from Surrey, British Columbia; Saskatoon, Saskatchewan; London, St. Jacob's, Waterloo, Kingston and other Ontario communities. These people are calling on the government to remember the heritage of its party, which includes the building of the railways at the time of Confederation to tie this country together, and not to turn its back on that heritage but to introduce into this country a modern, up–to–date transportation system which shows that the government is taking seriously what it is saying about sustainable development in this country in the future.

• (1550)

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): It is my privilege to present a petition duly certified by the clerk. It is supported by some 9,000 people in two ridings on Vancouver Island who have signed petition cards, supported also by motions passed at every municipal council meeting on Vancouver Island. They urge the government to live up to its promises to maintain and to improve VIA Rail and to, at the very least, hold public meetings before any changes are made.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to discharge a duty and present this petition to this House of Parliament on behalf of many concerned Canadians, like residents of Winnipeg North. They are concerned that with the cutting of the VIA Rail passenger service we will destroy a cohesive link from coast to coast. The signatories to this petition, certified by the clerk, do humbly pray that this Parliament call upon the government not to cut in whole or in part VIA Rail passenger service in Canada.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): I have the privilege to rise today with a petition from people in my riding of Essex—Kent. They are very concerned about the position that has been taken with regard to the goods and services tax and the economic problems it will cause the people of Canada, as well as the disruption of business. They are very concerned about the total impact of it and humbly ask the government to reconsider its position.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): I rise today to present a petition from many of the residents of my constituency, Prince Edward—Hastings. They call upon the government not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger service in Canada. I am pleased to say that this is part of a number of now over 5,000 signatures that I have received in my riding alone calling upon the government to take a more serious and real look at rail passenger service in Canada.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition certified correct by the clerk on behalf of residents of Ontario and namely the village of Wellington. The petition deals with the elimination of VIA Rail, their existing routes and thousands of jobs. The people of Wellington urge the Conservative government not to cancel in whole or in part rail passenger service in Canada.

RCMP DRESS CODE

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 this afternoon and have the honour to present a petition signed by 146 Canadians, mainly from the city of Calgary and surrounding towns.

The RCMP is a distinctive Canadian institution and these petitioners are asking Parliament to preserve the unique heritage and tradition of the RCMP and to keep it truly uniform.

They are opposed to the proposed changes in the RCMP dress code.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition, endorsed by the clerk of petitions, from a number of Canadians obviously possessed of a great deal more vision and foresight and intelligence than can be found from time to time on the benches opposite.

They are calling upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in such areas as Edmonton, which is about to be kicked in the teeth by this government again with its VIA Rail cut-backs, such places as Calgary that similarly will be kicked in the teeth by the government with its cut-backs, and in other such centres of Canada that are, as we increasingly see, so terribly ill-served by this government.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): I am honoured to be able to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by a number of Canadians asking that VIA Rail be modernized and improved so that a fast, economical, safe and convenient transportation system can be provided for all Canadians.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to rise today to present a petition on behalf of a number of Canadians who are concerned about the future of VIA Rail. They call on the government to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service throughout this country. Canadians are speaking. I do hope that the government is listening.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): It is also my pleasure to rise to present a number of petitions signed by residents from the Ottawa, London, Windsor, and St. Thomas area. They humbly pray that the government will listen to their concerns about the cuts in the VIA Rail. They not only ask the government to stop these cuts but to improve the service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): I also have a petition from the residents of my riding in Timmins—Chapleau concerning the goods and services tax. They humbly pray that the government will cease with the proposal which taxes diapers and coffins, therefore taxing Canadians from the cradle to the grave.

BRANCH LINE ABANDONMENT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct honour and privilege today to present a large number of petitions certified to be correct by the clerk of petitions. These are petitions signed by most of the citizens of Big River, Saskatchewan, who protest this government's termination of the branch line rehabilitation program and call on the government to renew its commitment to the desperately needed upgrading of the Big River subdivision, a commitment made to the community of Big River prior to the 1984 election and withdrawn shortly thereafter.

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 97, 100, 114 and 115.

[Text]

REQUEST FOR AN INVESTIGATION OF THE ACTIVITIES OF THE UNITED PARCEL SERVICE OPERATING IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 97—Mr. MacWilliam:

Has the government taken any action to investigate the activities of United Parcel Service operating in British Columbia?

Hon. Otto John Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): As a result of inquiries regarding United Parcel Service operating in British Columbia, I immediately ordered an investigation into this matter. The review began on May 23, 1989 and is now complete. The results indicate that UPS is meeting Customs requirements and I am satisfied with UPS's efforts to comply with the laws and regulations for which I am responsible.

OSCAR AWARDED TO THE NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Question No. 100—Mr. Kaplan:

As of June 6, 1989, with regard to the Oscar awarded earlier this year to the National Film Board (a) is the government aware of its location and, if so, what is it (b) do the government and the National Film Board have plans for its retention and display and, if so, what are they?

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): (a) The special Oscar presented to the National Film Board is on display in a specially designed cabinet which exhibits all its awards, in the main entrance of the Norman-McLaren Building at 3155, Côte-de-Liesse, Ville Saint-Laurent.

(b) In addition, as part of 50th Anniversary activities, the Oscar has been displayed at certain events outside of NFB Montreal: 1. At the Canadian Library Association Conference in Edmonton from June 21 to 25; 2. At the AMTEC (Association of Media and Technology in Education) in Edmonton from June 18 to 21.

A Canadian tour will be organized from October 1989 to January 1990. Also, the Oscar will be placed in an appropriate area at the House of Commons from May 1990 to December 1990.

PRINCE CHARLES PROJECT IN TORONTO

Question No. 114—Mr. Karpoff:

As of June 20 1989, has money been recovered by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation relating to expenditures on a Toronto housing project known as the Prince Charles project and, if so (a) in what amount (b) what penalties are provided for in regard to monies that must be so recovered?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): (a) and (b) Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation wrote to the National Council of Jewish Women (Toronto) on May 31, 1989 requesting a revised statement of final costs to reflect the sales tax rebate received in the project's capital costs. Audit final costs are required so that CMHC may determine the final amount of federal assistance to be paid out, as it is based on eligible capital costs. The sales tax rebate is not money owed to CMHC, but rather funds to be used for the benefit of the project. It is anticipated that a reduction of the eligible capital costs will also result in a reduction in the level of federal assistance provided.

CMHC continues to press for this statement and for a meeting with the Board of Directors to ensure these funds are used properly.

PRINCE CHARLES PROJECT IN TORONTO

Question No. 115—Mr. Karpoff:

Is CMHC conducting investigations into possible criminal activity, in the Prince Charles project, involving (a) granting of management contracts (b) rebating of provincial sales tax (c) rebating of federal sales tax (d) other areas and, if so, what were these activities?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): (a), (b), (c) and (d).

Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is conducting an internal investigation into all aspects of its review and approval of this project. CMHC has indicated, in writing, to all those conducting their own inquiries that it is prepared to co-operate fully with them. This includes the Ontario Provincial Police, who will be looking at any possible criminal charges.

SALE OF CROWN CORPORATION

*Question No. 89—Mr. Karygiannis:

1. Does the government have in its possession the 1986 Agreement of Sale of CN Express to Route Canada Inc. and, if so, is it prepared to table the document and, if so, on what date?

2. Is the government prepared to provide an undertaking that the future sale of Crown Corporations, such as Air Canada, will not go ahead until a full determination of their true market value is arrived at by an impartial appraiser?

Mr. Albert Cooper (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by Transport Canada and the Office of Privatization And Regulatory Affairs as follows:

1. There is no agreement of Sale of CN Express to Route Canada Inc.

In 1983 Canadian National Railway Company merged CN Trucking and CN Express into a company with the legal name Transport Route Canada Inc. In 1986 Transport Route Canada Inc. was sold to Route Canada Holdings Inc. The Agreement of Purchase and Sale is considered to be a commercially confidential document and neither of the companies involved is prepared to make it public.

2. As a normal part of any privatization undertaken directly by the government, financial advisors are engaged to provide expert commercial advice with a view to protecting the government's financial interest. In some privatizations, notably those of Canadair, de Havilland, Teleglobe Canada, the Canada Development Corporation and the recently completed sale of the government's shareholding in Air Canada, the government also benefitted from the advice of the Board of Directors of the Canada Development Investment Corporation (CDIC) whose members are drawn from the private sector and have broad experience in commercial transactions.

That same prudent course will be followed in the proposed divestiture of Nordion International Inc. and Theratronics International Limited, for which divestiture legislation is currently before the House. Wood Gundy Inc. has been engaged by CDIC as financial advisors to the government. The CDIC Board of Directors will provide their recommendations to the government as well.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. P-4, in the name of the hon. member for Nickel Belt and P-5, in the name of the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence are acceptable to the government and the documents are tabled immediately.

Motion No. P-4

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents and impact studies for Success in the Works—A Policy Paper—A Labour Force Development Strategy for Canada.

Motion No. P-5

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all impact studies prepared for the Department of Employment and Immigration regarding the effects of the reallocation of 1.3 billion in Unemployment Insurance expenditures, and specifically regarding the number and provincial break-down of Unemployment Insurance recipients who will no longer qualify for benefits, the number and provincial break-down of Unemployment Insurance recipients whose benefit periods will be reduced, the amount of money saved thereby, both nationally and by province, and the funds to be allocated in each province as a result of the reallocation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. P-4 for the production of papers be deemed to have been adopted?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. P-5 for the production of papers be deemed to have been adopted?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. P-12, in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and P-13, in the name of the hon. member of Okanagan—Shuswap.

Motion No. 12

That an Humble Address be presented to Her excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House copies of Cabinet directives issued by the government in July 1981 and July 1988 which directed the Farm Credit Corporation to provide long-term mortgage credit to Canadian farmers on a cost-recovery basis.

Motion No. 13

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all documents and correspondence pertaining to the decision by Revenue Canada (Customs and Excise) to suspend the renewal of the customs brokerage licence of United Parcel Service operating in the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Notice of motion for the production of papers P-12, in the name of the Hon. Member for Kingston and The Islands.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the papers requested are cabinet confidences that cannot be laid before the House and I, therefore, ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the documents requested are for directives of cabinet issued to a Crown corporation which, under the statute that permits such directives, in my view ought to be made public. While the cabinet document upon which the recommendation would be based, I would agree, is a cabinet confidence, the other documents, in my view, are not or ought not to be. I would request, therefore, if the Parliamentary Secretary will not accede to my request, that the motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Transferred for debate pursuant to Standing Order 97(1).

Notice of motion for the production of papers No. P-13, in the name of the Hon. Member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

• (1600)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, the documents requested cannot be released pursuant to Sections 21(b) and 21(c) of the Access to Information Act. I, therefore, ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. MacWilliam: Mr. Speaker, with your leave, the information requested pertains to the decision by Revenue Canada, Customs and Excise, to suspend the renewal of the customs brokerage licence for United Parcel Service, the reason for suspension apparently being some rather questionable activities of this major international corporation. In light of the decision made by representatives of Revenue Canada and in light of the impact that the refusal of the government to honour this request has brought upon the House, I would ask with your leave, Your Honour, that this request be transferred to Private Members' Business so that it may be debated further.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Transferred for debate pursuant to Standing Order 97(1).

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

VIA RAIL

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received a notice of motion for an emergency debate from the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52, I have advised you in writing that I seek leave to move that the House adjourn for the purpose of debating an important and urgent matter, namely the imminent dismantling of VIA Rail.

In my letter to you, Mr. Speaker, and I am not going to read it, I make the point that the Minister of Transport has indicated that there will be no public hearings. He has refused to meet further with delegations from Atlantic Canada, Quebec and Ontario. We know that the cabinet will, within days if not hours, be asked to consider the recommendations coming from either the Minister of Transport or the Planning and Priorities Committee of cabinet, and I would ask that you grant us leave to hold an emergency debate in order that the House, on behalf of the people of Canada, can provide specific input to the cabinet as to the decisions that it may make with regard to the future of VIA Rail.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has considered the matter raised by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. The Chair believes that it is a most serious and important matter. However, the Chair does not believe that at this time it meets the requirements of the standing order.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed from Thursday, June 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Gauthier: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on a point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. The debate on Bill C-18 has taken some of the House's time so far and seven hours and five minutes of debate remain before we use up the eight hours allowed in the Standing Orders. After that, each Member has ten minutes to speak. In order to speed things up and to give more members of my party an opportunity to speak and take part in the debate, I would like to tell the House that we would want to divide our time occasionally, when our turn comes, from 20-minute speeches and 10 minutes for questions, to two periods of 10 minutes for speeches and five minutes for questions and comments.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, of course we would be more than happy to co-operate with the Official Opposition in this eminently sensible move.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I notice the record indicates that to date, we in the New Democratic Party have had a chance to speak for 23 minutes on this very important piece of legislation. Perhaps some people would like us not to speak at all, ever, and run the House as a dictatorial arm of the government, but that is not the way our parliamentary system operates.

I simply want to say that we have a number of speakers who have a number of comments that they wish to make on this piece of legislation and I would like to see that they have an opportunity to speak for 20 minutes. I would certainly entertain the suggestion, however, once we have heard a number of speakers who feel very strongly about this legislation. Beyond that, we are quite prepared to also consider breaking down the 20 minutes into tens and fives. For the moment, as the standing orders provide, we would like to retain the 20 minute speeches and 10 minute questions and comments.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we understand that decision of the NDP. May I also then, in the same spirit, since everyone seems quite anxious to participate in the debate, an important debate for the House of Commons, ask if there would be unanimous consent of the House to add the time that we have just taken for the presentation of the petitions and add that to the clock tonight to make sure that we have adequate debating time for all of our colleagues.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I think the term is "crocodile tears". The Parliamentary Secretary who just made that proposition should know that the House has not sat for 64 days since the last election, not because of the opposition, but because the government was unable to call this House together. I take it that the Parliamentary Secretary would like to have the House sit a little longer. It is up to him to talk to government members and tell the cabinet to get this House sitting a little longer. I am not in agreement at all with prolonging this day's sitting. At six o'clock, I think we should adjourn as usual.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to add to the very thoughtful comments made by colleague. This is a Parliament. This is a House of Commons where, in our parliamentary system, the opposition also has access to time in this chamber, and part of that time is used presenting petitions. The minister responsible for VIA Rail has refused to allow Canadians to speak out on this issue. Presenting petitions is one way for ordinary Canadians to register their concerns.

I also want to suggest, however, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the government House leader knows, that the government made a gross error on Bill C–32, the advance grain payments bill. It introduced legislation some time ago and then realized that the legislation made no sense whatsoever, that it was silly, stupid, not very thoughtful, irresponsible, a mistake to say the least. Now government members have asked us to forget all of the speeches that were made and all that was done. They are going to retract the bill and bring in a new one.

I would like to remind my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary, that if the government understood how to do business, if the government understood how to conduct the affairs of the country, it would not introduce bills without first thinking them through carefully. I would ask him to ask his minister to give more thought—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair understands that there is not unanimous consent to proceed after six o'clock. We shall, therefore, resume debate.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker. I last had the opportunity to speak on this particular bill on June 22 before the House adjourned for the summer break. I understand that I have some 10 or 12 minutes to conclude my remarks. In order to put my concluding remarks into perspective, permit me to repeat some of the submissions I made on June 22, 1989.

We are here today as we were then to discuss in principle Bill C–18. The purpose of second reading debate is to determine whether, in a general way, in principle, this House ought to endorse and support a particular piece of legislation. This piece of legislation, Bill. C–18, is an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain acts in relation thereto.

Let me say in no uncertain terms that I believe very fundamentally that this bill ought not to be approved in principle. I would like to explain the reasons why. I do not believe that the Government of Canada should be establishing a Department of Multiculturalism.

Up until now, it has been the policy of the Government of Canada, from 1971, that Canada would be a bilingual and multicultural country. The policy of multiculturalism was introduced by a previous Liberal administration in 1972. While at the time and in the subsequent years that particular policy may have been of benefit to immigrant Canadians and to Canada generally, I believe very strongly that the policy is no longer appropriate or valid today. In effect, the present policy of multiculturalism is divisive. It divides Canadians. It is unfair in that it treats Canadians in a different fashion. It is regressive and at times discriminatory. Let me explain why I feel that way. If one were to ask Canadians generally what they thought multiculturalism was and if one were to ask members of Parliament to explain what multiculturalism means, they would say, I suspect, that it means everything other than French or English. If you are a French Canadian and you are not part of the multicultural community, or if you are an English Canadian or an anglophone, you are not part of the multicultural community. However, if you have origins that are Italian, Greek, German, East Indian or South American, then somehow you are part of that multicultural community. You are "an ethnic".

In the true sense of the word, multicultural means everybody. My French Canadian colleagues here in the House of Commons are just as much a part of the multicultural community as I am as a Canadian of Italian origin. That is not the mindset here in Ottawa today and indeed throughout the country. When one speaks of multiculturalism in this House of Commons, one is speaking of Canadians who have origins other than French or English. In many ways, that is discriminatory because there is almost a suggestion that because one is part of the multicultural community, somehow one is inferior, is of a different class, is of inferior quality to Canadians who have origins that are French or English.

I was born in Canada. My parents are immigrants to this country. They came to Canada in 1950 from Italy. I was born in Revelstoke, British Columbia. I do not consider myself a francophone. I do not consider French to be my mother tongue. I have no origins that relate to things French. I do not consider myself an anglophone even though I speak English fluently and English was the language of my education. So I ask myself, what am I?

If I am not a francophone and not an anglophone and the Government of Canada seems to suggest in its policies and legislation that it is either one or the other, then I am in a category which is multicultural. I am in the basket over here that consists of everyone with roots other than French or English.

We are bilingual because of history and because the English and the French were the first settlers. Far be it from me to give a history lesson today, but that is why we are bilingual and have a policy of bilingualism in Canada. The arguments for bilingualism are strong.

One also has to accept what Canada is today and what Canada is becoming. What will the Canada of the future be? Statistics Canada recently reported that 34 per cent of Canadians have origins that are British, and that number is diminishing. Twenty-four per cent of Canadians have origins that are French, so 58 per cent of Canadians have origins that are French or English. Of the remainder, 25 per cent have origins other than French or English and 5 per cent have origins that are a mixture of French, British and some other origin. The reality today is that the country is more diverse than it ever was.

Of the immigrant population in Canada, people who migrated to Canada, one-half arrived in Canada before 1967 and one-third arrived between 1967 and 1977. Less than 20 per cent arrived in Canada since 1977.

The reality is that those of us who have origins other than French or English have just as much right, just as much entitlement to equal protection and equal benefit of the law as defined by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Mr. Speaker, you have indicated that my time is nearly up. I will appreciate the opportunity to answer any questions that my colleagues might have.

It is a step backward to start entrenching multiculturalism. We ought to be moving to the next phase, to recognize what Canada is today and what Canada will be in the future for our children and grandchildren. We as Canadians have to start talking about a new national spirit, a spirit that says that we are all Canadians.

I frankly am tired of being a hyphenated Canadian. I am not a hyphenated Canadian. I am fiercely proud of my heritage. I will defend my heritage and promote my heritage, but I am a Canadian. I am not an Italian-Canadian or a Canadian-Italian. I happen to be a Canadian of Italian origin. I am very proud of my heritage and I am proud of the fact that I am Canadian. I suspect that the one-third of Canadians who have origins other than French or English feel as I do.

I think it is time that we stopped segregating and ghettoizing Canadians of origins other than French or English and that we all start talking about and promoting what we all have in common and that is the fact that we are Canadian. Whether we come from Quebec, whether we have origins that are British, Japanese, German, Italian, Greek, or whatever, we are all Canadians. To support this bill in principle is to take a tremendous step backward. I urge colleagues not to support this bill in principle and to refer it back to the government to bring in a piece of legislation that will recognize the equality of all Canadians.

Mr. Peterson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for York South—Weston on his deep concern for the multicultural communities of Canada and for the country that Canada has become. I would like him to elaborate for this House on one of the matters that he has raised most forcefully with us, his colleagues on this side of the House. It is the question of the redress to the Japanese-Canadians and the way it was handled by the government.

He has brought forth to us the point that this matter was considered a multicultural issue. It was handled by the minister responsible for multiculturalism as opposed to other ministers who are more properly charged with questions of fundamental justice, fundamental human rights and the way we treat people, not because of their ethnic origin or their background or their language but simply because they are Canadians, simply because they are human beings. I would like to ask the Hon. Member for York South—Weston to elaborate on this point and to continue his remarks.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in my remarks, the policy of multiculturalism as embraced by this government and as introduced by the previous Liberal administration is discriminatory. I use as an example the way the Japanese Canadian redress question was handled by the House of Commons and by the government in particular over the last number of years.

• (1620)

Because Canadians of Japanese origin are not anglophones or francophones and because they are a visible minority, the mindset in this Parliament and the mindset on the government side was that anything having to with Canadians of Japanese origin must be an issue involving multiculturalism.

If that is not the ultimate insult and the classic example of how discriminatory the policy of multiculturalism is, I do not know what is.

That issue ought to have been dealt with by the Minister of Justice. As my colleague quite eloquently pointed out, it was an issue of natural justice and a matter that ought to have been dealt with by the government as a policy not having to do with ethnic origin but having everything to do with justice.

The mindset on that side of the House was because they have origins that are Japanese, hand the issue over to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. I ask rhetorically what the reaction would have been in Canada if the Government of Canada had handed over the issue of Nazi war criminals to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. I do not believe that would have been acceptable.

I do not make these submissions in order to place blame but simply to reflect the negative mindset that exists in Ottawa with respect to the policy of multiculturalism.

I will use one more example, and again I do not mean to be critical. When Air India flight 182 was bombed off the coast of Ireland some five years ago, the initial reaction of the Government of Canada was to phone Rajiv Gandhi, the Prime Minister of India, to offer condolences to the families of the deceased.

It is necessary to ask why the Government of Canada called Rajiv Gandhi and the Government of India. The reason was that it was an Air India flight and because those on board wore turbans; some were Sikhs, others were darker in complexion because they were Hindus. There was a mindset that because these people were visible minorities, somehow they were not Canadian. The fact is that the overwhelming majority, in fact almost all of those people who perished, were Canadian, but the government's multicultural mindset led it to call Rajiv Gandhi, the Prime Minister of India.

In answer to my colleague, I am saying that this policy of multiculturalism, not in a deliberate way but in an insidious way, is extremely discriminatory and insulting to those of us who have origins other than French or English. For that reason, I do not believe we ought to be supporting the perpetuation of a policy that treats our fellow Canadians as being inferior.

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, let me begin by saying that I have reviewed the speeches made when Bill C–18 was debated first. I noted that the first three speakers for the Liberal party spoke in favour of the principle of this bill and supported this bill. The NDP critic supported this bill. I am absolutely astounded that this member would be speaking against a multicultural bill to establish a new department which is going to oversee the Multiculturalism Act.

I would like to point out to the House that the Multiculturalism Act is multiculturalism for all Canadians, and that is part of the preamble of that act. I would like to say that the hon. member for York South—Weston voted for that act. The Multiculturalism Act states that it is for all Canadians and he voted for it. Now he is standing up here saying that the Multiculturalism Act divides Canadians.

I know that the Liberal party is having a great deal of difficulty with unity, but it is absolutely unbelievable that a group of people who have spent some time governing this country is now in total shambles in terms of its multiculturalism policy.

I would like to know from this member of Parliament how he can possibly be against this bill. I know that there is going to be a tremendous number of people in our city of metro Toronto who are going to be astounded at these comments.

I just read in one of the newspapers that the member said that multiculturalism is a fraud perpetrated on groups of ethnics other than French or English in order to appease them. Is that the policy of the Liberal party? He said that our current multicultural policy actually breeds racism in Canada because we are telling them they are different.

The Multiculturalism Act is about bringing people together, uniting people and I am positively astounded. I am sure there is embarrassment in the Liberal Party of Canada today because of this member's comments.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the member is so easily astounded. It is obvious that the member was not listening to my submissions and that she does not have a full and complete understanding of the issue.

Yes, indeed, there may be members on my side of the House who support in principle this particular piece of legislation. I am telling you in no uncertain terms how I feel about this particular bill.

I was elected by the people of York South—Weston to come to this House of Parliament to express my point of view and I have done that. I have told you how I feel regardless of how the government feels, how the New Democratic Party feels or how other people feel about this particular legislation.

Rather than talking about the merits of my submissions, the member from Toronto is more interested in making a personal attack. I am prepared to debate with the member and she can establish the venue. If she wants to organize a meeting in metropolitan Toronto, I am prepared to debate her or anybody else who supports the bill on the merits of this particular piece of legislation.

The member for Scarborough Centre is sadly mistaken in her submissions. I have always expressed this particular point of view that I have expressed today. I am prepared to debate with the hon. member at any place, at any time, this particular issue on its merits. I would like the member to explain to the people of Canada why she supports, for example, the establishment of two separate ministries, two separate departments, one of culture and communications and another of multiculturalism.

She said a few moments ago that multiculturalism means everybody, that it tends to unite. Why then would you have one ministry of multiculturalism and another of culture and communications? Surely, if one talks about culture, that means everybody, all of Canadian culture. The member finds it necessary to distinguish between Canadian culture and multiculturalism. For that reason, I would suggest to the hon. member that she is not totally aware of and sensitive to this important issue.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C-18, an Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

I was pleased today when the House leader brought forth the motion to have the Standing Committee on Multiculturalism and Citizenship established, and we look forward to the participation of the members of the House of Commons on that committee. In the debate last June the Secretary of State outlined the important principle behind this legislation. Both opposition critics have also expressed their support for the bill and I believe it is important now, Mr. Speaker, to move this legislation from this chamber into committee where we can study it and have further discussion and examination.

As the minister noted when he introduced this bill, C-18 speaks to the future of Canada, a future where all Canadians are free to participate and to succeed in our society, a future that recognizes the words of Canada's first Canadian-born Governor General, Vincent Massey, when he said: "This country is more than a chain of wheat fields and mineral mines and pulpwood forests, it is more than even the union of ten provinces, it is the expression of a certain idea."

The bill before us today is the reaffirmation of that idea. C-18 establishes a new department of multiculturalism and citizenship that will administer the Multiculturalism Act, the Citizenship Act, and will also incorporate into one department a number of programs that are vital to the future of Canada, programs such as the national literacy strategy, a partnership program that is designed to address the tragedy of illiteracy in our society. Our government has set forth $110 million and through the literacy secretariat thousands of Canadian businesses, community organizations, and non-profit groups are becoming involved in fighting the problem of illiteracy.

I was honoured recently to attend a performance entitled Reading the Signs which is a play produced by a group of young actors that is touring schools and community centres to promote literacy. This play, Reading the Signs, is being sponsored by both the federal government and a variety of business organizations.

Another aspect of this department will be voluntary action programs which support the outstanding work of hundreds of thousands of volunteers in Canada. Another will be human rights, and especially race relations which is becoming such an important issue in cities like metropolitan Toronto. The new department will also focus on citizenship registration and citizenship promotion. Recently there was a citizenship court ceremony which was attended by a group of Girl Guides who took out their citizenship registration as their way of promoting the vital aspects of citizenship.

Citizenship promotion is a central feature of C–18. Being Canadian is both an honour and a responsibility and the oath which every new citizen takes reads as follows:

> I swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, Queen of Canada, her heirs and successors according to law and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

As citizens we have the right and the duty to participate fully in every aspect of our society. We have the right to vote, to stand for public office, to travel abroad as Canadians and to enjoy the full economic benefits of our country. This year some 94,000 people will take the oath of Canadian citizenship with tremendous pride and declare themselves Canadians.

Recently I had the opportunity of opening the new citizenship court in Scarborough and it was such as privilege for me to speak at that ceremony. What a joy it is to participate in ceremonies where hundreds of people become Canadian citizens as a matter of choice. Later this week, Mr. Speaker, a very special citizenship ceremony will be held in Toronto for over 600 new Canadians of Chinese heritage who will take their Canadian citizenship.

The Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship created by this bill will help these new citizens and thousands like them as they move through the citizenship process. Clauses 4 and 5 of the bill outline the role of the minister in the department. The minister shall:

> —promote among all members of Canadian society an understanding of the values inherent in Canadian citizenship and encourage participation in the social, cultural, political and economic life of Canada; and
> (d)—promote among all members of Canadian society a greater awareness and understanding of human rights, fundamental freedoms and related values.

Those duties reflect on how we see ourselves as Canadians and this bill speaks to how we see our future as a dynamic and forward–looking society. This is not a bill merely to support organizations or to authorize existing programs of a government department. This is a bill that speaks for the value of our country.

Just over a year ago this chamber gave consent to the Canadian Multiculturalism Act. That act established in Canadian law the principle that multiculturalism is a fundamental characteristic of our society. The Multiculturalism Act also declared that the policy of the Government of Canada is to recognize and promote the understanding that multiculturalism reflects the cultural and racial diversity of Canadian society and acknowledges the freedom of all members of Canadian society to preserve, enhance and share their cultural heritage.

Bill C–18 builds on the Multiculturalism Act by establishing a department to co–ordinate Canada's multiculturalism and citizenship programs. That co–ordination, however, is not exclusive to this department. The central principle of the Multiculturalism Act is that all government departments must be involved in the promotion of the pluralistic, free and open society.

The new department created by Bill C–18 is only part of the process. This is not a department of ethnicity, nor should it be. This is the department of being Canadian. This is a department that speaks to Canada's future and to the way that we see ourselves. This is a department that recognizes the richness and the benefits of Canadian life.

As a Conservative I believe very strongly in the importance of individual freedom; freedom for every woman and man in our society, regardless of race, religion, ethnic background or age, to succeed and prosper. Individual liberties and freedoms are the very essence of Conservative philosophy. Perhaps that philosophy is best expressed in the words of Prime Minister

John Diefenbaker when he said in the establishment of Canada's first Bill of Rights:

> I am a Canadian, a free Canadian, free to speak without fear, free to worship God in my own way, free to stand for what I think is right, free to oppose what I believe wrong, free to choose those who shall govern my country. This heritage of freedom I pledge to uphold for myself and all mankind.

Bill C-18 supports and advances these principles. This bill creates a department that speaks to the very essence of what we are as a people and what we want to become as a people, looking forward to the promise of our shared future.

• (1640)

On July 1, Canadians celebrated the one hundred and twenty-second birthday of Confederation. In 1867 confederation brought together four disparate provinces to form Canada. Today we are forming a new confederation, a confederation of people who share a different culture and one future as a nation. The establishment of this new confederation of cultures was perhaps best expressed by a resident of Scarborough, an 11 year old boy, a recent immigrant to Canada. His name is Samuel Yip. He designed this year's Canada Day poster which read "Together we build Canada. Tous ensemble Canada.

Mr. Nunziata: I would just like to put some very simple and straightforward questions to the Hon. Member from Scarborough Centre. First, I would like her to define in clear terms what multiculturalism means. I would like her to explain why citizenship is such an integral part of this particular bill. She referred to it as essential. What is the relationship between multiculturalism and citizenship. Could she clearly define that relationship?

I would also like her to explain why when becoming a Canadian citizen it is important to swear allegiance to the Queen. She read the oath that must be sworn in order to become a Canadian citizen. I would like her to explain why someone coming from a non-Commonwealth country or someone who perhaps does not believe in the monarchy must swear allegiance to a non-Canadian of British origin before they become a Canadian.

Can I ask her finally to advise the House whether she considers herself an anglophone or a francophone or something else?

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for that question. It gives me an opportunity to expand a little further on this issue—I suppose the issue of multiculturalism and citizenship. Why we need this department was probably best set out on September 15, 1988 when the Prime Minister stated that we would be establishing a new department of multiculturalism and citizenship. At that time he said "The decision to create a department of multiculturalism and citizenship recognizes that multiculturalism is a central feature of Canadian citizenship. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms entitles citizens from every ethnic and cultural background to exercise their freedom of choice, to retain their customs and honour their traditions while at the same time entering the mainstream of Canadian identity".

I think that sets out very well what we as a government are setting forth in terms of linking multiculturalism with citizenship.

In relation to the oath of office, each time I attend a citizenship court—and I have recently been attending quite a few across the country serving as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State—and each time that oath of citizenship is taken a special pride wells up in each of us about how fortunate we are to live in this great freedom-loving country. Our traditions and our history are based on that oath. If this member is indicating to the Canadian public that the Liberal party would not be wanting to swear allegiance to the Queen of Canada, I would like him to get in his place and say that because I think there would be a great many people across this country who would be most disturbed at that comment of the member.

I am sorry time is up and I cannot answer the rest of the questions but I would be pleased to discuss the matter further with the member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret having to cut off the hon. member. The Progressive Conservative Party, on this round, has decided to have two speakers within the 20-minutes and that is why I am cutting the question and comment period to five minutes.

Now we will resume debate with the second member from the Progressive Conservative Party who will have a 10-minute speech followed by a five-minute question period. Then the next speaker will be a member from the New Democratic Party.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton): Mr. Speaker, I also feel proud and privileged to rise and speak today about this Bill C-18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

I would like to say at the outset in response to the remarks by the hon. member for York South—Weston that I too would, if I were of his mindset, be concerned. I think that it is a case of mindset, our attitude to citizenship, our attitude to cultures, our attitude to being a Canadian. We can take a mindset; in which we are concerned with discrimination, racism and bigotry but I do not think the hon. member's intentions are in that direction. I take the hon. member's intentions as being honourable and I regret that he is looking at this bill in what I would perceive to be a negative context. Of course because he is an elected public official, he is liable to lead in this negative context and that would be unfortunate because this is a bill to which you can attach a negative context if you wish, or it is one to which you can attach a very positive context.

I would prefer, frankly, to see this department called the department of Canadianism and citizenship. But I suppose there is a first step in this process. This country of ours, I am surprised to learn, is the first country in the world with a national multiculturalism piece of legislation. And so we are pioneering a process in Canada. We are pioneering a process, to some degree with our official languages policy which has been in place now both in New Brunswick and in Canada for 20 years or more. With the establishment of our Multiculturalism Act a year ago we have pioneered a piece of legislation on a world scale.

With respect to the linkage to our two official languages, to our English and our French, Bill C-93 last year, the act pertaining to Canadian multiculturalism states specifically in the recital that whereas the Constitution of Canada and the Official Languages Act provide that English and French are the official languages of Canada and neither abrogates nor derogates from any rights or privileges acquired or enjoyed with respect to any other language. It goes on to say in the purposes of the multicultural policy which that act describes: "(i) to preserve and enhance the use of languages other than English and French while strengthening the status and use of the official languages of Canada". It further states: "(j) to advance multiculturalism throughout Canada in harmony with the national commitment to the official languages of Canada".

And so I have to reject vigorously the assertion by the hon. member from York South—Weston that this multiculturalism act is an isolation kind of an act that excludes anglophones and francophones or isolates those who are new Canadians and the like, as he has described them.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill is timely. There is great evidence of racism and bigotry in our nation and it is time that we as a Parliament addressed ourselves firmly and constructively to new visions in those directions.

In my home province of New Brunswick, Mr. Speaker, there are challenges today to the official languages policy of our province. There is an established party that has a specific, clear policy of unilingualism. And that same party has a policy of what it describes as selective immigration. It is not clear whether that selectivity excludes blacks, English, French, Chinese, or just exactly how selective it should be. They are the kinds of words that I find extremely troublesome.

• (1650)

As I say, while I sincerely do accept the honourable intentions from the member for York South—Weston, I would encourage him to apply his most positive perspective to this bill and to try to lead his constituents and to help us lead this country in a recognition of the purposes of this bill for the national unity which it intends to pursue.

It was about 20 years ago when New Brunswick officially adopted its policies of bilingualism making us then and now Canada's only such province. We have been distinctive and enriched by those policies over the years. It was not long after that, in 1973, that the New Brunswick Multicultural Association was born in my city of Fredericton. It has flourished and it has also helped to make our society distinctive and enriched in New Brunswick.

Today, as I have said, there are challenges and we must defend against those challenges and we must inspire and lead our citizens to tolerance and recognition of the richness which the diversity of Canada brings to all Canadians. The bill before us today will bring to fruition the promise made by the Prime Minister last September, as my colleague has said.

I have read this bill and considered it very closely. It is a bill about the future of Canada. It is a bill about where we as a society want to go and what we must do to achieve our objectives. This new department of multiculturalism and citizenship will be a department about bringing Canadians together, about strengthening the values which we hold in common.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, two important factors that make us a distinct nation are our recognition of multiculturalism as a fundamental characteristic of our society and our recognition of two official languages.

[English]

Another factor is our generous and humane immigration policy, our willingness to share our homeland in intelligent and compassionate ways with the rest of the world.

In 1987 the projected level of 125,000 immigrants was exceeded and reached 152,098. Immigration levels under the Progressive Conservative Government policy in 1989 will be almost twice as high as those under the Liberals in 1984.

This department of multiculturalism and citizenship is intended to address those new Canadians. It is intended to give them a special attention, a special opportunity, a special interest by the Government of Canada and to bring to the attention of all Canadians the distinctive and enriching values which these new Canadians bring to our country, to ingrain them with the spirit of Canadianism while permitting and encouraging them to retain their original identities and the richness of their individual cultures and languages.

My point is that the government has demonstrated the will, the commitment and the determination to face contemporary social issues affecting all Canadians. This government has demonstrated the will to meet the challenges that are afforded by a multicultural society and to meet the challenges that are afforded by a bilingual Canada.

In closing I would like to say that preserving freedom is not an easy process. It is a process of give and take and it is a process of spirit and vision and leadership. The rights of all Canadians to cultural identity and official language services are basic freedoms of Canadianism. They have been hard-fought and hard-won. We have an enormous responsibility to defend, to sustain, to lead and to enhance those freedoms which make our country so respected and so admired throughout the world.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, the essence of citizenship and multiculturalism is truly equality and dignity among all Canadians. In the non-ideal world of today we need a department that will make this world a bit more perfect. The hon. member for York South—Weston thinks of the ideal world today and of course we have to respect his views.

At this juncture however I would like to call the attention of the government because the member for Scarborough Centre did say that our hon. member is an embarrassment. Well, the Minister for Multiculturalism last August in the Conservative Party convention did in essence say that his party, the Conservative Party, treats ethnic minorities with distrust and disdain. I saw the Minister for Multiculturalism was earlier in the House and I am a little unhappy that he had to leave. Of course I understand he may have to attend to another schedule. I would like him to explain how he came to his conclusion. It is proving to me that we are not living in an ideal world when the Conservative Party treats ethnic minorities with distrust and disdain. He said further that unless the Conservative Party cultivates the ethnic votes it could lose all the major metropolitan ridings in Canada in the next election. Is the Conservative party truly for multiculturalism or is it truly only for election votes? Is it an election ploy? He who is without sin, let him cast the first stone, it has been said.

Also, the member for Scarborough Centre said today, "We are forming a new confederation". Well, the ideal is excellent but if it is only today that we are beginning to form this new confederation we have missed the boat, we have missed history. The Liberal Party of Canada must be given credit for taking the initiative to institute the multiculturalism policy. Of course we have to continue to improve. That is the challenge to humanity all the time.

I agree with the member for Fredericton—York Sunbury that the timeliness of this topic is here for reasons of racism, of unfair hiring practices, and of selected immigration. I am glad that the member for Fredericton—York Sunbury did make those observations and I congratulate him for that.

So I support this bill. The Liberal Party of Canada supports this bill. Multiculturalism is here to stay in a non-ideal world and I only hope that the government, by enacting this bill, will truly give teeth to its proclamations, that henceforth there will be racial equality in this country, that there will be respect and dignity, that there will be jobs for all, and that the bill will not only be used as an election ploy.

As a new Canadian citizen, as a new member of Parliament, now I can feel very proud with all humility to participate in the debate of this honoured House. To contribute to this debate is my honour and I hope that the government will continue this policy of equality for all.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, it is with a lot of feeling that I get up to support the government on this bill. This bill is to establish a department of multiculturalism and citizenship. I think we should look at some of the specific duties that are outlined in it. I would like to take the liberty of reading some of them.

• (1700)

The bill's specific duties are to initiate, recommend, co-ordinate, implement and promote national policies and programs with respect to multiculturalism and citizenship; to provide services for the acquisition and proof of citizenship; to promote among all members of Canadian society an understanding of the values inherent in Canadian citizenship and encourage participation in the social, cultural, political and economic life of Canada; as well as to promote among all members of Canadian society a greater awareness and understanding of human rights, fundamental freedoms and related values.

Canada has a proud history in relation to multiculturalism and religious, political and racial freedom. It also has some very bleak history. I think there are many things that are significant within my own personal life that meet the implementation of this type of bill.

First of all, my father was an immigrant. He left Russia because of political and religious persecution. He came to Canada because he felt as a Canadian citizen he could follow his religious beliefs, that he would have the rights of a citizen to pursue his own way of life to gain economic security and to raise a family. These promises were fulfilled. He was proud to be a Canadian citizen. He always treasured the fact that he was able to go to a citizenship court and take out his citizenship.

However, my wife is Canadian born but of Japanese ancestry. She experienced as a young child that her Canadian citizenship was not worth anything. She was uprooted from her home, taken with her family and interned in the horse barns at the exhibition grounds in Vancouver—so much for her Canadian citizenship. Yet her father, in spite of those things, was always proud that he became Canadian. He valued the things that Canada stood for and valued the ideals that we have.

I live in the riding of Surrey North which is very much a multicultural riding. It is a riding which has a large number of immigrants. It has Portuguese, Scandinavians, Germans, people from the Latin American countries and people from India. I am now holding teas to welcome new immigrants. It is really a multicultural mosaic afternoon.

Many of my constituents, particularly those from the Punjab, do not have happy memories about the way they have been treated in Canada. Many of their relatives remember that in 1914 the Komagata Maru, containing 376 passengers, 340 of whom were Sikh, arrived in Vancouver. As they were all British subjects, they were entitled under Canadian law to enter Canada. However, when the ship arrived in Vancouver harbour, Canadian immigration officials denied them landing rights, severed communications to shore and denied permission to replenish their food and water, finally forcing the ship to leave and return to Indian waters. Needless to say, this incident deeply humiliated the Sikh community. It continues to be a source of national shame for Canada.

Surrey North is fortunate to have a significant Sikh population which has greatly enhanced our community. The Indian-Canadian community throughout Canada today is one of the communities that is very hard working, has a tremendous commitment to their families, to the community, to their religion, and to strengthening all of Canada.

But even now, today, in this House, I become perturbed when members of Parliament rise to present petitions that are deliberately aimed at preventing Sikhs and other minorities from joining the RCMP, because in order for them to join we might have to change a minor dress code to allow them to wear turbans as part of their religious faith. Sometimes I think we have come a long way since 1914, and sometimes I wonder whether we have come very far at all.

I think we should look right now at some of the background of multiculturalism and the problems within our ethnic, multiracial and racial minorities in Canada. According to figures given by bureaucrats in the race relations sectors of Secretary of State, an attitudinal survey conducted in 1986 found that between 10 per cent and 15 per cent of Canadians were intolerant of visible minorities. Yet, at the same time, we know that between 1981 and 1986, 64 per cent of immigrants to this country were visible minorities. Fifty–four per cent of Canadians perceived an increase in racism. I think we have seen that in the last year in some of our metropolitan cities, particularly when we have problems like increased unemployment, problems of affordable housing, concerns that are expressed by many people about ethnic minorities and as immigration increases.

There is still systemic discrimination against visible minorities in employment. The government has set a low target of only 3.2 per cent for the hiring of visible minorities in the public service compared with an actual figure of 6.3 per cent in the work force. In actual percentages only 1.58 per cent were employed.

In language training and settlement programs, funding has been erratic. I shall be talking about that a little bit more. I want to talk about some of the weaknesses inherent in this act.

We are very quick to spout nice platitudes, but when it comes to putting in dollars to assist new immigrants to obtain some of the things that this bill sets out in terms of understanding the values inherent in Canadian citizenship and encouraging them to participate in the social, cultural, political, and economic life of Canada, the resources are not provided. Therefore I think we have to take a look at that.

• (1710)

Multicultural health care is now an issue. Governments and professionals are only beginning to recognize that different diets, lifestyles, and culture perspectives affect the type of illness a person may contract and the treatment they may opt for. Very little attention has been paid to medical practice as it applies to other cultures.

There has been insensitivity shown by the media in covering causes that are overtly racist. In some of the programs that depict crimes, particularly in the city of Vancouver, the media has not brought attention to the fact that just as when I first started working in Vancouver in the social services in the late 1950s and early 1960s, there were worse gangs. They were not Oriental gangs. The problems with gangs in Vancouver is nothing new. They have nothing to do with immigration. They have to do with unemployment, dislocation of youth, poverty and lack of housing.

We have seen concerns being raised about the whole question of the notwithstanding clause as it might affect the rights of minorities, particularly as it might affect the rights of visible minorities. I think this is something we are going to have to take a look at in Canada. We feel that that clause, and where there are some reasons to continue with it, can be used by government to perpetuate injustice on minorities. We must remember that in the two incidents that I cited with the Sikhs and with the Japanese, it was the governments that were behind them with the support of the general public.

The New Democratic Party certainly supports this bill, but there are some shortcomings that I think must be addressed. One of the first shortcomings is that there is no increase in staff. There may be sharing of staff and facilities from Department of Secretary of State, especially in regional offices. That new department has serious responsibilities to monitor federal departments and institutions. Therefore, we anticipate that there is going to be a shortfall or insufficient staffing. It is very nice to have a bill, but if you do not provide the resources, it is not possible for a department to carry out its responsibilities.

This government has cut back on the Citizenship Instruction and Language Training programs. Since 1987, they have been reduced by 50 per cent. Now we understand that they are to be totally eliminated by 1990. Again, what is the purpose of having a department if you do not provide it with any resources? These Citizenship Instruction and Language Training programs are the backbone of getting new citizens integrated into Canadian society. That is the way you accomplish the goals that are set out in the act. To simply state goals is of very little value if you cannot, in fact, provide the resources. The bill says it is to provide "services for the acquisition and proof of citizenship". If you delete the ability and the resources to provide those services, what do you have? You have a piece of paper. I think that is a weakness.

We are concerned still that there is not a commissioner or an ombudsperson as there is with official languages. We are delighted to see that the House leader for the government has today announced, mainly at the urging of my fellow New Democrat from Vancouver East, a separate standing committee on multiculturalism.

There is also a problem of overlapping with other areas, particularly in the area of immigrant women, that may allow departments to play games and may allow both this department and some of the other departments to take the "it's your problem" attitude, while at the same time neither of them providing the services and resources.

In summary, I would like to make two or three points. This is an important piece of legislation. It sets up a department that will have significance for the lives of most Canadians. It is worthy of support because at least it sets out some goals and some purposes. Unfortunately, we cannot be sure that those without resources are going to be enough. I think all Canadians have a vital stake in making Canadian multiculturalism work. Certainly, for people like myself, with my family background, it is vital.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on his submissions, but he, along with the previous Conservative member who spoke seem to suggest that by passing an act to create a department of multiculturalism that somehow immigrants, new Canadians, will acquire new rights, that they will get something that they do not already have. That begs the question: does a policy of multiculturalism give to new Canadians and Canadians of ethnic origins something, or anything that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not give them? Surely the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that was passed by this House and embraced by this Parliament gives every Canadian, whether they were born in Canada or elsewhere, similar rights. Therefore I think it is a mistake, Mr. Speaker, to suggest that this policy of multiculturalism and the creation of a department of multiculturalism will somehow bestow new rights on certain Canadians.

The Conservative member who spoke said that it was intended to give new Canadians a special interest. Well, the simple answer to that is, no thanks. New Canadians, and the sons and daughters of immigrants, do not want special recognition. All they want is to be treated like every other Canadian.

The member talked about immigrants. Yes, special programs ought to be in place to ensure that new Canadians, immigrants to Canada, are assisted in their integration into Canadian life. But surely you do not need a policy of multiculturalism to achieve that. Surely that should be the responsibility of the Department of Immigration, the immigration policy of the Government of Canada, not only to establish the criteria for admission into Canada of new Canadians but also to assist them in their integration into Canada.

What this particular piece of legislation will do is this, and I think it is important to look at it in context. It will create a minister of multiculturalism, there will be a separate department of multiculturalism and then there will be a department of culture which again begs this question: What is the difference between Canadian culture and multiculturalism, and why would you need the two? Surely multiculturalism is part of Canadian culture.

I will put this question to the hon. member who just spoke: He was speaking about certain barriers that exist with respect to visible minorities in Canada. Does he not truly believe in his heart of hearts that this particular move by the government, rather than breaking down the barriers that exist in order to achieve full equality in Canada, will in effect create barriers in that it will distinguish Canadians based on their heritage? This is at a time when we ought to be promoting what we have in common. We ought not to be creating new barriers which will, in my view, exacerbate the already sensitive situation we have in Canada with respect to racial harmony.

Mr. Karpoff: The member feels that the introduction of this type of a department is a backward step. I cannot agree with him. I think that to focus within one ministry the responsibility for citizenship and multiculturalism, including some of the other things that it is responsible for in terms of the promotion of race relations, is positive.

Canada is now going through another period where there is concern within the ethnic communities and particularly within the visible minorities. One of the things that I think Canada does that is different from some other countries that promote or accept large numbers of immigrants is that it values their diversity, it values their culture. We have undertaken not only to allow but to assist people from different nationalities to maintain their cultural identity.

The mosaic of Canada is, therefore, quite different from that of the United States where the intent there is to integrate and to play down any differences, to drop your background, your religion, your culture and your ethnicity when you become an American. Here in Canada I think we have done the opposite, much to the enrichment of our country.

Therefore, I think it is important to have a department that not only promotes multiculturalism and race relations but one which also ties them in with citizenship. What that basically says is that those are the things that go with being a Canadian citizen. I think that is where we have broken down in the past, in terms of our mistreatment or lack of equality for ethnic groups. What we have not done is say to the Japanese or to the Sikhs: "You have certain rights because you are a Canadian citizen and with that citizenship go these rights". I think that there is an importance in linking it within this type of ministry.

I would agree, however, with one thing that the member seems to be alluding to, that is, if there is not some substance and some resources provided then what we have is an empty shell. If what the government intends is to provide a department for window-dressing with no resources to carry out the goals that are stated in that bill, I will be the first one up on my feet to condemn it. If that is its intent, not only will the New Democratic Party but other Canadians very quickly see through it and condemn it.

Mr. Nunziata: Mr. Speaker, the member seemed to suggest that in order to acquire certain rights and freedoms, citizenship is a prerequisite. Just to correct the record, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not require citizenship as a prerequisite in order to be afforded the rights and privileges that attach to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I want to make that absolutely clear. The Conservative members seem to be suggesting the same thing, that in order to have certain rights to equality and the right not to be discriminated against, Canadian citizenship is a prerequisite. In fact, it is deliberately not a prerequisite in that when parliamentarians decided on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, they specifically decided not to make it a prerequisite.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to participate today in this debate. It is an historic debate which establishes a new federal government department responsible for multiculturalism and citizenship.

These are important steps which flow from a landmark study done in 1960, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which is properly known as the Laurendeau-Danton report. It noted at that time in recognition of the diversity of the cultural groups found in Canada that "Canadian society, open and modern, should be able to integrate heterogeneous elements into a harmonious system to achieve unity in diversity".

I think much of the debate and differing points of view here relate to the fact that fundamentally, in adding this rich cultural diversity and recognizing it, we add to the fundamental characteristic which is in our constitution officially, the bilingual and bicultural nature of Canada. We are talking about the right for equal treatment and consideration under the laws of Canada.

I am very pleased because this government took an initiative that was started with Laurendeau—Danton in 1971 to establish a policy marking multiculturalism. This department becomes official through this act and I believe, if given adequate resources, can become a great symbol of the reality of our multicultural heritage and of the grandeur of our diverse ethnic mix, something that the people of Canada are becoming more and more aware of every day. We hope that this department can enrich the unique multicultural tapestry that is the Canadian society, enabling us to forge a new era of goodwill in the relationships among our people, notably respect, understanding and tolerance, which is the hallmark of Canadians with very few aberrant moments in our history.

As a new arm of the national government, this department should work to preserve and enhance the fundamental characteristics of Canada which I stated as being tolerant, open, peaceful and democratic. But let us not fool ourselves. The creation of this department is but one step in the long process of integrating the ethnic, linguistic and multicultural aspects of our people with the day to day reality of life in this country. There is racism and those of us who do not care to acknowledge it move with a blind eye. If this department takes us one step toward the goal of eradicating that sense and undercurrent in society, we will have been successful with this move.

This department and this minister must be prepared to do battle against that growing undercurrent which I have talked about, and which I sense underneath this society. If we are to avoid major steps backward as a society, this trend must be stopped, and I hope this will be a major goal of the new department. If we are not more tolerant, then we fail the most democratic test of our modern society and of a modern democracy.

The challenge goes beyond institutions. I hope that this new department will be able to provide a leadership role so that its efforts, research and findings will become a guiding framework all across government and through this touch all aspects of Canadian life. The challenge is to direct our whole range of national programs toward integrating new Canadians and those who have been here for generations into all aspects of Canadian life in a coherent and proper manner.

It is not enough to support individual groups in society, visible minorities or others just in the enhancement of their own cultural expression. Song, dance and cultural festivals are important and serve to preserve individuality in society.

• (1730)

But we must, at the same time, seek integration through maximum participation in Canadian life. It should be considered a Canadian reality that a certain distinctiveness can be preserved while the process of integration is also put into practice. This is one role that I can see for this new department. Pursuing the dual objective: enhancement of cultural uniqueness coupled with a great emphasis on integration. The old maxim remains true: the whole of this country is far greater than the sum of its parts, as exciting and as rewarding as each of those parts can be.

The so-called politics of inclusion must be used here in Canada, not with the aim of forgetting the past, but integrating it into the present and the future as we build together a cohesive society able to address the challenges the next decades will bring.

I think this department, Mr. Speaker, should broaden our perspective. As we embark on establishing a new institution in this country it will gain its place around the cabinet table and in the political life of the country. We must use the opportunity to begin letting our cultural sensitivities pervade other aspects of government, of public discussion, and of our daily lives. Perhaps the visibility of this department will now ensure that education, job training, employment accessibility programs and law enforcement agencies all have a multicultural component to recognize differences, respect and reflect these differences, and see them as a positive aspect of our Canadian mosaic. And though perhaps a contradiction in terms, the creation of this new department may just help us meet our goal of seeing multiculturalism merged with all general cultural policies and thinking rather than being introduced and addressed in isolation.

Would it not be a wonderful irony if, by separating multiculturalism and citizenship off on their own, from a government perspective, it would achieve the goal of integrating them more from a human perspective, making them part and parcel of the Canadian way of thinking.

I said earlier that governments must go further than supporting multiculturalism through cultural expression, such as song, dance and folk festivals, and through other ministries and institutional fora. I believe that on the basis of mutual knowledge of cultures and opportunities to seek, establish and develop links, Canadians can be enriched by each other.

The view articulated in the charge to the 1984 Equality Now! committee task force, which was looking at the question of visible minorities in our Canadian society showed that while progress has been made, there are still many miles to go. I quote what was stated in the preamble: "Canada stands on the threshold of a new era. In a country with a long history of innovation, accommodation and tolerance, the challenge of an increasingly multicultural and multiracial society is one which can and should be met head on— The government must now consciously choose a course of action which will ensure that there are no roadblocks preventing the full participation of all citizens in the cultural, social, economic and political life of this country".

Therefore, how is such enrichment to be achieved? There are many ways but time does not allow me to elaborate or be creative. However, let me suggest that we look at our law enforcement agencies and our employment-equity policies, they are the best places to start. I would also suggest one of the other ways that is all pervasive is the medium of broadcasting, television and radio, which are fundamentally a part of all of our lives and can serve the cause of strengthening sensitivities in the multilingual, multicultural racial areas of this country. Let us not forget that watching television is the number one leisure activity for Canadians. We spend more than 24 hours a week, on average, in front of the television set. Each year, Canadian children watch almost 1,000 hours of television compared to 800 hours spent in school.

As well, more than 50 per cent of Canadians say that radio and television is their principal source of news and information. That is the medium that can carry the message of who we are, what we are, and can reflect the exact colour, shape, dialogue and dialect that we use as Canadians.

I gave you these facts and figures because I believe it to be clear that Canadians of all races, all creeds, and all colours can find out what their society is like and what society thinks of them in part by the way they are portrayed through the media.

With the growth of television, media images have become a very important substitute for social integration. Therefore, we must ensure that broadcasting does not represent individuals and groups as a single North American type for we are not all the same and that must be recognized when we see ourselves on the screen.

Now Parliament has a golden opportunity with the imminent introduction of a new broadcasting bill to make sure that our broadcasting system through its programming is more reflective of the multicultural nature of Canada helping to meet the goals of society and the objectives of the new department of multiculturalism.

A new bill must not stop there. It must address, as I have said, employment equity and the absence of visible minorities in the media, not just on the screen but those behind the cameras, those on the media boards, the commissions and self-regulating bodies.

The government in its legislation must encourage the broadcasters in their hiring practices to be more reflective of the multicultural nature of Canadian society. This is just an example which could be extended to all phases of business activity in our country.

I would like to suggest that there are a few problems in this bill. My hon. colleague, the member for Saint-Laurent, pointed out that the definition section needs to clearly link this bill with Bill C-93, the Multiculturalism Act. There is a need for clarity as to who the minister really is, who will speak with the most force and authority at the cabinet table to bring to reality our vison of Canada for tomorrow.

The question has been raised by her as well about whether the bill adequately focuses on the separate areas sufficiently, that is, the area of responsibility for citizenship separate from that of multiculturalism. There must be a distinct description of the responsibilities in each of these areas.

I would hope that in legislative committee partisan politics will not be played out in this very sensitive area of our Canadian vision for a Canadian way of life, and that thoughtful amendments from any side of this House to improve the operative sections of the bill will be warmly appreciated and the needed changes made.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I bring to your attention that the United Nations has proclaimed this period, 1987 to 1997, the world decade for cultural development. One of the objectives of this decade is the international recognition of equal dignity for and of all cultures. It is my hope that within Canada we could achieve this objective.

I think we can be a role model for the nations of the world. We must be confident that we can become more accepting, more aware of the true value of our diversity, but also realize how fortunate we are to be so diverse in the first place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Scarborough Centre.

Mrs. Browes: Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member on her speech. I have had an opportunity over the last five years to work with her .I want to say that in those five years I have enjoyed the opportunity of working on a very special committee of the Equality Rights Committee that reported to the Parliament of Canada in the form of a report called Equality For All.

I know that her comments come from a position of knowledge of the importance of this issue of citizenship and multiculturalism, the pluralistic aspect of this bill that is so important at this time in our history.

I want to say that I was pleased to see her emphasize in her comments the importance of tolerance in our communities. Every once in a while this issue of racism raises its head and I think we are all outraged with it. Her comments on tolerance were so very important and well taken today, as well as the understanding that we must have between the various communities.

• (1740)

I would like to ask the member what her advice would be to other colleagues in her Party who oppose this bill.

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to address the member for Scarborough. I have very pleasant memories of the almost year we spent together on a daily schedule which was rather rugged travelling across this land. I see one of her other colleagues is the Associate Minister of National Defence. Certainly, the area of defence was one to which we paid a great deal of attention.

The misogynists are there in force.

[English]

Equality now, equality for all; respect, tolerance and understanding, and you asked me about differences of points of view. That is one of the great qualities of Canadians. All Canadians, hopefully on your side or my side of this house, are open, tolerant and understanding of differences. This difference that you are alluding to is perhaps a difference of time line. It is my hope that in the future we will not need to have a committee, department, minister or bill to address multiculturalism per se. I hope it will disappear in terms of its need over time. I would eventually agree with the member's colleague sitting behind you that we will eventually have the department of Canadianism or the department of culture. However, we have not reached that stage yet. I think I mentioned there is this ongoing need to recognize that there is racism just below the skin and we really must address it.

It is an unfortunate reality that we have not built a system of integration into the Canadian way of life as we receive and absorb new immigrants. I would hope that the minister will find a way to improve the integration and acceptance of new Canadians, and find mechanisms within our law enforcement agencies. In my city the level of racism between the various visible minority groups is of great concern. There have been some unfortunate incidents of late which only underscore the need to work at many levels in our society to reach nirvana, that point in the history of development of Canada where we will not need multiculturalism. In that regard, I would say that he is perhaps 10 steps ahead of where we are right now. Let us hope that we reach where he is some day.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make a comment, since as you probably all know, I was very busy with the election campaign which has just ended in Québec. I took part in the campaign as a Liberal militant. I worked very hard for Liberal candidates and I offer no apologies for the fact. Certainly not! I am very proud of the fact.

During the campaign, some very unfortunate comments were made about the majority in Québec by a new party which calls itself the Equality Party. Strange that a party called the Equality Party would, through its founding president, practically spit in the face of those of us people in Québec who try to explain what it means for a people to survive. I just couldn't why. Perhaps some day here in the House we could have a debate in which we could express the feelings of the majority in Québec that sees its numbers dwindling at an incredible rate because of the low birth rate and an aging population.

If this bill could bring us to a better understanding of what racism is, perhaps some of the unfortunate statements we heard in Quebec, references to fascists and nazis and comparisons of the Québec situation with what is going on in South Africa, in that case I believe this bill will have been tremendously useful. I say this, and I am sorry that I have to say it, and I hope, in the weeks and months to come, that here in the House we will reflect and draw the necessary conclusions before we make a final decision about other political events that are expected to take place next June, and I am not referring to the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada, I am referring to Meech Lake. So I hope we will have a chance to get back to this question.

I also hope we will have a chance to explain how, when people speak without thinking, and this also applies to the people who made those unfortunate statements, whoever they happen to be, and I am not naming names— I don't want to get into particulars, because today I especially wanted to say how happy I was to be able to take part in this campaign. If you really want to know the issues, an election campaign is the place to be. I also want to congratulate those who were elected and who are not of the same political stripe as we are. We cannot blame people for voting for a party that calls itself the Equality Party. After all, this is a democracy. In fact, I am almost glad this party exists, because as a result, the party for which I worked may move to the centre between two extremes, which should improve our relations in the future.

But if this particular bill, and here I agree with the Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone), could help us to fight all forms of racism—but when we talk about fighting all forms of racism, we must not be selective. It's like when we fight for human rights, we don't have the right to be selective. We either believe in human rights or we don't. We can't pick and choose. We can't select some people rather than others because they are more important, better organized, richer, and ignore the destitute. Either we believe in this principle or we don't. Either we fight racism or we don't.

And that is why, without being directly involved today in the debate on second reading of this bill, I nevertheless intend to take a close look at the legislation, Mr. Speaker, and to become actively involved, because I have a lot to say about the development of multiculturalism in Canada. I believe that together, we can make this a better bill, as long as the Government doesn't insist on believing that the bill is perfect. There have been a number of developments since multiculturalism was first introduced under Mr. Trudeau. A lot has happened and much experience has been gained.

I listened to what was said by the Hon. Member from Toronto, and I must say it made me think. I feel I ought to give due consideration to what the Hon. Member,for whom I have a great deal of respect, had to say. He may belong to a minority group, he may feel like a minority, but as you know, minorities are not always wrong.

The Hon. Member asked us to think carefully before we pass this bill, and I want to thank him for that. I also wish to thank my other colleague who reminded us that we should have an absolute horror of racism in all its forms. I hope that in future elections, people will be more careful and refrain from distasteful comments of this kind, especially when addressed to an entire population. I realize no one is absolutely blameless, but we cannot attack a group as such just because we don't like them.

[English]

Mrs. Finestone: Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I share my colleague's view and hope for the eradication of racism and bigotry and that sane heads and careful language will guide our direction, wherever we are in Canada.

• (1750)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent (Mrs. Maheu) on a point of order.

Mrs. Maheu: We had planned for 20 minutes, with two 10-minute speeches, and the period for questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Mount Royal (Mrs. Finestone) had the first 10 minutes. It should therefore be Ms. Guarnieri's turn to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When there are such agreements, the Hon. Member who has the floor must speak for 10 minutes. To my knowledge, the Hon. Member for Mount Royal spoke for 15 minutes. If someone speaks for more than 10 minutes, I leave 10 minutes for questions and comments.

So if such a decision is made in future, I should certainly be informed. I would then stop the Member after 10 minutes.

In this case, I did not know and that is why I did not interrupt the Hon. Member for Mount Royal. I let her speak for 15 minutes and after that, I allowed 10 minutes for questions.

Mrs. Maheu: We reached an agreement before whereby each of us would speak for 10 minutes, and our whip referred to it before the debate started.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) will help the Chair, as usual.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that we do not have a better system to tell Members who are speaking how much time they have taken and especially how much time they have left to speak.

I recognize the difficulty, because in the heat of action, it is not always easy for us to think about time constraints.

A suggestion that I might make to the Chair would be to have a small dial under each clock showing the time left to speak. For a 10–minute speech, it would start at 10 and go down to zero.

But I think that we will have to improve the system the House uses to control the time allowed. Otherwise the Chair has trouble knowing whether it is 10 minutes, 5 or 20.

Personally, I gave notice, but I told the Speaker that occasionally during the debate the Opposition would like to divide its periods of 20 and 10 minutes into two periods of 10 and 5 minutes.

In any case, for reasons that can be easily explained, there was a misunderstanding here, for which I apologize.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In future, the Chair will check when there is this kind of agreement. I will check when Hon. Members start their speeches.

So, for now, the Hon. Member for Ahuntsic (Ms. Roy–Arcelin).

Mrs. Nicole Roy–Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to offer my contribution to the debate on Bill C–18, an Act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

The Bill before the House today, Mr. Speaker, is about what makes Canada special.

Last year in the House we considered the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, and as a Parliament consisting of people speaking both official languages and coming from the four corners of this country, we endorsed this very important aspect of our Canadian identity.

The department will play a major role during this last decade of the twentieth century. At its core lies our constitutional commitment to two official languages, and our recognition of our cultural and racial diversity. The department has three crucial missions.

The first consists in further consolidating our unique position among the nations of the American continent. To a large extent, this position derives from our recognition of two official languages and the store we set by the various cultures of all Canadians.

This position also derives from the means we have chosen to reflect these realities and respect them.

Although it would be misrepresentation of the facts that we have always lived in harmony, our history proves that as Canadians we have a special aptitude for compromise, for seeking reasonable solutions and for acting as mediators in case of conflict.

These aptitudes, together with the flexibility of our institutions, are so many characteristics that are the envy of other nations. It is characteristics like these that are judged essential in a world that demands an increasing ability to adapt to change.

The department's second mission is to ensure that no one in our society is deprived of the ability to participate in that society as a result of constraints such as illiteracy or cultural or racial background.

In cases where our society has been unable to give its citizens a satisfactory level of proficiency in reading, writing and arithmetic, we have failed. Where our society perpetuates discrimination in any form, including discrimination based on the misconception that a particular race or group of persons is superior to others, we have failed. We cannot claim to be that generous and compassionate society we aspire to be, as long as this kind of situation is allowed to exist.

The third mission of the department is to create a climate and conditions which will enable all Canadians to contribute to building our future. By pooling the various assets of our fellow citizens we have at our disposal the combined knowledge, experience and wisdom of all the world's cultures. This is a tremendous wealth which is our very own. It is a wealth which must be put to good use if we want to face up to the challenges that can be expected in the near future. It is a wealth which is absolutely essential to the fulfilment of our promising future.

Mr. Speaker, this department will not be a regulating or controling agency. It will not attempt to maintain the statu quo, nor will it be chained to the past. It will look to the future and actively seek to eliminate whatever obstacles might limit our aspirations. Its mission will be to convince us, make us aware of the reality, throw us challenges, and urge us to become simple society which will grow and command the respect of all nations the world over.

Mr. Speaker, the Bill under study is the logical continuation of the work done by the House last year, but as my Québec colleague said, the Secretary of State and Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship (Mr. Weiner), it is much more than simple legislation to establish a federal department. As I see it, a department such as we want to establish today deals with the many issues and values we all share. I am convinced that the object of the Bill is more than a mere consolidation of Government programs. It conveys the vision strong Canada looking to the future. That is why I am proud to take part in this debate.

The existence of a Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship will be significant for the people of Montreal, Moncton, Trois-Rivières, as well as Toronto, Winnipeg and Saskatoon. It will be just as significant for Quebecers as it will be for all other Canadians' groups, for our native people as for our citizens whose forefathers came here with Champlain or with the Loyalists.

Mr. Speaker, we are debating a bill to establish a new Department. This bill follows a commitment made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), on September 25, 1988, confirmed on election night, and reiterated in the Speach from the Throne.

Mr. Speaker, in studying this bill, we will realize its importance for all Canadians. With this bill, we will bring Canadians closer together, and establish a government agency mandated to encourage our people to build a stronger Canada for the future.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

REPORT OF CANADA–U.S. GROUP

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the report of the Official Parliamentary Delegation of the Canadian Section of the Canada–U.S. Interparliamentary Group which attended the thirtieth annual meeting of the Canada–U.S. Interparliamentary Group at Ottawa and Montebello between June 1 and June 5, 1989.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Charest: I am sorry I could not hear, Mr. Speaker, because I have, under the item of tabling of documents, some Order in Council appointments to table.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree to revert to tabling of documents?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

ORDER IN COUNCIL

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1).

FEDERAL COURT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–38, an act to amend the Federal Court Act, the Crown Liability Act, the Supreme Court Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. minister have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

INTERPROVINCIAL LIVESTOCK TRADE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): moved for leave to introduce Bill C–262, an act respecting interprovincial livestock trade.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I would simply like, in having this bill printed, to point out that this piece of legislation seeks to settle the problem of security for producers who sell livestock outside of their own province. A large number of the provinces have internal security arrangements for cattle traded interprovincially, but extraprovincial trade is a federal matter.

• (1110)

This bill would attempt to set up a trust fund to which abattoirs and slaughterhouses purchasing livestock and poultry from farmers outside a province would contribute. In the event of their bankruptcy the producers would not be left wanting their money.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Routine Proceedings

CANADA–ALASKA BOUNDARY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–263, an act respecting the international boundaries between Canada and the State of Alaska.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, this bill is being reintroduced to permanently and legislatively entrench 54–40 as Canada's international land and marine boundary with the United States at the southern tip of the Alaska panhandle, more commonly known as the A–B line.

It is particularly important now because of the hijacking of the MV Fonzie and Viscount this summer and the kidnapping of the crews by the U.S. Coast Guard.

The debate will fully inform Canadians of the history of the boundary and the need for the Government of Canada to entrench the boundary in law, to fight for the protection of the boundary and to fight to protect the rights of Canadian fishermen such as Skippers Devereaux and Willson from the above–named vessels.

Mr. Speaker: The Speaker of course has no public comments whatsoever on this bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NUCLEAR LIABILITY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–264, an act to amend the Nuclear Liability Act (limitation period).

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, this bill to amend the Nuclear Liability Act is vitally required in Canada for the future protection of Canadian nuclear industry workers and for Canadians generally.

The purpose is to delete the 10–year limitation period for litigation and to provide a fair limitation period for victims of radiation exposure and injury.

Modern medicine now recognizes latency periods of up to 30 years for radiation induced exposure. Surely laws passed by this Parliament must recognize medical realities and the rights of Canadians.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present several petitions containing the signatures of over 1,500 of my constituents who want to retain the uniformity of the RCMP uniform.

While they are in favour of those changes which will contribute to the safety and comfort of the RCMP, they feel it is imperative that the distinct heritage and the tradition of the RCMP as exemplified by this uniform be maintained. They wish to see continued the proud tradition of their forefathers while ensuring that this legacy will be preserved for generations to come.

REVISION OF EXTRADITION LAWS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have approximately 6,000 names on petitions. They have been approved as to form by the clerk of petitions.

They relate to the question of our extradition laws. They refer specifically to some individuals who have created concern among Canadians generally. It is my honour and pleasure to present all of these petitions to the House today.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege of tabling a petition signed by 34 residents of Canada and users of VIA Rail who call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in the House a petition certified pursuant to Standing Order 36 as being in conformity with the rules of this House.

Residents from a number of communities across Canada are concerned about the proposed slashes to VIA Rail. As you would know, Mr. Speaker, there are many communities in northern British Columbia that have no other means of travel in and out of their communities. It is very important that VIA Rail not only in those areas but other areas of Canada be maintained.

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, this morning it is my privilege; speaking on behalf of the people in my riding and in towns as far away as Saint-Bruno, Verdun and Dollard-des-Ormeaux, to present a petition which conforms to Standing Order 36, in which petitioners call upon the federal Government to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

[English]

I also have the privilege of presenting another petition on behalf of the Seniors Club in my riding whose members are begging us because of the impact on our senior population to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by people from across Canada, 126 signatures, who oppose the proposed cuts the government has suggested to VIA Rail in its budget.

These people believe that VIA Rail is an essential part of our Canadian identity and have signed this petition praying that this Parliament will in fact oppose these cuts and stop them.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as I did yesterday, as I expect to do tomorrow, as I know my colleagues and I will continue to do for as long as it takes, I rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition, authorized by the clerk of petitions, to this House.

It is from a number of Canadians who are calling on the government to reverse its policy of the death of a thousand cuts to VIA Rail, calling on the government to enhance the service, not to cut such things as five of the seven weekly Supercontinental runs through Edmonton, not to annihilate train service through Calgary but rather to restore passenger rail service in this country to the effective levels that we all need.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions, for a total of 60 signatures. They are based on the disillusionment, concern and uncertainty over the goods and services tax.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject this proposed goods and services tax. This petition is duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too rise under Standing Order 36 with regard to the goods and services tax as proposed by the Government of Canada.

This petition is signed by approximately 75 petitioners from across Canada who really believe that the new GST will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle income Canadians. On behalf of these petitioners I present this petition and pray that Parliament rejects the proposed goods and services tax.

• (1120)

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour and privilege to stand before this House and present petitions from Canadians from southwestern Ontario who ask this government to reverse its decision on the goods and services tax which will hurt every man, woman and child in southwestern Ontario and throughout Canada.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured today to present two petitions to the House pursuant to Standing Order 36.

I humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax on behalf of these petitioners, Sir.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It has been certified correct by the clerk of petitions. It is signed by petitioners from western Canada who are simply distressed that the government has decided to reduce VIA Rail services.

I am speaking for them when I say that they are moved to the point of depression. They are asking the government to reconsider this dastardly decision.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to bring to your attention petitions which call upon the government to show some consideration for the taxes that have been imposed upon Canadians over the past four years.

On behalf of these people who strongly oppose the new goods and services tax which they consider to be unprecedented as a grab from their pockets—and they are hit with not only higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment—I call upon the government to stop the tax.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present petitions from people from the city of Windsor. The petition is duly certified.

It prays that the goods and services tax that is proposed by this government be abolished in its present form.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 76 and 122.

[Text]

MR. ROBERT ALBERT CALLIHOO, OF THE MICHEL CALLIHOO INDIAN BAND

Question No. 76—Mr. Skelly (North Island—Powell River):

Did the Secretary of State for External Affairs contact Mr. Robert Albert Callihoo, of the Michel Callihoo Indian Band, to discuss the matter of enfranchisement of the Band and was an appointment made with Mr. Callihoo and (a) if so, for what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Secretary of State for External Affairs did not contact Mr. Robert Albert Callihoo of the Michel Callihoo Indian Band to discuss the matter of enfranchisement of the band as this issue was deemed to be neither a constituency matter nor to fall under the mandate of the Department of External Affairs.

LINES OF CREDIT AND LOANS TO CHINA

Question No. 122—Mr. Kindy:

For the years 1985 to 1988 inclusive, what is the dollar value of (a) lines of credit and loans given to China by the Government of Canada or its agencies and Crown Corporations (b) loans and subsidies given to Canadian companies to do business with China?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Insofar as External Affairs and International Trade Canada, the Canadian International Development Agency and the Export Development Corporation are concerned, the reply is as follows:

In the years 1985 to 1988, the Export Development Corporation (EDC) had a Cdn $2 billion line of Credit with China. This was most recently renewed by EDC and the Minister for International Trade in October 1988. The value of loans provided by EDC for China from 1985 to 1988 inclusive was Cdn $472.6 million. EDC does not provide any direct loans or subsidies to Canadian firms.

Support to the private sector for activities in China during the period totalled $5.4 million under the Program for Export Market Development (PEMD), $1.75 million under the National Trade Strategy, and $15 million under the Industrial Cooperation Program of the Canadian International Development Agency.

[Translation]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including:

1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary;

2) an unjustifiable high interest rate policy, with an interest rate spread between Canada and the United States that is at record highs;

3) negligence in the management of Canadian trade causing unparalleled reductions in our trade balance and a loss of jobs, and threatening the survival of many formerly thriving Canadian industries;

4) abandonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forest industries; and

5) continued neglect of regional disparities.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the new 9 per cent sales tax is the ultimate confession of failure of a government which said that it was dedicated to fiscal responsibility.

This government has lost control of the economy. Interest rates are spiralling upward. In five years the total public debt of Canada since Confederation has doubled. Annual deficits are still around $30 billion per year, and all of this despite the largest tax increases during the last five years in the history of our Confederation.

[Translation]

The Conservatives have increased taxes 31 times since 1984. If you add up the tax increases for a single-income family with two children and an annual income of $23,600, which in Canada means you are below the poverty line, the Tories increased their taxes by 60 per cent in the past five years. If you happen to be an average Canadian with an annual income of $45,000, thanks to the Tories your taxes went up 30 per cent in five years. If you are wealthy with an annual income of $100,000, that increase was only 8 per cent and if you earn $200,000 annually, it was only 4 per cent. Everybody knows this isn't fair. There is no equity in all this. The same applies to the new sales tax. It isn't fair either.

After letting their expenditures get completely out of control and raising personal income tax levels to the saturation point, Tories are now inflicting on Canadians the biggest, sneakiest and most regressive tax grab in our history. The impact of this tax will be particularly severe on lower and middle-income families. This means that the people in the poorest and most remote regions of our country will suffer most.

How big is this tax, Mr. Speaker? Well, if we add up all personal income tax collected by all ten provinces and the two territories, that amount is still less then what the Tory Government is going to collect from Canadians through its new sales tax. This is a tax that will be paid on practically all goods and services purchased by Canadians: shoes, socks, shirts, skirts, hats and coats, piano lessons, home repairs, plane tickets, stamps, lottery tickets, paper napkins, toothpaste and aspirin. Mr. Speaker, I have only twenty minutes —

[English]

The tax does not meet any of the criteria which the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of Finance set forth for the tax. It does not meet one solitary principle they outlined to Canadians. They have been dishonest about this tax right from the beginning, right from day one.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Listen to what they said, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance said that this tax would be revenue neutral. We asked them what this new vocabulary meant. The Minister and the Prime Minister said during the election campaign and prior to that, and I use their words: "Not one penny of additional tax", will be paid as a result of this new sales tax. Those were their words to Canadians during the election campaign. The Minister's own technical paper says there will be $5.5 billion more taken from Canadians.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business says that that amount is $10 billion more. That is the figure used by the chairman of the finance committee of the House of Commons, the member for Mississauga South, who is in the House. Yet the Minister and Prime Minister said that that member was not right, and yet he was telling the truth. Now we are faced nationally with a new $29.7 billion tax grab.

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Minister and the Prime Minister told Canadians it would be revenue neutral. Saying this tax would be revenue neutral was somewhat like saying that hurricane Hugo was like a warm summer breeze.

[Translation]

And what about the visibility of this tax? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance told us that consumers would be well aware of the tax and that it would appear separately on the sales slip, so we would see what proportion it would be of the sale price. The tax was supposed to be visible. And then one day, the Minister woke up in a cold sweat.

• (1130)

He suddenly realized that if his new sales tax appeared separately on the bill, consumers would know what they had to pay as a result of the tax and would know exactly who was responsible for this extra cost.

But the most important thing from his point of view is that if everyone knew what the tax rate was, he could not increase it every year as he did with the old manufacturers' tax. The Minister of Finance increased this invisible tax from 9 per cent to 10, 11, 12 per cent, in short by 3.5 per cent in 5 years.

[English]

Now the tax will not be visible. It will not be on the sales slip. Instead, the minister is going to give to every business a little sticker to put at the check-out counter. The sticker will say, "Notice: Somewhere in your total bill is the new 9 per cent sales tax. If you cannot afford it, put some of those things back. Have a nice day" signed by Brian Mulroney.

The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister said they would impose this tax only with provincial co-operation. In 1987 the minister told this House of Commons that without provincial co-operation any such sales tax would be, to use his words, unworkable; not a difficult tax to impose, not harder to do, but unworkable. So what happened? The Conservative government is now imposing a tax on Canadians which they themselves said was unworkable. It is now being imposed without provincial co-operation.

The Prime Minister and minister said that they would remove the income tax surtaxes. They did not. They said they would lower personal tax rates. They did not.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister and the Minister said that the tax would be easy to administer, but that is not true!

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business believes that applying the tax will be a nightmare, much more complex that the taxes imposed by other countries; 4,000 new tax collectors—additional bureaucrats; a million small and medium-sized businesses will have to collect the tax for the Minister; every small business will have to spend $2,000 more because of the tax; the Retail Council of Canada says that it will cost $2 billion to collect the "easy to administer" tax; it will take more machines, two sets of accounts, two sets of cheques, two sets of transmittal forms. It is total anarchy for every private business person, for every small business in the country!

[English]

The Prime Minister and the minister said it would not be inflationary. On September 14 of this year the Prime Minister said, and I quote him: "If inflation gets out of the bottle, you will go through an enormous amount of agony before you get it back in, and we are not going to let it get out of the bottle".

Did the Prime Minister not read the April budget? That budget says that this 9 per cent tax will cause an increase in consumer prices of about 2.5 to 3 per cent on average. Did he not read the minister's technical paper that is now before the committee on finance? On page 34, that paper says the tax will cause a 2.25 per cent increase in inflation. That is an increase of 50 per cent over the current rate of inflation. This tax will double the inflation rate in Canada. It will not just let inflation out of the bottle, it will be a new and powerful engine of inflation in the economy.

How naive can the Prime Minister be if he thinks business will not try to pass on the tax to the consumer? How naive can the Prime Minister be if he believes that the labour movement will not try to get that tax back in increases in salaries and wages across the country? It is going to cost us more for everything, considerably more.

For example, the homebuilders' association told the finance committee the tax will increase the average house price by $3,000. That is just the average.

What about food? Originally the government said the tax would apply to food. We protested, Canadians protested. We deposited petitions here in the House.

Finally, in response to Canadians everywhere saying:"We don't want a tax on food", the Minister of Finance rose in this House on September 2, 1987, two years ago, and as reported at page 8700 of Hansard stated:

> Let me make it absolutely clear. There is no proposal in this document or any other document in Canada to tax food. That is a fact.

Those were the minister's words. That was not a fact. That was pure fiction; that was pure deception; that was not coming clean with Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): In 1987, we thought that the minister had relented. More important, all Canadians thought so too. Almost every newspaper in the country ran headlines that read: "No tax on food, says Minister of Finance". Now, the minister is laughing at Canadians; laughing at this House of Commons. He says that is not what he said. He said he just said there would be no tax on groceries. He said that he was very precise.

He knew exactly what he was doing. He knew that Canadians would assume that he had meant that he was not going to tax food. What did he do when he saw those headlines? He did not say anything to correct them. What did he do during the election? He did not say a word. He left Canadians with the impression that there would be no tax on food and now he says: "It's only basic groceries". He knows full well that if he had told the truth to Canadians he would not still be in his office as Minister of Finance.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): What is the situation now? All food in restaurants, cafeterias, snack-bars, will be taxed. He is still debating the merits of taxing certain canned and frozen foods, and a whole range of other frozen products. About the only thing Canadians can be thankful for is they will not pay tax on food on trains; they will not get the chance because there will not be any more passenger trains left in the country.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The restaurant industry says that the new tax increases their tax burden by 612 per cent. Loblaws warns that food prices could jump by 10 per cent. The minister is proposing a confusing, hodge-podge of rules and regulations which will result in a whole bunch of ridiculous distinctions.

A frozen pizza in a grocery store is not going to be taxed unless it is heated up in the store before you get in. But if you buy a pizza from a pizza parlour, it will be taxed.

The same carton of milk will be taxed if you buy it in a restaurant, but it will not be taxed if you buy it in a grocery store. Milk in a paper cup is taxable in a restaurant, but in a carton it might not be taxed under certain conditions. Under the so-called streamlined accounting procedures milk, might be taxable and tax-free in the same store at different times of the year. That is a shambles, Mr. Speaker. That is ridiculous. How do you expect the corner grocery store, the corner pharmacy to deal with a confusion like this? Mr. Bulloch, in this sense, was right when he called the whole tax a nightmare.

To add insult to injury, the Prime Minister is trying to sell this as a tax cut. He is going across the country and saying: "Look, we are lowering the 13.5 per cent tax to a 9 per cent tax". That is an unbelievably fraudulent way to treat Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it does not take a mathematical genius to figure out that a new 9 per cent tax at the retail level on a $300 armchair for your home would come to $27. But the $27 tax at 9 per cent on a $300 armchair is more than the 13.5 per cent tax on the wholesale price of that armchair of $100 which would only be $13.50.

So a retail tax at 9 per cent is higher than a 13.5 per cent tax at the wholesaler distribution level. Anybody can understand that, except the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, we see that not a single criterion announced by the Prime Minister and the Finance Minister has been met. Not one! It is not revenue neutral, it is not visible, it is not easy to administer, the provinces are not participating, the personal income tax rate is not lower, the individual income surtax is not eliminated and it has an inflationary impact.

This tax therefore meets none of the criteria, the principles set even by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and now they ask us to find alternatives.

There is no alternative to this tax. Get rid of it! Do not impose it. Go back to the drawing board. That is the alternative!

• (1140)

[English]

This tax cannot be salvaged or rescued. It does not meet any of the principles which the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance set forth to this House. This tax is nothing but a licence to print money for the government. It is a licence that Canadians want revoked. This tax is coming out of their pockets. It is coming out of our savings accounts, pension cheques, family allowance cheques, unemployment insurance cheques, our budgets for clothes and shoes, and it is on top of rental payments, mortgage payments, and utility bill payments.

As I said to the students at Dalhousie last week and will say again at the University of British Columbia on Monday, for the first time in the history of this country we have a tax on learning, a tax on reading, a tax on literacy, a tax on books. Yet, the Prime Minister, talking to his national convention a few weeks ago, said that education was the priority in the next four years of his government. What a farce! What deception!

It is a tax on pollution-control equipment from a government that said it would do everything to stop pollution. It is a tax on sickness. It is a tax on housing. It is a tax on raising children. It is a tax on the necessities of life. For God's sake, Mr. Speaker, it is even a tax on death.

It is a tax to pay for the government's own mismanagement. It is a tax to pay for the government's own incompetence. We will all pay hundreds and thousands of dollars more for the simple reason that the Tory government has made a complete mess of the fiscal situation. They botched it and now they want Canadians to try to rescue them and pay the price. Well I say, Mr. Speaker, it cannot be rescued. It cannot be tinkered with. It is so fundamentally flawed it has to be scrapped and the minister has to go back to the drawing board and withdraw the tax.

We intend to fight this tax all the way. It is a bad tax. We are telling this government it is time to scrap this idea and go back to the drawing board. Canadians are fed up with the dishonesty behind the tax. Canadians are fed up with this 9 per cent tax. They are fed up with this government.

I say to the Prime Minister: "You had better listen to what the people of Canada are telling us and your own members." It is coming in loud and clear whether you live in Whitehorse, Vancouver, Toronto, Trois-Rivières, Halifax or Corner Brook. It is coming from ordinary Canadians, from the elderly, from seniors, from our students, from single mothers, from the business community, and it is virtually unanimous. It is saying to the Prime Minister of this country: "Scrap this tax. No more double talk. No more of these extravagant newspaper ads. No more phoney sales pitches. No more of this tax. Scrap it, get rid of it, and bring us back something that makes sense".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton East on questions and comments. I will come to the hon. member for Kamloops in a moment.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I think we have just had an impassioned analysis of the situation. I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Vancouver Quadra whether in fact, given the parameters of this tax, and given the fact that everything the Prime Minister said he did not do he has done, do you think that the Prime Minister will actually listen to Canadians and listen to the Leader of the Opposition? Do you really think he will scrap this tax?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I think if the Prime Minister listens to Canadians, if he listens to his own members of Parliament, some of whom are in the Chamber today, if he travels about the country as all of us are travelling listening to our own constituents and Canadians everywhere, he will not only get the message, he will start feeling the heat.

If I were the Minister of Finance I would listen very carefully to the daily pronouncements of his Prime Minister because I think the Prime Minister is wavering.

If I were the Minister of Finance I would feel the Bunsen burner right under my backside.

Mr. Riis: I listened very carefully to the speech of the Leader of the Official Opposition, and I agreed with virtually everything he had to say. I have a question. I heard him say that he was against this sales tax, that this is a mean and a terrible tax, and he had a whole host of good critical comments to make. The question I want to put to him is a very simple one. Does he and his Party oppose the concept of a consumption tax? Would he commit himself and his party today to never, ever supporting a consumption tax of this nature, that they are against the idea of imposing a sales tax on the people of Canada? Perhaps a very tight answer might be appropriate for this question.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Only a government has the authority under our rules to bring in a tax. As you know, we cannot amend it from the floor. It has to have the warrant of the Crown signed by the Minister of Finance in order to make it applicable.

We are examining a tax that does not meet any of the criteria which the government itself put on a tax, criteria which we stated in our minority report in the last parliament were necessary even before you could consider a value added or a consumption tax, or something of that sort. We said it would have to be visible if there were any way we would ever contemplate it; it would have to be provincially drafted and co-ordinated, and it is not; we said there would have to be some progressivity in it. It is so warped on the basis of the minister and the Prime Minister's own criteria that there is no way, in our view, that it can be improved, or amended. You have to go right back to the drawing board.

We said during the election that we were against the sales tax. We still are. We would look at a better combination of progressivity, at a better balance between taxes on the various elements in an economy than this.

Also, it has to be looked at within the general scope of the economy. Fiscal and monetary policy have to be taken together. Also, consideration must be given to what the government has allowed to happen to our exchange rate as part of the secret deal that I believe exists with the United States under the trade agreement.

Mr. Riis: I appreciated the response given by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I have been trying to think, while he was making his very thoughtful presentation today, how we differ in terms of the Liberal Party and the New Democratic Party. I think I have found the way.

We are clearly of a mind that we oppose the principle and concept of a national sales tax, of a consumption tax, of a tax on consumption of any kind. We totally oppose it. I think what I am hearing the Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition say is that, on principle, they do not necessarily oppose that, but they oppose this particular tax. This is a mean, rotten, bad tax, there is no question about it. But perhaps in another form, in another way, they would consider it.

If we are trying to figure out how we do differ, because we are both fighting this tax, would he agree that perhaps this is the way that we do differ? We oppose it on principle and you really buy the principle, it is just that you really oppose this particular tax?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I want to suggest to the Hon. Member for Kamloops, who in an earlier incarnation shared a lot of our views, that he can read what he wants into what I have said, but should not put too much confidence in his reading.

• (1150)

The real difference between a Liberal approach to taxation and an NDP approach to taxation is that someday we will have to implement it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

Mr. Taylor: I wish to follow up my House leader's question from a few minutes ago in terms of the way in which the Leader of the Official Opposition is opposing this goods and services tax. The wording of the motion is quite specific. The first item reads:

> 1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax—

Could the Leader of the Opposition clarify that the comments he made throughout his well-argued speech would also apply to this item if it read 4 per cent sales tax, or 7 per cent sales tax? Do his arguments apply to any number there, as opposed to the specific 9 per cent which is mentioned in his motion today?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I want to thank the hon. member for listening so closely to what I had to say. I hope he profited by it, and I hope it is reflected in his own speech when he addresses the House.

I said that the tax is so flawed you cannot tinker with it. That means you cannot play with the numbers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mrs. Dobbie: I would like to ask the hon. member, since he sees that this tax is such a negative tax and such a blight, according to what he has had to say, what concrete and positive proposals he would like to bring to the Canadian people as an alternative to this tax?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The hon. member is entitled, representing a constituency in this country, to put that question. Before I answer it fully, she really should assure me that what she reflects carries the support of all the people in her constituency. We heard her colleague from Edmonton deposit about 6,000 names representing what his constituency feels. I wonder whether she could assure us that she speaks for her constituency and that the people are behind that tax as she seems to indicate she is.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the speech by the Hon. Leader of the Opposition. Since I am getting on in years, I have discovered that much of what is too exaggerated does not exist. I feel that to be so negative on so many points indicates a certain weakness in the argument.

What he has convinced me of is that we are not doing this because we intend to win a popularity contest. We are doing it because this government has a long-term plan to build a strong economy for Canada. The plan is aimed at such vital objectives as reducing our deficit, controlling the growth of national debt, of removing obstacles to Canada's economic growth, and fostering innovation and competitiveness in the business sector.

Our plan is working. There are factual independent measurements of its progress because 1.5 million new jobs have been created in Canada over the past five years; 86 per cent of them full-time, and 57 per cent filled by women. Unemployment rates have dropped in every region of our country. Youth unemployment has dropped by 7 per cent as more and more Canadians have joined in our economic renewal. The economy has expanded by 20 per cent. Business investment is up by 95 per cent, and average after tax disposable income is up by $1,600. The government's annual deficit has been cut by about $9.5 billion below its level of 1984–1985.

Our plan is also aimed at providing more assistance to Canadians in need through our social programs. That is something the opposition always seems to forget. Only by having a dynamic economy, led by a vibrant business sector, coupled with a fair and effective tax structure, can we provide these services today without imposing an insupportable burden of debt on future generations.

I have listened carefully to the comments made by opposition members about our comprehensive proposals for sales tax reform, and frankly, I am not very impressed. I am waiting to hear their proposals for sales tax reform. How could they replace the current manufacturers sales tax, a tax that has been universally condemned by nearly every interest group in this country as a destructive, discriminatory, and unfair tax?

This important reform of our tax system is an essential element of the plan for economic renewal that this government began five years ago.

As far as interest rates are concerned, I maintain that it would be irresponsible and in fact counter-productive to lower rates before inflationary symptoms have eased off. It would certainly not be a good way to manage the economy. There would be a heavy price to pay for any short-term relief that might result. Business, labour and other levels of government must realize that this Government will not tolerate measures that are inflationary. However, to beat inflation, both the public and private sectors of our economy must be involved.

The federal Government will continue to implement responsible monetary and financial policies in order to defuse inflationary trends. As inflation eases off, we will see the benefits as reflected by a drop in interest rates, a more competitive economy, stronger growth, more jobs and a higher standard of living for all Canadians.

Our GST package, and I stress "package", contributes to these objectives. First, by contributing to the deficit reduction effort and ensuring that we can continue to pay for programs and services Canadians value. Second, by helping to ensure that Canada can compete in the world economy. Third, by improving the over–all fairness of the tax system.

Since we released our proposals in August, a number of misconceptions about the GST have arisen. I welcome this opportunity today to put these misconceptions to rest and to get the facts on the table.

To begin with, it can be taken as a given that we would all prefer taxes to be lower rather than higher. That goes without saying. But it also goes without saying that they are a necessary part of a civilized and modern society. The government knew that its proposals would be controversial.

No one likes taxes and we recognize the sacrifices that Canadians have been asked to make to help deal with the deficit. Life could have been easier for all of us if we had been content to let the subject of tax reform drift, as past governments have done. But, for a government that takes its responsibility seriously, that was just not acceptable. Our objective is to have the fairest and most efficient tax system that can be designed.

Very few Canadians are aware that they already pay a hidden federal sales tax of 13.5 per cent when they purchase manufactured goods. They do not realize that this 13.5 per cent manufacturer's tax generates production losses of as much as $9 billion annually for Canadian businesses, exporters and workers.

The present tax has another drawback: widely varying rates increase the risk of distorting consumer choices.

If prices contain distortions, it is practically impossible to make an informed choice. Our economy's resources are not being used to their fullest extent. We cannot maximize our production potential and that has an impact on jobs.

The existing tax is very complex. It applies to only 75,000 businesses but has generated 22,000 special provisions and administrative interpretations.

Under the existing federal tax, which may be as high as 19 per cent on certain goods, we are taxing business inputs while our foreign competitors do not. Our entrepreneurs are therefore at a disadvantage, both domestically and on foreign markets, and this has an impact on employment.

Furthermore, with the exception of automobiles where the tax affects wholesalers, the taxable value of imported goods does not include the foreign manufacturer's marketing and distribution costs, while these are usually included in the value of domestic goods.

This means that on average, the amount of tax paid on most Canadian goods is almost a third more than the tax collected on imports. The importer pays a lower tax and can therefore sell more cheaply. This, too, costs jobs.

The federal sales tax as we know it today goes back 65 years, to a time when production and distribution patterns were relatively simple. However, the economy has changed drastically since then, and Canadians must move ahead.

Sixty–five years ago, manufacturers manufactured and distributors distributed, with little involvement in retail sales. Today, the situation has changed. Many retailers are involved in manufacturing, and some manufacturers are directly involved in retail sales. Other industrialized countries are in the same situation and have adapted their tax system. Today, only Canada has maintained a tax on manufactured goods.

[English]

I think it is safe to say that the GST is not a well kept secret and that by January 1991 we will make sure that consumers are well aware of how much GST they are paying. Certainly GST is going to be much more visible than the present federal sales tax that is buried throughout the production process. The GST is part of the five–year fiscal plan put forward in the April budget which will see the government's cash requirement reduced year by year to zero. The GST has been designed as an integral part of our fiscal strategy.

I would like to remind the hon. members that the GST is a carefully balanced package. In order to change one element other parts must be balanced. If the rate were to be lowered another element would have to change. The base would have to broaden, the credit lowered or the deficit increased.

Canadians know by now that our government is serious about revitalizing the Canadian economy and ensuring a strong and prosperous future for this country.

Our record since 1984 speaks for itself. Our critics do not have a monopoly on compassion and fairness when it comes to dealing with Canadians who need assistance. Our government is committed to reforming the tax system to ensure fairness for Canadians right across the country.

We are serious about reducing the cost to government and about reducing the deficit. At the same time we are serious about maintaining the services that Canadians look to their government to provide. The goods and service tax will ensure that these goals are met.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister who was a journalist at the newspaper where I was a cartoonist when I was a university student. I congratulate him for being the Minister responsible, but I have this question that I want to ask him. I am still thinking about the time when I was a student and the Minister was encouraging students. Does the Minister propose taxing cartoons? Does the Minister propose taxing comic strips? Does the Minister propose taxing comic books intended to help educate young people? Does the Minister propose taxing school texts? Is the Minister for students and young people? The Minister said that we had to talk about being fair, I heard him mention the words fair and civilized, and that Canadians have to keep up with progress. Mr. Speaker, is beating up on youth and students progress?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I believe that my hon. colleague is raising an extremely important question. When this tax, this reform project based on a multi-stage tax, was considered, we paid a great deal of attention to fairness. That is why instead of making the choices for the citizens ourselves, we ensured that they would make the choices themselves and those who have less freedom of choice because they have less income, in particular students, would receive compensating credits.

As for books, you must understand as well that we granted special provisions for universities, libraries and public agencies. This is not a tax on culture, if you will. To be fair and equitable, for the rate to be low, the tax must apply to as many items as possible. Otherwise, it is taking from one pocket and putting in another. But to restore fairness to a system, I agree with him that without credits and compensating measures, it would be an unfair, regressive system. We have what has been described by the taxation office as perhaps the fairest system in the world, according to tax experts' studies.

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. minister very carefully. He is a man of honour and I have a great deal of respect for him. I have had dealings with him in the past and I have some respect for him.

I find it rather strange, because when a goods and services tax was first announced by the government Canadians were told that it would be revenue neutral. They were told that it would be visible. They were told that it would be simple. They were told that it would be integrated with the provincial scheme.

We did not hear at that time about this tax being used to reduce deficits. We were not being told that this was going to be used to reduce a national debt. We were not told that this would involve some 6,000 bureaucrats which has got to be an anathema to any true Conservative.

• (1210)

Canadians are getting a little bit cheesed off with the lying that is going on; they do not like to be lied to. This government promised that it was going to be revenue neutral, and now we are hearing that once this cash cow gets into the barn the government is going to run off into the stable and pull a few billion dollars off this cow every time it needs it to reduce the deficit or the national debt.

Why? The question is: "Why has this government lied to Canadians and why does it continue to lie to Canadians?" That is the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Loiselle: I thank the hon. member for Nickel Belt for his question and his remarks. I would tell him that we did not lie. We have explained from the beginning that the purpose of this type of mechanism of tax reform would not be used per se to increase the revenue of the government. We said it would be used to replace a bad tax, the present federal sales tax, and to make it, I would say, not regressive.

I think the hon. member would agree with me that we have devised a system of credit because we have also promised that it would not hinder affordability of housing. So the package in itself is a very well balanced package and it does not in any way bring additional revenue to the government for other spending.

As far as visibility is concerned, I would be inclined to smile at this because the tax does not exist and it is probably the most visible thing in the country at the present time and will remain so, as it is in other countries, for the future.

As far as a national tax with the provinces is concerned, for two years we have worked with the provinces to try to arrive at a system, which we would have preferred. We know that to implement such a tax is a difficult political thing to do, even if it is necessary. To get 11 governments to come together at the one precise time is not an easy objective to reach. We have tried to do it but we can understand and respect the other governments of the provinces that do not have the problem we have with their sales tax, which is a rather straightforward consumption tax. It works. In our case we have a disastrous tax.

He talks about revenue and deficit reduction. We know that the present sales tax is extremely porous. While we increase the rate the income keeps going down proportionately because manufacturers will find ways of escaping and avoiding the tax. Through the new system, which is much more modern and which has been chosen by all modern countries, we will prevent our revenue from disappearing and in this way we will help reduce the deficit.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, in asking my question I want to make it very clear that I oppose the tax and think it should be knocked out completely, not tinkered with. But the government and the finance committee have indicated on a number of occasions that they are prepared to do some tinkering with the tax. If that is as close as they can come to listening to the people of Canada and will go ahead with that tinkering, while I reject that idea I will ask a question of the minister who on other occasions has indicated a great knowledge of the credit union system in Canada.

The credit unions have said that they would be disproportionately taxed by the new goods and services tax. In their submission before the finance committee they talked about financial services being exempt. However, when the GST goes into effect credit unions will have to pay the tax on shared networks, training, consulting, tax processing, and cheque clearing because of the way their system is set up. Can this minister inform us in the House if plans are under way to continue to tinker with this tax to change it to apply to the credit unions?

Mr. Loiselle: I would like to thank the hon. member for a very important question. Indeed the problem he has indicated to me is a serious and difficult one. I would like to inform him officially today that we are aware of the particular situation facing the co-operatives and credit unions and that we are going to find a way of solving that problem because we do not want to be unfair to this movement.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I am absolutely delighted to participate in the debate today and pleased to have an opportunity to lend some commentary toward the motion that simply describes the host of ways in which this government has mismanaged the Canadian economy and, as my colleague from Nickel Belt said earlier today, how we have been exposed to a whole set of lies by the government. I suppose we might as well call a spade a spade and simply call it that.

When you look at even a small part of Canada—and I refer simply to the constituency that I have the honour to represent, the Kamloops constituency—we have had again a whole host of mistruths stated regarding what this government would do for our area. For example, it suggested that it would enhance VIA Rail service. Now we find out that it is going either to eliminate totally VIA Rail service in some parts of Canada or curtail it very seriously.

Then it said it was going to support more post-secondary education. Yet before us on the Order Paper there will soon be legislation to cut back on transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education.

It said it was interested in helping develop our forest resources, yet the government refuses to sign the forest agreements with the province of British Columbia to add funding for reforestation, silviculture. It simply suggests that we go to the Western Diversification Fund. We are not talking about diversification of the economy; we are simply talking about enhancing the forest resource.

It suggested that it would help the mining industry. Rather than helping the mining industry it is eliminating programs that encourage the exploration for more and new mineral deposits.

It said that it was concerned about illiteracy and we saw that it brought in a tax on reading. I think we are now the only country in the world where the government has imposed a tax on books, periodicals, magazines and reading material to make it more expensive and therefore a disincentive, if you like, to encourage people to develop their reading and analytic skills.

The government said it would help ranchers because of the severe drought situation. There are huge cattle ranches in the central interior that receive no drought assistance and support at all.

It said it would enhance tourism and yet refuses to sign a new tourism agreement with the province of British Columbia. As the tourist association told the finance committee last night, about 30,000 jobs will be lost in this sector because of the 9 per cent sales tax that will be introduced on all tourist services, which will essentially price a good number of our tourist operations out of the market.

It said it would clean up the environment, yet refuses to help any of the municipalities and towns across Canada develop their sewage treatment facilities in terms of a cost sharing basis with the provincial governments which are quite anxious to participate. It promised a comprehensive child care program and then reneged on that child care program; it has abandoned all intentions of supporting that.

It said it would enhance the fishing industry, and we have found out in the last number of days that the fishing industries on the east coast and the west coast are in a state of crisis, a state of collapse, because of the policies of the government.

I could go on and on. The Prime Minister has heard this list before and simply has to stand there and agree that "yes, this is the case; that in spite of all of these promises that we are going to take all of these different initiatives, we have reneged on them all. We have broken the promises that we have made. We have lied time and time again and that is just the way the world is."

I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, Canadians are fed up with that Tory world and when they get another chance to go to the ballot boxes, once again this will ensure that this set of promises will never even be listened to again in terms of a future government of this country.

I want to, before I get into an analysis of the 9 per cent sales tax, simply refer very briefly to the free trade agreement. While the government was jamming this legislation through the House of Commons it indicated that all sorts of economic opportunities would take place in Canada. Everybody else who had analysed the free trade agreement clearly found once that border was removed, the industrial sector and business sector of Canada would move their operations to the United States where they could produce their materials more cheaply for a whole host of reasons.

Now we have, of course, a very long list of companies that have done just that and have taken advantage of the ease of moving their operations to the United States.

I just want to read a handful of these into the record as an example of this particular transfer of jobs south or, as others call it, the Americanization of Canada: Canron Incorporated shifted production to its plant in Columbia, South Carolina. Burlington Canada Incorporated moved its plants into Georgia and Virginia. Hartz Canada moved its production to a number of United States plants in the deep south. Picker International Canada Incorporated transferred its production to Cleveland, Ohio. International Playing Card Company moved its production to Cincinnati, Ohio. Star Suspension Industries moved its product development to the United States parent plant.

Woodbridge Group moved down to Mexico, again to take advantage of free trade areas on the Mexican–U.S. border. Bendix Safety Restraints moved its plants to Alabama and to the Mexico zone. Marr's Leisure Products moved its production to Newberry, South Carolina. Takahashi Industries moved its production to Seattle, Washington. Executive Dental Supply moved its production to Pullman, Washington. ITW Shakeproof moved production to Tennessee. Advanced Gibson Canada moved down to Pennsylvania; and Progress Company moved its plant to Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

K. T. Industries downsized and moved its production facilities to Fort Wayne, Indiana. Northern Telecom, with hundreds of jobs to a total of 1,500, shifted its facilities into Dallas, Texas and down into the southern part of California. United Maple Products moved its production to Vermount. Canadian Coleman moved down to Texas and Kansas. Leviton Manufacturing transferred its production line of electrical goods to the United States, again down into the Mississippi area. I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker.

I just repeat that we now have literally dozens and dozens of major Canadians firms that have moved their production into the United States. There has been the transfer of over 50,000 Canadian jobs into the United States as a result of the free trade deal. We are seeing our worst fears being realized.

However, I want to turn my comments today to the 9 per cent national sales tax, the goods and services tax, or the grief and suffering tax that has become more associated with the title.

I looked at the newspapers this morning that were referring to this tax, as different groups have commented in the last two or three days. Some of the names they used to describe the tax were: a very bad tax, an insidious tax, an oppressive tax, a ridiculous tax, a regressive tax, a vicious tax, a mean tax, a cruel tax, a harsh tax, a punitive tax, a brutal tax, a destructive tax.

I have been looking in newspapers now for the last three weeks at virtually every article and I have yet to find a single group, a single organization, a single agency, a single person with credibility in the tax area that supports this tax and says this is a good idea. The only exception is the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance.

I see the hon. member from Edmonton here. I even hear a whole host of Conservative back-benchers say that this is a terrible tax, that they should not be introducing it and that the Minister of Finance should not be pursuing it at this point. Every Premier across Canada and every single group that has spoken out in the last couple of weeks have spoken against this tax.

Even the Liberal party has spoken against this tax. I think it is appropriate to make the comment that what the Liberal party is saying is that it does not support this 9 per cent tax. It might support a 7 per cent tax or a 6 per cent tax with some modification and so on.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Riis: My hon. friends can ask me some questions to elaborate on this at the end of my speech, but it appears to me that the Conservatives think this is a deliriously wonderful 9 per cent cruel, mean tax that they want to impose on the people of Canada. The Liberals are not quite sure that this is the kind of mean, cruel tax that they would impose, but they would modify it somewhat and make their imposition.

I will say that there is one party that will never impose a sales tax, a consumption tax on the people of Canada, and that is the New Democratic Party, never.

Let me continue with what this tax does, this mean, cruel, horrible tax.

An Hon. Member: It is a crushing tax.

Mr. Riis: A crushing tax, as my hon. friend indicated. When he says "crushing", he means crushing. This is going to crush the life right out of the economy. It is going to crush the kind of lifestyles that people have been struggling to develop over the last little while.

A typical Canadian family today is going to have not $100, not $200, not $500, but $850 yanked out of its pocket every year as a result of this tax. T hat is the most modest estimate. I have all sorts of information here.

For example, the Consumer's Association of Canada, which has a very through research branch, says that every man, woman and child will be hit with at least $1,000 a year in additional taxes as a result of this 9 per cent tax. That is not the New Democratic Party saying that; it is the Consumer's Association of Canada that says $1,000 a year, at least, for every man, for every woman, for every child. For a typical family of four it is $4,000 minimum that will be yanked out of its pocket.

Not only will those people not have that money to purchase necessary goods and services, but the community will not have that money. In a community like Kamloops with a population of 65,000 people, at $1,000 a person hundreds of thousands of dollars each day will be yanked out of that community, dragged down to Ottawa to be spent on some pretty peculiar and questionable uses.

That is not the way you generate economic activity, by taking away that money that could be used to purchase goods and services, certainly those necessary goods and services. What is going to be taxed? From the crib to the coffin, from haircuts to movies, from laundries to lawyers, from kids' snowsuits to hunting licences. These are all new areas that have never been taxed before.

This is the largest tax grab in Canadian history since the imposition of the personal income tax which the government of the day said would last just a couple of years. Back in 1917 the government said that this was a tax to get us out of debt as a result of the war effort and that as soon as we are out of debt it would take away this personal sales tax. We know that personal sales tax has stayed in place and has gone up until now when we have this crushing burden of tax including personal tax, excise tax, and gas tax. Now we are going to add another big tax on our back. This is a party of tax, tax, tax. The Conservative Party is a tax party.

The Minister of Finance will know that since this government came to office in 1984 the average family in Canada has paid at least $1,300 more in federal taxes, and now we are just going to be slammed between the eyes with another 9 per cent consumption tax on all these goods and services.

Nobody can imagine a government that says: "We have got a great idea. We are going to tax snowsuits for children. We are going to tax children's books". Imagine taxing children's books.

Imagine taxing haircuts. My dad is 86 years old. When he goes down to get a haircut with his pension he is going to have to pay a Mulroney sales tax of 9 per cent on his haircut; when he buys his shirts and when he goes to a movie—on everything. This is a cash cow that this government has created to generate, not millions, not thousands of millions, but billions and billions of dollars in additional funds every year.

The economy cannot take it and Canadians will not take it. That is why we say that this government has to back off on this tax initiative. It is not only the New Democratic Party that says this is a tax that we must not proceed with. There are some other groups that you would be interested in hearing from, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business opposes this tax. The Canadian Organization of Small Business opposes this tax. The Consumer's Association of Canada opposes this tax. The National Council of Welfare opposes the tax. The Canadian Home Builder's Association opposes this tax, because it says that this tax will add thousands of dollars to the price of a new home.

We already know that the housing market is overpriced now and that it is virtually impossible for young Canadians to even consider owning their own home. This government's solution is to tax it again, raise the tax on the price of a new home. But it says: "Well, we are going to exempt rental". That is only partially true because all of the inputs into rental housing, the janitorial services, repairs, renovations, heating, advertising fees, landscaping and maintenance will all be taxed and one can rest assured that the landlord will take those additional 9 per cent taxes and pass them along in terms of the rent. Indirectly, even rentals will be increased substantially as a result of this tax.

That is not all. Wood Gundy, one of the most outstanding financial analysts in the country, has said this is a punitive, mean-spirited tax. The Coalition of Senior Citizens opposes the tax. The One Voice Seniors Network strongly opposes the tax. The Canadian Conference of the Arts strongly opposes the tax. The Canadian Association of Universities opposes the tax. The Canadian Bar Association opposes the tax.

The Canadian food industry is deliriously in opposition to taxation when the pizza at Pizza Hut will be taxed 9 per cent and the pizza you buy in the grocery store will not be taxed. What kind of nonsense is this? What kind of an unfair, biased, discriminatory tax is this? Not surprisingly, the industry opposes it. The Conference Board of Canada opposes it.

I think if we were to honestly analyse the process, we would say that the Conference Board of Canada, with its first-rate research department, looks carefully at these kinds of initiatives and then makes its observations. It came out strongly in opposition to this tax saying that it is going to cost thousands and thousands of jobs. The Conference Board of Canada said that this 9 per cent tax will lose tens of thousands of jobs in this country. We have to listen to this group.

I do not understand the government. When it is confronted with the Canadian Bankers Association, its friends in the banking community, the Institute for Policy Analysis and its own back-benchers, to whom does it listen? To whom is the Minister of Finance listening? I have yet to hear a single group stand up and say it thinks this tax is a good tax.

Why are people not to trust this Minister of Finance? He said at the beginning of this process that the tax would be revenue neutral, that as we phase out the manufacturers' sales tax, we are going to impose a sales tax but we are not going to make any money out of it. That is not true. Already, this is billions over what the manufacturers' tax brings in. It is billions and billions of dollars over being revenue neutral.

The Minister promised that the tax would be simple. We are seeing quite the contrary. I have here the brief of the members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business who again are almost unable to speak when they refer to this tax. John Bulloch, one of the most outstanding supporters of the government on almost every issue, says that this government must fall, that the Minister of Finance must resign, and that they ought to be hanging their heads in shame as they back off on this tax and start over with a fair system. He points out on behalf of the small business community that this tax is unworkable, that it cannot be done and is going to be punitive to small business. Small business is all tangled up in red tape now and they have tax collectors hassling them day and night. What will this do? We will have to hire not one, not two, not five, but maybe 10,000 more tax collectors.

New Zealand, with a population of 3.3 million, has over 5,000 new tax collectors. We have a population of 26 million, so when that is factored out, we can say we are going to have thousands more tax collectors now.

I do not know why my friends in the Conservative benches are not up in their seats shouting and yelling today because the small businesses in their communities are going to be harassed beyond belief with new paper flows. There will be a blizzard of forms coming into those businesses and tax collectors will be hassling them. Mr. Bulloch says it is going to cost at least $2 billion for just the small business sectors to comply with this tax.

The Minister of Finance said that he would not proceed with the tax unless the provincial governments co-operated and we would have a melded provincial-federal tax. That has gone by the board completely. Now we are going to have a combined federal-provincial tax in British Columbia of 15 per cent. In Newfoundland it will be 21 per cent and it will be changing right across the whole country. What a mishmash. Not a country in the world has a tax system of that nature.

The minister promised that the tax would be visible on all sales slips. We all know that they have abandoned that promise a long time ago. It will not be visible.

There is so much more one could say and should say. The New Democratic Party not only opposes this tax but opposes the principle of this tax. This is a regressive tax. When a poor family buys snow tires for the winter coming up and has to pay a 9 per cent sales tax and the wealthy family with an income of $200,000 a year buys those same snow tires, they both pay the same amount of sales tax. How is that fair? How is that just? How is that equitable? That just points out the discriminatory, biased nature of this tax to the middle-income and low-income families of the country.

We as New Democrats oppose this 9 per cent tax. We do not care if the government reduces it to 8 per cent, 6 per cent or 5 five per cent, because we know very well that within a matter of time, it will be jacked up to 10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent. Some European countries now have it has high as 22 per cent.

In closing, we oppose not only this tax initiative, but we oppose the principle of a consumption tax as being regressive, mean and unfair. We will do everything that we possibly can in the intervening period to convince the government, along with many of the Conservative back-benchers, to stop progressing with this particular tax, to go back to the drawing board and to start over with real tax reform that is fair and ask those corporations and those individuals who are not paying their fair share to start paying their fair share.

Mr. Jelinek: I have a very simple question for the hon. member. He says that he and his Party oppose categorically any consumption tax. I would like to ask him whether he supports and agrees with the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax. As a former businessman and as a former manufacturer, I know from experience that the existing manufacturers' sales tax is a major obstacle for Canadian manufacturers and producers in terms of fairness, competitiveness and international trade opportunities.

Obviously, the reason for this government's move in proposing a fairer system, which we believe the GST is all about, is to give Canadian producers and manufacturers an opportunity to be competitive both domestically and more importantly, internationally so as to compete on a level playing field which they are not doing today.

The hon. member knows full well that 48 countries around the world have a similar tax to the GST, a value-added or consumption tax, therefore giving an advantage to all of those manufacturers in those countries over our manufacturers in our country. Unless we remove this obstacle, we will not create the opportunities for our manufacturers and producers to create the type of competitive spirit that is held elsewhere around the world and therefore to create the jobs that are necessary to be created.

Does the hon. member support that existing tax? If he does not, what would he and the New Democratic Party replace that tax with? That tax, as he well knows, brings in revenue of some $18 billion today which goes toward many of the social programs as well as many of the things that both my hon. friend and I believe Canadians want, desire, need and will continue to have.

I would like the hon. member to say what he and his party would propose to replace the existing manufacturers' sales tax, if in fact he is opposed to that sales tax and agrees with me that it is an obstacle in the way of Canadian producers and manufacturers.

Mr. Riis: I appreciate the question of my hon. friend. Yes, indeed, the manufacturers' sales tax has to go. The Minister of Finance on occasion has referred to the existing manufacturers' sales tax as a killer of jobs. I think he used that term, Mr. Speaker. You remember that he said it was a killer of jobs. Yet I am puzzled because if this is a tax that kills jobs, why would the government increase it time and time again? I remember back in 1984 when the Conservative government took office, it was 9 per cent. Now it is 13.5 per cent and I am curious why a government that identifies a tax as a killer of jobs, that creates an unfair advantage for foreign importers against our own manufacturers, would increase that tax once, twice, three or four times. I am not referring to the hon. member, but the government itself. It is a bit hypocritical to be saying that this is a killer of jobs and then to keep increasing the tax so it can kill off more jobs.

To answer my hon. friend seriously, yes, we believe that the manufacturers' sales tax should be phased out over time. I do not think we have to drop it from 13.5 per cent to zero overnight, but there should be a commitment to phase it out over a period of time that would make sense to the manufacturing community and we should replace it with some changes to our tax system.

Let me offer three or four examples. The United States has in place a minimum corporate tax .The Reagan administration back in 1986 saw all of these corporations that paid no income tax and said that was wrong and that they should pay some, so it introduced a minimum corporate tax. We say we should do that in Canada. As we all well know, there are 60,000 profitable corporations in this country that do not pay a penny in income tax, let alone 50 cents. Let us have the minimum corporate tax to generate some new revenue like they have done in most other countries.

Second may I humbly suggest that many of the corporate tax incentives, the tax exemptions, or the tax loopholes, are not necessary. Billions and billions and billions of dollars each year are lost from our federal treasury through silly corporate tax loopholes. Even the corporations say they are silly and that we do not get the bang for the buck. It costs us $500 million for a certain tax incentive and we do not get very much in return. Let us close off some of these large corporate loopholes.

Mr. Dorin: Name one.

Mr. Riis: The finance committee has gone on at some length to name some of the silly corporate loopholes. I would ask my friend to name one that works, one that is good. I remember my hon. friends from Alberta who ranted on about all the grants and the freebies in the tax system for the oil companies to explore, while the taxpayers were paying 100 per cent. They moved off on some of those, sensibly. There are many more corporate tax exemptions that ought not to be in existence.

Let me offer my friend one other suggestion. Why is it that our interest rates have to be so high? Why is it that our deficit and debt are jacked up every year because of our increased interest rates? It is Conservative interest rate policy, but it perplexes me that our rates have to be three or four percentage points higher than those in the United States. If we were to drop our interest rates just 2 per cent, we would cut from the deficit over $3 billion just like that.

I could go on to make some suggestions, but a minimum corporate tax is one suggestion, eliminating some of the corporate tax incentive programs is another, lowering interest rates is another suggestion, a more progressive income tax system in the personal side is another. Just as a starter, this indicates that there are many alternatives to increasing revenue through the tax system as opposed to simply imposing a punitive 9 per cent sales tax.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a couple of remarks. The Hon. Member for Kamloops referred to the mismanagement of the economy. I would like to recall that very recently, the World Economic Forum and the International Institute for Management Development indicated a significant improvement in Canada's international competitive position, with our ranking among the 23 major industrialized economies climbing to fourth position this year from sixth in 1987. For mismanagement, this is good management, I would say.

The hon. member referred briefly to the free trade agreement. Whenever we do something that more less looks like what the Americans have done, we are accused of imitating them. We are doing something that the Americans have not done. We are using a different system of taxation. This is something important. It is a modern way of doing it and we are doing it in way which is more generous.

The Hon. Member talked about his father. We were concerned about his father before he made his speech. We want to protect all the fathers of Canada by devising the most progressive credit system and package. This is to protect the people who need to be protected, to remove the regressive aspect which exists in the sales tax.

We have made this effort and I think you have to take into account the whole package and not only say we will be taxing everything. We will make sure that people are well protected because if we project the numbers you have given, with so many Canadians paying so much more, we would not have any deficit left next year. I would not mind that, but I do not think this is the way the world would unfold.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is over. On a point of order, the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations with representatives of all parties, and in an effort on a supply day like today to get as many speakers as possible on debate, I would like to move a motion that reads as follows:

> That, notwithstanding any standing order of this House, that after the third speaker during supply proceedings on September 28 and October 2, all speakers be limited to a 10-minute speech followed by a 5-minute question and comment period.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could the Chair ask a question of the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier? Would that mean that the Chair would rotate speakers? There would not be two in a row for each party like it was yesterday?

Mr. Gauthier: Indeed, Mr. Speaker. Instead of allocating one period of 20-minute speeches with 10 minutes of questions and comments, you would do the usual rotation after every speech of 10 minutes followed by five minutes of questions and comments.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I want to concur that indeed, there have been discussions, and because we are dealing with a finite period of time, this will enable more members to comment on the motion before the House, and we certainly support that idea. I think it is a good opportunity to explore various ways of including more members in these important debates.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we have no problem with the motion as proposed by the Official Opposition. The only concern I would have is that the rotation would follow the normal party rotation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It would follow the normal party rotation on allotted days which is not the same, if there is such a thing as a rotation in this House, as it is on normal second reading.

The House has heard the terms of the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to rise on behalf of the constituents of Kenora—Rainy River and Canadians generally to explain what this particular government has done to our economy since its election in 1984 and its re-election in 1988.

This government has a record of mismanaging the economy in just a very few short years that is unprecedented in the history of this great nation of ours. This government's record, for lack of a better word, is tainted. Canadians have lost all confidence in the government's capability to manage the affairs of this country.

When the Conservatives took power in 1984—and we go back to this over and over again—Canada's national debt stood at $170 billion. Today our national debt stands at $340 billion. For members opposite who might have a hard time understanding this, that means that the national debt has doubled since 1984.

At a time when everyone has been asked to tighten their belts, the government has increased its expenditures. Where is the leadership in this? How can Canadians be expected to carry the burden of deficit reduction when their own government spends and spends and spends?

• (1250)

The Minister of Finance claims that his goods and services tax proposal is the be all and end all of tax reform. There are so many problems with this particular GST that it seems to me that the government's only alternative, and we say this very honestly, would be to scrap it and go back to the drawing board. The goods and services tax is nothing but a tax grab.

Canadians are fed up with tax increases. They are fed up with the burden imposed on them time and time again. Since this government took power, Canadians have seen tax increases no fewer than 30 times. I can only say what Canadians have been saying in the press lately, "Don't you think enough is enough?"

Not only will the goods and services tax increase taxes. It is inflationary, and I believe higher interest rates will be the end result. The hidden nature of the goods and services tax means that Canadians will not know how much tax they are paying.

This government has promised that the GST would be visible. Well, as we have seen on numerous occasions, it is just another one of those broken promises. Canadians no longer trust anything this government says. As for integrity, the record speaks for itself.

To keep the GST hidden from Canadians is despicable. The government is telling Canadians, "Trust us." There is no trust in this government and there is no integrity in this government.

In the budget tabled earlier this year, the government chose to tax back seniors' pensions and family allowances. The Finance Minister said that everyone had to chip in and help reduce the deficit. Reducing the deficit on the backs of seniors and those less fortunate is ridiculous.

The Finance Minister said that he was not tampering with the universality of social programs. However, the Finance Committee chairman admitted in an interview with The Ottawa Citizen on Saturday, September 23, that the government's real agenda is to do away with universal social programs.

It is unbelievable that on one side they can say that it is not and on the other side they say that it is. It is really difficult to understand who is telling the truth in this regard. Coupled with the goods and services tax, the claw-back provision of old age security pensions and family allowances, means that seniors will have lost what little buying power they have left. Every purchase made will now be made more difficult. Their budgets, which are already stretched to the limit, will be considerably affected by the goods and services tax.

At a time in their lives when they should be enjoying their retirement years, seniors will now be faced with difficult financial decisions and increased burdens. Where is the fairness this government claims to profess? There is no fairness. This government could not care less about being fair.

The goods and services tax will severely restrict small businesses in northwestern Ontario that depend heavily on tourism. Increased administrative costs, increased taxes and the higher prices for services will kill this very volatile industry in my region. My riding sits on the Canada–U.S. border. Communities such as Rainy River, Emo, Stratton and Fort Frances depend on tourist dollars from the United States. Businesses located in these communities are already struggling to survive as people cross over to the U.S. to buy gas and grocery items. The goods and services tax will serve only to encourage my constituents to cross over to the U.S. in greater numbers.

The goods and services tax will not contribute to the economy of these municipalities and may very well throw them into an economic turmoil from which they may never recover. Jobs will be lost and, with reforms to the Unemployment Insurance Act, many will not be able to collect benefits and will therefore be forced down to the old welfare office.

Opposition to this goods and services tax is widespread. I believe this government has no option, except to scrap it entirely. Communities in my riding will not survive. In northwestern Ontario, we already pay astronomical prices for gas and transportation services by road and by air.

Fragile industries such as forestry and mining located in single–industry towns will crumble as a result of the goods and services tax on transportation services. Towns such as Ignace, already struggling to survive as a result of mine closures, will become nothing but ghost towns. There will be no jobs, no consumer purchases and therefore, no economic activity.

My constituents are vehemently opposed to the goods and services tax. Petitions are rolling in every day. Now that we know what the government's intentions are with respect to VIA Rail, my constituents realize that the only other mode of transportation left is by air. Many of my constituents are retired citizens. On their pensions, they cannot afford to travel by air. Even if they could, they would not spend that kind of money knowing their pensions are being taxed and that the goods and services tax will mean additional expenses.

The destruction of VIA Rail in northwestern Ontario will mean that many of my constituents will be housebound. Young couples who dream of owning a brand new home, single–parent families trying to make ends meet, seniors trying to enjoy their golden years are seeing their dreams and aspirations destroyed by this government's so–called management of the Canadian economy. They have seen the destruction of universal programs, they have seen the destruction of Canada's passenger rail service and they are seeing the destruction of their future.

Canadians are skeptical of this government, and so they should be. Canadians no longer believe in this government and they know it cannot be trusted any longer. The government may think business is on its side. If the government would only take the time to listen to what business is saying about the goods and services tax, it would soon realize that the support is simply not there. Small business will be faced with an administrative nightmare, and will have to hire additional staff just to sort out the mounds of paper required to administer the GST. Grocery stores will be the hardest hit because they will be trying to figure out where the GST applies and where it does not. Then again, the finance committee chairman has said that the government is reconsidering the tax–free provision for basic groceries.

The goods and services tax has to go. The Canadian economy will not benefit from this tax and Canadians will suffer as a result. Opposition is growing day after day. The government has underestimated the Canadian people. Canadians understand what the goods and services' tax will mean to them and to the economy. Canadians realize that their purchasing power will be significantly reduced. They know that tough times are ahead if the GST goes through. As we always say on this side of the House, Tory times are tough times. Canadians are fed up with carrying the burden of taxation. They want to help reduce the deficit, but they do not want to do it alone. Canadians want to see responsible government.

The constituents of Kenora—Rainy River have spoken out. They have voiced their strong opposition to the reforms to the Unemployment Insurance Act, to the destruction of VIA Rail, to the claw–back provisions of old age security and family allowances and to the goods and services tax. My constituents have told me that the government must scrap the goods and services tax proposal and go back to the drawing board. I think it would be appropriate at this time, considering the fact that there are so many people who consider this a very important issue, that we on this side of the House would like to propose a motion under Standing Order 26(1). I move:

That, the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of the business of supply.

I do that, Mr. Speaker, with the hope that the other side will agree to this because I think it is a very important issue and all Canadians would like to hear from their Members of Parliament on this particular issue. I think it would be to our benefit to tighten the belts a little further and stay away from the parliamentary restaurant to speak on behalf of Canadians.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, we are planning to object to this motion because we have had incidents in the last couple of days when we tried to offer some sort of co-operation to both sides and we have not been able able to get that co-operation. We do object to the motion and plan to oppose it.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, just on that last comment, the opposition always tries to co-operate. I agree that the government sometimes does not like the debate, but debate is what runs this place and we would like to debate the question further.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion is that the House continue to sit through the lunch hour for the purpose of continuing consideration of the business of supply. The Chair does find the motion to be in order.

All those opposed to the motion will please rise.

And more than 15 members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, the free trade deal has reached the town of Aurora in my federal riding of York North. Sterling Drug Limited recently announced that the drug manufacturing division of the plant will be phased out and 180 workers will lose their jobs as a result of the plant shut-down.

Right after the November 21 election the company closed a sterile product manufacturing division in the plant. Today 40 per cent of the plant will be transferred to the United States of America, 30 per cent to Puerto Rico and only 20 per cent will remain in Canada, simply because this 20 per cent of the products cannot be manufactured anywhere else.

The free trade deal has failed the residents of Aurora. The free trade deal has failed the constituents of the federal riding of York North. The free trade deal has failed Canadians.

THE PRESS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, Southam News today has reported that Peter Worthington, a journalist and sometime Conservative candidate, acted in 1968 as an informer for the Internal Security Division of the U.S. Department of Justice and for the FBI. This is confirmation not only of Mr. Worthington's lack of simple patriotism to Canada, but of the fact that the U.S. government was spying on Canadians who held different views from that of the U.S. government.

Two days ago Simon Reisman, head of Canada's negotiating team for the free trade deal, said he believed that the U.S. government was spying on the Canadian negotiating team.

Will the government first advise this House whether the government of Canada believes, on the basis of CSIS reports, that the U.S. government is continuing to spy on Canada? Will the government tell the American government of our outrage at this behaviour? Third, will the Solicitor General make it clear to this House that the government has no intention of emulating this odious practice and sending Canadian spies out into the world to snoop on the friends of Canada?

ABORTION

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, this week on Parliament Hill there are men and women from across Canada representing many walks of life to remind us that Canada is in need of a new abortion law. They are here to represent the unborn and have a deep love for their country and the province that they represent.

Among this vigilant group is a very special lady by the name of Helen Walsh from Nova Scotia. Mrs. Walsh has recently completed, in August of this year, a walk across this country which started in St. John's, Newfoundland, on Mother's Day, May 8, 1988. This journey totalled 7,700 kilometres.

Mrs. Walsh believes that human life is a gift given by God and that it is unique and special. She holds a concern for the mental, physical and spiritual well-being of both mother and child and believes that faith in our future can only be guaranteed by our witness to a respect for life, from the preborn to the aged.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Mrs. Walsh for her achievement.

DROUGHT PROGRAM

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the drought program has become a nightmare for producers. Townships and crops which are included change from month to month. Some farmers are even being told to return the interim payments that they received.

This government failed to listen to or understand the arguments put forward by producers and opposition members that the program was flawed, poorly designed and unfair.

I call upon this government to expand the parameters of the appeal process to allow appeals on an individual basis, reconsider its decision to recover any overpayments made in the initial drought payments, and expand the program to include losses incurred in forage production in 1988.

The government has ruled that farmers producing red clover seed for commercial purposes will be excluded. Producers in my riding are compiling supportive data from independent sources to verify their claims.

I call upon this government to implement the changes I have outlined and give its assurance that red clover producers will be granted an appeal and given a very fair hearing.

1992 ELECTION

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the April 3 Speech from the Throne the government announced plans to organize a major celebration in 1992.

When interviewed, a government official said they had no idea how a number of events in 1992 might be linked.

At a time when pensions are being clawed back, when VIA Rail is being slashed, and when taxpayers are being robbed, this government plans to spend a quarter of a million dollars on a conference in two weeks' time just to help organize the 1992 pre-election party.

The government should advise the House how many staff were involved in the 1992 project, what the theme will be, and how they can justify such an extravagance when ordinary Canadians are being asked to pay more and more every day.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are told by the Prime Minister that his government is committed to environmentally sustainable development. His actions, unfortunately, contradict such declarations.

A close look at the budget of the environment department reveals that it is very low on the government totem pole. It receives less than 1 per cent of the federal budget and has lost over $50 million to inflation over the past five years. In spite of the fact that the Prime Minister talks of the urgent need for action on global warming, his energy minister continues to support tar sand megaprojects which will increase Canada's carbon dioxide pollution, add to global warming trends, and tie up billions of federal taxpayers' dollars. So far this government's record on sustainable development consists of high ringing words which are actually hollow because they are not backed by actions.

ROUGE RIVER VALLEY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, right now Premier David Peterson and his cabinet are considering a proposal which would ruin the last remaining wilderness area in metro Toronto, the Rouge River Valley. Thanks to a group of environmental organizations an Ontario cabinet document was recently made public which calls for the development of the Rouge River Valley.

The people of Scarborough are left asking one simple question. If the four municipalities that border the valley can unanimously support efforts to preserve the Rouge, if the Metro Toronto Conservation Authority can call for saving the Rouge, if the Royal Commission on the Future of Toronto Waterfront can call for saving the Rouge, if close to 50 organizations at the local, provincial and national level can call on saving the Rouge, if the federal government can pledge $10 million toward saving the Rouge, why can David Peterson and his government not take action to save the Rouge?

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, Newfoundlanders, and I suspect Canadians right across this country, over the last several weeks have been very disappointed to see representatives of the federal government attempting to resolve a matter as critical and pressing as the constitutional evolution of this country by using threats.

We have reports that an official of the federal government in an off the record briefing to the national press suggested that if the province of Newfoundland were to exercise its right as a province to express itself in a matter as important as the Constitution then that province may find itself subject to punishment by the national government.

Nobody has yet apologized to the province of Newfoundland for that kind of threat. The official in question still remains an employee of the federal government and still remains a spokesperson on behalf of the federal government.

To add insult to injury, the Prime Minister himself said yesterday "Wells is ungrateful of Confederation" because of his position on Meech Lake. Newfoundland is not a beggar at the table of Confederation. Newfoundland is a full partner in Confederation and Newfoundland stands solid behind the concept of Canada.

The constitutional question is a difficult one, but let us live together with respect and with dignity, and let us put away the hammers in a resolve to build this nation.

SKYLINK CRASH

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to apprise the House of extremely serious allegations made to me since the Skylink crash in Terrace. I believe there is no option but to pull the operating certificate, initiate a full audit and advise the public that the Dryden inquiry will move as soon as possible to investigate the Terrace crash which killed all seven aboard.

The pilot killed in the crash was time expired. This voids the insurance of the aircraft and the flight. The chief pilot, the brother of the deceased, has now resigned along with the majority of the 402 pilots due to safety concerns. The owner Mr. Raphael Zur, I am advised, has been signing the log books in the place of unqualified pilots. Pilots are flying certain aircraft without proper qualifications. Aircraft are not being properly maintained. Of the three recent gear collapses none of the aircraft have had their engines removed as required.

• (1410)

A 402 recently had to glide into Vancouver International Airport to land due to the failure of the fuel selectors which were installed backward. Pilots have been ordered to fly aircraft after reporting problems to head office. MOT inspectors located a rusted through engine mount on a Metro 2 and yet all three are still in the air without the required engine removal.

A pilot contacted me today and advised me that Mr. Raphael Zur has on several occasions stolen his aircraft for use. The flying public is at risk. On maintenance, on safety, on aviation violations, on Criminal Code matters, falsified logs and lack of insurance the list is long. The Dryden inquiry must take on the Skylink crash.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, in Canada today for largely historical reasons there exists a special relationship between aboriginal peoples and the Government of Canada. Within that context it is not surprising that disagreements might arise. Disputes surface in any aspect of human activity. The challenge of leadership is not just to represent your own interests; it is also to know when and how to put disputes to rest.

Earlier this week near Calgary a lengthy dispute between the Sarcee people and the Department of National Defence was resolved. On behalf of all members of the House, who I am sure would wish to join me in this sentiment, I commend the leadership shown by Chief Roy Whitney, the Hon. Bill McKnight, their representatives, and mediator Harold Millican. Their efforts have closed a difficult chapter in relations between CFB Calgary and the Sarcee people. A chapter of renewed trust, hope and commitment has opened.

ARMENIA

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, for the last several months the world has watched as the people of Karabagh and Armenia have struggled to rebuild after the devastation of last December's earthquake. However, over the last several months this rebuilding has been totally frustrated. Azerbaijan has blocked access for all materials and supplies into the earthquake region.

I with others urge the Canadian government to bring this desperate situation to the attention of both the Soviet authorities and to the General Assembly of the United Nations. We ask the Soviets to lift the blockade of Armenia and Karabagh, to ensure the security of the Armenian people in that region, and to hold a referendum in the mountainous Karabagh to determine the majority will in that autonomous region.

Surely the people of Karabagh and Armenia have suffered enough.

CHRISTMAS TREE PRODUCERS ASSOCIATION

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the Christmas Tree Producers Association of Lunenburg County will hold their twenty-third annual conference this year at Bridgewater. Collectively, through professionalism, research and hard work, they produce the finest Christmas trees in the world. Every year they export a million and a quarter of these trees bringing millions of dollars to Canadians.

Real Christmas trees are a renewable resource, they are environmentally friendly and they are beautiful. Mr. Speaker, there are only 72 shopping days left before Christmas. This year I urge all Canadians who celebrate Christmas to use real Christmas trees, and none are finer and none are more beautiful than the Christmas trees from Queens and Lunenburg Counties in Nova Scotia.

CAMBODIA

Mrs. Marie Gibeau (Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, not long ago, the Vietnamese government announced it would be withdrawing the rest of its troops from Cambodia between September 21 and 26. It also invited foreign observers, including Canadian officials, to watch the operation. Although the withdrawal of the military is heart-warming, we think the Vietnamese authorities can do a lot more to urge Cambodia to agree come to a compromise during this peace process.

Canada's position on observation or peace-keeping missions in Cambodia is well-known. For us to consider taking part in such a mission, all parties involved would have first to arrive at a complete and satisfactory settlement of the problems in Cambodia; our participation must not overly burden Canadian resources and our mandate must be clear and limited in time.

However, Mr. Speaker, since these requirements have not been met, Canada has not seen fit to send an observer.

We are glad to see that Vietnam has taken steps to withdraw all of its troops from Cambodia and we do hope that this decision will bring us closer to a well-deserved and sustainable peace in Cambodia.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, successive governments have stumbled and bumbled their way through office by neglecting a need for a national transportation policy. The challenge is clearly out there for the minister and the government. The Canadian people can accept restraint but they cannot and will not accept a minister and a government which slash services yet offer nothing in the way of a strategy for the future.

Today we do not have a national policy that will propel Canada into the 21st century. Instead we have a disjointed scheme from which we will stumble out of the 20th century. The challenge is clearly up to the minister and this government. If they can meet that challenge and exceed it, they will truly have earned the support of the Canadian people.

CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the free trade agreement has had a tremendously positive effect on the economy of British Columbia, and my riding of Delta is no exception. Regency Industries is the largest manufacturer of free-standing wood stoves in western Canada and is exporting over 80 per cent of its products, primarily to the U.S. market. Regency has annual sales over $10 million and is predicting a sales increase of 50 per cent over 1988, thanks to the focus on U.S. market potential generated by free trade.

This innovative company is also planning for the future, spending 3 per cent to 4 per cent of revenues on research and development. Exports have already started to Korea and Japan as Regency buys Japanese steel and then ships the finished product back to Japan.

All of Regency's products are approved by the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, making these stoves an environmentally friendly product with tremendous growth potential.

This government knew that given the freedom to do so Canadian firms could compete successfully in the world economy. In the export dependent economy of British Columbia no one is proving this adage better than Regency Industries, and I am proud to have that company in my constituency.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

VIA RAIL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Six and a half million passengers travel more than two billion kilometres a year on VIA Rail, and yet this government is destroying VIA Rail.

I have learned that the government has plans to issue nearly 3,000 pink slips, that is 3,000 lay-off notices, to employees of VIA Rail in the two weeks following Thanksgiving.

At the priorities and planning committee of cabinet on Tuesday the Prime Minister approved a plan to lay off more than 70 per cent of the VIA employees in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, and Newfoundland. VIA operations, particularly in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, will be devastated.

The Prime Minister told the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia that they had to use it or lose it. They are using it. Why are they losing it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I should repeat what I said yesterday. The Leader of the Opposition always uses documents that are not official. The Leader of the Opposition has decided on the process of the government. Unfortunately, I must repeat to the Leader of the Opposition that we are in the process of making the decision and in due course we will make the announcement.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, did you notice that the Minister did not deny what I suggested to the House? We noticed that very clearly.

I want to just point out one illustration of how irresponsible, calculated, brutal and vicious this government's actions are. Last year in advance of the election the Prime Minister authorized Stewart McInnes, who was then the Minister of Public Works, to open a brand new VIA maintenance centre at Halifax at a cost of more than $7 million. Two days ago the Prime Minister approved a plan to close that brand new maintenance facility in Halifax which cost the taxpayers more than $7 million and employed 150 people. How is that, Mr. Speaker, for pure unadulterated, rank cynicism?

I ask the Prime Minister how much longer he is going to squander the public trust on this particular issue.

• (1420)

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, of course the Leader of the Opposition can try to mislead Canadians in any way he wishes and say anything he wants.

He can claim that decisions have been made. He can comment on documents that don't exist, without a shred of evidence.

However, I would ask the Leader of the Opposition to be professional about this and to be accurate when referring to official documents about decisions that have been made.

Until those decisions are announced, I would ask him to have the decency to argue on the basis of information that is true, not false.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I agree the decisions have not been announced but they have been made.

I see his colleague, the other "Bouchard", the Minister of the Environment, who didn't have the courage to demand that his colleague order a study—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I know the right hon. gentleman would not want to proceed in an unparliamentary manner, and I would ask him to continue his question keeping that in mind.

[Translation]

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, why didn't the Minister of the Environment insist that his cabinet colleague from the same part of Québec order an environmental impact study of the decisions regarding VIA Rail? Because neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of the Environment have the decency to keep their election promises.

In any case, will the Prime Minister confirm that last Tuesday he personally approved a lay-off plan for 1,000 VIA Rail employees in Montreal?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can say that the statement made by the Leader of the Opposition is false.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport.

At our public hearings in Quebec on the future of VIA Rail, those who spoke at these hearings all stressed how important it was to have an improved and viable railway service, the operative words being "improved" and "viable".

Will the Minister agree to meet the members of the consultation group set up by the Government of Quebec to examine future prospects instead of laying off thousands of Quebeckers, in Montreal and across the province? Why this negative attitude to VIA Rail?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome the new federal Member from Québec, and I may say I am pleased the Hon. Member held these hearings. I wonder whether, in the process, he also asked Canadians whether they were prepared pay up to $650 million for a service that is being used by only 3 per cent of Canadians, in Québec and in the rest of Canada. I think Canadians want sound management of public funds, and that is what we intend to give them, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, in Atlantic Canada alone VIA cuts will kill 500 jobs. A new $7.2 million maintenance facility in Halifax will see its doors closed permanently and thousands of Atlantic Canadians will see the severing of this vital transportation link. Our region has suffered enough under this government's knife.

Will the Prime Minister finally show some compassion and common sense and stop this latest brutal, bloody assault on the people of Atlantic Canada?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will ask this member, as I did all other members, to wait for the official announcement.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

His Minister of Transport in an answer to the Leader of the Opposition said: "He should not base his decision on false affirmations."

The Minister of Transport has been using, much like the rest of the government, erroneous figures to justify the actions that the government is taking. He consistently cites 3 per cent as the number of Canadians who are using rail passenger services. Some 30 per cent to 50 per cent of the users of public carriage, either rail or airplane, is the real figure.

Given that kind of information and given the information that ridership is up, that more people are using VIA Rail, that revenue is up, and that the users are paying for more of the operation, would the Prime Minister not recognize the mistake that his government has made and indicate to this House clearly, and to the people of Canada, that the government will change its mind and will keep VIA rolling?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, obviously, those produced by my colleague from the New Democratic Party do not necessarily correspond to the figures that we produced in the Government. I would just point out to him that as far as figures are concerned, Canadian voters twice preferred the Conservatives' figures to the New Democrats'.

[English]

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, my question again is for the Prime Minister. He will know that hundreds of thousands of Canadians have been writing to him and to the Minister of Transport and, in spite of the attempts of the government House leader to circumvent the rule of this House allowing members to send material to the Prime Minister, he has today received hundreds of cards and will receive thousands more during the course of the day from people in support of VIA Rail.

Given that rail passenger service is the safest method of travel and the most environmentally sound method of travel in this country, would he not agree to send the Minister of Transport back to the drawing board to come up with a plan that will allow VIA Rail to continue and to be improved?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I just want to repeat what I said before. The VIA Rail plan which will be proposed will be proposed with regard to the capacity we have to interface this transportation mode with the way people use VIA Rail. People use VIA Rail by 3 per cent, of all intercity travellers use VIA Rail by 3 per cent.

I believe that we will continue to put more than $2 billion over five years in VIA Rail and I believe that is exactly what Canadians can afford at the present time.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, poll after poll has indicated that Canadians are willing to support government expenditures that are environmentally sound. I ask the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport whether they do not realize that this decision about VIA is a major economic decision.

They attend international conferences concerned with hydrocarbons, the greenhouse effect, low level ozone, you name it; and yet here they have a major economic decision which they have not subjected to an environmental assessment. If they did they would find that the environmentally sound thing to do would be to modernize and expand passenger rail service in this country.

Why in the hell can we not have an environmental assessment? Why can the Prime Minister not put his money where his mouth is when it comes to the environment, or shut up about it forever?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I know that this member is worried about the environment, but we can be worried about the environment calmly. I believe that the member should know that the announcement on VIA Rail has not been made yet. When the announcement on VIA Rail is made different parts of the announcement will deal with different concerns. I believe that he should wait for the announcement before giving that kind of performance.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. According to a column written by the Prime Minister's good friend and until very recently senior adviser, Dalton Camp, on September 17, the decision to gut VIA Rail was made in Langevin Block by the estimates review committee chaired by the Prime Minister. I quote: "Benoit Bouchard may still be Minister of Transport but he had no voice in the basic and critical consideration of national transportation policy."

• (1430)

Given that the Minister of Transport cannot possibly have in these circumstances any credibility on this matter, why is the Prime Minister, who chaired the committee that made this decision, refusing to stand in the House and defend these cuts for which the Prime Minister bears primary responsibility?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not read the column to which my hon. friend referred—

Mr. Lapierre: I'll send you a copy.

Mr. Mulroney: The member will send me a copy, I would thank him for that. I have not read the article to which he refers, but I can tell my hon. friend something that is certainly clear to all members of the government and to most Canadians. The present Minister of Transport is widely regarded as a strong and very effective performer here and across the country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: In fact, Mr. Speaker, while I haven't read that column, I have read this, and it deals with—

Mr. Lapierre: Who wrote it?

Mr. Mulroney: Well, I'll tell you. It is in the Sherbrooke Record of July 18, 1988—

Some Hon. Members: 1988!

Mr. Mulroney: July '88—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Oh, they want me to keep reading! Let me keep reading then, Mr. Speaker. It is a statement by the Liberal candidate in Sherbrooke, Mr. Wood, who says this in respect to the Conservative candidate, "He brought back the train. Big deal", he says. "Take it away. Nobody is ever on the train. It's always empty," said the Liberal candidate in Sherbrooke.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has the floor.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's endorsement of his Minister of Transport sounds very much like a general's endorsement of the troops before he sends them into the slaughter.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether or not he agrees with Mr. Camp, his former senior policy adviser, when he says of the decision to gut VIA Rail, "It is a decision that discriminates against the less affluent, the old, the young, the unemployed, the small towns".

Does the Prime Minister agree with his former senior adviser's assessment of this brutal decision? Perhaps this describes the mysterious departure of Mr. Camp from the Langevin Building. Even he has an ounce of salt blood left in his veins and couldn't see his region sold out by this Prime Minister.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to be very clear about—

Mr. Tobin: You weren't even there!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I was not there but I am here.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I should remind both the hon. member and the minister that I am here.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benoît Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to be clear. Seriously, the newspaper Le Devoir decision about the cuts to VIA Rail. I believe when a decision is good, is honourable for Canada, and for the Minister of Finance, it is good also for the Minister of Transport.

FINANCE

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance told us last night that the goods and services tax would remain steady until 1994, barring unforeseen circumstances.

Mr. Speaker, we have just discussed VIA Rail and certainly that is an example of unforeseen circumstances because last fall, certainly no one expected the disaster that would hit the whole rail system in Canada, especially VIA Rail. My question to the Minister, Mr. Speaker, is this:

Can he explain to Canadians exactly what he means when he talks about unforeseen circumstances in the context of his goods and services tax in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I responded to a question yesterday which asked me about the to the GST. I said that we had put in place, in the last budget, a fiscal track, a fiscal framework that provides for a continuation of program spending at somewhat less than the rate of inflation, a continuation of the revenue picture as it is in place now, including the proposed GST. I said that if we continue in this direction, barring unforeseen circumstances, we will reach the deficit position that is outlined in the budget which involves also a zero cash requirement.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): We spoke earlier this week about "wage and price moderation", now it is "unforeseen circumstances". I think Canadians have a right to be more informed on that. I would ask the Minister of Finance this. With high interest rates, high unemployment, high inflation, would recession be an unforeseen circumstance? Would the Minister of Finance try to be very clear on what he means?

First of all, he is talking about 1994 and a tax that has not been imposed yet. Can he clear up the confusion for Canadians as to what he means by unforeseen circumstances?

Hon. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have seen over the course of the last few years a number of matters that have happened that had not been anticipated. I think the hon. member would regard as being an unforeseen circumstance the drought in agriculture.

If there is a recession internationally, then that is something that is unforeseen at this time. We have set out what our economic assumptions are in which we base this track. If there is a major deviation from that, then clearly that is an unforeseen circumstance.

As indicated last year at the time of the election, we still do not know what the outlook is for interest rates at any one time. We make assumptions on that, but if there is a major deviation in interest rates either domestically or internationally from the track, then that is something unforeseen. There are a number of these things that come into play.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): My question is also for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. We know that officials in the minister's department are now looking at various options, various scenarios to reduce the rate of the tax and include food as a taxable item in the GST.

We also know that his buddies on Bay Street are making the same recommendations to the minister and to his officials. This is causing a lot of worry and concern among ordinary Canadians, in particular the senior citizens who built this country, and the poor.

I would like to give the minister one more chance to say in a very categorical way, in an ironclad way, that there will be no tax on basic groceries. Will he say no to his officials, no to his Bay Street buddies, and tell the people of this country that there be no tax on food?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let us be quite clear about the reference that the hon. member was referring to. This is not a finance proposal. This is the Department of Finance officials responding to a request for information from members of the research staff of the Finance Committee. They have to respond to these requests, as they would respond to the hon. member if he asked for information. That is the sole basis on which that information is provided.

• (1440)

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, we have now heard a classic example of the minister evading the question.

What I want from this minister is an ironclad assurance groceries in this country. I ask that in view of the fact that one of his buddies, Laurent Thibeault, came to our committee this morning from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association to complain that there would be a 9 per cent sales tax on power lunches of caviare and champagne—and he wants an exemption. Can the minister assure us that he will not listen to Mr. Thibeault and, instead, assure the ordinary people of this country that there be no tax on basic food?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I made this statement the other day and I will make it again. I am not going to be commenting on individual recommendations that are made by this person or that person before the finance committee. There have been—

Mr. Nystrom: —no guarantees.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): If the hon. member would listen, Mr. Speaker. There have been recommendations from people who have come before the finance committee to tax food. Others have said keep the exemption in place.

The position of the government, as set out in the proposal that is before the committee now, is that basic groceries are tax-free. We will continue this position. The hon. member can ask me again and again and again, but I will not comment on specific items, specific recommendations that are put before the finance committee until the finance committee has made their recommendations final.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I want to ask the minister for a clarification on the impact of the GST on our senior citizens.

There was a lot of information in the riding of Elk Island and, indeed, across this country regarding the impact of the GST on our seniors. Some of this information good, some of it is misleading, but all of it is very confusing. Let us clarify this issue once and for all.

Mr. Minister, what will be the impact of the GST on our senior citizens?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think as colleagues understand the change from the existing federal sales tax to the goods and services tax is a major step forward in the impact of sales taxes on our senior citizens. Sales taxes have been widely regarded as regressive, but with the change from the federal sales tax to the goods and services tax we will have for the first time a progressive sales tax system because of the implementation of a very substantially increased goods and services tax credit.

In addition to that, we have exempted a number of other things in the GST tax proposals, such as medical devices. That includes hearings aids as well as glasses, health care, prescription benefits—

Ms. Copps: What about protheses?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): —protheses, homemakers' services that are provided by non-profit institutions, meals-on-wheels, and a wide range of things like that. That is why the goods and services tax system as a whole is very good for our senior citizens.

HEALTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, recently our government announced the release of the drug AZT for the treatment of AIDS. I understand that there has been a recent development. I was wondering if our Minister of Health could tell us what the most recent developments are in the treatment of AIDS in Canada.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to inform the House today that DDI will be available under the Emergency Drug Release Program. It will be available to Canadians who are symptomatic of AIDS and HIV infection and who are intolerant of AZT. It will be available free of charge under a program administered by the manufacturer.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. During the public hearings on the unemployment insurance bill which end today, serious doubt has been raised with respect to the constitutionality of this bill, in view of the fact that the bill provides that up to 15 per cent of unemployment insurance moneys can be used for training and development purposes.

The minister knows that federal jurisdiction in unemployment insurance is the result of a constitutional amendment in 1940, which very specifically refers to unemployment insurance and not to training and development.

In order to clear the air on this point, would the minister order an independent legal opinion, make a commitment to this House to make that opinion public, and ask the government to delay this bill until this constitutional issue has been resolved?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the bill was, naturally, reviewed by justice officials prior to introduction. We take the position that the act is constitutional and is within federal powers.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, that is unfortunate. I guess we will have to pursue that issue ourselves.

I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. It concerns the area of federal–provincial relations.

Another major issue being raised in the committee by many, many witnesses is the shift of the unemployed from the unemployment insurance system to provincial welfare rolls. As a result of this bill, thousands of unemployed Canadians will be left without unemployment insurance and the responsibility will be shifted to the social assistance systems.

In Toronto, the estimated increase in the welfare budget is $10 million. In the regional municipality of Ottawa, the estimated increase in the welfare budget is $10 million. In Sudbury it is $2 million.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he would meet with the provincial premiers in order to get an exact estimate on how this bill will increase provincial welfare budgets. Would he delay the bill until he has those estimates, discussed them and put them before the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that the unemployment insurance system will not be cut back; what we want to do as a government is to improve it, make it more efficient and more equitable.

As far as social assistance is concerned, we already have a joint program with Quebec and as part of unemployment insurance reform, we already provided additional funds to be shared between the provincial and federal governments. Measures have already been taken to create more jobs by training the workers needed for new requirements.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. By the end of this month, tomorrow or Monday, the Haché Task Force on the Scotia–Fundy is expected to submit its report to the cabinet committee which he set up to examine the current crisis in the Atlantic ground fishery. Virtually every witness who has appeared before this committee, including the Nova Scotia Department of Fisheries, has complained that the groundfish management system, "—has focused on establishing, allocating and enforcing quotas but not on the managing of the fishery".

Will the Prime Minister ensure and order immediate direction to the cabinet committee to look at the Haché report to formulate proposals that will relieve the hardship currently being experienced by the thousands of people who are connected to the inshore fishery and the Scotia–Fundy region?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I am seriously considering the findings of the study of the special task force conducted by Jean Haché. In fact, I received a full briefing on his report only yesterday.

We have had a number of very positive recommendations from the fishermen in the area on improving science and the quality of data we receive from fishermen as an input to our management process, and the changes of gear which were necessary; but, above all, the importance of dealing with a huge over-capacity problem in southwest Nova Scotia. I will be taking recommendations to cabinet to deal with that in due course.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet committee was set up by the Prime Minister to study the total. It was taken out of the hands of the Minister of Fisheries. I am asking that immediate attention be given to the Haché report.

My supplementary is to the Minister. I want to ask him whether the hardships that his policies have inflicted over the past two summers of no work for the people—the thousands of people in the inshore fishery—and whether the evidence of the Haché report has finally convinced him that his management plan, as the Department of Fisheries of the Province of Nova Scotia has said, has focused on the wrong areas and not focused on the managing of the fisheries on the east coast. It shows up in the northern cod, on which the cabinet committee is meeting, and also on other policies of this particular committee.

• (1450)

Mr. Siddon: In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Haché findings suggest possible new regulations and changes in fishing methods which would involve tighter control by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. Secondly, on my first review of the report, it appears that in the present year there are no extraordinary circumstances of hardship which are unlike those of previous years with the exception of lower prices and the problems created by exchange rates. There are no areas of unemployment which cannot be accommodated, Mr. Speaker, within the existing programs that are provided by the federal government.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since last April the government has been telling Canadians that not many people would be hurt by the unemployment insurance cuts. They said only 30,000 people would be unable to obtain benefits. Statistics Canada has contradicted the government. It says that 130,000 people will lose all of their benefits. Thirty times more people will be hit in Newfoundland alone than the government has admitted to.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister confirm that by Statistics Canada's own analysis there will be 130,000 Canadians who will lose all their benefits? Would he also confirm that his government's own stats have been a dramatic understatement?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to tell my colleague that since our Government took office, we have created 1,500,000 jobs, including 878,000 for women. I repeat that what we are trying to do with unemployment insurance reform is to make this system fair and equitable by taking account of regional disparities.

I come from a region that is affected by unemployment and we have implemented a measure that will respect the worker who wants to work.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I think I will have to try and address my supplementary question to the minister. She is not answering the question. She knows that Statistics Canada did not make up those figures. She knows those numbers are right, but that her department has not had the guts to release how the numbers are being cooked up.

Is the minister telling us that she was really not aware of the horrible impact these measures would have? Was she aware of them and did the government still allow incorrect numbers to be released?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina Mr. Speaker, I personally was responsible for the Department that oversees Statistics Canada and I have confidence in Statistics Canada's data.

I also know that the data I just quoted you truly reflect the job creation situation. The unemployment insurance program will continue to be a safety net for the working man or woman seeking employment. And what we are trying to do as a responsible government is to ensure that most Canadians will be able to find work in the new markets of the year 2000. We are preparing the future.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It is a given that cuts are going to be made to VIA Rail. Keeping that in mind, Mr. Speaker, what indication can the minister give this House that both he and the government will be bringing forward a national transportation policy that will lead Canada into the 21st century?

Also, Mr. Speaker, aside from debt reduction, I want to know what innovative measures does the minister envisage to propel us into the 21st century? Will we have a national transportation policy to address the real needs of this nation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend for the question. I think there are two very important points here. The first is that, of course, the reason why we have to intervene with VIA Rail is because we cannot any longer waste Canadian money as we did for such a long time.

Second, I believe one thing we have to determine in the transportation policy is to have better management of the rail system. When we move in that direction and it is done, Mr. Speaker, I believe then will be the time also to determine a broader perspective in terms of transportation in Canada.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, we now know of a major source of foreign investment in Canada, illegal drug money from the United States. A confidential report released in Washington yesterday confirms what we predicted two years ago. Canada has become a major haven for laundering hundreds of millions of dollars a year in dirty drug money.

My question is to the Prime Minister. If his government is truly serious about fighting the drug war, will his government immediately introduce legislation to require Canadian banks and institutions to report large cash and foreign currency transactions as a means of stopping the laundering of illegal drug money in Canada?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the Hon. Member for raising an issue which has to be of great concern to all the members of this House. As he knows, it is of great concern to this government, and we have already acted.

I would like to remind the hon. gentleman that effective January 1, 1989, we brought amendments to the Canada Criminal Code and the Food and Drugs Act which made money laundering in Canada a criminal offence.

At the Toronto economic summit in 1988 Canada played a prominent role in achieving agreement on a set of principles and initiatives which will result in greater co-operation. Even last week my colleague, the Minister of Finance, raised the issue at the summit.

With our American neighbours we have made arrangements for mutual legal assistance. The Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has instructed all banks to institute procedures to detect money laundering. I could go on for a long time. I think we have taken very decisive action.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: I assure the Hon. Member the report was based on data which is not relevant any more.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is also to the Solicitor General. The last response did not show any mechanisms developed and being used by banks.

In view of the government's failure to date to impose mechanisms to track profits of the international drug cartel through our Canadian financial institutions, I want to know when the government is going to show some leadership, stop dragging its feet and offer to us a comprehensive and effective Canadian initiative in the war against drugs. Or do we have to wait for the FBI or the Drug Enforcement Administration to show us how?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I would like to reassure the Hon. Member that we do not need to wait for anybody. At this very moment the banks, with the office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the RCMP, are working on very precise measures to modernize our methods. We are very confident that we can tackle that.

WESTINGHOUSE CANADA

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. On May 24, Westinghouse Canada announced the closure of its Renfrew, Ontario plant. At that time we were told that with the exception of some specific equipment, the rest of the equipment would remain in the plant until the end of the year to allow it to be sold as a going concern.

However, those Westinghouse officials have gone back on their word during the summer. As a result we have lost one potential buyer because equipment was not available with the plant. We do not want to lose another one.

Is there any recourse the Minister has with regard to the procurement of goods and services from Westinghouse, given the current Westinghouse withdrawal from Renfrew and, more particularly, the manner in which they are doing so?

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, although it is regrettable that Westinghouse has not been able to remain in the slow growth region of Renfrew, and after nine years and some $10 million of federal government money, has indicated its pull-back to its Westinghouse plant in Hamilton, I must inform the hon. member that there is no precise remedy which the Minister of Supply and Services can implement to punish them for their action. I would hope that they would certainly negotiate in good faith with upcoming potential purchasers of this facility, and that they would leave their equipment in place as they promised they would do.

• (1500)

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. Given the several millions of dollars in federal grants, training programs and tax credits that the Minister of Supply and Services mentioned that have gone into the plant over the past nine years, and because much of this was done in the name of regional development, in a sincere way, does the minister not agree, both morally and realistically, that this government-subsidized equipment should be available to a prospective buyer who will remain in the Renfrew area so that the benefits that were meant for this slow growth region will in fact remain in that area and be of benefit to hundreds of people as intended in the first place?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me notice of his question. I am informed that the company has fulfilled its obligations to the Department of Industry, Science and Technology. I will be glad to check into it further, however, to guarantee that that is the case.

I will tell the hon. member that the 147 employees have been offered a comprehensive adjustment package which includes offers of jobs, offers of job placement. It is a very comprehensive program. In terms of the equipment, I will confirm that they have in fact fulfilled their obligations.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Mackenzie, and this will be the last question and supplemental.

DROUGHT PROGRAM

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Prior to the drought cheques being mailed out this summer, the minister and his officials repeatedly assured producers of commercial forage seeds, the grasses, clovers and alfalfas, that they would be receiving drought payments. When the cheques came the commercial producers were dropped from the program and only producers of pedigreed seed were left in.

Will the minister explain why commercial producers were not paid on either the same basis as the pedigreed producers, on the basis of the quota book acreage, or even using a basket-of-commodity approach which was built into the program? Why were the producers of commercial grasses, clovers and alfalfas left out of the drought program even though they were badly affected?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that this would have been very difficult to administer. My colleague, the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds, has been directly involved in this particular issue. That is my understanding, but I will consult with him and get a fuller answer for the member and report back to him as soon as I can.

I would suspect, as well, that this would be a matter that would be dealt with through the appeal process which will be undertaken in the next little while.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of the Environment who monitors all government programs to make certain that they are environmentally friendly.

Can the minister explain why he accepted this decision by the Department of Agriculture which harms the country's long term ability to protect the environment by signalling to producers of commercial forage seeds, the alfalfas, clovers, and grasses, that these seeds and plants are not useful to stop soil erosion and to clean up the air and the water of our country? Why did he stand by and do nothing?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I take it from the hon. member's question that he is deeply interested in soil and water conservation and sustainable agriculture. Of course, that is a very key component of the policy review process that we are going through. I would invite the hon. member's support in that particular initiative and we will welcome any comments or suggestions that he has to make in that regard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Government Deputy House Leader on a point of order.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): With the consent of the House, Mr. Speaker, I would like to revert to motions. With the consent of all parties in the House, I would like to put to you the following motion on the business of the Standing Committee on Finance:

That the House hereby directs the following arrangements with respect to the consideration, by the Standing Committee on Finance, of the proposed goods and services tax:

1. That the committee be authorized to travel as follows:

A) A sub-committee of the said committee, composed of one member from each recognized party in the House, to travel to Whitehorse, for hearings on Sept. 30, 1989;

B) The full committee to travel for hearings in Vancouver, (October 2 and 3), in Edmonton (Oct. 4), in Regina (Oct. 5), in Winnipeg (Oct. 6), in St. John's, (Oct. 18), in Halifax (also on Oct. 18), in Charlottetown (Oct. 19), and Fredericton (also on Oct. 19).

2. That the committee make its report to the House no later than Thursday, November 28, 1989.

3. That televised broadcasting of any or all public meetings of the committee in Ottawa, subsequent to the adoption of this order and until the committee enters into its report, be on the basis of the principles and practices now governing broadcast of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

4. That the order for consideration by the House of second reading and committee referral of any bill or bills relating to the proposed goods and services tax be for "second reading and referral to the Standing Committee on Finance."

5. That the committee be authorized to travel to Mont Ste. Marie, Quebec from November 6 to November 9 inclusive for the purpose of drafting the said report.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. minister have leave of the House to introduce his motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. minister has said, this motion arises out of considerable discussion among the three parties. I want to note that the motion does not refer to the possibility of the committee having hearings in Quebec City or Toronto.

I hope the minister will indicate that—according to what some of the committee members have told me—the government would be willing to come back to the House with a motion to allow the committee to hold hearings in Toronto and Quebec City if it appears to the committee that there is a volume of requests to appear before the committee which would indicate the need to have hearings in those two cities.

I want to make clear that, even though we have our doubts and reservations about whether the committee is going to enough communities, we are willing to give our consent. Again I ask the minister to indicate to the House the position of the government on the possibility that the committee will say that in view of the volume of requests, there is a need to have hearings in Toronto and Quebec City.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on the same point, I am looking forward to the response of the hon. minister. The deliberations have been extensive on this issue. We are pleased that we have been able to get this far in terms of the special House order. Repeated discussions have occurred in the finance committee over the last number of days on the need to travel to Quebec, particularly, and parts of Ontario.

The understanding, as we have it, is that we are giving consent to proceed so that the committee can get under way and get out to the west coast on the weekend with the understanding that this does not preclude that possibility in terms of holding hearings in the province of Quebec and in the province of Ontario. I think there is a general understanding in the committee by all members that this is appropriate.

Assuming that the relevant briefs come in from the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario, the committee is open to consider travel and holding hearings there. I simply want to put a quid pro quo on our agreement here by stating that, yes, we certainly will agree to this House order to get the committee on the road with the understanding that discussions will take place so that committee hearings will take place in Quebec, assuming that there is sufficient interest in Quebec City and in Montreal.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, the House Leader for the New Democratic Party is correct, as is the House Leader for the Liberal Party, in bringing the attention of the House to the fact that there have been discussions within the committee on the appropriateness of holding hearings both in Quebec City and in Toronto.

I do not want to venture or speculate on what they may base their decision to come back to the House to put a motion. I will leave it to the committee to have its own debate and make that assessment based on whatever finding it may have.

We understand that there have been discussions and that the committee may, at one point, come back and ask to hold hearings in those two cities. We will leave it at that for now, let the committee do whatever work it has and come back to us in due course if it chooses to do so.

• (1510)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): First of all, I take it that the question has been put and the order in question has been adopted by the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did put the question. It has been agreed to by the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I would like to ask the Deputy Government House Leader to give a statement of the business the government intends to call for the next week.

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, of course this afternoon the allotted day motion of the opposition continues. We will resume next Monday, October 2, for the full day with a vote at 5:45 p.m.

Tomorrow, Friday, September 29, we intend to continue second reading debate on Bill C-29, the forestry department bill. I understand that there will be no private members' hour tomorrow, so I expect that the House will be able to complete the second reading of this bill tomorrow.

Tuesday morning we intend to call second reading of Bill C-36, Coop Advance Payments bill. We hope the bill can be referred that day.

Tuesday, after Question Period, we will resume debate on Bill C-18, the multiculturalism and citizenship department bill. I indicate notice now that, because of the surprising slowness of the House pace which is arising opposite me, I will on Tuesday afternoon immediately before the Order of the Day is called for resuming debate on the motion for second reading of Bill C-18 and on any amendments proposed thereto move that the debate shall not be further adjourned.

Wednesday, we expect to be able to call second reading of Bill C-28, the income tax and other acts.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) would allow me a few seconds?

I have received written notice from the Hon. Member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Skelly) that he is unable to be present to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Friday, September 29, 1989.

[English]

It has not been possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 94. Accordingly, I am directing the Table Officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

[Translation]

Since the notice will be withdrawn, Private Members' Hour will be suspended and, in accordance with Standing Order 94, the House shall revert to the business before it prior to Private Members' Hour.

The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to get back to tomorrow's Private Members' Business and say that what you just did was entirely correct. However, when the Minister was speaking, I wondered how the Minister knew, even before the House or you yourself knew, that we could proceed this way.

I don't want to be difficult, but apparently the Minister informed the House that tomorrow there will no Private Members' Hour because of reasons known to him but not to us so far, since the Chair has yet to submit the conditions of this arrangement to the House.

So perhaps from now on, when the Minister is informed of something, the Opposition could also be informed so that we can have some co-operation.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could seek clarification. When the minister rose in reference to Bill C-18, was it his indication that he was going to be then limiting further debate on Bill C-18? Was that the intent of his statement?

[Translation]

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, first of all, in response to the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier, perhaps I may recall the exact words I used with respect to the bill presented by the Hon. Member in question. What I said, in English, was:

[English]

I understand there will be no private members' hour.

[Translation]

So I did not offer either him or you, Mr. Speaker, with respect, or the Members of this House any certainty. In fact, what I said was that we understood the Hon. Member would not present his bill.

He wonders why we had prior knowledge. I suppose because we are on this side of the House. I make no pretence of enjoying divine inspiration, Mr. Speaker —In any case, in the course of a conversation we may be informed of certain things that may or may not take place.

Perhaps this also answers the question put by the Hon. Member for the New Democratic Party.

I also mentioned the fact that the House was proceeding at a slower pace than expected since it resumed sitting on September 25. In the circumstances, we are expressing our intention to ensure that legislation can proceed normally, that it be aired and discussed at a normal pace and for this reason we are making it clear today that we intend if needed to proceed with those debates in order that legislation can get through.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to indicate to my friend from the New Democratic Party and other Members in this House that this in no way precludes any discussions in the meantime. If my honourable friend has suggestions—as it happens from time to time, as I know for having had discussions with him, he knows what I mean—if they have suggestions in order that we can look together for ways to ensure that our business proceeds normally, at a pace that is acceptable to all, then the Government as usual will be very open to any suggestions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) on the same point of order.

Mr. Gauthier: Apparently the Minister does not want to understand my point. The Hon. Member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Skelly), a New Democratic Member, probably sent a notice to the Chair or the Clerk that he will not be able to be here tomorrow. We did not know the Hon. Member had done that. But the Government did know. So the Government have entry or access to the clerk's office which we do not. If this is what the Minister is saying, it is not proper.

[English]

Mr. Riis: Perhaps I can help my hon. colleague from Ottawa Vanier and the table as well. The hon. minister will know that we had some communication. The hon. member from the New Democratic Party had indicated to me that he was unable to be here for Private Members' Hour. I communicated that as a courtesy to the Chair. I am sorry, perhaps that same courtesy ought to have been extended to my hon. friend from Ottawa Vanier. It is simply a matter of communication.

I do want to say to the hon. minister that on Bill C-18 we in the NDP have had two speakers to date. To suggest that this is moving incredibly slowly seems to be a peculiar way to evaluate progress. Would one speaker only on a bill suffice? Is that the point the minister is making? I want to register a strong complaint against this initiative being suggested.

I hope that we can sit down and negotiate a suitable arrangement so that those who want to discuss multiculturalism in Canada will have an opportunity to do so. But two speakers from a political party in Canada participating in debate surely is not unduly holding up progress.

Mr. Charest: The government, as the hon. House Leader for the New Democratic Party has indicated, is very much open to discussion on how we can proceed in an orderly fashion to get the business of the house done. To that point we were ready to split time for speakers so that we could get more speakers in. That is one thing we are open to. In that manner more members can speak on the multicultural act that we are presenting before the House now.

The hon. member knows that yesterday a lot of time was taken up for petitions.

Mr. Cooper: Which we offered to add to the end.

Mr. Charest: As the parliamentary secretary points out, we had offered to add to the end of debate. These are all things the government is ready to look at in light of the good co-operation between all parties to get the business of the house done.

Finally, I would like to add one comment. At no point in time have I ever thought that the integrity of the Chair was called into question. It is quite clear that we on this side of the house believe that the Chair has maintained, always has and will maintain, a very strong position of neutrality. Never would we on this side of the House question the neutrality of either the Speaker or the office of the Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: Things are getting carried a little too far here. As a matter of fact, he knew something that I did not know because the NDP told him. I think it is now cleared up.

I want to refer to a disease that seems to be catching over there. Yesterday we saw the parliamentary secretary shedding crocodile tears about slow progress in the adoption of legislature in the House in the last few days. We have only been here three days. The government knows that this is the sixty-fifth day of this session. It is up to the government to call the House back. If they do not want to do work and call the House back to its function as the parliamentary forum for debating bills, then it is their problem, not ours.

• (1520)

I would say to the minister that we have been more than co-operative this week. But he has not convinced me that it makes sense to have only two or three speakers on a bill as important as the multicultural bill—a bill that is going to possibly be sent to a committee that was struck yesterday by this House, created when we separated communications, culture and multiculturalism. We created a new committee of the House of Commons. This bill will give it some matters and questions to discuss. I find it very difficult for the House to accept that the government with its majority is now imposing its will on the rest of us by imposing a very short debate on a very important bill that deals with a very important subject, multiculturalism.

PRIVILEGE

HANDLING OF MAIL BREV

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I gave notice to the Speaker during Question Period of my desire to raise a point of privilege regarding a matter that occurred during Question Period.

Myself and members of my caucus erroneously used the services of Pages to deliver material to the Prime Minister's desk. It is my understanding that the normal procedure, and I am not sure if it is an order of the House, is that large mailings of that nature should go to the post office.

In this modern era we all know that mail such as that really does not come to the attention of the person it is addressed to. It ends up in a computer somewhere and perhaps a list of the number of letters received each week is provided to the intended recipient.

I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, if you could undertake to review that particular rule so that members of Parliament, on behalf of their constituents, can have direct access in terms of large quantities. Obviously, we still have the right to send an individual letter over to a Minister or to the Prime Minister, and vice versa. My question is in terms of large mailings, not petitions which are covered under other rules, such as that which we started to send to the Prime Minister today. In fact we completed it by carrying a large mail bag up to the third floor of this building.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take a look at that to see whether or not the rules reflect the reality of the modern era of mail coming to the Prime Minister in particular but also cabinet ministers and members of Parliament.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can tell the hon. member that I am not in favour of changing the rule, however I will look into the matter and get back to him.

Mr. Charest: I doubt very much that this is a question of privilege. It probably is not. The debate would probably stop immediately. Furthermore, there is one rule in this House, for example, that does not permit members to put on or to show something when they debate. In the same spirit I think we can draw a conclusion that we certainly would not want to encourage members on all sides of the House, and it is not just a matter of members on this side, but on all sides of the House, to enter into a procedure where we are sending packages from one side to the other, or putting on demonstrations for the sake of the House or for the sake of making a point.

I think that is the spirit of the rules of the House now, and I expect the Speaker will want to look at such a question in that very spirit.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner:

That this House condemns the Government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including:

1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary;

2) an unjustifiable high interest rate policy, with an interest rate spread between Canada and the United States that is at record highs;

3) negligence in the management of Canadian trade causing unparalleled reductions in our trade balance and a loss of jobs, and threatening the survival of many formerly thriving Canadian industries;

4) abandonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forest industries; and

5) continued neglect of regional disparities.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At one o'clock when the House rose there were five minutes left for questions and comments on the speech of the hon. member for Kenora—Rainy River.

The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—St. James on questions and comments.

Mr. Harvard I was listening to my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River and it raised a question in my mind with respect to the inflationary pressure that would be brought on by imposition of the GST. I think the finance minister has already indicated in a number of statements that inflation would rise as a result of the levying of the GST. That in turn would probably raise interest rates and reduce our purchasing power.

The question I have for my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River has to do with what impact this is going to have on wage rates in the country. What is the response going to be from unions? What is the response going to be from ordinary workers? If they face inflation, if they face higher interest rates, if they face a loss of purchasing power, are they not going to go to their employers asking for huge raises to offset this GST?

That is the question I have for my friend from Kenora—Rainy River.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. friend for his question. I shall preface my answer with a little background, and being a unionist myself, it gives me great pleasure to tell you that I have had discussions with some unions relating to their philosophy of how they are going to bargain once there is GST, if it so unluckily does pass.

Basically, they are not going to accept it and just allow their way of living, their improvements in life, and what they expect for their family to go unquestioned. What they will do, I am sure, when bargaining in the next round of negotiations, and some are coming up this year with very large, major unions, is expect a large increase in wages to offset the loss of their income.

I expect what you will see is a confrontation between business and labour. As you all know, it is important for labour, and the individuals who work for the different labour movements, to get the same improvements in wages as the businessman would. Therefore, he will pass it on to the consumer. I think what we will see is mass inflation in our country because there will be an out and out war between labour and business.

Mr. Mifflin: I have a question for my colleague from Kenora—Rainy River. First, I would like to congratulate him on an excellent presentation. I did note in his presentation that he highlighted two areas that certainly are of interest to me, small business and tourism. I would like to ask my hon. friend if he could highlight some of his more pointed concerns, particularly in these areas of small business and in tourism.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, in an area like northwestern Ontario there are many small communities which are basically single-industry towns, except for the area of tourism, which is the secondary industry that we have. We have been told over and over by different governments, and this government is no exception, that tourism and the service industry is the industry of the future, that is where we should be headed, where we should be looking to in the next century.

Unfortunately, that is not taking place in places like northwestern Ontario in the tourism industry. I might say before going on that the Minister responsible for Small Businesses and Tourism did come to northwestern Ontario this summer and told all the tourist operators that he had the ear of the Minister of Finance and that there would be no problems in relation to the tourism industry. They would be looked after. There would be exceptions and exemptions for them. Lo and behold in the technical paper there is no such thing. Tourism is a big employer in regions like northwestern Ontario because of its beauty and the fact that people like to visit.

What has happened now is that the goods and service tax will increase the cost of transportation, it will increase the cost of goods, and it will increase the cost of staying in hotels and motels. That effect will run off what little tourism is left in northwestern Ontario.

What we are finding now, and these figures will bear this out, is that there is a 50 per cent drop in the number of people crossing the border from the United States to Canada. In our area tourists are dropping back because they are now going to places like northern Minnesota, which is very similar to northwestern Ontario, because it is cheaper and it is easier to have an affordable holiday, whereas in Canada we have made it too restrictive because of the tax increases that keep coming every time we turn around.

It is easy for the people in Toronto or Montreal to say: "Well, it is okay. One cent more for gasoline."

When you use vehicles as much as we do to go hundreds of miles from one neighbour to the next, it is very expensive. When tourists are put in that situation and they figure out how much it is going to cost to go on their holiday, with the travelling involved, they suggest to their families that because of their pocketbooks it is just not affordable. Therefore they go somewhere else like northern Minnesota which is not doing us any good. To add insult to injury we are now going to lose VIA Rail, a big tourist promoter in northwestern Ontario, which also brings megabucks as does tourism in our area. So now we have the double whammy.

• (1530)

Therefore, I suggest that we cannot afford this goods and services tax, not in northwestern Ontario, not anywhere in Canada. I suggest that the Minister of Finance take a different approach and look at stimulating the economy through different mechanisms rather than raising taxes over and over again.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate today because I think it is important that we put some of these statements that have been made about the goods and services tax into some perspective.

There have been some who have said that this tax is something that has been dreamed up at the last minute and put before the Canadian people. Nothing could be further from the truth, because back in November of 1984, in the agenda paper for economic renewal, I did state for the first time on behalf of the government that this was a tax that we were considering. It was all part of the economic plan that we put forward at that time. It was a plan designed to reduce the deficit, to get out debt under control, to improve the operations of the economy by giving encouragement to the private sector through deregulation, through encouragement of investment, through change in our privatization policy, freeing up markets, getting access to the large United States market, as well as the multilateral trade negotiations. It was also designed to help Canadians get better training and get better equipped to face the future. All of this is combined with tax reform as well.

We have had the first stage of tax reform that became effective in 1988 for personal income tax and corporate income tax. Now we are moving in a systematic way to the second stage of tax reform, sales tax reform. We all know in this House that this goods and services tax that we are proposing is a replacement for an existing tax which is a very damaging tax to our economy. There are very good reasons why we are moving in this direction. The existing tax results in a hidden tax on our exports. The nature of the tax results in a one-third less burden of taxation on imports as opposed to Canadian production. Canada is the only country in the world today that still has a manufacturers' sales tax. Forty-eight countries have a multi-stage tax such as the one that we are proposing here, so we are not exactly pioneers in this area. It is something that has been a long time coming and it is important that we get on to this so we can remove this drag from our economy which is causing us to lose about $9 billion of economic activity every year.

There are very good reasons to bring in this new tax. One is the competitive position as I have just described. The second is to allow us to get on further in getting the deficit down and controlling our debt. Finally, since we all pay taxes, and we all know we have to pay taxes, the important consideration and the key responsibility of government is to bring in a fair effective tax. That is what we are doing with the goods and services tax.

Now opposition members have said in their interventions earlier today that everybody is opposed to this tax, and that the tax is fundamentally flawed. One thing absolutely clear is that no fundamental structural flaw has been pointed out in this tax proposal. In the month and a half in which the technical paper has been out for the practitioners to study, no fundamental structural flaws have been pointed out.

Opposition members have said: "Let us scrap it. Let us get back to the drawing boards". As I said a minute ago, governments have been trying since the early 1950s to get rid of this existing tax. Mr. MacEachen, the Minister of Finance in 1981, made a proposal to get rid of the tax and move it to the wholesale level. That did not work, but he did ask for Mr. Wilf Goodman, Q.C., to head a committee that would advise on the way we should be moving from the manufacturers' sales tax to a new type of consumption tax. In essence what Mr. Goodman proposed, moving to a multi-stage tax at the retail level, is the precise form of taxation that we are talking about today.

After Mr. Goodman reported to the government, we brought out a white paper in June, 1987 and we are proceeding with consultations and discussions with many groups and organizations to fine tune and make sure that the proposal we have on the table today represents the consensus that we could achieve as we designed this tax.

What I would like to do is analyse what people are saying. In the finance committee people have said that hardly anyone agrees, but it is very clear that there is a common theme running through here, namely, that practically everyone has said get rid of the old tax. People have some problems with the proposal that is on the table today, and when one analyses exactly what they are saying, it is very clear that some have come down on one side or the other side of the particular issue. Yes, both sides are opposed, but they also have diametrically opposing points of view. People have said they want to recommend change by lowering the rate, by changing the credit, by changing the tax base, and by reducing the compliance costs. Yes, there is this criticism, but let us examine it further.

How would those who want to reduce the rate go about doing that? By reducing the credit? By reducing the small business payment, or offsetting the compliance costs? Would they do it by reducing the housing rebate? Some people have been saying we should reduce those things.

But on the other side we have the small business community saying: "You have got to pay more on the compliance offset". The housing industry is saying "You have to raise the housing rebate". Others have said we have to increase the size of the tax credit.

We have very clearly conflicting points of view. We have people who are saying it is important that we reduce the complexity of the tax. One of the elements of complexity is whether or not groceries should be taxed.

We have some people who are saying "Yes, tax everything. Groceries should be taxed". On the other hand, we have the grocery association and some of the organizations representing the lower-income people, people on welfare, who are saying "By no means should you tax food".

Again we have people saying tax food and others saying don't tax food. We have people saying exempt me, exempt the product that I sell while we have people who are saying tax everything. That is the position we have seen develop over the course of the last few weeks. There is criticism, but that criticism is also diametrically opposed.

I want to comment on one thing that the Leader of the Opposition said today. I could not believe my ears. He said "This government has lost complete control of spending". How can this man talk about completely losing control of spending when, as finance minister, his government's spending increased at a rate of 29 per cent in one of the years in which he was minister of finance. The program spending of the Government of Canada prior to our taking office was increasing at 5 per cent higher than the rate of inflation, 14 per cent per annum. Compare that to this government which he says has totally lost control of spending. Our program spending has increased at 3.5 per cent per annum, a half per cent below inflation, rather than the 5 per cent above inflation under the previous government.

People—including I believe the Leader of the Opposition—have said that this is the most regressive form of taxation.

When we came into office we had a sales tax system that resulted in low-income Canadians paying two or three percentage points more of their income in tax than people in upper incomes. Now, with the GST tax system including the tax, the low-income credit and the middle-income tax reduction, we have the exact opposite. People with low income are paying two or three percentage points less of their income in sales tax than people with upper incomes. Rather than moving into a more regressive tax system, we have moved into a progressive tax system in sales tax reform.

• (1540)

The NDP said that it would never impose a consumption tax. I do not know where the member from Kamloops was when the NDP signed the finance committee report which said, "In short, a single rate value added tax on the broadest possible base is a desirable objective." Does the broadest possible base include things like children's clothing and services? I would like him to describe what they had in mind when they signed that report as to what the broadest possible base is, because we have an example here of politicians talking out of both sides of their mouths. I think Canadians are getting a little fed up with that type of reaction from their political members.

Let me get back to the essential point of my intervention today. The government position as set out in the technical paper that we put forward on August 8 is a proposal which has been developed after much study and careful consultation since June, 1987, when we put out the white paper on tax reform. We consulted with the provinces for about two years. The result was the technical paper, a very specific proposal which took into account the balancing interests about which we had discussions during this period of time.

We expect opposition and we expect different points of view. It is the responsibility now of the government and of the committee to reconcile these points of view. It is the responsibility of the opposition not to blindly repeat each piece of criticism but to join in this debate, to join in this discussion. I call upon the opposition members and the public to engage in this debate so that together we can develop the best form of sales tax system in the world today.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to what the minister had to say, having sat through the hearings of the finance committee for the last number of days. Many of his comments on what the witnesses were saying are certainly of interest to me.

I would like to point out to him that even the staunchest supporters of the tax, the ones who have said you should go ahead with it, have been adamant in pointing out the flaws. Even those who think you should tax everything that moves—we were told this morning you should tax the interest on the bank accounts—say that we cannot live with a two-tiered tax if the government cannot get the provinces on side. This is, in the words of the retail council last night, an act of self-mutilation.

We heard on the news last week that this government in fact had—and I suppose still does—a proposal in its back pocket that would allow an amendment of the manufacturers' sales tax to continue a tax only at the federal level so we would not get into this incredible mess that we are leading into with a two-tiered system of consumption tax in Canada.

Whatever other flaws there are in this proposal, and there are many, the fact that we cannot have a single-tiered tax system in this country makes it impossible to go ahead with this proposal.

I think the minister should admit that. He should get up and say: "This is the best we can do but it is not good enough and, therefore, we will have to find another way to address the inequalities and the problems in the manufactures' sales tax". The best minds in Canada will have to address themselves on how to fix that tax because we have to live with this federal system.

In fact, as we heard this morning in the committee, it is really the monetary policy which this government is pursuing that is hurting our exporters a lot more than the manufacturers' sales tax. It adds 1.2 per cent to the price of an export. In the last 23 months the exchange rate of the Canadian dollar has gone from 67 cents U.S. to 85 cents U.S.

That is a much greater problem to the exporters than the manufacturers' sales tax. Yet the government does nothing to address the problem of high interest rates in Canada. I would like the minister to tell us whether it is true, as the reports have suggested, that the Department of Finance had prepared for him a proposal to amend the manufacturers' sales tax at the federal level only without going to a multi-stage value added tax.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is absolutely right. That was roundly criticized by all members of the finance committee in the last Parliament. Surely, the government would be criticized roundly if we did not listen to the views of the finance committee. That is why we have not proceeded with that and why we are proceeding with the goods and services tax.

The hon. member asks why are we not dealing with the problem of high interest rates. We are, Mr. Speaker. But we are not doing it in the way that was dealt with by the government 10 years ago.

I remind the hon. member that we had an inflation problem in the 1970s. The rate of inflation in 1976 was about the same as it is now, 5.5 per cent. About four years later it was up at 13 per cent because the government of the day swept it under the carpet. We are addressing this head on with our monetary policy. It involves for a while high interest rates, higher than I would like to see, higher than the hon. member would like to see. But I know it is necessary for us to endure these rates for a period of time so we can get that problem of inflation under control.

If we do not get inflation under control, we will be standing here in the House talking about 13 per cent unemployment and the 20 per cent interest rates that we had in the early 1980s. This government is not going to repeat those mistakes. We are going to deal with the problem of inflation now and not sweep it under the carpet. We learn from past mistakes that others have made. We do not blindly follow the shibboleths that my hon. friend would like us to.

ALLOTTED DAY S. O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Vancouver–Quadra) that:

That this House condemns the Government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including:

1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary; 2) an unjustifiable high interest rate policy, with an interest rate spread between Canada and the United States that is at record highs; 3) negligence in the management of Canadian trade causing unparalleled reductions in our trade balance and a loss of jobs, and threatening the survival of many formerly thriving Canadian industries; 4)abandonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forest industries; and 5) continued neglect of regional disparities.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): I am very pleased to be able to stand up today and speak on the economy. But like the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition I am saddened and disappointed that I have to speak on such a sombre note.

There is so much to talk about, it is difficult to know where to begin. I could talk about the disastrous effect of the GST like many others have done today. I could talk about the disillusionment of the 2.5 million senior citizens at the clawback. I could talk about the dramatic decline of the federal direct assistance to business in Atlantic Canada, the anxiety of fishermen over the future of the fisheries on both coasts, the increasingly destructive effect of the high interest rates to which reference was just made. There is also the fact that during the second quarter of the year over-all economic growth hit the skids along with exports, corporate profits, housing starts, auto and retail sales. Even the tourism deficit hit a historic high of $1 billion. That is a large percentage of the whole business.

Yesterday we sat in this house and heard in disbelief that the government leaked plans to slash VIA Rail. I could express my concern and that of my colleagues over the 31 times our taxes have been increased by the Minister of Finance since 1984, in most cases without telling us what was going on.

I could talk about this government's policy of removing almost all barriers to foreign investment in which foreign buyers have enthusiastically responded, or the reports that there have been 23 Canadian companies sold to U.S. buyers during the first six months of this year compared with 11 during the first half of 1988.

I could talk about Canada's 514,000 full-time university students who are resuming their studies at 68 degree-granting institutions this fall, for whom overcrowded classrooms, outdated equipment and deteriorating building plants are a fact of life. I could talk about the million youngsters in this country that will never be able to be the teachers, professors, engineers and leaders that they have the potential to be because of the economic circumstances.

I could highlight the concern that free trade is costing us control of our economy. I could use as examples, unfortunate examples, the unexpected and the ironic twist in which the government is being forced to buckle under a free trade bilateral deliberation that threatens Canadian restrictions on the export of fish in British Columbia and threatens that industry, 4,000 jobs and $580 million worth of exports.

I am more concerned as the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, that this will go on to threaten the east coast fishing industry. It is hard to know where to start and where to end. We are all the victims of time and circumstances in this House, so I would like to concentrate on two aspects of the economy that concern me the most: The changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, and the goods and services tax.

First, Bill C-21. There are a number of things that concern me about this deplorable initiative of the government to divert $1.3 billion from the $13 billion fund in the near term and to eventually withdraw all government support of the future to the tune of what is now $2.9 billion.

There are individual concerns, but, above all, it is the negative synergism of all these concerns taken together. In this case, the individual points add up to more than the sum of the parts. They add up to something like 10 or 12 times the effect, and the effect is not linear, it is more like exponential.

Let me outline the results of the proposed changes that concern me and practically every person involved with unemployment insurance in the riding of Bonavvista—Trinity—Conception, the province of Newfoundland, Atlantic Canada and perhaps all over the country. First of all it represents a breach of trust. It is a broken promise solemnly made by this government last fall. It redirects money for the unemployed into training. There is nothing wrong with training but why should it come out of the unemployment insurance fund? More important, it is training for jobs and positions that do not exist in my riding. I do not see them ever existing.

It provides the level playing field by getting the government out of the UIC business, insisted on by the free trade agreement for the benefit of the United States, not for the benefit of Canada.

It hurts the very people it was designed to protect. It was sudden; it was abrupt; and it attacks the very heart of the Canadian social security system, a program about which Canadians care very deeply. It runs counter to the expectations of Canadians. As if that were not bad enough, this is at a time when the Minister of Finance himself admits that next year the unemployment rate will run from 7.7 per cent to 8.5 per cent, a 10 per cent increase in one year. He promises that next year we we are going to have a 3 per cent rise in inflation. We add all this up with the unemployment insurance changes, and it is not a very bright picture.

Taken all together, they spell disaster. This is the constitutional right about which Canadians concern themselves, and the government has attempted to privatize it. That is just not honest. The questions has been raised here today about whether or not this is lawful. There is no doubt that it is unjust. Perhaps unlawful justice is done and lawful injustices are committed somewhere in the world every day, but this is Canada. We do not have to stand for that and we will not.

An Hon. Member: And we won't.

Mr. Mifflin: No, we won't. During the election campaign the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition was accused by this government of using tactics to scare Canadians. They said he was wrong. He warned that the free trade agreement risked major changes to our social programs because our senior negotiators admitted that they did not have the time to work out the definition of regional development and subsidies.

Well, he was right and they were wrong. He was right because what he said might happen is happening. They were wrong for two reasons. First of all, they broke their promise. More importantly to me and many of my constituents, they knew they would break that promise even as they were saying the opposite at the time. That is nothing short of despicable. They cannot be trusted.

I want to take a few minutes to talk about my concerns over the goods and services tax. More and more, I find my reaction to this terrible proposal—there is only one term that I can use— inexpressively distressing. It is nothing more than a cash cow that will raise wages, fuel inflation, cripple small business and drive consumers crazy right out of their minds.

I spoke about my concerns earlier in this House on June 15. Three months later, my concerns are greater. The more I learn about what the government thinks it has in mind, the more concerned I become. Is it any wonder I am concerned? The government said this was going to be revenue neutral. The very first statement in its shameful attempt to bribe Canadians with their own money into accepting this bill of goods is the following statement: "It is going to be revenue neutral and it is a major part of the ongoing program to reduce the deficit".

I am confused. The government said it was going to be done in co-operation with the provinces. Not one province agrees. The government said it is going to be visible. We see it is not visible. It is going to be simple. Somebody estimated, I think it was the Consumers' Association of Canada, that 10,000 bureaucrats will be needed to administer it and somewhere in the vicinity of billions of dollars.

Let me look at the experience of some other countries very quickly. Denmark, same tax, 10 per cent to 22 per cent; France, 13.6 per cent to 18.6; Germany, 10 per cent to 14 per cent; New Zealand, 10 per cent to 12.5 per cent; Britain, 10 per cent to 15 per cent; Holland, 12 per cent to 20 per cent and, Sweden, 10 per cent to 24.5 per cent. If we follow the example of Sweden, we would be able to cancel all income taxes and get the same revenue. That is a startling revelation and perhaps I should not reveal it to this government.

Everybody is against this tax. Eighty per cent of Canadians are against it according to a recent poll. As far as I am concerned and from what I hear today, the world is against it. We have a saying in Newfoundland that I would like to trot out for the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. It is a very simple statement. They say: "In a fight between yourself and the world, back the world".

Mr. Reid Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege to be back here and to have the opportunity to respond to my hon. friend and fellow Newfoundlander who, I should like to point out to this House, was very kind to me recently during some time that I spent in his beautiful and historic constituency. Unfortunately, that does not make up for what we have heard in the last ten minutes from my friend opposite who wanted to talk about this government's policy in terms of the economy.

This government's policy let us see in this country the creation of 1,550,000 jobs since September, 1984. The national unemployment rate is falling from 11.6 per cent to 7.4 per cent and the youth unemployment rate, a concern to all Newfoundlanders and Labradorians, and all Canadians and members of this House is falling from 18.2 per cent to 11 per cent. In our province, it has fallen a total of 10 per cent over that period of time.

We have seen in terms of growth and expansion in the economy 20 per cent, growth that the hon. member talks about as being unacceptable. In 1988, 223,000 homes were built in this country. In 1984, 135,000 homes were built in this country.

Let me talk more specifically, if I may, about the region. Total unemployment in Atlantic Canada has fallen by 33,000 compared to an increase of 65,000 between 1980 and 1984. In 1988, in Newfoundland and Labrador alone, we had the largest drop in unemployment of any province in this country and we saw an increase in jobs of 10,000, 10,000 people who were working that year but were not working the year before.

I have a short time left. I know my friend would like to comment. I do have one thing to say about unemployment insurance. Next year it is anticipated that $865 million in benefits will be paid into my province under employment insurance. The proposals made by this government will see a reduction of some $30 million out of $865 million in straight benefits.

We see an increase of $45 million for things like Community Futures, older workers, maternity benefits and benefits for those people who need help in times of sickness. Community Futures is a program which in my hon. friend's constituency has been shown to be hugely successful. In most of our provinces, it has been hugely successful and we have more money from this program.

The thing that aggravates me more than anything else when dealing with unemployment insurance is that narrow-minded, closed, "don't-change-anything" attitude. If we change nothing, we see no progress, we see no evolution, we see no hope. We must say to people that we keep adapting, we keep moving, we keep changing because there are options. This provides options.

Mr. Mifflin: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise to congratulate my hon. friend from across the House on a first-class revelation of statistics. I do thank him for conceding that he enjoyed his visit to Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I wonder if he would like to return and make that speech in the town hall that he just made. If he did, I would demand equal time. There are a number of things that I would like to say.

Statistics are a little bit like a lamp to a drunken sailor: more for support than for illumination. I would like to point out that what he did not mention was the money lost to UIC recipients in the province of Newfoundland alone. According to a reputable study—I cannot quibble with the figures—if we include the UI payments to recipients that they will not get plus the income tax benefits that would be paid anyway, the loss is $91.7 million. I have divided it three ways, and in the riding of Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, I cannot conceive of how to explain what $30 million means to my riding.

He also did not mention the very crucial area of job development that I deal with on almost an hourly basis in my riding. The hon. member knows that because he does the same thing. I am dealing with a loss of $53 million over all in the country and that affects me to a degree that causes me distress every day. I have to turn to people and say: "No, you cannot have your community hall, you cannot have your fire hall, you cannot have this and you cannot have that," because all of a sudden the ground rules have changed.

The perception of Mr. de Grandpré, as I understand it, and I think we paid him $1.5 million to do this study, was a vision of a trampoline which would put you back into the training market and a safety net which was unemployment insurance if you fell off. The government wants to have the trampoline but not the safety net, so if you fall off the trampoline, you might go right through the safety net. That is what my people are concerned about. Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the opportunity to respond to my very learned friend.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to participate in the debate today. I would like to preface my remarks by pointing out what this government has done to restore Canada's competitiveness on international markets.

I would like to point out that we have done more in our term of office to improve our competitiveness in the international market-place than any other government in the history of this country. We have liberalized investment controls, we have deregulated energy and transportation, we have privatized many state-owned enterprises, we have developed a new labour market strategy, we concluded a free trade agreement with the United States and we have undertaken major reform of income and corporate taxes. We are now reforming our manufacturers' sales tax.

These moves have been and are part of a concerted plan to make markets function better for the benefit of all Canadians. Despite the inevitable transition problems that accompany major reforms, the longer term benefits are clearly apparent and have already done much to improve Canada's economic performance. There has been a remarkable rise in business investment in Canada over the past few years and that is testimony to the strong business confidence resulting from our policies.

Intended business capital spending in 1989 amounts to $82.7 billion. That is an increase of 13.6 per cent over 1988. That means jobs for Canadians. The OECD projections of economic growth continue to put Canada ahead of the pack among member countries.

The next steps in improving our competitive position will involve measures to remove distortions in Canadian markets while securing our access to foreign ones. The new goods and services tax is an important instrument for that purpose.

The goods and services tax replaces a manufacturers' sales tax that has been universally recognized as obsolete and distortive. It is broken. In particular, replacing the manufacturers' sales tax with the GST removes the bias that exists, imports over domestic production that is there in the manufacturers' sales tax. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, that we tax goods produced in Canada more than we tax goods being imported into Canada? We are shooting ourselves in the foot continuously every day that this manufacturers' sales tax stays in place.

The GST applies at a single rate of tax to a comprehensive base of traded goods and services leading to a more efficient allocation of resources. That helps to lower the cost of capital to Canadian businesses which makes them more competitive and it lessens the relative burden on manufacturers which makes the manufacturer more competitive.

Canada, as the Minister of Finance pointed out, joins an increasing number of industrialized countries that apply multi-stage consumption taxes. Those countries, it should be noted, have gained increased competition for their exports. It has done nothing but good for them. It has made them more competitive in the world market. Not least, implementation of this tax will remove a major source of uncertainty affecting growth and investment decisions.

Canada has for a long time been the only country to operate a sales tax at the manufacturing level and one that, by its very structure, disadvantages our own producers as compared to foreign exporters. That is why we have seen the influx of foreign goods at a more competitive price than Canadian goods on the shelves in our stores.

The manufacturers' sales tax taxes domestic inputs of marketing and distribution costs which were not fully captured in the tax levied on imports. Because the manufacturers' sales tax was essentially invisible from the point of the consumer, people were not aware of the effects on their choices as consumers. They did not know it was there. They did not know how much tax they were paying on the goods that they purchased. It did not affect their choices as consumers or indeed their jobs as producers. The new goods and services tax will be visible and will remove or reduce the above biases to consumption and production.

• (1610)

In trade terms, Canada achieves by reform of the manufacturers' sales tax the removal of a self-inflicted wound. We are going to stop shooting ourselves in the foot. We increase the advantages to Canadian producers in markets in Canada and indeed when they export abroad, without, I might add, having to offer additional concessions to our trade partners.

The GST will lead to a significant improvement in the efficiency with which resources are allocated both within Canada and between Canada and other countries. The manufacturers' sales tax as it stands today provides for four different rates of tax. There are 22,000 special exemptions that have been won through the tax courts of Canada. Presently there are approximately 130 cases in the tax court seeking special exemption from the manufacturers' sales tax. Anyone with an ounce of sense would recognize that this distorts the relative prices of the commodities concerned and the investment choices that were made on that basis.

The reduced efficiency that flowed from this was reflected in output below potential. Canada's output today is below potential because of it. That reduces any gains that we might make from trade.

In contrast, the goods and services tax provides for a single rate of taxation applied to a comprehensive base of traded goods and services. The manufacturing sales tax incentive to shift out of manufacturing into services will be removed. Companies are restructuring, trying to move as much out of manufacturing into other areas of doing business and not always in a very efficient way. Producers, instead of concentrating on that kind of thing, will be able to allocate their productive capacity to the most economically remunerative purposes. That makes them more competitive.

This will be an important factor for the continuing restructuring of the Canadian economy to meet international competition. We must become internationally competitive. Because Canada is a trading nation, our very prosperity depends on this competition.

With an efficient tax system, business can concentrate its efforts on decisions about the best use of real resources rather than concentrate on how to minimize tax liabilities. An efficient consumption tax will also serve to encourage savings, an element that is very important at a time of large demands for capital accumulation and restructuring of the economy.

This is a difficult period for many western economies. The stresses on international trade and payment systems have grown from a number of sources, escalating debt, weak commodity markets, major payment imbalances, proliferating barriers to trade. Canadian economic and trade policy has balanced the needs arising from these and other uncertainties in order to gain security and growth for Canadians.

Through the free trade agreement, we have secured duty-free access to the largest national market in the world. Access, however, will not do us any good if we do not also develop the competitive capabilities to make use of it and to extend our influence into other developed markets. This is what the GST will help us do together with other ongoing elements of the government's economic program.

Mr. Harvard: I must say at the outset, Mr. Speaker, that the stoicism of my hon. friend from across the way is quite remarkable. The flames of protest against the GST are searing hot right across the country but particularly in his own home province of Alberta, and there he stands placidly, serenely, indifferently, as if nothing was going on outside of this House of Commons beyond Parliament Hill. It is as if the part of Canada where he lives belongs to some other planet. The fact of the matter is that Canadians are extremely upset about this tax and yet he did not recognize that fact at all in his 10 minute speech.

Since this government was first elected in 1984, it has failed to come to grips with the deficit despite all its protestations about the deficit. The debt has gone up from about $170 billion to $340 billion. This government has raised taxes not just 10 times, 20 times or 25 times but 30 times. I think the Leader of the Opposition identified the number of times this government has raised taxes: 31 times! Yet it is this government that talks about its fiscal management as though it is doing such a tremendous job.

On top of this record of the past five years, now this government has the nerve, the unmitigated gall, to come along with this whopper called the GST and is going to gouge Canadian taxpayers to the tune of $10 billion extra as though we had just all kinds of money to throw away.

The Minister of Finance who spoke in this place just a few minutes ago has broken his promises over and over again on this issue. He talked about visibility of the tax. There is no visibility. He talked about a federal sales tax scheme that would be integrated with sales taxes in the provinces. Did that happen? No, it certainly did not. He has broken his promises over and over again.

He talked about the tax being revenue neutral. Some kind of revenue neutral. He admits or concedes that perhaps the additional gouging of taxpayers will go up to around $6 billion. We know it will be more than that. It will be closer to $10 billion.

I know I am running out of time, but I am coming to a question. Almost every major business group in this country is opposed to the GST. According to a CTV poll, 79 per cent of Canadians are against the GST and yet they push it through. I ask my hon. friend from across the way who shares one of the prairie provinces with me how in the name of heaven can this government justify pushing through this crushing tax?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to point out that I do not share Alberta with that hon. member.

The hon. member said that the province of Alberta was adamantly opposed to the imposition of the goods and services tax. That is true. It is because of the general type of rhetoric that we just heard from that hon. member when he stood up to ask a question. His rhetoric says that they will even tax your funeral.

Mr. Harvard: I did not say that. It's true though.

Mr. Shields: No, but I am telling you that that is the kind of rhetoric—it is true? Yes, that is true because right now we tax the shovel at 13.5 per cent, we tax the casket at 13.5 per cent, we tax the shroud at 13.5 per cent and we even tax the hearse at 13.5 per cent. After the GST is put in place, it will be 9 per cent, so who is being silly?

All they are doing is raising rhetoric. When they do that, I think they do a real disservice to Canadians in every walk of life. Hon. members, even if they are in opposition, should get hold of the facts and lay them out to the people instead of coming out with rhetoric that completely distorts. I might add that they are following the same tactic today that followed in the free trade debate. Look where it got them, right over there where they belong.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to be able to participate in this important debate today. It is an important debate because of the nature of the legislation pending. It is a very important debate because of the implications that this will have on the people of Canada.

Certainly the people of Canada have spoken loudly and the government has yet to listen. The goods and services tax is indeed a very bad tax. It is a tax that we have described as being in the wrong place at the wrong time. It is a tax which we discussed in Question Period and in previous speeches today as a tax which is just ludicrous to be imposing upon the people of Canada.

The motion before us today is one which I can support with a number of changes. The first part of the motion reads:

> 1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary;

While I agree with everything that is there, I would also agree with the motion if that had read 2 per cent, 1 per cent, 9 per cent, or 12 per cent. The number is irrelevant in this case. It is not a 9 per cent tax we are fighting, it is the tax we are fighting, the goods and service tax, the grief and suffering tax, as the hon. member for Kamloops said earlier.

• (1620)

In order to support some of the things that have been said around the country, the finance committee is looking to expand its hearings from the Ottawa area into the other cities of Canada. As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the finance committee has decided that this is an important enough issue that it will extend the sittings to different places in Canada: Halifax, Edmonton, Vancouver. The closest that the finance committee will come to the area where I live in the constituency that I represent is the city of Regina.

My colleague in the provincial legislature, Doug Anguish, who formerly sat in this House and is now the MLA for The Battlefords, and I together are going to have our own public hearings in the city of North Battleford on October 7. We are going to listen to the concerns of the people of The Battlefords and The Battlefords—Meadow Lake constituencies because while the finance committee considers their views to be important, the finance committee cannot extend into all parts of Canada, particularly the rural and remote areas that are probably going to be affected harder by this tax than the urban parts of the country.

We want to give the people of our constituency the opportunity to present their views to the finance committee and to the Government of Canada. I have no doubt about some of the things I am going to hear when we hold our hearing in the city of North Battleford on October 7. The types of things I am going to hear will be similar to what has been provided to the finance Committee here in Ottawa and to us in the House of Commons by way of letters and the media.

A number of the things we are going to hear about are people in the retail sector expressing their frustration with the nature of the taxes that apply to their operations. First is the consumer end of it, having to fight on the front line, defending the collection of this tax to angry consumers who are going to be paying this tax at the front end. It is not the finance minister who is going to have to stand there and explain why this box of diapers cost 9 per cent more today than it did yesterday. It is going to be a clerk or a store owner in small-town Saskatchewan who is going to have to say: "The government needs the money." It is not the finance minister who will hear that directly from the people who need those diapers and other services and goods that have not been taxed before at the retail level.

Certainly some things have not been taxed at all before. The hospitality industry, small hotels, cafes, gas stations, dry cleaning services, hair salons, in the smaller areas is suddenly going to be collecting a tax for the federal government because it is providing services to the people of its community. They become the tax collectors, and it is not these people over here or the 5,000 to 10,000 new tax collectors who are going to be hounding them who will actually be taking the money from the consumer. The small town, rural and remote business people are the ones who will have to take the brunt of the frustration in the future for the strange moves of this government opposite.

I want to suggest a number of things. Earlier I had mentioned that it is not the 9 per cent but the tax of any per cent that I oppose. One of the things of which I am most scared is that this government, using the finance committee and parading witnesses in front of us, is going to try to provide a reason why, if 9 per cent is not appropriate, perhaps 6 per cent or 7 per cent will be appropriate.

We will have to broaden the base then because we still have to collect all of this extra money to pay off the deficit for the mismanagement of this government.

Seven per cent or 4 per cent attached to food now, this government tells us, will be acceptable to the Canadian people. Four years from now, that 4 per cent could become 9 per cent and it will be applied on food. We will not have gained anything by this debate and the frustrations expressed by people. All we will be doing by lowering the rates from 9 per cent to any other rate is simply forestalling the inevitable with these people on the other side of the House, and that is to have a broad based tax that is going to apply to food.

What does a broad based tax mean? We are just referring to it in terms of food, but what are the other exemptions? They are dental care, prescription drugs and those types of things that have been exempted. If we are broadening the base of this tax, we are talking about applying a tax to food, dental care and prescription drugs.

I, for one, want to be firmly on record, standing in this place, in front of all these people and anyone who is watching, as saying that I never want to see a tax on food, prescription drugs, medical appliances or heath care items of any kind at any time.

Why do we need all of this extra money? We are seeing ads from the government, and by the way, we cannot forget that the government has already indicated that it is prepared to spend $7 billion over the next two years to sell this tax to us through advertising. What is it that is causing this great need for this massive amount of money? It is not just the deficit. Do not forget that it is not that long ago that we stood in this chamber and debated the free trade legislation which was going to allow us to transfer and sell goods into the United States without tariffs. We argued then that that meant that we also would allow free access to the Canadian market for American goods without tariffs. That move alone cost the Canadian people $2 billion in lost revenue.

Now the Canadian government is saying that we have lost the revenue and we have to make it up, let us charge the consumers, let us charge the poor, let us charge the people of Canada so that the Americans can sell cheaper goods on the Canadian market and take away Canadian jobs. I think that is an awful situation and it is one of the things that we have to keep in mind when we are dealing with this goods and services tax and the approach that this government is taking to all of us across the country.

There are a couple of other things that I want to express, particularly relating to agriculture. This government is pushing upon the farm community in Canada a whole broad range of exemptions for farm products under the goods and services tax. I do not want to play around with the nature of the tax at all and I do not agree that you put some things on and you provide exemptions on the end. The government is forcing farmers to pay cash up front, apply for rebates in the back and then expect that they will get paid back some time down the road. It is a ludicrous situation.

The point I want to make here is that if this government believes that the farm sector is important, then exempt the farm sector completely. Do not play around with this rebate and credit stuff. Exempt the farm sector if you consider it important and forget about the rebates, the delays and the cash flow problems that this whole situation is going to create for farmers, and that includes land transfers, leasing land, selling and transfer of crops and all of that sort of thing.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say to anybody who is thinking seriously about supporting the goods and services tax, think first about what it is that you want this tax to do. Is it to reduce the deficit? There are other ways to do that. Is it to make our trade better with the United States? There are other ways to do that. Is it to reform the Canadian tax system? There are other ways to do that and they are all much better. This goods and services tax does not address the needs of the Canadian economy. It addresses the needs of the government opposite and we have to change that. We have to do something about that. Unfortunately, for some of us it means waiting until the next election, but by golly we are going to be there and the Canadian people are going to do that for us.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to participate in this debate today, because certainly any debate relating to the economic policies of the government and hence the economic progress of the country is exceedingly important.

I think it is important to understand, when we look at the goods and services tax or any other particular part of the whole, that this government, going back to 1984, did in fact begin to develop and has put in place since then an over-all policy designed to generate the growth of a strong economy. I think what is important is to remember that each part of this policy has been part of an ongoing program. Naturally, we as citizens have a tendency to isolate the various proposals and to see them, perhaps, distinct from the other and to forget that indeed they are part of an ongoing policy. In doing that we may not fully appreciate the benefit of each.

This plan really had three central elements. First and foremost was the plan to reduce the deficit, because we understood as a government that unless we did something to reduce both the annual deficit and, eventually, the national debt, that we as a nation would indeed be crippled in the future. I think it is important to reiterate the fact that we have made good progress in the reduction of the annual deficit which must, of course, occur before we can reduce the debt itself. In fact, since 1984 the annual deficit has been reduced by $10 billion per year. I think that figure of $10 billion per year is worth repeating because there are a lot of people who forget that it exists.

In addition, it is also important to understand that in the plan, a part of which is now before the House of Commons, there is a further projected reduction in the annual deficit of $14 billion per year to be in place by 1993-1994.

We have also made good progress with respect to our proposals to permit Canada as a country to compete more effectively in the world market. Part of that, of course, is the free trade agreement which has been place for a few months and part of it also relates to the GATT talks which are an ongoing process and which are vital to our future in light of the fact that we have been and will continue to be so heavily dependent on exports.

Third, as part of this plan, the government announced some time ago that it was exceedingly vital that we should have tax reform so that the policies of the government would be fair to all Canadians. It is this latter part of the over-all plan that I would like to speak about this afternoon, and to discuss where the GST fits in because it is, indeed, related to all three parts of the over-all plan.

Going back to November of 1984, Mr. Speaker, as you will recall, the government introduced what was called the Agenda for the Economic Renewal of Canada. That is when the government laid out its long-term plan describing how we would, over a period of time, put in place policies which would regenerate economic growth in this country. Within that policy framework there was emphasis on job creation, economic growth, sound fiscal management, economic efficiency and improved international competitiveness. Not only have we, as a government, followed this agenda with our economic policies, but I think we have real evidence that our plan is working. With our economic initiatives, from job creation and encouraging business investment to deregulation of energy and transportation sectors, our economic record begins to speak for itself.

The goods and services tax which by the way is a replacement tax, as I think all of us in this House understand but unfortunately which not all Canadians yet understand, is a continuation of that agenda, part of a plan to build a strong economy for Canada.

The 1987 White Paper on tax reform recommended that tax reform should take place in two phases. About a year ago we had phase one and today we are beginning the debate with respect to phase two. Briefly, as most of us understand, the goods and services tax which will be broadly based will replace a woefully inadequate and patently unfair 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax which has been in place in this country since 1924.

I think it is important in passing to remind ourselves, and perhaps to remind Canadians, that every political party in this House has agreed that the manufacturers' sales tax has been a disaster and that it must be replaced.

The evidence of its inefficiency and unfairness lies in the fact that of the 75,000 Canadian businesses which are part of the manufacturing sales tax some 22,000 have separate and independent tax arrangements. That, in itself, has to be evidence of unfairness and inefficiency.

We believe that the goods and services tax will benefit, once it is in place and once we understand it, Canadians in all regions. What I would like to talk about is how the goods and services tax will impact on farmers. That is also the subject of the discussion in which my hon. friend was participating.

Most of us understand that a number of items will be exempt from that tax. One is basic groceries. The fact that basic groceries will be tax free under the goods and service tax means that Canadians will not pay any tax whatsoever when they buy them. Making food-related products tax free will ensure that basic groceries are completely free of tax. With limited exceptions, almost everything sold by farmers, as a consequence, will be free of tax.

A farmer selling livestock or crops to a food processor will not charge a GST on that sale. Food processors will not charge a GST when they sell food-related agricultural products to the food wholesaler, and the wholesaler will not charge a tax when he sells products to the food retailer. In turn, of course, the retailer will not charge a tax when he sells products to the consumer.

The only products that will be taxed in this process when sold by farmers, and they are worth noting because they are relatively few in number, are cut flowers, trees, wood, bedding plants, sod, soil, bait, horses, unprocessed wool, fur, hides, seeds and natural fertilizer, except when sold in bulk.

Like other businesses, farmers will be able to claim the input tax credit on what they buy to use in their business. Since a farmer can claim back the tax which he pays on all of his business-related purchases, whether he is buying a tractor or paying for the services of a veterinarian, it is really to the advantage of the farmer, despite the fact that there w5ill be some more bookkeeping, to participate in the GST. I would note in passing that there will also be some very real economic gain to the farmer in certain specific instances which would come to mind. Take for example the purchase of a half-ton, which is so vital on the farms of western Canada and throughout the country. Assuming a $16,000 wholesale value for that half–ton with a 13.5 per cent hidden manufactures' sales tax applied now, bearing in mind that tax will disappear and also that the farmer will receive a rebate on the 9 per cent goods and services tax paid on the retail price, he clearly comes out the winner, according to my mathematical calculations. On that $16,000 half–ton I think he would stand to gain some $2,160.

When he pays the telephone company for his service he will claim the tax back. Because the farmer has the option of reporting his purchases on a month–by–month basis he will virtually be in a position where there will always be tax owed to him. Therefore I do not believe, once the first two or three months are gone by, that the cash flow crisis about which some people have spoken will indeed be significant to that farmer. I would also remind the house that the farmer will also be in a position, should the rebates not be returned as quickly as he would wish, to receive interest on that after some 21 days.

The farmer is in a good position even when he sells his land because as long as he sells his land to an ongoing farm operation tax would not be applied. Even if it is sold in part the purchasing farmer would be eligible for the rebate. Should he sell his land to a developer, should it go from an agricultural to a non–agricultural use, the tax would apply, and I would suggest appropriately apply. If this is part of a transfer to part of the family there will not be a tax charge.

In conclusion, I think this tax will be good, once we understand it, for virtually all regions in Canada. It will be particularly good for western Canada because of our dependence on exports and I think it will be particularly well understood and well received by the farm community because the farm community in the end, I believe, will come out a winner.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I had actually hoped to direct this protracted question to the hon. member for Athabasca, as he is a fellow Albertan, but any defender of the government's economic policies will do.

I rise, in fact, to support the motion of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition and to ask a more general economic question of the hon. member, if I may, arising out of the experience we in Alberta have had during the 1980s; two successive four–year terms, first of Liberals and second of Tories federally, and of all Tories provincially from 1981 to 1988–89.

Let me start by quoting Statistics Canada employment earnings and hours to show you what the situation is now. In March, 1989, the average hourly– paid employee in the goods producing sector in Alberta worked 37.8 hours a week for an hourly rate of $14.80. By contrast, the average hourly–paid employee in the service sector worked 28.4 hours a week for an average hourly wage of $10.37 an hour. At the lower end of the service sector are trade, finance, insurance and real estate, and at the very lowest end are those jobs associated with tourism with a rate of pay of less than $6.50 an hour, for an average of just over 26 hours per week and a gross pay of about $172 a week. That is the current employment situation in Alberta.

What we find is that between 1981 and 1988 in Alberta employment in the goods producing sector actually fell from about 403,000 to about 342,000, a decrease of 15 per cent. Meanwhile employment in the service sector grew from about 748,000 to 845,000, an increase of about 13 per cent. The largest increase was in the services subsector, that poorer subsector, which grew from about 322,000 to about 402,000, an increase of almost 25 per cent. At the same time, the highest unemployment was experienced in the services producing industries, about 61 per cent of all unemployed in Canada, as a matter of fact.

This parallels a growth in part–time work. In 1988, 184,000 or 15.5 per cent of all jobs in Alberta were classified as part time, a growth of about 39,000 from 1981. During this same eight–year period full–time employment actually fell from 1,007,000 to 1,003,000, a decrease of about 0.4 per cent while officially recognized part–time employment increased by 27 per cent.

Successive Liberal and Conservative Governments have seen employment in full–time jobs fall, in part–time jobs rise, in well–paying jobs fall, in poor–paying jobs rise. I ask the hon. member is this the success of which he boasts?

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have a member from Alberta ask a question, particularly bearing in mind the fact that I think the whole question of the goods and services tax in Alberta is of particular interest to the people of that province because most of them seem to not understand that indeed they have been paying the manufacturers' sales tax and that they are part of a tax–paying public whether they have been paying a direct provincial sales tax or not.

So there is a 13.5 per cent tax that has been applied throughout Alberta and because it is hidden there has not been any accountability for that.

Without being able to comment specifically on the statistics which the hon. member has cited relating to his province, I would like to say a few words. First, with respect to the million and a half jobs that have been created since 1984 in this country, I do know that 80 per cent of them are full-time jobs, which was in fact a contrast with the situation as it was before 1984. I find it hard to believe that that pattern would vary substantially in one part of the country from that which exists elsewhere. I think that 80 per cent full-time jobs across the country is a very important accomplishment.

I would also suggest to the hon. member that his province, like so many provinces, has been very dependent upon one or two parts of an economy. Certainly the agricultural economy has had difficulties in the last three or four years, mostly difficulties created by climate over which we have little or no control. However, I would say to this member, as one who is very proud of what we have done in agriculture, that this party, this government, has done more to assist Alberta farmers and farmers in every other part of the country than has any other government in the history of this country.

I would also suggest to the hon. member that part of the difficulties in the Alberta economy relate very much to what has been happening in oil. If I recall correctly, his party, if not himself, because he was not here, was a very strong supporter of the National Energy Program which those two parties across the way put in place. It had a tremendous negative impact on the economy of Alberta.

I think you will see, Mr. Speaker, that certainly the goods and services tax will help Alberta because of its dependence on exports, because the manufacturers' sales tax in place now discriminates against manufacturing in Canada. It also has made it very difficult for us to export abroad because the manufacturers' sales tax has been included in the price of those goods sold elsewhere. The goods and services tax will not be charged on products being exported outside the country. That will help the province of Alberta. That will help all of western Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I want to take part in the debate today because I believe that no country can have a strong economy to carry it through the turn of the century unless it follows a sound fiscal policy. This Conservative Government has totally missed the boat in the past two years. Everybody in Canada—employers, trade unions, ordinary people and major corporations alike—agreed on the fact that a real tax reform was needed. But the Government put it off, changed its mind and, as we recall, in the fall of 1984 and in the spring of 1985 the Minister of Finance told us there was no point in revamping the tax system because everything was forever changing. So all that was needed were small corrective measures to take prevailing conditions into account. But the minute he realized that the United States would be coming up with their own tax reform he decided we had to have one as well.

Even then everybody agreed we had to reform the system. So the Minister, ever mindful of the upcoming election, chose to bring in the tax reform in two stages: first stage, the income tax, second stage, the sales tax reform. I remember very well that when the Committee on Finance began studying the first stage most witnesses before the committee said we were making a mistake and that the two stages should have been considered at the same time because a sound fiscal policy has to include income and sales or consumer taxes, both fully harmonized as a whole to achieve economic recovery.

But as I said, for electoral considerations, he did the opposite and we are now looking at a tax reform, an income tax reform which does not really meet our requirements. And today here we are dealing with a sales tax refom which Canadians reject outright. We have heard about a number of polls. A couple of days ago, I think, one such poll revealed that 78 per cent of Canadians are against the TGS, the tax on goods and services. Among others, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business reported that 97 per cent of small businesses completely reject this tax.

Well, the Minister of Finance may have the impression that he got through the first stage before the election by allowing the odd income tax rate reduction and that we are now prepared to swallow the second stage right after the election. If he thinks that Canadians will forget all about it between now and the next time they vote, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest he and the Prime Minister are mistaken because Canadians are not about to forget. People throughout the country are now getting organized to set off a real tax revolt. Canadians find this tax unacceptable.

Given what little time I have left, I should like to deal more particularly with small business. Just what does this tax mean to small business? It will be a total nightmare, Mr. Speaker. We now have close to 900,000 small businesses in Canada and out of these 900,000 businesses perhaps a small percentage is affected by the existing federal sales tax.

• (1650)

So all small businesses! And the Minister in his technical paper proposes that businesses with sales of $30,000 a year will not be affected, will not have to register for the sales tax, the new goods and services tax. Mr. Speaker, I think that is really a joke. Think of what $30,000 is worth today and what it will be worth in 1991.

So in fact all small businesses will register for this tax and we have reason to believe that the 4,000 public servants—and I do mean four thousand, Mr. Speaker—whom the Department of Revenue will employ just to administer this tax will not be sufficient.

Imagine the anxiety of Canadian small business people now, because they do not really know what to expect; it is complex.

An item may be taxable or it may not be. The new system the Minister is proposing to us will make items taxable not according to what they are but depending on the establishment and the origin of the establishment.

Mr. Speaker, imagine the complexity. Big business, banks and big corporations will not have problems because they have management systems, fairly sophisticated accounting systems that will enable them to carry on.

The Minister defends himself, as we saw yesterday when he tried to answer my question, by saying they have provided two simplified accounting systems.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say what John Bullock, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, thinks about these two simplified systems.

I am quoting John Bullock, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. He said that nevertheless, the simplified accounting methods proposed by the Government are even more complex than the rest of the system.

He said that on September 9 in The Ottawa Citizen. So much for simplicity, Mr. Speaker. We know very well from Mr. Bullock's testimony that the extra administrative costs for Canadian small businesses will be from $1,000 to $3,000, depending on the additional equipment they will have to buy, a new cash register or whatever.

Mr. Speaker, the $600 the federal Government proposes to compensate small businesses is not adequate and several witnesses have asked that this amount be increased.

During the past five years in the House, Members, and especially Government Members, constantly said how pleased and proud they were of small businesses which generated between 80 and 85 per cent of our employment. I am also proud of these small businesses, Mr. Speaker, and I have always been a staunch defender of small business. Today, however, these people are afraid. Canadians who would like to start a new business are now afraid to do so, because of this nightmare of a new tax, the GST. Jobs that would otherwise have been created will not materialize.

Last night, Mr. Speaker, we heard that apparently, Canada's tourism industry will lose at least 30,000 jobs. Mr. Speaker, 30,000 jobs will be lost because of this new tax!

When people say that the old tax—

[English]

Like the Minister used to say and still says in his speeches, "this federal manufacturers' sales tax is a killer of jobs". Well we find out that the new GST, goods and services tax, is also a killer of jobs. So what are we doing here? We are changing four quarters for a dollar and are making all Canadians miserable. New small businesses will not be created because of fear. People will say: "Why should I invest my money? Why should I risk my shirt? Why should I risk everything I worked for all my life when maybe a few years hence a tax inspector will walk into my business and say, 'you did not charge the tax right.'" He does not know what is taxable and what is not taxable. The businessman is going to be asked to pay the tax, the penalty and the interest and he will lose everything he has worked for all his life. That is the kind of business attitude we are creating in this country.

If we say that small business is the backbone of our economy then we should stop this madness and the minister should withdraw this project immediately. He should go to the provinces, negotiate, and have one tax system in this country once and for all so that everyone can understand and we can have some business activity that makes sense.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Richmond—Wolfe (Mr. Côté).

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, sales tax reform is essential, as I see it, and is part of the Government's plan to provide for a better economic future for Canada.

One of the major obstacles to achieving this objective is our increasing national debt.

Before discussing the goods and services tax the GST and how it works, I would like to talk about our national debt.

Everyone agrees that this debt is a national problem. Controlling the debt is a challenge that is national as well, and what we need is a national commitment, if we are to meet this challenge and overcome this obstacle.

Borrowing money, having debts is not necessarily a bad thing. If I want to buy a house, I have to borrow. Borrowing is, in itself, dynamic. It is not necessarily risky as long as we are able to meet our monthly payments.

Ongoing debt, however, is a problem. If I am unable to meet my monthly payments on the house I just bought, I go into debt. If I borrow money to buy more goods, I accumulate more debt which I cannot repay and I end up with my back against the wall.

Being in debt is a problem. It has been Canada's problem for the last 25 years, and a problem for private individuals and businesses as well.

When your debts are too high and interest payments are high as well, then the situation becomes extremely difficult.

Public debt has existed since the beginning of Confederation, but it was not until the past 20 or 25 years that our debt took on astronomical proportions.

Since 1970–1971, the federal Government has spent annually more than it receives in revenue. This takes us back to the monthly mortgage payments I am unable to meet on my house. Those missed payments become a debt.

Briefly, the Government has had an ongoing deficit since that time. In order to deal with these deficits, we and our successive predecessors had to borrow. The cumulative result of all this borrowing has become what is referred to as the national debt, which today totals $320 billion.

Imagine what this means in interest payments alone! Thirty-one cents of every dollar of revenue received by the Government is used to service the debt.

Last year, interest payments alone represented $1,300 per Canadian citizen. Men, women and even children were in debt. This means average of $5,000 per family or $400 per individual, per month, the equivalent of a very substantial proportion of the rent or mortgage payments we all have to pay. This cannot go on. We are now with our backs against the wall. But in order to reduce the debt to a manageable level, we have to reduce the annual deficit. That is exactly what we have done since 1984.

• (1700)

At that time, in 1984, the deficit was $38.3 billion. Just for the fiscal year ending in March 1989, provisional data show the deficit was $28.7 billion, which is $200 million less than forecast in the April budget projections. So we have reduced the deficit by some $9.5 billion from the 1984 level. That means that every year, we have reduced our expenditures by $10 billion, maybe not to spend on the extra services we would like, because there is always the total debt to consider, but we have already reduced the deficit, which stood at $38 billion, by $10 billion.

This deficit reduction has thus slowed the growth of the public debt. In the last fiscal year, for the first time in 15 years—yes, fifteen years—the debt increased by less than 10 per cent. That is a good performance, compared to the peak of 24 per cent growth in 1984.

But our objective is to reduce our borrowing requirements to zero by 1993–94, and that is a major challenge. It means wiping out the whole $28 billion deficit we still have. Using the same accounting methods as the United States and Great Britain, we would then have what is called a balanced budget.

Our overall success with deficit reduction since 1984 is due to tighter control on all expenses in all areas. First, we cut public expenditures. Second, we overhauled the whole tax system. Finally, we made structural changes to help the economy function more harmoniously and productively, without too much government interference.

Expenditure restraint, Mr. Speaker, was and is a major part of our debt control program. I heard people say, not only today but for several weeks, that if the government reduced its expenditures, they would not be so unhappy about paying taxes. Well and good. Everyone is for cutting expenditures instead of raising taxes. But in fact, that is just what we have done, restrict and decrease government expenditures, not just a little, but a lot.

Let's take a closer look. Consider what has happened. We made cuts in every area of public spending. A lot of people say: Make cuts in the public service. Cut property. Cut buildings. Don't forget we reduced grants to businesses, like incentives for the petroleum industry. We also cut funding for Crown corporations, including The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and Canada Post. We did that. We also reduced spending on defence and foreign aid. A lot of people are criticizing us for this. So where should we cut? We had to do something. We also made changes in our programs for income transfers to individuals. People on high incomes now have to return part of their old age security pension and family allowance. The list of cutbacks does not end there, and it will continue to grow. In fact, many of these decisions were extremely difficult to make. But they were necessary, and we made those decisions. In fact, it is all part of a government's responsibility to manage the well-being of the entire community. Of course, this requires sacrifices on the part of certain sectors of the population, but this Government has shown in the past four years that it is able to act responsibly.

Spending cutbacks have been very visible in government operations. Last year, spending on government operations was less than it was when we took power. In four years have we cut government spending to a level even lower than it was four years ago. What a performance!

We managed to do so by imposing severe budgetary constraints on the departments. We sold surplus public property. We cut the Public Service by 12,000 person-years. There again, people are saying: Cut, cut! However, we cannot keep on cutting. We must maintain our services and the people who manage them. Nevertheless, we managed to cut 12,000 person-years. We spent $1.7 billion on government operations last year 10 per cent less compared with 1984–85. Many businesses would be delighted with those results. And we are determined to continue to identify and deal with any instances of taxpayers' money being wasted.

We have been able to keep program spending increases down to an average of only 3.5 per cent annually, since we came to power. This increase is less than the inflation rate for the same period. Last year—an election year—we kept increases in program spending down to 3.1 per cent. In comparison, spending by provincial governments increased 6.5 per cent. Once again, what a performance!

These measures, Mr. Speaker, made it possible to reduce program spending from 19.5 per cent in 1984–85 to 16 per cent, in terms of last year's gross domestic product. Further reductions will be achieved this year and in the years to come. Without our budgetary restraint measures, program spending this year would have been $22 billion more than it is today.

When we look at the deficit, we must consider the spending aspect and, of course, taxes. Nobody likes taxes. Nobody wants to pay taxes. But even if we don't like taxes, we know we have to pay them, and that is how we should approach the proposed goods and services tax.

The first stage of tax reform was done with this in mind. The second stage is the one we are talking about today. Canadians must understand, Mr. Speaker, that government is a service that must be paid for. Of course, the Opposition tends to be alarmist in its statements, but

I think, Mr. Speaker, we should point to all the information that has been made available.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for my colleague the Hon. Member for Richmond—Wolfe (Mr. Côté). It is not a matter of being alarmist, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of fact. I happen to know that we in Canada have certain taxation problems. Corrective steps must be taken. I would think everybody in the House is aware of that. But, Mr. Speaker, what has me seriously concerned about the TGS announced by the Conservative Government is that 75 per cent of Canadians have indicated in no uncertain terms that they are against this tax on goods and services, and what has me even more worried, Mr. Speaker, is that Quebec is one of the provinces which will be hardest hit by the 9 per cent tax on goods and services. So here is my question to the Member for Richmond—Wolfe.

You in the Conservative Government have always sought to reach a consensus with the Canadian provinces, so how is it that in this case, barely a few weeks ago at the federal-provincial conference held in Quebec City, all Canadian premiers unanimously spoke against the tax on goods and services? Yet the Canadian provincial premiers are your partners and you have to try to reach a consensus with the provinces concerning provincial or federal tax issues. So I would like to know what our colleague thinks. Since everybody is against it, can the Government not realize it is taking the wrong approach with respect to the kind of tax it wants to impose on Canadians?

• (1710)

Mr. Côté: I am amazed Mr. Speaker that the Hon. Member's assessment of the situation is that of a total opposition. If he was attending the hearings or reading the submissions, he would realize that everyone of those who have appeared up till now supports the principle of the GST, because it is a fair and equitable alternative to another tax, the manufacturers' sales tax, which indeed was unfair. What you should know is that all the witnesses are suggesting to the Government through the Committee, of course to perhaps propose alternative implementation mechanisms than those tabled in a working paper which indeed we are discussing.

When you also suggest that there is no unanimity among the provinces, I can indicate that if there is no unanimity between themselves, there is no lack of it as far as discussions with the Canadian Government are concerned. There is rather more unanimity between provinces, but as to that the discussions are continuing.

The third matter raised by the Hon. Member, Mr. Speaker, is that alarmist sentiment. And I must submit that the Hon. Member used the right word because the discussions that are now going on are alarmist indeed to the extent those fears are expressed by the Opposition. It is clear people oppose this if the surveys you are referring are to be believed. But as I said to the extent the discussion is proceeding in a cold, dispassionate manner, my appreciation is altogether different and witnesses appearing before the Committee have very supportive views indeed.

[English]

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to talk about browbeating. I would like you to give me some latitude, Mr. Speaker, because I believe this is relative to the goods and services tax that the government plans to introduce.

I would like to read an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press. It is entitled: "Browbeating Newfoundland".

> The Prime Minister last week sent one of his top underlings to tell a press briefing that Newfoundland's second thoughts could threaten not only the Meech Lake Accord but all federal-provincial agreements and, indeed, the very international order. If Newfoundland could change its mind about Meech Lake, he warned, no agreement between governments could stand. The federal-provincial agreement to develop the Hibernia oilfield off the shores of Newfoundland would be at risk; so could fisheries agreements with the United States.

This was an unprecedented move by a senior official of the Government of Canada warning Newfoundland, saying to Newfoundland: "You be careful or otherwise you're going to be cut off." I have never seen such shameless intimidation in the 17 years that I have been in the House of Commons.

I want to tell the members of the House of Commons the context for this intimidation. This is a province that has been warned to behave itself, a province which has already suffered immensely, immeasurably, at the hands of this government. It is a province, first of all, that has seen its fish stock, its very lifeblood, threatened. The crisis that we see in the east coast fishery now is unprecedented. And we began as a fishing province, Mr. Speaker. That is what we are all about. That is what our people do. That is why they are there in the first place. Those people who say: "Why don't you do something else?" really don't understand the situation at home. Our people fish, and yet the fish stocks are in crisis as a result of the mismanagement of the Government of Canada. They are the government; they bear the responsibility.

In the midst of this crisis on our very doorsteps, at the heart of our very livelihood, the Government of Canada says: "At this time, Newfoundland, Labrador, we intend to change the unemployment insurance system in this country" which is the safety net that fishermen and plant workers have used as an income support program since the days of Jack Pickersgill.

At the time the fishery, the main industry, is in crisis, the Government of Canada says: "We're increasing your premiums. We're withdrawing from the unemployment insurance plan. We're cutting back on the number of weeks of benefit you can draw. That's what we're going to do for you in a time of crisis." There is no compensation plan, as was provided for the farmers of Canada. There is no plan for managing the stocks. They are cutting back on the safety net on the unemployment insurance plan which is the safety net for plant workers in Newfoundland. That is number two.

The third thing the Government of Canada did was to short change the east coast in terms of regional development. I want to read from The Ottawa Citizen of September 13. This is a study commissioned by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council—not a Tory rag, not a Liberal organization, not an NDP organization. It is the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. Do you know who did the study for them? Decima did the study for them, the polling agency of the Tory party. The polling agency of the Prime Minister did a survey for the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council and here is what they found:

> —federal industrial assistance to the Atlantic provinces has fallen to such an extent that in 1987 it was, per capita, below the national average.

Let me repeat that for the record. It is important. This is a Decima survey.

> —federal industrial assistance to the Atlantic provinces—

Remember regional development? Remember DREE? Remember co-operative federalism? Remember a kind Canada, a sharing nation? Remember reaching out to the underprivileged and the underdog and those who had less? Remember that? Here is what Decima says:

> —federal industrial assistance to the Atlantic provinces has fallen to such an extent that in 1987 it was, per capita, below the national average—
> The business-funded economic research council found that federal assistance to Atlantic Canada amounted to $1,045 per person.
> That compared to $229 per person in the rest of Canada and $302 per person for all of Canada.

I have not got time to dwell on that point, but it is point number three.

On top of that the government wants want to bring in a goods and services tax. It wants to put that on top of the tax that already exists. Do you know what the tax is in our province right now? It is at 12 per cent. It is the highest sales tax of any province in Canada, a province which has the lowest per capita income in Canada and the highest unemployment rate in Canada, and no alternatives to an industry that is threatened.

You want to think about the context of this, Mr. Speaker, to see what is happening. What does that mean? It means that the sales tax in our province, the composite sales tax is going to be something like 22 per cent or 23 per cent. That is bad enough, but I want to sketch in for you if I can, Mr. Speaker, the effect of this on the north. This does not just apply to Labrador, which is the northern part of our province, it applies to the north.

Here is a letter from the Labrador West Chamber of Commerce—now get this, my colleagues from Montreal— "While the cost of freight is a very real portion of our 22.5 per cent of higher-than-Montreal cost there are several other real factors. Remember, freight is going to be taxed. Not just the goods in northern Canada are going to be taxed, but freight is going to be taxed. It was not taxed under the manufacturers' tax. It was not taxed before, it is going to be taxed now.

In addition to freight, vehicles take a severe beating from the intensely cold weather. Heat is costly because of such winters. Wages are high because of higher living costs. One of those high living costs is medical. When surgery or dental work or special treatments forces us to travel to St. John's or Montreal, only a small portion of the necessary travel expenses comes back in reduced personal taxes.

The letter states: "I experienced a dose of this when my wife had open-heart surgery in Montreal. It cost me thousands of dollars to stay with her until she was out of danger and then to visit her weekends until she could be flown back to Labrador City. My costs were in no way tax deductible. They were just part of the high cost of living in Labrador West."

• (1720)

Those things are going to be taxable from now on. What is going to happen to people who live in the extremities of this country, to marginal people who have no alternatives? What is going to happen to them? There are no answers for these people. There are no answers for the people in Canada's north. There are no answers for the Inuit who live in Inuvialuit or Thompson, Manitoba, or northern British Columbia, or Dawson City in the Yukon. What are the answers for these people? What is the plan of the Government of Canada to alleviate the position of those people? Does it understand what is going to happen in 1991 when the sales tax comes into effect?

I have tried to tell you, Mr. Speaker, and I have got two minutes left, of what is going to happen in our province. What is going to happen? Not just a browbeating that Mr. Specter threatened on the Government of Newfoundland if they did not play ball—not just a browbeating. They are not going to do anything to help our fishery, as far as I know. They have not told me what it is. They are going to cut out our unemployment. They are going to gut our unemployment insurance scheme. They are allowing regional development funds, according to Decima, to fall down. Now they are imposing a sales tax on us in the north, 20 per cent higher than Montreal, a composite sales tax of 24 per cent. That is not a browbeating. What they have said to Newfoundlanders is: "We are going to knock your head off. We are going to knock your block off". That is the attitude of the Government of Canada in this case.

I plead with the members of the House to understand that in regions of this country and in the northern part of this country there are vulnerable people. If the government goes ahead willy-nilly, no holds barred, no alternatives with this tax, we will be at risk. Not only will our livelihood be at risk, but our homes, communities and families will be at risk. I say to the Government of Canada at that time it will be accountable.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have this opportunity twice in a day, and particularly with my hon. friend from Labrador. I only have five minutes, unfortunately. As he knows, I probably could go on forever. I will try to be brief and respond to the four main points that he makes.

To suggest that the fish stock problem in Canada is the responsibility of this government or, if I may suggest, any one government, shows that the the hon. member is not recognizing the complexity of the situation that led us here and, I fear, the complexity of the problem that we face and the solutions that we need to address them.

Make sure that the hon. member and all hon. members recognize, as has been made clear in the House since the spring of last year, that this government sees the fish problem in Atlantic Canada as a national economic issue. The Prime Minister has made it such in our dealings around the world and in this country with the appointment of a committee of senior ministers and senior public servants to do two or three things. First, what really is the problem? What really will be the ramifications of that problem? What are the legitimate options that we as a government, that we as a country have in dealing with that problem, which first and foremost is the welfare of people and of communities? That is why this government has made this a national economic issue.

With respect to changes in the unemployment insurance system, fishermen are not affected by unemployment insurance. The changes in unemployment insurance do not affect fishermen, the only self-employed people in this country who can avail themselves of unemployment insurance. It remains untouched. The premiums, in fact, may be higher than they are today, but they will be lower than they were last year.

Mr. Mifflin: What about the plant workers?

Mr. Reid: The plant workers, as is the case with fishermen, the government has repeatedly implemented emergency response programs which will respond to the needs, the short-term immediate needs of the plant workers who have faced problems and who face problems.

Mr. Harvard: Do you believe that?

Mr. Reid: Absolutely, I believe that. The hon. member said that regional development has been short changed. In the last two years more money has been spent on regional development in Atlantic Canada than has been spent in the last 25 years. This year alone we are spending $500 million. In the next five years we will spend an average of $420 million, up from the previous five year average of $280 million, up from the previous five years of the government of the hon. crowd opposite of $185 million.

If that is denying Atlantic Canada the important regional development the support that it needs, then there is nothing we can ever do. Regional development is clearly a major part of an over-all economic government platform.

Very quickly, if I may, sales tax on freight is a business input. The 9 per cent is applied to the whole thing from start to finish. There is no freight on food that is taxable. The basic necessities are there. With medicine it is the same thing.

In Labrador West of all places, with the resource-based industry, with such heavy industrial capital base, this tax is of greater benefit than in most places. If we have constrained growth of $9 billion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the member but I must give some time to the member from Labrador to reply.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, I will convey the remarks of the hon. member to the Chamber of Commerce in Labrador West. Perhaps they might want him to speak and explain to them how the sales tax is going to be of benefit to them.

Even conceding to him, and, if we are going to be fair, I suppose we have to concede to him, the fish crisis just did not start last night or yesterday. Conceding that to him and conceding that maybe the responsibility for the crisis in the fish stocks has to be shared, it is not the simplest or most complex matter. One thing that is very simple is this. Any compensation package is clearly the responsibility of the present government, the treasury benches that sit opposite.

I heard a figure of $1 billion that was announced. Indeed, that government that sits across the way, those same treasury benches, were very generous to the farmers of western Canada. The Minister of Agriculture, who comes from that area, was very generous to the farmers of western Canada. We agree that there is a crisis in the fishery and that the stocks are threatened. He says the responsibility for that is shared. Let us concede that he is right. Would he also agree that the responsibility for compensation is clearly only at the door of the present Government of Canada? Would he also agree that there has not been, so far, one cent of the $2 billion forthcoming even though people are in dire straits in our province at the present time?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I rise today to participate in this debate and to talk more about regional funding as my colleague from St. John's has just mentioned and, specifically, how over the past two years this government has done more for regional assistance than any other government. I would also like to talk about western diversification and what we are doing in Atlantic Canada under ACOA as well as FEDNOR with the head office in Sault Ste. Marie.

On August 4, 1987, the government announced a major new initiative to bring the west more fully into the mainstream of national economic development, ready to respond to the changing global economic realities. Much has been done in the two years to achieve that aim.

Despite the present period of fiscal restraint, the national challenge has been to reduce the federal deficit. We are working to continue with even more energy-wise ideas and more commitments into our regional areas to make sure that they receive not just the same amount of funding as last year but, indeed, increased funding.

Western diversification has been increasing its spending. In 1987-1988 our cash outlay was $52 million. In 1988-1989 this increased to $145 million. For the 1989-90 fiscal year our Main Estimates show $287 million. Compared to actual expenditures last year, the Main Estimates tabled in 1989 provide for a $142 million increase. That is a $142 million increase for western diversification.

Funding expectations have been very high, and in a period of fiscal restraint, not all expectations can be met, nor should all of them be met. But the government remains highly committed, as these increases for expenditures show, to major regional development, especially efforts in the west and in our eastern regions in Atlantic Canada.

The government established the Department of Western Economic Diversification in response to special needs of western Canadians. This government recognized that the economic challenges of each region of this country differ and that a new and innovative way of dealing with economic development was needed. Western Diversification and ACOA reflect this new approach.

To ensure success Western Diversification's mandate was kept simple with three main objectives: First, to provide responsible leadership for economic development in the west; second, to undertake a strong advocacy role in order to represent western Canadian views in decision–making process here in Canada; and, third, to use widely accepted business principles in establishing a program in support of diversification. The act was passed and proclaimed on June 25, 1988.

WD has taken on a new task and its officials keep plugged in to interdepartmental policy processes here. They keep plugged in to the day–to–day processes of the government in order to ensure that the interests of western Canadians are fully considered here in Ottawa and are listened to very clearly in our offices across the west.

Western interests are also being pursued with the cabinet in a number of key areas. The main one I want to talk about is the procurement and development of national resource policies.

The Western Procurement Initiative, WPI, which was announced in July, 1988, was a specific move for western Canada. First, increasing the level of high value added. Second, discretionary procurement funding to be sourced in the west by an increment of $600 million over four years has been set aside. Third, making best efforts to designate significant portions of major Crown projects for sourcing in the west, and only in the west. Fourth, putting the full weight of the Western Diversification fund behind efforts to pre–position western suppliers so that they may be better prepared to compete for public sector contracts. Fourth, working with provincial governments to ensure an effective network is being put behind a supplier and in the pre–positioning of suppliers to bid on government procurement contracts.

Presently, a procurement memorandum of understanding is being drawn up with the Departments of National Defence, Supply and Services, Industry, Science and Technology, and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

Western Diversification works with other departments. For example, it works and shares with Agriculture Canada on biotechnology and in soil conservation; with Energy, Mines and Resources on clean, low sulphur coal.

To be eligible for WD assistance, projects have to relate to new products, new markets, new technologies, increases in productivity or import replacements. Western diversification supports both individual commercial projects and systemic projects. We do not take an equity position at all. If a decision is made to invest, WD normally does through a repayable contribution. If the project is successful, the government will be repaid. If it fails, we share in the losses. There are no application forms.

We encourage entrepreneurs to come into the department with a two–page summary outlining their idea so we can sit down and discuss it before any moneys are expended with long term work projects.

Nearly 1,200 projects have been approved to date; 85 per cent of them are small businesses. We recognize and know the importance of small business in the western part of Canada. The department does not provide assistance for modernization, nor does it for expansion. We are looking for unique ideas for diversification. In the 25–month period that western diversification has been in operation there have been 6,800 projects submitted, 1,158 approved for funding, 4,006 rejected and we have 1,718 in process.

I would just like to mention a couple of small projects from my province. A small Alberta company received a $10,000 contribution toward the cost of developing prototypes for new products for the physically handicapped. Pro DentLaboratory of Calgary received a repayable contribution of $216,648. The first advanced industrial materials initiative in western Canada was launched in partnership with the Government of Canada, the Government of Alberta and Sheritt Gordon Limited. This is great initiative. It shows that we are working together.

This work is not all done in isolation in the west. Western diversification works extremely closely with other federal departments and agencies. We rely on it to assist us on complex, analytical or political issues.

Fundamental problems of the west cannot be resolved quickly or simply through the expenditure of government funds. Financial assistance can be effective if used strategically to help get new initiatives off the ground and to create new opportunities, in particular for the western economy.

The Budget shows the government's strong commitment to regional economic development in the coming years. Over the next five years, we expect to spend a total of $1.8 billion on regional development in western Canada. This is an 85 per cent increase relative to the $980 million spent on western regional development over the last five years. It is interesting. There is $242 million in new funding for a new federal–provincial agreement in western Canada as well.

I also want to talk a little bit about federal regional development in Atlantic Canada. To date, federal spending on regional development has been through action programs as well as through co–operative programs. During the period of 1979–84, expenditures were $185 million. During the period 1984–89, expenditures in Atlantic Canada were $282 million and during the period 1989–94, the expenditure averages are forecast at $425 million.

My colleague from St. John's East said so very clearly that Atlantic Canada has strong opportunities and strong regional support, the greatest since World War II. Take a look at its unemployment rate. As my colleague said it has fallen in P.E.I., it has fallen in Nova Scotia and it has fallen in New Brunswick and in Newfoundland since we took office.

I can assure hon. members that this government supports the Atlantic Canada Opportunity Agency. We stand behind that agency. We like what it is doing. We like what FEDNOR is doing for northern Ontario and we like what western diversification is doing for western Canada.

It has been a pleasure to participate in this debate, Mr. Speaker. I want to assure you and our colleagues on the other side of the House that there is no neglect to the regions of this country and we stand behind diversification in all the regions.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the discourse of our colleague across the way and I want to ask her a question.

The hon. member spoke of regional development and of other interesting issues. More specifically, I want to know whether she is in favour of the goods and services tax, first, as is presently proposed by the Minister of Finance. Second, I want to ask her about the following: The Minister of Finance said today that the goods and services tax was a component of the government's program to lower the deficit.

Given that the Minister of Finance said on June 18, 1987 that this tax would be revenue neutral, I wonder whether my colleague can tell me how a revenue neutral tax can possibly reduce the deficit.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I was just opening the technical book on the goods and services tax. I do believe my colleague's first question had to do with whether I was in favour of the proposed goods and services tax.

• (1740)

I guess you have to understand where we are coming from and maybe it takes time to explain that what we have in place, the federal sales tax, or the manufacturing sales tax, was initiated in 1924 when 85 per cent of the employment was in the manufacturing industries here in Canada and actually less than 10 per cent, probably about 8.5 per cent employment was in the service industry.

Life has changed as obviously we have evolved over the last six decades and we are now in an era where over 70 per cent or 75 per cent of the people in Canada are employed in the service industry rather than what I would call the manufacturing industry or the resource industry. So that has changed completely.

In 1924 there was a tax applied on manufactured goods only, and that was applicable at that time. But today life has changed and we have a average 13.5 per cent tax applied to the manufacturing industry. This is not fair. This is why our Minister of Finance is moving to broaden the base and to bring in other industries and services so that we are all treated equally, and it is an equitable position. Yes, I am in favour of a goods and services tax, but we have to have a package. If we want to have certain exemptions, basic foods, health care costs, certain dental care services, municipalities, universities, schools, hospitals, and certain legal fees exempted, and so they should be, then we need a 9 per cent tax.

The Minister of Finance must have a 5.5 per cent rate if he is to obtain $18.5 billion which is raised today from the old, archaic, obsolete tax. We have to have the $18.5 billion.

The Minister of Finance is going to implement a goods and services tax credit that will assist lower income Canadians. He is going to lower the rate of tax from 26 per cent to 25 per cent for middle income Canadians. This is stated in his technical papers. If he is to have this, and if he is to have the exemptions, it works out to the 9 per cent. Therefore, if you want to lower the rate, you have to broaden the base.

The second question my colleague asked was with regard to revenue neutral. Certainly, this has been discussed quite a bit recently and I do believe some months ago the minister did mention revenue neutral.

The tax that we have today which raises the $18.5 billion has 22,000 exceptions and has hundreds of people who avoid or get out of paying the tax. There are many manufacturing companies that during their process stage would do one value-added here, and then through a subsidiary they would pass off the value-added product into another company and therefore avoid the tax. This is happening. No one, not your government when you were in power, Sir, nor this government, knows exactly how many companies are either avoiding or getting out of paying the tax. We do not know how many people we are missing out there. Hopefully, if we are missing a lot it will perhaps gain us more revenue than what the Minister of Finance said. However, if you look at the technical papers, and at the diagrams which the Minister of Finance has put in them,he shows exactly what he needs to replace the $18.5 billion, what he needs to have the goods and sales tax credit for the lower income people, what he needs to have in order to have the rate drop from 26 per cent to 25 per cent for the middle income people, and what he needs, which is the $.2 billion, for the administrative costs.

Therefore, it probably will be revenue neutral, but if we do gain more people in the system who are avoiding it I guarantee that everything over and above is going to deficit reduction.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise in the House today to speak to this opposition motion that condemns this government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy. If anything has been shown in this debate, the last few remarks show frankly what Canadians are going to get from the government with this tax. If any government has mismanaged the economy of this country in the last five years it has to be the Conservative government opposite.

I have some information from Statistics Canada which clearly shows that the deficit has nearly doubled since the Conservatives have been in office. That is a shame from a government that preaches restraint and preaches about running a fiscally responsible government. We know that that is not what it is doing, and we have been pointing that out in the House since we have come back after the summer break.

This government is a three-letter government. We have had the FTA, we have had the GST, we have VIA now, and now we have TAX from the Tories. That stands for tax, and what every average Canadian in this country is getting from the Conservatives right now is a Tory tax.

In the next three years, in 1992, even after they have spent all that money trying to party and celebrate 1992, the Tories are going to be RIP. That is what is going to happen to the Conservative party in three years when that election is called the next time around.

Let us take a look at just what they are doing with this tax. The other day my colleague, our party's finance critic, asked a question in the House of the finance minister. This government is spending—and I hope people at home are watching now—$7.6 million on advertising. To advertise the GST it is going to be spending $7.6 million. That is not revenue neutral.

Let us take a look at what that means to people who are at home in their kitchens now, having a coffee, perhaps watching this or perhaps watching something else, or reading about this debate. This government is spending $21,000 a day, $875 an hour of our money, of Canadian taxpayers' money, to advertise this tax which is not yet law in this country. The government has had the gall to publish and spend money on advertisements when Parliament has yet to approve this tax. I read Hansard when the members opposite were in opposition and the comments they made about responsible government. Well it is hogwash, and you know that, Mr. Speaker.

Let us take a look at some of the comments that members have made and some of the comments that are in the motion today. They continue to pursue a high interest rate policy. I asked some members and some constituents about this. They said: "Let us not get into detailed questions on this. There is one answer that I have to know: Does it cost me more to borrow money to buy or build a house?" Under this government the answer is yes. That is all we need to know. Under the GST we have heard evidence already that it is going to cost a great deal more.

Let us take a look at the question in terms of threatening some of our primary resource industries. We have been debating the forestry bill this week. We will be back at it again tomorrow. There is a 15 per cent softwood lumber tariff. This government sold out Canadian forestry when it signed that deal. The Conservatives have allowed American interests to tell us how to run our forests. They have no faith in our industry and that is a shame as well.

Let us take a look at some of the questions that we have been asking about tax policy, the kind of information that this government does or does not have. As you would know, Mr. Speaker, people who live in our northern or remote areas of this country depend a great deal more on the telephone and other services.

I have been approached by constituents in the Burns Lake area of my riding who ask what is happening with that tax on our long distance calls? How much is the government collecting? What is the government doing with it? So I put a question on the Order Paper, and, yes, indeed, there is an excise tax imposed on long distance telephone calls. When filing monthly tax returns, the companies do not segregate the amount of tax applicable to long distance calls. I think they should check their computers. It is very clear on your phone bill just how much federal tax you are paying on long distance calls. The minister should give the CRTC a quick call and let B.C. Tel know that if they can do it on my telephone bill here, certainly they can tell the Government of Canada how much tax they are paying on this ridiculous tax that affects people in northern and remote communities, more than people in other communities in larger urban centres. We respect and understand that, Mr. Speaker. We do not ask for a lot. We just ask that it be fair. We are not getting fairness from this government.

Let us take a look at some other examples of regional disparities that this government is perpetuating. Let us take a look at some of the information released yesterday by the Canadian Labour Congress on statistics dealing with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Conservatives did not do a lot in my riding in northern British Columbia for many years. We are having to do a bit of catch-up work in our riding to bring the kind of representation that I think it needs.

When you ask Tories, "Well, what did you do for this area?" they trot out Unemployment Insurance Commission statistics as examples of the wonderful things that they do for us. If you follow that to its logical conclusion, the higher the unemployment, the better the Tories think they are doing for us.

This information on statistics provided by the CSC in northern British Columbia shows that some 3,600 claimants will be losing their claim, or will no longer be eligible for UIC. That is going to come to about $24 million, taken out of the northern economy.

All I am suggesting to the Conservatives is that when you take credit for spending that kind of money on unemployment insurance payments, then you better take responsibility for any time that you take those funds out. That is going to mean a lot to the people of northern B.C. We will be discussing that in Prince George at an all-northern labour council meeting this coming Saturday because people are upset about this government. They are upset about their actions on VIA Rail and the GST, on forestry, and many other issues.

I want to wrap up a bit on some of the comments made by some members opposite about forest agreements, particularly Western Diversification. The members opposite are running around extolling the virtues of Western Diversification. Fair enough. We are on record in terms of supporting the forest resource agreements that flow out of that Western Diversification Fund. It is shocking when you look at the evidence from the minister himself. No specific date has been set for commencing negotiations on new western forestry initiatives.

In this House, members are honourable and they tell the truth to this House. What we need from this government is the truth about what it is doing, what it is going to be doing to Canadians on the GST, and what it is going to be doing to Canadians on UIC. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that our statistics have shown that the Conservative party is going to cost Canadians an additional $800 to $1,000 a year. My concluding remarks on this is that when the Tory canvasser comes calling during the next election, you should ask for your money back.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On questions and comments, the hon. member for Champlain.

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I followed with the utmost attention the comments made by my NDP friend from British Columbia, and I found passing strange his reference to the Canadian Government having let forestry down over these last few years, because looking at our record since we came to office in 1984, to my knowledge we appointed a Minister of State (Forestry). As we know, the previous Liberal government completely ignored that industry which, may I point out is among our major industries. It was moved from one department to the other Agriculture, Environment, etc.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we had a commitment in 1984 when we came to office. It is a fact the Prime Minister promised in 1984 to put greater emphasis at the Department of Forestry level by appointing a Minister of State (Forestry). And so we did. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I would remind my New Democratic friend from British Columbia, a province that is foremost in the forestry area, that we increased our funding silviculture in this area by more than 300 per cent. This is concrete proof, Mr.Speaker.

I would also like to remind him that we have signed federal–provincial agreements with all 10 Canadian provinces including British Columbia. That represents over $1 billion in joint investments with the provinces, almost $662 million of which comes from the federal government's coffers.

Let's take British Columbia as an example, Mr. Speaker, since my colleague opposite seems to forget that the federal governement has done important things in that province. The British Columbia agreement, with that of Quebec, is among the largest: $300 million over five years equally divided between the federal and provincial governments. That is a lot more than what the Trudeau government did.

We have given Canadian forestry all the importance it deserves, mainly in exporting provinces such as British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker, if we look closely at the Canada–British Columbia Forest Resource Development Agreement, we see that, since 1985, we have invested nearly $39 million in the forestry sector in that province, including $9.8 million for forest research and $27 million for research funded under the Forest Resource Development Agreement between 1985 and 1990.

I would also like to remind my NDP colleague that the Canadian Government, that the Progressive Conservative Government is the Government which established the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers in 1985, and it was also this Government which finalized a national forest strategy in 1987 and that all provincial ministers unanimously agreed with the federal Government to say that indeed the forest sector is important and that indeed all together we must emphasize, develop and concentrate on this issue and set this sector of economic activity in its proper perspective.

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about more than 800,000 jobs in Canada. Quite sincerely I want to say to my colleague that if we look at the performance of the Progressive Conservative Government in the forest sector since 1984 we realize that we have done a top–notch job, Mr. Speaker, because it has met the aspirations of each province and the aspirations of a sector which was badly neglected by the Liberals. Mr. Speaker, this is a sector for which we will certainly do more in the future because we will have a full–fledged forest ministry.

[English]

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes I have left to respond to the Parliamentary Secretary's comments, I will say that we are in agreement with regard to his view on the abuse of forestry by the Liberals when they were in office. In our discussion on Bill C–29, evidence was already given to the House about the current leader of the Liberal Party who came to my home town and spoke against a full department of forests. We are glad the Liberals have changed their minds on this.

I think a lot of the Parliamentary Secretary's strong support of a renewed forest agreement in B.C. I would be pleased to send him a petition that British Columbians are signing now to get him to endorse that petition and to join with me and members of my party to support the renewed forest agreement between B.C. and Canada. I look forward to his support of that agreement with funding that will give us the adequate kind of reforestation that we need.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

THE ENVIRONMENT—VIA RAIL CUT-BACKS—REQUEST FOR IMPACT STUDY/GOVERNMENT POSITION.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pursue a question that I asked of the Prime Minister before the summer break actually but a question which is still very current. In fact, I had the opportunity to ask a question about the same thing today, namely, the proposed cuts to VIA Rail passenger rail service in Canada and, in particular, the way in which the environmental dimension of this decision has been ignored by the government.

• (1800)

On the same day that I asked the question in June, the Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan asked the Prime Minister whether or not an environmental assessment had been done of the proposal to cut back severely on passenger rail service in Canada. The Prime Minister rose in his place and said that it was a budgetary decision and that budgetary decisions are not normally subjected to environmental assessment, thus giving the lie to all that has been said in the last many months since the Brundtland Commission report came out about the extent to which this government was taking seriously the recommendations of that commission, that all major economic decisions should be assessed for their environmental impact. Surely a decision to cut a couple of hundred million dollars from the annual subsidy to VIA Rail, and knowing that the consequence would be a significant reduction in passenger rail service, qualifies as a major economic decision.

All we are saying to the government is that if you want to be true to your own rhetoric, if you want to be true to your own commitments, if you want to demonstrate that you really have entered into this new way of thinking about the economy and this new way of thinking about the relationship between economic and environmental matter, then here is the perfect opportunity. Here is the perfect opportunity to say that the world has changed, our way of thinking about the economy has changed and our way of thinking about federal expenditures has changed and before we make any decisions with respect to VIA Rail, this time and for the first time, we will take into account the environmental externalities of passenger rail service, those things which are normally not accounted for in the regular way we do our bookkeeping vis-à-vis passenger rail service.

We have made that kind of argument before just on the subsidy level. All the subsidies to passenger rail, or for that matter rail period, are all up front, they are all in the railway's books. But the subsidies to airports, to highways, to automobile use and to buses are all hidden subsidies that are kept in a different set of books. That is one argument.

An even further argument is that there is a whole other set of books with respect to the priority of one way of transporting people over another. That has to do with the environment and it has to do with safety. We know that in many parts of Canada the highways are already too crowded. We know that in some parts it is due to deregulation and the increase of truck traffic over rail traffic. We know that there is still a tremendous rate of death on the highways as a result of this overcrowding but also as a result of a way of life centred around the automobile.

In terms of deaths caused by various modes of transportation, I remember the derailment in Hinton. We have a Hinton a week on the highways and yet no one seems to take that into account. That is one thing that should be taken into account. We ought not to make that situation worse, yet that is what the government proposes to do.

Second, with respect to the environment, the government and its spokesmen, the Prime Minister and others, go all around the globe addressing problems. We have to reduce our use of hydrocarbons, we have to stem the greenhouse effect. We have to deal with the question of low-level ozone which has to do with exhaust emissions, not high level ozone and the depletion thereof but low level ozone at ground level. There are all these increasing global environmental problems that are related to over-use of the automobile. It is as simple as that.

Yet what do we have? Instead of a government that is really trying to address that, that is trying to make some of the difficult decisions, we have the Minister of Transport get up today and say that this is costing a lot of money. Well, it will not only cost money, it will cost us our survival as a human race if we do not start to make these kinds of decisions differently.

• (1805)

The Canadian people have said in a variety of ways, not just through the polls, but through the support that they have given to people who are concerned about the environment that they are willing to support policies, even expensive policies, if those policies tend toward an environmentally sustainable future. People are willing to pay for that. They are not willing to pay for the GST and I do not blame them. I would venture to guess they would be willing to pay some form of even higher taxes if they thought that they were going to be directed toward a transportation system that did not pollute or toward other environmentally sound policies.

I think the government is really missing an opportunity to show leadership here. The minister says only 3 per cent use passenger rail service. The minister cannot possibly be that stupid. I challenge the minister to try to get a seat on many of the trains that he proposes to cut.

I had an opportunity to travel on the train a couple of times this summer and I was on a train on which I could not get a seat. Yet the Minister has the nerve to say that people are not using the trains. Well, there are people who are not using the trains because they cannot get a spot on the trains, the trains are so full.

If you want to get a sleeper from Winnipeg to Vancouver next summer, you had better book now. It might not do you any good now, thanks to the proposal of the government, but people are having to book way ahead of time. Why? Because the trains are getting shorter and shorter. Why are the trains getting shorter and shorter? Because there is less and less equipment. Why is there less and less equipment? Because there is no investment. Why is there no investment? Because the Conservatives do not keep their promises.

There is a wonderful opportunity lost for the environment, for Canada and even for this government to show just once it was not kidding western Canadians when it paraded itself around western Canada saying that it would be the great saviour of VIA Rail. It lied, and that is the most despicable element of this, more than anything else.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there were times, while the member was speaking, when I was wondering whether he was talking about the same question as the one he had asked a few months back in this House, but then he finally got around to the environment.

It is a misconception in Canada that trains are the most efficient mode of passenger transportation. Energy efficiency depends to a large extent on passenger levels. VIA, with its generally low occupancy rates is not nearly as energy efficient as is often assumed.

In 1980, a study on energy consumption concluded that buses, not trains, were the most energy efficient mode of transport in Canada based on energy consumed per passenger mile. Eighty-four per cent of all intercity travel is by car, 6 per cent is by bus, and only 3 per cent is done by train.

Emissions from automobiles and buses have dropped by 75 per cent since the early 1970s. In an effort to further reduce these emissions, the Ministers of the Environment and of Transport Canada recently announced a joint action plan to put in place within five years the most stringent regulations that technology will allow to control emissions from internal combustion engines that burn fossil fuels.

This tough new controls package could further reduce by up to 30 per cent emissions of nitrogen oxides and volatile organic compounds which contribute to smog and to acid rain. It could also cap carbon dioxide emissions which cause global warming and will reduce toxics produced by the use of motor fuels.

Federal assessments of environmental and health benefits, associated economic impacts and technological feasibility will be completed within 24 months. Regulatory proposals will begin to be published within 36 months and regulations could become effective within 48 months. Standards established in 1987 and 1988 under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act will effectively lower air pollution from on-road vehicles over the next decade.

Given the above and the small amount of intercity rail travel, any shift in rail passengers to buses or the automobile should therefore have a minimal environmental impact.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on September 26 I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture asking him why the government misled the Canadian dairy industry in the spring of 1988 when the Minister of Agriculture told Canadian dairy farmers that they would preserve the underpinnings of the supply management and marketing board system in this country by simply moving ice cream and yogurt and other dairy products from the tariff list to the import control list, that tariffs were coming off because of the free trade deal.

The minister said very clearly that he would preserve the underpinning of the supply management and marketing board system by simply putting these products over so that there will not be a flood of cheap surplus processed dairy products coming in from the United States. He led Canadian dairy farmers to believe that there was some arrangement with the Americans under the free trade deal, that there would not be this challenge, that there would not be a flood of these dairy commodities coming into Canada.

It was a given that under the 1955 waiver the Americans have from GATT their market was closed to our dairy producers for these commodities going into the United States. But clearly the minister, on many occasions in the House of Commons and otherwise, led Canadian farmers to believe that the import controls on these items would be protected the underpinning for the supply management system.

On June 13, 1988, in the House of Commons, in responding to a question from the Leader of the Opposition, he said:

> On March 16 we gave an indication that would reserve the underpinnings necessary for the day to day operation of supply management.
> The commitment was that we would move the items about which the Hon. Member might be concerned, which are now on the tariff list, to the import control list.

It is very clear. It was very believable at that time. When they did put these on the import control list and quota for the Americans on January 1, 1989, the Americans immediately challenged the GATT. About two weeks ago their challenge was sustained by a GATT panel. The final decision has not been made yet but we know where it will likely end up; the Americans will have full access to our market. If that is not a complete misleading of Canadian dairy farmers I don't know what could be more clear.

I guess the most disconcerting part of it is that we have the Minister of Agriculture, the new minister who happens to be the Deputy Prime Minister as well, trying to rewrite history. He is saying this is all just a problem with the GATT, that it was not a problem with the free trade deal. Well, what was the former minister, Mr. Wise, talking about when he made a commitment, with an election coming up, that putting these items on the import control list would preserve them.

Now we have the Minister of Agriculture saying this is not a free trade problem, this is a GATT problem. What poppycock. Here you have two countries in a free trade zone, one with a total ban on all our products going into the United States, and when the Canadian Government put these items on the import control list immediately the Americans challenged it. Clearly there was no understanding, no arrangement under the free trade deal. The former minister totally misled the dairy farmers. The new minister is trying to rewrite history saying: "Oh well, there is no problem with the free trade". If there is no problem with the free trade deal, why is it that what the former minister promised to do is not working. It was challenged by the Americans at the GATT. That is right, it was challenged by the Americans. If you had a deal with the Americans under the free trade agreement, how come they challenged it at the GATT? Because you did not have a deal, that is the problem. We have got the worst possible precedent coming at the worst possible time because some time this winter we are going to negotiate the new arrangements under Article 11 of the GATT as to how it will protect supply-management.

The Americans have a panel decision to open the market totally for ice cream and yogurt and a whole list of other dairy commodities. They can take that into those negotiations to destroy the whole supply-management system, which is what they have been trying to do for years so they would have total access to our markets. This has just put the whole dairy industry into complete torment as to whether or not supply-management systems for the feather and poultry industry can be maintained in this country. Clearly, we are the only country in the world that I know of that uses Article 11 of the GATT to use import controls to maintain the supply-management system. So the whole system is in serious jeopardy.

Farm quotas dropped in price by 50 per cent earlier this year with some banking institutions. The value of quotas is in jeopardy. The farm mortgages on supply-management farms are in jeopardy. The whole income support system and the whole livelihood of literally tens of thousands of farmers in this country are in jeopardy because of this action and because the government did not have in place a proper mechanism to control imports under the free trade deal with the United States.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member for Algoma that this government remains committed to supply-management as an important part of Canadian agriculture policy. The hon. member has suggested that the recent GATT panel ruling on Canadian import controls for ice cream and yogurt represents a failure on our part to protect Canadian supply-managed producers.

I would like to remind him that it was at the request of dairy producers that we added these products to the import control list under GATT Article 11 in January 1988. To quote the dairy farmers of Canada, they wrote in November 1987: "It is imperative that the Minister for International Trade take action, without further delay, to amend the import control list—to include those products for which coverage is currently not provided".

Article 11 is designed to allow countries to regulate imports in support of national supply management programs. Canada is a member of the GATT. We have to obey the rules, and that includes using the import control list.

The U.S., which is the largest exporter of ice cream and yogurt to Canada, complained that this action did not meet all the requirements of Article 11. The U.S. pursued this complaint under the GATT dispute settlement system. The GATT panel ruled that Canadian import measures on these products were not fully consistent with our obligations under GATT.

Let us also be clear about something else. The ruling was limited to two specific products. The panel's findings have no direct implications for the chicken, turkey and egg sectors which also have supply-management systems in place. We firmly believe that our supply-management programs conform with the regulations under GATT.

With regard to the GATT panel ruling, we are working closely with the dairy industry to develop a response to the panel report. We do not intend to make any immediate changes to our dairy policy.

The GATT ruling illustrates just how important it is for us to clarify the definition and the use of Article 11 during the current round of multilateral trade talks in Geneva. The panel ruling is based on rules that were negotiated in 1947. Results of the current multilateral trade negotiations will determine the rules which will govern trade into the 21st century.

As the hon. member has pointed out, the U.S. does not allow our ice cream and yogurt access to its market, and he is right in calling it unfair. We agree that it is unfair. That is why we are actively pursuing international trade reform. We want to see fair and equitable trading rules that apply to everybody in the international marketplace.

The hon. member should keep in mind that the president of Dairy Farmers of Canada stated in a press release issued on September 22, 1989: "Following our consultation with the Minister of Agriculture and officials of External Affairs, we are confident that the Canadian Government will vigorously defend the interest of supply-management in dealing with this issue as well as within the current GATT negotiations".

Adjournment Debate

TRANSPORTATION—VIA RAIL SERVICES/GOVERNMENT POSITION.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity during the adjournment debate to explain why I am dissatisfied with the government's answer to my question on VIA Rail in June of this year. I am as dissatisfied with the answers then as I am with the answers today and yesterday and the day before. Clearly this government has an extremely shortsighted view of Canada and its transportation system.

I would like to start my brief comments by quoting from a letter that was published in one of the Toronto papers. It was written by a Michael Coo of Toronto. It starts by saying:

> Transport Minister Benoit Bouchard, while expressing his horror at the cost of VIA Rail to the Canadian taxpayer, went on to give his vision of Canada's transportation future—one populated with private automobiles and airplanes. I have two comments.
> Bouchard says that $500 million is too much to spend (notice that the Conservatives never refer to this money as an investment) on a transportation service that is used by only 6 per cent of the Canadian travelling public. He claims that airlines, cars and bus companies all recover more of their costs than do the trains of VIA Rail. Our transport minister can only make this claim because some serious social costs are not factored into this deceptively simple equation.

He goes on to say:

> There's the cost to the Canadian taxpayer, for example, of the 6,000 people who die in traffic accidents each year; and the 60,000 others who are injured. Imagine the equation if these costs were included. And that is strictly economic. It does not cover the emotional trauma of the friends and relatives of the victims.

Let me deal with that for a moment. We have a number of modes of travel in this country. Rail is the safest method of moving people from place to place. It is the most efficient in terms of fossil fuels. It could be made more efficient by electrification of the lines which would also reduce the impact on the environment and increase the speed. While the most environmental friendly method of moving people and goods is marine transport, in terms of land transportation, rail is the most environment friendly.

The next most environmental friendly mode is air travel. It only creates four times the amount of pollution as trains do in Canada. These are Canadian figures done by the Department of Transport.

The transportation mode with the most negative impact on the environment is automobiles. They contribute 17 times more carbon dioxide to the atmosphere in Canada than all of rail travel, both passenger and freight.

When this writer talks about an investment, and he talks about it in the context of an investment in safety, we also have to talk about it in the context of the investment in the future of this country and this planet in terms of minimizing our abuse of the planet we live on. Rail travel is a key element. So when we talk about the cost to the taxpayer, it is cheaper for us to provide a subsidy for a rail passenger service than it is for us to spend billions upon billions of dollars to promote road travel through the construction of ever larger highways, with more ribbons of concrete and asphalt from coast to coast. We have to keep that in mind when we talk about the cost.

That is not to say that we have to accept what VIA is doing and I, for one, do not. VIA was saddled with a situation, in reality, that was designed to fail.

I am sure the hon. parliamentary secretary will agree with me when I say that the reason his government has the ability to do what it intends to do about VIA Rail is because of the lack of legislative framework and the lack of investment by the previous government.

• (1825)

The Minister of Transport talked today about the billion dollars that has been poured into VIA Rail over the last number of years. I agree with him, a lot of it has been wasted because we have been repairing junk. We have been trying to keep junk on the rails, as opposed to what this government promised it would do in 1984 when it got elected. It did part of it. It restored some of the routes that the Liberals had cut. Now the government is going to cut them again. It bought new locomotives. Unfortunately, the new locomotives have to be hitched on to old locomotives which can provide the heating and the power for the junk that is being hauled behind them. What the government did not do was to buy the new rolling stock.

The former Minister of Transport, the Hon. Don Mazankowski, worked with VIA. VIA worked with the Transconsortium. Bombardier and UTDC CanCar came up with a design and a price. The government said no, it was too expensive. Transconsortium came back to the government and said, "Okay, we understand you have money problems. We will finance this operation. We will finance the construction of new equipment for VIA Rail and lease it to you". What did the government do? It said no. This is the privatization government. It had an offer that it should not have refused but it did.

I realize my time is very tight. Let me conclude by saying that my party is not going to stop until we convince the government that what it is doing about VIA Rail is wrong. It is wrong environmentally. It is wrong socially. It is wrong economically because the cost of shutting down VIA Rail will cost more than what is going to be saved by reducing the subsidy levels.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on May 3 of this year VIA Rail Canada was given new reference levels and was asked to submit to the government a new business plan which would respect new budget realities. This business plan was submitted, as requested, on June 30, 1989, and is currently under consideration. An announcement will be made in due course.

I would remind the hon. member opposite that Canadians are currently faced with a national debt which costs us $90 million a day. The subsidy paid to VIA Rail has increased steadily. It now exceeds $600 million yearly. Indeed, in 1988 alone this subsidy cost taxpayers $1.5 million a day, or $100 per passenger.

We simply can no longer afford this drain on the public purse, particularly since ridership has decreased by 20 per cent since 1981. In fact, rail passenger services currently retain only 3 per cent of the total Canadian intercity passenger traffic.

With 84 per cent of Canadians travelling by automobiles, and goodness knows Canadians have a love affair with the automobile, I believe that the message is loud and clear. We can no longer afford a service which is costing more and more and being used less and less.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, September 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C–29, an Act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be read the second time and referred to a ligislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Debate. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria).

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to take part in the debate on Bill C–29, an Act to establish the Department of Forestry. You may rest assured that I have no intention of voting against this Bill. It would be tantamount to voting against trees, or against nature, and I am not against nature any more than I am against motherhood or apple pie. I don't think you have any reason to worry about that. And I am sure my colleague opposite is delighted to see that I intend to support this Bill.

[English]

Canada needs Bill C–29 but, of course, it needs more than that bill. When I say that it needs Bill C–29, it needs it because the legislation will consolidate many government activities pertaining to forestry which are right now spread among a variety of different ministries. When I say that it needs more than Bill C–29, or it needs Bill C–29 and much more, I mean that the forestry minister will not have much power under this legislation, simply because he or she will have to obtain funding from other departments in order to embark on federal–provincial reforestation programs, in order to arrive at agreements between the federal government and the provinces, and also in order to actually get the funding to do his job as a minister.

I am going to touch on the federal–provincial agreements in a moment, but first I would like to talk about an experience in my own constituency.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, about 50 kilometres from Ottawa, in the beautiful riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, there is a forest, the Larose Forest, which covers a hundred square kilometres and where 18 million trees have been planted, most of them by hand. All this was the work of a genius by the name Ferdinand Larose. In 1900, Mr. Larose, a resident of the area and agronomist for the counties of Prescott and Russell, had the brillant idea, Mr. Speaker, to start a reforestation project in what could be called the desert area of Bourget. This area southeast of Ottawa had become practically barren as a result of erosion and other factors.

Mr. Speaker, a tree planting program started in 1928. The program continues today, and Larose Forest is now the largest reforestation project in Ontario.

[English]

It bears repeating that near this city we have the largest man–made forest in Ontario, only some 50 kilometres from Parliament Hill. If you can imagine that visionary agronomer, Mr. Larose, who in 1928, particularly given his profession, was telling farmers to get off the land, to sell it to the government so it could be replanted with trees. Needless to say, there were probably some people in the community who wanted to chase that gentleman right out of town for coming up with a scheme like that.

• (1010)

Imagine what the people in the village, the merchants, and so on, were thinking, when farms that were previously occupied became vacant at the encouragement of this man Ferdinand Larose. It seems, in retrospect of course, that he was right. He had the bright idea of creating this forest in an area which was practically a desert.

I said moments ago that I would come back to this issue of reforestation and federal-provincial agreements. The reason I want to bring this to your attention is as follows: The Canada-Ontario Forest Resource Development Agreement, or COFRDA for short, has now expired. That agreement which was in place contributed to the tune of $150 million to reforestation programs in the province of Ontario. It was because of programs such as COFRDA and others in the past that the replanting of the Larose forest and probably many other similar projects were made possible.

As we are here discussing the creation of a new department of forestry—which I favour of course—I cannot help but condemn the government for the fact that forestry has suffered an 11.9 per cent cutback in 1989-1990. I am sure the Minister of Transport is terribly upset by this and that the cause of this, of course, is the budgetary cutbacks inflicted upon these departments by the Minister of Finance who is sitting almost immediately in front of me.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, forty-seven person-years were cut in this ministry, a reduction of 3.5 per cent. Today, we are talking about establishing a department of forestry but I think we should recall that, under the Tory Government, there has been no particular concern for our forests, and in fact there have been major cutbacks.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to talk about COFRDA, the agreement which has expired and which I hope the Minister of Finance, who is listening attentively, will negotiate with his provincial counterpart and renew that federal-provincial agreement, COFRDA, with the province of Ontario.

Let me tell the Minister what this has created in our province. I invite him, by the way, to come and visit the Larose forest, 50 kilometers east of Ottawa. He can jump in his limousine and I will show him this forest. I will gladly do it this afternoon as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker. But let me tell you of some of the benefits of this agreement.

Over the last five years in the province of Ontario COFRDA has accomplished the regeneration of 110,000 hectares of land; the tending of 59,000 acres; the site preparation of 113,000 acres; and the purchase of 165 million tree seedlings. Indeed, COFRDA has contributed tremendously toward the reforstation of our province.

Unfortunately, the time allocated to MPs to speak today is shorter than usual and I will have to conclude my remarks very soon. I will not be able to further state to the minister how important it is for him to contribute to this federal-provincial agreement in Ontario. I hope that I have gone some distance in convincing him, and I know that my colleagues will continue to do so over the next few minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I would like to say that today in Larose Forest, the trees are about 100 feet high. Those beautiful trees, the white pine we see in our area, were planted thanks to people with vision. People like Ferdinand Larose, people who wanted to make a contribution and who knew it was important to preserve this forest and to replant it.

My message to the House and especially to the Minister of Finance is that the Government should stop these cuts in the forestry department and enter into an agreement as soon as possible with the province of Ontario and other provinces who also need them, so that we can keep up the good work done by Ferdinand Larose and other Canadian pioneers.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a point of order the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Boudria: I was under the impression this morning that we had an agreement whereby the 20 minute slots would be split in two and that two consecutive members of the same party would be recognized. That is why I cut my remarks to 10 minutes rather than 20 under the assumption that my colleague would be recognized. If the member is proceeding with questions and comments at the present time, I apologize for interrupting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We have had that type of agreement earlier this week. To my knowledge, I do not believe we have had it today. I will ask the chief government whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I was not party to any discussions, but I was at a meeting this morning. My understanding was that we would follow the normal opposition day rotation but on a 10 minute speech with a five-minute question period. Rather than dividing the 20-minute period it would be 10, 10, 10 with a five minute question period. That seems to be agreeable to the house.

Mr. Boudria: I am quite agreeable to that. It is just that I do not believe it was said that this was questions and comments, therefore, I mistakenly assumed that the member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne) was in fact making a speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill on the same point of order.

Mr. Murphy: We actually want full debate on this issue. We do not want any shortening of the speeches.

Mr. Hawkes: Would the NDP have any objection to any other party in the house then taking the normal 20 minute rotation and dividing it between two people with 10 minutes each? They are insisting without unanimous consent we cannot change the rules of the house, but maybe we could have unanimous consent in the Chamber to take the 20 minute allocation to a spokesperson for a party and at the party's own arrangements divide it between two people, 10 minutes each with five minute questions. Is that agreeable? In that manner they could keep their 20 minute speeches for their individual members.

Mr. Murphy: We have no qualms with the other parties dividing their time whichever way they want as long as we keep our 20 minutes in the normal rotation and use it for full speeches.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Am I correct in believing that today, contrary to the other days this week, and we can take the example of the Liberal Party, they will use the 20 minutes as they see fit, and at the end of 20 minutes, a 10 minute question and comment period. There will not be ten-five, ten-five. It will be 20 among two or three speakers. Very well.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the issue at hand. I am very pleased to speak on this legislation before us. I say that because it has been long overdue. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised the Department of Forestry in the 1984 general election. We thought, on this side of the house, that he had forgotten, but luckily his memory came back.

• (1020)

Bill C-29 will, in part, restore faith in the forest industry that it has not been overlooked. The industry will be assured of a voice at the cabinet table. While this legislation creates a new department of forestry, there remain a few questions which we need to have addressed.

One of the main concerns with this piece of legislation is the lack of an adequate budget. The department of forestry saw its 1989-90 budget cut by 11.9 per cent. This does not seem fair as other natural resource programs received increases in their budgets.

It seems to me that the government is not committed to providing leadership in the development of one of Canada's most precious resource. The government needs to inject more funds into this new department if Canada is to become a leading nation in the area of reforestation.

At a time when Canada lags behind in reforestation, what does the government do? It cuts the forestry budget and slashes 47 person-years along with it. The forestry department will need increased funds and staff resources in order to catch up with other leading nations. The creation of a new forestry department must go hand in hand with adequate financial resources. Furthermore, the Minister of Forestry must be given total control over the future of his department. It will not work if he has to go to other departments and agencies for funding.

Canada's forestry industry makes a significant contribution to the Canadian economy. Canada has the second largest stock of softwood lumber in the world after the U.S.S.R. It is the third largest producer of softwood lumber products after the United States and the U.S.S.R. It is the largest exporter of lumber products: one third of its pulp exports, 63 per cent of its newsprint and nearly half of its lumber. These are significant statistics and we must look at what the government has done to this vital sector of the Canadian economy.

In 1986, after mounting pressure from the United States, the government decided to impose a 15 per cent export tax on all softwood lumber products. This measure has been a sore spot for the forest industry. In northern Ontario the 15 per cent export tax has had a devastating effect on the softwood lumber industry. It has also caused some concern to the 30 single industry towns that need this resource for employment.

In February of this year members of the northern Ontario Liberal caucus travelled extensively in order to hear firsthand from the lumber industry, labour, and municipal governments. The witnesses repeatedly told us that the 15 per cent export tax will continue to force closures and lay-offs. We were told that the expansion and modernization projects have had to be put on hold because of this situation.

There have been some major economic changes since the imposition of this export tax which warrant a review of the situation. The U.S. dollar has depreciated by more than 18 per cent. There has been an increase in Ontario stumpage and area charges. Canadian exports are lower than they were pre-1986 and the lumber industry is faced with depressed prices.

The task force was told by industry representatives that with the signing of the free trade agreement the softwood lumber export tax should not exist in the free trade environment. McKenzie Forest Products in Sioux Lookout, a very large industry and a large company in my riding, kept four trucks busy hauling finished softwood lumber products to the Minneapolis-St. Paul market just to the south of my riding. When the 15 per cent export tax was imposed, this market was lost. Now McKenzie Forest Products ships its lumber to southern Ontario.

The additional transportation charges have eroded profits it would have otherwise received had it been able to keep the U.S. market. The imposition of a further 9 per cent on transportation services under the goods and services tax will further erode potential profits. I suspect that we will see further sawmill closures and many more lay-offs as a result.

The government must demonstrate leadership in the area of reforestation and management of this resource. The forest is capable of providing employment for many future generations if the will of the government is such. To quote a representative from Canadian Pacific Forest Products in Dryden: "It was a political decision to initiate the 15 per cent countervailing duty, so it will take a political solution to remove it". For the small, rural and northern regional economies, it is imperative that this government support the softwood lumber industry by eliminating this export charge.

I read in the July 27 edition of The Ottawa Citizen that the Minister of Forestry stated that his department has prepared a proposal which would be sent to the Americans to end the export tax. The minister was quoted in the article as stating that he would present them with a proposition to test the ground before we send them a termination notice.

This was a welcome statement, but I find it kind of scary because we do not know what the Americans will say. We ask the Minister, will he succumb to U.S. pressure once again, or will he demonstrate leadership by telling the Americans that we cannot agree with this tax in the spirit of the free trade agreement? He, as Minister of Forestry, has a responsibility to Canada's forests and the industry.

A year ago this month a green ribbon review was held at the Great Lakes Forestry Centre in Sault Ste. Marie to look at the achievements and impacts of the Canada—Ontario Forest Resource Development Agreement. The review concluded that the agreement has had significant impacts on Ontario forests. There has been more forest management activity and employment because of it. The agreements have also ensured the viability of the forest industry, especially in northern Ontario where the economic survival of some 30 communities is directly dependent on the forest industry.

When the Province of Ontario signed the Forest Resource Development Agreement in 1984, it made a long-term commitment to managing a sustainable forest resource. The federal government's inaction is jeopardizing forest renewal programs in six provinces. It is undoing everything that has been achieved in the last five years if it persists in delaying the renewal of these agreements.

In 1987, the National Forest Sector Strategy, endorsed by the Canadian Council of Forest Ministers and Canada's First Ministers, urged this government to continue its spending commitments to forest resource development agreements with the provinces.

Maybe the government needs to be reminded of the forestry agreement achievements in Ontario over the past five years. As well as providing nearly one quarter of the funds for Ontario's regeneration program, the agreement helped to improve management practices on private woodlots and it has promoted integrated resource management for multiple use.

The agreement helped build some 300 kilometres of access roads which are vital to forest renewal operations. More important, the agreement funded forest management projects with 40 Ontario Indian bands. This has led to jobs for the aboriginal people. Ontario has a proud record of achievements as a result of the forestry agreement. Approximately 80 per cent of its forest management program is delivered by the private sector. Nurseries, tree planting, and road building are examples. There is no question that the Canada—Ontario agreement has played a key role in stimulating private sector involvement.

In a speech to the Ontario Forestry Association's annual meeting in February 1989, the then Natural Resources Minister for Ontario said, and I quote: "We cannot sustain this momentum without a new development agreement. Without it and without the continuity that a new agreement would provide, we jeopardize our future achievements and future gains. Without the federal contribution the amount of forest we regenerate each year simply will not be as high." By continuing to refuse to negotiate a new agreement the federal government will further damage its already tarnished reputation internationally.

The signing of a new Canada—Ontario Forest Resource Development agreement is vital to the economy of many small communities in my riding, many of which depend solely on the forest industry. In the Auditor General's report to Parliament, he urged that Canada's forest renewal efforts be strengthened with more funds and better management. He warned that Canada is not getting ahead in renewing its forests, despite sharp increases in provincial funding and co-operative cost sharing agreements. The provinces and the forestry industry need a long-term commitment from this government in the areas of forest regeneration and sustainable development. Canada's forests can continue to provide economic benefits and employment for generations to come, if they are properly managed. The Minister of Forestry must move quickly before Canadian forests suffer irreparable damage.

In order for the new Department of Forestry to achieve its goals in managing Canada's most precious natural resource, it must be provided with adequate funding and staff resources.

I urge the Minister of Forestry to talk to his colleagues and allow them to act responsibly on behalf of the people of Canada so that future generations of this country will have the kind of forests and forest regeneration that it needs.

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) for his unconditional support for the Forestry Bill. I also urge him to ask his colleagues, especially those who will sit on the legislative committee, to deal with this legislation very quickly so that it can be passed as soon as possible.

The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Mr. Speaker, was concerned that the federal Government seemed to be forgetting about forests, at least according to him.

I would simply remind him that from 1984 until today, the federal Government—that is, the Progressive Conservative Government—has increased its budgets for silviculture by over 300 per cent. I think that is concrete action that should be pointed out, especially by our colleagues opposite.

I know that the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and his colleague boasted about the Canada–Ontario agreement. I must remind them, however, that this agreement was signed by the Progressive Conservative Government.

Also, the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is concerned about the effect the new Department will have. I would remind him that the new Department—that is, the one now represented by the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Oberle)—will no longer be a Department of State; therefore, it will report directly to the Prime Minister.

Moreover, the Forestry Bill is intended first and foremost to update the regulations on wood under which Forestry Canada manages forest areas together with other federal Departments.

The new Bill will also make it possible to extend the application of these regulations beyond experimental forest areas. It will enable the Minister and the Department—and I think it is important for my colleagues opposite to understand this—to conclude agreements with individuals, organizations and governments. I refer to the famous forestry development agreements with each province. The Minister will be authorized to do so, as provided in clause 9 of the Bill.

It also provides for the tabling in the House of an annual report on the status of forestry resources and their contribution to the Canadian economy.

Also, Mr. Speaker, what is new with the Department is that under its mandate, it will oversee the development and coordination of forestry policies and programs nationally. It will also carry out and encourage forestry research and development. We know how important research and development are for the future and survival of Canadian forestry, both for local and for export markets.

So in summarizing these facts, I think in all sincerity and honesty, beyond partisanship, Mr. Speaker, that our Liberal and New Democratic colleagues will make it their duty to act diligently, first, to complete second reading and, second, to move quickly and smoothly in the legislative committee to have this Bill passed as soon as possible. For as both Liberals and New Democrats have said so well, we need this legiation as soon as possible so that the Forestry Department can have a free hand in its negotiations with the federal Departments concerned with forestry and with the provinces and the whole industry, for the sake of the harmonious development of forestry in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure there was a question. Perhaps it was just a comment.

[Translation]

I should like to respond to some of the points raised by my colleague opposite.

First, concerning co–operation on the part of the Official Opposition to pass this measure at the earliest opportunity, the fact that we have readily agreed to reduce our speeches by half so as to speed up the process is, I would suggest, a sure sign of the good faith of the Official Opposition. What we want of course is to give Members who have significant observations to make to do just that without unduly delaying the Bill. This is why we too have shortened our speeches.

[English]

In terms of the federal government commitment to forestry, the member has stated that there were federal–provincial agreements and that the minister was empowered to continue working at them. But I want to repeat what I said before. Since last summer, there is no such thing as a federal–provincial agreement on forestry for the province of Ontario. The previous one was in the area of $150 million over five years, toward replanting forests, projects such as the one I described in my own riding. Right now there is no money. The Minister of Finance is sitting right across from us and I hope he is listening attentively to this. I hope he instructs his colleagues to get on with it and to provide the province of Ontario with the federal government participation so we can continue doing so.

In terms of the federal government's commitment toward forestry, it is contrary to what we have just heard. I will just give you one instance of lack of commitment. The newly created independent forestry budget was reduced from $235 million to $207 million. I believe this is for the province of British Columbia. That is a net cut here of some $28 million. That is not what I call commitment.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Manicouagan (Mr. Langlois).

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, just a brief remark to remind my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) that, pursuant to clause 9, one of the responsibilities of the Minister will be to enter into agreements or arrangements with any person, body or government. He will have enough authority to discharge his duties. This means that the Minister may enter into agreements with the provinces, including agreements similar to ERDA subsidiary agreements. He can exercise that power with the approval of the Governor in Council.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might say in passing that the federal Government has just concluded agreements with New Brunswick under which the province will receive $91 million. It had received $77 million under the previous agreement, so this is a considerable increase in the federal Government's share in the development of forestry in New Brunswick. Similarly, Nova Scotia will get $45 million under a two-year agreement, again a significant increase over the funding made available under previous agreements.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the new Minister and his department will have full authority so sign agreements and support the growth of Canada's forest sector.

Mr. Boudria: In response to that argument, which was also directed to me, Mr. Speaker, it is true that the Minister can sign agreements with the province, but he has to go to another department, and that is even worse, he has to go to a number of departments to get the money. Yes, but this works out to the same thing. The minister may sign any agreement he likes, but in the case of agreements where funds are not involved, he needs authority. That is not very good. The fact is that the entire exercise is directed by others, not by the department. Here is an example. In the case of an agreement with the Atlantic provinces, the Minister of Public Works will be authorized to release the funds. In the case of the western provinces it will be the Minister responsible for grains. In the case of Ontario the purse strings will be held by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Member for Calgary. That is the way things work under the new legislation, Mr. Speaker, so it is not perfect by any means.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, there has been further consultations among the parties in the House of Commons. I think you would find that there is unanimous consent if we could make one slight modification to the rules that we agreed to change this morning.

All parties have indicated that it would be preferable to have 10-minute speeches, where those parties wish to have 10-minute speeches or two 10-minute speeches consecutively, but in those instances we would follow each speech with five minutes of questions and comments at the end of every one of the two consecutive speakers of that party, rather than having a combination of questions to two different members at the end, the way we have had for the last 40 minutes or so. I believe that all parties have given their agreement to that. Of course this does not oblige any party to having 10-minute speeches. They can continue having a full 20-minute speech followed by 10 minutes of questions and answers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Edmonton East.

• (1040)

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start with some general comments on the bill, by noting that it was in fact the New Democrats who proposed a separate ministry of forestry in 1983. I note as well that in 1984 the leader of the Liberal Party at the time opposed that suggestion by the New Democrats. I am glad to see that in the intervening five years the Liberals have come around to see the wisdom of the New Democrat position. It happens from time to time. In fact the Canadian political historic record shows that it happens quite often.

I would note as well that the Conservative Party promised a forestry department in the 1984 election. Obviously certain contingencies intervened and they were, how shall I put this, prevented from making good on that promise in the entire period of their first term. So, they were in the happy position of being able to use the promise again in the 1988 election, which of course they did, and I must say to their credit this time they have acted upon it. This is sufficient to render it not quite but almost unique in that entire panoply of promises that the Conservatives advanced at the 1988 general election.

However, we went through that first term of Tory government from 1984 to 1988 and it was drag, drag, drag. There was no action on the creation of a department whatsoever. Now, in its second term, it seems incredibly hasty in pushing this bill through the Commons as quickly as it can. It is a remarkable turnabout, and one that the New Democrats at least are not terribly comfortable with. As my dear grandmother used instruct me as well—she was a very wise woman—anything worth doing is worth doing well.

So, instead of rushing this bill through the House, we New Democrats would suggest that at the very least thorough consideration ought to be accorded it in this House. As well, we would sincerely suggest along with many other interested Canadians that a range of public consultations on the bill be undertaken.

If I may, I would like to quote from the September 1989, No. 23 Newsletter of the Canadian Institute of Forestry where they note that the CIF recommends that there be public consultation in developing the new forestry act. Obviously that recommendation is no longer actionable. However, they recommend further:

> —that the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries be given legislative responsibility for review of the proposed legislation and that the committee hold public hearings in Ottawa and across the country. In this way interested groups and individuals will have an opportunity to make their views known concerning the federal role in the forestry sector.

A most admirably sensible suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and one which, if the government is serious about producing the best possible department of forestry, I am certain it will want to pursue.

Such consultations can be especially important given recent events and the growing importance of forestry in areas not previously known for it, like my home province of Alberta. There are huge new projects being proposed especially in the pulp and paper realm in the province of Alberta. In their wake, these new projects are creating growing environmental concerns.

Among those developments, in the light of which this bill and this new forestry department must be seen, are the unfortunate cut-backs in federal funding for forestry related matters that we have experienced. As was reported in that national newspaper The Globe and Mail on May 17 of this year the minister himself said that, excluding FRDAs his department will have $207 million to spend this year. This is nearly a $28 million drop from forestry expenditures last year.

I understand the members across the way have been arguing that this is not a cut-back, that in fact this is an enhancement. Such a cavalier approach to the English language do them no credit but we will, of course, leave it to their constituents this instance.

In the same story the hon. minister is reported as saying that funds for FDRAs would come from general regional development allocations, themselves slated for cuts. So even in this instance we have a bit of trouble with the usage across the way.

Finally, it is noted that the Western Diversification Agency will bear responsibility for funding the FRDAs with the provinces which fall within the jurisdiction of that agency. In total, the finance minister's budget papers showed a drop from $1.4 billion for regional development spending—and this with regard to the Western Diversification Office—during the current 1989-90 fiscal year to about $1 billion annually over the next four years. The government may argue if it wishes that this is not a cut, but I think it will have trouble convincing Canadians of that.

As well, even allowing that there is substantial but reduced funding for FRDAs out there, it must be borne in mind that that funding is to be delivered through the regional development vehicles and through the FRDAs. We have a situation in which as of March 31 this year, six Forestry Resource Development Agreements have expired. These are with my home province of Alberta, with Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, and New Brunswick—a new deal has been agreed to in principle with New Brunswick, it must be noted—and with Nova Scotia, for a total of $420 million.

The programs and jobs related to these programs are thereby threatened. It is greatly to be hoped, in fact it is reasonably to be expected, that the programs will be renewed. It is greatly to be hoped that they will be enhanced. But we have no guarantee of that. Such a guarantee must be forthcoming if we are to take the government's protestations about its desires for a new forestry department seriously. New Democrats have been vigorous in calling for the renewal of these programs. We will continue to be vigorous to that end.

There is another factor in light of which the growing importance of forestry and the proposal for the establishment of a forestry department must be viewed. That is the serious concern that establishing this new department will not be accompanied by the changes necessary to make it a sufficiently significant player within the ranks of the government.

The Conservative Government is using new agencies to act as the vehicle for federal-provincial economic development agreements, including the FDRAs. In my part of the country, that is, as I have noted, the Western Diversification Office. It controls funding for forestry programs in western Canada and the FDRAs are funded out of the WDO budget.

The forestry minister has to seek funds from western Diversification before he can negotiate with provinces to establish agreements. In other words, the decision-making power over who will get FDRAs and what those FDRAs will contain does not rest with the minister. In the first instance, that decision rests with the Western Diversification Office, which it must be noted has a great deal else on its plate. So what does this tell us about the importance that this government places on its new department and its minister? It tells us that it and he are second string. That is unfortunate because the economic ministries are sort of second-level treasury boards, and the minister has to deal with them for funding of his major programs.

The New Democrats are insistent that the department of forestry must have direct control over its own programs and its own initiatives. There is no substitute for this if we are to take the government's program at all seriously.

There are problems with the bill. There are problems with the department that the bill proposes to create. It is nothing that cannot be fixed. It is not an irreversible situation. But the government must listen, and not just to us on the opposition benches. The government must listen to the people of Canada, especially those with direct interest in forestry, if it is to improve this bill as it must be improved before it becomes law. But the government must listen, not just to us on the opposition benches, but to the people of Canada, especially those with a direct interest in forestry, if they are to improve this bill, as it must be improved, before it becomes law.

While we are on the topic of forestry, and given the importance of this issue in Alberta and the likelihood that there will not be many chances to address this issue in the House at this sitting, I would like to mention a few related matters that concern my constituents and the people of Alberta generally.

The forestry projects that are coming in Alberta, especially the major pulp and paper projects, have been the subject of considerable concern in that province. The Daishowa plant near Peace River is to be constructed with the help of a $9.5 million contribution from the Western Diversification Office. When this plant proposal was announced, many people were concerned that there had not been a proper environmental assessment review. They were right, there had not been. There were no public hearings.

The company prepared an environmental report, an impact statement, for the provincial environment department. The report did not even consider the cumulative effects on Alberta's environment of the contribution that the Daishowa plant would make to pollution in the province in light of that pollution which will be contributed by all the other proposed plants and those currently in place.

In fact, there are, as a consequence of that cumulative effect, which it is reasonable to anticipate, serious concerns about the biological oxygen demand levels in the rivers affected, principally the Athabasca river, but as well the Peace river, and about the dioxin and furan emissions from those plants. Since there was no proper environmental impact assessment, construction went ahead without these concerns being heard, much less addressed. In fact, Daishowa was granted a forestry management agreement for the mill on land claimed by the Lubicon people who are currently in the midst of a very serious, lengthy dispute with the federal government. The Daishowa plant was granted land out from underneath them; a most serious development and one that does neither of the governments involved any credit whatsoever.

I should note that one of the other major mills being proposed for Alberta is the Alberta-Pacific mill, which is to be located on the Athabasca river. The review by Alberta-Pacific was, it must be said, much better than the review undertaken by Daishowa. There is, for example, a joint federal-provincial co-operative approach to environmental assessment in this instance.

In fact, I will quote from the release of the Minister of Environment Canada, Release No. PR-HQ-089-34, dated July 19, in Ottawa.

He notes that he and Mr. Klein announced a federal-provincial environmental review of the proposed Alberta-Pacific kraft paper mill in northern Alberta. He said that the terms of reference of the review board will emphasize the need to assess cumulative impacts from the Alberta-Pacific and other mills on all downstream interests.

There we have it, a reasonable approach in this instance, assuming the review to be a thorough and effective one. What was lacking in Daishowa in this regard, at least, we find at Alberta-Pacific, and that is a good thing because there remain serious concerns.

I would note, as well that under this review for Alberta-Pacific, public hearings will be held. Their effect is yet to be judged, but the hearings themselves will be held. Intervener funding will be offered and, as I said, the cumulative effects of the mills on the river system is to be examined.

Why is that so important? It is because there are very, very serious concerns about the cumulative effect of biological oxygen demand occasioned by the operations of these pulp mills. In fact, just in the last week, the Alberta environment department released the results of an 18-month study on the Athabasca river that forecast that the river's oxygen level will stay above Alberta's set requirements for oxygen levels in that river only if stringent new standards are implemented and followed.

There are environmental groups in the province, including the Alberta Fish and Game Association, who are convinced that the measures proposed by Alberta environment are themselves inadequate. But one thing is clear, unless pulp mills are stringently regulated and are subject to the most rigorous environmental standards, the consequences both in northern Alberta and in the territories right up to the Arctic can be catastrophic.

It is this sort of thing, as well, that I would suggest any new forestry department must take into account as part of its mandate. The effects on the forestry industry are every bit as much an attribute of the forestry industry as are the revenues that that industry can generate. The department must understand that, and the department must incorporate that into its mandate.

There are other things that any such new department must consider. There are questions that generally revolve around the sustainability of forestry as an industry in Canada, questions that incorporate considerations like cutting practices. I am certain many of the members of this House who have had the opportunity to drive the beautiful mountain highways of Alberta and British Columbia during our delightful summer months have seen the incredibly panoramic vistas before them as they drive those highways, and have noted huge sides of mountains stripped of trees, indeed, of virtually all vegetation rising more than a foot or so above the surface. This is clear cutting, and it is an environmentally hazardous practice, especially in sensitive watersheds. Yet clear cutting remains the dominant—to use the industry's term—harvesting technique in Canadian forestry. This is an especially difficult problem in Alberta because ours are poor grey-wooded soils where the main forest harvest is to occur, and those soils are especially sensitive to the impact of clear cutting.

Among the things this department must do, Mr. Speaker, is examine and indeed facilitate and foster alternatives to clear cutting. We must look at the diversification of those products that we take from our forests. There is a vast range of products that now can be created from forestry, not just board lumber and not just pulp and paper. The department's mandate should include efforts, in current vernacular, to "sus out" those alternatives and popularize them.

Finally, it should be noted that in our urban areas we already have forests of paper merely waiting to be recycled. And that, too, is a legitimate concern of the forestry department.

New Democrats do support this bill. We support the creation of a department of forestry and have done so for many years. But the Bill does not go quite far enough. The forestry department, as envisioned in this bill, is not quite sufficiently effective. There are changes that must be made and which are perfectly worthy of study by the Standing Committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will have the question and comment period, after Question Period. It being 11 o'clock, we will now proceed with Statements by Members.

ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, on October 25, in Costa Rica at a meeting of the countries of the western hemisphere, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney is expected to make an announcement that will forever change the face of Canadian foreign policy with respect to Latin America. For decades now, countries such as Mexico and the Caribbean Islands, who are members of the Organization of American States, have asked Canada to join in the hope that their concerns would be better represented than they are by the government in Washington. Canada has steadfastly refused, as the Organization has been perceived as merely an extension of American foreign policy and our membership in it may serve to compromise our independence regarding our own relationship with member countries.

Growing Canadian trade and a trend towards democracy may, indeed, be good reasons to re-evaluate our past positions. Any re-evaluation, however, should be done in consultation with Canadian groups and agencies across Canada who work very closely with member countries and therefore would have invaluable input into the final decisions. This is a very important change in the direction for our country.

• (1100)

I urge the Prime Minister to seriously consider not making a decision on this issue until we are able, possibly in the External Affairs Committee, to study whether it is in our interests and whether it is in the interests of member countries for us to join the OAS.

UKRAINE

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, after having recently spent some time in the Soviet Union and particularly in Ukraine, I was able to observe the positive developments of Mr. Gorbachev's policies of perestroika and glasnost. There is now a window of opportunity to show Canadian support for those changes taking place in the Soviet Union.

At the present time, Canadian businessmen are travelling in Ukraine and are considering joint ventures in Ukrainian enterprises. Therefore, on the occasion of the Prime Minister's visit to the Soviet Union and Ukraine, I strongly encourage him to take that opportunity to announce the opening of a Canadian consulate in Kiev, the capital of Ukraine. This would follow an earlier decision of West Germany to do so. The Canadian counsulate would facilitate tourism and cultural and economic exchanges with that part of the Soviet Union and would show support for Mr. Gorbachev's policies.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, this week, for reasons known only to themselves, the Canadian Auto Workers, through some representatives, have garnered considerable publicity in Nova Scotia with threats to block National Sea Products trucks from exporting unprocessed fish from Nova Scotia.

Export trade, particularly to the United States, is the backbone of the Atlantic fishery. If Canada wishes to participate in trade with GATT nations, like it or lump it, Canada must abide by GATT rules.

If the CAW can write a law or a regulation that would prevent the export of unprocessed fish from Nova Scotia and is GATT consistent, then I and many others would welcome it. Such activity would be far more helpful to the people of Lockport than irresponsible actions which can only serve to scare off potential investors from CAW plants.

REPUBLIC OF ARMENIA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to draw the attention of the House to the crisis in the Republic of Armenia in the Soviet Union, crisis caused by the almost total blockade imposed by its neighbour, the Republic of Azerbaijan.

Almost all supplies in Armenia must pass through Azerbaijan. Because of this blockade, industry is paralysed, oil has run out, rebuilding from the earthquake is coming to a halt, and food and other necessities are in increasingly short supply.

[English]

This reprehensible blockade stems from the persistent dispute over control of the Ngorno–Karabagh region. The population of Ngorno–Karabagh is comprised predominantly of ethnic Armenians and they have expressed their desire and determination to be reunited with Soviet Armenia.

The U.S.S.R. Government has been at best ineffective in resolving this dispute. We implore it to act quickly to end the blockade of Armenia and to work for a solution which will ensure the security and respect the fundamental rights of the Armenian people. We strongly encourage Mr. Gorbachev to talk seriously with representatives of the Ngorno–Karabagh regarding their demand for reunification with their Armenian homeland.

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to point out in the House today that thanks to the economic policies of our Government and the cooperation that now exists with the provincial Government, the region of Sept–Îles in my riding was selected as the site for an aluminum smelter. This project, which involves a private investment of $1.3 billion, will create nearly 2,000 construction jobs and provide permanent employment for almost 700 workers.

The Alouette Inc. aluminum project came about because of the determination of the Sept–Îles community, the willingness of German, Austrian, Dutch, Japanese and Québec investors and the participation of the federal Government in developing port facilities.

Mr. Speaker, that is a fine example of cooperation between the federal and provincial governments and private capital which is giving my region an unprecedented economic boost!

WITHDRAWAL OF VIETNAMESE TROOPS FROM CAMBODIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, as preoccupied as we have been in Parliament in the last week with rising taxes and disappearing trains, it is important for members of Parliament to raise their heads and pause for a moment at greater tragedies happening around the world. This morning I would like to point in particular to the withdrawal this week of Vietnamese troops from Cambodia without any cease–fire or internal settlement, leaving the fear and the potential crisis of a new civil war emerging in that tragic country.

Canadians will remember the horrifying reports of the killing of over a million people at the hands of the Khmer Rouge just a few short years ago. With the coming of the dry season, the potential of a new civil war emerging looms large.

For our part, Canada has been invited to act as a member of an observer team, and while western nations have been reluctant to join in without a comprehensive agreement, it does not mean we should stand idly by without making some real effort to find a resolution to the tragic conflict.

We hope that at the meetings this week in the General Assembly of the United Nations, the Secretary of State for External Affairs will use the good offices of this country to remind western nations of our responsibility and will do everything we can to avoid another conflict in that tragic but very lovely country.

CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I think it is important for the House to recognize on the last sitting day of September that this month has been declared to be Child Abuse Prevention Month by the Independent Order of Foresters, IOF.

During September, the IOF has undertaken an awareness raising effort in communities across Canada in order to diminish the problem of child abuse. Child abuse, like other forms of family violence, is an issue of grave concern, not only to the federal government but to all Canadians. Prevention of this horrible crime is our ultimate goal. The goal can only be realized through the concerted efforts of many partners, including the federal government, the provinces, the territories, community groups, professionals in the field and, most important, aware and informed parents.

The Independent Order of Foresters is to be commended for its efforts this month in helping the public recognize the problem of child abuse and for offering positive steps toward solving it.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, lives will be lost and time wasted if the federal government goes ahead with plans to shut down search and rescue operations at Canadian Forces Base Summerside. Two retired senior officers of the Canadian Armed Forces have told us this.

Lieutenant Colonel Dennis Hopping, who commanded the search and rescue squadron from 1981 to 1984, said the move from Prince Edward Island makes no sense from an operational point of view. Major Gary Naylor, who was commander of the rescue co-ordination centre in Halifax, said he expressed similar concerns in a letter to the Minister of National Defence last spring and received no reply.

Both men pointed to a major report on defence tabled in 1982 which identifies Summerside as the optimum site for search and rescue operations in Atlantic Canada, an opinion the federal government appeared to support until last spring. We know that in April the federal government announced its intention to close the base and to move search and rescue out of Summerside. This is a crippling blow to Summerside, wiping out 2,900 jobs.

A time when the fishery on the east coast is in crisis, a time when the social security net, the unemployment insurance, is being dismantled by this government, is no time to play with the lives of fishermen and mariners in the north Atlantic. I call on the Government of Canada to do the sensible thing, the wise thing, to restore search and rescue to P.E.I. and give the people back their jobs.

S. O. 31

NATIONAL PAROLE SYSTEM

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is with much regret that I inform the House of yet another instance when our national parole system has failed us. In the 1960s Blaire Donald Johnson was convicted of murder with malice in the United States. Again in 1980, this time in Canada, he was convicted of rape.

In August of this year he was released on full parole. Less than one month has passed since the approval of his full release and he has struck again. Six days ago in my B.C. riding of Fraser Valley East he was charged with unlawful confinement and sexual assault.

Clearly we live in a dangerous world which warrants strong measures in order to protect the public. In this case, the current system has failed. How was it that a twice convicted violent criminal was allowed out on our streets? How was it that the current system allowed this man to slip through? The parole board cannot be easily perfected, but perhaps at this time its parole procedures could be re-evaluated. Therefore, I call upon the Solicitor General to look into this matter and put an end to such preventable crimes in the future.

BILL C-21

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, the public hearings on Bill C-21, which changes the Unemployment Insurance Act, have been concluded. There has emerged from these hearings one common theme expressed by cities, community groups, national organizations and private citizens alike in reaction to these changes and that is one of anger.

• (1110)

The government's claim that it was introducing these changes in order to make unemployment insurance fair has been shown for what it really is, an attempt to punish the victims of the system. Time after time, government members of the committee referred to polls showing that Canadians think unemployment insurance is abused, in spite of the minister's statement that abuse was not an issue.

There is an abuser of the unemployment insurance system and it is the government through this act. Increasing the qualifying period is an abuse of the victims of the government's failed economic policies. Decreasing the length of benefit periods is an abuse of the victims of the government's failed right-wing agenda. Doubling the penalty for women who have to quit their jobs because of sexual harassment or because they have to meet the needs of their children is an abuse of Canadian women.

Canadians have told the government in no uncertain terms that these changes to the unemployment insurance system are immoral.

FREE TRADE

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to see that, thanks to the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement, Ontario-based Arriscraft Corporation has decided to build an ultra-modern plant in Quebec rather than in New England.

Next spring Arriscraft will build in Saint-Étienne-des-Grès in my riding of Saint-Maurice a $12 million calcium silicate brick factory.

That decision to choose Quebec over the United States shows once again this Government's economic foresight.

[English]

From the great city of Cambridge, Ontario to St-Etienne-des-Grès in my riding, Arriscraft Corporation will now be able to compete in the north American market and also succeed.

DREDGING OF ST. CLAIR RIVER

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a serious matter directly affecting the health of thousands of Canadians in southwestern Ontario. The Great Lakes Water Quality Board says that river and lake bottom sediments are huge reservoirs of pollutants. Now the government is dredging up these materials from the St. Clair River and dumping them in 15 feet of water in Lake St. Clair.

Today the Walpole Island First Nation announced that it is seeking an injunction requiring the federal government to cease all dredging of these potentially hazardous materials from the bottom of the St. Clair River until a full environmental assessment is completed. This project has been undertaken without an environmental impact study and without consulting the Walpole Island Nation whose people rely on the river and lake for their traditional economy.

I and the Member for Kent ask the government to stop this dredging unless and until a full environmental assessment shows it is safe to do so. I and the Member for Kent ask the government to show more concern for the health and safety of the thousands of Canadians living in the vicinity of the St. Clair River and Lake St. Clair.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River) Mr. Speaker, Canada is a very special nation, a country blessed with abundance, a land filled with resources. We are a country envied around the world, an envy that has attracted people to our land and allowed us to build a nation that provides opportunity to our citizens and dreams for our youth.

This is not a country that anyone should take for granted or treat as the stakes for a game of Russian roulette. Canada is a country worth fighting for. I call on our premiers to reach out to one another in generosity and in kindness to achieve agreement on the Meech Lake Accord, to take our nation through this first round of constitutional reform and to lead our country into maturity.

Now is the time to set aside our personal and political differences and to follow the example of the Hon. Member for Shefford.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, Canadians concerned about the environment were extremely unhappy with the decision taken by the Minister of the Environment to proceed with the Rafferty-Alameda project without holding a public environmental impact assessment and were similarly disgusted with the bungled attempt to export Canadian PCBs across the world.

Despite the public promises of the Conservatives to take environmental consequences into account in making all economic decision, we see the Minister of Finance promoting the GST without any concern whatsoever for the negative environmental consequences. Why should environmentally friendly goods be taxed at the same rate as goods and services which poison our air and drinking water and contribute to our monumental waste disposal problems?

The Minister of the Environment should hang his head for supporting a regressive tax regime which taxes recycled paper at the same rate as other paper, bicycles at the same rate as cars, alternate energy at the same rate as fossil fuels which contribute to the greenhouse effect, cloth diapers at the same rate as disposable ones.

Jim MacNeil, Secretary General of the Brundtland Commission, was dead on yesterday for condemning the Conservative government for being long on talk and short on action for protecting our environment. It is time for green taxes, not grief taxes.

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to impress upon the government the need for close scrutiny at Canada Post. The London Free Press today, has a front page story which alleges that managers at Canada Post in London, Ontario, have been artificially doctoring employee attendance records to make employees who were absent appear as though they had been present. One has to wonder why these kinds of activities are going on and why it is that someone would have the motivation to do so if those allegations are in fact correct.

I have in hand an internal letter of Canada Post dated February 7, 1986, in which one manager brings the following to the attention of lower managers. He says:

> Any raises for MPS categories are hinged directly to our control of absenteeism. Last year I got no raise! This year I want one! Do your part, it is all that I ask.

We have suspected for some time that there are bonuses at Canada Post for managers who twist the arms of people below them. This seems to be proof of exactly that kind of practice.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I will put my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Canadians learned today that the decision concerning VIA Rail was not taken as a result of the government's budget-cutting exercise as we were led to believe. I have learned that it was discussed on November 22, one day after the federal election, according to a leading newspaper.

This is an attempt to fool Canadians. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, why did the government try to mislead Canadians on this very important question?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to see a little more consistency on that side of the House of Commons. Yesterday I was accused of not being aware of what happened to transport in the April budget and that everything had been imposed on me.

Today the member stated that there was a document which was issued in November saying that I proposed to cut VIA Rail. I believe that he should make up his mind as to whether it is November or April. Please, I do not think we need two versions.

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that to the minister because I did not put my question to the minister. Again, since it was the Deputy Prime Minister who reinstated routes that had been cancelled previously and told people to "use it or lose it", I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the government is refusing to consider all the facts before taking such Draconian action against the travelling public of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, since April and even before then, the Government has been considering various factors to determine the future of VIA Rail.

I said not long ago, in fact I have been saying this all week, that we were involved in a decision-making process and that as soon as the decision is announced, Hon. Members will be able to stop relying on leaked documents at a rate of several per week, and use official documents provided by the Department of Transport.

[English]

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Speaker, nothing would enhance the Department of Transport as much as the minister leaving it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Dionne: I would like to put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. I would like to ask him if he would consult with the Prime Minister and advise him that the transport committee will be meeting at 9.30 on Tuesday, October 3, and would he ask the Prime Minister to come before that committee and try, if he can, to explain why the government is taking this Draconian action which is going to hurt the Canadian environment, is going to devastate the travelling public and is going to wind up destroying VIA Rail.

• (1120)

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I hope that the committee will do the same work that it did in 1981 when this member was chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport and he cut VIA Rail by 20 per cent.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday the government was rushing to defend itself against the charge contained in the RCMP DEA report which was made public yesterday that the government has let Canada become a haven for the proceeds of crime.

After declaring a war on drugs, the government rejected the essential bank deposit reporting requirement which I brought forward when the bill was before the committee. It sat on the bill for six months after it was passed before proclaiming it. Rod Stanler, the distinguished RCMP drug officer, left the force, saying that the government was afraid the new law, and the Minister of Justice himself yesterday said that because of failings in the law, the municipal police forces of the country are not using it. Instead of declaring itself a success, why does the government not admit that this law is a failure and bring forward amendments to correct it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that this government has taken very seriously the whole question of money laundering, also the whole question of the problem of drugs as has been indicated by the Prime Minister for a number of years now at a time when he was ridiculed by the members opposite because of the words that he used to describe the problems of drugs in this country.

On the question of money laundering, we have always taken this as a serious matter. We had this report which I should point out is a year out of date. It is a September 1988 report. Since then, we have had Bill C-61 which deals with the proceeds of crime. We have also entered into mutual legal assistance treaties with the United States and other countries.

At the last summit we agreed with our partners in the summit countries to work co-operatively on an international basis to deal with this problem.

In addition to that, the RCMP and ourselves are working very closely with the chartered banks to ensure that the practices that they are following are consistent with what is required to address this problem which is clearly an international problem.

Mr. Kaplan I do not think the Minister knows what is happening. He just said that we entered into a mutual legal assistance treaty. In fact, we endorsed it on our side, but is it not a fact that the U.S. Senate is refusing to ratify that treaty, particularly because Canada has no minimum deposit reporting requirement in our law? That is a report from the Financial Post just the other day.

I want to ask the Minister to retract the statement that we have a mutual legal assistance treaty. In fact, we do not, and we will not have one until we have a proper law in this country about the proceeds of crime.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Member is quite correct that we have indicated our readiness to ratify that mutual assistance treaty.

Ms. Copps: That's not what you said, Mike.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I just said that I agreed with the member opposite. We have not had the United States saying to us that they are ready to ratify that treaty. We have been working closely with it, though, in an operational sense, and we will continue to work closely as has been indicated by representatives of the Drug Enforcement Agency in the United States on television this morning.

VIA RAIL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Transport.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Perhaps he will stop his clapping when he hears the question.

The Government of Canada, through the office of the Prime Minister during the election campaign in 1988 promised to improve VIA Rail. This was during the election campaign, I repeat. We now learn, according to a report in today's press, that while this promise was being made, the government had already made a decision for major cut-backs in VIA Rail and the then President of VIA Rail was informed of that but had been asked to keep quiet during that election period. Why was the Government of Canada saying one thing during the election campaign while simultaneously making its decision about VIA Rail to go in the opposite direction?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will not stop clapping. It was not because the member asked me a question. It was because I appreciate the reason why his party was applauding and I will continue to clap.

Now, concerning VIA Rail, first of all the document that the leader of the NDP is referring to is a document that I have not seen. It seems to be a leaked document, but even if the document has been leaked, the document referred to November 22, the day when I was at my doctor's office for surgery I would undergo the week after. I was surely not deciding about VIA Rail.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister's medical appointments to one side, whether it was on that precise day or not, the accusation is extremely serious. The accusation is made that the head of VIA Rail knew that a decision had been made to have cuts in VIA Rail but had been asked to keep quiet during that period, and at the same time the Prime Minister's Office, in response to questions about government proposals for action on VIA Rail during the election, was promising, to quote the document put out by the Prime Minister's Office, to enhance the service of VIA Rail.

Was the president of VIA or was he not informed at that time of a decision that had been taken? Why, I repeat, was the Government of Canada, in an election campaign, saying one thing about VIA Rail and at the same time planning to go in the opposite direction?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, obviously a process is now in place for the decision making on cutbacks at VIA Rail, and this process ended or started, as the case may be, on April 27, the budget cuts were announced. Almost six months after the election campaign, the Budget was brought down in which the Government announced its intention to cut back on spending. I think this is a completely normal process. I intervened in the process when I had to, contrary to what was said yesterday. I repeat, what is important is that the corporation had to be given spending levels commensurate with our ability to pay, and this was made clear in the April Budget, but I repeat, this was part of a procedure that took several months to establish.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Minister did not answer the question. My last question is as follows: The Minister responsible for Montreal said yesterday that he did not know what impact these cuts would have on the Montreal area. However, according to recent information, we are going to lose 3,800 jobs in Montreal, 500 in Winnipeg, 300 in Halifax, which means a total of 13,000 jobs in Canada. My question for the Minister is very direct: Will he publicly admit today that the Government intends to abolish 13,000 jobs?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, of course I will not confirm those figures which, once again, are based on documents that are not official. I have no idea where those figures come from because I have not seen them, and so I see it is my responsibility, Mr. Speaker, not to confirm either the document or the figures it contains.

• (1130)

[English]

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday the Minister of Transport said in this House, and I quote:

> The Minister of Finance has decided for the best of this country to determine new reference levels for VIA Rail.

This is the first time that we have an admission by the Minister of Transport that the decisions on VIA Rail were in fact made by the Minister of Finance. What the Minister of Finance and his department know about transportation policy in this country is beyond me.

Let me address my question to the Minister of Finance. When will he table in this House the studies and criteria used by his department to determine those reference levels? We need the supporting documentation on how he arrived at these figures and perhaps the minister will be kind enough to tell us when this information will be brought to the House.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday and I repeat it today, as I just said to the Leader of the NDP, I have been a part of this decision all along.

Yesterday I was accused of not being part of the process and today your colleague said that I did in November. I think, once again, we need a little consistency. The possible cuts at VIA Rail, the cuts in the reference levels, have been decided by the cabinet.

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister that we need a little consistency and let me just clarify some information that has been coming forward.

VIA Rail in fact does use 3 per cent of those people using transportation needs in our country. But in context, the bus service in this country uses 4 per cent, the air services use 7 per cent and the automobiles on the highways use 86 per cent. So in context 3 per cent is a rather large number.

Having said that, my next question is to the Minister of Finance also. The $250 million used in your statistic, 1993, is calculated in 1993 terms. Does the Minister of Finance say that this in effect destroys passenger rail service in this country?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the reference levels were determined based on the capacity of Canadians to pay for the budget as a whole. The member gave a few figures, he said 3, 4, 5, 6 per cent, and I think those figures are accurate, but at the same time the Department of Transport has to determine subsidies or support for different kinds of transportation modes.

We have determined that VIA Rail, transporting just 3 per cent of intercity passengers, should be cut in light of the fact that in terms of the reference we had for the other modes of transport, VIA Rail was over-subsidized. This is the reason why we have those figures.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance. Because the threshold of the GST tax credit system is not fully indexed, over half a million low-income Canadian families who would be eligible for full refundable GST credits in 1991 will lose either part or all of their credits within five years. Because of this erosion, within 10 years over one million will lose their credits.

Can the minister explain why he has decided not to protect low-income Canadians?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it is quite clear that the government has been sensitive to the impacts of the indexation formula that is now in the tax system, the CPI minus three formula. As an example, on the question of the refundable sales tax credit, we started with a threshold of $15,000, then we moved it up to $16,000, then we moved it to $18,000. Now with the GST proposal it is going to be $25,000.

That indicates that we review these programs on an ongoing basis and we make adjustments where they are appropriate. I think it would be wrong for the hon. member to draw the conclusions, as he has, that in a certain period of time X thousand people will be ineligible for the GST credit. All elements of the tax system are indexed the same way and all elements of the tax system will continue to be indexed the same way. They will be adjusted as appropriate as time goes by.

Mr. Pickard: Mr. Speaker, obviously where these credits are not fully indexed, year by year, each year and every year, Canadians lose the value of that credit system. Obviously this tax must be withdrawn. If the minister is really serious about protecting low-income Canadians from this regressive GST he will not increase the burden placed on these people.

Will the minister commit to the House today to fully index the income thresholds of the tax credits and the tax credit system in order to protect all low-income Canadians?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think fair-minded Canadians would see clearly that what we are doing in the GST tax system is changing from the regressive nature of the sales tax system we inherited in 1984 whereby people who were in low-income brackets were paying 2 or 3 percentage points more of their income in sales tax than those in upper incomes. That is clearly regressive.

With the refundable sales tax credit and the GST credit that we are bringing with the GST tax system, we have changed that so that people in low incomes will be paying 2 or 3 percentage points less of their income than those in upper-income brackets. Clearly, we are moving to a much fairer system and that system is widely acknowledged as being far better than the very regressive system that we inherited in 1984.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. At the VIA Rail board of directors meeting of September 7 they were supplied with a document entitled Financial Results and Forecast, July 1989 In that document there are a number of financial statements and a number of graphs, that clearly indicate that the people of Canada are using VIA Rail in ever-growing numbers. Revenue is up from $65 million to $123 million over one year. The trend lines for every route are in an upward direction. These are VIA Rail documents and I will send the minister a copy so he knows what I am talking about.

Given these documents, these pictures that VIA Rail has that show that people are using the rails, that revenue is going up, will the minister not agree that what he has been doing is purposely telling the people of Canada one thing that is not supported by the facts?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday what I think about the kind of figures my friend is proposing. The information I have for VIA Rail is that for the first six months of 1989 the increase in traffic was 4 per cent. I believe we have to be serious. If the trains were full, if we just had a lot of money to operate the trains, we would keep the same system. However, we subsidize routes by $641 million. We have a route in British Columbia which costs $419 per passenger. We have routes which cost $325 per passenger. If it is working so well, if people are using the train that much, how can we have those figures where we have deficits of more than $600 million?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the document I have is not a fabrication. It is a document which was produced by VIA Rail and submitted to its board of directors earlier this month. That document shows that train revenue system-wide is up 14.6 per cent, passenger miles are up 7.3 per cent, train yield is up 6.8 per cent, load factor is up 12.3 per cent and total passengers are up 2.7 per cent. What this document shows, Mr. Speaker, is that in spite of the antiquated equipment and the very poor marketing that VIA has been able to do because of the cuts, more and more people are using the train, and we have to find a way to invest in rail passenger services so that more people can use it and we can lower the cost, because it is possible.

The minister knows that the costs can be reduced by investing in new equipment, and with proper operating rules with CN and CP. It can be done. Unfortunately this government doesn't have the backbone to do it.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I know that the NDP always has the magical formula. We know that, everybody knows that. But he didn't give any figures about costs. Last year, 1988, revenues were up $26 million, but expenditures were $94 million more. Is this the kind of management he wants?

In 1987 the total costs were $638.4 million; in 1988, $732 million. The costs increased more quickly than the revenues. I am not a specialist, Mr. Speaker, but normally when the cost is over the revenue there is a problem.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, but in his absence I will address it to his parliamentary secretary.

The Canadian Auto Workers are threatening to disrupt the export of unprocessed fish from Nova Scotia. What is the Government of Canada going to do to discourage or prevent the export of unprocessed fish from Nova Scotia?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises a very serious issue, one of concern to a number people of Nova Scotia. If regulation is necessary to deal with this problem, it is regulation that must come from the province of Nova Scotia. However, I suspect that that government recognizes the traps that are involved and the potential difficulties in dealing with GATT, which we all comply with and is supported by all parties in this House.

This government would prefer, Mr. Speaker, to deal in voluntary measures and to deal with incentive-based measures to deal with this critical problem. It is something that has been discussed and studied by the Haché report, which will be presented to the government and, in turn, to the special committee reviewing the Atlantic fishery.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Virtually all the witnesses to appear before the legislative committee studying Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance legislation, were opposed to the government's proposal to withdraw its financial contribution to the UI account. Indeed, employer representatives were led to say that if our premiums are expected to pay for this program then we should be allowed to run it. They then proposed that fisheries benefits, maternity benefits, and training be removed from the program.

Is this the government's intention? Is it the hidden agenda to carry out a two-step privatization of UI in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must repeat that the changes to the unemployment insurance scheme have the very definite objective of making it more efficient, more dynamic and more active. The Government is not surrendering its unemployment insurance responsibility, for we shall continue to administer the unemployment insurance fund and support training programs together with the private sector which acknowledged in a brief its obligation. And if ever Canada were to face difficult economic times, we would take steps, as a responsible Government, to absorb any deficit incurred by the unemployment insurance fund. Therefore, as a Government, we maintain our involvement, but in a different way, because the unemployment insurance reform calls for a new philosophy.

Mr. G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. When the Minister of State for Employment introduced Bill C-21, she told us that the changes would not affect the benefits paid to independent fishermen. Yet, we know that with the new Bill, these benefits will not be paid from general funding, but from contributions. For the Minister's information, changes to the type of financing of a program amounting to $250 million are real changes indeed.

Therefore, in order to protect the integrity of this program, could the Minister assure the House that the Bill will be amended so that benefits will be paid from general funding?

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, this so-call reform is really a redistribution of funds.

As I was saying earlier, when we compare our unemployment insurance scheme with those in all the other industrialized nations, we feel the need to make it more practical, more enhanced and more equitable. We have taken into account the special needs of fishermen and the redistribution of $1,3 billion will help provide social benefits, if we want to encourage the participation of women in our society; we will also continue to support needy workers.

The unemployment insurance scheme will continue to be a safety net for workers looking for a job.

[English]

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for the status of women, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. It concerns Bill C–21, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House why the government spends $8 million a year on three agencies to advise it on the status of women and then does not even ask those agencies how this legislation will affect the women of Canada? Did the minister and the government not ask because they do not want to hear the truth about women working 16 hours a day on the farms in B.C., working in the fish processing plants in Atlantic Canada, and immigrant women who are losing their jobs by the hundreds in the garment industry in Toronto? Or is it because they already know the answer, that this legislation will drive women and their families further into poverty?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, as a woman in this Government and a member of Cabinet, I must tell you that I am proud to be a woman because our Government has done the most to improve the status of Canadian women.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Vézina: We have implemented an employment strategy that takes account of women's needs, whether they are immigrants, young or old. We have implemented social equity measures and federal contract programs, to name only these, that take account of women's needs. Unemployment insurance reform is a very specific way of doing so, since as we say, the cornerstone of success is training, and women will of course have their program.

[English]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact we checked on that information with all three organizations and none of them had been consulted to date. I do not know how the minister gets her information.

I have a supplementary question to the same minister on the changes to the UI Act. Bill C–21 will substantially alter the character and the mandate of the act as the government withdraws its $2.9 billion, cuts hard–earned benefits to the unemployed and increases unilaterally, I might add, to 15 per cent, or $1.8 billion, the amount from UI to be used for developmental purposes rather than for income maintenance as constitutionally required.

Will the minister make a commitment to this House that the insurance premium funds, now over 50 per cent of all moneys available for training, will not be used to further scale down the government's contributions to training on the Canadian Jobs Strategy, from which the government has already withdrawn $700 million since 1984?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Mr. Speaker, did I understand correctly? Is the Hon. Member asking us not to use the reallocated funds for training, when statistics show us that 30 per cent of workers must be retrained to meet the new requirements? That is the purpose of unemployment insurance reform: to ensure that workers are ready to face the new requirements of the year 2000, whether they are young or old, men or women.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES ACT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. I noticed yesterday when I spoke to his old friend, Laurent Thibeault from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, that Mr. Thibeault is now starting a national propaganda campaign to try to sell the GST to the Canadian people. We also found out that the Minister of Finance is co–operating with him by sending officials around to his meetings.

In light of the fact that the Manufacturers' Association and big business spent millions of dollars over the last couple of years trying to sell free trade and save this government's neck, I want to know why this minister now is spending taxpayers' money to try to sell a deal to the Canadian people that the Canadian people don't want.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is an astounding statement. We in the Department of Finance have made an offer to any organization holding workshops or other informational sessions on the GST, whether it is workshops by industry organizations, by labour organizations, by social organizations or any type of organization. If they want to have some resource people from the Department of Finance to help explain to their membership what the GST is, how it can affect them, what impact it may have on various aspects of their operations, officials will be made available to those organization.

To call an attempt by an industry association to explain a government policy to their organization a propaganda policy or a national propaganda campaign is absolutely outstanding—I mean astounding. The rhetoric that the hon. member is using to describe these things is just unbelievable.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I think outstanding is probably correct. Maybe he should talk to Mr. Thibeault, his friend, because it was Mr. Thibeault who was telling the committee that they are launching this publicity campaign to sell this idea to the Canadian people. It is not Lorne Nystrom saying that, it is Mr. Thibeault.

I want to know whether the minister can tell us today the extent of the commitment made by the Conservative Party in terms of taxpayers' money and the extent to which officials and bureaucrats are going across this country to sell this idea to the Canadian people. I want to know how much that is going to cost. I want to know the nature of the commitment, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, so do the people of this country.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me quote Mr. Pinard, the chairman of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. He said that this is necessary to educate the public, to advise the public, to inform the public, to tell Canadians the impact of this. But in particular, they believe that it is important for their managers as well as their employees, their workers, to understand how the goods and services tax benefits the manufacturing industry in Canada.

The manufacturing industry is an important part of our economy and certainly I do not think there should be any reason whatsoever to criticize the federal government for making officials available, as we will to any organization across the country if they want to take the initiative to advise their membership of the details of the goods and services tax proposal.

JUSTICE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance regarding the laundering of drug money. The impression has been left by his earlier answers that in fact the reason the U.S. Senate is refusing to ratify the treaty is Canada's failure to produce mandatory reporting limits. If that is in fact the case, members would be upset. I wonder whether the minister would clarify his earlier answer.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, following my previous response to the member for York Centre, and in particular his allegations that the reason why the United States has not ratified the Mutual Assistance Treaty is because we did not have the mandatory reporting requirements, I did check with my officials who have been directly responsible for these negotiations.

I am advised that the assertion of the hon. member is absolutely untrue and that the delay is not tied to anything that Canada is doing but is more related to problems in the relationship between Mexico and the United States. Once those are worked out I would hope that we would have ratification by both the United States and Canada. Certainly we are ready to ratify our treaty as quickly as we can.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who is supposedly responsible for tourist policies in this country. The provincial ministers of tourism are against this new GST tax, the Tourist Industry Association of Canada predicts at least 30,000 jobs lost, and once again the Conference Board of Canada warns us that the tourist industry is in serious decline.

If the minister is dedicated to his responsibility as Minister of Tourism, why did he let such disastrous proposals be put forward by this Conservative government?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member quotes documents which are now out of date and are being changed. The conference board study was based upon assumptions which have since been changed. The hon. member should understand that from day one I have been working with the Minister of Finance to get important features put into the GST to help the tourism industry.

I remind him what they are. The first and most important is that accommodation of foreign tourists in Canada will be exempt from the tax. I do not know of any jurisdiction that has a VAT that gives such a privilege to the tourist industry. Number two, goods purchased by tourists in Canada will also be exempt from the tax. Number three, transportation into the country will be exempt from the tax.

There are a whole series of constructive proposals that the tourist association has brought forward and that I have brought to the Minister of Finance. These will be put in place. We are working with them to bring more constructive proposals forward as well to help make the tax work in a way which will not be administratively burdensome for the industry.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, I notice that he did not give the statistic that 80 per cent of the tourist activity in this country is by Canadians themselves.

[Translation]

The Conservative Government's repeated attacks on the tourism industry will lead to this industry's total destruction.

Does the Minister not realize that everyone around him, the provincial ministers, small businesses, the Conference Board of Canada again and the Tourism Industry Association of Canada are unanimous in saying that the new 9 per cent tax and the cuts to VIA Rail will destroy Canada's tourism infrastructure?

How can the Minister, as Minister of Tourism, knowing that the erosion of the tourism industry is directly due to his Government's misguided policies, remain in office, knowing that his decisions will destroy the tourism industry in this country?

[English]

Mr. Hockin: Mr. Speaker, one reason for remaining in this position is to continue my work with the tourism associations to bring them the kind of features they ask for under the GST. We have already accomplished a number and we will continue to work for others.

The hon. member's statistics are wrong. Tourism, up until the end of June, is up this year over the previous year. He is wrong on that. Second, he seems to be against us trying to entice non-Canadians to visit Canada. Canada, as an industry has enormous attractions. We have amenities, we have a culture, we have sightseeing, we have baseball teams, we have all sorts of attractions. Let's not abuse this industry, let's boost it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will complete question period with one question from the Member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception and one question from the member for Edmonton East.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence. I have here a recent DND response to a question on the Order Paper which says that no socioeconomic impact studies were undertaken on communities for which base closures are planned and neither were there corresponding studies on the impact of military effectiveness.

Can the Minister of National Defence tell the house exactly how he assessed these factors in the case of CFB Summerside?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in using the word "study" I suggest the hon. member is familiar with activities in the Department of National Defence. When he talks about socio-economic studies, we identified the payrolls that went into those communities, we identified the loss that would be taking place in those communities. We did not identify replacement opportunities or replacement economic activity. That is not the responsibility of the Department of National Defence.

• (1200)

I can suggest to him when he is saying that there was no study done on defence initiatives or defence efficiencies to the changes made in the defence bases and stations around Canada, he is totally inaccurate.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.
The goods and services tax will apply on sales of energy resources to Canadians but not on export sales of those energy resources to Americans. The Free Trade Agreement ensures Canadian energy resources must be sold to American buyers at market-determined prices equivalent to those charged Canadian buyers. In a nutshell, the double whammy of the FTA and GST will give American consumers a competitive advantage over our own Canadian energy resources.

My question to the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Is this another brainwave from the Fraser Institute, or did his boys across the way think this one up all by themselves?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should study the GST proposal, and particularly as it relates to the energy sector, because in it the current manufacturers' sales tax that is in place is a direct cost of doing business .Under the GST the input tax credit will be applied. Any of the capital investments that are used for the extraction of energy or the exploitation of energy resources will have an input tax credit. So it puts the Canadian energy sector in a much more competitive position. The hon. member, as a critic, I understand, for energy, should recognize that and should applaud it.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received notice of a question of privilege arising out of Question Period from the Hon. Member for York Centre.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Very briefly, during Question Period I asked a question of the Minister of Finance. In his answer he misrepresented a treaty we had which he claimed existed between Canada and the United States.

Subsequently, he rose and accused me of misrepresenting the circumstances under which the treaty was signed or not signed. I would like briefly, since there is an implication that I misled the House, to read into the record—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would tend to believe this is a matter of debate rather than a question of privilege.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present today yet another petition signed by residents of the area around Kingston who are protesting the closure or threatened closure of VIA Rail, and call upon Parliament and the government not to cancel in whole or in part VIA Rail passenger rail service in Canada. The petition has been certified to be in order by the Clerk of Petitions and contains 56 signatures.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, again I rise, as I have the last several days, under Standing Order 36 to present a petition to this House, certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions, from a number of Canadians who call on this government to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service. Canadians, though not unanimous are very close to unanimous on this question. They wish their rail services maintained and upgraded, as is attested to in this petition.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise in the House again today to present a petition on behalf of 41 petitioners from the Kingston area of Ontario. These petitioners are very concerned about the cut-back in VIA rail, and ask the Government of Canada to consider very carefully the cancellation of either whole or part of the passenger rail service here in Canada.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition from a number of citizens of Canada from New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Labrador and Toronto, who are concerned that the NATO-NORAD low-level flight training operating out of Goose Bay not only disrupts the lives of the people who have lived there for so many centuries but also endangers the peace in this era of negotiations.

Therefore, they ask the government to join with the Assembly of First Nations and the Innu of Labrador in demanding the government to end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in both Goose Bay and other parts of Canada, and to oppose the entry of NATO operations into Canada, including the proposed Goose Bay base and to redirect Canada's NATO and NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihoods, promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of Canadians who are concerned about their jobs, their futures, their communities, their children and their grandchildren for that matter. They are very concerned about the effect that the government's proposed goods and services tax is going to have on them and their futures.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty to rise and present to you a petition duly certified by the Clerk. These Canadians humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker. it is my honour and pleasure, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition that has been certified by the Clerk. It relates to VIA Rail and the abandonment of a mode of transportation in this country that is very important to all Canadians and a necessity. Considering the fact that environmental situations in this country are getting worse every day, we need the type of transportation that will not pollute our air and our country for future generations of Canadians.

There are so many individuals who have continued to send us petitions that I find it very difficult to believe that the government would even attempt to remove this service when fully 80 per cent of Canadians feel that this is a tragic situation and that it should be stopped immediately.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour for me to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions, on behalf of literally thousands of citizens of Kamloops, British Columbia, who are concerned that the government's intention to proceed with a goods and services tax is a very unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay. They point out a whole host of reason why the government should reconsider this tax initiative.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On a second matter, Mr. Speaker, again pursuant to Standing Order 36, I present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens of Kamloops, British Columbia, who are asking the government to reconsider its decision to curtail VIA Rail service, particularly to the regions of Canada. They have noted, Mr. Speaker, what appears to be an enhancement of the service in the central corridor of the country at the expense of VIA Rail service in the regions of Canada and they feel that is certainly discriminatory.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to present a petition signed by 33 residents of the community of Atikokan in my riding. It is a VIA Rail petition. They are petitioning in support of a continuation of VIA Rail service.

What is interesting, Mr. Speaker, is that these people come from a community that lost its passenger rail service 10 years ago. They want to join in the fight to ensure that other Canadians do not suffer the same situation that occurred to them when they lost their passenger services.

• (1210)

They call on Parliament to maintain VIA Rail, Canada's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present to the House a petition on behalf of constituents in the riding of one of our hon. members.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Keyes: I suppose the members opposite find this humourous, Mr. Speaker. But, of course, this is of utmost importance when we are talking about Canadians coming forward through their representative in the House of Commons and humbly praying and calling upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I also have other petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36 that humbly call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part national passenger rail service in this country.

MILITARY EXPORTS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Also pursuant to Standing Order 36, Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by some 25 members of local churches, including the Westhill United Church in my riding of Hamilton West. They call upon the government to provide full disclosure of all Canadian military exports, including the type, producers, vendors, purchasers, transporters, as well as the immediate and final destinations of military exports to be printed in register form and available to the Canadian public upon request.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and honour pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions duly certified from constituents of my colleague, the hon. member for Windsor West, who wish to register their opposition to the goods and services tax, and who humbly call upon Parliament to reject this tax as it will do incalculable harm to Canadians.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I am today again tabling a petition which was gathered in my riding of Sudbury with the help of a large number of residents of my riding who are extremely worried about the effects of this tax on their lifestyle, on their living. They humbly ask the government to please consider Canadians because that is what we are here for. There is only one taxpayer at the bottom of the heap. He cannot keep paying more and more. So we have to reject this particular proposal for the goods and services tax and go back to the drawing–board.

PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty and an honour to present on behalf of several thousand British Columbians petitions which humbly petition this Parliament to formulate and legislate a law to protect life at conception, a law which seeks to save the life of both mother and child.

FORESTRY

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36. I am proud in so doing to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the province of British Columbia who, on the matter of the forestry ministry now before us, humbly pray that whereas the forests of Canada have been harvested and exploited for decades without sufficient replanting and regeneration having taken place; and whereas the need for regeneration of this precious resource has never been more paramount, they urge the federal government to implement a ministry of forestry that has a great deal more content and impact than does the proposal now before us, particularly with regard to the administration of FRDA agreements, their enhancement and their renewal with the provinces.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I know we will have the support of the parliamentary secretary in signing that petition in urging the renewal of FRDA for B.C. I noticed the hon. member for Fraser Valley East is now endorsing our petition as well. The Tory caucus is finally coming on board with the new forest agreement for B.C. We appreciate that.

The petition I wish to table today relates to VIA Rail. Of course, it calls upon this government to ensure that we improve and modernize VIA Rail, not just in the heavily travelled Quebec City to Windsor corridor, which we support, but also to express concerns on the comments that the Minister of Transport made today about certain rail links in British Columbia. I think he is talking about our rail service. My constituents and constituents across this country are concerned about that.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, question No. 93 will be answered today.

[Text]

GOVERNMENT TESTING OF SUBSTANCES DEFINED AS TOXIC

Question No. 93—Mr. Fulton:

1. In the past five years has the government tested any imported substance for the presence of substances defined as toxic under the Environmental Contaminants Act or the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and, if so (a) on what date was each test conducted (b) what was the substance tested (c) for the presence of what toxic substances were tests conducted (d) what was the estimated cost of each test (e) were any toxic substances found (f) were any charges laid as a result of those tests?

2. In the past ten years has the government received any written or oral reports alleging that gasoline, oil or any petroleum product was contaminated with any substance defined as toxic under the Environmental Contaminants Act or the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and, if so (a) on what date was the report made (b) to which government department was it made?

3. In the past five years has the government conducted any tests on petroleum products for sale or in use in Canada for the presence of substances defined as toxic under the Environmental Contaminants Act or the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and, if so (a) on what date was each test conducted (b) what was the substance tested (c) for the presence of what toxic substances were tests conducted (d) what was the estimated cost of each test (e) were any toxic substances found (f) were any charges laid as a result of those tests?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): 1. The government has not tested imported substances for the presence of substances defined as toxic under the Environmental Contaminants Act (ECA) or the Canadian Environmental Protection Act (CEPA). However, the government has tested many imported products for substances defined as toxic under the ECA and CEPA.

April 1986	Electric space heaters	PCBs	$100/analysis	880 parts per million (ppm)	No–recall carried out
May 1986	Same	PCBs	Same	110–124 ppm	Same
May 1987	Capacitors in water pumps	PCBs	Same	No PCBs	No
October 1987	Paint pigments	PCBs	Same	Less than 3 ppm	No
May 1989	PCB–contaminated mineral oil transformers	PCBs	Same	699–733 ppm	Pending
1984	Aerosols	CFCs	$50/sample	CFCs present in 37 of 75 imported products tested	No–Imported aerosols not regulated
1987	Aerosols	CFCs	Same	CFCs present in 17 of 66 imported products tested	No

2. Yes.

a) Since the May 8 Globe and Mail article pertaining to the contaminated fuel issue, four oral and one written allegations have been received.

As well, several allegations related to leaded gasoline being sold as unleaded gasoline have been received over the past ten years.

b) The Department of the Environment

3. The concentration of lead in automotive gasoline is regulated under the Leaded Gasoline and the Lead-free Gasoline Regulations under CEPA. Before CEPA came into effect, these regulations were under the authority of the Clean Air Act.

Environment Canada's compliance monitoring program for these regulations involves extensive sampling and analysis of unleaded gasoline sold at retail service stations, and refinery production of leaded and unleaded gasoline.

(a)	(b)	(c)	(d)	(e)	(f)
1984	See #3	Lead in Automotive Gasoline	$5/analysis	2229 tests 62 incidences of lead levels above allowed limits	None*
1985	Same	Same	Same	1938 tests 33 incidences of lead levels above allowed limits	None *
1986	Same	Same	Same	2526 tests 43 incidences of lead levels above allowed limits	None *
1987	Same	Same	Same	2587 tests 77 incidences of lead levels above allowed limits	None *
1988	Same	Same	Same	1619 tests 7 incidences of lead levels above allowed limits	None *

*The incidences of gasoline with lead levels above the allowable limits occurred with unleaded gasoline sampled at retail service stations. The samples were contaminated with lead at levels only nominally over the allowed limit of 13 milligrams of lead per litre. At these lead levels, there is little risk of damage to catalytic converters on cars. In all cases, the retail outlets were instructed to stop sales of the contaminated gasoline, remove it and re-supply new gasoline verified for lead content.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question as enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOUVERNEMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-29, an Act to establish the Department of Forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We shall now proceed to questions and comments following the speech by the Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Harvey). The Hon. Member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne), on questions and comments.

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what my NDP colleague from Edmonton East (Mr. Harvey) had to say. I have two comments on his speech. My first one is that the Hon. Member raised the possibility of referring the Bill to the Standing Committee. Mr. Speaker, the Government decided to refer the Bill to a legislative committee because obsiously the Government wants to observe the spirit of the McGrath reform. As you know, this reform makes it possible for Members to go to the legislative committee and consider the specific of a bill.

Second, Mr. Speaker, the legislative committee will consist only of individuals who are specifically interested in forestry. This is important because the Standing Committee covers both forestry and fisheries. We agreed that it would be better in this particular case to go to the legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member and several other Opposition Members mentioned figures that appear in the Estimates for the current year, saying that the ministry's budget had been cut. I may remind Hon. Members that what they saw in the Estimates of 1989-90 are figures that are incomplete, in that they represent —At this point, as you know, Mr. Speaker, the agreements are about to expire, and generally, the agreements are included in the various budgets. Six agreements out of ten are to be re-negotiated, while the other agreements will expire next year.

It is also a fact that the budgets are always lower when we get to the last year of a series of agreements. I think I should warn the Opposition that these figures does not necessarily reflect what future spending by the Department of Forestry will be and that because we will have a better idea when all the agreements have been renewed.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that if we consider the Estimates that were tabled last February, it was said that for this year the Department would have a budget of $206 million with 1,226 person-years. Today, and this is the point I am trying to make, we are up to $211 million, with 1,328 person-years, which is more than for 1988-89. Mr. Speaker, I want to make sure all the Members are aware of this fact and are not too hasty in their judgments about the impact of current budgets on the future Department of Forestry.

[English]

Mr. Arseneault: Mr. Speaker, under questions and comments, I just want to make a few comments.

The parliamentary secretary has made some comments which I think it would be wise for us to put in the proper perspective.

What we are trying to do is help the minister of forestry by giving him a little more authority. We are arguing that we want the minister of forestry to have more authority, more money and more personnel in his department. There is nothing wrong with that. That is what we are in favour of.

• (1220)

The other thing he mentioned is that the agreements have expired and none of that money is in the forestry budget yet and that is why the budget looks a little lower. Let me tell you that the budgets for the forestry agreements are not going to be found in the forestry department. They are going to be under the control of other ministries. That is what we are worried about. We would like to see all of the budget money into the forestry department. There is no doubt about it.

Let me assure you and the hon. parliamentary secretary that we are in favour of a full-fledged forestry department. We are very pleased that we are going to have one. However, we would like it to be much stronger than that. Maybe the member for Edmonton East would like to comment on that aspect as well.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, to return to the remarks of the hon. parliamentary secretary, he suggested that the reference of the bill to a legislative committee was superior in this instance to the reference of the bill to the standing committee because the standing committee includes within its mandate the responsibility for fisheries.

This is, I will grant him, a colourful argument, but I do not know if it is quite to the point. Because the committee's mandate includes fisheries does not require it as a committee to include the question of fisheries in all of the business it does, just as the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources is quite competent to consider matters dealing only with Canada's energy resources—and, in fact, we did so earlier this week when we had the National Energy Board before us—to the complete exclusion of questions of, for example, mines. I do not recall one single question being put to the NEB regarding mines.

Therefore, it is possible for the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries to, for the purpose of studying this bill, concern itself solely with fisheries. For example, if the Canadian Institute of Forestry was to appear before that committee, I feel very confident in saying that it would be most unlikely that any member of that committee would put to that institute a question regarding fisheries.

The argument that the bill must be referred to the legislative committee as opposed to the standing committee I do not think has yet been unassailably made.

The question of the budget figures, and the contention that the figures are incomplete because we are at the end of a period during which several agreements are expiring, is an interesting rhetorical point to which I will respond. Surely, it is up to the ministry to place before this House estimates of its expenditures as complete as they can possibly make them.

If they are intending to sign agreements this year, and if in consequence of those agreements the ministry is intending to spend money then, by heaven, estimates for that expenditure ought to be included in the budgetary estimates presented to this House. Those estimates are the only documents we have to go on. If they are not including expenditures that they fully expect to undertake in those estimates, then they are to that degree at least misleading this House. I leave that to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, in response to the points made by the Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Harvey), I may recall that referring the Bill to the legislative committee will give Members with a special interest in forestry a chance to work on the Bill and thus make a contribution that will be far more useful than if the Bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries.

I may also remind the Hon. Member that I listened carefully to his speech, and that after he mentioned at the beginning of his speech that he felt the Government wanted to expedite passage of the Bill, I was surprised when I heard him say later that he would have preferred to see the Bill referred for consideration to the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries, in order to slow down the process.

I can inform the Hon. Member that my riding, Manicouagan, has a large number of forestry operations. It is a riding that needs dynamic policies for reforestation, a riding that needs research and development, and I would be very disappointed if the Bill were not given speedy consideration by the legislative committee and the House of Commons.

Throughout his speech, the Hon. Member mentioned a series of factors, events and situations which in my view confirm that this Bill should be passed as soon as possible. He referred to the situation at the paper mills. He mentioned clearcutting and referred to air pollution, acid rain and contaminated effluents.

Mr. Speaker, I think all these factors argue in favour of getting Bill C–29 as quickly as possible through the legislative committee so that it can then be referred back to the House of Commons.

[English]

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, again, I would just briefly note that the government's new found concern for expeditious treatment of this bill is welcome on this side of the assembly. We only ask where they were from 1984 until 1989.

I would say as well that we have no objection to the bill going to the legislative committee on the assumption that that committee will hear witnesses on the bill. We consider that to be a virtually minimal demand in this regard. So, if you are going to refer it to the legislative committee, fine, go ahead, but please hear witnesses.

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to support Bill C–29. In fact, I am very proud to be able to participate in the legislation that will finally create a full department of forestry for Canada. As a Canadian, I applaud this far–sighted legislation. But this legislation is also important to me as a British Columbian. It is no exaggeration to state that it could be vital to the future well–being of both my province as well as Canada.

Forestry, as we know, has been de–emphasized by previous governments. It is an attitude that is strange to me. It is a strange approach to an industry which is the largest in Canada. It is number one in our exports. It is an industry that is in a position to help meet the ever–growing demands for forest products in the world.

Fortunately, Mr. Speaker, the present government has moved decisively to support the forest sector. Now with this bill a full federal forestry department will be created, and will provide national leadership in generating and applying forest and forest resource policies. Its initiatives and programs will support the government's commitment to environmentally sustainable economic development. It will make forestry agreements with individuals, organizations as well as other governments. It will conduct and promote research and development in the forestry sector.

If anyone still wonders about the need for national leadership in the forestry sector, I would like to take a few minutes to just briefly outline the magnitude of the forest products industry in Canada.

Over $40 billion of product is produced by the forest industry. There are over $20 billion worth of exports. As I said earlier, it is the largest exporter in Canada. In fact, Canada is the world's largest exporter of forest products. We see that British Columbia probably produces close to half of the products in lumber. But if you look at the total forest products industry across Canada, you will see that Ontario has 212,000 people working in forestry. Quebec has 230,000 people, more than in British Columbia. In British Columbia we have 216,000 people working in the forest industry. Atlantic Canada which needs the work that the forest industry can provide, currently has 66,000 people employed in the forest industry. Across the prairies there are 46,000 people employed.

One thing we have to understand when we talk about forestry in Canada is that very few of our forest lands are, in fact, controlled by the federal government. It is the provinces that control the forest lands. There is a need for this government to provide leadership, but it has to be done in a co-operative manner. It is this government over the last five years that has shown the initiative to initiate that leadership and the mood of co-operation that is essential.

• (1230)

It is far more than what we have done and are doing in terms of jobs. This is an industry for the future. It is for that reason that I feel it is imperative that this new forestry department is in a position to provide the leadership and the co-operative approach to develop our future.

When speaking to this bill everyone in the House has acknowledged this government and its initiation of the FRDA projects across Canada which have been universally acceptable. They are considered by all Canadians to have finally put the emphasis in forestry where it should be. That has been done in co-operation with the provinces.

Many people have said that the FRDA projects are replacing forests that have been taken by industry. That is really not how we have used these FRDA dollars. I would like to emphasize that there are many things that can impact our forest land. There are natural growth stands that are too thick and therefore produce crops that are unhealthy and do not have good trees. We have lands destroyed by forest fires that have not naturally regenerated. In many parts of Canada thousands of acres have been hit with the blight of various diseases that affect our trees. It is these areas of Canada, insufficiently restocked areas of our forest lands, that the FRDA projects have been attacking over the past four years.

It is in fact to the future that we should look with these. We could double the volume of logs now brought in to the forest industry if we properly farm our forests. If we do the thinning, natural fertilizing, and the proper processing of those forests, we can double the amount of fibre that we take off those lands. We also have the capacity to use the wood that is now considered waste.

For instance, 50 per cent of the wood that is brought into the sawmills is not utilized in forest products per se. It is either burnt or consumed as energy. All that 50 per cent waste is potentially usable fibre, and it is learning how to use that fibre that will create many of the jobs we require in the forest industry.

There are also many new products that this government can help ensure that get past the point of just talking about and that we actually get into the process of producing and exporting.

There is another area I would like to mention. The environmental ramifications of the forest industry have been mentioned by many people. We cannot just log the forests. We have to do it in such a way that it meets the demands that we place on it for proper environmental use. It has to be done so that all the industries that want to share our forest resources are in a position to do so. Meeting that challenge and demand is going to be where this new department of forestry can paste its brightest star on the calendar board.

I know that many have criticized the budget. They say that the budget for the forestry is not sufficient, that we should be putting more money in it. We cannot just throw money at these problems. The Canadian public expects us to do more for less in this government.

We will do well to follow the example of many industries in Canada and the United States which have shown that the pursuit of excellence is possible and that we can in fact address and solve the problems exercising leadership and co-operation. Hopefully we will not have to go to the Canadian people for vast sums of money to achieve that.

In closing, I would like to say that this bill is about our commitment to a vital industry and it is about the commitment to the birthright of our future children.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the member on his speech. He is a fellow British Columbian whose riding actually abuts mine. I certainly welcome his contributions.

I have a brief comment and a question or two for the member. The parliamentary secretary earlier in debate today made a comment that I would like some clarification from the member on, if he is able to give clarification. He stated that the legislation has to be passed before we can get on with the renewal of new forest agreements. I do not know if the parliamentary secretary is sure of that comment. As a government member from Cariboo—Chilcotin, perhaps the hon. member can give us some clarification. Clearly that has not been part of the discussion to date on renewed forest agreements. This is certainly the first comment we have heard that this legislation has to pass before any new forest agreements can be approved. It is those forest agreements that I would like to comment on and also ask a question.

The government members opposite and ourselves included have talked about the valuable contribution that these forest agreements have made to reforestation and intensive silviculture in all the provinces. Of course government members have lauded their support of those. We would be interested in their support in renewing these agreements. I remind the members that there are currently three forest agreements with Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba that expired at the end of March, and there are ongoing discussions in B.C. about renewing our forest agreement.

In light of the fact that in the Western Diversification Fund available funds for new federal—provincial agreements have been identified at around $242 million, and in light of the fact that representations by the provinces and others on forestry agreements alone total nearly $400 million, I would like to ask the member if he can give us an idea, because the minister to date certainly has not nor has the finance minister, what the provinces might be able to expect in a renewed forest agreement and other economic agreements when in fact there is such a pittance in the Western Diversification Fund.

Mr. Worthy: Mr. Speaker, I am not privy to any more knowledge than the member for Prince George on the subject of FRDA. I know that they are in process. I personally feel that the formation of the full forestry department which will elevate the current Minister of State to full minister status will in fact put him in a position to influence from within the federal government and in that new position to have more impact with provincial forestry counterparts.

The expedient passage of this current bill and the formation of the full department will be a very positive step toward the new FRDAs. I really do appreciate that the member from Prince George is fully on board the train that was started by the Conservatives on these agreements.

• (1240)

I have heard him many times speak strongly for the FRDA programs that we now have and how essential the new ones will be. We do appreciate his support. It is continuing to be high priority on the government agenda, and I can assure the member that it is of extremely high priority on this member's agenda.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my question deals very specifically with what is a blight on B.C.'s economic horizon, that is the fact that on an ongoing basis raw logs are being exported with no value added.

Raw logs have been exported from the coast of British Columbia in the following manner: in 1984, 12 per cent of the lumber output was raw logs with no value added; in 1985 it was almost 9 per cent; in 1986 it was almost 10 per cent; in 1987 it was 10 per cent; and in 1988 it was 9 per cent. Of course the member knows that exporting raw logs is exporting jobs from Canada.

I would like to know what specific provisions the new forestry minister will undertake to stop this blatant export of Canadian jobs at the expense of Canadian foresters.

Mr. Worthy: I can't speak for the minister, Mr. Speaker, nor will I attempt to, but I can explain a little about the export of raw logs which I do not support, either, under most circumstances.

There was very little exporting of logs from the Pacific coast until we hit the severe recession in the 1980s. At that time many of the loggers up the coast had no market for their logs. At that point the provincial government expanded on the permits to export.

Unfortunately those exports continued for some time. There have been many representations by myself as an individual, from some people in the industry, from the unions, and Jack Munro, the president of IWA, to that very point over the past year. In fact, the provincial government has made changes to its exporting. The exporting of those logs is being wound down and now only special circumstance type logs that we cannot take advantage of in our markets will be exported in the years to come.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Pembroke—Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, in rising today to speak on Bill C-29, the organization bill for a new forestry department in Canada, I must say that I am always appalled by the government doing something such as this, which is a tremendous idea that we support but putting no money where its mouth is to do the job. To do something without a financial commitment on the part of the government is wrong.

This government can put money into a new forestry department and it is not throwing money to the winds, because we all know that with forestry being such a tremendously important industry to Canada that all Canadians will get their money back in the returns in future years.

If we do not have that commitment today to rebuild, to grow greater forests in this country, to replant lands that should never have been deforested in the first place, if we do not move out there and lay the groundwork for this tremendous industry in the next decades of Canadian economic life, then we are not going to have a solid a forestry business.

The lack of financial commitment to produce something that is going to bring great financial returns in the future is the wrong philosophy. I have heard members of the Conservative Party in this debate give us this age old slogan that they try to peddle across this country: "This government must do more with less".

The Canadian people out there are fully cognizant that this government's real idea is to do less for more. That is the whole scenario behind their tax grab and everything else that goes on around here. This business of telling the people of Canada that the government is going to do more with less is as phoney as a $3 bill. They are in fact doing less for more.

To give you an idea of what they are doing by way of less, Mr. Speaker, all we have to do is point to the devastation that the Minister for International Trade in 1986 did to the softwood lumber industry in this country. She signed the memorandum of understanding that allowed 15 per cent export tax to go on softwood lumber from this country into the United States.

Why did she do that? Members of the northern Ontario caucus, for one group, led by my distinguished seat-mate from Algoma, can certainly tell you what it meant. We travelled from sawmill to sawmill, from town to town, in northern Ontario in the month of February. Everywhere we went, industry and labour alike in small community Ontario were telling us that the Conservative government sold the softwood lumber industry down the drain in order to get their international free trade agreement.

It is true, because immediately after they signed the memorandum of understanding slapping the 15 per cent tax on softwood lumber going into the U.S., the U.S. signed because it wanted to protect its own manufacturers in the United States.

Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker, a government of Canada going around raving and saying what a great job we have done to sign a free trade agreement when in fact what we have is protectionism, protectionism by the United States, protectionism that was bought by the Conservative government on that late day of 1986 when it sold the softwood lumber industry down the drain and then the U.S. came forward and signed the free trade agreement after its own industry had been protected? Protectionism, Mr. Speaker, is not something you talk about in the same tone, in the same operation as you talk about free trade. Never. They are two absolutely opposite subjects.

Since then under this protection the Conservative government calls free trade the Americans have improved their sawmills. They go to the banks and get loans and they improve their manufacturing processes. Now they are filling the markets that have been traditionally filled by Canadian business over the years.

You can drive anywhere, Mr. Speaker, around the province of Ontario today and you see lumberyards filled more so than I have ever seen in all the years I have been in this House or when I was growing up in a rural area. It is there. It is a fact of life. People are being laid off, so let's not talk about this great positive thing that they are doing for the lumber industry in this country.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we support the establishment of a forestry department in Canada, but we support one that is going to have some clout. This minister is not going to have any clout under this bill because he has to go to other ministers in cabinet to beg for his finances.

• (1250)

It is good to have our excellent forestry research institutions under this departmental roof. I know they are going to be very happy with that.

If we are going to make use of the tremendously positive work, the work that is being done for the future of this country by our forestry research institutions across Canada, then we have to do something out in the field to complement it. We have to grow trees. We have to have an over-all plan. This government has no plan whatsoever.

The first thing that should happen is a federal-provincial meeting of forestry and natural resources ministers across this country with the minister of forestry and the minister should have something to bargain with. He should not have to go to them with hat in hand when he is discussing the future of an important industry in this country. It is not as if we are putting money into something where there will not be any returns. If this government is so gung-ho about great private enterprise in this country, which it has echoed time and time again, why does it not put its money where its mouth is and have a plan to build up the forests in this country and do something?

We have here a very good statement from the Canadian Institute of Forestry, and this has been discussed on the floor of the House before. The Canadian Institute of Forestry would like the new department to have a clearly stated national responsibility, and that responsibility is not clearly stated. It does not have it. The institute wants federal leadership in forestry matters, research and technology transfer, forest resource development, federal-provincial agreements, forest resource data, industry marketing, trade and economics, international forestry—and I mentioned how important international forestry is—human resource, important employment and education programs, and public awareness.

The act should make provision for an interdepartmental committee on forestry so that Forestry Canada can provide federal leadership in the forestry sector. An interdepartmental committee is not new. We have had that before. Consideration should be given to the inclusion of parks, wildlife, lands, waters, surveying, mapping and management of federal forest lands within the mandate of the department. Those are just some of the ideas expressed for this bill.

I want to leave a very positive suggestion in closing my speech. There has to be co-ordination on the jurisdiction of natural resources in this country. I think this is going to be the grounds for a major constitutional discussion at the federal-provincial level in years to come, if we are going to have real co-ordination.

We have several counties in eastern Ontario: Renfrew, Hastings, Lanark, Frontenac, Victoria—Haliburton, Muskoka, Nipissing and others. This is one area where we could have a major reforestation program in these areas where trees must be grown. There is a great expanse of tremendous resource across northern Ontario where people depend upon it for their one community livelihoods. It is a matter of everyday bread and butter. That is the case in many small towns in eastern Ontario as well. So we have a great deal in common here, Mr. Speaker.

There is absolutely no reason why this federal minister cannot sit down with the provincial minister of natural resources and draw up a major plan that will plant trees across this province and across the country.

All this is very, very important to lay the groundwork for it and to show that we are serious about replanting lands that should be left in forestry to show that we are serious working with industry to replant trees that are cut. They will co-operate with on this because it is their future too.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. Questions and comments.

[Translation]

Mr. Champagne (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague's speech with interest. He is concerned primarily about Canada's forestry policy. I would remind him that since 1984, our Government has emphasized silviculture in a remarkable way by increasing its budget over 300 per cent; this should reassure him. His province, Ontario, has been the main beneficiary.

Secondly, he was also concerned about what the Department's mandate might be. I would say it is to provide national leadership in terms of policy. I would reassure him, Mr. Speaker, that the new Department's mandate is to develop and coordinate forestry policies and programs at the national level, to do forestry research and development and encourage it as well, and to work closely with industry and the provincial and territorial agencies concerned in various areas related to the use and protection of forests.

Also, Mr. Speaker, the new Department will work closely with the other federal Departments interested in forests, including Environment Canada, External Affairs and the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion and Science and Technology.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I think that this legislation is first and foremost intended to make this new Forestry Department a full-fledged department with a minister who will have a free hand to negotiate with the provinces and the other departments concerned for the enhancement of forestry, as we did throughout our last term in office and as we are prepared to do now with the new mandate.

[English]

Mr. Hopkins Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the work on silviculture that the hon. member mentioned is nothing new. That too has been going on for years in the very capable hands of the excellent research establishments that we have across this country.

I note too that you mention that the department's mandate would have the co-ordination of forestry programs. That is clearly understood. That is nothing new either. You say that they will work closely with other departments. I would hope so. They are going to have to depend on other departments for their financing because the government has failed to give the new department its own financing.

I would also like to ask the hon. member whether or not the present Conservative government will renegotiate the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber that the Minister for International Trade signed on New Year's Eve of 1986. Will you go back to the drawing board, sit down with the United States, and negotiate your way out of that 15 per cent penalty that you have put on the softwood lumber industry in Canada?

That was a devastating move. It is still having its effect, because not only do they have to contend with paying 15 per cent tax to export the lumber to the U.S., but they also have to contend with higher interest rates in Canada, and there is no indication that they are going to go down, particularly with the introduction by this government of a 9 per cent sales tax that is inflationary.

At the time that that memorandum of understanding was signed in late 1986, the Canadian dollar was at about 71 cents exchange with the American currency, and today it is at about 83 cents, so the lumber industry has lost another 12 per cent right there on the exchange rates alone. What about the spokes in the wheel of progress? You are certainly going to clean the spokes out of the wheel. There is no question about that. I just wonder whether the government is prepared to sit down and negotiate its way out of that 15 per cent penalty that it put on the softwood lumber industry in Canada vis-à-vis the United States in order that the United States would then turn around and sign a free trade agreement and make the softwood lumber industry the goat of the free trade industry.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, this summer I had a rare privilege and one which unfortunately is not accessible to every Canadian. I had an opportunity as a city person—my idea of a forest was a walk through Gage Park—to visit northern and western Canada through northern Alberta, the Northwest Territories and British Columbia and had a chance to see, first-hand, some of the beauty of our land and also to begin to understand the challenge that will face any government and any ministry of forestry.

I would like to begin by pointing out the basic concern that I have about this particular bill. First, we are calling it a ministry for forestry. Forestry implies that the function of the forest is to be simply certainly cut down, because forestry is the action of foresting lumber. If we called it simply the ministry of forests we would begin develop an understanding of how we have to treat our forests in a sustainable manner.

One of the things that awed me as I flew over various parts of British Columbia and had a chance to visit the Kutzamateen and to go to the Carmanah Valley was the sheer beauty, splendour and the age of some of our own forests. We have heard a lot of talk about the Amazonian rain forests and how Canadian and worldwide efforts are being made to save the Amazonian rain forests, but in our own country there seems to be a lack of understanding of our own capacity to preserve old growth forests.

Let us examine this particular initiative of the government in establishing and putting some emphasis on our forests not only as a unique tool of economic opportunity but also as a unique reflection of our heritage and, I think, a symbol of what our country has been and could be in the future.

If we step back for a moment and begin to re-examine the basic premise of a ministry of forestry and start to integrate some of the findings and understandings that we drew from the United Nations Report on Our Common Future chaired by Madam Brundtland, one of the points made in that particular report and which was certainly re-emphasized in the Liberal Task Force Report on Forests released in March, 1989, is that if we do not properly husband our resources and if we do not properly manage our forests in a way that is sustainable for future generations, while we may be embroiled in short term arguments about the disposition of certain kinds of lumber, we will not have a sustainable resource for future generations.

I was very concerned when I read the bill to discover that there is no specific reference to sustainable development. There is no specific federal mandate on how we can maintain our forests and what percentage of our forests can be reasonably harvested in the short term to guarantee the economic prosperity that we care about, while at the same time making sure that we have a resource for future generations.

I do not see, for example, any discussion about the whole question of the shipping of raw logs. If I look at the report written by, among others, the Member for Kenora—Rainy River, one of our jobs as legislators is obviously to ensure the economic viability of our own communities which is very much dependent on the harvesting of our forests. At the same time we should ensure that our forests are harvested in a manner that is value added. That means jobs for Canadians.

I pointed out an example in my question to an hon. member from British Columbia of one way that is not happening. I sat in the office of the Haida people in the Queen Charlottes and watched two barges go by in the short space of about three or four hours. According to their estimates, they had approximately $1 million worth of logs in each of the barges.

I later had an opportunity to meet with representatives from the industry, including representatives from MacMillan Bloedel. I asked them how many raw logs were being exported from British Columbia. I was shocked recently when I got the actual figures for the industry as a whole along the coast, and specific figures relating to that particular company.

In 1988, post-recession; in 1987, post-recession; in 1986, 1985, 1984, and 1983, almost 10 per cent of the logs that were harvested in British Columbia have been sent offshore in raw form. What kind of government policy, whether it be federal or provincial, would permit the exporting of raw logs at a time when our own sawmills want to work? They wanted to add the value and they wanted to be able to sell a product that has a value added that means jobs for Canadians. The member for Kenora—Rainy River was just telling me about the situation in his own community where you have two operations, one on the Canadian side of the border, and one on the American side of the border. The harvesting is done in Canada, the pulp is ground in Canada and then it is sent off to the United States for processing.

If we are going to intelligently use our forests, then surely we should have a system in place to make sure that our yields can be sustained and to ensure that the value is added here in Canada for Canadian jobs, not shipped off to other countries where they can literally manufacture products from our woods and sell them back to us at 10 or 100 times the value of the original product.

That is what an intelligent forest policy should encompass, not simply the TFLs and not simply a licence for clear-cutting which is what has essentially been the case in federal and provincial legislation in the past. Certainly we need a renewal of FRDA agreements, but we need a renewal of FRDA agreements that takes into consideration the fact that our resources are becoming more limited.

I flew over vast regions of British Columbia. Canadians should have an opportunity to see this, by way of video. I am sure the same holds true for northern Ontario. I will be in Sault Ste Marie in a few days to find out. But when you are driving by and you see——the border, you see, there are tall trees, no problems, the only way you can really have a good idea of how badly depleted our forests are is to fly over the land. Unfortunately most Canadians never have the opportunity to see them from the air, they have to rely of figures released by the companies.

[Translation]

[English]

Look at Carmanah. Is it little wonder that Canadians get frustrated by some of our corporate policies when the decision whether or not to log the slopes leading into a forest that is actually older than many of the Amazon rain forests is made on a study done by the company wanting to log it? Is it any wonder that the public is a little skeptical? People are saying, "Step back. We want an independent analysis of what is sustainable. We want the national government of our country to have a policy with respect to forest management". It is not enough to say it is a provincial matter.

One of the major flaws in this bill is that there is no national mechanism for dispute resolutions. Whether you are looking at Carmanah or Tofino or logging prospects in northern Ontario, the issue of dispute settlement is going to be primordial to the success of any particular forest policy.

At the moment the federal government by way of this bill has completely abdicated any responsibility in that area.

• (1310)

We think on that particular issue we will be moving some very important amendments. We intend to make this a bill that respects the demands of the Brundtland Commission and respects what should be our common future.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the remarks of the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) and I should like to remind her that cutting rights fall under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. The federal Government has nothing whatsoever to do with awarding and administering cutting rights, that is a provincial matter.

While I am at it I might draw her attention to clause 6 of the Bill under which the Minister is empowered to co-ordinate the development and implementation of forestry and forest resources policy, and of programs and practices established pursuant to that policy.

The Minister will also have authority to assist the development of Canadian scientific and technological capabilities in forest management. He will be responsible for promoting the development and application of forest management codes and standards, and he will have regard to the sustainable development of Canada's forest resources and the enhancement of the international competitiveness of the Canadian forest sector.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Bill answers the concerns expressed by the Hon. Member for Hamilton East. I urge her to give her support so the legislative measure may be adopted as soon as possible, for everyone agrees that our country needs a Department of Forestry to ensure continued growth and sign agreements with the provinces so as to exploit the full potential of our forest industry.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, it is ages ago since people used to say that PCBs, too, fell under provincial jurisdiction.

I think that what the Canadian people are now saying to all political parties is that our forests and all our resources come under federal jurisdiction wherever national interest must be protected.

Mr. Speaker, I take issue with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) claim that Mrs. Brundtland supported him when he got an award in Washington for his environmental plan.

If Canada wants an environmental plan, we should, as the Brundtland report suggests, set aside 12 per cent of our forests and natural land for the enjoyment of future generations.

If we maintain that the implementation of forestry policy is strictly a provincial matter it follows that we refuse to assume our national responsibilities with regard to our children. I emphasize that point, and the Minister must agree with me to a certain extent, otherwise he would not have created a Department of Forestry. But, since he has done so, I urge him to ensure that every decision is made on the basis of sustainable development, which is not mentioned in the Bill as it now stands, and to set a course for Canada. It is the politicians who are dragging their feet on that issue.

[English]

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, in the discussion relative to stumpage fees and the claim that this has nothing to do with the federal government, I wonder if the hon. member for Hamilton East could comment on this question. The Conservative Government of Canada put much emphasis on listening to the United States' complaint about low stumpage fees in Canada and that resulted in the Minister for International Trade of the day signing the memorandum of understanding that penalized the Canadian softwood lumber industry by a 15 per cent tax before going into the United States.

Then the Conservative Government threw that into the hands of the provinces and the provinces had to negotiate their way out by going to Ottawa and trying to get separate agreements. When they raise their stumpage fees the Americans relieve them of that portion of the 15 per cent. Yet we hear from the federal government that stumpage fees have nothing to do with it. If they have nothing to do with the federal government then why did it throw this mess at the provinces on the eve of signing the free trade agreement with the United States? There seems to be quite a diabolical change here.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, I think you can find the answer to that question in the Liberal task force on forestry policy, which I think is required reading for anyone who is interested in developing an intelligent forest policy in this country.

If you look at the actual cost to Canadians per thousand board foot, the loss to Canadians as a result of that FTA-provoked excise tax which we inflicted upon ourselves in typical Conservative fashion, bowing down as we have before the Americans at any opportunity, is actually costing our Canadian workers $71.59 per thousand board foot in lost revenue as a direct result of the FTA-provoked excise tax which was imposed.

That is one of the reasons there are sawmills in northern Ontario that are closed at the moment and one of the reasons that we think an intelligent forest policy would be introduced by a Liberal government.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to participate in this debate, because I feel that this initiative of creating a new forestry department is an extremely important one to Canada. There is no industry more important to Canada than the forest products industry and it is a particularly important industry to the Province of Nova Scotia and, indeed, to my own South Shore riding where we have major participation in the forest industry. I have spoken on many occasions about the importance of our Christmas tree industry. I would take this opportunity to again remind and urge all Canadians that one way to support our forest products industry is to use real Christmas trees as opposed to artificial ones. Real Christmas trees and the best ones, I might say, come from the Queens and Lunenburg Counties of Nova Scotia.

In our area we also have a great deal of other types of forest products industries. We have several sawmills, literally thousands and thousands of acres of woodlots, and we have two major forest products plants. We have the Canexel plant in East River which produces a hardboard used for walls and doors and various other things. We have the very important Bowater Mersey plant which I might say is this year celebrating its 60th anniversary of 60 years service to the people not only of Liverpool and Queens County, but indeed the people of Nova Scotia and Canada. That very important company which produces about 240,000 tonnes of newsprint a year is an important industry in our area. It clearly establishes, along with the other things I have mentioned, the importance of the forest products industry to us.

Therefore, I think it is a very insightful, forward looking, and a very wise move that the government has taken with this initiative of creating a new forestry department. It goes hand in hand with the recent announcements by the minister responsible for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency that a new regional development umbrella agreement has been signed with the Province of Nova Scotia. This agreement includes a $45 million two-year forestry agreement. I might say that is not only a priority of the government of Canada, but a priority recognized by the province of Nova Scotia and the province of New Brunswick some months earlier.

The details and application of the new Forestry Resource Development Agreement will be worked out between the proposed forestry department and the province. It will extend activities funded under the previous agreement. It will increase funding for research and development as well as marketing initiatives. Under the two-year agreement $22.5 million will be spent annually in Nova Scotia for forestry. As a result of this agreement, the forest sector in our province will be better able to meet future market challenges.

We have all heard about the forest sector's overwhelming importance to Canada's economy as a whole. We know that global demands for forest products will grow in the 21st century. Clear-headed Canadians see the opportunities afforded by the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement. Right across Canada, forest industries will have secure access to the whole North American market.

This bill is about tomorrow. It is about the environmental economic well-being of our children and their children's children. These are not responsibilities that we in this House can take lightly. These are major challenges. They must be faced resolutely. Canadians expect no less. If generations yet unborn could speak, they would tell us to act now and in the manner that we are. That is why the government of Canada is honouring its commitment to establish a true federal department of forestry. It is determined to take this first step toward economic development based on environmentally rational policies. Let no one doubt the government's resolve.

In Canada's forest sector, economic progress will be coupled with sensible resource husbandry. Bill C-29 is the first step toward true national leadership for Canada's forest sector.

Some hon. members say that they are concerned about the perceived reductions in the present Minister of State's budget. The operative word here is "perceived". Such concerns flow from an examination of last February's Main Estimates. They provide an incomplete picture. In fiscal year 1988-89 the Main Estimates show $234.8 million for forestry Canada and 1,281 person years. In the present fiscal year the figures are $206 million and 1,226 person years.

• (1320)

However, other factors must be considered. As needs become known adjustments will be made through Supplementary Estimates voted by the House. Already the original $206 million for forestry Canada has risen to $211 million. The original 1,226 person years mentioned in the Main Estimates have become 1,328, an increase of 47 over the previous year. Our approach is gradual and rational.

This year most Forest Resource Development Agreements are running out. Some have expired. The sum set aside at the beginning of the fiscal year do not reflect what will be spent after new agreements are negotiated. Often when agreements are ending, major spending has been completed. What kind of managers would we be if we allocated huge sums to undertakings that are winding down? Why would we earmark billions of dollars to expired agreements without knowing future spending requirements? That is not how Canadians want us to manage their economy.

It has been suggested that the new department will not control its own budget because over-all amounts for forestry are set in umbrella regional development agreements. These are reached by the Department of Industry, Science and Technology for Ontario and Quebec, by Western Economic Diversification for western Canada and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency for Atlantic Canada. That is how regional development funds are initially committed. To suggest that there is something strange in this approach is, quite frankly, strange itself. The new federal department of forestry will have exclusive responsibility for negotiating the terms and application of each federal-provincial forest agreement. The proposed department and the agreements it will administer are an important first step. The new agreements will mark the real transition to intensive management of Canada's forests.

The new department will confirm national forestry leadership. I am not talking about national leadership through attempts through jurisdictional power grabs. The provinces own the resource. Forestry is a provincial responsibility.

We propose methods that will allow each province to use its forest sector efficiently. What we seek is co-operation that will benefit Canada's forest sector through policies of environmentally sustainable economic development. What we offer is support that will pinpoint the right products for a highly competitive and constantly shifting international market. What we are building is partnership with the provinces and the industry to do two things: one, base all forest sector progress on a national commitment to sustainable development; two, ensure that governments and industry make the right market decisions. That is how we will remain the world's top exporter of forest products. That is how we will create hundreds of thousands of new jobs for Canadians.

The new department will do this by carrying out the mandates it has been given by the legislation. These mandates are to expand forestry research, promote development of national goals, offer policies of forest conservation and generate federal-provincial co-operation of forestry. Last but not least, one of the new department's mandates is educational. It will inform the public so that Canadians will demand integrated and balanced forest management of the highest order.

Other nations' experiences have shown that this approach will protect our wilderness heritage and it will do this while allowing us to realize higher yields and earnings from renewable resources. Here I want to stress the importance of the emphasis on research. Research will show us the best way to couple sustained development policies to market demands. Research will also ensure that our industry provides the products which the market seeks. That is why research is one of the principle objectives of this bill.

If we act sensibly and quickly we will create thousands of new jobs through expanded markets and intensive forest management. The new department will be a centre of excellence from which the Government of Canada can reach out to the provinces and the industry. By doing so it will serve the common good.

Bill C-29 lays the foundation for a national approach that will allow Canada's forest sector to provide prosperity rooted in policies of sustainable development. This legislation reflects the government's determination to manage change so that Canadians can meet the challenges of the future while deriving maximum benefit from the opportunities it offers. That is why the government is so deeply committed to this legislation, that is why I support it, that is why it is an excellent idea, and that is why I encourage all members of the House to support it.

Mr. Nault: Mr. Speaker, I must say that was a real barn-burning speech we heard. I would like to commend the—

Mr. Gardiner: At least he's not burning Christmas trees right now!

Mr. Nault: The member seems to come from an area which is similar to mine but, he must admit, a lot smaller in size. I suggest to the whole House that I am sure he understands the importance of the forestry industry.

Therefore, I would like to ask him a specific question which is very important to me and to areas that do have a large amount of trees. It relates to the 15 per cent export tax that was imposed, and there is now a memorandum of understanding put right in the free trade agreement. Does the member feel that that is to the benefit of producers and to those who are in the forest industry at this time, that they have this export tax put on them by the government? Does the member feel there should be a discussion by those individuals on the other side to remove this 15 per cent export tax before—as has happened in northern Ontario where 900 jobs have been lost already, it is possible that in his location, even though it is a bit smaller with not as many trees—he will start having unemployment situations as we have.

Currently we have 30 communities in northern Ontario that rely solely on forestry. We look very strongly to the leadership of the gentleman I am speaking of to try to help us to educate the government side on the importance of removing that 15 per cent export tax. I look forward to his intervention on this matter.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to respond to the issues raised by my colleague opposite, although I must comment on his remark about the size of our province. We have always, as you know, specialized in quality and produce nothing but the best in the maritimes. That applies, I might say, to our Christmas trees. I am sure you know that over 50 per cent of the Christmas trees that are exported from Canada come from Nova Scotia. They generate $30 million in revenue and that is very beneficial. We do know a little bit about countervails because we had a little problem in one situation ourselves which, fortunately, this government had the wisdom to deal with in a manner that best served our industry.

I cannot profess to having great expertise on the issue you raised because, of course, it doesn't apply in the maritimes. I do recall at the time, however, that it was something requested by the industry and the provinces involved.

It relates to trade with the United States and one of the things that our forest products industries are benefiting from, as will other resource sectors—including the fishery which is critically important in my own area—is the access that that agreement gives us to the American market. In the long run I don't think there is any question that the forest industries are going to be the over-all beneficiaries from the free trade agreement. Therefore, we supported it wholeheartedly in our area.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's very good interventions in this House on Christmas trees are appreciated. He will know on the softwood lumber tariff that the Minister of State for Forests himself has admitted that it has been a bad deal for this country and that we are working to change it. It is something of course that the government did negotiate.

My question to the member concerns his comments about the importance of the forest agreements with which we agree, on some of the concepts of sustainable development. One of the rules in the Brundtland Commission on sustainable development is access to information so that legislators and other people are able to make the correct decisions on forestry. In this case the minister and the government have refused to let the forestry committee know what the criteria are for some of the new forest agreements, particularly in western Canada.

I wonder if the member supports the view that that information should be withheld from the forestry committee or does he share our view that we should be told what the federal government is looking at in these new forest agreements?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely sure what it has to do with the matter before the House at this time, which is the creation of a new forestry department. I am sure my hon. friend is aware of the fact that co-operative agreements are negotiated between the ministers I mentioned in my speech and the various provinces involved and that within those agreements there is an allocation as to where those funds go. The various departments such as the forestry department become involved in negotiating directly the details of how that agreement will work in the particular jurisdiction involved so that both federal and provincial priorities are recognized, and it works to the benefit of all.

As a member of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry I would hope that in due course we get this important legislation through the House, and I think we should remember that that is the priority. It is my hope that this bill will achieve second reading today. One of the things that I would hope would happen soon after that is that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry would have an opportunity to take a look at the role of this department and to assist the minister and the government in seeing that that department is used to the best advantage of the forest industry and indeed for generations of Canadians to come.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who just spoke had kept on, there is no way that this bill would get passed today or even in the next session.

I want to open my remarks by referring to the Minister of State for Forestry. I appreciated his comments a few days ago when he was talking about this legislation, a bill to establish a department of forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to the other acts that affect the strongest industry in this country.

Before making those comments I would refer to the members from British Columbia who are in the House and are concerned about this industry as I am sure are my colleagues from northwestern Ontario and all parts of northern Ontario. A remark was made by my friend and colleague from Hamilton East just a short while ago with respect to the shipment of these magnificent trees from the west coast of the province of British Columbia to the Pacific Rim countries. There is a comment that goes around in our area. We say that you could almost walk to any Pacific Rim country, if you wanted to, across the Pacific Ocean by just walking on the barges that are carrying our natural resources in their raw state to these Pacific Rim countries that take our raw material, produce goods and products and then send them back to Canada to compete with products that we make, including pulp and paper and wood, right here in Canada.

We have to have respect and appreciation for this natural resource. One of the fundamental problems that we have in northern Ontario is to secure the quality of trees for production purposes that the province of British Columbia seems to be shipping out in its raw state without adding any value to it. That in itself is not acceptable, and I am glad, as I said, that we have representation from the province of British Columbia here, and hopefully those representatives will be able to correct that terrible situation.

I paid special attention to the minister's remarks about how vital the forestry industry is to us. The establishment of a department of forestry is a positive step not only for northern Ontario but for all of Canada. As a member of Parliament for a northern Ontario riding, I agree fully with the minister's words relating to the importance of forestry.

The Canadian forestry industry is important to Canada. It provides employment for 8 per cent of our Canadian labour force. It supports 900,000 forestry manufacturing and service jobs. In 1988, forest land yielded more than $30 billion in the value of goods shipped from Canada. One out of every seven manufacturing dollars in Canada is related directly to the forestry industry. The forest sector contributes more than $17 billion to Canada's net trade balance, and this exceeds the net trade balance from agriculture, fisheries and mining combined. Forest products account for close to $25 billion in trade within our country alone.

Forestry is the largest industry in Canada. It is larger than the automobile and petroleum sectors. Forestry is Canada's number one industry and this industry must be recognized. This must dictate our approach to this very valuable industry to Canada.

When I talk to my friends in the forestry industry, particularly the past president of the Canadian Institute of Forestry, Dr. James Kyle who is also a forestry teacher at Lakehead University, I say that those statistics with respect to the forest industry in Canada are perhaps the best kept secrets in our whole country. The forestry industry is indeed the largest single industry in Canada and contributes more to our economy than any other single industry. Unfortunately, the forestry industry does not tell us this story as it should.

Mr. Flis: The government doesn't know it.

Mr. Comuzzi It looks like the government doesn't know it. I tell my friends in the forestry industry in jest that perhaps those people who administer the forestry section could best serve by administering the secret service, and that way we will have complete secrecy with respect to that department.

Despite the forest industry's contribution to the national economy the statistics do not reflect the importance of this industry to over 300 communities in Canada which are dependent upon this industry for their sole survival. Some of those towns in the riding that I represent are Nipigon and Red Rock, Hurkett, Dorion, Pass Lake, Kakabeka Falls, and in these small communities, the people are not involved in the manufacturing process but they are involved in going out into the forests through spring, summer, fall and winter to harvest the trees and sell them to the mills where they are produced from that point.

I was interested in the remarks made by my friend from Kenora in northern Ontario that towns in his area are reliant on the forestry industry specifically. It is important to northern Ontario. More than 30 single industry towns are reliant on the 17 pulp and paper mills and over 325 sawmills of various sizes throughout all of the north. Towns like Dryden and Kenora, Sioux Lookout, Atikokan, Fort Francis, Terrace Bay, Marathon, Hearst and Kapuskasing. All rely on the forest industry and what happens in that industry. As my friend has stated so capably and ably before me, we in northern Ontario rely on the forest industry. It is the lifeblood of our communities.

You can understand full well, Mr. Speaker, how my constituents in northern Ontario have a special interest in the matters that relate to forestry. Therefore, I would like to comment for a few moments on the bill that is before this House.

Naturally, in principle, we favour the establishment of a separate department of forestry. One would assume that such a department would better able the government to reflect in its policies the realities of this industry.

As I said at the outset, I listened carefully to the Minister's words reflecting precisely how important the forestry industry is to Canada. His words were those of an astute man. However, we in northern Ontario tend to gauge one's performance based on actions rather than on words. As we say in the bush industry, you have to put your money where your mouth is. That is what we suggest the Minister do with respect to this bill. He should do things that are concrete for the forestry industry in our country.

If he really means what he has said, I challenge the minister to take the 15 per cent on our export lumber sales that is enshrined in the free trade agreement and cancel it according to section 9 of the memorandum of understanding. We have the complete concurrence of all of the industries in northern Ontario with respect to forestry that we should cancel unilaterally that memorandum of understanding with the United States so that we can indeed compete in the forest industry on a level playing field. We in northern Ontario are not afraid to compete with anyone in the United States.

In closing, and I know my time is short, this government has claimed that a forestry department would provide national leadership in the development and co-ordination of forest policy and programs and, consistent with its commitment to sustainable development, promote research and development in the forestry sector and encourage federal co-operation with industry, universities, provinces and territorial authorities in a wide range of activities related to forest management and protection.

I say in closing that I would be the first person on my feet to compliment the minister and those on the other side of the House if they were to come to grips with and take issue with the memorandum of understanding and cancel the 15 per cent export tax.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am especially pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-29, the government's bill to establish a department of forestry, even though the government is five years late in doing so.

I think it is safe to say that the creation of a forestry department is strongly supported by all of Canadian society. We all realize that we need a strong forestry program in order to oversee and protect our vast resource. This legislation will enable the government to have a better focus on activities pertaining to forestry.

In trying to accomplish this focusing in on forest activities, I certainly applaud the legislation. However, there are many problems with Bill C-29 that first must be addressed. Forestry and lumbering is not something that is new to in eastern Ontario and particularly to the Ottawa area. If one goes back in history to when Ottawa was known as Bytown in the early 1800s, lumbering was the major industry. The Ottawa River and the Gatineau River were the two vehicles that carried the logs from the lumber camps down to through to the sawmill, and that sawmill is still across the river from us in Hull, the E. B. Eddy plant.

Like the previous speaker, there are no forests in my riding of Nepean but we do have wood lots. One of the things we have done as a municipality is to recognize the importance of wood lots in our city. Because we are a rapidly developing municipality, the city of Nepean has moved forward to purchase those wood lots and put them in city land holdings so as not to allow the developers to cut these wood lots down for houses to be built in their place. I think that my city has played a major role in recognizing the importance of wood in Canada today.

Bill C-29 does not provide the forestry minister with much clout. Most of the funds for federal-provincial reforestation agreements will come from other federal departments and agencies. In other words the forestry department must stand in line with other departments to lobby the federal government for money.

Environmentalists are very concerned about this industry in Canada, and I do not think it is just in Canada. I think it is a global thing. In classrooms in schools today we hear children who are very, very concerned over the loss of our forests in Canada, Brazil and all other parts of the world. We hear about the warming effect, the greenhouse effect, all because of the loss of our forests and the effect it has on our environment.

If we are all to be concerned about our planet, we have to be concerned about the forest industry. The federal government must take a leadership role in reforestation and resource development as the municipalities such as my city have done and as the province of Ontario is doing.

The Liberal Party supports the renewal of federal–provincial forestry agreements. The government must address the backlog of unsatisfactorily restocked forest land in Canada which continues to increase by 200,000 hectares per year. These stocks must be replaced because we are very rapidly falling behind in replacing them.

Bill C–29 does not provide Forestry Canada with financial control of forest resource development. The department cannot ensure the improved forestry practices are applied because the department does not have the necessary resources to do so.

The department will be unable to improve and increase the resource base across Canada as the bill is presently written today.

The government alleges that the purpose of the bill was to create a strong ministry which would positively represent the interests of the forest industry of Canada at the cabinet level. Yet, according to the Estimates tabled by the government, the new department will receive less money than the Canadian Forestry Service Agency that it will replace.

For example, the government's over–all budget for 1989–90 increased by $9.9 billion to $142.9 billion. The forestry budget for the same period has actually decreased by $28 million to $206.9 million. Furthermore, 47 persons were cut from the new forestry department, a 3.5 per cent reduction in persons compared to a total government reduction of 1,072 person–years or a 0.5 per cent reduction.

In conclusion, Canada needs a strong forestry department. It has been a long–standing policy of the Liberal Party of Canada that a forestry department ought to be created. Unfortunately, this bill does not provide the forestry sector with either the profile or the funds it deserves.

The forestry minister should be in control of forestry resource development agreements. He should not have to request funds from other departments. He should be in control of his own agenda and he will not be. I ask the government to make a strong commitment to the forestry branch. Although the bill is a step in the right direction, in its present state it is a superficial and token approach to our forest industry.

In the last five years since 1984, we have seen, particularly through FRDAs, the expenditure of $1.115 billion with no department, with a minister of state. While my friends opposite are supportive of the department and very critical of the amount of money provided, it should be pointed out that that $1.115 billion is a 300 per cent increase over the financial commitments of that crowd opposite from the previous time.

Most important is to recognize the opportunities available throughout government at the federal and provincial levels. Like my friend from Hamilton East, I also had the opportunity this summer to visit a project in my province that was supported by the federal–provincial agreement between the two levels of government. With the minister of forestry for the government of Newfoundland and Labrador, I participated in the planting of the 50 millionth seedling at the tree nursery in Woodale outside Windsor in central Newfoundland.

What is critical in that process is that we have had to come together, not only two levels of government but a number of departments of both governments, to ensure that we have the forest resources that will feed the industry in Newfoundland and Labrador over the next number of years and centuries. One of the greatest advantages is the ability of a department like this to bring other departments together, going with government departments at the federal level to the provincial level and saying what it is we can do together.

In my part of the world, as with my colleagues from northern Ontario, Nova Scotia, parts of Quebec and even British Columbia, when we sign these agreements we sign them to do a number of things. Obviously protecting and enhancing and developing the forest resource is key. Quite clearly the creation, the preservation, the protection and the enhancement of jobs is critical and therefore the involvement of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency or the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

We have been able to develop, with the help of the youth strategy under the Department of Employment and Immigration, in a signed joint deal with the Newfoundland government and ACOA and the provincial department of mines and resources, a world-class training program for young people, a training program that will train people for two years in our forests in silviculture and in protecting and developing the resource.

We have the ability to jointly protect the resource through fire-fighting. We have the ability to jointly understand the resource better through the development of new products. We have traditionally depended on black spruce and fir. We are now growing juniper. Those opportunities, bringing departments together, bringing different levels of government together, is where the creativity and the imagination of all of us can come together to develop this industry to secure its past and our future.

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments with regard to my comments on the forestry department. All of the things that this government is doing are certainly commendable, but surely he is kidding when he cannot recognize the fact that there are millions of dollars cut in the budget in the forestry division, that staffing has been cut back. Where is the dedication? Where is the commitment to this industry when there is a budget cut-back and a person-years cut-back? It is there in the figures. It is in the Minister of Finance's budget.

The member talks about agreements with the provinces. How many of those agreements are not signed? Quite a few. I believe six out of ten are still not signed. We have heard from my colleague from Thunder Bay who talked about the softwood lumber industry and the damage that is being done to the lumber industry in northern Ontario by the 15 per cent surcharge that has been added on. How can he ignore that? How can he say that his government is committed to this industry when he failed to do the things that I have mentioned here?

I would like this gentleman and this government to be serious about this industry. This, I believe, is our No. 2 industry in Canada. It has been our No. 1 industry from the early days of settlers in this country. We cannot ignore it. We cannot ignore the warming effect, the greenhouse effect, on our planet.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in addressing Bill C-29, an act to establish the department of forestry, to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act and to make related amendments to other acts, I would like to begin by congratulating the minister as another old sawmiller like myself with some 20 years in the industry. I understand also the minister's own commitment and experience in that industry as an owner—operator in his case. I know the two of us share the feeling that comes with the sweet smell of fresh cut wood, especially if it is mixed with salt air.

The minister's own experience in that industry stretches back over many years in the Peace River section of British Columbia. While I never dealt with him directly there, I know that his own experience and feeling both for the industry and the forests that sustain are strong. I know it is of some pleasure and relief to him that he has finally been able to give birth to the measure that is before us today, the establishment of a department of forestry.

In referring to the rather long gestation period, I would point out that in 1984 the Conservative Party and the present minister had some role to play in the forestry policy of that party. They said that we would have a forestry department immediately. It has been five years in coming. By any standard of measurement, that is a rather long gestation period. As one who has been involved in wood products labour for very many years, I always knew that forestry was hard labour, but five years' gestation is kind of ridiculous.

Be that as it may, I know there were many serious debates taking place between parties, between individual members within parties and between many others across the country during that period and the years preceding it over whether the correct and best route to go for the protection and enhancement of the forest industry was to have a separate department, or whether it would be more appropriate to have a ministry with an enhanced associate deputy minister and a strong team within a major government department.

It was also a matter of great concern to a number of others as to what type of department was appropriate if we were to promote and defend properly the interests of the industry and the resource. Should it be a production oriented department or is it more proper to put it in with the Department of the Environment? There were good arguments on all sides, and I think all of us in every party finally came to the conclusion that the best route to go was to have a separate ministry and a separate department.

It is regrettable, however, that in establishing this department and for something that has taken so long we find it lacks one of the major instruments that surely any department has as its main purpose—the enhancement and protection of the forestry resource in Canada. The administration of and responsibility for forestry renewal does not rest within the mandate of that department, particularly in the negotiation of and the funding for the joint agreements which have done much during the last four to five years to finally give an appropriate measure of attention to the forest industry and to the forest resource.

In The Vancouver Sun on June 28, 1989, it was reported that officials from the Western Economic Diversification Office told MPs the day before that only $242 million in new money has been made available over the next five years for federal deals with the four western provinces. That much money is to be spread over four western provinces with 11 federal-provincial economic regional agreements. When you consider that during this past five years under FRDA in the province of British Columbia alone, there has been $150 million federal and $150 million provincial, that $242 million is obviously totally inadequate.

If we look at the estimates for the Western Economic Diversification Office, we find that the amount available to that office for its mandate has fallen by $40 million over the period 1988-89 to the 1989-90. Again, this is something that does not bode well. Many spokespersons within the industry and around the industry have suggested that it is entirely inappropriate for an agency such as the western diversification agency to have that kind of responsibility and power over what is in Canada the major contributor to our balance of trade surplus—if it is still a surplus—an industry which has such an impact on so many communities right across Canada, some 300 communities which are either solely or largely dependent upon the forest industry for their existence and welfare.

It is some time now since the first Canadian Forest Congress was held in the city of Toronto in 1978. I was there. It was just shortly after I was appointed as a regional representative for the International Woodworkers of America, not dealing with forestry policy as such, but with the issue of with race relations within the forest industry.

I remember at that congress in 1978 it was still our concern that there was hardly any awareness among the public of Canada about the importance of this industry and the needs that the forest resource had. A phrase used was that the public could not see the lack of forest for the trees.

We have come a long way since then and there is a great deal of awareness among the public and among the people who work in and around the industry. Over the years that has created an ever-increasing sense of urgency in the political area as well.

While the creation of this department is obviously one sign of that increasing awareness among politicians as with the public, it is likely to be a long time before we can again focus public attention on another major step ahead in terms of the renewal of the forest resource in Canada. That is why it grieves me so much to see the lack of a strong mandate written into the legislation before us. It is a pity because it may be a long way away again. It has taken five years to get us this far from the time of the announcement that it was going to be done immediately. If we do not do it right now it may be a long, long time before we get a chance again.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, there are some 300 communities across Canada dependent upon the forest industry and many of them are within my own constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke. I know the figure 300 was used in a broad sense some four or five years ago, at the time that I was the member for Kootenay West, and since then we have at least one less community in my own area that is primarily dependent upon that industry. The mill where I reported to go back to work, some two weeks after the 1984 election, closed down permanently within days of my application to return to work. I was one of those who thought he had job security when I left this place in 1984, but I should have known better because I had realized for years and years that unless all people have job security no one has it. But I was rather forcibly reminded of that in the weeks following the election of 1984, and it had nothing to do with losing the election.

Now the employment within my own constituency within the forest industry is not much different than it was then. But what has happened there, as has happened in many other communities, is that many large, integrated operations have closed down. We have gone back to the days of a number of small operations which have much more hazardous working conditions. In many cases they conduct their logging operations in ways which are much less sensitive to the needs of the area. They pay their employees and thus pay their communities less for the resources that they utilize. They now have people working with them who are working for one-half or two-thirds of the wages that they used to earn. They have no benefits, except for those few required by law, and have no pensions. We have gone backwards in terms of what our people and our communities receive from that industry in many, many areas of Canada. And that in part is because of the small "c" conservative political agenda which has dominated much of North America over that period.

We hear a lot of concern about the environment. That is right and proper and it is long overdue. But I have always been one who believed that the environment had to do with more than just trees, minerals, air and water. People are part of the environment too; people tomorrow and people today. The job of any responsible politician and any responsible government is to accommodate and negotiate between those needs of people today and people tomorrow, recognizing that they are part of what we call the environment and ensuring that one is not sacrificed in too large a measure for the benefit of another.

In addressing part of the needs of the people, and there are hundreds and thousands of them across this country who have derived their livelihood from the harvesting of our forests, if we want to enlist them as allies which we must in preserving forests and in preserving the environment we must assure and guarantee to them some fair measure of equity. We cannot ask them simply to sacrifice themselves, their families and their communities for the future.

It is important that sacrifices be made but they must be shared. We must apportion to them in our reforestation and silvicultural programs an appropriate number of the jobs at reasonable rates of pay with appropriate compensation, benefits and pensions for the future of themselves and their families working in those important areas of silviculture and forestry regeneration.

If we do not make those assurances, they will automatically dig in their heels and we will force the kinds of social conflicts that we have seen in the headlines over and over and over again. Our society cannot afford those conflicts on an ever-increasing basis. Our environment cannot sustain those conflicts on an ever-increasing basis and it is within our ability, as a community provincially, nationally and locally, to take such measures to ensure that any sacrifices to be made will be shared equitably across the board and that we will give as much respect and accord to those who are living and working in the present as to the future.

I have always been suspicious, whether it has been with other Socialists, Conservatives or Liberals, of any politician who says that we always have to do things for tomorrow at the expense of those today. We are equally as important. Besides, if we do not take both groups equally into account we will not take the kinds of measures that are necessary to preserve a future existence.

I know that a lot has been said about the FRDA agreement over the last five years and it has been an excellent agreement. I have had the opportunity, both formerly as a member of Parliament and during my four years in the wilderness, as it were, to visit a number of operations that were financed both by FRDA and by the agreements that were conducted prior to the existence of the Forest Renewal Development Agreements.

I can testify to the value of the work being done with minimal amounts of labour and, considering the importance of this industry and this resource, our forests, with the minimal amount of money spent we got tremendous value in terms of enhancement of the resource.

There was something that went on prior to the last five-year FRDA agreement in British Columbia. The B.C.-Canada FRDA agreement had $150 million federal and $150 million provincial, a total of $300 million over five years. That is some $30 million a year for each level of government.

I would remind the members opposite that in the year prior to FRDA there was an agreement for which we had to fight for years to get. It was a one year agreement. There is a problem with short-term agreements. The five-year one was certainly welcome in that respect. It takes a lot of planning and co-ordination. There was a one-year agreement that saw $55 million dollars come from the federal government and $55 million from the province.

So in fact, if you measure it on that year-by-year basis, when this government was elected in 1984, its commitment fell from $55 million a year to $30 million a year. But the government probably got just as good a value because it was at least planned over a five-year period. That allowed the provincial authorities who have the prime jurisdiction, as they should, over forest management and forest renewal to plan in advance to attempt to get the appropriate number of seedlings in place, to do the necessary preparatory work and to have the necessary skilled labour in place, because we had not done an adequate job of reforestation prior to that time and we needed to train forestry technicians and silviculturalists. It allowed that to happen. But because of the foot dragging in this last year we have thrown away the benefits of that kind of advance planning.

Even if the federal government were now to agree to spend more than it had over the past five years, when all the evidence shows it is going to spend less, it would get fewer results and do great damage to our resource simply because of the lack of lead time. Seedlings have not been produced, not adequate ones for the right places. Because of the privatization program that has taken place in the province of British Columbia where many of the seedlings are produced by independent contractors, largely made up of former employees of that province, they are left holding the bag, otherwise the taxpayers would have ended up holding the bag. It would have been unfair to the taxpayers and it is now unfair to those contractors, because these seedlings will probably not be used.

That shows the waste. You would think that a government that had shown enough sense to do things over a five-year period where the appropriate amount of planning could take place would realize how important it is for that kind of planning on a long sustained basis to continue, but apparently it has not.

Now we are seeing jurisdiction not placed within the new ministry of forests but placed in another agency which may be very valuable, the Western Diversification Fund. But it has different priorities. It does not have the understanding of the particular problems of that industry, so we can expect to see even more of that helter-skelter unplanned approach because these people simply will not understand the industry. You do not plan to regenerate a forest in one year or one month. You have to do it over the long haul. I am sure the minister understands that. If he does, why does he not get it through the thick skulls of his colleagues? He knows what the necessities are and knows the urgency. I only wish his other colleagues would come to appreciate the particular needs of that industry.

Another disturbing trend has been in what we are now starting to see as some hints of Conservative plans to deal with forestry and some of the broad environmental concerns. The Conservatives and Liberals have been urging so-called market-driven solutions to our environment. But it is market mechanisms that have got us in the situation we are in now. As an example, according to the September 23 issue of The Financial Post, Environment Probe in Toronto is calling for the privatization of our—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair regrets to interrupt the member but the member's time has expired.

On debate, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to make the time available to me this afternoon to pose some questions to the House and in particular the proposed minister of forestry.

What Canadians want to know before this bill is passed is whether this is another mechanism to get the minister a bigger car, a better seat at the cabinet table, a larger expense account and a little more status among his colleagues or whether the forestry department is now going to do something. They want to know whether, in fact, it is going to be a real, substantial contribution to the making of proper policy in this country dealing with forests which is, after all, our largest employer and our most successful export market in many areas.

The forest industry is in deep trouble as a direct consequence of actions by this government. The real question is whether this new ministry of forestry and the new minister is going to be prepared to stand up finally with some courage and integrity and defend the forestry industry of Canada.

I hear comments from the gentleman who represents that large forestry area in Mississauga or Scarborough, wherever it is.

The fact of the matter is I have here a study done by Price Waterhouse for the forest industry in British Columbia. This is an objective, honest and clear account of just what disastrous effects the decisions by this government have had upon the forestry industry in British Columbia. Let me read you one quite startling fact: "In 1988 the net earnings of the industry in the lumber field alone plummeted from $352 million to $6 million."

The direct consequence of the softwood lumber agreement, the export tax, the stumpage fees, has been the cause of that decline. The lumber industry is losing markets and has increased costs and, as a result, it is losing money. When it loses money the industry loses the capital to reinvest in modernization. It loses the ability to provide for better technology, higher productivity and, therefore, loses what has been for the British Columbia forest industry perhaps its most important advantage, namely, its superior ability to produce logs at lower cost, at higher productivity and with better technology. Once it starts losing money of this scope and magnitude it loses its cutting edge, if you don't mind a somewhat bad pun.

That is not a matter of nature, it is not God's will, it is a direct decision by this government. One of the stupidest, most futile and dishonest decisions in the history of trade in this country is now coming home to roost and we are seeing the impact directly in British Columbia, northern Ontario and right across this country. What was a thriving, bountiful industry is now being put into real dilemma as to its future and as to whether it can continue to provide for an active export market.

There is a responsibility by the minister of forestry because his colleagues have failed. The Minister for International Trade, who somehow has believed that his primary occupation these days is to provide for the destruction of the fish industry off the east coast, has failed miserably in his primary responsibility, which is to do something about the trade area.

I want to quote from the Minister for International Trade on April 7, 1989, just a few short months ago. He said: "The economic circumstances (for the forest industry) have changed—Therefore we think it would be reasonable for changes to be made—Whether the United States will agree is another question. We have pointed out these facts..(but) there have been no formal negotiations—".

I checked a few days ago and there are still no negotiations. There is still no initiative by the minister for trade. There is still no honest effort to try to come to grips with the fact that the Canadian forest industry faces the drastic impact of new stumpage fees in British Columbia and the export tax in the other provinces, to say nothing of the major increase in the Canadian dollar.

I have a very simple question for the minister of forestry. Once his department is there, once he gets in the harness, once he gets that bigger car and that new staff and all the trappings, is he going to start renegotiating this agreement? Is he going to tackle the fundamental flaw that faces the Canadian forestry industry? Rather than going out and making great speeches about the green ghetto and all the nice pieces of nostalgia he liked to refer to in his opening speeches, is he going to do something serious? Is he really going to tackle the problem that faces the industry which he knows well? I was within three feet of his office only a few days ago, and there they were busy, the computers were whirring, and the typewriters were going. But I have not seen the minister whirring and going. I want to know if we are going to get some action once this department is passed and if, for a change, we are going to have a minister in this government to stand up to the Americans, someone who is going to stand up for Canadian industry and say let us start doing some serious negotiation.

• (1420)

It is not a matter of changing policy. Even his colleague, the minister of trade, when we can find him, is prepared to admit that there is a serious problem. He knows that negotiations have to take place, he knows that something has to happen, but he is incapable of doing it. I know that the Minister of Forestry with his new department deeply cares about his region—he had better or he will not get elected next time—but aside from that, his own sense of humanity and well-being would require him to do something. Is he going to do it, or is he going to find himself, once again, captive to that peculiar paranoia that is so omnipresent, so totally in existence on the other side that people are fearful of standing up on behalf of this country and its major industry?

If they do not, Mr. Speaker, this industry is going to be facing increasingly tougher times. As international competition gets tougher and tougher the industry will find itself without the capital. There is a capital grab by the province of British Columbia. There is an export tax which steals it from the saw mills in northern Ontario and prairie regions of Canada.

That is the primary task. I am more than happy to relinquish my remaining few minutes to the Minister of Forestry if he is prepared to say here and now publicly that that will be his first priority, that the minute he is given the new baton of office and the door is open, he is going to buy himself an air ticket to Washington and start saying to the Americans: "The game is over. We have had enough fun and games with this particular little jaunt. You have now been able to exploit us for three years. Is it not time we got down and did something honest and even?". Is the Minister of Forestry now prepared to say that he will undertake that kind of initiative?

I would even recommend, as a member of the opposition, that when the minister leaves Washington, he buys a ticket to Tokyo and starts renegotiating the decision dealing with the Japanese tariffs on lumber. Perhaps he would do the full world-wide tour and hit Geneva where he will make an appeal against that decision, so we can again open up the Japanese market and not lose it on a technicality. I will not blame the government for making the odd technical mistake. However, the government makes more than the odd mistake. It makes them about 100 times a day.

We lost that case with Japan on a technical argument. It is going to take some initiative, motivation, and some minister with will, purpose, energy, thought and creativity, to start representing this area rather than just occupying a warm seat around the cabinet table.

This is not based upon what might have been. This is based upon hard fact. I recall very well one of the minister's predecessors, the since retired Minister for International Trade, who negotiated that softwood lumber agreement in tough battles on the beaches of Hawaii, fighting for Canadians every moment as she dashed herself with suntan lotion. She said this would be the greatest thing that ever happened to the lumber industry. This would solve our problems. Do you recall what she said, Mr. Speaker? You were in the house. She said: "This is a great victory for Canada". Well, Mr. Speaker, you convince the lumber industry that has just lost $352 million last year in net earnings that this is a great victory for Canada.

I simply say to the minister, who I am pleased to see is in the house, that he knows what his job is. I do not say that it is an easy task. I am here simply to urge him and to pray with him that he will take it on. Unless there is a change made, unless we can get a renegotiation of that agreement, unless we can end that agreement, then the future of the forest industry is dim indeed.

For all the other rhetoric that he may provide, and for all the other speeches and policy papers that he may want to introduce, until he addresses himself and his government to the single most serious problem facing the forest industry, he will not have done his job.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we in the opposition will wait with interest to see if this new ministry of forestry is simply a hollow shell providing more creature comforts for the minister of forestry or whether in fact it will do something serious about tackling a problem facing one of the most important industries in Canada.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to have an opportunity to participate in today's debate on this most important legislation. We see before us Bill C-29, an act to establish the department of forestry. I say thank you to the minister. We have waited years and years and years for this. Finally, the government was embarrassed enough to have to do something. I want to say to the Minister of Forestry who is here with us that I remember vividly as a matter of fact way back in March, 1984, when our Prime Minister stated the following: "As a government we would create a department of forestry in order to ensure that the problems now facing this industry are dealt with before it is too late." That was in 1984. We waited all of 1984, all of 1985, all of 1986, all of 1987, and here we are, Mr. Speaker, and finally the government is now going to introduce legislation. Well, I tell you, Mr. Speaker, and my hon. friend from Winnipeg who just spoke on behalf of the Liberal Party, we waited decades, of course, and never had anything at all from the Liberals on this initiative. So I think that their criticisms are somewhat hollow.

As a matter of fact, if my memory serves me, and I believe that it does accurately, when the Leader of the Official Opposition was visiting Prince George, British Columbia, he indicated that it was Liberal policy not to establish a department of forests, that it ought to be within a larger umbrella of industrial development. I simply point that out to my hon. friend from Winnipeg in case that slipped his mind.

Obviously what we are seeing here is an issue that is not a high priority. If it is a high priority, the government would have moved back in 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987 or 1988. It is not a high priority. So let us hope that once we get this legislation in place the Minister of Forests will actually start treating the forest industry as he ought.

When you consider the number of people who are directly and indirectly employed in this industry, which is in excess of 800,000, when you recognize that more than 300 communities in this country depend exclusively on the forest industry for their economic base, and when you recognize that in terms of Canada's trade it is forestry and forest products that are at the top of the list and so critical in terms of our foreign trade, we have to hope now that it becomes somewhat of a priority because it certainly has not been one up until this point.

I must say that the creation of a forestry department is welcome news. Obviously, when one looks carefully through Bill C–29 we find that it is woefully inadequate. We see that it is certainly an opening now. It provides us as parliamentarians with a window of opportunity to not simply accept this bill, which is inadequate in so many ways, but to enhance it now through an appropriate set of amendments. Our forestry spokesman, the hon. member from Prince George—Bulkley Valley, has already outlined carefully what we would like to see as ways and means of enhancing this legislation.

I simply want to refer to them because I think it is critical that the Minister of Forests know right at this point, at least some of the major initiatives that we are going to propose. One, of course, is adding to the annual report provisions. When you see in the legislation that there will be an annual report, unfortunately, it will be like most annual reports of most departments, a glowing comment about the wonderful minister and the wonderful people involved—utter and total propaganda nonsense by and large. This is too serious to play politics with, as we have seen played too often in these annual reports.

Therefore, we are going to include some amendments to the legislation to ensure that the annual report reflect and give us an update on the forest inventory across the country, the employment statistics, the number of jobs created and developed in the various sectors, the most recent trade figures, as well as outlining and suggesting a number of new initiatives and proposals for the forthcoming year. These are simply a number of things we would like to see in the annual report. We want to see this legislation to ensure that we do not get just some namby–pamby propaganda.

• (1430)

Second, we feel that it is appropriate that in the legislation itself there be a call for a First Ministers' Conference on the forest industry each year. Let us face it. There is no more important sector when you consider that people in every single province and in every single territory are involved in this industry. There are hundreds of thousands of people directly involved in this industry. Is it too much to ask that our Prime Minister and the first ministers of each province and territory get together and discuss the challenges facing this critical sector on a five–year basis? We figure that is important.

Then, of course, the ministers of forestry ought to get together every year to discuss the challenges facing the industry and to identify solutions to those challenges.

Also, we want to propose the establishment of a forest trade commissioner. After all, I think we all recognize that now in our shakes and shingles industry 90 per cent of it goes into foreign markets. A good portion of our pulp and paper, lumber and plywood is taking advantage of newly developing foreign markets, but there is much that can be done. There are many more initiatives that we ought to be taking in terms of selling our products which are top rate, top of the line, first rate overseas. We would like to suggest that a forest trade commissioner would be a step in advancing that type of initiative.

I think also that we need in this legislation provisions that will ensure new jobs are created in this industry. We often look about the country and ask ourselves how could we put more Canadians to work meaningfully. I do not mean snap your finger and create a job schemes that are good for maybe three or four months or whatever. We have seen those in the past. That is not the solution in terms of full-time employment opportunities.

It is interesting that in the central interior of British Columbia, and the Minister would certainly be aware of this, a number of municipalities have commissioned studies to look to see what needs to be done in terms of enhancing that forest resource and how many jobs would be created as a result. The figures are absolutely astounding. If we were doing in our country what we should be doing, that is, enhancing, developing and nurturing our forest resource which means thinning, spacing and fertilizing and impending programs for disease, fire and pest control, road building, research and development, and so on, there are tens of thousands of jobs that could be developed, if we are serious about sustaining that forest resource.

These are long-term jobs. If you take the central part of British Columbia alone, there are literally thousands of jobs that could be developed to enhance that forest resource. I cannot think of a better investment. Rather than provide money for various income support programs, whether it is welfare on one hand or unemployment insurance on the other, if we could take that same initiative and develop hundreds and thousands of jobs that must be developed. This is not something that could be or should be. It must be. We have no alternative.

We say this is what should be done in this legislation to implement programs in terms of proper tree planting. We cannot do it overnight. We recognize that. We certainly ought to have a crash program put into place because there are many people who understand the wood industry. They have lost their jobs over the years and could very quickly put that expertise and experience to work, to say nothing of the thousands of experienced tree planters who would enjoy working full time in developing the forest resources of the country. We put that as a very high priority in terms of amendments that my hon. friend from Prince George—Bulkley Valley will be providing once we get into the committee stage.

I also want to refer to the FRDAs. I have here the Forest Resource Development Agreement between Canada and British Columbia. I notice that it expires in March 1990. Just a few months from now it will expire.

Many of us from British Columbia are becoming quite concerned with this expiry date approaching because we have noticed that when these agreements expired in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba the government did not renew them. They just said: "That's it, we are going to abandon the forest industry. We are going to abandon working with the provinces to enhance the forest resource in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba". Here is British Columbia coming up next.

What this means—the writing is clearly on the wall—is that this government has no plans to sign a new agreement between British Columbia and the federal government to enhance and support the forest industry. This is critical, of course, in a province where the forest industry is the number one economic sector.

We would suggest that the government show that this matter of the forest industry is a priority. It should commit immediately to signing a new agreement with the provinces by which the federal government and the provincial governments can develop a long-term forestry strategy to ensure that the forest industry not only is maintained in a healthy condition but is going to be there for future generations. This of course means that we have to spend some time developing those lands that have not be sufficiently planted. We have got thousands and tens of thousands of hectares of forest land that we refer to as NSR, non-satisfactory restocked lands. These are forest lands where companies have gone in, usually clear cut, logged off all the trees and just left. If that is not insanity, I do not know what is. Other forest producing nations look at us, scratch their heads and think we must be crazy to cut down tress and not restock the land. That is exactly what has been done.

British Columbia, of course, had the very unfortunate experience to say to the forest industry: "We want you to monitor what you are doing. We want you to be self-policing. We want you to be self-managing". They tried that for a year. The results were so dramatically negative that they have had to renege on that. This makes the case that legislation at the provincial and federal level is critical if we are going to maintain that forest resource.

Up until now the province of British Columbia and Canada had an agreement which involved $300 million over five years for reforestation and silviculture. That is $30 million a year, which I think is a pittance. I think if we are serious we have got to increase this, say, to a $1 billion over the next five to ten years.

Mr. Redway: Why not?

Mr. Riis: The minister says: "Why not?" I applaud him for that comment. Why not spend that kind of money and put a few tens of thousands of Canadians to work meaningfully? You might ask where are we going to get $1 billion. May I suggest where? By implementing a minimum corporate tax like they have done in the United States. It would generate a few billion dollars each year by doing what President Reagan did in 1986. He introduced a minimum corporate tax because he felt that if you have as we have in Canada tens of thousands of corporations that do not pay any income tax at all they should pay their fair share. They should not pay too much or excessively; they should pay something. It is unfair when the welding shop down at the corner of the street is paying tax but the Royal Bank of Canada or General Motors pays no tax. We in the New Democratic Party say that is unfair.

If the Minister is looking for a source of revenue so that in fact he could put $1 billion into the agreements between Canada and the province of British Columbia over a five to ten year period, may I suggest that that is one place where he can start to look.

I also want to make a point, and I say this as an honorary member of IWA Canada Local 1-417, that it is time that we stopped expecting those people involved in the forest industry to pay for our parks, to pay for our wilderness areas and our recreational lands. If we as a country want, and we should want, wilderness areas set aside, parks set aside, conservation areas set aside, which are laudable and necessary goals for our country—we have even set 12 per cent as a guideline in terms of lands that should be set aside for these uses—then it should not be those people employed in the woods industry that should pay for this. It should be society that pays for this.

We need to find some mechanism to put in place so that it is not pitting those companies and workers in the forest industry against those people who want to set aside these lands for uses other than forestry. We need, if I can use the parlance of the free trade deal, a dispute settlement mechanism whereby we can have a process, if there is a dispute over the future of certain lands that could be harvested for forest industry reasons, to get away from emotionalism and have reasonable decision making brought forward. Then we can have, if you like, lands that will be harvested in terms of the forest industry and other lands that will be set aside for wilderness conservation and park zones.

I think this is becoming paramount. This emotional crisis that we have to deal with on a valley to valley basis must stop in this country. I would like to see the minister of forests, as a result of the development of this new ministry, playing a leadership role. If he could do that in the next three years he would be making quite a contribution to this country. I will tell you that my hon. colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley will be urging him at every opportunity to do just that.

If this is the kind of leadership that we can expect from the federal government? A lot of people ask: "What is the role of the federal government in terms of the forest industry?" After all, our Constitution gives this area, if you like, to the provinces. It places resource development and so on under provincial jurisdiction.

There are all kinds of initiatives that can be taken. I have identified research and development. I have identified the whole matter of leadership and partnership in reforestation and silviculture. If we had in our country a long-term agreed upon forest strategy involving those people employed in the industry, the investors, the regional governments, local governments, provincial governments and federal governments, can you imagine what kind of a dynamic forest industry we could have in this country? But that requires leadership.

I am pleased to say that Bill C-29, an act to establish the department of forestry, is a step toward establishing and accepting that leadership role. I encourage all of us to do whatever we can as we develop this legislation in the next number of weeks to rally around, to not only introduce this legislation which is pretty weak, inadequate and lacking but to develop a bill and to develop the resulting department of forestry that actually will accomplish what every single thoughtful parliamentarian who understands this industry wants it to do, that is to say, provide leadership and to ensure that Canada's number one export industry is not only maintained but is encouraged to grow and more particularly is there for future generations to work in and to appreciate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to call it three o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Accordingly this House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

WORLD HABITAT DAY

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this House a significant occasion in housing around the world. Today is World Habitat Day and it gives us the opportunity to focus our thoughts on just how vital the home is to each and every one of us.

For most of us Canadians, it is a day to be thankful for our good fortune, for by and large we are among the best housed people in the world.

[Translation]

Unfortunately, many do not share our good fortune. One billion people in the world do not have decent, safe, sanitary housing. That is why the United Nations General Assembly in 1985 designated the first Monday in October as World Habitat Day.

[English]

The United Nations Centre for Human Settlements, or Habitat, has developed an ambitious plan to address shelter issues, the Global Strategy for Shelter to the Year 2000. It was adopted by the United Nations General Assembly in December 1988. The UN believes that no country can claim to have solved all of its shelter problems and therefore all countries should make a commitment to meet shelter needs.

The theme for World Habitat Day 1989 is "Shelter, Health and the Family". This highlights the link between these critical aspects of human welfare. Without proper shelter, including housing, clean water, sanitation and community services, the risk of disease is vastly increased and a stable family life becomes almost impossible.

As one of the world's best housed nations, Canada has experience in solving housing problems that we would like to share with developing countries and with developed countries alike. On the other hand, we have not yet solved all of our own housing problems and we too can learn from the experience of other countries. Canada supports the global strategy and regularly exchanges information with the UN on Canadian initiatives to address housing issues.

Since hosting the International Habitat Conference in 1976, the federal government has provided financial contributions to the information activities of the United Nations Centre for Human Settlements.

[Translation]

The Habitat Information Office for North America and the Caribbean was originally located at the University of British Columbia in Vancouver and later moved to York University in Toronto. We are pleased now to house it in its new quarters in Ottawa. I am happy to announce that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has renewed the funding for the Information Office's activities by granting it $750,000 over three years.

[English]

I would like to close by borrowing a few words from the World Habitat Day message of the Secretary General of the United Nations. The home and family are the nucleus of the global community. The home is where we bring up our children, where we find our values, where we develop our abilities. The home is where the fabric of society is woven. In Canada, we share these principles and we continue to do all that we can here at home and internationally to ensure that people have adequate shelter.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Official Opposition, I am pleased to have this opportunity to draw attention to World Habitat Day. This occasion, the first Monday of October, was so designated by the United Nations General Assembly in 1985 as a means to focus the world's attention on the desperate battle to improve the shelters of hundreds of millions of people on this earth.

It is indeed shocking that a billion people around the world are in need of adequate housing, with facilities most of us here take for granted, such as clean drinking water, sanitation facilities and a safe environment for our children with educational and employment opportunities on our doorsteps.

Inadequate housing denies people the opportunity to lead fully productive lives and to help in the building of their communities. For many people throughout the world, our own country included, the lack of housing is a denial of life itself.

As the minister stated, the theme of World Habitat Day 1989 is "Shelter, Health and the Family". The theme recognizes the fact that shelter is a basic need to us all. In the absence of adequate secure shelter, there is anxiety, anger and frustration. One cannot dispute the linkage between adequate housing and good health. In the absence of adequate shelter and good health, how is the family to survive? How are parents expected to build a better future for their children when their thoughts are dominated by fears of losing what shelter, however inadequate, they possess?

The problems and heartbreak associated with inadequate housing are not limited to the squalid slums of the Third World. Here in Canada, hundreds of thousands of families and individuals live in inadequate housing, often at prices that force them to go without other necessities. The growing network of food banks and other emergency services in Canada can be directly linked to the shortage of affordable housing in this country.

This government has exacerbated the seriousness of the situation by its refusal to provide strong leadership and commit the necessary financial resources to substantially improve the living accommodations of the homeless. I might add that in this morning's The Toronto Star, the minister's statement that we do not need housing and that it is not a national issue in this country is totally irresponsible.

For those whose housing tenure is so insecure that they are in fact homeless and for parents whose children are denied the many joys which should accompany childhood, the task is great both here in Canada and around the world.

I urge the government to give this matter the attention it deserves. I applaud the initiative of the United Nations in pursuing a global strategy as a means of finding solutions to housing problems around the world. I am proud that Canadians have the opportunity to participate in this quest.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome World Habitat Day on behalf of the New Democratic Party. We hope that the location of the Habitat information office in Ottawa will result in work which will improve our efforts to house people in decent conditions both in Canada and throughout the world.

Many of us have been shocked at recent media reports of death squads in Brazil preying on the more than one million youngsters who are forced to sleep in the open each night. Another media report, most recently in The Vancouver Sun alludes to the hypocrisy of the Canadian government in its dealings with the issue of asbestos.

The United States plans to ban the use and the importation of asbestos by 1997. There is no safe level of asbestos exposure, according to health experts. The Conservative government angrily disagrees. The hypocrisy of the Canadian government in supporting a dangerous industry that is worth $300 million a year and some 2,600 jobs extends far beyond the U.S. border.

Canada's asbestos industry has busily built up export trade in the Third World, where less sophisticated societies are not so scrupulous about safety. Countries such as Pakistan, Korea and Thailand use asbestos to provide housing for the poor. This is the kind of contradiction in which the Conservative government is embroiled.

It is significant that the United Nations, which has declared this to be World Habitat Day, has found that one billion people are not properly housed. No one nation is immune from shelter problems. For Canada, which has seen substantial cut-backs to both international assistance and housing budgets this year, the ground that has been lost.

A government that stands today to celebrate an international day of shelter might also be called to account for some of the following issue which it alone has responsibility for: budgetary cuts for the one program which renovated housing for low income Canadians. The Rental Remedial Action Plan, a program which brought basic improvements to the rooming house and low-income rental housing and is vitally important in our cities, is now terminated. What will replace it? There is reduction of co-operative housing from the proposed target of 5,000 units per year, which was never attained, to a now paltry 1,700 units which is supposed to serve all of Canada. How can we tackle affordable housing this way? It is a crushing blow to housing affordability that present high interest rates and the future goods and services taxes will bring to Canadians. It is no overstatement to say that the goal of housing Canadians to a decent standard is receding despite our unparalleled affluence.

The government, in its wisdom, cannot even fund such worthy self-help projects as Project Beaver, an organization which has specialized in training people in rural and remote parts of Canada to house themselves. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Surrey North, who is our housing critic, is fond of saying that there is no housing problem for the wealthy in Canada. The market does provide everything beyond our wildest dreams but increasingly, the market which this government puts its faith in has nothing to offer in terms of affordable accommodation.

I wonder if this is to be our message to the world on World Habitat Day, put your faith in the magic of the market, and if that does not work, then hope for some charity. It is not the way forward that we in the New Democratic Party endorse. We will be pressing for a housing policy which will house all Canadians and one which will be an example to the world. That would be a goal worth striving for on succeeding World Habitat Days.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-39, an act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. minister shall have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I have the responsibility to table a petitions with regard to the impending announcement on VIA Rail and the savage cuts the government is proposing. These petitioners would like this House to consider the following.

The Government of Canada has decided to eliminate many of VIA Rail's existing routes and thousands of jobs. The people of Canada deserve a high quality passenger rail service, including modernized equipment throughout the network and a rapid rail system for the Windsor—Quebec City corridor. The Government of Canada, in acting in the way it is going to act in a few days to come, are indeed cutting into a very essential service. These petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to urge the Government of Canada to not cancel in whole or in part rail passenger services in Canada.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I too have the honour and duty to rise under Standing Order 36 to present several petitions containing several hundred names of constituents of mine from Brantford and Brant county, but also from other centres in southwestern Ontario, severely criticizing, indeed, condemning the government for even tampering with VIA Rail, let alone shutting it down to cities like Brantford.

At a town hall meeting yesterday afternoon, at which over 300 people turned out to a tri-level meeting, this petition was signed by many more people. The petitioners call upon the government not to terminate rail passenger service to Brantford, Woodstock and other communities in Ontario, but indeed to expand this environmentally-friendly and cost-effective means of transportation, if it was properly administered, properly funded and properly set up. Every other country is doing it. There is no reason why this country cannot do it.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of the Canadian constituents across this nation who are violently objecting to the proposed cuts to VIA Rail. VIA Rail is an essential service to those rural communities across Canada. Older people depend on this to keep their medical appointments at hospitals, particularly from Sarnia to London and in other areas of Canada. The petitioners humbly call upon this Parliament to urge the Government of Canada not to cancel in whole or in part, rail passenger services in this country.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit a petition signed by many Canadians who are voicing their opposition to the proposed goods and services tax and who say that the proposed tax is just unacceptable. They just cannot bear the increased taxation. Many small businessmen and women feel that their businesses not only cannot handle the new tax but cannot handle the cost to them of collecting the tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition certified correct as to form and content and signed by dozens of constituents, ordinary Canadians, objecting to the government's intended plan to decimate VIA Rail. It is a pleasure to present this document on behalf of these petitioners.

[Translation]

OPPOSITION TO PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Madam Speaker, it is also my duty to present a petition from people in the Windsor area who, just like those in the riding of Beauséjour, want to express their unhappiness with the Government's planned legislation to tax goods and services.

[English]

The petitioners want to express their concern, whereas the imposition of this tax will create an onerous burden on small business and will also cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by residents of my riding of Kingston and the Islands and the neighbouring riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington.

I may say that I collected these petitions personally on a VIA train going to Toronto one morning in August, and the persons I requested to sign the petition were persons who boarded the train at either Kingston or Napanee. There are 54 signatures on the petition, though a few others came along and asked to sign it because they had heard there was one on the train. This train deposited a large number of these people in Toronto and then presumably they came back by a train later in the day.

The rumour is that the government is considering cutting this train and it seems to me to be the height of folly because all these people do have to take the train back, so if they cut this train, how are they going to go?

These people who have signed this petition are praying for the government to avoid any cuts to VIA Rail and to save the national rail service to which Canadians have contributed for so long.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I too have the honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 from people from Victoria, Vancouver, Coquitlam and Port Moody in British Columbia, who are distressed with the decision by the government to curtail VIA service in parts of the country, and to begin the dismantling of VIA. They are simply calling upon the government to reconsider these cuts. They are asking the government to actually give VIA a sufficient budget in order to enable it to maintain its national mandate to provide passenger service.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, on a different topic, again it is an honour to present petitions on behalf of the residents of Kamloops, British Columbia, who are concerned about the government's proposed sales tax and are asking the government to simply back off from proceeding with this punitive tax.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to introduce a petition from Canadians who are concerned about the new goods and services tax, about its effect on higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment and in particular, the unfair hardship it will place on low and middle-income Canadians. They ask that the government abandon this proposal.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I too have the honour and privilege to table a petition that has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners are all residents of the north shore communities of Rossport, Schreiber and Terrace Bay who are currently, and I emphasize currently, served by The Canadian. They point out that the Progressive Conservative Party said in its report on passenger rail services that the federal government has a responsibility to ensure that rail passenger services in Canada be retained, modernized and expanded as an important part of our national transportation system, and to that end, it is recommended that the federal transportation spending priorities be reordered to put a greater emphasis on rail passenger services. Obviously, the petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reject the cuts to VIA Rail so that they can keep their only option in the wintertime.

• (1130)

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a duly certified petition with 65 signatures from the city of Kingston protesting the Government of Canada's proposed cuts to VIA Rail.

These petitioners are most concerned for the economic health of their community and feel that the annual subsidies provided by the Government of Canada to VIA Rail are not disproportionate to subsidies required for roadways or airports. The petitioners urge the Government of Canada not to cancel VIA Rail.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, it is my duty and honour, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present this petition to the House. The petition is in support of VIA Rail. I was in my riding on the weekend observing the one hundred and third anniversary of the E & N Railway in my community.

This petition is from many people from both the lower mainland and from Vancouver Island who want the VIA network upgraded, both VIA equipment and the sufficient support to VIA to carry out its mandate to provide passenger service.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition which has been certified correct. It is a very even petition without any pejoratives in it.

It is from constituents from my riding, mainly from the Windsor and Hants County area, commenting on the rumours and plans to curtail VIA service and asking the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail at its present national network, to upgrade the service, to have new equipment, and to revise the costing arrangement with the railway companies.

In the meantime these petitioners will join the efforts of Transport 2000 and Rural Dignity of Canada in order to obtain fairness, justice and satisfaction for their legitimate demands.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure and the honour to present a petition on VIA Rail that has been submitted according to the rules and regulations governing such. This railway system has bound the nation together over the years and has played a key role in economic and social development of the nation.

If the latest information with respect to its possible reductions are carried out, there will be harsh and brutal effects on workers across Canada. I think particularly smaller communities in Canada, as well as large centres such as Winnipeg, will be victimized. We call upon the government to invest in our rail system as opposed to destroying it.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents asking the government to reject this proposed goods and services tax.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure and duty to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of a number of constituents in Timmons who humbly pray and call upon the government to reject the current proposals for a goods and service tax and further to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I have the privilege today to table before this House a petition signed by the required number of signatories from the city of Belleville. It has been properly certified.

Signatures were received when the Liberal party embarked on the task force across this country to ensure that passenger rail service would continue. Obviously, from announcements that we anticipate in the next 48 hours, it is going to be severely cut. The petitioners ask this government to reconsider its position.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to present a petition on behalf of citizens of Ignace, Ontario, hopefully not another lonely voice in the wilderness.

There are many, many voices in Canada that are rejecting the VIA Rail cuts and the proviso "Use it or lose it" has become "Lose it or lose it".

I am very honoured to present this petition rejecting these VIA Rail cuts.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition to this house for the people of Kingston, Ontario, on behalf of the Hon. Member from Kingston and The Islands who are asking this government to retain our national passenger rail service in Canada.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present to this house, pursuant to Standing Order 36, an attached petition which has been certified correct as to form and content, from various citizens in southern Ontario from cities, towns and communities, both rural and urban.

They petition this government to reconsider its decisions regarding VIA Rail and to protect those interests of Canadians that have been generated by the rail system and passenger transport system, that have promoted tourism and economic activity, have tied Canadians together and have kept the lifeblood of this country running.

They petition this government to reconsider its decisions to cut VIA Rail and to instead infuse more productivity, funds and resources to making a very effective means of transportion even more so.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, I am honoured and pleased to rise in the house today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to urge the government not to cancel in whole or in part VIA Rail passenger service.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Madam Speaker, I ask that all the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Before recognizing the next member, I wish to inform the house that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 13 minutes beginning at one o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra):

That this House condemns the Government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including:

1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary;

2) an unjustifiable high interest rate policy, with an interest rate spread between Canada and the United States that is at record highs;

3) negligence in the management of Canadian trade causing unparallelled reductions in our trade balance and a loss of jobs, and threatening the survival of many formerly thriving Canadian industries;

4)abondonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forest industries; and

5)continued neglect of regional disparities.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to address the house considering the government's economic record, in particular our record on job creation. I welcome this opportunity because since this government took office Canadians have experienced a wide economic expansion combined with steadily decreasing unemployment that, despite what the prophets of doom and recession may say, the economic expansion shows no signs of letting up.

One reason we have succeeded in turning the economy around was that five years ago this government committed itself to economic renewal and to the sometimes difficult measures needed to effect change and generate growth. In short, we had and still have a coherent comprehensive economic game plan based on the direction Canada must go if our labour market is to succeed today and in the future defined by new skills and demands and growing international competition.

On the evidence it would seem that the government's blueprint to generate meaningful long-term economic change is proving to be the right one. The simple fact is that since the government took office in September, 1984, unemployment in Canada has fallen from 11.6 per cent to 7.4 per cent and continues to fall. In this period the total employment has risen by 1,555,000 jobs and 87 cent of them are full-time jobs. More important, of all the new jobs created since 1984, 56 per cent have been filled by women.

When this government took office we recognized that youth employment was an area of particular concern, not only for our young people themselves but for the long-term health of the Canadian labour market. With this in mind the Minister of State for Youth has implemented far-reaching youth strategies with the provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland and is considering other initiatives to ease the transition of young people into the world of work.

• (1140)

On the broader front we have also successfully initiated two comprehensive agreements which have signalled a new era in federal-provincial economic co-operation. I am speaking of course of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the Western Economic Diversification agency. These two initiatives, along with the industrial adjustment service and the Community Futures Program, have established a co-operative, pro-active approach to dealing with inevitable industrial or sectoral adjustment. Their successes in revitalizing companies and communities and saving jobs is directly related to involving the very people affected—employers, union representatives and community groups.

This government understood from the outset that the long-standing regional disparities could no longer be addressed through the traditional piecemeal so-called make work programs administered from central Canada.

Over the past five years progress has been made to minimize these disparities and, while much remains to be done, the processes and the programs are in place along with a new spirit of co-operation to generate long-term regional growth. Since 1984, employment has risen in every province, by 19 per cent in British Columbia and by more than 10 per cent in seven other provinces.

Just as significant as the number of jobs for Canadians is the type of jobs they have been getting. Through the Canadian Jobs Strategy, which we introduced in 1985 as part of our long-term economic blueprint, almost 1,500,000 Canadians have received training and on the job experience. After participation in a Canadian Jobs Strategy project most have gone on to permanent employment in positions relevant to today's labour market needs.

Consistent with the mandate of the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the large majority of participants have been those Canadians who are most in need—women returning to the workforce, young people who are unemployed or underemployed, the disabled and native Canadians. By turning decision making and budgetary leverage over to the regions, Canadian Jobs Strategy programs are operating with maximum impact and cost effectiveness.

It is clear that Canadians are responding to what they perceive as a necessary and workable package of initiatives to bring about economic renewal. The Canadian Jobs Strategy is part of that package. Comprehensive tax reform to bring about a more competitive tax system, including the GST, is part of the package. The free trade agreement is also part of that package.

I should say at this point that sales tax reform could raise employment from the start and create more than 60,000 in the private sector. The opposition always talks about the 4,000 people they say will be added to the public roll. I say again that they say that; we do not say that it is 4,000. That is their estimate. The fact is that there will be at least 60,000 new jobs created by the GST in the private sector.

Statistics Canada labour force surveys released since the agreement was signed in January show that total employment has risen by 209,000 jobs so far this year. This growth, moreover, is reflected in almost every sector of the Canadian economy, including manufacturing, construction, agriculture, communications, trade and real estate.

And for those determined pessimists across the floor who insist on seeing, indeed it seems almost hoping for, an economic downturn, let me quote some more recent statistics if I may. Over the last period for which figures are available, July to August, 1989, employment was up again by 73,000 jobs, all of them full-time, shared among men, women, young people. And during this period Quebec among all the provinces experienced the strongest growth. Obviously the remarkable expansion in the Canadian economy is not a temporary thing, but the government is determined to build on this growth, because we understand that to continue to prosper in the future a far-sighted approach to the skills requirements of our labour force and our labour market is needed.

In this regard the Minister of Employment and Immigration introduced an important initiative last spring designed to prepare our workforce for the future. I am referring to the labour force development strategy. As members of this House are aware our labour market is undergoing tremendous change. Canadian business and industry face challenges posed by technological change, expanding global markets and world competition. The labour force development strategy is part of the government's ongoing response to those challenges.

For the unemployed the strategy marks a significant shift away from passive income support toward programs and services which will help Canadians get working as quickly as possible. For those Canadians who do have jobs the priority will be to equip them with the skills the changing labour market demands. To do this we will be enlisting the involvement of the private sector, unions, educators and other groups as never before. Let me add that this involvement of Canadians from all sectors has been another cornerstone in our economic policy from day one.

It is the enterprise of Canadians that has fuelled and will continue to fuel our national economic renewal. The labour force development strategy is a massive and complex undertaking. I will not touch on the details at this time, many of which are still being worked out in consultation with Canadians from all sectors. But I will add that the strategy is fully consistent with our belief in long-term, fully integrated economic activity.

Canadians are well aware and appreciate this government's commitment to the economy and job creation. Our labour force development strategy underscores that commitment. By tackling the realities of a changing labour market we are working to ensure that Canadians will have the opportunities for productive employment in the 1990s and beyond. This and other contemporary economic issues are simply too large and crucial to address with the haphazard, stop gap programs of the past or programs that leave Canadian business and industry on the sidelines when decisions must be made and policies developed.

The government recognized the need for long-term comprehensive planning when we took office in 1984. We recognize it today as we continue to take the necessary measures to build a foundation for economic success.

Mr. Mifflin: Madam Speaker, I would like to convey to the hon. member for Burlington that I listened with great interest to what he had to say. We have discussed this matter on several occasions.

I have two fairly simple questions. They are legitimate questions and are not made for any particular purpose. I would like to have the member's response if I may.

The first one is that to my knowledge the de Grandpré report, for which I think the government paid somewhere in the vicinity of $1.5 million to have completed, made a recommendation which was very much in keeping with the action that the government was taking, i.e., to combine the safety net of unemployment insurance with the trampoline offered in the sense of training. It was my understanding that we made that recommendation and that there were five members I believe on that committee; only one representative of labour, the rest were business. The recommendation was made that the training should be done but that the money should come out of a tax on business. I believe it was 1 per cent. I would like to know why that was not followed.

The second item is a legitimate question. I cannot understand why the government is getting out of unemployment insurance altogether in a very short time frame.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, what the hon. gentleman says is not quite correct. Bill C-21, which is another matter that we are going through in committee right now, puts a limit of 15 per cent on the amount of money that may be used for training. The balance of the training funds will come from the Canadian Jobs Strategy. I would venture to say there will be a lot more money paid out of the CJS than out of UI funds.

• (1150)

But that whole discussion is another argument that is being put forth by many people who comment on whether we should in fact use UI funds for training. When you boil it all down it is a matter of what you consider a benefit, whether benefits are just dollars or whether you can take someone who is presently contributing to the UI fund and becomes unemployed and use some of those funds to train him so that he can get back into the fund. In other words, benefits can be training as well as dollars. That is the legal opinion we have, and that is the way we are going to proceed in that regard.

The de Grandpré report had many things in it, some of which we agreed with and some we disagreed with. Consequently we did not put it all into effect. I think if we had we would have a larger howl from the members opposite than we have today with Bill C-21.

We are going to proceed with training, and that training is going to be supplemented by people in the areas and regions to indicate to us what training should be done there to enhance future employment of people who are presently unemployed.

Mr. Volpe: Madam Speaker, I have never heard so much gobbledegook and tripe on this discussion as I have heard from the member opposite. I feel offended as a member of Parliament, especially when the member opposite quotes a whole series of Statistics Canada figures that have already been contested in committee, and I am going to have to do it again.

The lower unemployment rate to which he refers is still higher than that which was experienced in Canada prior to the recession. For six years prior to the recession we had a lower unemployment rate than we have now. For six years prior to the recession we had a higher employment rate than we do have now. Those are the kinds of figures the government is using to justify withdrawing from unemployment insurance, even though constitutionally the purpose of unemployment insurance is to provide income support for those who find themselves without jobs in a period of duress.

What the minister and the member opposite are trying to do is boondoggle Canadians into thinking that that money is actually going to go into training. That too is not true, especially when he quotes figures like 15 per cent. The 15 per cent of premiums, according to 1989 estimates, will net the government $1.8 billion. Last year and for 1989 estimates under CJS for job training programs, the government has slotted less than $800 million. It has cut $700 million over the course of the last four years.

The Conservatives expect us to believe that while they are cutting funds from training they are going to use moneys that are derived for insurance purposes and for income purposes for training. I do not think Canadians are that stupid. We are certainly not gullible.

The member opposite is perpetrating an absolute untruth when he talks about the constitutionality of using that 15 per cent of funding because first of all that 15 per cent of funding is going to net more moneys than they anticipated. It is a windfall that they are going to abuse, and I say that deliberately because there is already some legal opinion that that 15 per cent constitutes a complete and total fundamental change of the UI system.

Mr. Kempling: If that was a short question I will give you an example of a very short reply.

When we took over the government in 1984 the UI fund was $4.5 billion in deficit. That has been repaid. It is now $500 million in surplus through fiscal 1989 and it will be $500 million in surplus after this year. What you have just said is total nonsense.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Nepean.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to speak on the motion of the member for Vancouver Quadra. It reads: "That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy", more specifically, the threat to impose a 9 per cent goods and services tax, high interest rates, negligence in the management of trade, abandonment of farming, fishing and forest industry and, finally, continued neglect of regional disparities.

I will first address the 9 per cent Mulroney sales tax. What we have here is a massive shift of responsibility from the federal government to individuals, to small business, to low income people, to our elderly and to other levels of government.

Let us first look at how this imposition will affect municipal government which of course the same taxpayer supports but from a different pocket. If I could I would like to refer to a brief submitted by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities to the minister of revenue.

The finance minister assured the Canadian municipalities that local government would not be used as a source of new revenue. The technical paper indicates that municipalities are to be rebated a substantial part of the remitted GST. But even so, there are considerable inequalities which cause a contradiction to the minister's over-all commitment.

According to the FCM report it is the failure of the proposed government formula to recognize the extraordinary administrative burden confronting municipalities under GST. There are several types of tax collection and remittance requirements to which they will be subjected. To name a few, they will be faced with the task of tracking the applications of any good or service acquired in order to determine the appropriate GST treatment, and the government formula will vary from municipality to municipality. Some municipalities will be winners and other municipalities will be losers.

Second, compensation for administrative costs applies to small business. Why not municipalities?

Third, cash flow costs are ignored while waiting for the rebate.

Fourth, the burden of a federal tax on top of a provincial tax will increase costs to municipalities beyond the amount recognized in the formula.

Fifth, the commitment of the Minister of Finance to municipalities was that services such as telephone systems, natural gas, hydro, water—they sell their water—would not be subjected to the tax increase, and yet the technical paper states the contrary. The Minister of Finance, in spite of that commitment to the municipalities, has reneged on all those commitments to those municipalities. Their only source of revenue is from the property tax base and whatever grants they are at the mercy to receive from the province and the federal government.

Government members have no one to blame but themselves when faced with a public that has nothing but doubt and cynicism over the government's true motives. First they said it would be revenue neutral then they said it would be visible. On both counts the government lied, and therein lies the lack of trust the public has for this government.

Further, the government's misleading sales tax ad campaign shows contempt for Parliament and undermines the democratic process. Financially depressed regions of the country will be given not a double whammy but many, many whammies. First the 9 per cent GST, then a massive reduction in the federal government spending on regional development. Cut-backs on the UI program and transfer payments will be reduced to the provinces by one percentage point. Finally, those outlying regions will be the hardest hit with far higher transportation costs for all their goods.

High interest rates will go hand in hand with the GST and will for some time to come. Other ill effects will be higher taxes, higher inflation costs and fewer jobs. The government itself has admitted that the GST will raise inflation by two and a quarter per cent in 1991. We know that the Bank of Canada sets its interest rate by the inflation rate.

The GST will seriously affect trade in Canada. The Conference Board of Canada estimates that 72,000 jobs will be lost because of the GST.

My time allocation does not allow me to mention all the negative aspects of the GST, but is it any wonder that taxpayers are concerned?

• (1200)

The government has doubled tax revenues in five years, and yet has doubled the national debt in the same period of time. In addition, these five years were ones of unprecedented economic growth. The government earned billions of dollars in excess revenue over estimate in the past five years. What did it do with this money? It certainly did not go to reduce the deficit. This government has mismanaged the affairs of the country to such a horrendous measure that they are now panicking and moving forward to a disastrous GST.

I hope this government gains its senses before the citizens of this country revolt. The imposition of a 9 per cent sales tax, a consumption tax that will hurt those who can least afford it, is not acceptable or is a 7 per cent or a 5 per cent or a 3 per cent GST acceptable. This government must negate this whole plan and go back to the drawing-board to find a more equitable way of replacing the manufacturers' sales tax.

I have a motion which I would like to put forward. Given the importance of this debate and given the great opposition to the GST and the number of people who wish to speak, I move, according to Standing Order 26(1):

That the House continue to sit during the lunch hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to stand here today and address the motion that we see before us, a motion that some of my friends opposite spoke to last week which gave me the opportunity to respond at that time.

If I could, what I would like, is to take this opportunity to speak in the inevitably short 10 minutes specifically on the fishery. The fishery is such a critical part, not only of my province of Newfoundland and Labrador but, indeed, of Atlantic Canada, parts of Quebec, certainly British Columbia and growingly, provinces in the areas that we do not traditionally consider part of the fishery. It is an industry that I would suggest is finally being recognized as a national industry. It is an industry that is important to all Canadians no matter where they live and whatever they do to make a living.

I am horrified by the motion we see before us which states:

That this House condemns the Government for the mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including—

The relevant phrase here is:

—abandonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forestry industries;

Absolutely nothing could be further from the truth. This government has shown time and again that its concern is not only with those industries but the people and the communities that depend so heavily on those industries.

The policies of this government are focused on the long-term benefit, the long-term survival of these industries, of the fishery, to ensure that our people in our communities can depend upon a fishery that gives them a stable, a predictable and a worth-while remuneration for their efforts and which ensures the long-term benefit to those people and the long-term survival of those communities.

You cannot take short-term measures to exact long-term gain. There are no immediate responses to what is a complex and historical problem that has resulted from a myriad of a factors. We face in Atlantic Canada, and therefore in Canada generally today, an industry that looks towards some very difficult times, an industry that will demand consultation. It will demand imaginative and constructive public policy. It will demand strong response from government, from industry, from all of those who participate in and benefit from the fishery. It is that leadership that this government is and will provide to that fishery.

I look at the west coast in terms of the development of the Pacific salmon fishery. We had four good years of runs. We have gone from 13,000 metric tonnes in 1986 to 35,000 metric tonnes today. We have a strong shellfish and groundfish industry in western Canada, in British Columbia.

The free trade agreement panel is hearing the process there. Unfortunately, because of the death of one of the commissioners, there has been a problem. But with the appointment of Mr. Don Tansely who was a long-serving and is a well-recognized senior public servant that process will move ahead. This government has represented the interests of the British Columbia industry with vigour and determination.

The current situation in the Atlantic fishery has grown out of a number of interrelated and complex, scientific, economic, and historic factors. There are some things that we cannot control, such as exchange rates and lower margins of profit. But at the same time this government has moved ahead with a policy to address the problems in our fishery. That is specifically what I would like to discuss for a few minutes.

There are four cornerstones to that action. Particularly in recognition of this problem, the challenge that we all face in dealing with the problems in the Atlantic fishery, the Prime Minister has appointed a special committee of cabinet, senior ministers from a variety of departmental backgrounds to address the problem that we face in dealing with the scientific results on the northern cod stock. That committee will look at exactly what the situation is. It will look at what the options are for all of us, be we government, the industry, or those who depend on the industry. Then, we will develop the response of this government and lead those participating in this debate, this consultation, in dealing with this issue to ensure that we have the stocks that are necessary to protect the long-term availability of the resource that we so fundamentally depend upon, particularly in Atlantic Canada.

Second, the special task force that has been set up to deal with the fishery in Nova Scotia, known as the Haché task force, is designed to examine the state of the fishery off the Scotia shelf. This task force has been consulting broadly with a number of people. There have been public hearings. Mr. Haché will report to the minister and his findings will be discussed by the special committee.

Third, the government has made the problem of foreign over-fishing a priority of the highest order. From the Prime Minister to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, to the Minister of Fisheries, to the Minister for International Trade we have made it clear to the Europeans that the ongoing overfishing is of a disastrous nature. It is of such serious concern to this government that it substantially affects the relationship between two very good friends. This diplomatic effort has been carried out with the European Community generally and with specific members of the European Community, as well as with the United States of America which too, in the past, has refused to honour the necessities of sustainable development and the necessities of protecting that resource. That process continues.

The fourth cornerstone of our policy, something that will benefit both the Pacific and the Atlantic fishery, is to take steps to strengthen fisheries management and to introduce amendments to the Fisheries Act to protect the resource. That will involve increasing deterrents and the effectiveness of enforcement, updating and strengthening fisheries management systems generally.

As I am sure you and my colleagues opposite well know, Madam Speaker, we have taken a number of actions already to deal with some of the these problems. Enforcement has been substantially increased along the 200-mile limit. Fines have been increased. Our ports remain closed. We have increased the spending on science, particularly in response to the Harris commission report, by 80 per cent. We are spending $3 million more to ensure that the science that is carried out now is as good as it can be and that areas that have not been dealt with in the past are dealt with in the future. That particularly relates to things like hydro-acoustics and oceanography.

I would like to talk briefly about the goods and services tax that we have heard so much about and how it relates to fishermen. Neither farmers nor fishermen will charge tax on their sales of food-related products. Fishermen will get back the tax that they pay on anything they buy to use to run their businesses in the prosecution of the fishery. In the past the tax has been payable and been accumulated and people have not seen it. Not only will the GST not apply to the fish they sell, but any of the tax they get back on boats, gasoline, nets or anything at all they use in the fishery will come back.

To conclude briefly, this government recognizes that the fishery in Atlantic Canada is an integral part of the economy of this country. Problems that are faced by the Atlantic fishery are problems that all Canadians share. The policy of this government is designed to directly address that today and in the future.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I have listened to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and a colleague from the Atlantic quite attentively. It amazes me that we can both represent a fishing area and come from the Atlantic yet we can both stand up in this House and declare that there is a very acute crisis in the fisheries on the east coast. Not only is it in fisheries, it is in other areas. It could be infrastructure because of VIA, or a decrease in air services or any of a multitude of areas.

I listened to his colleague talk about unemployment and what a great record their government has. The Member for St. John's East said, "There is nobody hurting in the fisheries. It is only a matter of different rates, the economies of scales, because the dollar has gone up against the American. We are suffering that hardship".

The municipal leaders of three counties, Shelburne where his colleague the Member for South Shore comes from, Yarmouth and Digby, met this summer. They asked to meet with the Minister of Fisheries. They have not had an answer to their request, which was made over two months ago. They have had no recognition from the government opposite. They have not been able to meet with his minister, the minister to whom he is parliamentary secretary.

I say this because there is a hardship. I met a man who has fished for 38 years, 18 or 16 of them with his father and over 20 on his own. He has had seven weeks of employment. That is unheard of in southern Nova Scotia. It is absolutely incredible that in this year—because he had his boat in the boat shop—he has only fished seven weeks when we are there where the fish are and we see the Cape North 30 miles away.

Could the parliamentary secretary implore the Prime Minister to come down and meet with the people in Lockeport, meet with those people who are unemployed, meet with all the plant workers who have not worked for two and a half months this year and two months last year because of the policies of his minister on the fishery, because of the bad management plan? Will he look at the Haché report that he talks about and present the people who came before that commission to the cabinet committee? It is out of the minister's hands. When you set up a cabinet committee to look at the policies of a minister you have taken it away from the minister. It is up to that cabinet committee.

Would he, as a member from the east coast, ask the Prime Minister to act quickly to ease the hardship in the fishery, look at what is happening with many, many thousands of people? I think it is about 11,000 in those three counties who had work in the fisheries who are not working in the groundfishery because of the policies of his minister.

Would he ask the Prime Minister to go to Lockeport this week, Wednesday night, or the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who we have not seen on the east coast? There is an east coast. I do not think he was there all summer. We were off all summer. We asked to meet with him. We have not seen him. Maybe the Parliamentary secretary could be sent to Lockeport on Wednesday night to go with his colleague from South Shore who has to face those many unemployed people. Would he ask him?

Mr. Reid: Madam Speaker, first and foremost, I would like to correct one thing that my colleague opposite has said. She put words into my mouth. She claims that I have said that nobody is hurting in the fishery. I said no such thing. It would be folly to even think any such thing. I know, as she knows, that people are hurting in the Atlantic fishery. I know, as she knows, that there is the potential that a lot more people could hurt in the Atlantic fishery.

But I know, as perhaps she does not know, that there are not immediate, instant solutions. I also know that the people who understand the fishery, who know what the fishery is all about, recognize that there are no instant solutions. The problems that have emerged over years and years result from a variety of reasons, some of them management, some of them science, some of them caused by foreigners, some of them caused by ourselves. But our solutions will come only with a reasoned and reasonable, well-thought out, informed position to start from, and a concerned, conscientious approach to the problems over the longer term.

The hon. member opposite has no corner on concern and, clearly, no corner on knowledge of the fishery. This minister and this government have shown by reacting, by forming a cabinet committee, by appointing the Haché Commission, by dealing with the problem in a consensus-based, organized fashion, not by sitting bleating, putting words into other people's mouths.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is over. There is only five minutes and the hon. member for South West Nova took four of them.

The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre on debate.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the problem with fanaticism is that it blinds one to reality. It is unfortunate that the last member who spoke, a new member of the House who came in with great expectations, has so quickly been absorbed into that fanatical obsession that this government has had about its own peculiar way of managing the economy of Canada. It has blinded him and others to the hard reality of what is taking place in this country. It is too bad that a gentleman who feels so passionate about his region is so blind to decisions taken by his government which are totally eroding the position of the fishing sector, the primary agricultural-forestry sectors of this country, not by some act of God's will, not by some long-term change in the atmosphere, but by direct decisions undertaken by ministers of his government over the last four or five years. These decisions have put the fishing sector in a precarious position. They are now doing the same with agriculture, and with all our primary producers, all our commodity sectors in the economy.

• (1220)

I put to the hon. member the simple but clear decision taken by his government under the free trade agreement to surrender the right of Canadians to apply export taxes to protect their own primary producers on processing. How does he get up and say that somehow someone made us do it when, in fact, it was the signature of his Prime Minister on that agreement that surrendered the one area that would provide, under the fish processing decision, the processing industry on the west coast and, ultimately, the east coast, the right to protect their own industry? It was not some far off, distant, foreign, unknown stranger who did it. It was his Prime Minister.

We now face a situation where we already have an interim report on the fish processing dispute on the west coast, where we clearly see where the decision will go, that the Americans are going to win the case. In the meantime we have given up. We have surrendered. We have voluntarily thrown away the legitimate means at our disposal to protect our processing industry.

Yet that member has the gall, the effrontery and the nerve to stand up and say, "It is somebody else's fault". Sir, it is your fault. It is your government's fault that the the fishery industry of Canada has been put in jeopardy. It is about time you started answering honestly for your responsibilities.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I say the same thing when you go to agriculture. Once again, we are pretending that somehow there is some far distant secret move afoot to undermine agriculture. Well, Madam Speaker, I point to you the decisions being taken in the dairy industry. We talk about the fact that we now have a GATT decision saying we cannot use import controls.

That man of great integrity, the Minister of Agriculture and Deputy Prime Minister says, "Well, it has nothing to do with free trade. It is that GATT decision. What am I going to do about it?". What he forgets, and what the members opposite forget, is that during the debate on free trade, his predecessor, the former minister of agriculture got up and said, "Now, look it, I recognize that by taking the tariffs off on all these agricultural products, on food processing, on dairy products, that that will put our supply management system in jeopardy". Those were the words of the Hon. John Wise, former Minister of Agriculture. He said, "But I have a solution. I will give you a guarantee. I will put a control on imports of yogurt and ice cream." Well, we all said, "We do not think it is going to work, but let us give it a try".

They knew right from the start that that was a phoney, that that was a placebo, that that would disappear. Now it is being challenged and the government has no recourse. It knows that the entire supply management system of Canadian agriculture is under attack. They say, "We did not have anything to do with it". It was their signature on that agreement. They put their name on the document. They knew full well what they were doing. Now they put the entire dairy industry—in fact the entire supply management system—under jeopardy.

Similarly, let us take the pork decision. Once again, we on this side of the House said, "Now, wait a minute. What the free trade agreement is going to do when it is signed is entrench into law U.S. trade requirements. We are going to have to administer U.S. trade law". The Americans, who are pretty smart and shrewd about these things, slipped in the new law last summer, the omnibus trade bill. They rewrote their trade law just before the free trade agreement came into being. They rewrote the definition of what a subsidy is. They rewrote what we could do. So we signed the agreement. The Prime Minister stands up flag-waving, bands beating, saying alleluia, it is a great day for Canadian agriculture. In the meantime, knowing that what we have signed ourselves to is a sentence which says that we can no longer have agricultural stabilization programs, or regional development programs, or agricultural support programs. It is no longer allowed because the free trade agreement, inscribing as it does U.S. trade law, prevents it. Now, there is all this fuss and bother, "We have got to go to the GATT again".

I recall during the election campaign as I debated across the country with the Hon. John Crosbie said, "You know, the reason why Canadians should accept the free trade agreement is because we do not have to worry about the GATT any more. It is going to give us secure, guaranteed access to the U.S. markets".

Now, when we get into trouble, who are they running off to? We had better go back to our old friends, the GATT. What a difference a couple of months makes.

It is no wonder the minister does not want a report card. Because under that report card, whoever would be authorizing it would not only fail the minister, they would send him back for remedial training. The fact of the matter is they knew what they were doing. At the same time in agriculture they were saying, "Well now, we are going to protect all of these agricultural programs". Yet, they had put together their own position paper at the GATT, under the Uruguay round, suggesting that they were going to negotiate away all these subsidies. There it is in their own documents that they tabled in Geneva. They now think we have to renegotiate all this.

The Hon. Member gets up and says, "Hey, we are doing everything we can for the primary producers in this country". They are the forgotten people in this country. They are the ones who feel that this government does not speak for them. There is no voice, there is no one to listen, they simply ignore them.

Of course, when you come down to the fundamental question as to why a lot of this is happening, let us talk for just a moment about the interest rates in this country and the exchange rate that goes along with it. I put on the floor of this House, Madam Speaker, this direct charge and I want the government to answer it. As part of the negotiation, as a side part, while the minister and others were off negotiating free trade, the Minister of Finance was off negotiating with his American counterparts an understanding that we would substantially increase the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar. That was part of the deal. It was not written in words, but that was part of the deal. That is the reason why, right now, that we sit with an 85–cent dollar.

It is why in the last report from Stats Canada, exports in this country nosedived by 8 per cent. We now have a maximum of $127 million surplus in our trade account. That is the lowest in ten years. We are almost at the point of running a deficit in our trade account. That is no accident. It is no coincidence. It does not happen by some manipulation amongst the gods. It happens directly. One of the prices we are paying, a consequence of our new economic relationships, is the fact that we now have the highest point spread on interest rates in the history of this country and an exchange rate which has no basis in the economy whatsoever, except the fact that we made a deal. As a result, whether you are a fisherman, a farmer or a lumber producer, you are paying the price.

On Friday afternoon I quoted in this House figures from British Columbia which pointed out that the profit margin in the softwood lumber industry of British Columbia fell from a high in 1987, $357 million to $6 million in 1988. That is a direct consequence, a direct result of this government's signature on a piece of paper with the Government of the United States.

How often can we have members from the opposite side stand up and somehow pretend that our export market is dropping in a barrel, that primary producers are losing their markets, losing their protection, losing their supply-management, losing their right to market, that all these things are an act of will? There is only one place where the responsibility must be carried and that is on the government opposite. It put their finger on the button. The government signed the paper. It is about time that it gives up this fanatical obsession with the goods and services tax which will only exaggerate the problems all the more, and got back to some serious management of this economy so that once again we can show our primary producers in this country that they are not the forgotten people of Canada.

Mr. Butland: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for Winnipeg South Centre for refocusing on the free trade agreement, which I understand the government no longer wishes to talk about. The government suggests that it has won the public relations battle and are into a new public relations battle, the goods and services tax. So, it is important that we refocus again on the free trade agreement and report cards should be issued. Indeed, it will be labelled a failure.

On the rulings that are going to come before the panel in the not too distant future, it would appear that we are going to lose the fishing ruling.

Very important to my constituency is the steel rail ruling which one year from now I understand, in all likelihood, we will lose. Despite the fact that there is an airtight case, there is every indication that it is an unwarranted, illogical, ridiculous, no proof kind of a judgment by the commerce department of the United States. They are suggesting that there is no basis in fact for the ruling, but it is likely to injure the Canadian steel producers in the future. But, nevertheless, application of American trade law suggests that in fact we will probably lose that ruling as well.

I would ask the member for Winnipeg South Centre, given his free trade expertise, what would his reaction be should we lose both of these rulings? Were he given the opportunity to act, what alternatives would he take?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I suppose the opportunity is one that we clearly stated during the election campaign. We have to get rid of a deal that sells out Canada. That is the starting point.

Unfortunately, what we have found in this deal—and now it is coming home to roost—is that it is skewered against us. The member just pointed out the decisions on steel, on pork and on other areas. The fact of the matter is that what FTA requires us now to do is basically implement U.S. trade law. They changed their law. They rewrote their law to give them the advantage. Therefore, we have substantially weakened our ability to make claims in the international circles, in the international tribunals.

The GATT panel on pork, on dairy products, or steel, is going to say: "Hey, Canadians, you were consenting adults. You got into this relationship with the United States. You knew what you were doing. Don't ask us to bail you out of a bad relationship, a bad deal". All of a sudden we will be forced into a position where—we could normally have referred these kinds of questions and got a reasonably objective decision—we have to recognize now as Canadians that every decision taken at the GATT will be substantially influenced by the existence of the free trade agreement. It is there and it will set the tone. Furthermore in many cases it will supersede any GATT decisions. Therefore, we may get a decision on pork favourable to us under the GATT, but it would not apply to the United States because of the free trade agreement.

We will be forced into a position where we are the odd person out. We will be standing out as one of the eccentrics in the world of international trade because of that agreement. It puts us in a perpetual inferior relationship in gaining proper secure guaranteed access to world markets and to the American market. Clearly, as we said right from the outset, it is time for Canadians to take a hard look at what they got themselves into and take a hard look at how we can get out of it.

Mr. Speller: I thank the hon. member for his wise comments. Is he aware that the American wheat growers are also planning to file a request under section 409(b) of the free trade agreement that could lead to a countervail by the U.S. administration against Canadian wheat farmers? Canadian wheat farmers have always grown and traded fairly. Is the member aware of that?

Could he tell me whether or not, given that we have seen the Americans retaliate recently on pork and given that we have seen the decisions regarding the dairy industry, he feels that in fact the government knew what it was doing when it signed this free trade agreement? Were they merely trying to mislead Canadians, or did they actually know what they were doing prior to signing the free trade agreement?

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): I am never sure that this government knows what it is doing, certainly when one considers its track record. I can tell you what it has done. By becoming involved in that agreement it has put the prairie regions, and in fact the wheat growing and grain growing areas of the entire country, in a position where we are going to lose the structures that we have taken 50 years to build .I am speaking of the Canadian Wheat Board marketing systems, two-price wheat system, all those areas where we have carefully moulded a framework in which we could ensure price stability and active marketing of our products. They are now the number one targets of the United States. Of course what happens, again going back to the U.S. trade legislation, is that they gave themselves new weapons to use which we did not and which we in the opposition warned about.

For example, Durum wheat farmers had the Department of Commerce doing their research for them. They are now getting free assistance from their government and all we get from our government is standing on the sidelines in a fit of absent-mindedness while those kinds of attacks upon the basic structure of our wheat growing areas go on.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to participate in the debate today of the opposition motion. In part, the Liberal motion states:

> That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including—
> 5) continued neglect of regional disparities.

I do not agree with that statement in its entirety. What this government has done is not just neglect regional disparities, but it has gone on an outright campaign to attack the regions of this country. Nothing is a greater example than what it is doing with rail passenger services.

I want to spend a few moments going through the list of routes that every document that we have seen would suggest that the government is going to cut. It is my understanding that those cuts will be announced later this week. Let us start with Atlantic Canada, an area of the country that I have been spending a fair bit of time in learning how it is different and how it is similar to the area that I come from and seeing from riding the train there and talking to people the direct impact that these cuts will have.

For example, the Halifax to Sydney run currently accommodates 102,000 people every year; an incredible number of people using a very small and antiquated train, a train that we gave up in the central corridor years ago. They have got our hand-me-downs, but 102,000 people are using it.

When I talked to the people I found out why they were using the train. From Sydney alone there are over 10,000 men and women, but primarily men, who must go to Halifax for worker's compensation reasons, either for assessment, treatment, or for rehabilitation. Ten thousand people a year use that train. This government, in its wisdom, is going to force those people on to the highways of Nova Scotia, highways that are becoming ever crowded with major trucks including the haulage of coal, becoming less safe, less sensitive to their needs in terms of injured workers. Thousands more take the train to go to Halifax for medical care unrelated to on the job injuries.

Throughout the whole Atlantic, the Atlantic route itself, 267,000 people a year use that train.

The Deputy Prime Minister told the people of Atlantic Canada a few years ago: "Use it or lose it". He gave them a target of 200,000 riders for the year 1990. Two years ago they met that target and now they are exceeding it. They used it, but now this government wants them to lose it.

The other interesting aspect of the Atlantic region is that 20 per cent of the passengers who use the Quebec City to Windsor corridor come off the Atlantic. It is fine and good to say that we will keep the corridor, but there are 20 per cent of the corridor passengers who will not be coming by train. The chances are they will not be continuing by train, but they will have been forced into using the air or bus modes and more than likely will be driving their cars.

The Halifax to Yarmouth line, 47,000 people; the Moncton to Edmundston line, 10,000 people. Clearly, a vast majority of the people of Atlantic Canada use the train on a regular basis. But, instead of providing them with the equipment that will make their riding more comfortable, instead of ensuring that they have the money to do the proper marketing to attract more and more tourists into Atlantic Canada, not just from the New England states but from Europe and from Asia, this government is going to pull the plug on the Halifax to Sydney run, the Halifax to Yarmouth run, and the Moncton to Edmundston run.

Even the Ocean Limited train that travels the North Shore, which is a very scenic route, is going to be reduced to three times weekly. It is ideal for the tourist trade, but because of the meandering nature of the trackage it is not designed to move people from point a to point b in a reasonable length of time. It will see a decline in usage, which I am sure is what the government wants, and in three or four years from now, if they get their way on this one they will say that people were not using it, our deficit is too high, so we are going to have to cut it.

Let me skip to the other end of the country to British Columbia and Alberta. This weekend on Vancouver Island the one hundred and third anniversary of the E & N Line was celebrated. As a passenger service, it is 103 years old. That line, the only line on Vancouver Island, is to be eliminated by this government in spite of the fact that I am told that it was part of the agreement between British Columbia and Canada when British Columbia joined Confederation. Therefore, there may be more that will happen if the government tries to go through with its plan.

On that line 45,000 people a year use that train. I am told by my colleagues from Vancouver Island that that is in spite of the fact that it goes the wrong way at the wrong time of day. Instead of providing a service from the northern parts down to Victoria so that people can come into Victoria for cancer treatments or for economic reasons, it goes the other way. We think it should do both, so that we are using the service as a tourist facility to take people throughout the island but at the same time take the residents of the island into Victoria for the business they have to concern themselves with. But 45,000 people are already using it.

In northern British Columbia the Jasper to Prince Rupert run is going to be reduced to a summertime operation only. This shows once again that this government does not understand the nature of rail transportation in this country. They will quickly point and say: "But those people along that line have other modes of travel. They have air, roads". The people who are saying that are people who drive around in chauffeured limousines on major expressways or who fly in a government plane somewhere. They do not understand that in the wintertime in some of these smaller communities along that line you take your life in your hands getting into a car and driving some place because of the treacheries conditions that exist there, particularly for senior citizens who have driven for years but now recognize that they would like to stay around on this earth a while longer and feel that it is better for them to ride the rails. They are not going to have that option any more.

That is no different from what this government is going to do to my region of the country in northwestern Ontario. The historic Canadian is also the only rail transportation around the north shore of Lake Superior. It parallels the Trans–Canada Highway, a highway where we literally kill dozens of people every winter in automobile accidents. The people in Terrace Bay, Schreiber, Rossport, White River, and all along the north shore, at least today and so far for the first part of this winter, will have the option of catching the Canadian into Thunder Bay. But thanks to this government they will lose that option. Most of them do not have air transportation as an option, so the only recourse they have is to use the bus or an automobile, and studies have shown that people will use an automobile before they use a bus.

Clearly this fundamental destruction of rail passenger service in this country is an attack on the regions, even in southern Ontario, which will do okay because the corridor will be saved. My colleague, the member for Brantford spoke this morning when he was tabling petitions. His community is going to lose VIA Rail service. The community of Havelock will lose VIA Rail service. From the community of Niagara Falls, all the way up to Toronto, including Hamilton, will be served by Amtrak. How ludicrous, or is it?

Is it all part of that grand design that started with deregulation and then free trade to allow the Americanization of our transportation services? Freight railroads have running rights up into Canada now. Now Amtrak is going to come up to Toronto. Not just like it does in Montreal to make the connection with the American system, which makes a lot of sense, nor like it did when the corridor train at Windsor becomes an Amtrak train to provide that connection into the States, but this is to provide service within Canada. That is our job. It is our job to provide that service.

The impact on the regions will be devastating. We know that in tourism alone, passengers who use VIA Rail who are tourists from outside the country spend in excess of $600 million a year. That will be gone. That will not be replaced by some entrepreneur who will pay an arm and a leg to use CN or CP.

I could go on and on. It is a subject dear to my heart, almost as dear as it is to the member for Regina—Lumsden. In conclusion, we will not give up. We are going to fight this to the bitter end.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate from the perspective of a person who represents an area dominated by agriculture and small business.

Noting that my colleague from Brandon—Souris very eloquently addressed the agricultural end of this motion last week, I would like to talk from the perspective of small business.

What we are hearing is a recitation by members opposite of tax increases and expenditure reductions and the suggestion that there is something inherently wrong with that twin thrust. Surely it is time for a little bit of back to basics reality in this country.

At this point in time we have approximately a national debt of $330 billion, probably in the area of $350 billion by spring. Every cent, every nickel represents overspending by previous Liberal governments plus the unpaid interest on it.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): You have doubled it in the last five years.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the input from the opposition member who suggests that it has been doubled in the last five years. Yes, it has, because of the effect of compound interest on Liberal overspending. I challenge the members opposite when it comes time to question me to ask me about the composition of that debt, and I will be very happy to respond to you. I challenge you to do so.

I think it is clear to most reasonable Canadians—not to the opposition but to most Canadians—that we have to take in more revenue and spend less. That is the only way we are going to dig ourselves out of the economic mess which we have in this country.

Yes, Madam Speaker, taxes have increased. Unlike our profligate predecessors, however, we are spending far less on government programs than we take in in revenue at this point in time.

A number of other significant measures have been undertaken. Approximately 12,000 positions have been taken out of the federal bureaucracy, thus reducing its size to approximately the level it was back in 1973. There has been privatization of a number of non-essential Crown corporations, and I think here about enterprises like de Havilland and Canadair, which as Crown corporations were a continual millstone around the necks of the Canadian taxpayers. They have been sold off the private sector and are flourishing today, employing more people than ever before. There is no reason why government has to own these enterprises. A government that can tax and can regulate surely has no need to own these things.

There have been further measures taken. The budget of this spring is the impetus for this debate. Yes, there are government spending reductions. They have been mentioned here: VIA, various military bases, CBC, other programs. How on earth can you reduce government spending if you do not eliminate some programs? It seems quite obvious to this side and to most rational Canadians that there has to be a response to the debt and the deficit problem, the cause of which I think we all know.

In addition to the measures that have been set out, tax reform is an important factor. It is part of our program whereby we are going to discipline spending and reduce the deficit. Sales tax reform means that the goods and services tax will replace the existing federal sales tax. There is nothing new about it at all. There has been a federal sales tax in this country since 1924. For 65 years Canadians have been paying a sales tax and it is a lot of money—$17 billion in federal revenue coming in this year as a result of the federal manufacturers' sales tax. That is the second largest source of revenue which the federal government has, and obviously it must be replaced by something else.

There is only one thing that all parties agree on in this House, and that is the recommendation that the existing federal manufacturers' sales tax is fundamentally flawed and therefore ought to be replaced. The finance committee unanimously passed a motion last year saying exactly that. Therefore, the Minister of Finance, quite responsibly, has brought forward a proposal for a goods and services tax. Thank goodness it has prompted debate in the country. For the first time many Canadians are becoming aware of the fact that there is a sales tax in existence, that it gathers in a lot of money, but it is hidden and people do not know about it. The more debate, the more discussion, and the more consultation we have about it the better. The proposal is out there.

There are some people who are saying that perhaps the base for this sales tax ought to be broadened. There are people who say to eliminate basic food, keep it out of there. They are the same people now who hypocritically are criticizing government in the grey areas of take-out food and restaurants versus basic food.

Either you tax everything, or if you narrow the base you are going to have problems with exemptions. That is common sense but certainly I suggest not worthy of criticism from the people opposite.

Under the current federal sales tax we have four rates: 9 per cent, 11 per cent, 13.5 per cent, and as high as 19 on some goods. We are taxing the business inputs of our domestic companies while our foreign competitors are not similarly handicapped. This puts our companies at a major marketing disadvantage, both at home and abroad. That costs us jobs.

In addition, for most products the import price on which the tax is calculated does not include the foreign manufacturers' costs of marketing and distribution, while the price on Canadian manufacturers' products generally does. The result is that on average the tax paid on most taxable Canadian products is fully a third higher than the tax on competing imports. The importer pays less tax and thus can charge less. That makes us less competitive and it also costs us jobs. That, of course, is why the Minister of Finance has referred to the existing federal sales tax as a silent killer of jobs. That is why I believe most responsible Canadians, and indeed the opposition parties as well, have suggested that that tax has to go, that it should be replaced.

Other industrialized nations have recognized today's economic realities and have changed their tax systems accordingly. No other industrialized nation, with the exception of Canada, continues to have a manufacturers' sales tax. Why would we want to continue to shoot ourselves in the foot?

The first proposals for changing the federal sales tax were made back in the early 1940s. There are all sorts of problems with it. What to do about it? Why introduce a GST?

First, it will contribute to the deficit reduction effort and help ensure that we can continue to pay for the programs and services that Canadians value. Second, the GST is an essential element of this government's plan to make the changes necessary to ensure that Canada can compete in the modern world. The GST will fully remove federal sales taxes from the production process in Canada. It will reduce the cost of investment and improve the ability of Canadian producers to compete both in foreign markets and against imports from other countries. The GST will end the anomaly of a tax system that favours foreign producers over Canadian businesses on our home turf.

There are some 750,000 small businesses in this country. They are the key, the generator, the engine for economic growth. They are the ones who have responded positively to the policies of this government and have expanded their businesses and created new ones with the result that there are over 1.5 million more Canadians working today than was the case five years ago. I salute the small business entrepreneurs, small business investors in this country, because they are the people who are responsible for that incredible record growth.

These businesses will be able to claim input tax credits to get back the tax paid on the purchases that they require for their businesses. They will simply deduct the tax paid on their purchases from tax owing on sales and remit the difference in each filing period. This will ensure that all tax is totally removed from inputs in the production process.

There will be a suggested threshold so that businesses with sales of less than $30,000 can choose to be in the GST system or not. There are streamlined accounting procedures ready. The government will help out with compliance costs. There will be assistance to businesses that wish to purchase more sophisticated point of sale equipment in order that they can write these expenses off for tax purposes. They will receive an administration fee to assist them in the remittance process. All of these measures are designed to keep compliance costs down and increase fairness between small and big business.

Third, it is a fair tax. There are some who have suggested that it is regressive. I fail to understand this. I think it is a knee-jerk reaction from those who have nothing better to do than criticize this government, no matter what. Surely a tax where the more you spend the more you pay is the fairest possible tax, the consumption tax. The people who have money spend more and pay more tax. Those with less income, lower income families, will be protected through a generous refundable tax credit in order to shelter them. It seems to me an eminently fair and progressive tax.

The GST is an essential part of this government's plan to build a stronger economy for Canada, an economy which is not overburdened with a massive debt and debt service charges which threaten future growth and our ability as a country to withstand changes in world economic conditions.

It will improve the fairness of the over-all tax system by putting in place measures to protect lower and modest income Canadians. The benefits of sales tax reform will be substantial, the GST will result in higher incomes and a higher standard of living for all Canadians. It is the right thing to do and that is why this government is proceeding with it.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On questions or comments, the hon. member for St. Boniface.

Mr. Duhamel: The hon. member referred to this as a fair tax. I wonder if he could indicate to me in what way it is fair to students who will be attending colleges and universities, who will be paying additional taxes on a number of services and goods, whereby the education that they are trying to pursue so that they can contribute to our society will in fact be costing them more.

How will it be fair to seniors and those on fixed incomes who will have to pay a disproportionate share of their income in order to survive in Canadian society? How will it be fair to small businesses that will have to handle this nightmare, for they will be given roughly $600 a year to do so and it will cost them three to four times more?

I could give some other examples, but I want the member opposite to go on record and tell me how it is fair to students, seniors, people on fixed incomes and small businesses, and no gobbledegook, please.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): There will be no gobbledegook from this side. All the turkeys are sitting opposite there. This is a tax which is fair to all Canadians. The fact is that the people over there saddled this country with a debt which is approaching $350 billion through constant program overexpenditure year after year after year. They handed out the goodies, and they did not have the gumption to tax Canadians sufficiently for that.

Now, for the first time in 25 years, we have a government which is prepared to face up to the music, to get back to reality, to try and bail this country out of the economic chaos that it is in. Is there any co-operation over there from the guys who did it? Not on your life. They are laughing their heads off over there, Madam Speaker.

There is not a single positive suggestion coming from members opposite. All it is is that mindless, mind numbing criticism: "The tax is terrible. It is awful. Don't cut VIA. Don't cut transfers. Don't reduce government programs. Increase taxes. Build the deficit". Let us have a higher national debt. Let us keep going until all the tax revenue in this country is used to pay interest on the national debt and there will not be a single nickel left over for seniors, not a nickel left over for students and the small business community is going to say, "Why bother? Let us all go and work for the government". That is the kind of nonsensical approach that we were going to get and that Canadians were heading for when they had the boys across the way in charge of things.

• (1300)

Mr. Jordan: Madam Speaker, my hon. friend attempts to play down the effect that this GST is going to have on ordinary Canadians. This is not my basic question—I will get to that—but if it is so commonly accepted then why is there so much furore from his own caucus?

It is a good idea to do this, he says. Perhaps he can answer my question.

It was supposed to be up front and it is not. Why not? Why is the tax not up front? Canadians were promised that. It was supposed to be revenue neutral. Remember that? It is not. It was supposed to be simple. Ask any small corner store operator if he so far has envisaged this as being simple. Could the hon. member answer those three basic questions?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity. First of all, who likes taxes in this country? I do not, and I am sure the people opposite do not like it. The member expresses some amazement that there are people in the country who do not like the thought of what is perceived as a tax increase. I think, first of all, it is time that the opposition stopped persisting in this fallacy that this is a new tax. What we have is a replacement for a tax which—

Mr. Duhamel: Get serious.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): —they themselves agree is fundamentally flawed, cost Canadians jobs, is ruining our economy and must be replaced and which they, in all the years they were in charge, did not have the gumption to face.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier: You are comparing bananas and carrots.

Mr. Duhamel: Answer the question.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Oh, they are aroused over there. Madam Speaker, may I have more time because what I would like to do is outline some figures that I have here relative to government spending. On a current account basis because that is the basis for everything here, talking in terms of a current account—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member is asking if there is unanimous consent for him to continue with his answer.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Gauthier: With that nonsense? Of course not.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): There is the answer, Madam Speaker, they do not like to hear the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Madam Speaker, it certainly is a privilege to be back in Parliament and I appreciate the opportunity today to speak to the motion that is before the House.

Contrary to what the member across has just said, the state of the Canadian economy at present and the effects that a myriad of government proposals will have on Canadians for years to come is certainly not a pleasant theme to address.

As I travelled through my constituency of Hillsborough and other regions of Canada this summer, I was inundated with a barrage of complaints from the average hard-working Canadian. People are furious with the government for trying to impose upon them a completely new and unfair tax system. They are furious with the destruction of their national rail system. They are furious with the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance program. They say, "What right does the government have to take 15 per cent of the workers' contributions to UI given in good faith and use them for retraining programs that are the government's responsibility to provide?"

My home province of Prince Edward Island is reeling from the economic impact of the CFB Summerside closure. No solutions or alternatives have been offered or even suggested to them. And how will they recover and replace this massive loss? And will they ever recover from the sense of betrayal and alienation?

All of the government initiatives outlined in today's motion are playing havoc with an already vulnerable economic base in various regions of Canada. I submit that the future is especially bleak in Atlantic Canada where deep regional disparity already abounds. Prince Edward Islanders, Newfoundlanders, New Brunswickers and Nova Scotians do not mind paying their fair share, but in return they deserve and expect fair treatment from their government. They have received none. ERDA, ARDA, DREE and ACOA moneys barely began to address the problem, and now even they have been slashed. Does this government believe that people can live on salt water alone?

According to an Industry, Science and Technology Canada document entitled Regional Disparity in Canada 1989, and using their definition of deep disparity as: "Below 70 per cent of the Canadian average of earned income per capita", Newfoundland had the highest rate of deep disparity in Canada at 95 per cent; and Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick were next at 50 per cent in 1987. These numbers remained unchanged from the previous year.

These numbers represent more than one million Atlantic Canadians who are living below the Canadian average of earned income. These statistics are quite startling. What is interesting about these numbers is that the government continues to hide behind the claims of creating 1.5 million jobs since September of 1984. What we are asking is, where are all these jobs located?

What we have in Atlantic Canada is more than one million taxpayers who have to maintain an existence on incomes well below the national average. These people are subjected to the same government proposals that are dipping into pockets all over Canada. Canadians in the Atlantic region and elsewhere have been telling me and trying to tell their government that they have had enough.

The government definition of a sound fiscal policy has left us with a total public debt that has doubled in just five short years. After increasing our taxes some 31 times, this government now wants Canadians to dig deeper to pay for its disastrous handling of the economy. At the same time we are losing more and more services and social programs.

Now we are presented with the government's newest magic trick, the goods and services tax. What arrogance, Madam Speaker, to assume that Canadians will fall for this and that they will believe it is a better system when things are only getting worse for the average Canadian.

As the hon. Leader of the Opposition stated last Thursday in the House, Canadians have fraudulently been told that they will be taxed at a lower rate when actually it will be higher. We all know that this tax will not be revenue neutral and that it will not be visible. The tax will not be visible but the hardships that it will create certainly will be.

What is clear and visible to everyone but this government is that Canadians will not be fooled by the latest rabbit pulled out of the hat. We have been told many times over the past five years that our economy is booming. The growth should have improved the government's fiscal situation. Over the same period of time billions of dollars have been slashed from public spending by this government. Yet we are now told that we need a new consumption tax to reduce the deficit.

The GST is nothing more than an unprecedented plunge into the pockets of ordinary Canadians. These people will be hit by higher taxes, higher inflation, higher interest rates and fewer jobs. It would cause chaos in the business community and create a paper nightmare for small business. Over 82,000 small and medium-sized businesses, as members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, are opposed to the imposition of the GST.

Let us touch briefly on how the proposed GST would affect the average working Canadian family. The Minister of Finance was quoted in the?Financial Post? on September 19, 1989 as saying: "Families earning less than $30,000 a year will be better off under the tax". The great favour being granted to these working families by the minister is the enhanced refundable sales tax credit.

I would like to relate some statistics that were presented to the Standing Committee on Finance by the National Council on Welfare in a submission entitled Help Wanted: Tax relief for Canada's poor. Their analysis found that single parents with incomes in the $10,000 to $15,000 range paid approximately $388 in federal sales tax in 1984. In 1991 even with the sales tax credit taken into account, these low-income families would still end up paying about $553 in net GST.

That is 42 per cent more than they paid in 1984. The reality is that the poorer families will be worse off in 1991 if the GST comes to fruition. They will be worse off than they were before the various so-called reforms of the past five years. By 1992 they will be in even more desperate shape, because inflation will begin to gnaw away at those much-lauded tax credits.

Everyone in this House knows that almost 80 per cent of the Canadian population is opposed to this sales tax. Can that many individuals be wrong, while the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are right? Only the most arrogant would think so. I could give an entire litany on individuals and organizations that have studied and researched the GST, including groups in my own riding with which I have met. They all give the same reasons for opposing this so-called tax reform.

I say, and my colleagues on this side of the House say to this government: scrap this deal and come back with a better tax plan, one that Canadians can live with.

Given that I have only a few more minutes, I would like to speak briefly on the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance plan. Once again, this government is trying to put the boots to the ordinary Canadian worker. Specifically, these UI changes will have a disastrous impact on the Atlantic economy and especially on Prince Edward Island. As you are undoubtedly aware, the workforce on P.E.I. is predominantly employed in seasonal operations—tourism, farming and fishing. Thus, unemployment insurance forms an integral part of our province's income profile.

Unemployment insurance was established as a no fault insurance program. It is a safety net and one that workers readily pay into for their protection in case they lose their jobs. I would like to cite an incident that occurred in my riding a few weeks ago. The members of the UI committee that were in Charlottetown heard this from a group that appeared before them.

A worker at a construction site collapsed with an apparent heart attack. An ambulance was called, but the fallen worker did not want to go to hospital. His reason was that he needed the week's work to ensure that he would qualify for benefits. Many employees do not have sick leave coverage or long-term disability plans. Thus they are forced to work when they really should seek medical attention. Their only recourse is to stay at work until they qualify for UI benefits. Now, with the proposed changes a worker will have to put in more weeks to qualify for fewer benefits.

Another concern with the proposed UI changes is the reallocation of $1.29 billion to job training programs. This proposal can only be seen as a slap in the face to Atlantic Canadians. What can Prince Edward Islanders be retrained for that will allow them the opportunity—the right—to continue working and living in their home province?

The bottom line is that they will be paying into a program that will force them to migrate to central Canada to find employment, thus continuing the erosion of the social and economic structure of our province. Our region of Canada is unique. It is unique because of its high unemployment, seasonal work and low wages. The government has failed to recognize this fact and continues to refuse to implement full employment programs which would offer meaningful, long-term employment in the Atlantic region. It makes little sense to force people into job retraining when there are no jobs to move into. What Atlantic Canada really needs is an adequate labour force development strategy. Until then we need to keep the unemployment insurance program as it is.

The present rate of unemployment in P.E.I. is 14.1 per cent. I do not see much prospect for improvement. The government should be advocating more flexibility and increased benefits to reflect the tough economic times that Islanders must face. Atlantic Canadians await proof that this government recognizes and respects their special needs. We have seen none thus far.

In conclusion, I support the motion by the Leader of the Opposition and I call upon members of this House to listen to their constituents, to condemn the government for its destruction of the socioeconomic system that Canadians built, and thus for its betrayal of the people themselves.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Madam Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak on this motion that we are debating today. I am proud that this government is committed to building a strong economy, an economy which is competitive with the world's trading nations.

In order to achieve this goal, we must create a solid base on which to allow our economy to flourish in the coming years. Measures which seek to control the deficit and reduce the national debt are an essential element of this foundation for the future. Equally, measures which seek to establish a sound, fiscal framework to sustain continued economic development are also essential to our purpose. These objectives are reflected in this government's commitment to a sound transportation policy.

Transportation is and always will be at the heart of our nation's economy. That is why we have undertaken to provide Canadians with a safe, effective and efficient transportation system. This system is the core around which our policy of economic regulatory reform was built.

With the advent of free trade, the role played by transportation in our economic development has become increasingly vital as we enter the next decade and the next century. A cost effective transportation system is essential if Canada is to preserve and enhance its position in world trade.

In order to meet this challenge we must make the best use of each mode of transportation: air, rail, marine, car, truck and bus. Continued subsidization of a mode of transportation which costs more and more and is used less and less is not a sound investment in our future, particularly when that investment is being made with the Canadian taxpayers' money. That is exactly the situation we are facing with respect to our national rail passenger network.

VIA Rail's subsidy rose to an unprecedented $644 million in 1988. This translates into an average subsidy of $100 for every passenger that used the system.

We are asking all Canadians to pay this subsidy, but only 3 per cent of the travelling public uses this mode of transportation. Canadians have demonstrated their preference for other modes of transportation. With a market share of 84 per cent, the automobile is clearly the mode of choice.

Contrary to all the rhetoric which has been bandied about in recent months, VIA Rail's performance is worsening. It is not improving. While 1988 revenues did increase by 13 per cent or $26 million, operating costs increased by 15 per cent or $94 million, with the result that government subsidies to VIA for its operations alone had to be increased by $68 million. This means that for every additional dollar earned by VIA in 1988, the government has had to dispense an additional $2.62. So, for every dollar of additional revenue we spend $2.62 more.

Now the NDP, in their economic model, say because the revenue is better in itself then you should keep it, but they never mention the costs that are associated with that. That is the logic that they are putting forth in this argument.

As you can see, prompt action had to be taken to stop this drain on the public purse. That is why the government announced a new policy approach for VIA and asked the corporation to prepare a new business plan which would reflect its new reference levels. VIA was asked to consider all options that would allow it to operate within its budget, including such actions as fare increases, route abandonments, reductions in services on some routes and the take-over of services by private parties.

The government, however, does recognize that in a country as large and as diverse as ours there are some truly isolated communities which do not have access to any other mode of transportation. In order to meet this need, nine routes in five provinces will be maintained and subsidized. VIA Rail's corporate plan is currently under consideration and an announcement will be made in due course. The government expects the financial and operation performance of VIA to improve and to function in a more cost effective manner.

This government has distinguished itself during the past four years through fiscal responsibility and judicious allocation of federal financial resources. When money is scarce it is spent where it is most needed, where it is most likely to produce results.

• (1320)

I invite the members opposite and indeed all Canadians to look at the facts and to judge for themselves the validity of the fiscal realities under which we currently labour. If we have had to make difficult decisions, it is because in 1984 we inherited a legacy of debt. This is a legacy that I personally do not care to pass on to my children and to their children. The difficult choices we have had to make allowed us to reduce the rate of growth of the deficit and bring the rate of inflation down to a more acceptable level.

Responsible fiscal management combined with sound economic policies have paved the road to a rate of economic growth which ranks among the highest in the industrialized world.

As responsible Canadians, we owe it to our children to leave them with every opportunity for development that we ourselves have enjoyed, and I am committed to working toward that end as part of the Government of Canada in 1989.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on behalf of my constituents, small business, all those who will not get the opportunity to appear before the finance committee and who will not be allowed to express their outrage at the proposed goods and services tax. This government was first elected in 1984 in large part because of the Prime Minister's promise of tax reform.

It was argued, with some justification, that Canadians were being unfairly taxed and that the burden of financing government services was poorly distributed across the tax base. The Prime Minister sold himself as the great economic manager, the hero of big business. Five years later Canadians now realize that the Prime Minister has doubled the national debt, introduced crippling and regressive taxation policies and has launched an all-out assault on the pocketbooks of the middle class.

Now in 1989 we have begun to realize the Prime Minister and his colleagues in finance have a far different notion of tax reform than the rest of us. Over the summer I distributed a survey sheet in my riding and asked constituents what they felt were the most important issues facing the country today. I assumed, perhaps naively, that the responses would be primarily about abortion, Meech Lake, or the local issue of Pearson International Airport. Though there were some responses concerning these issues, the overwhelming concern, 90 per cent of the responses, focused on this government's unfair taxation policy.

My constituents are horrified that after five years of empty Tory rhetoric about tax reform, the most progressive concept this government could come up with is the goods and services tax, a tax that is being called regressive, inflationary and the greatest one-shot tax grab in Canadian history.

At a recent Tory convention in Ottawa, Mr. Wilson told the party faithful that the GST is unpopular but necessary. Well, Mr. Wilson is only half right. The tax is unpopular, but it is not necessary.

A quick look at the history of the Tory record shows this government has failed dismally on its promise to bring about tax reform. For example, Tory tax reform since 1984 has meant that an unmarried individual living at the StatsCan poverty line has had his taxes increased by 38.9 per cent under this government. By contrast, a single individual earning a salary of $60,000 has had only a 6 per cent tax increase. This is Tory tax reform?

Another example is the one-income family with two children who live at the poverty level of $24,000. The Prime Minister and Michael Wilson have increased the tax bite on this family by a whopping 61 per cent.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): This is the third time that the hon. member has referred to the Minister of Finance, the member for Etobicoke Centre by his name. She should know by this time that this is not done and she should refer to the Minister of Finance as such. I thought at first it was a mistake but now, the third time, I think it was deliberate. The hon. member for Mississauga East.

Ms. Guarnieri: I assure you, Madam Speaker, I stand corrected. It was not deliberate.

Once again, by contrast, the family earning $100,000 has had its taxes increased by only 7.7 per cent.

Canadians are learning to say: "If this is the Renaissance take us back to the Dark Ages". The new goods and services tax appears to be the silver lining in a full metal jacket. When the finance minister first introduced the idea he promised that the GST would be a tremendous advantage over the manufacturers' tax because it would be visible to the consumer. Well, more trickery, more treachery awaits. The premiers recognize that this is an ill-conceived administrative nightmare of a tax and they are simply not prepared to participate in the finance minister's folly. This tax has not accomplished any of its intended and promised goals.

The GST will not be visible because, as the minister himself stated, the federal government does not have the legal authority to impose a method of collection on Canadian retailers. Consumers will be left in the dark about tax. Is the price pre-taxed, un-taxed or re-taxed? The only thing consumers will know is that they are over-taxed. This government's vision of tax reform is nothing more than raze and pillage.

It is estimated that the GST will plunder at least $6 billion more from the taxpayers than the old manufacturers' tax. This figure, which was rounded off from the government's own technical paper, flies in the face of the finance minister's other promise that the value-added tax would be revenue neutral. This tax is not neutral. It is acid for most Canadians.

Like this government's other tax measures it is nothing more than a thinly veiled attempt to gouge the average Canadian. Not long ago you may remember the bank robber who wore a transparent plastic bag over his head when he approached a teller. Canadians can see through the finance minister's disguise.

It is distressing to listen to the Prime Minister's glib statements in defence of the proposal over the past few months. He has repeatedly tried to mislead Canadians by saying that a 9 per cent goods and services tax is a major improvement over the manufacturers' 13.5 per cent and that consumers may even see costs go down. I wonder if after receiving so many reports, so many failing grades from everybody, from the Canadian Chamber of Commerce to the National Anti-Poverty Organization, the GST will mean lower prices for Canadians. The Prime Minister, like old Ebenezer, will find his conscience after seeing the ghost of elections yet to come.

Let me explain how the new tax will work. Under the current manufacturer's tax, a sofa which costs $500 to produce will be taxed at the rate of 13.5 per cent, or roughly $67, for a total shipping cost of $567. Under the GST any tax that is paid in the transfer of product from producer to producer will be rebated to the manufacturer or retailer with the entire value-added tax placed on the final retail price, which is saved for the consumer, the average Canadian, to pay. So our example of the $500 sofa shipped to the retailer and marked up 100 per cent on the store floor will have the consumer shelling out $1,090. That is $90 in tax compared to the original $67. That is, of course, assuming that the manufacturer will not just alter his original price structure and continue to ship out the sofa at $567.

Perhaps the Prime Minister's mathematics may fool his cheerleaders on the finance committee but it does not seem to have fooled anyone else. If this is the Prime Minister's vision of tax reduction then we can understand the debt doubling under his direction. The minister has countered these complaints by saying that all taxes are unpopular. No one, he says, likes new taxes and so the thousands of ordinary Canadians who have signed petitions written to their MPs and have appeared before the committee do not matter.

If the Prime Minister will not listen, then perhaps he should listen to some of this former allies. He should listen to what business groups have to say about the GST. Groups such as the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian Real Estate Board. What more does the minister need?

Mr. Bulloch of the Federation of Independent Business which represents 82,000 small businesses has said—and this has been confirmed by many businesses in my own riding—that Canada will witness an unprecedented number of small business closures. Companies that are already operating on narrow profit margins will be cut to the bone. The hairdresser, the variety store owner, the shoe repairman are all examples of business people who will find themselves absorbing the cost of a new tax in order to remain competitive. This is not to mention the extra cost of the paperwork needed to administer this paper nightmare. The small business will be hurt in other ways as well. The GST will reduce the over-all buying power of Canadians, raise unemployment levels and generally slow economic growth. These combined factors will devastate the viability of most small businesses because they do not have the financial security to absorb even short-term losses.

An example of how this will affect independent businessmen is well laid out in a letter I received from the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association. They point out that the GST will drastically reduce the profit margins in a number of ways and will drive farmers off the land.

For example, land sales will be taxed forcing up the price of land which the farmer will have to finance. Although the government has promised to reimburse the farmer for the GST, the carrying costs between the time of purchase and the reimbursement will not be covered. Farm implements will increase in price as a result of the inflationary nature of the GST. In fact, the grain farm organization states that the culmination of price increases for all foreign input purchases will prove disastrous. There is a growing sense—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member. Her time has now expired.

Ms. Guarnieri: Can I beg the indulgence of the House, since I was interrupted earlier, to finish my closing remarks?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Ms. Guarnieri: There is a growing sense of despair sweeping the country and it is causing what has been called a tax revolt. It is not a politically motivated force, but it is organized by independent Canadians who are horrified about the direction this government is taking us.

This government has talked a lot about the concerns of the grass roots. It is time the Prime Minister lived up to the rhetoric. Even some Tory back-benchers are taking to the hustings to protest the GST. How do Canadians survive hurricane Brian?

Ms. Langan: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member, as she comes from a riding where rush hour traffic is appalling and in fact all day long is abysmal, if she would agree with the comments of the hon. member from the government side of the House who spoke before her who said that this is the age of the automobile and dismissed out of hand the need for rail transit and the need for commuter transit. I would ask the hon. member if she agrees with those sentiments or if she has other comments to make about that.

Ms. Guarnieri: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. Coming from a riding which has limited access to such facilities as the subway, anybody who has travelled in Mississauga and has been caught in the 401 parking lot will know that our system is far from adequate. Of course I would have to disagree with the hon. member opposite who made those statements.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my neighbour from Mississauga East. Obviously the government still has a tremendous amount of work to do in educating particularly members of the House of Commons because today she gave facts and figures which were totally wrong.

She figured out the sales tax system featuring the manufacturers' sales tax which is being replaced by the goods and services tax, and she had the figures all wrong. I would invite the hon. member to drop over and we will go through her speech. I will show her where she was wrong in her figures, transposing the two taxes, because she was way off base.

I might also comment on small businesses. She referred specifically to small businesses and to the problems that small businesses are going to have with the goods and services tax. In fact small businesses will be paying no input tax on their purchases as they are now. They will be tax-free in all of their purchases and therefore they are going to be far better off, far more competitive with the imports. That is what this tax reform is all about. They will be far better off under the new system than they are now. If the hon. member would examine how the new system works, I think she have to admit that.

Ms. Guarnieri: Madam Speaker, I am all in favour of education. I gladly take up the minister's invitation to meet with him and review the figures. Perhaps we can agree to resume debate after we have done so.

I have one question for the minister. Is this GST or is it the FTA tax?

Mr. Riis: I listened with interest to the hon. member's presentation. I wonder if she could elaborate on a point. The Conservative government indicates that the reason for this tax is to replace the manufacturers' tax which is a killer of jobs. I think that is the name the Minister of Finance used when he described it, yet it is my recollection that when the Conservatives took office it was at 9 per cent, which is the same level that has been proposed for GST. Over the years it was raised to 10 per cent, 11 per cent, 12 per cent, 13 per cent, and then 13.5 per cent. If the government is serious about saying that this tax is terrible, that it mitigates against our exporters and favours foreigners, that it is a killer of jobs, why would the government increase it four times during its term of office?

Ms. Guarnieri: I can only conclude that some of the finance minister's economic advisers have perhaps studied in Argentina and their theories should be tested on animals.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today to speak to this motion. I would like to reiterate what the motion is: "That this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy", and then it cites five aspects of that mismanagement.

I want to point out that this mismanagement is not an accident. It is consistent with the government's political philosophy. It is consistent with the government's vision and it is consistent with the government's overconfidence in the market as the device to solve all problems.

This approach to our economic woes, this vision, this mismanagement, represents what we are now facing in Canada. As my colleague from Sault Ste. Marie said earlier this morning, the government does not like to talk about the free trade agreement any more. We in my party are going to continue to talk about the free trade agreement. The measures that this government is bringing in now are components of that trade deal with the United States. This is what harmonization means.

I will address my comments to just two of those components: first, the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The Canadian Labour Congress last week released startling new figures which demonstrate just how bad the impact of the government's Unemployment Insurance Act will be. While Bill C–21 takes a number of harmful steps, the CLC figures examine only one aspect, and I should be clear about that, that is the increase in the number of weeks of work required to be eligible for benefits.

According to government figures there will be only 30,000 people who would not be able to get enough weeks of work to qualify for benefits. The CLC, however, paid Statistics Canada to produce a study based on the impact of Bill C–21 on people who received benefits in 1988. According to Statistics Canada 128,724 people would not have had enough weeks of work to obtain benefits. This is four times the government's figure.

In British Columbia the government says only 3,000 will be affected. Statistics Canada figures demonstrate that the real figure is 15,845 people. On Vancouver Island where I come from the figures are 3,060 people. This has an economic impact of $15 million lost to my region of the country. When we talk about mismanagement, we also have to talk about the careful manipulation of figures. The government has been withholding this information. It released only some of it in August, four months after tabling the proposal, only because of an access to information request.

The second component of this free trade agreement is the goods and services tax. When any major policy is introduced, it is wise to look at who will benefit and who will suffer. I think Canadians, in spite of a $7 million plus ad campaign, know that they are not going to benefit. It is going to be big business, not small business, that will benefit from this.

It is small business that was talking to the finance committee in droves. I was there when the Chamber of Commerce group came, when the Home Builders Association gave its presentation, and when the construction industry came to give its presentation. They understand in spite of this $7 million ad campaign that this is not good news. I think, though, that we have to understand that this is a component of the free trade agreement.

My colleague from Edmonton East in a question in the House on Friday alluded to some of the dimensions of the free trade agreement and the goods and services tax as relates to energy. In the free trade debate last year a lot of focus was put on energy. As my colleague from Edmonton East pointed out, the goods and services tax is adding 9 per cent to energy costs, the same energy that we sell to the United States. But the goods and services tax is not included in exports, so the United States purchasers do not have that GST added and will get the energy for 9 per cent less than what Canadians pay for it. These issues are components of a free trade agreement. You can be assured that on this side of the House the free trade agreement is going to be there to haunt this government for many years to come.

Some colleagues of mine have stated that this government is going to be among the most hated of governments come the next election, and we in our party are going to be there to make sure that the people understand that and that we provide an alternative.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions and comments. Resuming debate. The Hon. Member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne).

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to this Opposition motion of censure, presented mainly by the Liberals, and I want to read the motion, which says:

> That this House condemns the Government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including:
> 4) abandonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forest industries;

Madam Speaker, I find it rather ironic that an Opposition motion, mainly sponsored by the Liberals, should deal with this subject, especially the forestry sector. Let me provide some background. Twenty-nine years ago, in June 1960, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, rose in this House to propose a bill that would create a department of forestry for the first time in Canada's history. On July 11, 1960, the bill was passed unanimously by the House, on both second and third reading. Royal assent was given on August 1, and the new department was established on October 1, 1960. And it was a Liberal Government, Madam Speaker, that invalidated this major step, that abolished the Department of Forestry so that we now have to go back and repeat the process.

The motion presented by the Liberals condemns the Government for abandoning the forestry industry. I think we should condemn the Opposition for ignoring the forestry sector, especially as far as interest rates are concerned. Remember the period from 1980 to 1984, when interest rates were so high that most people in business had tremendous trouble recovering from the impact and people in the primary sectors such as farming, fisheries and forestry suffered considerable losses and in some cases even went bankrupt.

Madam Speaker, it is indeed ironic that the Liberals should present this kind of motion. If we look at what happened in 1984 when the Progressive Conservative Party came to power and what has happened since then in the forestry sector, I think it is clear that some very important initiatives have been taken.

First of all, when we came to power in 1984, we had promised during the election campaign to appoint a minister of State, and we did, Madam Speaker. Second, when we came to power in 1984, federal provincial relations, or what was left of them, were very troubled. Québec was no longer on speaking terms with the federal Government. The provinces were no longer on speaking terms with the federal Government, and vice versa, because of the unmitigated arrogance with which the Liberals approached the provinces and the areas under their jurisdiction.

What we have done in the forestry sector since 1984 has been to sign federal-provincial agreements with each province, agreements that represent nearly $1 billion invested over five years, from 1985 to 1990, of which $662 million is federal funding, with the remaining $500 million contributed by the provinces. Madam Speaker, in Québec, and more specifically in the region I represent—Region 04—the Canada-Québec Agreement, which, I may add, is worth $300 million, of which $150 million is federal money, has generated nearly $29,279,860, which breaks down as follows: public forests, $19,833,950; private forests, $8,381,530 and $1,064,380 on Indian reserves and federal land.

That is the situation in my riding. Producers in the farming and forestry sectors know that the Progressive Conservative Government has done a great deal for the forestry industry since 1984, and contrary to the motion presented by the Liberals, they realize how conscious we are of their concerns and how anxious we were to reach a compromise with the federal Government that would make it possible for our producers, our businesses, our young people and our business people to invest in a prosperous industry, in one of the activity sectors that generates the most jobs in Quebec, 1 out of 17, and is also very important in terms of economic spinoffs.

Madam Speaker, in the riding of Champlain, the Canada–Quebec Agreement on forestry development has provided nearly $17,433,860 in funding, which breaks down as follows: $14,539,430 for public forests and $1,830,006 for private forests. Plus $1,064,380 for Indian reserves and other federal land. Madam Speaker, this proves without a doubt there is no hint of partisanship here since we are dealing with a provincial–liberal government that when it was necessary to reach a consensus with the provinces and provide for the recovery of an economic sector that had been abandoned by the Liberals, this federal Government was able to find ways to reach that consensus.

If I may refresh the memory of the Liberals with respect to forestry, we established the Canadian Council of Forestry Ministers in 1985. We developed a national forestry strategy in 1987. And finally, as I said earlier, we are now setting up the legislative committee for Bill C–29, a proposal to establish a full–fledged department of forestry. In fact, both Opposition parties support us on a proposal, once implemented in 1960 and later demolished by the Liberals.

The goods and services tax is a vital part of the Government's long–term strategy for establishing a viable economic policy. Once the goods and services tax is in place, the federal tax system will be more progressive, and low–income Canadians will be better off. This will be achieved thanks to a new refundable credit. The credit will be paid quarterly, before the goods and services are purchased by households.

Implementation of the goods and services tax should have the following impact on the forestry sector: production costs will drop, since the new tax will not apply to goods required in the manufacturing process, thus making our producers more competitive on domestic and foreign markets. Wood products for export will not be taxed, thus making them more competitive on international markets. Furthermore, as in other sectors, manufacturers of wood products will be able to claim input tax credits on goods and services acquired for use in manufacturing their products. Indeed, the goods and services tax will encourage a more effective use of our economy's resources, promote exports and make Canadian products more competitive, both on Canadian and foreign markets. It will also encourage new investment, while an increase in the number of jobs in the forestry sector is expected.

Removal of the manufacturer's tax will strengthen the position of Canadian products, including wood products, on Canadian and international markets. The result will be increased productivity and more jobs for Canadians. And finally, Madam Speaker, increased productivity, improved competition and lower capital costs will affect the growth of investment and strengthen foreign trade. These factors will increase production and employment from the first year the goods and services tax takes effect. We also expect that the goods and services tax, by replacing the present manufacturers' sales tax, will result in lower industrial and commercial construction costs, which should increase the demand for this type of construction. Note that this kind of construction is exempt from the GST because the products used are not at the end of the consumption chain. Note that the lumber and paneling used in non–residential construction is very important for the lumber industry. About half of these products are for the domestic market and used for non–residential construction. This is especially important for Québec and Ontario which are much more dependent on the Canadian market than are the other regions of the country are.

We also expect lower costs for writing and wrapping paper, for cardboard not used for food packaging and for tissue and toilet paper. The tax on these products is now 13.5 per cent at the manufacturer's level, but it will be 9 per cent with the GST. Tax reform will thus benefit producers and consumers of these products. Note that these products have a high added value compared to most other forest products.

Also, Madam Speaker, the GST or goods and services tax reform will cancel any sales tax now imposed on goods used in manufacturing. Let us mention motor fuel, vehicles, computers, office furniture, services, telecommunications. At present, taxes on these products are invisible in the selling price and reduce the efficiency of investment.

Madam Speaker, in conclusion, because I know that my time is running out, I would like to say to the whole House that the goods and services tax will have a positive effect on employment and job creation, especially in the forestry sector, Madam Speaker.

I would like to remind the Opposition that the Government's record in recent years is positive because it has given this industry its rightful place in Canadian industry and the Canadian economy, namely first place.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions or comments. The Hon. Member for Gatineau–La Lièvre (Mr. Assad).

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member who just spoke was talking about forestry policy, but I have the impression he was trying to lose us in a thicket of figures and facts. And I think he was also being overly optimistic when he said that the new tax, the GST, was going to improve things. That is not how we see it, especially since 79 per cent of Canadians are not happy with the way you are managing public funds, and why should they be?

However, what is really at issue in this debate is not forestry policy. I can inform the Hon. Member that the provinces have their own forestry policies and have had them for many years. If you intend to enter into agreements with the provinces, as you propose to do with this new tax, we will really be up the creek.

Basically, the motion says that the new goods and services tax will be a menace because, first of all, it will lead to inflation across the board and is regressive, inequitable and invisible. Of course it is!

What we must consider with this goods and services tax is that the Government's only strategy in this instance is that it does not want to deal with the real problem in this country, which is that we need a complete tax reform, from A to Z.

All the observers and tax experts tell us that every year it is getting more and more difficult and complex for the average Canadian to complete his income tax return, especially when he sees his taxes going up every year. We don't have to quote figures all day long to realize there is something wrong with the tax system in this country. We have statistics indicating that thousands of Canadians don't pay income tax, that Canadian companies don't pay income tax, that all kinds of companies have managed to defer income tax payments for years, which of course has an impact on the federal Government's revenues.

[English]

This tax on goods and services is the greatest cover–up I think we will have ever seen in the House of Commons. The basic problem that we have here is that the whole tax system is out of control. You do not have to have an economics degree from any university to realize that the tax system is the most detrimental thing against the middle class that we have seen in the last 25 years.

All that you have to do is take a look at the last 25 years to 30 years, especially after the Carter commission that was unfortunately not published, to see that the tax system even then needed an overhaul. Here we are coming along with an additional proposed tax of 9 per cent. It is obvious that 79 per cent of the people of this country feel that it is unjust and that it is going to create more difficulties for the average Canadian.

The basic problem that we have to face is to admit, to begin with, that our tax system needs to be completely overhauled. I admit I have been influenced by a book called Behind Closed Doors which was written in conjunction with the best tax expert in this country who indicated that the so–called tax loopholes were because of nothing but lobbyists in this country.

• (1400)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): As it is now 2 p.m. the House will proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31. The Hon. Member will be able to continue after Question Period.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, five weeks ago I and a committee of Liberals from P.E.I. took up the Tory challenge of coming up with alternatives to the defence department closing of military bases as a means of satisfying the finance minister's deficit cutting requirements.

After much research and study we proposed that one of the military bases, Summerside, be used to establish a UN international peacekeeping training centre. Funding would come primarily from the UN and participating nations, and while Canadian government contributions to the camp would drop from $40 million to about $10 million, there would be little drop in personnel.

The proposal was received with great acclaim by many experts in the arms control and disarmament community. That is not surprising because there are many up sides. Canada would be able to apply and share its internationally recognized expertise and experience in peacekeeping. It would be afforded a leadership role in an increasingly important aspect of external affairs, and foreign capital would replace the funds from DND and breathe life into the local economy.

I urge the Minister of National Defence to take a serious and hard look at our alternative and he can call on our committee for help.

HONESTY

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, a few months ago, something happened to me that turned out to be very important.

I lost a wallet which contained my credit cards, identification and also a substantial sum of money. When I got home, I received a telephone call advising me of this fact.

I promised the finder I would report this in the House, so that the widest possible audience would know that our society still has honest upstanding citizens deserving of everyone's admiration and respect.

In a world like ours where we so often have to contend with all kinds of disagreeable situations, it is a pleasure to see that our country also has people like Mr. Claude Brabant of Montreal, who has the real civicspirit and a keen sense of honesty. He deserves to be mentioned as a shining example.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House the fact that today is the start of Family Week in Canada. As we enter the 1990s the definition of family is changing. The number of children being raised in one parent families and the number of children living in poverty are on the rise. There are 1.2 million Canadian children living in poverty. Internationally, 40,000 children die each day because of the poor economic conditions in which they live.

Children are poor because their parents are poor and family benefits are being eroded by this Tory government. The claw-back of family allowances, destruction of UI, the failure to provide national child care strategy, the lack of affordable housing, and the introduction of the goods and services tax makes the job of parenting more and more impossible for Canadian families.

While we celebrate the week of the family we must remember that much more needs to be done to support families in Canada and throughout the world. It is a sobering thought to recognize that in the one minute I have been given to make this statement, 27 children around the world have died from poverty.

GORDON TOWERS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday night the Red Deer Chamber of Commerce honoured David and Linda Hueppelsheuser as farm family of the year, and Wayne Lalor for his dedicated service to youth and sports programs.

They also paid tribute to the person chosen as citizen of the year, a man who has dedicated a lifetime of service to the community of Red Deer. In the words of the presenter, even in his political position, he constantly went far beyond the normal expectations to help his fellow citizens.

I am sure you will be pleased to know that Red Deer has honoured as its citizen of the year a former colleague, Mr. Gordon Towers, Mr. Speaker. In his acceptance speech for the award, a surprised Mr. Towers accepted humbly, quoting Tennyson, saying that he had "received much from others as each of us is a part of all we have met". He went on to say that he is not yet finished and he still has work to do. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that he did not intend to let his service stop when he left this place and Red Deer will reap the benefits of that service.

PORK INDUSTRY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the recent decision by the United States International Trade Commission to impose a 3.6 cents per pound, countervail duty on Canadian fresh chilled and frozen pork is one of the best examples of the failure of the free trade deal to protect our farmers from the whims of U.S. farm lobby groups.

The free trade deal was going to provide certainty instead of uncertainty in the face of U.S. trade protection as we were told by the Prime Minister. The only certainty Canadians can expect out of this government and this trade deal is more challenges to our food security and to our farmers and their farms.

This countervail duty is sure to affect farm gate prices and cost millions to Canadian farmers. Farmers can hardly afford to stay in business with the way things are going. U.S. legislators made it clear last fall after the Congress passed the free trade deal that they had no intention of guaranteeing access to the U.S. market for Canadian pork when they amended the omnibus trade bill.

It is high time the government went back to the drawing board before its ineffective trade policies spell certain doom for Canadian farmers.

DEVELOPMENT DAY

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, today marks the second annual Development Day, a day designated by the federal government to shed light on international development issues and to reflect upon what we can do to better the living conditions in the Third World.

Canadians are justifiably proud of our record as a caring and as a compassionate people. Our record in the field of international development is unrivalled. In the developing world the maple leaf is a symbol of hope and co-operation.

Unfortunately, this record is in jeopardy. Since the April budget the over-riding thought has been cut-backs. Instead of helping people to help themselves, the development community is struggling to cope with far fewer resources. Multilateral food aid was cut by $32 million, bilateral food aid was cut by $24.4 million, our contribution to international institution by $56.5 million and humanitarian assistance by $4.5 million. The list goes on to total over $360 million in cuts with many more on the way next year.

Development Day is the day for all Canadians to reflect on our role in the developing world. More importantly, it is also a day to send a clear message to the government that the time has come to restore funding for development assistance.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the European Economic Community consists of 320 million people in 12 sovereign nations and languages who in this century alone were at war twice, killing millions of people. Yet they have fewer barriers to trade and other differences than we do here in Canada. In spite of a GST tax of up to 28 per cent they are buying stereos, cars and houses in record numbers. The reason is that the GST is the most equitable and fair tax. By 1992, they will have an economic and social union which will make Canada look like 10 separate and feuding nations.

We are clearly wasting time in Canada over Meech Lake and other petty differences. Meech Lake should have been passed months ago, and we should already have dealt with women's issues, native issues, fisheries and Senate reform. I call upon the opposition parties to start thinking of Canada as a whole rather than always being concerned about the separate, narrow, selfish interests of special groups.

THE LATE MARK SMERCHANSKI

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment of this House to remember a distinguished Manitoban and a former parliamentarian who just recently passed away. Trying to recount all the contributions of Mark Smerchanski, who served in this House from 1968 to 1972, is a difficult task for he was a man of many talents and interests who provided remarkable public service.

A geological engineer by training, he was one of the pioneers in opening up Canada's north to mineral exploration. He was later a professor of engineering and a builder of new techniques in that area.

As a member of the provincial legislature for Burrows and in this House as the member for Provencher, he won the respect and praise of his constituents and was certainly a strong voice for western Canada.

Mark Smerchanski will also be remembered for his major contributions to the Ukrainian-Canadian community. He was instrumental in establishing the Department of Slavic Studies at the University of Manitoba and perhaps took greatest pride in his accomplishment as the founder of the Holy Family Nursing Home in Winnipeg. Mark Smerchanski is survived by his wife Pat and three daughters, Joan, Rhonda and Patricia.

I am sure the House will join me in wanting to send our condolences to his family and thanks to Mark Smerchanski for a life of service to his country.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL AIRLINES

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, Nova Scotians will view with alarm the announcement that Canadian Airlines International intends to close its pilot base at Halifax International Airport and reduce the staff of flight attendants stationed there. These pilots and flight attendants are a community resource and they contribute to the economic, social and cultural life of Nova Scotia. Canadian Airlines International is a private enterprise but its future success depends on the support of government and public good will.

I call upon the officials of Canadian International Airlines to assess the corporation's decision and consider the welfare of these employees in the community at large. Otherwise public support will be severely damaged.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I attended the one hundred and third anniversary of the Esquimalt-Nanaimo Railway in Victoria. It was an occasion with little cause for rejoicing; a wake rather than a celebration. The news of the cuts to VIA Rail and the complete elimination of the E & N dayliner served as a grim reminder of the government's lack of interest in the wishes of Vancouver Islanders.

The elimination of the E & N is an attempt by this government to extract itself from obligations on Vancouver Island and reflects its unwillingness to make the E & N a viable service. It is also contrary to historical agreements.

The preservation of the E & N is an obligation rooted in B.C.'s entry into Confederation. The agreements of 1883 are based on contractual and constitutional conditions between federal and provincial jurisdictions. The federal government is bound to provide passenger service on Vancouver Island in perpetuity. Support for the dayliner is clearly demonstrated by the increased number of passengers despite inconvenient schedules, bad service and appalling management. Rather than ending over 100 years of service, the government should upgrade the dayliner in the interests of tourism, community pride, the environment and national unity.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to lend my wholehearted support to National Family Week which starts today and runs through to October 8. This government provides support to the Canadian family in many broad and diverse ways. We run programs for seniors and the disabled. We administer comprehensive income support networks. We are working on a national strategy to reduce violence in the family. Our child care initiatives fund is supporting quality child care services across Canada.

National Family Week asks us to be more sensitive to the needs of our families and to celebrate the strength, the joy, and the vitality of the Canadian family.

I would like to ask all members of the House to join me in support of National Family Week and to enjoy the riches our family lives offer each of us.

CHILD CARE PROGRAM

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, September 29, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and I toured three day care centres in the city of North York and met with representatives of the North York Interagency Council. We visited a workplace infant and toddler centre with rent and building costs paid for by the city. This centre took six months to fill as a result of the freeze on subsidies caused by the lack of provincial funding. As a result, only 19 of 58 spaces are available to low income families.

We visited a day care centre in a high school designed to keep teen mothers in school. This centre, which is subsidized and assisted by the board of education, had empty spaces for part of last year due to a lack of subsidies. We visited a neighbourhood centre, also in a public school, where full fee-paying parents were subsidizing low income parents because of the lack of adequate subsidies for low income families. As a result, spaces for parents needing subsidy have been limited. Eight-five per cent of the families needing subsidy are single parent families. Day care subsidy help families to help themselves.

As part of National Family Week, I strongly urge the minister to bring forward a child care program which will ensure that low income families have access to day care and will provide disadvantaged children with the benefits of early literacy, good nutrition and good child care.

HOUSING

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday's unbelievable pronouncement by the Minister of Housing that affordable housing is not a national priority in Canada is truly irresponsible as numerous Canadians for a variety of reasons cannot afford to buy a home at all.

Do those living on the streets in cities across Canada find affordable housing not a priority? Do single mothers looking for reasonable accommodation find that affordable housing is not a priority? Do the many families in major centres across this nation who cannot begin to afford a new home because of the skyrocketing prices also find that affordable housing is not a priority?

What belies the statements made by the minister is that he was, before becoming a cabinet minister, a mayor who fought for such issues. He was an outspoken critic of the Conservative government's housing policy right here in the House of Commons. His comments do little to help those in need of basic shelter and are a rebuke of their pleas for action.

I suggest that the minister consult with those he purportedly serves and take concrete measures to house the many Canadians in need. Affordable housing is a national issue. What we need is a minister who recognizes that fact.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, almost a year has passed since the last election when the Prime Minister declared that social programs were a sacred trust. However, the government has begun a process of clawing back the safety net and has embarked on an initiative that will severely affect lower and middle-income Canadians.

The Conservative government is blindly committed to a new tax to replace the manufacturers' retail sales tax which would be placed on almost every good and service. One week ago I held a meeting in my riding of Hamilton West on the subject of the proposed tax. Three hundred and fifty people filled the room and not one person was in favour of the government's plan. So far over 5,000 signatures have been collected from constituents opposing the tax.

As one of my constituents put it, when a family buys a new home it takes on a deficit. When they buy a new car, it takes on a deficit. What the Minister of Finance is telling Canadians is that they must now increase their deficit to reduce his. And happen it will, as the government proclaims its tax as fact in newspaper ads, circumventing my privileges as the elected representative for the constituents of Hamilton West who say enough is enough.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister and concerns the moral legitimacy of this government.

During the last election the Prime Minister promised a child care program, promised a revenue neutral national sales tax, promised continued universality of social programs, and continued support for VIA Rail. After the election the Prime Minister terminated the child care program, delivered another massive tax increase, destroyed universality of social programs and is now in the business of gutting VIA Rail.

Given that Canadians have no opportunity to pass electoral judgment on this massive fraud for another three years, will the Prime Minister agree today to withhold implementation of the planned route eliminations of VIA Rail and the planned 2,900 lay-offs of VIA employees until public hearings are held across this country on this very important matter?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is astounding for the House and the country to hear a Liberal rise in this House and talk about moral legitimacy. That is a contradiction in terms. The fact of the matter is that this House passed a child care program which was killed by his Liberal friends in the Senate.

We have a mandate from the people of Canada to deal with matters which are not necessarily popular, but which are right for Canada. Some of these mean reversing some attitudes and some trends of the past, not all of them pleasant and not all of them easy. We are not going to do them because they are popular; we are going to do them because they are right for Canada.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, according to Webster's Dictionary the word "probity", which used to be a favourite of the Prime Minister's, means upright, upstanding, forthright and honest. It is no wonder he never uses the word anymore.

It staggers the mind to realize that while every other nation in the western world prepares to meet the year 2000 with efficient, environmentally clean, high speed rail passenger service, Canada and Canada alone pursues a policy of increasing reliance on already congested highways and skyways.

• (1420)

I ask the Prime Minister whether or not he will make available all environmental impact studies carried out in preparation for this decision to terminate VIA Rail. In fact I ask whether or not he will give the House, and through the House the people of Canada, an assurance that such environmental impact studies have been carried out pursuant to the government's recently announced policy of doing just that.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have always said to the House and outside the House that when the decision is known I will provide all necessary documents so that Canadians will understand. It will be the best decision we can make.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, neither the Prime Minister nor the Minister of Transport have been prepared to tell Canadians that they will have a right to be heard on the decision, which was never discussed or announced in advance of the election last November.

I put my question to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Transport. Given that we cannot receive an answer in the House, an assurance of public hearings on this important question from either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Transport, will the chairman of the Standing Committee of Transport refer this important question to the Commons transport committee immediately?

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, the question was to the chairman of the committee and all I can tell my hon. colleague is that the transport committee is meeting tomorrow morning at 9.30 to discuss that very thing.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am astounded today to hear the Prime Minister say that savaging VIA Rail is the proper thing to do, but my question is for the Minister of Transport.

According to the multiplier factor used by VIA Rail to gauge job losses, the 2,900 job cuts projected to be announced on Wednesday will grow to 10,200 jobs as the effects mushroom through the economy. The minister knows it because he received these figures months ago from VIA Rail.

Will the minister give us a clear and unequivocal answer, for the first time on this issue, as to why he has kept this vital information from the Canadian public and from the House of Commons?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, of course we always release good information to Canadians. Normally, though, it is not based on leaked documents.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I rode VIA Rail this weekend to talk particularly to the employees of VIA Rail. They all know that over half the routes will be cut and 2,980 employees will be fired.

Some Hon. Members: New rider.

Mr. Comuzzi: Perhaps the hon. gentleman over there should take a turn and ride VIA Rail also, so that he knows of which he speaks.

Another 10,000 Canadian jobs will be directly affected. They all expect this to be announced on Wednesday just before Thanksgiving, and the lay-offs to take place just after Christmas on January 15. All Canadians have the right to know why the minister is doing this to VIA Rail. The minister is duty bound to explain why he is eliminating passenger rail service in Canada. Will the minister appear before the transport committee to explain to the committee and, in fact, to all Canadians why he is doing this to passenger rail service in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, that is pretty obvious. Last spring, I appeared twice before the Transport Commitee. I answered all kinds of questions at the time the Hon. Member was there and the vast majority of the questions were about VIA Rail. I answered the questions, and, at the time, I felt that this was one way of consulting. However, Mr. Speaker, I still feel I cannot give the Hon. Member the answers he wants, because they are not the kind of answers I will give, first of all, but—

Mr. Comuzzi: The announcement on Wednesday!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): He says: The announcement on Wednesday! I have yet to announce when the announcement will be made and so far I have given no indication. Announcements will be made at the appropriate time, as I said earlier, and will be based on valid documents. I just hope the Hon. Member will take VIA Rail more often than he must have done when he was a member of the task force on transport.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the minister does not know when it will be because he has not found a place in Montreal that will hold 1,500 people for the meeting on Wednesday.

My question is to the Prime Minister. On Friday, the Minister of Transport said, "Normally, when the cost is over the revenue there is a problem". This government has repeatedly promised to buy modern trains for VIA Rail instead of just throwing away hundreds of millions of dollars by maintaining obsolete 35 year old trains resulting in high costs and a waste of taxpayers' money.

Clearly, the Minister of Transport has failed to live up to his responsibilities and that responsibility must now fall on the Prime Minister. When will he act to protect Canadians who use VIA because it is affordable, safe, accessible, environmentally friendly and convenient?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct something that my friend said about VIA Rail.

Over the last 10 years the former government and ourselves have put more than $5.4 billion into VIA Rail. Our own government has put more than $.5 billion into the equipment alone. He says that we have not put money into it.

Last week my friend talked a lot about ridership. For the first six months of 1989, the increase in the number of passengers was 2.7 per cent. I would like to be able to manage a corporation with that kind of figure. I would have to know exactly what is the cost; but my friend never gave the costs of the operations of VIA Rail.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, it is nice to know that the minister has confirmed the information I gave the House on Friday. I have another supplementary to the Prime Minister.

Last week we heard that bus companies are predicting significant fare increases as soon as VIA Rail is cut. Today, we learned that airline fares are about to go up by hundreds of dollars per ticket.

Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that his government's policies of deregulation and the destruction of VIA Rail are an attack on consumers in all regions of this country. Will he act to protect these consumers by cancelling plans for the elimination of VIA services across this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw your attention to a letter I received from the Canadian Bus Association, in which the association's director general says the following:

[English]

"I am writing to you to state in clear terms that the telephone interview conducted on September 27 did not contain any reference to the prospect of the bus industry increasing price simply because VIA Rail services are changed".

I believe it is very clear. Once again, we have to tell the truth. We have to use real documents as I am doing here this afternoon.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, since according to the Minister of Transport, it is very hard to know who is responsible for what in this Cabinet, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Under the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, nearly 5,000 people in Montreal will no longer be eligible for benefits. Over 8,000 people depend either directly or indirectly on VIA Rail for their employment in this city. We see the same scenario in Halifax, Winnipeg and elsewhere in this country. Does the Prime Minister intend to take the necessary measures to protect Canadians who may be out of a job and without any financial support?

[English]

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think that my friend, the Minister of Transport, has been forthcoming about what the government is looking at in connection with VIA Rail. We will be there, as we are with any other organization, should there be any need for the services of the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Industrial Adjustment Service, and so on. We are here now for businesses across the country. We are here for other businesses, should the need exist.

TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It concerns the devastating effect on the tourism industry of the proposed GST.

In the Atlantic region alone over $2 billion are infused into the local economy because of tourism. In Nova Scotia, 1.6 million tourists leave over $760 million in the local economy.

The effect of the proposed GST will be to send many of these tourists who are seeking a seaside holiday stateside. That is where they will be leaving their money. What measures will this government take to protect this industry which is so vital to a region that has already been battered half to death by this Government's economic policies?

• (1430)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the first thing we are doing is we are exempting foreign tourists from the GST on products they buy in Canada, as well as accommodation that they buy in Canada. They will not be taxed, either, on their plane flights into the country.

I will tell the hon. member something else. We have worked hard with the tourism industry to make sure that it has a competitive advantage with other countries. France, Britain, Germany, for example, have tax programs just like we have. We are going to have a GST. Their tourism has increased by almost 100 per cent over the last four years. Let us make sure that our industry is helped and not pulled down by exaggerations, by defective attacks like this.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, that is a tremendous amount of gall. Some 74 per cent of the travelling public that go into Atlantic Canada are Canadians. What the minister has just said is that Americans will be given preferential treatment over Canadians under this government's economic policy.

My question is again for the Minister of Finance. Given that your government has gutted regional development programs, has mismanaged the fisheries into a state of complete collapse and probably Wednesday or Thursday of this week is prepared to drive the last spike into the heart of the travelling rail public in Atlantic Canada, will you finally not now say that the GST—

Mr. Speaker: I must ask hon. members to put their questions through the Chair.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Will the minister now not see that his GST proposal is fatally flawed and withdraw it immediately? Or, is he hell-bent in shutting down yet another industry in Atlantic Canada? That is the question.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the content of the member's question with a large amount of exaggeration on the various things related to the gutting of regional development is nonsense. This government has maintained a very high level of regional development spending, 50 per cent higher than it was in previous years. The hon. member knows that.

The hon. member also knows that there has been no mismanagement whatsoever of the fisheries industry in Atlantic Canada. In fact we have been working very hard with the industry and with our representations to people in other countries to ensure that we maintain a healthy fisheries industry in Canada.

The hon. member would do his region a good deal more credit and a give a good deal more assistance if he would avoid the exaggerations and start talking facts.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The 9 per cent goods and services tax proposal discriminates against the residents of the northern regions of Canada. Because our cost of living in the north is the highest in the country, each northerner will pay more of this unfair tax. None of the public documents of the proposed GST have assessed the impact of this tax on northerners.

My question for the minister is this: Why was the north omitted from the government's technical paper? Has the government done any background studies on the impact of this tax on the north? If so, will the minister release these studies to northerners?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should draw to the member's attention that we have done a good deal of work on the impact of the tax on the north. If the hon. member did not just isolate one element but looked at the over-all impact of the tax on the economy of the north, I could tell him that the impact on the north is about the same as the national average. In other words, it will improve the economic fortunes of the north by about 1.5 per cent. That is equivalent to what the national average is.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of members the presence in the gallery of Mr. Anders Bjorck, President of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Churchill.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Given that today the minister is aware that the—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Western Arctic.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that we did not get an answer from the Minister of Finance so I my supplementary to him.

It is quite obvious that the government did not give any consideration to the north even though the effects will be devastating. I would like to know if the minister will commit to determining the impact of the tax on tourism, on inflation, on the cost of transportation, on construction, on housing, and justify why northerners should pay a much higher dollar value for the tax on the same item than in the south.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in fact I did give her colleague an answer, and I got quite a precise answer.

The answer is that if you take into account all aspects of the tax—not just one or two or three different aspects of the tax but all aspects of the tax—and the impact of that on the economy of the north, the answer that I gave her colleague and the answer that I will give her is that there is a positive impact on the region of the north. The amount is about a 1.5 per cent increase, which is about the same as the national average.

FISHERIES

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has had notice of this question now.

Given the fact that the fish workers in Nova Scotia in attempting to save their jobs are stopping the export of raw fish from that province, what is the minister going to do to live up to his responsibility and keep jobs in Canada?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would know that fish harvested in Canadian waters on both of our coasts and in the central areas as well leave Canada in various forms, including fresh fish which goes into many markets where it commands a higher price than processed fish.

We believe that we should gain maximum employment advantage from our raw materials, but a recent ruling by the GATT makes it quite clear that Canada cannot restrict the export of unprocessed fish to certain markets which demand it. In fact, many fishing companies and many fishermen benefit by this practice. Nonetheless, we encourage maximum processing and maximum opportunity being extracted from the resource in Canada.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, that is simply not good enough. Since July of this year over 8 million pounds of B.C. raw salmon have gone to the United States. Last year, over 80 million pounds of raw fish went from Nova Scotia to the United States. The thing is that the minister has not taken his responsibility. He has done nothing to save those jobs. When is he going to start acting?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would know or should know that the Pacific coast fishing industry, which he mentions, has enjoyed its most abundant year in history in the quantity of fish harvested and the amount of employment provided to Canadian workers. That is a fact.

Were it not for certain problems with exchange rates and international fish prices, we would have far more employment in Atlantic Canada. Nonetheless, we have a very healthy fishery in this country, and the member knows that.

RAILWAY TRANSPORT

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Nearly 700,000 litres of fuel were spilled in a derailment that occurred in Press, Abitibi around 1981. Today, eight years later, some of that fuel is coming back to the surface.

My question is as follows: Could the Minister assure us that Canadian National will install a permanent reservoir immediately, before next winter, to separate the oil from the water and to recover the petroleum spilled?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to tell my colleague from Abitibi that the reservoir in question should indeed be installed by next winter—that is, within a few weeks.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Farmers in Elk Island want to know more about the GST. How long will they wait for the input tax rebate—60 days, 90 days, six months? Our farmers are important. How long will they have to wait?

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, the position of the farmers in the goods and services tax proposal is, I think, quite a good one. Because food is not taxed, and because the products that these individuals sell is tax-free, they will receive a full credit on all these business inputs.

• (1440)

The credit will come not in the length of time that the hon. member has suggested but 21 days after they request the credit. If they do not receive it after 21 days they will receive full interest, so they will get their cash flow well looked after during this period of time, and very quickly.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question as well for my good friend the Minister of Fisheries fresh from his, if I may say so, pitiful performance at the NAFO talks a couple of weeks ago. In my riding of Burin—St. George's alone, 16,000 plant workers and fishermen are looking down the barrel of permanent unemployment, thanks to the minister's bungling of the fisheries crisis.

I want to ask him this question: Has he had discussions with National Sea and with Fish Products International about options to ensure that those plant workers and fishermen are able to keep their jobs? Also, can he assure us that the Canada-U.S. free trade provisions will not prevent the minister and the government from honouring its obligation under the 1983 fisheries restructuring agreement to keep certain fish plants open?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that he does no service to his constituents by exaggerating and spreading fear that 16,000 workers, as he characterized it, will be without work.

We have certain difficulties in the fishery this year resulting from a number of factors, some of which involve international supply and demand and exchange rates because our fish products from Atlantic Canada are largely exported.

The hon. member knows that a special committee of cabinet on which several of my colleagues and I participate is looking into all facets of this problem. The hon. member also knows that in most respects fishermen in Atlantic Canada are enjoying a year which is prosperous and adequate for their needs in many parts of Atlantic Canada but not as abundant as it has been in the last three or four years in relative comparison.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, they will be delighted to hear that they are enjoying it because they did not know that. Now cut out the baloney, Tom; cut out the bombast.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will put his question.

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, last spring the Secretary of State for External Affairs was appointed to head up a fish committee. We have not heard from him since.

I ask the minister this question: Can he now finally tell the House what specific plans he has to bring in an assistance package to keep those fishermen and plant workers working, even if we have to share the work until such time as the fish stocks rebound?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated already, the special committee continues its deliberations. When the quotas are set for next year, 1990, we will have a far greater indication of the availability of supply to the industry, and at the same time any measures which might be required supplementary to those available from existing programs will be announced, if required, at that time.

BIOTECHNOLOGY RESEARCH

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the spring of 1987 in a speech to the University of Waterloo the Prime Minister said the following and I quote:

> We know that foreign controlled subsidiaries conduct less R and D than Canadian controlled companies.

And he went on to note that:

> The strategic development of Canada depends upon information technologies, industrial materials and biotechnology.

In light of the Prime Minister's own statements in that speech, I want to ask him this questions: Why is the government standing idly by while the acknowledged flagship of Canada's biotechnology industry, Connaught Labs, is being subject to a foreign takeover?

Will the Prime Minister outline today what steps the government intends to take under the authority of the Investment Canada Act to stop the takeover of Connaught and to ensure that Canada has a Canadian owned centre for biotechnology research?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, under the Investment Canada Act full authority is there to ensure that any foreign takeovers, including this one, are to the net benefit of Canada. That examination is under way.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, let me ask the minister, then, a specific question.

As he knows, under section 15 of that act the government has the right to stop any takeover that affects cultural heritage and national identity.

Let me ask this question of the Minister. Does the Minister agree that Connaught Labs, the home base of Banting and Best, is part of Canada's national identity? As a result, will he put on notice today that this government intends to use section 15 to stop the takeover of Connaught Labs and keep it under Canadian ownership?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly give commitment to the House that the Investment Canada Act will be followed. After the proper kind of examination which is called for under the act a decision will be taken. The hon. member seems to be suggesting we should take a decision now and do the analysis later.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. On January 31, the Minister promised Canadians: "Where environmental considerations will conflict with economic ones the environment will prevail".

Canadians know that the GST fails to recognize the difference between environmentally friendly and polluting products. Canadians know that the cuts to VIA Rail will force the travelling public to depend more on polluting forms of transportation. Bad environmental policies are being forced on Canada by the Minister of Finance.

Will the Minister today show some leadership and announce that he is going to subject the GST to a full environmental impact assessment?

[Translation]

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Government's existing environmental assessment directives involve several aspects. But the aspect on budgeting in particular does not fit in at all with already existing mechanisms.

That is why we are preparing legislation for the House to give the country a flexible, comprehensive, professional mechanism to deal with any eventuality.

As for the GST in particular, Mr. Speaker, I believe that a measure that will enable Canada to take its rightful place on international markets so that we can create jobs here and improve the sales of Canadian products abroad will put the country's economy on a sound footing to deal with the great environmental challenge.

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Minister obviously does not know that the tax system is one of the most effective places, not least effective places, to assist in promoting environmentally friendly products.

My supplementary is to the Prime Minister who, on October 15, 1988 said: "We are prepared to subject every federal undertaking to a full environmental impact study".

Last week the Secretary General of the Brundtland commission noted: "Canada is a country noted for leading with rhetoric and following others with action".

Will the Prime Minister live up to his promise and subject the GST to his own promise and to his own words from last year?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the comment from the Secretary of the Brundtland commission, but I have seen comments from Prime Minister Brundtland herself who chaired the commission. She said that Canada's record led the industrialized world. It should be viewed by all Canadians with pride in regard to what we have done in the environment.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: With regard to the matters raised in respect of taxation and others, the Minister of the Environment has responded fully about his intention to bring forward what I believe will be an important and landmark piece of legislation as it affects the environment. I hope my hon. friend and members of the Liberal Party who profess to support the environment will at that point in time rise and give it the enthusiastic support of which they are capable.

FOREIGN AID

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question this day, Development Day, is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the absence of the Minister for External Relations.

As demonstrated in the April budget under cuts to overseas development assistance, this government has cast a blind eye to the world's poor and sanctimoniously throws them but scraps from our table. Dozens of Canadian non-governmental organization projects have had to be cancelled. Millions of the world's poorest will suffer because of these foreign aid cuts. The poor do not understand our minister's double talk about quality versus quantity of assistance. They do understand the fine line between life and death.

Will the government not review its foreign aid priorities and return to Canadian NGOs the funds chopped in the April budget enabling them to meet their grass roots assistance projects budgets?

• (1450)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada's program of delivery of aid to the poorest is one of the most effective in the world. We intend to keep it one of the most effective in the world.

Now there were budget cuts in the last budget. I would have preferred, as everyone in this government would have preferred, to have inherited an economy that was strong enough and that was free enough of deficits that we would not have had to engage in the kind of major cuts that we have had to engage in across the board. But that was not the situation we inherited.

We came into office after a period of reckless spending by the Liberal Party and government. We have to take account of that for several reasons, including the capacity of this country to maintain the kind of economic growth that will allow us to deliver effective aid in the world including particularly to the poor.

Mrs. Stewart: I challenge the minister to tell that to the thousands of the world's poor, the rickshaw drivers in Bangladesh, the purse sellers in Ivory Coast, the malnourished children in Lima, Peru.

My supplementary is to the same minister. It is interesting that the budgets directed to the poorest individuals at the grass root level are cut, yet CIDA's own budgets for administrative costs and publicity have risen by $114 million.

Our foreign aid target is gone. Which is the greater need, the need of this minister and the government to promote itself and its structure or the needs of the poor?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Without any doubt and without any argument, the greater need is the need of the poor. That is why the policies of this government have been directed so consistently and so effectively toward helping the poorest in the world.

I suppose what we will hear next from the hon. member is a suggestion that we should not be proceeding with the decentralization in CIDA that was proposed unanimously by a committee of this House.

It was proposed for the very reason of ensuring that we are making our policy based upon the needs of the poor in the regions where Canada is trying to contribute to development assistance and not in relation to the whims or the partisan comments of the day that might arise here in Ottawa.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, the former Prime Minister is disgracing himself with an answer like that.

JUSTICE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): My question today is for the Minister of Justice. It is generally admitted that Bill 61 on profits from crime is not working well, certainly not as well as in the United States and not as well as the Minister promised. On September 29, the Minister himself admitted in the Toronto Star that local police are not using it. Is the Minister prepared today, instead of keeping all the confiscated profits of crime in Ottawa, to turn them all over to the government or police force that did the work to confiscate them?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that my friend has differentiated between the successes we are having in the money laundering legislation and the legislation that in particular his party talks about with respect to proceeds of crime.

In fact, when I was in the United Kingdom this past summer I discussed that very aspect with them over there. There was an editorial as a matter of fact in The Toronto Star about two weeks ago which led me to ask officials of my department to bring to me the rationale upon which the act was originally drafted, to advise me as to how it was working. I intend to look into that very matter.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, after admitting himself that the law needs to be looked at, and recognizing the Prime Minister calling for a war against drug crime and against crime in general, the minister should be aware that no change in the act is necessary for the federal government to decide to turn over the proceeds of crime to the order of the police force that fights to confiscate them.

I want to ask him again: is he ready now simply to announce that he will do that, recognizing the shortcoming that he referred to himself and to get the local police forces on side for this important operation?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend was on the committee. My information is that it was never raised at that point by himself. It was raised by the chiefs of police.

As I said, we are looking into the matter. As soon as we have established the rationale on what action could be taken we will take that action.

Oral Questions

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister as well.

Today, 1,200 elementary school children of the Six Nations near Brantford have entered the second month of their boycott of Department of Indian Affairs schools because the schools have failed to meet fire code standards, basic safety standards, health standards with respect to water, to drainage and to washroom facilities, and asbestos content.

A study by the Department of Indian Affairs in 1985 condemned four schools and proposed substantial repairs to the two remaining schools and replacement of the condemned facilities. This became a promise of the Department of Indian Affairs. After four years, Six Nations children have been forced to go to school in condemned schools that are unhealthy and renovations to only one of the remaining schools has been completed.

What will the government do to keep its promise to replace the condemned Six Nations schools and to completely renovate the remaining schools so that Six Nations children can go to school under the same safe, healthful, decent conditions as non–Indian children in this country?

Mrs. Dorothy Dobbie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. gentleman that the department is fully aware of the situation, that it has it well in hand, and that the situation is being addressed.

The hon. member might be interested to know that the students are being well taken care of and that their long–term objective will be met over time.

Mr. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary questions is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Does that parliamentary secretary consider it adequate for kids to be taught at home because government controlled Department of Indian Affairs schools are unsafe, are infested with rats, with snakes, have floors and ceilings and walls that are infested with asbestos? Would she like to see her children go to school under these conditions? Is that what she means by taken well in had?

I would ask the parliamentary secretary: When are those schools going to be upgraded to the standards enjoyed by the rest of Canadians?

Mrs. Dobbie: Mr. Speaker, once again the hon. member exaggerates the circumstances. The students are being looked after. We are aware that there are problems with the conditions of the school but temporary measures have been taken to ensure that those students are properly housed in the mean time.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the part-time Minister of Agriculture.

Over the past few months we have seen the U.S. retaliate against our dairy industry, our pork industry and our steel industry. Now we hear the American wheat growers are going to ask for a countervail. All this has been under the umbrella of the free trade agreement.

Why did the government tell Canadian farmers during the last election that free trade would protect them from U.S. harassment and that they would have open access to the U.S. market when they clearly do not? Were they deliberately misleading Canadians, or are they just too naive to know?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member spent at least a quarter of his time looking at agricultural issues and studying in particular the free trade agreement as it relates to trade of grains between our two countries, he would know that until such time as the subsidy level on the two countries is equal there will be controls maintained.

• (1500)

In this particular case with regard to Durum, the United States is a much higher subsidizer of Durum and wheat products than Canada is. Therefore, we are penetrating that market simply because of the quality and the price. I think that demonstrates clearly the energy and the enthusiasm that our farmers have displayed in exploiting the U.S. market.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, they promised that there would be no harassment. Clearly, there has been.

In the past, Article 11 of GATT has protected our right to have marketing boards and bodies such as the Canadian Wheat Board. By allowing the U.S. to question these programs under the FTA, the government has opened the door to challenges and doubt. In the meantime, Canadian farmers are financially bearing the cost of their actions. How does the government intend to defend our interest to stop this harassment from their buddies to the south?

Will the government vote for Canada and Canadian farmers when the GATT panel decision on ice cream and yoghurt goes before the full GATT body?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, The hon. member cannot have it both ways. He is suggesting that this is a free trade initiative. It is strictly a GATT initiative. I answered that question twice in the House last week to the Hon. Member for Algoma. It has been the subject of a late show in which we outlined very clearly the position of the government. I would invite the hon. member to read those answers.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—THE ECONOMY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra):

> That this House condemns the Government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including:
> 1) the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary;
> 2) an unjustifiable high interest rate policy, with an interest rate spread between Canada and the United States that is at record highs;
> 3) negligence in the management of Canadian trade causing unparallelled reductions in our trade balance and a loss of jobs, and threatening the survival of many formerly thriving Canadian industries;
> 4) abandonment of Canadian primary producers with resulting undermining of the farming, fishing and forest industries; and
> 5) continued neglect of regional disparities.

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, to continue the speech I had begun before oral question period, I would just like to say that the GST is not a solution, but rather a problem. It does not get rid of the deficit, far from it. Instead, it creates a situation where Canadian business people are in great disagreement with this approach to taxation. Obviously, the burden borne by the middle class will grow. That is also a very important factor. Obviously, all provincial finance ministers disagree with this approach to taxation. All Canadians have shown their disagreement.

Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) referred to the reason why Canada cannot give more money to the poor countries. He said that the budget would not allow it but if they had inherited a better financial situation, they would have been able to do so. It is rather strange to hear the the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who has been in this House for over 15 years, say such a thing, given that the present Government has been in office for more than five years. How can you explain such a statement knowing that they have been in charge of this country's public affairs for five years, but they are still using that argument that they cannot give more money to the poor countries?

[English]

The Canadian people expect an alternative; not alternatives, but rather an alternative. It would be in the best interests of any government in this country to take heed that the Canadian people want their government to reconsider this whole goods and services tax completely.

It has been echoed by many economists in this country that one of our big problems is the fact that the tax system has become so complex that nobody seems to understand whether we are coming or going.

I am sure that an alternative could be looked at. When we see the controversy over the goods and services tax we can go to an alternative. We can be inspired by a document whose principles are still good today, namely, the Carter Commission of 27 years ago. With this document we could make a complete and true reform of the fiscal system in this country. That is an alternative we have to look at and that is going to take a tremendous amount of political will. Unless we have this political will, we are going to lose the confidence of all Canadians, no matter what government is sitting on your right-hand side, Madam Speaker.

In conclusion, obviously this is a subject that could be debated for months on end but, nevertheless, the last opinion should come from Canadians at large. They are not happy with the situation. It is time that the alternative be looked at. It is the only alternative left that can be of any value in bringing back the confidence of the business people and the confidence of Canadians, especially the middle class.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On questions or comments the Hon. Member for Broadview Greenwood.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, my question is directed to my colleague. My colleague has studied Behind Closed Doors on the Carter Commission and other examples of comprehensive tax reform. In his opinion, why does he not think the Government of Canada, which was so adamant on this change from 1984 to 1988, has not rallied and gone for a comprehensive tax reform, and why has the government just gone for this added bureaucracy of an extra 4,000 to 6,000 public servants on GST? Why do you think the government is not acting in a simpler, fairer and more efficient way?

Mr. Assad: Madam Speaker, I would say it is very simple. As you mentioned, Behind Closed Doors certainly brought out a lot of facts. The financial elite in this country have been dictating to this government, and to previous governments, in the last 25 years. Under this government with its ideology, I would say the basic problem is that there is no political will nor political courage to look at the matter face to face and say that we need a complete reform because there has been a disproportionate influence from the financial elite in this country.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the hon. member's speech, and I was especially interested in the impact because of the importance in his area of the goods and services tax on the tourism industry. I would like to know if the hon. member knows just what the impact will be.

Clearly, the government has made moves already this year which have increased the cost of gasoline and those increases will continue in the next year. In my area I hear a lot of complaints about the amount of taxes which have been added to gasoline in the last four years. This move now with the goods and services tax will hit every kind of tourism item, such as restaurant meals.

For instance, I recently stopped overnight at a motel in my constituency. The owner pointed out to me that if I returned in 1991 after the goods and services tax is in place to stay overnight, had a cocktail before dinner and then had dinner, the following taxes would be imposed. On the room in Ontario there will be a 5 per cent tax; a cocktail before dinner will have a 10 per cent tax; on dinner there will be an 8 per cent tax. On top of that and on top of all these other taxes plus on the meal itself there will be a 9 per cent federal goods and services tax.

• (1510)

My concern is twofold. Our season for tourism tends to be very short in this country, and so we have a very short period of time in which to make a good living for the small tourist operators.

I want to know from the Hon. Member if he feels that the combination of administrative problems plus the additional goods and services tax will be detrimental to the tourism industry because it is a very important one both in his constituency and in mine.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): A very short answer from the Hon. Member.

[Translation]

Mr. Assad: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity— Of course, his question is most appropriate. There was a very interesting article in today's La Presse reporting that the last two years have been disastrous for the tourism industry.

Of course, in the last few weeks I contacted the various tourism organizations in this country, especially the Tourism Industry Association of Canada, and the Conference Board of Canada, which published their reports showing that this tax would indeed be disastrous, especially for the tourism industry.

Despite what the Minister of Tourism is trying to tell us, the facts are there. Everyone else cannot be wrong and they are the only ones who are right! That is impossible! The issue is very simple. This tax will be a nightmare for tourism operators and we will live with it—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The period for questions and comments is over. Resuming debate, the Hon. Minister.

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, I rise to intervene in this debate to put a perspective, in the brief ten minutes that we have, on my department's involvement in so far as the administration of the GST is concerned. Before I do that I would like to answer the question: Why is the government going ahead with a goods and services tax?

First, let me say that I come from a small business family and I was a small-businessman myself for many years. The answer to the question is very simple. In the good natured rhetoric that takes place in this chamber and outside we sometimes forget why the government is committed to moving ahead instead of staying with the status quo. The easiest thing for any government is to stay with the status quo and not move forward in a progressive and aggressive way for the benefit of future generations and for the benefit of allowing Canadians to reach their full potential.

I think it is a universally accepted fact that the existing federal sales tax is an obstacle in the way for Canadian manufacturers, producers and exporters. I know because I was an exporter, a manufacturer and a producer in Canada. There is nothing more damaging to the potential of the Canadian manufacturer and producer than the existing federal sales tax. I think that is universally an accepted fact. Even our friends the Liberals and New Democrats who agreed on that a year ago are now suddenly asking that this whole GST be dropped.

I cannot understand suddenly the opposition parties coming here for their own political reasons and saying: "No, we cannot go ahead with this, we cannot go ahead with that," without coming forward with any alternatives.

I see one of the Liberal members shaking his head. Obviously, he has not been in the business community because if he had been he would know very well that the existing federal sales tax, while the world changes around us, is a major, obstacle for us to be able to produce and compete on a level playing field with the international market-place and for us to to have free trade.

We are not re-inventing the wheel. There are 48 countries around the world which have a value-added tax. If we do not change, move forward and accept the fact that we have to give our producers an opportunity to compete on a level playing field then we are not going to be able to keep up with the rest of the world and we will fall further and further behind. I do not want that to happen to my children or to anybody else's children in this country without them having full opportunity.

Now what we must do from the standpoint of an administrative situation is make the GST system more workable. It must be understandable and it must impose the least possible addition to the paper burden of both government and the taxpayer and, in particular, the small business community.

To achieve this goal, we have designed a program that emphasizes two key points: consultation and information. In order to facilitate this initiative I have established within the Department of National Revenue a special industry consultation group. The consultation group has begun individual meetings with major national trade and industry associations and professional groups on whom the GST will have a significant and immediate impact. We will be putting special emphasis on sectors that have unique needs, I have already mentioned small business but also charities, financial institutions, farmers and so on.

I can assure all those who accept this open invitation that their views and concerns will be seriously considered because in my view the best way to avoid problems is to consult and we are going to do just that.

I believe by doing that, the consultation process will benefit the government and, more importantly, it will benefit the business community and the taxpayer.

We will also be providing information to those taxpayers who request it. It is for this reason that our information campaign, including registration and information programs which will begin later next year, will be far-reaching. In addition to registration kits and printed information that will be available early in the 1990s, we must provide local seminars and one-on-one assistance to as many registrants as possible. We will do just that. We will provide a service never before witnessed in this country.

This service, this support, this assistance will need additional resources. I spoke to a group of chartered accountants earlier today. I announced the steps necessary for us to be able to meet this requirement to provide the service, and to be able to meet the needs of an estimated 1.6 million taxpayers as compared to the 75,000 who are currently paying the federal sales tax. By the way, Madam Speaker, that is the reason it is unfair. Why should the tax burden, in this instance of $18.5 billion, fall on the shoulders of 75,000 Canadian producers and manufacturers who will be then hampered in producing more products and creating a better economy and, therefore, establishing greater job opportunities in an international competitive market? So in order to provide this service, we are shooting for a target of between 3,400 and 3,900 additional person-years in order to be able to: (a) administer the goods and services tax; and (b) provide the services that are so necessary particularly to the small business community.

I would like to point out that the ratio compared to the International Monetary Fund is not bad. In fact, it is pretty good. Because I and my officials in this government have spent the last six months or more in looking under every rock, to use that term, to utilize existing facilities, to utilize existing resources, to look forward to innovative methods and ways of dealing with the GST, to find the most state-of-the-art technology possible. That is why our ratio, compared to the IMF, is considerably better. The ratio on the IMF for a value-added tax such as ours is one person for each 250 taxpayers; ours is one person for each 300 plus taxpayers.

So I feel very positive that instead of sitting on the status quo as the opposition parties would want us to do, we are moving ahead. It is very clear that this government is moving ahead with the GST.

The Finance Committee hearings continue. We continue to consult with Canadians, but when we put this measure in place by next year, when we have the one on one involvement with the Canadian taxpayer and the Canadian businessmen, I can assure you that we will be far better off as we move toward the next century. If we had stayed with the status quo, we would not have had a Free Trade Agreement with the United States. If we had stayed with the status quo, we would not be reducing the deficit by $10 million. If we had stayed with the status quo, we would not have created over 1.5 million jobs in this country in the last five years. If we had stayed with the status quo we would not have been able to give our children and our grandchildren the opportunity that they deserve.

• (1520)

All of us who are elected to this chamber must put political persuasions aside because if we were doing this only for political reasons we would not be doing it. We are doing this because we believe in Canada and we believe what we are doing is right for the future of Canadians and right for my children and your children. That is why we are not putting any emphasis on a popularity contest.

This is not a simple thing. This is not an easy matter. It is not a popular matter today. But when Canadians see that it is going to give our children the opportunity to reach their full potential I think they will understand that this is the right thing for Canada and for future generations.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, the hon. minister for the government indicated that this side opposite should have an alternative. Some 80 per cent of Canadians are asking the government to have an alternative, to go back to the drawing board on this proposed tax. Does the government not want to listen? We believe that in the best tradition of parliamentary government when some 80 per cent of Canadians are opposed to this tax, there is a clear message to the government which has the first responsibility to draw up an alternative to what obviously is an obviously wrong tax proposal go back to the drawing board.

I would like to ask the hon. minister some specific questions. Can the minister guarantee Canadians that this proposed tax will not be a powerful and tempting tool to grab taxes from the people?

Second, how can it be workable when even the small businesses say that truly this type of tax is a "gouge and a squeeze tax"? How can you then tell them that this tax is simple when in fact all testimony has told us that it will be confusing, it will be complex as far as record-keeping is concerned, and that there will be many other nightmares in the administration of it?

Third, would not the minister agree that this tax will be a vehicle for greed and dishonesty on the part of government to increase taxes in the future? Last, I submit the minister has to agree that tax even only on some food, when some people cannot even afford to buy food with their type of meagre earnings, will be a threat to their physical health. A tax on the tools of learning, for those who want to study but can barely afford to study, will threaten their intellectual health. That a tax on death is truly a reflection of insensitivity on the part of government to collect taxes from the dead.

Mr. Jelinek: Madam Speaker, I would probably need half an hour to answer in detail all those questions but I will try as quickly as possible to answer the last part of the hon. member's question about basic groceries and low-income Canadians paying tax.

I do not know where he has been for the last three years since this tax proposal began to be debated because it is three years and more specifically since the technical paper came out. But the member will know that basic groceries are exempted. He will know that consultation still continues with the food industry to eliminate any grey areas that exist in that industry. He will know that there is a GST tax credit being offered as early as this December when my department will be mailing out income tax forms to all Canadians for low-income Canadians to be able to register for tax credit. He will know that the low and medium-income Canadians in this country are going to be better off as a result of the GST. He should know as well that by eliminating the obstacles to Canada's manufacturers and producers and opening up greater opportunities for trade and competition all Canadians are going to be better off. So that answers the first part of the question.

Second, will we raise the tax? What a silly question. We have a federal sales tax, if we wanted to raise taxes, and sometimes you have to raise them, if you are left with a bankrupt economy like the party that he represents left us with five years ago. We cannot continue to put the burden of our deficits on the shoulders of my children and yours. What is the difference whether we raise the GST or whether we raise the existing federal sales tax except for the fact that the Minister of Finance has already stated that the GST is not going to be raised, except under exceptional circumstances, until 1993-94.

Finally, the question that the member asked about grab bag taxes. How can he say that a GST which is a broader based tax is some sort of a grab bag of taxes when we have a $18.5 billion tax grab in the federal sales tax on the shoulders of 75,000 Canadian manufacturers and producers? That is the unfairness of the existing tax. That is why it is being changed.

We will receive out of the GST some $24 billion, $5.5 billion of which will go back into the economy through tax credits for people earning low and middle incomes. Part of it will go back to assist small business collect the tax. Therefore, the net revenue will wash out in the process while assisting Canada's economy to grow and prosper so that we can all be better off instead of the regressive policies of the Liberals, not to mention the New Democrats. That is why we are doing this, for the betterment of Canada.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, it is almost a year since the election. During that time, I have risen in this House in numerous debates to explain to the government opposite and to the members about the unfairness of a proposed government program, the harshness of some new policy on the devastating effect of the budget on people who live in the north, on people who live below the poverty line, on aboriginal people, and on women.

The free trade agreement, the deregulation exercise, changes to the post secondary education policy for native people, the Budget, the unemployment insurance changes and now the proposed tax reform. In every instance it is the same story. Those who get hurt the worst are always the women, the poor, the aboriginals, the northerners, Canadians who live in the far extended regions of this country. There are Canadians who cannot pay their mortgages, and most young people cannot afford one.

Students cannot afford the education they need. There are elderly people who cannot afford to pay for their health care and for their rent and food also. People sleep in the streets. The number of homeless is increasing. Farmers are closing down their farms. It is a story as old as history.

The difference between the Conservatives and the Liberals: Tories divide the nation in half, into those temporarily better off and those worse off before and call it recovery; Liberals speak for the minorities and for those who have not yet entered the mainstream, for ethnics who want to add their culture to the mosaic that is Canada, for women who are 52 per cent of the population and 52 per cent of the talent of this country, for young people demanding an education and a future, for senior citizens terrorized by the idea that their only security, their social security is being threatened, for millions of reasoning people fighting to preserve our environment from greed and stupidity and fighting to preserve our very existence.

This government has become so arrogant and so elitist that there is no hope for grassroot Canadians to catch up. I read the speech which the Minister of Finance gave recently in New York to the Economic Policy Council of the United Nations Association of the United States. He proudly recited all the "destruction" that this government had caused in our country in the past five years and then said: "We have introduced income tax reform, and are moving ahead to replace our antiquated manufacturers' sales tax with a multi-stage goods and services tax, a value added tax, that will come into effect on January 1, 1991".

The Minister did not even pause, let alone explain to the UN delegation that the entire process is in the hands of Canada's parliamentarians and its citizens. He misled the Canadian public in every ad which he placed in newspapers across the country stating that this tax would be implemented in January, 1991. We as members on this side of the House have become accustomed to these lies and we are no longer surprised at the contradictions and the redundancies. But to lie to his friends in New York, I thought the Minister would be a little more sensitive.

If one of them were to ask how Canadians feel about this tax or how it affects Canadians, would he not have to tell them? I think he would have to tell Americans what they will learn from Canadians: that as a result of the goods and services tax, the gross domestic product will be cut, wage and price increases will spiral, labour costs will increase, as will the Consumer Price Index. There will be employment losses, inflation will rise, interest rates will be pushed up and, contrary to what the finance minister told this UN economic policy group, Canada will have the slowest growth rate in the Group of Seven, which consists of the U.S., Japan, Italy, West Germany, Britain, France and Canada.

This cut in growth will mean a sharp decline in domestic demand which will be reflected by retail sales, housing starts, business investment and government spending. Perhaps government spending will soar when revenue from this alleged revenue neutral tax gets added to the federal coffers. I bet this government gets even bigger when it is handed another cash cow.

I want to mention quickly two more contradictions in the minister's speech which he gave in New York because they illustrate just how redundant this government's policies really are. He talked about the rebirth of belief in market economics.

I was interested in an article in the Toronto Star which expanded on the federal government telling Canadians to put their faith in the market. It said that free trade is good for Canada because it creates one big North American market. The new Progressive Conservative goods and services tax will be a bonanza because it will remove distortions in the market caused by the existing sales tax. For the most part the government's policy is based on a belief that the market makes better economic decisions than a bunch of politicians in Ottawa, but apparently even the Tories do not think that is always the case.

During the last election, for example, the Tories decided they knew more than the market about oil prices and prospects. The market was telling Canadians that energy megaprojects were too risky at the prevailing price of oil. But, since the Tories thought they knew better, they proceeded to commit megabucks to megaprojects. How does that interventionist spirit square with the Tory vision of one big happy market?

Studies have slammed the government for risking billions of taxpayers' dollars on the highly questionable assumption that crude oil prices will rise substantially over the next two decades. If that does not happen, Canada will lose a substantial portion of its megaproject capital. In other words, billions of taxpayers' dollars will go down the drain.

It is too bad the free trade deal does not allow Canada to pass on the Tories' new 9 per cent sales tax to U.S. consumers who may end up buying subsidized Canadian oil.

The third flaw in the minister's speech that day in New York was one we are all akin to: "If we expect to prosper, we shall have to control the destruction of our natural environment". Is it not ironic that on the eve of shutting down parts of VIA Rail service, the most environmentally friendly means of transportation, the Minister of Finance dares to present to a delegation at the United Nations his government's passionate commitment to environmental protection?

It is like this government's commitment to the poor of this country. The so-called beneficiaries of the tax are to be lower income earners according to the Minister of Finance, but the poor of this country have already lost so much during the reign of this Conservative government through increasing taxes that, on balance, they as well as others have become big losers.

The poorest of Canada's poor are women, for instance. Moving away from a progressive income tax toward a regressive tax on consumption hurts women most because they are in the lower income groups. The credits for those earnings less than 25 per cent are insufficient. It does not compensate for the cost of the sales tax.

For instance, although day care is exempt, the cost of the service could increase because day care operators will pay tax on many items, such as diapers, toys and any other services that they need to carry on their business.

Another group of low-income earners are aboriginal people. I want to mention that credits to low-income earners are not tied to inflation. In reviewing the details of the proposed national sales tax, there does not appear to be provisions to exempt off-reserve treaty Indians from such a tax. Therefore, I do not know whether the government will be implementing a process to reimburse the tax to native people affected. These people have a unique constitutional position on such things as taxation.

Certainly, northerners are not exempt. The proposed tax will cause tremendous problems for consumers and small businesses in the Northwest Territories. It will have a devastating effect on tourism, inflation, transportation and construction costs. Northerners want to develop politically and socially in a way that eliminates uncertainties and encourages northern people to participate fully in achieving self-reliance. We are looking for new avenues to strengthen our economy and to assert our pivotal role in Canada's future.

This government is making it almost impossible for the north to develop and for northerners to catch up economically with other Canadians. We have the same right to opportunity as any other Canadian citizen. This government continually implements programs that keep us down.

The budget and this tax reform disproportionately hurts northerners more because we already have the highest cost of living. The dollar value of the tax paid in the NWT will be much higher than the tax on the same item in the south.

Today the minister said the impact of the GST will be minimal on northerners. Yet, after six invitations to the north, this minister has not complied to see for himself. He has not, in fact, tabled the analysis that was done on the GST and the impact it would have on the north.

Mr. Malone: Madam Speaker, the hon. member listed a number of people who, according to her perspective of society, will need some assistance. I think it is important to draw the distinction that what is important is not that we stare at our feet and look only at those who need assistance, but that we put in place systems that are long term so that a nation and its government have the capacity to give that help. While I do not disagree or debate with the member on some areas where we might be more generous as a nation, I do debate some of the specific examples she gave. She said she knew of a whole host of elderly people who could not get medical service in this country. I dispute that. I do not believe that.

I would not expect her to name them in the House of Commons, but I challenge her to supply the names, because I believe that Canada can be of help. We are helping today and I do not think it is appropriate or fair to suggest otherwise.

She indicated that there is along list of European countries which are doing better than Canada or will be as soon as the GST is through. She should know that when the party she belongs to was last in government, in 1984, Canada's rate of economic growth was in thirteenth place just behind Luxembourg. Today we are second and ahead of every country in Europe.

I would like to ask her what authoritative economic evidence she can put forward. Canada is the only country in the world that has the manufacturing sales tax, the only country that taxes its manufactured products. We were similar to Argentina which put export assessments on all of its exports, trying to put together a wall around the country. Canada was the only one which tried to export into an external world by taxing against its manufacturing.

Can the member give us one authoritative document that will show that when we make a change to that tax we will lose our competitive edge? Having gone from the position when her party was in government of eleventh in competitive factor to today being fourth in the world, how does she think that this will put us back to where we are behind all the countries in Europe? Can she cite the source that is economically credible, anything at all other than the newspaper articles that she may have read at some time?

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member across the floor that I am not the Minister of Finance. If I had the resources of the ministry of finance, I would certainly produce documents to sell the goods and services tax and its merits, which the government is not doing. When this government is willing to give me the statistical analysis it did of the impact of the GST on the Northwest Territories, I will be very happy to try to answer some of your questions. I am not the Minister of Finance. All I can give as evidence is to say if your goods and services tax is so good, then all the Canadian people would be endorsing it. They are not.

• (1540)

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I want to say a few words on this motion that roundly condemns the government for a variety of issues that would properly fall under the topic of how the government is managing the Canadian economy. I want to say at the outset that I was interested to hear the remarks of the Minister of Revenue a few minutes ago. He said the reason this government was bringing in a 9 per cent sales tax was for the good of Canadians. Over the last several months I have not talked to one Canadian who feels that this 9 per cent sales tax should or could be supported.

That is not quite true. I issued a questionnaire in my constituency. I have begun receiving responses to that questionnaire. So far about 2,000 questionnaires have come back opposing the sales tax. Four, perhaps five questionnaires have come back supporting what the government is doing. I do not think this government was either elected on a mandate to introduce such a sales tax or should have the right to proceed with such a sales tax, particularly when you consider the impact that sales tax is going to have on poor and middle income Canadians.

I had an opportunity several weeks ago to be in Nova Scotia, just outside of Sydney on Cape Breton Island. Six out of every 10 individuals in that community are unemployed. The average income in that community is around $24,000 a year. In one of the communities I visited, a mine which employed about 1,300 people is being threatened by closure. This government is not only imposing another 9 per cent levy on disposable income for people who can hardly afford to live now, but on top of that is slashing funding for VIA Rail. VIA Rail very often is the only means of affordable transportation in that region of the country and elsewhere.

Apart from the fact that it is affordable transportation, it is good transportation. I have heard the Minister of Transport make the argument that the government had to cut back on funding for VIA Rail because of heavy government subsidies. There is not a transportation system in this country that could operate without government subsidy, and that applies to the airline industry as well as every other means of transportation in Canada. In fact that is why governments, by public policy, have always supported that kind of transportation.

Years ago Tories believed that transportation held this country together. They also used to believe that the CBC was a vehicle for holding Canada together. I still happen to believe that. These people are hell bent on slashing funding. It is an organization that has proved to be of invaluable service in providing information to Canadians, regardless of whether it be on Vancouver Island or in Newfoundland and Labrador. All you have to do is to go into northern Canada to discover how valuable those institutions are to holding this country together as a nation.

I want to go back to the sales tax because it is so unfair that it is, for me, beyond belief. We are talking about removing another 9 per cent of disposable income from senior citizens' pockets, from people who are disabled, people who can least afford it.

In Nova Scotia, which I spoke about a few minutes ago, if this sales tax goes through, sales taxes are going to be around 19 per cent. In Ontario, this 9 per cent increase will mean a 17 per cent sales tax.

The Toronto area is supposed to presently be in a very affluent situation. It is not. There are an awful lot of people in Toronto, for example, who are working in part-time jobs, who cannot find full-time work because they do not have the skills. Another area this government is cutting back on is skilled training programs.

Toronto, compared with some other areas of the country, is, generally speaking, better off. However, when you scratch the surface and get underneath, there are an awful lot of people in the Toronto area hurting just as badly as people in other areas of Canada, and this government is not providing solutions. In fact, it has very much been a part of the problem.

I am talking about single-parent families, headed mainly by women, who are having a hard time putting shoes on their kids' feet, clothes on their backs and meals on the table. If this government gets away with this 9 per cent sales tax, it is going to make life even more difficult for those women and their kids. That is one of the reasons why we in the New Democratic Party are going to do everything in our power to prevent this government from doing that to average Canadians.

The Minister of Finance said a number of things prior to the election. He said if they did go ahead and implement this sales tax that it would be visible to consumers, that it would show up on the sales slips at the sales desk. Number two, it would be revenue neutral; that is the government would not be looking to have additional revenues other than what it had prior to eliminating the manufacturers' sales tax, and that it would not go toward decreasing the deficit.

Well, the chairman of the House of Commons finance committee during the election campaign said that the sales tax would prove to be a boondoggle for the government, an increase in revenues. The next day the Minister of Finance was on national television saying that the hon. member for Mississauga South was a loose cannon, he did not know what he was talking about and denied that the government would ever proceed to go into the pockets of Canadians who could not afford it and do that to them. He asked Canadians to trust him. Well, as we all know, they trusted him once again and put this government back into power.

They trusted the Conservatives as well in 1984 when they were first elected. The Prime Minister made the declaration that universality and social programs were a sacred trust. They were not elected two days when they started trying to slash senior citizens' pensions, mothers' allowances, family allowances, and everything else that prior to election day this Prime Minister said was a sacred trust that he was going to protect for average Canadian families. We all know what he did subsequent to that.

In fact, I want to read a quote that I came across this morning. The chairman of that finance committee whom I just spoke about now says that: "the government has killed universality and is dragging the corpse out the back door."

I think the hon. member for Mississauga South is an honest gentleman, and I think he not only calls it the way he sees it, but the way he analyses the evidence that he has before him. I think he is absolutely right on. If this government has not actually killed universality, it is fast on the road to doing it.

I hope the Prime Minister does not make any more promises to Canadians about things being a sacred trust because as soon as he does, you know that sacred trust and that program is going to go right down the tubes.

• (1550)

When that Prime Minister was elected and said "Canada is now open for business", no one in the country thought he meant he was going to sell the whole damned country down the tubes. That is exactly the direction he is heading. Every policy that comes out, whether the government wishes to acknowledge it or not, can be tied to that free trade agreement that these guys negotiated and have not yet concluded.

I think an awful lot of Canadians are beginning to wake up and find that the Prime Minister's assurances once again not only were not to be believed, but were going to be reversed.

Finally, the Minister says that health care is exempt. I met with a group of psychologists two weeks ago who told me that if they provide that kind of service in their office, it is not exempt from the 9 per cent sales tax. If they do it in a hospital facility, it is exempt. I think at the very minimum the Minister of Finance should come clean with Canadians and tell us exactly what is exempt, what is not exempt, how it is going to apply it and last, but not least, that he is going to withdraw it in the face of the opposition that there is in the country to that kind of fiscal measure.

Mr. Thacker: Madam Speaker, my friend opposite is more fair minded than many others in the House. I would like him to comment on the fact—this is a basic fact—that Canada is the only industrialized nation in the entire world that puts this special tax on its manufacturers, so that we have 75,000 manufacturers paying over $18 billion in tax.

Would he comment on that in light of the fact that 48 other industrialized nations have moved to this type of tax, often for the very reason that I have just given to him. Do they have more poor people in France, Sweden, Norway and those types of countries for having this tax? That is what he is saying. He is saying that we are going to have more poor people if we do this. I do not think the factual record shows that. Would he please comment.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Madam Speaker, I do not think I said it would make more people poor. I think I said that it would make poor people poorer yet. I think that is a more accurate reflection of what I said.

I think there is general agreement that the thirteen and one half per cent manufacturers' sales tax is unfair and it should be dealt with—

Mr. Andre: How?

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): How about fairness, for one?

I understand the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would not understand that word, Madam Speaker, but how about fairness. They ask me again, what would we do. How should we replace it. I say simply with fairness.

An Hon. Member: Spend more.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): No, I never said that either. I never said spend more. But I would argue very strongly against some of the changes that have taken place in the tax system over the last number of years, where this government is more and more clearly being seen as a government of big business. If you shifted some of that tax load back to the corporate sector, from where you have placed it on middle and low-income Canadians,

I think that is how you deal with that unfair thirteen and half percent manufacturers' sales tax.

You do not remove the burden from big business in this country and transfer it over to people who are already being nickeled and dimed to death, to the tune of about $1,800 or more a year in personal income taxes since this group got elected, then come along now and say you are going to ding them for another 9 per cent. That is exactly what this government is doing. When you ask what we should do, I ask you to ask yourself what would you do in terms of bringing fairness back into an unfair tax system that this government primarily created?

Mr. Thacker: My friend has said that the poor would be poorer. I do not think the factual record will bear that out either. As he knows, since we have become the government, we have moved to these refundable tax credits rather than deductions. A $4,000 deduction against income helps a very rich person far more than a flat tax credit. That's a good thing and the facts show that people under $30,000 are better off than they would otherwise have been given the fact that more revenues were going to have to be collected. If we had had to collect the revenue under the old system, the poor would be far worse off than with the changes we made.

Under the new program families making less than $30,000 will again get this refundable tax credit which, in principle, I am convinced is the right way to go. How can he say that the poor will be poorer given the fact that they are actually going to get a cheque every few weeks?

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Well, Madam Speaker, the logic of that argument is not acceptable to me at all. Rather than deal with that specifically, I would like to remind the member that it is built into the White Paper, as I understood the proposal, that because the tax credit is limited to anything in excess of 3 per cent increase in the cost of living, that tax credit will be reduced eventually until it exists no more, as I understand it. As I understand the White Paper, that is exactly what is set out in the formula. There is no doubt in my mind as well that if this government brings it in, whether they bring it in at 6 per cent and everybody thinks "Oh, my God, thank God it wasn't 9", then within two or three years that thing is going to increase, because it is a cash cow for governments and that has been the way it is in every other country in the world that has that kind of sales tax. I can see the poor getting even poorer, so I don't accept at all the argument that we will be better off as a result of this measure.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on this Opposition day, when we have a chance, if one can call it that, to hear the same old clichés.

Those of us who have been here during the past five years will remember that we have had five budgets. After every budget, during the period set aside for Opposition speeches, the Opposition told us that jobs would be lost, that the poor would become even poorer, that Canada was going down the drain, that Canadians wouldn't stand for it and that we would be beaten in the next election.

Madam Speaker, you will of course remember Mr. Wilson's economic statement in November 1984, a statement that identified four major challenges: First, reduce the deficit; second, increase Canada's economic growth; third, promote investment, innovation and competitiveness in business; and finally, help Canadians in need.

These are the four major challenges Minister Wilson identified in 1984. We have made considerable progress since that time, but there is more to do yet. What we still have to do, Madam Speaker, is implement the goods and services tax, Part II of a tax reform that is already under way.

Last year, we introduced a tax credit for the first time, and as you know, Madam Speaker, a tax credit is twice as attractive and twice as profitable as an exemption. And above all, it is the fairest way to treat Canadians, because when you have two Canadians, one who earns $100,000 annually and the other who earns $10,000 annually, under the previous Liberal Government both were entitled to a basic exemption of $3,000. This worked out to a savings of about $300 or $400 for the person who had an annual income of $10,000 but the individual with an annual salary of $100,000 was able to save at least $1,500 on his income tax. This was criticized by the Liberals and the NDP. They said it wasn't fair, while we feel that with a tax credit of $1,000 for everyone, the same amount, whether you earn $10,000 or $100,000, the system is fairer and more equitable.

It is often said that sales tax is regressive. For instance, going back to my first example of a person with an annual income of $10,000 and another person who earns $100,000, when these people have to buy a pair of shoes, for instance, the 9 per cent tax will take a proportionally larger chunk out of the income of the person earning $10,000. And that is why, Madam Speaker, our proposal to change the federal sales tax includes a tax credit, but in this case a refundable tax credit, while today, we have a tax that is hidden, a tax that distorts, that provides for 22,000 exemptions and which at the manufacturing level is as high at 13.5 per cent, a tax nobody sees and nobody knows about. We are removing that tax. We are going to remove it completely and replace it with a 9 per cent tax at the consumer level. Not a ripple effect tax, not 9 per cent at each level and cumulative. It will be 9 per cent from start to finish. Nine per cent is paid once, that's all. And only on new goods, not on used goods! Canadians will see the tax and know why they are paying it.

People on low and middle-incomes, all those people and households with incomes of less than $30,000 per year, will receive a tax credit. They will receive it before the tax comes into force. They will receive the tax credit in December 1990, while the tax becomes effective on January 1, 1991. They will receive the credit on a quarterly basis, so that individuals and families on low-incomes will not be hit by a regressive tax as was the case under the previous Liberal Government, because the 13.5 per cent at the manufacturer's level was paid by everyone, both rich and poor.

Under our system, Madam Speaker, those who can afford to pay will pay, while the others will receive a refund for the amount paid. That is important. That should be emphasized. And that is part of the tax reform that was started last year.

On Saturday, I was in my riding, and I had an opportunity to go to a lunch at the Traverse des âges where about 300 senior citizens are members, and several asked questions before lunch, a lunch where they serve beans which are always very popular, and they said: So what is this GST? What is this 9 per cent? And when I pointed out to those people that if they make $30,000 or less, they would receive a tax credit four times a year, I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that opinion polls and everything else mattered little to them, because they understood that this tax was for the good of the country and would not penalize them—that is important. That is what makes a tax not regressive: when it applies to those to whom it should apply and is refunded to those who cannot afford it.

Again on Saturday afternoon, Madam Speaker, I was in Pointe-du-Lac to meet with the Mouvement Action-Commerce, the association of Pointe-du-Lac business people, who had an exhibition. Small and medium-sized businesses will be paid by the federal Government to collect our tax, the GST. At the end of the month, if they paid out more in tax than they collected, they will be refunded the difference within 21 days. Madam Speaker, that is what makes a tax right, good for the country, applicable, simple and fair. Small businesses with annual sales of less than $30,000 will not even have to collect that federal tax. The tax is fair, non-regressive broadly based and accompanied with tax credits!

I was listening to the Hon. Member for Beaches—Woodbine (Mr. Young) say just now that they admit the present federal sales tax is not good. They admit that 13.5 per cent is not good. And the Liberal Opposition critics say the same thing. Everyone in this House and on the Standing Committee on Finance agrees that the present tax is not good because it is hidden, it is harmful, etc. But while they agree with that, they do not agree that the alternative tax we are proposing is good, although it meets all the normal criteria that an economist, a tax specialist, a sociologist or a political scientist would wish for a federal sales tax imposed at the consumer level, a tax which has proven itself in 48 other countries. I think that must be emphasized.

More than nine million Canadians earning $30,000 or less will receive cheques from the federal Government before this tax is implemented. You know that nearly 65 per cent of Canadians earn $30,000 or less. So if 65 per cent of Canadians receive a tax credit, it means that the 35 per cent with higher incomes will pay their fair share of the federal sales tax. I think that must be emphasized.

The amount given out will be about $1 per working day for adults and of course somewhat less for children. The new federal sales tax, the GST, was introduced to replace an existing 13.5 per cent tax with a more broadly based 9 per cent tax that is much less regressive. This fits in with what has been done since 1984.

Look at the reduction in public expenditures. In 1984, they were 19.5 per cent of our gross national product. This year, they are 16.5 per cent. Therefore, government spending has gone down in the past five years. We deregulated both the energy and transportation sectors to boost the Canadian economy and help Canadian industries. We privatized Crown corporations which were neither important to nor necessary for Canadians and used to compete directly against the private sector. The Government collected taxes from the people and took that money to offer overly generous grants to companies.

We signed the Free Trade Agreement with the United States and, as you would know, this agreement is bound to help Canadian business. Unemployment declined from 11.2 to 7.8 per cent. A million and a half new jobs have been created in Canada over the past five years. Earlier I heard the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young) say that unemployment is rampant in Toronto and that people can feel its impact Mr. Speaker, I would suggest the Hon. Member was kidding when he said that. We all know everything is going along just fine in Toronto. Were the riding of Trois-Rivières experiencing the kind of economic boom they now have in Toronto, I think we would not be complaining. Even at that, we are not that badly off in the riding of Trois-Rivières.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I see you indicating my time is drawing to a close. The deficit stood at $39 billion when we took office, it is now down to $28 billion. To put it another way, we trimmed the annual deficit down 25 per cent in four years. What does that tell us? That we have had a sound economy. And we have had a sound economy precisely because our policies did encourage investors and Canadian business alike. As I said, the 9 percent GST is part and parcel of the over-all plan.

• (1610)

Seen from that vantage point, Mr. Speaker, I think it is imperative that the legislation to implement this tax be adopted as soon as possible just so we can be like the 48 other countries which have a fair and acceptable tax system.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate the Hon. Member's comments on the following.

[English]

This morning, one of his colleagues indicated that he felt that this tax was fair to youths seeking an education in spite of the fact that they will be paying more for their education. We are talking about 500-plus students from universities, 300-plus students from colleges. He thought it was fair for seniors and people on fixed incomes. Some of them will be hit by this tax in addition to the clawback. He thought that it was fair to small businesses. Small businesses have, almost unanimously to my knowledge, said that the tax will be a nightmare, an absolute disaster. It will be extremely costly. It will make them less competitive.

Canadians generally are going to be subjected to this tax by roughly $600 for the average Canadian family in addition, I might add, to $2,800 in additional taxes during the last five years. I suppose that the member who spoke this morning, and I hope that my hon. colleague here can disagree with him, would suggest that the VIA Rail cuts that will affect 2,900 people if they go as proposed is fair, that the unemployment insurance changes that will affect over .75 million Canadians are fair.

The tourism industry, the food industry, the building industry and many others are opposed to this tax. They recognize that it will increase inflation, that it will shoot up the interest rate, that it will cause a loss of jobs. I would like to have my hon. colleague's reactions to these comments. Please, I beg you not to tell me that the Liberals made us do it.

[Translation]

Try a different approach!

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, it is rather unusual to hear such comments from a Liberal Member, the Hon. Member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Duhamel).

Maybe they are afraid of the truth, but after all, the debt we have today is their fault. And as it happens, the federal sales tax is their fault as well—

Mr. Duhamel: Just as I said, that's all you can say!

Mr. Vincent: They didn't have the guts to make any changes.

Mr. Speaker, in 1978—

Mr. Duhamel: They should take a course—

Mr. Vincent: You had your chance. It's my turn now.

Mr. Speaker, in 1978, I was studying for a master's degree in tax law, and that was eleven years ago. At the time, we were taught that the federal sales tax system was a disaster for Canada, and that was eleven years ago. Who was in power eleven years ago? Was it Social Credit? No, it was the Liberal Party of Canada which appointed all kinds of commissions but never had the guts to say: This is bad for Canada and we are going to change it. That is what we are doing now. The federal sales tax is bad for Canada, we are going to change it and we are going to have a tax system that is fairer and more equitable for Canadians. And that, Mr. Speaker is what the goods and services tax is all about.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Chartrand): Since the Hon. Member's time has expired, we shall resume debate with the Hon. Member for Hamilton West (Mr. Keyes).

[English]

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the motion proposed by the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, which states the total lack of confidence in how the Conservative government is managing our economy.

We are already witnessing the piece-by-piece dismantling of the social safety net. This is a net built with care and concern over decades, yet it is being destroyed in just a period of months. Canadians have long believed in government responsibility to provide systems of health and welfare benefits. We have believed in the right of every citizen to such benefits. We have understood well the Liberal concept that the disadvantaged should be able to free themselves from the excessive burdens of misfortune and should be provided every opportunity to pursue a decent standard of living including a higher education and health care.

What troubles Canadians today and what should concern all of us here in the House is that a new and more dangerous weapon against this right to an affordable, decent way of life, this cannon at the heads of families, is a tax that the government proposes to introduce on virtually every good and service.

The grimiest thing about this proposed tax is that it would amount to a tax on those in our society who are most in need of caring government support. The government boasts that lower and middle-income Canadians would receive tax credits to compensate them. However, the credits would not be indexed to inflation.

Just two weeks ago, I organized a town hall meeting in my riding of Hamilton West to give my constituents the opportunity to present their views and concerns on the GST. Of the 350 people who completely crammed the hall, not one person was in favour of this proposed tax. In fact, my constituents took it upon themselves to present me with over 120 petitions containing the signatures of over 5,000 people, and more are yet to come. The petition calls upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

I invited to this town hall meeting several groups representing various areas of interest in Hamilton. Not only did invited guests make presentations but several other showed up at the last minute to give evidence against this regressive inflationary tax measure. Each group gave presentations which lasted between five and ten minutes, and at the end of all the presentations, I invited questions from the floor.

I might add that the town hall meeting was moderated by Sue Patterson of the chartered accounting firm Peat Marwick Thorne. She was there with me at my side. She has over a decade of experience at Revenue Canada in excise taxation. Ms. Patterson provided accurate and unbiased answers to many questions which constituents had regarding the proposed tax.

The groups at the meeting included the Downtown Hamilton Business Improvement Area, the Hamilton Chamber of Commerce, the McMaster University Students Union, the Hamilton and District Funeral Services Association—yes, Mr. Speaker, this tax has you coming and going—Hamilton psychologists had their say, the Hamilton and District Homebuilders' Association, the Hamilton YWCA representing the volunteer sector and the United Senior Citizens of Ontario.

My solemn promise to my constituents and to those in attendance was to carry their message to this government here in the highest court in the land. At the time of the meeting, the Hamilton Chamber of Commerce advised us to watch the newspapers because the Canadian Chamber of Commerce was preparing to announce its position on the tax on the very next day. Well, it did and what people learned was that this large constituency, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, is very concerned about the effects of the tax. In fact, in a press release dated September 21, 1989, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce said that it could not support the government's proposals unless a number of conditions were met. These included the harmonization of the federal-provincial tax base, a common means of collecting the tax by both provincial and federal governments, that the tax be revenue neutral and that it must be visible to consumers.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce raises some important concerns. It suggests that any new tax must be brought in with co-operation between federal and provincial governments because, as the system is currently proposed, it is estimated that as many as 10,000 individuals would have to be hired to administer the tax.

The Chamber also demands that the tax be visible which the finance minister promised it would be in this very House back in June of 1987. However, the Minister of Finance has left it to the discretion of retailers to either put a sign in their window or a sticker on the till. Last, the Chamber insists that the tax be revenue neutral. Yet, as appears to be the case, the tax will be used to raise revenues for the Government of Canada.

The Minister of Finance proposes to replace an $18.5 billion tax with a $24 billion tax and, according to figures released by the Department of Finance, the GST will take a bigger bite out of poorer Canadians than rich ones. In the case of a couple with a single income of $15,000, the GST will consume 8.1 per cent of that income compared to a couple with an income of $75,000 of which the GST will only consume 4.8 per cent. These are Department of Finance statistics.

On behalf of over 10,000 students, the McMaster University Students Union gave a presentation at our town hall meeting. Students strongly opposed the GST. Their president, Stephen Longo, summed up the feelings of the students when he said: "It seems strange to us that at a time when education and skilled developed are said to be a priority of this government, that they are promoting a tax initiative that could reduce participation in our post-secondary institutions".

At a recent meeting of the Conservative Party of Canada right here in the capital, the Prime Minister's address underlined this glaring conflict between the GST and access to higher education. The Prime Minister said that higher education was a top priority for his government. He also said that in order to remain internationally competitive, our system must be the best. Hollow words, easily said, but hard to swallow in the face of the GST, because if implemented, the GST will do serious damage to students and education. If Canadians wish to enhance their education by taking upgrading courses, they will be taxed. What will this do to the idea of job retraining for people put out of work due to this regressive tax? Even student service fees will be taxed, increasing the cost of the mandatory fees.

Perhaps most hurt of the students will be the imposition of the GST on student textbooks, which as you know, Madam Speaker, are extremely expensive these days. As Mr. Longo told the meeting, this would mean a tax on the very vehicle of education, the printed page.

Beyond this, the tax will also hurt students because the GST will be placed on restaurant meals, because there is no rebate for student housing, because student transportation and telephone charges will be taxed. This is the government's commitment to education? The students say it expresses a lack of commitment to education.

The government has also made great promises in relation to affordable housing. The Hamilton and District Home Builders Association told our town hall meeting quite a different story. While the Minister of Finance says he will soften the blow somewhat through a proposed rebate system, the Home Builders Association says that housing will become less affordable under the GST. The association says that the new tax would add $3,000 to the cost of a new home, more than six times the cost estimated by the Minister of Finance. The association concedes that the added cost to a new home in Metro Toronto and region under the GST will be over $9,000. The Hamilton and District Home Builders Association also said that Canadians should expect their rents to go up significantly under the GST.

Not only will the price of a new home increase, but so too will the cost of renovations. Is the government so naive as to think that while the price of new homes increases, the price of older homes will not increase to keep pace with the market? To quote the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the tax proposals are: "triumph of greed and politics over reason and sound planning". There you have, Madam Speaker, a message from the constituents of Hamilton West through their elected representative to this government. They say enough is enough.

Mr. Speller: Madam Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for his very informative words here today. There was one subject that I kept hearing about back in my riding this past weekend. We had a county fair at which thousands and thousands of people lined up to sign a petition. This is something I think all hon. members would agree is one of their basic rights. A few people came up to me and mentioned the fact that they were not too sure of what this GST would do to disabled people and those less fortunate than us. I am wondering if the hon. member knows exactly what effect this will have on the disabled.

Mr. Keyes: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk for his questions. The disabled community in this great country had better brace itself for the onslaught of this proposed GST. It appears that personal attendant care will be taxable, except where the attendant is an employee receiving wages. Now this would not be affected by the GST but if the person is receiving a fee for his service which is, in this particular case, more common, it will be a taxable service.

Another example relates to adapted vehicles, such as vans. Vehicles bought to transport disabled persons are subject to the same 9 per cent tax as those bought to transport others. Now if a lift is bought such as those you see on the side of vans to aid people into the van, they are not charged the 9 per cent tax on that lift. Under the Ontario sales tax, the entire vehicle is exempt, but under this situation, it is not.

Mr. McDermid: Wrong.

Mr. Keyes: It is not, check the technical paper. Computers fall into a similar category. A disabled person buying a computer would have to pay the extra 9 per cent. Software would be free but the computer is taxed at 9 per cent.

By increasing the cost of computers and vans, this government is placing these items even further out of reach and thereby restricting the participation of disabled people in our society. Although renovations to make a home accessible would not be taxed, there will be a tax on the material used in the renovations. A business that wanted to renovate would be taxed on the contractor's services and this will also, of course, discourage people from making buildings accessible.

I stood here and listened to hon. members across the way speak of concerns. One member said that the Official Opposition was giving us these sorry and sad tales. Well, let us have a look at the suggestion of tax credits referred to by government members.

Since the credits and income thresholds are indexed only to increases in the CPI minus 3 per cent, fewer and fewer low-income Canadians will be protected. Let us make for a moment the not-so-unbelievable prediction that inflation is more than 3 per cent annually for each year after 1991. The $24,800 threshold at which families begin to lose the refundable sales tax credit will fall to $21,297 after five years, and to $18,288 after 10 years in constant 1991 dollars. This will mean that within five years, the over half a million low-income Canadians who will be eligible for the full refundable sales tax credit in 1991 will lose either part or all of this credit. After 10 years, over one million low-income Canadians who will be eligible for the full refundable sales tax credit in 1991 will have lost either all or part of this credit.

As more low-income Canadians lose the refundable sales tax credit over time, the value of these credits will also fall since the actual dollar value of the credits is only partially indexed to inflation increases in the CPI minus 3 per cent. Within five years the $275 adult credit will have fallen to $236 in constant 1991 dollars. In 10 years, this $275 credit will be worth $203 in constant 1991 dollars. Fewer low-income Canadians will be eligible for fewer and fewer credits over time, making the GST more and more regressive.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to participate in a debate on the economy, the management of the economy and the goods and services tax here in the House of Commons.

One of the reasons that I entered politics was that I think taxes are too high. I agree with many opposition members that a lot of middle-class people in this country feel quite burdened by taxation.

• (1630)

I guess what got me into politics was the desire to find some kind of alternative, some economic alternatives to simply the old methods which have ended up accumulating a massive amount of debt in this country at the same time as we have high taxes.

Taxes are not too high because the economy is being mismanaged, but rather because we have an intense debt situation which politicians have failed to address over the past few years, and it takes a lot of political guts to reverse old trends and to think about new ways of reforming the tax system in order to make it more equitable and more fair.

Political guts have been in short supply many times. A lot of politicians in this country have felt that they could stand here on the floor of the House of Commons and they could defer taxation, they could take taxation that should have been imposed today to pay for programs that we have now and just push it off into the future, cast it off into some nebulous and fuzzy generation that they would not bear ultimate responsibility for.

We have accumulated high debt which has resulted in high taxes. Right now we spend 35 cents of every tax dollar we collect just to pay the interest on the outstanding debt. Now that hamstrings this economy. It causes our government to have a very great problem. We have a balanced budget in terms of spending and revenue and yet we have this debt monkey on our back that is just siphoning off tax dollars. It has to change.

Our new debt equals $83 million a day. That is equivalent to roughly $1,000 a second. That is a new debt in this country that is being added on to the $350 billion that is already there. It is totally irresponsible to do that. I am sorry the hon. member who just spoke is leaving because he will benefit a lot from this.

Mr. Keyes: I have a phone call. I will be in the lobby.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): We will see you in a few minutes. We need to address these problems. We need to have discussions with the opposition members on meaningful, constructive, alternative ways that we can reform the tax system to accomplish national goals, and surely the first national goal that needs to be accomplished is the economic survival of this country.

We are debating a resolution now that states that there has been economic mismanagement. Maybe the government has not done everything right, but the government has attempted sincerely to cope with problems that it did inherit, to cope with an economic environment that had extreme difficulties when the government did take office.

What I want to say, and if no other message gets through to the opposition I hope this one does, the status quo is not an option. We have to change. The GST is one example, it is one alternative, it is one attempt to put a new form of taxation, a more equitable form on the table for discussion. The kind of debate that we are having now is a healthy one. It is exactly the kind of debate, in many ways, I think we should have had during the last election campaign. I think we should have been talking then about the economic destiny of Canada and about these particular problems which we need to solve.

The GST, the goods and services tax, is a proposal that is on the table as a constructive attempt to achieve fairness in the tax system. It comes not standing on its own but it comes as part of a measure of practices and proposals that the government has before us. First and foremost, if we are to tackle our debt situation, we have to stop the growth in the new debt and that means addressing our budgetary deficit, our shortfall, our annual shortfall. This must be done and the government, as you know, through this proposal and through its budget has been attempting to do that, relentlessly trying to reduce government spending. At the same time it removed obstacles to economic growth. This as well is a very important part of GST, removing obstacles to increased growth.

A third element that the government has had in mind in designing the GST has been to protect those people at the lower end of the income scale. I know the argument is made that sales taxes are regressive because they hurt those people who spend the greatest percentage of their money on surviving. There is validity to that argument, there is substance to it, and we must care about those people.

I submit to you that the finance minister has been attempting sincerely to cope with the regressivity of sales tax reform.

The Minister of Finance has been looking at an enriched tax credit for low-income people. If anything, a lot of critics are saying that it is perhaps too rich at almost $2.5 billion a year, a series of cheques being sent to millions of low-income families which would put money in their pocket before they go out and buy something. It will more than offset the effects of GST and we will have lower-income families in this country better off as a result of the reform.

I would like to say a couple of words about the effects of GST on small business. This is an area that has caused some of us concern. We have heard an awful lot of fearmongering, a lot of myths that have been perpetrated by those in the small business community who must have their own political agenda because what they are saying to the Canadian people is simply a gross distortion of the truth. The truth about GST and small business is that the government has been extremely concerned about not increasing the paperwork for individual businesses but to make sure that individual business operators in this country are given the greatest opportunity to concentrate on doing business and not pushing papers around.

We are going to have a streamlined accounting form for the goods and services tax for small businesses, a one-page form, one page which business people will be able to fill out in a relatively short period of time. It will be based on the difference between the tax collected on sales and the tax paid on inventories; simple, streamlined accounting procedure. The government will show by that one page form how sympathetic it has been to the concerns of small business people. Vast numbers of businesses will have the ability to do a very, very simple calculation.

In the case where there are refunds from the government, those refunds will be prompt. There will be interest paid on those refunds which are outstanding over 21 days. There will also be, for the vast number of businesses, a positive cash flow situation as they are able to go out and collect the GST on sales and remit it quarterly. So there will be an advance cash flow situation.

The most crucial element though is that businesses do not pay the GST, consumers pay it. It is a pure tax on consumption. It is a change in the way that we look at taxation in this country. It is a tax on spending, not on income. This brings me back to my first remarks.

Middle class people feel quite put upon in terms of the income tax system. They feel that they are taxed without an alternative, taxed without a way to decide how they are going to pay that money to the government. With a tax on consumption, a tax on spending, we give consumers a choice.

Let us not forget that when the GST comes into effect there is going to be a $700 million income tax reduction for middle-class people, a reduction in income taxes. People will have more money in their pockets, in their pay cheques, in their pay packets, after GST comes into effect. That means they have the choice of how to be taxed.

A tax on spending hits the big spenders, not the savers, not the hard workers. It hits the people who spend the most. Those who spend money on the big houses and the big cars and the large restaurant meals are the ones who inevitably pay more tax. It is without loopholes for the rich. It is fair and even across the board. If we shelter low-income earners and if we tax those who spend more, then we have an improvement in the system. By reducing income taxes and by imposing a spending tax, we put the choice for taxation into the hands of those people who spend.

Back to business for a moment. Because businesses do not pay the tax and consumers pay the tax, we have a situation which is far preferable to the one we have now. Now we have a manufacturers' sales tax that is buried deep in the price of products and services that businesses purchase. It raises the cost of their doing business. It makes them less competitive. It makes our exports less competitive on the world market.

The elimination of an old $17 billion bad, buried, invisible tax and a replacement of that with a visible tax that takes tremendous political will and courage to implement can only help this economy in the long run, and I know that the opposition parties who have given us no viable alternative will have to end up supporting it.

Mr. Duhamel Madam Speaker, I would like to commend my hon. colleague for having made a sincere attempt to explain his government's initiative. There is a certain gentleness there which I think has probably been absorbed by virtue of the fact that he is sitting on this side of the House and close to colleagues from another party.

My question is as follows. You will recall perhaps that two of your colleagues have indicted that this is a fair tax. I would ask you whether or not you have heard any student, any senior, any single parent, mother or father, any of the 3.5 million to 5 million poor in this country, any of the handicapped, any of the VIA Rail employees, any of the unemployed, anyone from the construction trades, tourism industry, or the foods industry, or farmers say that this was a fair tax. I guess what I am really trying to find out is whether or not you agree with your colleague's comments that on the record this is a fair tax to these groups.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): In answer to the hon. member's question, I have to say yes. I have heard people on both sides of the argument, on both sides of the debate, those who support the tax and those who do not support it. In my own riding, I might mention, I had seven public meetings. The hon. member beside me alluded to his meeting earlier. I had seven in my riding, two meetings specifically on the GST. We solicited briefs from all groups, not just business but social groups and so on, and all that response was then forwarded to the government in terms of a representation of what the people in my riding think.

I can tell the hon. member that I heard the debate on both sides. I did hear it from single parents and I have heard it from seniors. I have heard it from a lot of people who have said they are sickened that our country is so indebted, and are sickened that governments, not just this government, not just the past Liberal government—let's get rid of that stuff—but governments for the past two decades have found a real inability to wrestle with these social problems.

We have demands put on by taxpayers for social programs, we have the response by politicians who wish to give the taxpayers what they want, but they do not wish to impose a burden on those taxpayers for the costs of those programs. As I mentioned, we pushed the problem into the future. The future is now here, the future is upon us, our time-frame is running out. The debate goes on and with every second of the debate we are another thousand bucks in the hole. We have to end it at some point and take action. What I am saying is we have a proposal on the table now that will accomplish real action. Will some people be hurt? Yes. Will some people benefit? Yes. Is it fair? Absolutely, it is fair.

Mr. Keyes: Madam Speaker, far be it from me to stand and interrupt the hon. member for Halton Peel on a point of order to point out that we do not point out to this House when hon. members come and go, but he is a new member and maybe hasn't read the book. I will explain to him that I had to leave because of an important call from the constituency and I then returned to my seat.

The hon. member and one-time fellow journalist and I have discussed this issue in the past, and that issue is that we are dealing with a tax, a proposed tax—unlike the newspaper articles that say it is practically a fait accompli—a proposed tax of 9 per cent replacing the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' retail sales tax.

Now, replacing the one with the other leaves a gap between the 9 per cent and 13.5 per cent. Does the hon. member have a suggestion for the House and for Canadians on just how to ensure, or can we ensure, that the savings between the 9 per cent and 13.5 per cent is passed on to all Canadians, or do we just leave it to the discretion of the manufacturers to take that difference and pass it on?

Mr. Turner (Halton Peel)): My colleague raises a very valid point and I must say that many of my constituents share his concern. Allow me to answer you as I answer my constituents.

There are basically two thrusts that we have to consider here. One is that we have an extremely competitive economy and none of us here would diminish the importance of competitive pressures; certainly, for example, in the price of an automobile, which is expected to fall. After the implementation of the GST and the removal of the sales tax that currently exists, there should be a price reduction for consumers.

I can guarantee with the extremely competitive automobile industry, for example, that that will in fact be passed along. Should it not be, should business people in this country decide not to play ball with the government, should they decide in a moment of weakness to take advantage of a change in a tax system to take money from the people of Canada, should that happen, then there is a mechanism being set up to safeguard against that because an agency within the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department will be monitoring price changes. It will be investigating complaints and it will be reporting to this Parliament.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak on this important motion put forward by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I will use my time to express to the House and to Canadians who may be watching the strong objections of the people of the north to the government's proposed 9 per cent goods and services tax or GST.

Shortly after the Minister of Finance released his technical paper on the 9 per cent tax in August, the Leader of the Official Opposition, along with 70 members of our caucus, came north to my constituency in the Northwest Territories for a special caucus. This was the first time that any federal political party has held a caucus in the north. I am proud this happened in the Northwest Territories in Nunatsiaq, in my constituency, and I appreciate the tremendous support and interest of my colleagues.

Throughout our meetings and discussions with organizations and individuals, the topic of the new 9 per cent tax was raised. Northerners are deeply concerned because this tax is going to very severely affect northern residents. Across the north opposition to the government's proposal is widespread. The Yukon is opposed, the Northwest Territories is opposed.

I would like to share with the House the following comment from a well-known Yukoner:

> (We are) opposed to the federal government's new goods and services tax because it will only add to our already high cost of living, which currently is one of the highest in Canada. The Yukon economy is based predominantly on the provision of goods and services that are being targeted by this new tax. Our two major industries of mining and tourism will be hit as a result. Consequently, the goods and services tax will have more of an impact here than in southern Canada. This isn't fair. We shouldn't be penalized and have to pay more than southern Canadians just because we choose to live north of 60.

The House may be interested to know that the quotation I have just read is not a comment from the hon. member for Yukon, nor even the government leader of the Yukon. That comment was made by the leader of the Progressive Conservative caucus in the Yukon.

The Northwest Territories finance minister believes the new 9 per cent GST will have a particularly devastating effect on the north. Compounding the precarious economic future of the Northwest Territories is the fact that the federal government is threatening to substantially reduce its transfer payments to the NWT government. The NWT finance minister has said and I quote:

> It is a fragile, evolving economy up here, and it's just been dealt a double body-blow. The first is the goods and services tax, the other is (potential cuts to) the formula financing agreement that defines how the federal government pays our grants to us. I can't talk about one without the other, because the timing of the double body-blow is very serious.

If I may add a third body-blow, it is the government's proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system. These changes are going to seriously affect northern workers because of our high levels of seasonal employment.

We in the north are wondering why the federal government wants to reduce the deficit on northern backs. Northern residents live and work in the harshest climate of this country. By living in the north we contribute to Canadian sovereignty in the Arctic. We also have the highest cost of living, the greatest unemployment level and the highest suicide rates in Canada. The 9 per cent GST is an additional hardship we do not need imposed on us.

• (1650)

The Northwest Territories is one-third of Canada's land mass. We have 62 communities spread across three time zones. Only six of these communities have continuous year-round road transportation. Thirty-six communities depend entirely on air and marine links, all of the communities in my constituency of Nunatsiaq.

In my constituency in the central and eastern Arctic there are no highways. All our goods are shipped in by air or sea and we pay high freight rates on these goods. The freight and transportation costs increase the prices of goods in the stores. In Pangnirtung, eggs cost $3.81 a dozen, a loaf of bread costs $3.27, a five-pound bag of potatoes cost $9.49. In Coral Harbour, one pound of butter costs $3.79. A bag of 32 diapers costs $19.60. In Cambridge Bay, two litres of milk cost $5.35.

At its annual general meeting last April, the Northwest Territories Association of Municipalities unanimously passed a resolution concerning the proposed new tax, urging the government to give special consideration to the needs of northern Canadians who already bear the burden of this country's highest cost of living. The association has pointed out that due to higher northern costs, northerners will pay more of this tax per capita than southern Canadians.

The residents of the Keewatin region face living costs that are between 50 per cent and 70 per cent higher than those of the residents in their supply base of Winnipeg. Kitikmeot residents face even higher costs ranging from 70 per cent more than Edmonton prices for Cambridge Bay residents to a high of 139 per cent for residents of Pelly Bay. While I do not have the cost of living figures for the Baffin region, I do know that the residents of Iqaluit pay 31 per cent more for food than residents of Yellowknife and the Yellowknife food price index is approximately 35 per cent higher than that of Edmonton. Spence Bay has a food price index 96 per cent higher than that of Yellowknife.

Northerners already bear a large tax burden because of the extremely high cost of living in the north. Incomes are higher but are taxed by the federal government at the same rate as if they were earned in southern Canada. Northerners pay more in federal fuel taxes because the climate demands we have to use more fuel. Northerners pay more in federal telecommunication tax because we have to phone long distance more often. The slowness and unreliability of postal service in the north means we use facsimile machines and telephones more extensively.

Because of our higher costs, the dollar value of the tax paid in the north will be much higher than the tax on the same item in the south. The federal government estimates that families earning less than $30,000 will be better off. Questionable as that is, by the government's own admission, the reverse is that families earning over $30,000 will be worse off. Thirty–thousand dollars may be a comfortable income in southern Canada but it is not as high in real terms in the north.

With excise taxes on gasoline and diesel fuel, the air transportation tax and the goods and services tax, transportation will be taxed at a higher effective rate than other goods and services. This higher taxation will have a disproportionate impact on the northern territories and other isolated communities in Canada.

The costs to small business to administer this tax will be high. A $600 administration fee the government will pay to these businesses is not going to cover the additional costs. With respect to food, while the technical paper says basic groceries will not be taxed, the government appears to be wavering on this now. I urge the government not to tax groceries, especially in light of the high prices northerners now pay for their basic groceries.

Northerners are also concerned about the effects of the 9 per cent on new housing. There is a tremendous housing shortage in my constituency and housing is extremely expensive and hard to obtain.

The president of the Canadian Home Builders Association has predicted that rents will go up significantly and has said that the price of new homes will go up by three times what the finance department claims. In the north, the tax on transportation will drive up the cost of materials and already high prices mean fewer buyers will be eligible for rebates compared to the south.

The government will also apply the 9 per cent GST to all goods and services supplied by Canada Post. We resent having to pay tax on post services which already are inadequate. These are some of the more serious concerns.

While finally the committee on finance examining the tax proposal went to Whitehorse, Yukon, it has not visited the Northwest Territories. This is shameful and I urge the committee to include the Northwest Territories in its travel schedule.

The north cannot absorb this 9 per cent increase. The government must go back to the drawing board. The proposed 9 per cent GST is a nightmare for northern businesses and northern consumers. It will hurt our economy. Tourism, which is a growing part of our northern economy, will suffer with the imposition of this tax.

Mr. Flis: Madam Speaker, I was very impressed and was listening very attentively to what the Member for Nunatsiaq had to say because this summer I had the opportunity of visiting Iqaluit and another area, Pangnirtung, near there. You and I, Madam Speaker, could probably not survive there even on our salaries. I was shocked at the price of staples such as milk, bread and potatoes.

To give an example, there was some fruit on the shelf. One banana was going for $1. One pear was going for $1. I was very pleased that the Member for Nunatsiaq stood up in this House and told the government, on behalf of the constituents he represents, to scrap this GST, not to exempt foods going up north, but to scrap it. I think that is the message that we on this side of the House would like to give the government.

For God's sake, scrap this GST and go back to the drawing board because it is creating nightmares not only in the Arctic but all over Canada.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak for a few minutes on this opposition motion.

This opposition motion is a litany of the kind of effort that this government has made over the last few years to deal with the problems of the country. It indicates the kind of effort not only that has not been made but that needs to be made to put the country in a condition so it will survive.

I am particularly interested today in putting on the record a few words about rural Canada. Most of us do not realize this, but over 90 per cent of Canada is rural. Even on the most modest basis, more than a quarter, something around 35 per cent depending on how you define it, of the people of Canada are rural Canadians.

It is rural Canadians who will be most affected by the policies of this government and by the GST, the goods and services tax which this government is proposing to put on the goods and services bought by the people of Canada. There are three basic primary industries that are all rural industries. One is farming which, to many people, is the basis of rural Canada. But it is much more than that.

• (1700)

Many of the fishing communities of Canada are rural communities, and can be considered as rural communities. Much of the forest industry of this country is rural industry.

So we have the three major industries of this country related to the rural population of this country. Although we have had a tremendous amount of talk about how well these industries are going to be treated and how well they are going to be taken care of, these three industries have been the butt of the main attack of this government over the last four years.

I point to these three industries because all three of these industries are in a crisis position. In many parts of the country these industries are worried about survival. They have already, in many cases, given up the idea of survival under the kind of circumstance being produced for the last good many years. They have already adapted to a variety of changes which have made their lives less productive and their quality of life less good than it was before. A good portion of this can be laid at the policies which the government has put before us in the last few years.

If you live outside of Canada's main cities you are dependent upon a distribution and a transportation system that is necessary for you to survive. Up until the last few years our transportation and communications systems were policies of this country. The provision of transportation to rural and remote areas was a policy which the government accepted as a responsibility. It has turned away from that policy. In the process of dealing with transportation the government has made the cost of transportation so high that in many places it is not available. Or, in some cases, by deregulation the government has made it an industry which is dependent entirely on the market system.

If you are living in a remote area, the transportation system is the basis of your survival. If you attack that transportation system by removing it or making too expensive, you put it out of reach of those people and you reduce the income and the quality of life in those rural areas. That is true of farmers, of fishermen and of foresters. They are all affected by this government's policy on transportation.

I was very pleased to hear the member from the Northwest Territories speak on matter. The goods and services tax—in fact, all taxes in this country—have a detrimental effect upon rural and remote areas. If you bought a stove that cost you $200 from the manufacturer, you paid 12 per cent or 13 per cent, maybe $27 in tax on that. That was $27 added to the $200. For that stove sold in Stony Rapids in northern Saskatchewan or in Yellowknife, you would be paying $600—$600 for the transportation, the distribution and the mark-up for that stove.

Suddenly, that stove has a tax of $54. Before you paid $20; now you are paying $54.

The increase in tax is more than double. That tax is not on the product; it is on the transportation and the distribution costs of that particular product. The further you are away from the source of the manufacture of that product the more you are going to pay in tax on that product. This is true of every product that you can think of.

We have a good example that is already in place. This government put a 10 per cent tax on communications, on telephone calls. In my community every call that my neighbours make is a long distance call. If they want to call their doctor, or their school, the machinery agency or their dentist, they have to call long distance. Every one of those calls is taxed at 10 per cent. If you live in the city none of those calls are long distance. So you have put a 10 per cent tax on rural areas with that communications tax. We are now perpetrating a tax that we have already tried out. We already know it is wrong because we put it on communications. Yet we are proposing to put it on every other item making it that much more difficult for people to live in remote and rural areas.

I started out by talking about three basic primary industries. I have been talking about two policies of this government, the transportation policy and the goods and services tax policy that affect, detrimentally, directly upon rural and remote areas. But there are other things, other policies of this government to be considered. This particular opposition day motion points to many of those.

For instance, let us take the agricultural industry. This government has a policy of free trade. It has in the last year allowed into Canada an increase in products that are agricultural. I know the government will tell you that they are processed products. But they are agricultural products because they were made from agricultural products here in Canada. They are now made from agricultural products in the United States. They allowed them into Canada by refusing to protect them under the marketing boards that are already established. In fact, the agricultural industry right across Canada is feeling very insecure as far as marketing boards are concerned because the agricultural policies of this government have undermined the basic structure of that.

To conclude, this government has attacked the primary industries of rural and remote areas because it is planning to put in place a tax on goods and services. They have attacked it because they have put a tax on communications. They have attacked it because they are eliminating transportation—or making it so costly that you cannot afford it. They are even putting a tax on energy. Because we live where we do, it costs us more to travel. It costs us more, therefore, we are going to pay more. We abhor not only the goods and services tax but all of the attacks that this government has made on rural and remote areas.

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I have read the motion of the Hon. Leader of the Opposition made on Thursday last. I must say that this motion could not be more the pinnacle of irony or, perhaps, even of hypocrisy at a time when the Canadian economy is performing as productively as never before in virtually every region of the country, following more than almost two decades of a Liberal government in which economic misdirection seemed to be the norm. Deficits reached proportions of $38 billion. The national debt became entrenched and grew almost like a vicious national cancer. It ultimately resulted in the worst recession in this country since the Second World War.

• (1710)

By comparison, we find ourselves today at the very heart of a comprehensive, integrated and committed Conservative government strategy toward economic responsibility and integrity which I believe will ultimately unshackle Canada from the insidious financial consequences which we inherited from the Liberal regime of the 1970s and the early 1980s.

I believe that the course which the Conservative Government is now on will lead us from deficits eventually to a balanced budget, and perhaps then eventually to surpluses. That is the only way to commence to pay down the debt which will irretrievably consume the economic potential of our future generations if we do not deal with it.

I would like this afternoon to speak briefly about two aspects of the hon. Leader of the Opposition's motion. One is with respect to regional development. The other is with respect to the goods and services tax on which there has already been a great deal of comment.

With respect to regional development, particularly in Atlantic Canada today, it is hard to talk about neglect and disparities when in fact this government is spending more money on regional development in Atlantic Canada today than has ever been spent before. That is the truth. The budget projections for 1989–90 estimate that we will touch one–half a billion dollars in regional development spending. That is the first year and the bulge year of a program that will average $425 million as projected in the space of the five–year budget plan. It compares to a regional development average of $285 million over the previous five years. It compares to an average of $185 million in regional development spending by the Liberal Government in the period 1979 to 1984.

The pinnacle, the bastion, of our regional development spending in Atlantic Canada right now is the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency which is a $1 billion shot in the arm for Atlantic Canada.

I would like to tell you, Madam Speaker, just what the state of the Atlantic economy is at this stage when the Leader of the Opposition has made a motion that is so far out of touch with reality. In New Brunswick, 39,000 jobs have been created since September of 1984. In comparison there was a net loss of 2,000 jobs by the Liberal Government between 1980 and 1984. The unemployment rate in New Brunswick today is down to 12.5 per cent from 16.3 per cent in September of 1984. Manufacturing shipments in June of 1989 were up 61.6 per cent compared to the same month in 1984.

In Nova Scotia, 35,000 jobs have been created since 1984. The unemployment rate has fallen by 3.7 percentage points, and was down to 10.1 per cent in August of 1989.

In Prince Edward Island, 5,000 jobs were created in that same five–year period. Manufacturing shipments in June of 1989 were up almost 22 per cent compared to the same month in 1984.

In Newfoundland, 29,000 jobs have been created since 1984. In contrast, 1,000 jobs were lost in the last five years of the Liberal administration in Newfoundland. The Newfoundland unemployment rate has fallen from 23.5 per cent in September of 1984 to 15.8 per cent in August of 1989. Manufacturing shipments in June of 1989 were up 15.8 per cent compared to the same month in 1984.

The Atlantic economy, while still not at the pace that we would like to see it and still not at the pace of central Canada, or perhaps even of western Canada, is certainly steaming along at a far greater pace than it ever experienced in the latter years of the Liberal administration, and is progressively improving all the time.

One of the saddest facts about life in the Atlantic provinces is the exodus of our young people. One of the great purposes of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is to provide the sustenance, the opportunity and the wherewithal to encourage our young people to contemplate staying in our region, taking the initiative, seizing the entrepreneurial spirit and becoming productive and sustaining of themselves in our region. ACOA has been quite successful in that respect. I would like to cite a few quick examples.

I would like to talk about the example of Terry and Judy Adair of the Kingston Peninsula in New Brunswick who had a dream to furnish a lodge and log cabin complex that would invite tourists to the Kingston Peninsula to enjoy the quality of life which they enjoy there. With the help of $95,000 from ACOA and an interest buy–down worth $36,000 they have been able to construct that project which will accommodate up to 20 guests at a time. By their third year the Adairs will be realizing revenues from that venture of $160,000 per year.

The Leveret family of Joseph Du Moine in Cape Breton with more than $75,000 worth of grants from Enterprise Cape Breton and the investment tax credits available have been able to expand and upgrade their abattoir business. They are now generating annual sales to co–ops and restaurants in the Cape Breton area of more than $350,000.

I would like to tell you about Vincent Court from Prince Edward Island who had tried farming. In the course of farming he decided that he would like to go on and become a furnace manufacturer, to find ways to heat farm buildings more efficiently and more economically. The result is the bio–blast woodchip furnace which he developed with the help of an ACOA grant and ACOA financing which he is now selling to greenhouses, farms, motels and sawmills in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and New England. He cannot produce them fast enough. Gross revenues will soon be measured in the millions of dollars.

There are many other examples of such success stories. There is the Harmon family of Queenstown, New Brunswick and their family-operated custom cabinetmaking business. There is Gilbert Levesque of Grand Falls, New Brunswick and his profitable family-run bakery. There is Kathyrn Small of White Hills, Newfoundland and her dream to build a ski resort in her home province. All of these examples emphasize the success which ACOA has had in encouraging residents, citizens of Atlantic Canada, to stay at home, to not contemplate the exodus to central Canada which has become the norm and to build their futures and our future.

Atlantic Canada has demonstrated that its entrepreneurs can be world-class when given just half a chance. With people like the Sobbys, the Irvings, the Crosbies, the Cohens, the McCains and the Joudreys, to name a few, we have an example in Atlantic Canada of just what entrepreneurship can become. That is the direction and the thrust of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency which the Leader of the Opposition has criticized so vigorously, so unfairly and so incorrectly.

I will not have time to speak on the goods and services tax to the extent to which I wished, but I would like to say this. It is a balanced and integrated program which will eliminate a regressive and damaging federal sales tax that should have been gone long ago. It will provide a new series of major tax credits to more than nine million families at the lower levels of the earning scale. It will reduce net taxation for every family of income of less than $30,000. It will shift the burden of taxation more fairly to those best able to pay. It will improve indexation benefits for any inflationary impact. Lastly, it will provide special rebates to ensure affordable housing all in one encompassing package.

In due course, when the provinces see fit to recognize the opportunity for creation of a single national sales tax, I predict that Canadians will accept the GST program as one of the most effective alternatives for a progressive consumption tax system so essential to the attainment of our country's financial stability.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of our colleague, in particular when he said that this was a good tax because it would provide, as he referred to it, a single national sales tax. I want to know if he is aware of something that some of us are not. Have all the provinces joined in overnight or perhaps earlier today? If they have done so, I am surprised that the Minister of Finance would have not brought this fact to the attention of the House because it would have been, indeed, an achievement on his part that he would have probably wanted to raise in this House. It would have been interesting to see all the provincial finance ministers all of a sudden agree to this horrible tax. It would surprise us. I ask the member if that has happened as of late, or if it is just a wish of his for the provinces to go along with this grief and suffering tax.

I also want to ask him about something he said. I am paraphrasing here, I do not want to pretend to use his exact words. He said that this tax would make a fairer tax system. I believe he said something to that effect right at the end of his remarks. I want to know if he is aware that the government's own sales tax document which was provided to the committee indicates that a family of four—in other words a family of two adults and two children—with the combined two incomes of $45,000, one person making $27,000 and one person making $18,000, will pay—after this tax is in place $629 more in tax each year as a result of the grief and suffering tax. Is that the Tory definition of fairness?

Mr. Bird: I am happy that the hon. member has asked me those questions because it permits me to get to a part of my speech that I ran out of time to deliver. First of all, the hon. member did not hear me correctly. I said that when the provinces see fit to recognize the opportunity for creation of a single national sales tax, I predict Canadians will accept the GST program as the most effective alternative for a Progressive Conservative tax system.

The Minister of Finance consulted with the provinces for two years. The onus is on the provinces to join in this tax system. I want to tell you that if you had read in last Thursday's Quorum the article by W.A. Wilson, you would see he predicts that the provinces will have their feet to the fire when the citizens of Canada realize that the reason for two tiers of taxation is because the provinces failed to come to a consensus with the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance has no alternative but to proceed with the implementation of the federal financial strategy in this country. I respect him for the courage he has had in doing so. I would certainly express the wish and the hope—I think all of us would—of seeing a single integrated tax system. But the onus is now on the provinces to step up and to come forward with proposals. I believe we have already had indications from the Minister of Finance that he will listen.

I would like to address the second part of the member's question in which paraphrased me. I will tell you exactly what I said. It was that this tax will shift the burden of taxation more fairly to those best able to pay.

We have talked about how business does not like this tax. We have talked about how the opposition does not like this tax. But there are nine million Canadians who are going to get cheques every quarter under this tax system who are going to like it very much. There are families making less than $30,000 who will have a net benefit from this tax, and they will like it very much. Not enough attention has been given to the benefits that they will receive.

A family of one wage earner with two children making $30,000 will have a net tax saving under this program of $214, contrary to the examples the hon. member so selectively picked.

Mr. Boudria: The one you selectively picked is better than the one I selectively picked.

Mr. Bird: The example I selected certainly makes my point a lot better than the one one you selected to make your point on.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The time for questions and comments is over.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, I would like to address my remarks to the first portion of the motion moved by the member for Vancouver Quadra that this House condemns the government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy, including the threat to impose a new 9 per cent sales tax that is regressive, inequitable, invisible and inflationary.

As someone who has spent much of my working life in educating pupils between the ages of 6 and 19, as well as adults, I want to address the affect of the GST on learning because this proposed 9 per cent tax will be regressive on learning. It will be inequitable on learning, it will be invisible, and it will be inflationary on our education process.

There is no other country in the world, the western world especially, that has shown as much disrespect for education and for learning as this country has shown in the last five years. Education is an investment and the students of today are the leaders of tomorrow. This reality is not present in any action this government has taken in the last five years with respect to education. In our era, students realized that higher education meant more secure employment, a more secure future.

It is costing more and more for students to attend a post-secondary institution. According to the Canadian Federation of Students, the average cost per student now is around $10,000. With standard inflation this figure will rise at an incredible rate as this government indulges in its philosophy that only the rich should go to universities and colleges, and the poor should go to work. Otherwise, why would this government, in this new proposed tax, deliberately exclude students from receiving additional refundable tax credits above and beyond the general credit that it is making available to low income singles?

On page 15 of the technical paper we see that starting at the minimum level of $6,175, the additional credit will be paid at the rate of 2 per cent of net income up to the maximum of $140. I understand that finance officials have privately conceded that the minimum was set at $6,000 to specifically exclude students from receiving this additional credit.

Our students will not be eligible for the additional credit even though they will be paying the additional 9 per cent on all their textbooks. They will be paying the additional 9 per cent on their writing paper, their binders, their pens, their pencils, student activity fees, their tutorial fees, their rents, their courses and on their typewriters and word processors.

I understand that some members might wonder if a student can afford a word processor, the student should be able to afford 9 per cent sales tax. There are many gifted and bright students, but because of a learning disability require the assistance of a computer, a word processor, so that they can write their essays neatly and these students who were failing before are now going on to universities. These students, under this proposed 9 per cent sales tax, may not be able to go on to post-secondary education.

Tories laugh but they have no idea of what is happening in education today.

As legislators we should be aware to some degree of what it is like to be a university student or college student. There is not much time to cook for yourself, just like the MPs, so you tend to eat out. But it is not in fancy restaurants like MPs because you can't afford it. They eat in fast food restaurants.

With the proposed 9 per cent on prepared foods and foods eaten in restaurants students will essentially be paying the 9 per cent tax on most of the food they consume.

Many people would argue that education is a privilege, not a right. The interesting thing about that argument is that is supported mostly by those people who have never had to work too hard for what they have got.

I do not agree with this particular philosophy, I believe very strongly that in this country education is a right. It is a right because people are our most important resource. Anybody who does not realize that should go back to school because they couldn't have learned anything when they were there in the first place. The future of our country depends on how much and how well we educate our young people.

This tax will hit each and every pupil as he or she goes through one of our educational levels, right from junior kindergarten on to university. There will be less money to maintain and improve the learning environment as the various school boards use up more money to administer—and I stress, to administer—the tax when applying for their rebates: rebates for general maintenance services such as cleaning, painting; rebates for desks, chairs, books, pencils, right up to the supply of milk for the younger children.

This government does not realize that there are school boards that must provide breakfast for students before they can be taught. The hon. member for Brampton does not realize that. Maybe in Brampton they do not have to provide breakfast. But in the inner cities of Toronto, the Toronto Board of Education has to provide breakfast for children coming to school. Before they can learn they must have a good breakfast.

There will be less money available to the municipalities to provide day care and community centres as they in turn apply for their rebates for their own services. From day one, when the child goes to school, his or her parents will have less money to buy books that cost more; less money to buy clothes that cost more; less money to provide tutoring that costs more, but may be necessary; less money to take the kids to the zoo, to the museum, to the art gallery. These things are not a luxury. Educational excursions are not a luxury. Books are not a luxury. In a country where our illiteracy rate exceeds 26 per cent, we cannot afford to make books inaccessible to people in general, let alone our children.

This government has acted in contempt of every single person and every single institution in this country. It has acted in contempt of the seniors citizens of this country. It has acted in contempt of the poor people of this country and less fortunate regions of this country. It has acted in contempt of Parliament on more than one occasion. Now it is acting in contempt of the future of this country, our children and their right to a better life and a better world.

The students of this country are not deceived. They cannot be deceived. What does the Prime Minister think that our students would make out of his statement just a few weeks ago when he said at their national convention that education was a priority in the next four years of his government. What does he think they made of that statement? Does he really have so little respect for the intelligence of the audience? I suppose his direct audience was the Progressive Conservative Party at the time. Does he have so little respect for the intelligence of our students that he thinks they believe him?

He really does think that the people of Canada are going to believe him when he says that we will all be better off with this new tax. However, if he really thinks that, he should make a personal note of all the petitions that are coming in from right across Canada and tabled in this House daily. He should make a personal note of all the protests that are being organized across this country.

The Prime Minister does not have any choice if he wants to win the next election. Although his credibility is shot, he had better scrap the tax and go back to the drawing board. There should be no discussion in this House or outside this chamber whether to include all foods, whether to reduce the 9 per cent to 6 per cent. The bottom line is that the GST must be scrapped.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): I am interested in a couple of points raised in the hon. member's comments.

First, he talked about the students of today being the leaders of tomorrow. I hope the hon. member also realizes that the students of today are the taxpayers of tomorrow who will have to deal with the issue of deferred taxation which is mounting daily. I wonder how the member proposes to give us constructive alternatives to the GST and the government's tax reforms.

Second, I wonder if the hon. member recognizes that the government proposes to bring in a system of tax credits which will, of course, help students. Do you have any evidence that students will be excluded from the $140 single person tax credit? Do you have any evidence of that? If so, could you table it for us.

Mr. Flis: It is very clear that the member did not listen to a word that I said. He asked whether the students of today will be the taxpayers of tomorrow. Yes, they will be. That is why we have to provide the best education possible to these students, so that they will be in higher income brackets and will be able to afford to pay the taxes. If we do not have that, we will have a tax revolt in this country and no one will want to pay taxes.

May I quote to the hon. member from his minister's document, the technical paper, on page 89. This is how the government hides things. They talk about what is being exempt, and then they say that hence, as a general rule instruction and training in sports, recreational or cultural activities such as dancing, skating, cooking, sailing or swimming will be taxable.

Private ballet lessons, is this not an investment in our country? Could this not lead to a very profitable vocation for that person? That person will be taxed and may have to drop private ballet lessons. Students may have to drop private music lessons. Yet that could be their vocation. It could be their occupation.

What about the students who will not be able to go on to university because of the 9 per cent tax? Whereas if they finish university, they could be in the hon. member's category earning $60,000 or more instead of earning $20,000 and not being able to afford this tax. I am glad the hon. member posed this question. Let us educate our young people so that they can afford to pay those terrible taxes put on by this Tory party.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. member's excellent speech and I am sorry that the hon. member who asked the last question did not. He might have understood the problem. I wonder whether I could ask my hon. friend from Parkdale—High Park a question concerning the fairness of the imposition of this tax.

The government has said that this is all necessary and that it is part of their budget cutting process. This is stage two of tax reform. Stage one was introduced before the election. That was lowering the income tax. The details of this tax have only just been released.

In his area of Toronto, is it his view that if the details of this tax had been released before the election that the present government would have been elected, or is it safe to assume that if these details had been made public some time before November, 1988, we would have seen the defeat of the present government? In fact, we might not be enduring these taxes at this time.

Mr. Flis: I think the answer is self-evident. If the Conservative party was honest during the election they would be sitting on this side and not where they are today. They deceived the public, and it is all coming out now, on VIA Rail cuts, on promising not to increase taxes and now on the 9 per cent. They deceived the public on universality. They will not touch pensions and so on. Now they are clawing everything back.

Here is a party that got in by default and by deceit. They will not be there long. Come 1992 they will be on this side of the House.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I could not sit here all day without getting into the debate because I have sat and listened to the opposition ad nauseam today. Although I was not here last Thursday, I read the record from Hansard.

It is very obvious that what this government has to do first and foremost is to take the opposition on a training program so that they can understand how the goods and services tax works and how it will benefit this country. The examples that were given this afternoon by the members opposite were totally false.

I find it rather amusing that the Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, the man who goes around this country bragging that he was the last one to have a balanced budget in this country was also the individual who raised government spending some 27 per cent in one year and started deficit financing. He does not talk about that. Yet, he comes in here and has the nerve to bring in a motion that states:

> That this House condemns the Government for its mismanagement of the Canadian economy,—

History has shown that he was probably one of the worst managers of the economy in this country. That is absolutely true. We today in this country can thank him because he fathered deficit financing. He fathered the deficit that we are experiencing today and the Liberals thought that was pretty good, and we keep on borrowing, and keep on borrowing, and keep on spending and adding to the debt by some 24 per cent a year.

• (1740)

We have a tax system in this country that needed revision and a man with foresight and with guts, our finance minister, in November 1984 made it very clear to the Canadian public that this government was going to grab this terrible tax system that had been established over the years and reform it to the betterment of this country. He has done just that. I will put his record in finance up against any finance minister this country has ever had, especially the Chrétien, Lalonde, MacEachen and Turner that we have had over the last number of years. I will put his record against any of them any day.

This new tax is replacing a very outdated manufacturers' sales tax, absolutely outdated, and all three parties agree on that. All three parties unanimously have said in the House that it has got to go, that it penalizes the economy of this country, absolutely. It has been stated in the House by the finance Committee. There is no question about that.

The Liberals flirted with it back in the early 1960s. Back in the 1950s they even suggested perhaps they should do something about this tax. But this is the first government that has had the guts to tackle this major problem that Canadians have with the manufacturers' sales tax. This could destroy our exporting, and we are an exporting nation. We export 35 per cent approximately of what we produce.

If we cannot maintain competition with the nations that buy our goods and services, then we will be out of the market-place. Number one, the manufacturers' sales tax places us at a great disadvantage in exports. Number two, the goods and services tax makes imports less expensive than a comparable product made here in Canada. That puts our producers very much at a disadvantage because they are taxed entirely differently. Third, we are the only country in the world that has a manufacturers' sales tax.

We are late in doing this. This should have been done years ago. Forty-eight other countries have a goods and services tax, the countries that we compete with, and their businesses and their services have no input tax costs and sales tax. Ours do.

The examples that were given today by the members about trying to compare the manufacturers' sales tax with a goods and services tax I must say were totally wrong, totally misleading—I will not say deliberately so because I just do not think they understand. I just do not think they understand.

The goods and services tax is going to make our economy more competitive, both in our export markets and at home. That is very important. Any economist looking at this will tell you that it means jobs. There is no question about an increase in jobs, an increase in productivity in this country, and it is going to help the gross national product of Canada. There is no question about that.

Look at the groups that are appearing before the committee. None of them are arguing that there should not be a GST. They are not arguing there should not be a GST. Well, some of them want it a little lower. Some of them want exemptions. They want to be exempted. They think that they should be exempted but everything else is fine. They think we should have a lower rate, but that is impossible. This government is on the right track. It is going to be implemented in 1991 and by 1992 the Canadian public will understand how good this is for Canada and this government will be re-elected for decades to come.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 5.45 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 81(14) to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Turner) (Vancouver Quadra), which was negatived on the following division:

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Government House Leader): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to two petitions, Nos. 342–0872 and 342–0873.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour today to present three petitions signed by 194 constituents. They call upon the Parliament of Canada to maintain VIA Rail's present national network, to upgrade VIA Rail with new equipment and to give VIA Rail a sufficient budget to maintain its national mandate for passenger service.

These petitions are signed by the residents of Churchill, Weir River, Norway House, Wabowden, Thompson, Gillam, Sundance, York Landing, Snow Lake, Pikwitonei, and Pukatawagan. Many of these communities rely solely on an adequate VIA service.

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by several persons living in the Kitchener—Waterloo area. This is in addition to the many I tabled yesterday from people in my own riding of Brant.

They call upon the government not to reduce rail passenger service, but rather to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail service in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy-efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Madam Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of people from Windsor, Ontario, who strongly oppose the proposed goods and services tax. on the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes, but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment. The petitioners ask this Parliament to reject this tax.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I also rise to present a petition from a number of residents of Vancouver, Burnaby and New Westminster who are very concerned about the proposed cuts to VIA Rail which they consider to be essential for many Canadians and which has been a part of Canada for more than 100 years.

These cuts will result in a serious reduction in passenger railway service and threatens maintenance, safety and jobs and would eliminate a third of our national passenger railway system. The petitioners call on Parliament to maintain the existing VIA network, upgrade Via equipment and guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out a mandate to provide passenger service.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint–Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting, on behalf of the Club de l'Âge d'or in Saint–Hyppolite, a petition which calls upon the Government to reject the new goods and services tax, in view of the negative impact the tax will have on low and middle–income Canadians.

[English]

I also have the honour, Madam Speaker, to present the same petition on behalf of our Lady of Fatima Seniors Club who again feel that the tax will cause serious and unfair hardship to low and middle-income Canadians. We humbly ask Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure once again today to stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present this petition on behalf of the residents of South Porcupine who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ensure that there is no taxation on goods and services such as loans, the arts and other non-luxury items and to scrap the entire GST as it is proposed by the government.

• (1110)

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a petition in the name of 600 Canadians who are concerned about the present negotiations at the National Arts Centre with its orchestra and who hope that parties will go back to the table and negotiate in good faith.

The petitioners pray that we consider the National Arts Centre orchestra an excellent, world-class one that has brought fame to Canada and its capital city. They ask, as a matter of priority, to ensure that the National Arts Centre maintain this orchestra at its current size and standard of excellence and ensure that sound cultural credentials be the main criterion for any new appointments to the National Arts Centre Board of Trustees. I deposit this petition with pleasure.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour and privilege to present petitions signed by 132 Canadians in the communities of Thunder Bay, Ignace, Nanaimo, South Gillies, Kenora, and a number of other areas across the country.

The petitioners are all in support of the continuation of rail passenger service in this country. They point out that this government has refused to provide VIA with the necessary support to fully realize its potential to develop the kind of national passenger rail network that Canadians want and deserve.

I just want to say that although they were not there at the transport committee this morning, I know that they will be very pleased that we are going to hold public hearings into VIA Rail.

[Translation]

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions. One is signed by a large number of residents in my riding, by constituents who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the new goods and services tax because it does not meet the criteria set by this Government when it made its proposal for a new sales tax. It is a hidden tax, it is unfair and it applies across the board to goods and services. Your petitioners believe that the tax is not a good tax and that it should be rejected.

[English]

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present the concern of 60 Canadians who have signed this petition, and it has been duly certified by the clerk.

They are concerned that this new tax will be hidden from Canadians and will be applied to virtually everything they buy. They are particularly concerned with the onerous burden it will cause on small business.

They humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

VIA RAIL

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise also to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is a petition calling on Parliament to maintain the existing VIA Rail network, to upgrade the VIA equipment, and to guarantee VIA sufficient support to carry out its mandate to provide passenger rail service across our country.

This petition is signed by people in the lower mainland, from Vancouver, New Westminster, Burnaby, Coquitlam, Delta and the Vancouver region.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to table a petition signed by 2,400 people in the great constituency of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

These citizens of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell are particularly displeased with the fact that the federal government, earlier this year, embarked on a plan to cap the price of industrial milk in Canada. I might add that the representations of the dairy farmers of my constituency and elsewhere have been so successful that the government has already backtracked on a good portion of that awful scheme that they had embarked on previously.

I am pleased to table this petition on behalf of my constituents and I totally support their petition as well.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I stand pursuant to Standing Order 36 with a bona fide petition presented by people from the lower mainland as well, decrying what this government is doing to VIA passenger rail service in the country. They are asking the government to change its mind and provide the kind of service to Canadians that we need, with the kind of equipment we need, and with the modern kind of service that is certainly possible and needed within this country.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by residents of Vancouver Island, from Victoria to Campbell River, who are very concerned with the elimination of VIA Rail passenger transportation, especially on Vancouver Island.

They point out in this petition that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada said that the federal government has the responsibility to ensure that rail passenger service in Canada be retained, modernized and expanded. They are somewhat reassured now that there are going to be public hearings on rail transportation in Canada.

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present this petition under Standing Order 36. It is the same petition that a number of members have been submitting to this House. It relates to the dismantling of VIA Rail passenger service, the mode of transportation that really should be the transportation mode of the future.

I would like the members opposite to realize that we will continue to bring forward these petitions as there are many, many people who are now becoming aware that their rail passenger service will be taken away from them. We expect to see many more in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of presenting a petition signed by 88 voters from across Canada and especially from Kingston and the Islands.

[English]

The petition calls upon Parliament to avoid cuts in VIA Rail passenger service in Canada and reflects in its preamble the importance that VIA Rail passenger service has had to Canada, both to the tourist industry and to national unity, and calls upon Parliament to avoid any such cuts.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, it is my honour as well to present a petition from residents of the lower mainland of B.C., calling upon the government, as do many others, to maintain the passenger rail service on Vancouver Island and in Canada as a whole, and not only to maintain it but to provide the funding necessary to upgrade this service so that it will truly contribute to the passenger service in Canada. I urge the government to listen to these petitioners.

COMMUNICATIONS POSTAL SUBSIDY PROGRAM

Question No. 111—Mrs. Finestone:

For the fiscal years (a) 1985-86 (b) 1986-87 (c) 1987-88 (d) 1988-89, was any money paid under the Department of Communications Postal Subsidy Program to the Canada Post Corporation for mail mailed by (i) government departments (ii) Crown Corporations (iii) provincial government departments (iv) provincial crown corporations (v) municipal governments and, if so, in each case, in what amount?

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Government departments and agencies at the federal, provincial and municipal levels are eligible to mail in the Publications Mail Program. However, no data is maintained to determine the proportion of the Communications Postal Subsidy Program which could be attributed to these users.

PUBLICATIONS MAIL INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Question No. 112—Mrs. Finestone:

For the fiscal years (a) 1985-86 (b) 1986-87 (c) 1987-88 (d) 1988-89, was any money paid under the Publications Mail Infrastructure Program to the Canada Post Corporation for mail mailed by (i) government departments (ii) Crown Corporations (iii) provincial government departments (iv) provincial crown corporations (v) municipal governments and, if so, in each case, in what amount?

Mr. Benoît Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Government departments and agencies at the federal, provincial and municipal levels are eligible to mail in the Publications Mail Program. Mr. Cooper: I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP DEPARTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Wednesday, September 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mulroney that Bill C-18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship and to amend certain Acts in relation there-to, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I simply want to raise a point of order regarding a situation that occasionally makes things difficult for hon. members, and in any case we have to deal with it.

Yesterday, the Government announced, and that is what we read in the Projected Order of Business, that Bill C-36 would be the first item for consideration by the House. However, it seems the Government changed its mind, so that item No. 2, in other words, Bill C-18, will be debated first.

I raised this point because some members are in committee, and when they have to sit in committee and in the House as well, it is my duty as the party Whip to inform them that the House of Commons has priority.

If these members are supposed to speak to a particular bill, agriculture or multiculturalism or whatever, it is my duty as the party Whip to call them to the House.

Madam Speaker, I find it rather difficult to orchestrate or organize all this when we are not given all the information on what will be done on a given day.

I agree that the Projected Order of Business is subject to change without notice. However, I think we should be able to schedule the business of the House so that Members can be where they should be at the appropriate time and there are no last minute changes in the order of business to confuse matters. Personally, I would ask the Government to be more consistent in its instructions to the Table and to give us one day's notice or at least let us know the night before, as is customary, instead of making changes just before the orders of the House are called.

• (1120)

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I take note of the concerns of the whip of the official opposition party. As the House is well aware, the government can choose anything from the Orders of the Day, in whichever order they choose to put them forward and we try, as always, to co-operate.

One of the reasons we are faced with this dilemma this morning, or why we have the change in order, is because of conversations that were going on between the three parties. They did not wrap up in time for us to give the proper notice to the table in terms of the order for today. So we regret any inconvenience it has caused the opposition. They can be assured of our continued and ongoing and habitual co-operation which we are more than delighted to give on every and any occasion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The last time the bill was before the House, the hon. member for Ahuntsic had the floor. She still had some time left. Does the hon. member wish to continue her speech?

Ms. Roy-Arcelin: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Ahuntsic.

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment and perhaps ask a question, if I may.

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The hon. member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville, on a point of order.

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I would appreciate your opinion. Is it customary for a member to ask questions when that member has the floor for the purpose of making a speech?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I think that the hon. member can certainly understand that sometimes during a statement a Member might ask a rhetorical question, as many of us do, I think, at times.

The hon. member who was asked some questions has a few minutes left. Since she is there, she can surely answer a question she was asked and if her last comment takes the form of a question, I see no reason to object.

The hon. member for Ahuntsic.

Mrs. Roy-Arcelin: Madam Speaker, I can also use my time to make a comment.

The multiculturalism policy was established by the Liberal government in the 1970s because they saw it as a way to integrate into the Canadian mainstream Canadians whose origin was neither French nor English.

But since then, Madam Speaker, the face of our country, Canada, has changed. More than a quarter of our population is of other ethnic origins and our country is already in fact multicultural.

As the hon. member believes, Madam Speaker, this concept is no longer directed only to these minorities but to all Canadians, whatever their origin. Instead of dividing Canadians and "ghettoizing" them, it tends to unite them, to help them discover and respect their diversity, which is a great asset for our country.

That is why several European countries and even Australia envy our multicultural policy.

Madam Speaker, why do some hon. members not want to give our country a chance to develop in diversity, which is the reality of our country's existence?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Questions and comments. The hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, may I ask my distinguished colleague a question? She said that Canada should develop in diversity. But how does she fit the Official Languages Act into this diversity? Where does it fit into the new Multiculturalism Act? How can one combine what is an official fact, Canada's two official languages, although I know it is misunderstood in many parts of the country, how can one reconcile it with the new Multiculturalism Act?

Ms. Roy-Arcelin: Madam Speaker, I would say to the Hon. Member that the official languages will still be respected, as will all the new arrivals and the ancestral languages of the ethnic groups. But it must be clearly stated that the official languages, English and French, will be respected. Of course, the intention here is not to change the Official Languages Act and I think that all these newcomers and those who have been here for a long time will respect the Official Languages Act.

[English]

Mr. Bevilacqua: Madam Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member. It is in relation to the debate we are having today which I think is a debate of importance. It is a debate that I think deals with defining the very essence of Canadian culture and who we are as a people. There are certain things that concern me about the present direction of multiculturalism. Sometimes I think the message gets lost, not only outside but even within this Chamber.

For example, I gather from what the member stated culture is multiculturalism. My question is quite simple. If that is indeed the fact, then why do we have a parliamentary standing committee that calls itself the communications, culture, citizenship and multiculturalism committee? I would like to know what groups are represented within the culture portion of this parliamentary standing committee and what groups are represented within the multiculturalism portion of this committee. Are we four solitudes of this nation?

[Translation]

Ms. Roy–Arcelin: Madam Speaker, I think that we granted the wishes of our friends in the opposition because the members of the multiculturalism committee asked for multiculturalism to be separate from communications. So we granted their wish.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate.

[English]

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak to Bill C–18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, with the belief that this is a sincere effort on the part of this government to address the changing demographic reality in Canada. This bill recognizes that Canada is no longer a bicultural English–French nation, but a country constructed and reborn from many different heritages and backgrounds.

• (1130)

Roughly 40 per cent of today's population is neither of British nor French origin. This new reality of cultural pluralism presents a tremendous challenge for our nation.

But to effect real change we have to change attitudes as well as policy. In the past, Canada has had a relatively good record of addressing the needs of new Canadians and being sensitive to their concerns. Honest attempts have been made to recognize the intrinsic value that each new culture brings with it and the tremendous contribution that immigrants have made in the building of this nation. It is an eclectic identity that has thrived on its diversity and not been weakened by it.

The future of Canada hinges on the harmonious development of a self–confident society, on a society flexible enough to adapt and preserve positive elements from the many cultures of the world. This is a nation where any individual from any culture has the chance to come and start a new life. Canada has become an example to the world of how people of different backgrounds can work together for the common wheel. Our country is now a blueprint for the global village.

In principle Bill C–18 is well intentioned, but there are dangerous pitfalls in the undertaking of this pursuit. Ideally a multicultural policy should attempt to address the various issues of employment equity, racism, discrimination, integration, and training programs. These are good starting blocks, but the record so far has sadly fallen short of the ideal. The government has not been particularly successful in ensuring employment equity even within its own sphere of control. We need to look no further than the post office to measure how well this policy has been implemented.

According to the Canadian Ethnocultural Council only 4 per cent of the workforce of Canada Post are visible minorities. Compare this figure to the private sector as a whole where 6.3 per cent of the workforce are visible minorities. The discrepancy between the government's employment equity dream quest and the actual results is just as worrisome in other areas under government jurisdiction such as CBC and Bell Canada.

The existing legislation designed to end discrimination and ensure equality has clearly failed in the public sector. Unfortunately policies and programs aimed at ethnic minorities have often meant little more than bread and circuses. Ethnic communities are treated as something apart from so–called main stream society.

The government is all too willing to throw funds at communities to sponsor dances and events that are little more than costume parties. The attitude that the real problems of discrimination and racism can be avoided as long as money is supplied for costumes is a mistaken one. This is an ignorant and patronizing policy.

New Canadians want to preserve their culture, but more importantly they want to become full partners in Confederation. This has in reality been denied in the past. Multiculturalism has evolved to mean culture, different from French and English. Multicultural policy has regrettably acted as a barrier, preventing full integration, and one by-product has been the development of second-class citizens. The policy has exaggerated the differences rather than the similarities. It has encouraged ghettoization.

Ethnic Canadians who have been here even longer than many non-ethnic Canadians are still considered foreign. A country cannot progress if 40 per cent of its population is made to feel alien.

Lamentably there is a feeling among many Canadians that racism is once again on the rise in our country. The tolerance that was espoused in the 1960s and 1970s is evaporating. More and more Canadian cultural insecurity is reflected in the mounting attitude of many who feel threatened by new Canadians. Sadly we find that a growing number of Canadians do not like the "kind" of immigrant coming into this country. Perhaps it is simply the case that tensions that were previously submerged are now rising to the surface.

These tensions have now taken many forms, whether it be the painting of a swastika on a synagogue in Toronto last summer, a campaign to deny Canadian Sikhs the right to wear turbans as part of their police uniforms, or charges by native and black Canadians that they receive harsher and different treatment from police than other Canadians. All these examples are symptomatic of problems that cannot be conveniently packaged as multiculturalism.

Giving money to community groups to promote heritage events is fine for government public relations, but it does nothing to address the real problems that we will continue to experience as a result of Canada's changing demographics.

Multiculturalism, unfortunately, has become the catch all phrase for everything that is culturally different. There is a real danger if the term "multiculturalism" is used to pigeon-hole immigrants or those with foreign names. This is the reason why I can only agree with the bill in principle.

As a person who would be called by many an hyphenated Canadian as in Italian-Canadian, I have difficulty in accepting that the culture of my parents is a culture apart from mainstream Canadian culture, that it is something secondary, something not quite first-rate Canadian. In fact, the culture of my heritage is no different from main stream cultures other than it has a smaller audience in this country. Nonetheless, to ghettoize my ancestral culture by funding it through a special multicultural branch seems at best a little patronizing.

I can think of a number of organizations in my own riding that survive quite nicely without the benevolent patronage of government multicultural funding. For example, the Croatian Committee for Human Rights has promoted annual community elections that drew over 3,000 members in Mississauga. This was organized without a penny of government funding. I cite this as an example of a community evolving and maturing into political and cultural self-sufficiency within the Canadian mosaic.

Perhaps a more real alternative would be to place these programs under the Minister of Communications along with other Canadian cultural programs. I believe in a cultural policy of one Canada. As our Charter of Rights states, a Canada where no matter the race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability, we are equal.

Canadian social scientists have debated for years an absolute definition of Canadian culture. The reality is that an absolute definition is impossible because culture is always changing with the influx of new people. Canadian policy must reflect this evolution.

Today, the reality is that Canadian culture is multicultural. This new department must go beyond merely institutionalizing the ghettoization of various Canadian groups. We must take precautions to ensure that we will not have a nation where non-English or non-French Canadians will be considered foreign, even if their families have been here for three generations. This is not the way to build a strong Canada. At the same time it is my hope and the hope of many of my colleagues that this new department will be a forum for educating Canadians to more understanding and more tolerance.

We must build a country where each citizen can be rich in the heritage, customs and language of his ancestors but be no less Canadian because of it. This can only be achieved if this department of multiculturalism evolves into a department of heritage where all Canadians can participate and all cultures are treated equally, whether they be English, French or other.

• (1140)

In a unified and harmonious Canada no one can be called a hyphenated Canadian.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the remarks of the member and in particular the comment she was making in relation to her own cultural background and the heritage of the Italian–Canadian community. I wonder whether it is a common feeling in certain parts of central Canada and around the Toronto region in particular that maybe we do not need a separate multicultural program or policy. Maybe she will clarify her thoughts on that.

Also, I would like to express some concern. I do not get the same feeling at all coming from the west coast of Canada where many, many immigrants of different racial backgrounds—and there are many black Canadians who have been there for a number of generations—who still feel very definitely that some kind of special multicultural programs and affirmative action programs are needed to deal with questions of racism. I do not think she dealt with this. It is in my view a lot more than just heritage matters. There are very definitely issues concerned with equality and with racism that I feel should be a major priority in any kind of multicultural policy and concerns of a multicultural department. Would the hon. member like to comment on that?

Ms. Guarnieri: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her commentary. Perhaps I can best illustrate the point I was trying to make by citing an example of a constituent who came to my office.

She was born in Australia and she had to reinstate herself. She was obliged to go to what is called the Department of Ethnic Affairs. She came to my office enraged that she, born in Australia and now seeking to reinstate herself, would be obliged to go to what she considered was a put down. The put down was the Department of Ethnic Affairs. My comment to her was: "Join the club".

The hon. member for York South—Weston who was born here in Canada is still considered a hyphenated Canadian. I can appreciate and understand his grief when he is subjected to being a hyphenated Canadian even though he was born here.

There is no quick fix solution. The policies may be well intentioned and well meaning, but they have to evolve within the political reality of Canada.

You have a minister of culture and a minister of multiculturalism for the ethnics. Either the English and French will be deemed multicultural or the ethnics should be shifted under the umbrella of culture. It seems that the concept of two ministries to deal with the various cultural groups is faulty thinking. It promotes the differences rather than the similarities.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise today to address this bill, not only to put forward some of my views but also to clarify some of the talk that is going on in the community as to what is our basic position on this bill as a party.

First, I want to go back to the origins of our party on this bill.

It was this month in 1971 that Pierre Trudeau rose and said: "For although there are two official languages there is no official culture, nor does any ethnic group take precedence over any other. No citizen or group of citizens is other than Canadian, and all should be treated fairly".

We in the Liberal party are constantly defining and redefining policy, and multiculturalism is of no exception. Recently, on Friday, there was an article in The Globe and Mail by Jeffrey Simpson with the headline: "Balking at Multiculturalism". It went on to say that myself and other colleagues were balking at multiculturalism.

We were not balking at multiculturalism. We were asking ourselves some of the very questions that my colleague from Mississauga just finished raising. We are asking ourselves questions such as: if our national culture now is one of multiculturalism, if we are now a multicultural land, why do we really need a new department? Why do we need a separate department? Why can we not have one super ministry of culture?

As my hon. colleague mentioned, these are valid questions. It confuses people. There is a feeling out there that at times multiculturalism means this department will look after everyone who is other than French or English. Our country has evolved to a point where the people in my riding—and I do have a riding that has representatives from 50 different countries who are all Canadian—say to me that they feel Canadian, they feel equal, they do not feel that they need separate, distinct status.

It is important as we go through this bill today that we realize it is a bridge. It is a bridge to a point where eventually we will have one super ministry of culture to deal with all Canadians on all issues related to culture, whether it be racism or employment equity, rather than having a separate unit.

Therefore I want to reiterate what my colleague from Mississauga said. The government has basically put forward a bill here today which obviously promotes the machinery of multiculturalism, but we must make sure that the essence of multiculturalism is properly serviced. If we continue to use this department of multiculturalism for song and dance and ethnic newspaper advertising, as it is sometimes described in the manual, then I think we are working against the evolution of this country.

I want to be very clear that never ever has anyone in our party, including myself, balked at the multicultural reality of this country; but we want to make sure that we are not entrenching ghettoization which really does not serve any of us.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I was very interested in the member's comments, but I need further clarification. He said that he is supporting multiculturalism. His actions as critic of his party belie that statement with his request that there be no special multicultural committee.

I am wondering whether or not he realizes that his words are all very nice, but the reality in Canada is that we have racial problems and this multicultural committee and this bill may go some distance to address that reality. I would like him to address his comments to that.

• (1150)

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, when I think of the Department of Transport I do not think that we need to create a separate department for planes, a separate department for trains or a separate department for boats. If the Government of Canada is doing its job properly, the problems of racism should be handled in a comprehensive way and not just handled in some hived-off department.

I am very concerned that the very problem that you cite might not get the amount of priority. It might not get the amount of attention and energy put behind it when it is not right at the top of the agenda and handled in a comprehensive way through the Department of Justice, the Department of Employment and Immigration, and all the various departments that really must act on those very sensitive issues.

In my first job in Ottawa I worked for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism, Jim Fleming. I could see the frustration on a weekly basis that we had getting some of those priority issues to the top of the agenda. We at that time were not even on the inner cabinet. We were not on priorities and planning. So sometimes with those sensitive and difficult issues that you raise—and they are important—we just would not get the time we really needed. I really hope that we are not entrenching that kind of issue you raise as a concern which of course I support.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, I have just a comment. The NDP member who just questioned my colleague referred to racial problems that exist in Canada. She is quite right, there are problems. There is a fear that the problem is getting worse, that discrimination in effect is on the increase. Canadians are asking themselves whether we are as tolerant as we say we are and whether in fact we are as pure, if I can use that word, as we say we are when it comes to racial tolerance.

I think it is important to ask ourselves what are the root causes of the increased level of discrimination and racism and intolerance in Canada today. There are those who suggest that perhaps we should examine some of the policies of the Government of Canada and try to determine whether the policy itself, for example multiculturalism, is in some way impacting in a negative way on that very serious problem.

With respect to the racial problems that exist we have a problem right here in the House of Commons. There are members in this House who are going about gathering petitions and speaking out against Sikhs using their turbans in the RCMP.

Now, if we are as open and as tolerant and as multicultural as we say we are, then why, pray tell, are members in this House doing something which would suggest otherwise? Where is the tolerance when it comes to as important an issue as allowing Sikh-Canadians, if I can use the hyphenated term, to be members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

I do not believe that multiculturalism or a policy of multiculturalism is the way to deal with that problem. Multiculturalism, if I can be blunt, is there as a vehicle to hand out patronage, to hand out government largess. That is what it has come to mean.

All the flowery rhetoric in the preamble to the Multiculturalism Act and now to Bill C-18, as I have indicated in the past, is divisive.

What we have is the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If there is a problem with racism or discrimination we have laws in this country that protect every Canadian. We have the provincial human rights commissions. We have the federal law, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That is the vehicle to deal with discrimination and racism in Canada.

My colleague from Broadview—Greenwood and I agree in principle with respect to where the policy of multiculturalism is evolving. At some point in the past it was a policy that was useful in that it allowed new immigrants to Canada to feel that they were part of main stream Canada. Today, those very people are asking themselves what is main stream Canada. Unfortunately, to some main stream Canada means French or English. In practice it is not a policy that is doing what it purports.

My simple question is this: Can my colleague explain what the functions of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism will be and how will that differ from the functions of the Minister of Culture? If this bill is passed and carried, we will have two ministers—a Minister of Culture, presumably of Canadian culture, and his exact title will be the Minister of Culture and Communications. Then we will have a minister of multiculturalism.

Mr. Mills: I think my colleague and I share the same concerns. Right now, the ministry of multiculturalism is basically an operation that hands out cheques for programs that in many cases have not been totally thought through and are not really productive in terms of meeting the objective of multiculturalism. Because of that priority on ministers running around handing out cheques, we seem to forget about priority issues like racism and employment equity. I think really—

Mrs. Browes: You guys are the only ones forgetting about it.

Mr. Mills: I said that I worked in the Ministry of State for Multiculturalism. I must tell you that I found parts of that operation very wanting. I do not think—

Mrs. Browes: We have had a new administration for five years.

Mr. Mills: Are you telling me right now that you are no longer going to do any of that, that you are just going to address priority issues like racism, employment equity and day care? If you are, then we are heading in the right direction.

The ultimate point that I would like to make is that this is a bridge. We should look at it as a bridge because we must make sure that our aboriginal peoples are looked after in a proper way.

This approach is not the long-term answer, but as a bridge we will be vigilant and constructive. I think the granting of funds for program development should come under the ministry of culture.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today in the House to speak to the act to establish a department of multiculturalism and citizenship. I support the establishment of such a department whose mandate is to promote national policies and programs with respect to multiculturalism and citizenship, to provide services to aid in the acquisition of citizenship, and to grant funds for race relations programs.

• (1200)

First, I would like to address the issue of support for multiculturalism programming. I have long been aware of the work performed by ethnocultural organizations in my own riding and across Canada. The Burnaby Multicultural Society has instituted many innovative programs. The Burnaby School Board now has multicultural workers to respond to the needs of Indo-Canadian, Chinese Canadian and Italian Canadian communities, because of the efforts of Burnaby's ethnocultural communities and because of the efforts of the Burnaby Multicultural Society. This society has also sponsored a wonderful series on religions of the world in a very successful attempt to help to foster understanding and mutual respect in our community.

The society has just hired more multicultural workers through a grant program to assist social service agencies in making their services more accessible to all members of our community.

We know that there are cultural barriers that keep many Canadians from fully utilizing services. The society has ensured the participation of multicultural workers on crisis lines and social service agencies so that these will be accessible to members of our ethnocultural communities. The society has also sponsored cultural programs in schools, and is presently putting on two series for older Canadians in seniors community centres.

I am pleased to offer my support to all of these endeavours. I hope that the new Department of Multiculturalism will financially support the programs and activities developed and defined by the ethnocultural communities in Canada. Freedom of religion, respect for one's culture and language are the values that I hope the Department of Multiculturalism will actively promote.

When I met last May with representatives of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council on Parliament Hill, many concerns were brought forward at that time that may not be addressed in the setting up of this new department.

The council is active in the area of immigration policy. The government's immigration and refugee policies have been shameful. Immigrants to Canada are of great benefit to our country. They create jobs, they do not take them away. They bring knowledge and skills with them and they use them to make Canada prosper. They bring a culture, a language and a heritage that enriches our country. They bring ideas, a willingness to work, and a desire to be Canadian that inspires those of us who are Canadian by birth and not by choice. Often we in Canada repay them with sorrow, with poverty and with racism.

Canada does have a racist history from the days of the first white colonists who destroyed the political and economic systems of our aboriginal peoples. Slavery was only abolished in Canada in 1833. Later a head tax was imposed on Chinese immigrants just after Chinese labourers had finished building our railroads that now link Canada coast to coast. The Canadian government went even further than the head tax when it passed a law to exclude Chinese immigration altogether.

Japanese Canadians were interned in camps during the Second World War. They were relocated, their property was seized, and many were deported.

On May 23, 75 years ago, the ship Komagata Maru, carrying 375 Sikh passengers entered the port of Vancouver. All of the passengers were British subjects and thus had the right to enter Canada. They were not allowed to disembark. Immigration officials tried every tactic and used every possible delay to deny landing rights to the passengers of the ship. The B.C. government officials cut communications and denied permission to load food and water on to the ship. After two entire months in the port of Vancouver, two months of fear, the ship was ordered to leave. The Komagata Maru was escorted from Canadian waters.

We need not dig into Canadian history to find horrifying examples of racism. Students at the University of Western Ontario are being taught that black people are genetically inferior to the white race. A 1988 survey found that 70 per cent of Canadians believe immigrants often bring discrimination on to themselves.

I hope that the new Department of Multiculturalism can take on the challenge of educating the racist element in Canada. I hope that this new department will not be an excuse for government to ignore the other demands that are being made by the ethnocultural communities of our country. If the government is concerned about multiculturalism, why did it axe the Secretary of State multiculturalism program by a full $2 million?

I am particularly concerned with the situation of immigrant and visible minority women. I want an assurance that women will be well represented at the decision-making levels in this department. Looking at Public Service of Canada statistics, it is evident that decision-makers are overwhelmingly white, and overwhelmingly male.

The target set for employment equity in the Public Service is 3.1 per cent when the work force availability for visible minority workers is 6.3 per cent. I do not want to see the Department of Multiculturalism become some sort of ghetto, with the government feeling that the department must at least have some visible minority staff, but the rest of the Public Service need not. My point is that visible minorities, women, and visible minority women, should be well represented in upper level jobs throughout the Public Service.

I wonder when the government is going to do something about employment equity and about language training. I brought these two issues up before in the House, but there has been no action on the part of the government in these areas. I will continue to make these my priorities.

The Canadian Ethnocultural Council's analysis of the operation of the Employment Equity Act shows that employers covered by the act have made little progress in terms of the hiring of visible minority workers. According to the Department of Employment and Immigration, the labour force participation for visible minority members is 6.3 per cent. In the majority of firms examined by the CEC, visible minorities represented far less than 6.3 per cent of the employees of the firms. Visible minority workers were concentrated in the semi-skilled, manual and clerical occupational categories. In other words, they were among the lowest paid.

I have made public statements about the need for mandatory, enforced employment equity. I have questioned ministers in committee about mandatory enforced employment equity, and I have written letters about it. The only answer I have from the government is an indication that it seemed to think the employment equity legislation is working. Well, it has obviously never tried to use it. The government is so completely unrepresentative of the visible minority population it cannot begin to understand how to combat systemic discrimination. We must deal with systemic discrimination with effective measures such as mandatory enforced employment equity, with goals and with timetables. Voluntary compliance just does not work.

We need a comprehensive, universal system of language training for all adult immigrants, no matter what their immigration class. Access must be guaranteed to all immigrants by the provision of adequate training allowance, and child care. Special outreach programs should be developed to inform immigrant women locked into job ghettos of such a program. Without economic equality and without basic language skills, immigrant women and visible minority women do not have much of a chance in our society.

I hope the new Department of Multiculturalism will not exist just for a show, but that this government is actually prepared to listen to the ethnocultural communities and immigrant and visible minority women.

The New Democratic Party has long advocated the setting up of a Department of Multiculturalism. I might add that there are other New Democratic Party policies that the government would do well to heed. One is enforced mandatory employment equity with goals and timetables for women and visible minority members.

I do support this bill to found a new Department of Multiculturalism, as long as the government understands that this is only a first step and not the only step in creating a society that is truly fair and respectful of all of the ethno-cultural communities of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): On questions or comments, the Hon. Member for York South-Weston.

Mr. Nunziata: I would like to ask a few questions to the hon. member. The hon. member's surname is Black, and that would suggest that the origins of that name are British?

Ms. Black: Scottish.

Mr. Nunziata: Is the hon. member part of the multicultural community in Canada? I would also like her opinion on what she believes Canadians think about multiculturalism and what it means to Canadians generally.

Would she agree with me when I say that multiculturalism has come to mean that if you have origins other than French or English then you are part of the multicultural community and therefore you are ethnic. That appears to be the case, in my view. I would like to ask the member to comment generally in that regard.

In closing, can she also comment on why it is necessary to have one minister of culture, and another minister of multiculturalism, one department of culture, and another department of multiculturalism? If one of the fundamental characteristics of Canadian culture is the fact that our population is made up of French speaking Canadians or Canadians of French origin, Canadians of English origin, and one third of the population consisting of Canadians of origins other than French or English, why the need to have the distinction between multiculturalism and culture?

Ms. Black: First, I would just remind my colleague that many women carry the name that they were not born with and I was not born with the name Black, so it does not denote my cultural heritage at all.

I envision a Canadian society where all members talking about people who came to this country years ago from both French and British backgrounds. I am speaking about people who have come to our country recently from a variety of cultural backgrounds, Chinese, Japanese, Indo–Canadians. I also speak of our first people, our aboriginal people. In a society that really does care about all its people, perhaps there is no need for separate departments to deal with the inequalities that are present today.

We do not cure inequality by saying that we will treat everybody equally. When there are inequalities in our society, we must finds ways to address those inequalities. I support the development of this ministry, I have great hopes for it and I am pleased to see it before us today.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Hon. Member for Vancouver East.

Ms. Mitchell: The point that the hon. member raised this morning is very interesting. I cannot help but throw in a comment before I address a question to my colleague.

It seems to me that he needs to look at the whole question of the status of women department. There are a lot of similarities. of ethnic communities as being those of an advantaged community, then perhaps we do not need a separate multicultural committee. If, as the Liberals in the past have interpreted, perhaps the function is mainly supporting funding for cultural programs, which are very interesting, but perhaps are not a question of disadvantage, and then perhaps we do not need it. If he would talk to many people again, particularly visible minority people about the disadvantages they face in Canada, it would be quite clear, as my colleague has indicated, just as women need a special program that provides for advocacy to assist them and to give them an avenue for moving towards greater equality, so it seems to me there are many Canadians of different ethnic minorities who would say they need the same thing, including the Canadian Ethnocultural Council. It would be interesting to debate this point further in committee.

The question I have for my colleague really has to do with another matter and it concerns the cuts to funding to the Citizenship Instruction and Language Training Program, commonly referred to as CILT. Many Canadians do not realize that the government has completely cut funding for this program. In 1987 and 1988 about $9 million of federal funds went to citizenship classes and language instruction which was matched by the provinces. Close to $20 million was going into those kinds of programs.

In my community many more dollars were needed to provide language training for new immigrants and also citizenship classes, not only for immigrants, but perhaps for other Canadians as well. They would then begin to have a much stronger identification as Canadians and new Canadians with English or French not their first language would be able to settle into society as well as into jobs.

The government has chosen to cut this program. I would maintain that it is an abrogation of federal responsibility as far as the settlement of new immigrants is concerned and will lead to isolation and ghettoism of many people, particularly women and older people who are not in the workforce. It is also a contradiction of multiculturalism.

I would like to ask the member for her comments. I know of her great concern for the point of view of immigrant and visible minority women.

Ms. Black: I thank my colleague for her question. I know that she has a large proportion of ethnocultural groupings in her community. She is also aware of the very drastic effect that the cutbacks in language training have on all of these people, particularly on immigrant women and visible minority women who, when they enter Canada, are not always deemed to be of the same immigration class for language training. Many times these women have already been discriminated against in the classification that the immigration officials have deemed them to be for any kind of language training.

Now with the cutbacks to the CILT program there are further barriers to immigrant women who find it even more difficult than immigrant men to integrate into Canadian society. After all, if they cannot speak the language at the school their children are attending, it is very difficult for them to communicate with the schools about the education of their children. It is very difficult for them to access social service agencies in their community when they cannot speak the language that is used.

I know that the ethnocultural communities are lobbying the government. I applaud their effort and I do hope that the government will listen to the needs, particularly of immigrant women on this issue.

Ms. Ethel Blondin (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this important and progressive bill and the goals that we are trying to achieve with respect to our Canadian culture.

National identity is an expression that evokes a variety of issues, ideas and feelings. The absence of conflict, loyalty to the national government, the possible succession of one part of the country from Confederation, harmony or positive feelings amongst the people in different parts of the country, pride and other good feelings about being Canadian, co-operation rather than tension between levels of government, giving precedence to one's Canadian identity over one's regional identity, and the feeling of getting a good or bad deal from being part of the country. These are all concepts of national and social cohesion.

• (1220)

Today I want to address the proposed act as it affects the aspirations of aboriginal people and their respective heritage. The wording of the bill is not clear and I do not understand what is intended for the promotion and protection of the culture, the languages, and the rights of Canada's native people.

Over the years Canada has been beset with many problems of national unity or societal cohesion. Recently, attention has been focused on the French–English conflict and the prospect of Quebec national sovereignty. However, English–French relations are embedded in the whole matrix of other matters such as regional disparities, political tensions, economic problems, external domination, constitutional disputes, integration of people of different cultures and racial backgrounds, all of which present the problems of the cohesion of Canadian society.

Divisions among Canada's various provinces and regions have produced a highly decentralized political system with powerful provincial governments. Federal political institutions have proven inadequate to regulate regional conflict which often must be dealt with by conferences of provincial premiers rather than through the federal parliamentary apparatus. Economic problems have generated intense conflicts in labour–management relations. Canada has experienced a high degree of industrial disruption in recent years. The controversy over inflation and the wage and price controls is only one aspect of this problem.

External domination by British and then American interests contributes to the lack of a strong Canadian identity or a powerful unifying national ideology. In terms of culture, the printed and electronic media of mass communication, and the educational institutions have been heavily influenced by materials foreign, mainly American in origin.

All of these problems, and others as well, are interrelated and intertwined in the effects on the cohesion of Canadian society. None can be understood in isolation from the others. Ideally, ethnic diversity should become the factor in the development of a national identity. By this legislation it is hoped that ethnic diversity, by creating a general atmosphere of tolerance and pride in one's cultural heritage, might itself become the symbol of promoting national unity. It is interesting to examine how language and ethnicity mix with other features of our society such as regional disparities, American economic dominance, and socioeconomic inequities.

The configuration of ethnic and linguistic diversity in Canada is complex: one, the native peoples in relation to the rest of Canadian society; two, the English-speaking people in relation to the French-speaking people; three, a number of ethnic groups composed of immigrants and their descendants in relation to the rest of society. We have our hands full. This is a complex issue.

Within these lines of differentiation further distinctions need to be taken into account. The native peoples comprise several different groups including the Métis population. The anglophone–francophone distinction cuts across the other lines of diversity. The anglophone community is highly differentiated ethnically; so is the francophone community, although much less so. Other ethnic groups are numerous. They exhibit a considerable range of variation in factors such as size, acculturation, complexity of social organizations, and geographic concentration.

Despite such internal variations, at a general level there are a number of issues that pertain to all three axes of diversity. Among these is the question of patterns of inequality across ethnic and linguistic groups, and their impact on the cohesion of society.

There is also the matter of the modes of incorporation of members of different ethnic or linguistic communities into the political, economic, educational, and other institutions of the country. Not all communities are integrated into Canadian society in the same way. Their relationship to institutions are not the same. This is also a matter that has considerable bearing on the cohesion of society.

Another issue is the degree of contact and cross–cultural communication across communities. The development of a common culture that each collectively shares and the common symbols with which each identifies is an issue that is related to that of cross–cultural communication. The survival of ethnic and linguistic groups as distinct socio–cultural entities is another matter of relevance for societal cohesion.

These are some definitions that need to be expanded on in the legislation.

Please allow me to give you some history of the native heritage in aboriginal Canada. As European explorers and fur traders began to move into what is now Canada in the sixteenth century, they encountered a number of native cultures that because of their technological simplicity were thought to be uncivilized and backward. There was no system of writing, no metallurgy beyond the pounding of copper in one or two regions, no practical use of the wheel, and virtually no domestication of animals, except the dog.

Only recently has the ingenious nature of native cultures been recognized, particularly their value as adaptive strategies to deal with regional or local environmental conditions; natural conservationists. Native languages were thought to be rudimentary, primitive, and not really worth learning; religions were thought pagan; and social and political structures almost non–existent, based upon custom rather than a coded system of law. Although there were diverse societies speaking in a variety of languages across Canada in aboriginal times, culture and language played almost no part in the official definition of an Indian developed by the federal government.

This definition grew out of the first Indian Act of 1876 in which the principle of patrilineal descent was used to determine who was eligible for registration. This principle is still in force and has been interpreted to mean that only those persons of native ancestry who can trace their descent through the male line to a person originally entitled to be registered are Indians for purposes and benefits of the Indian Act.

An analysis of ethnic differentiation is useful in considering what makes aboriginal issues different than other minorities. There are major differences and these have to be examined.

First, the native communities are in fact not yet fully incorporated into our society. Indeed they exist as a cluster of satellites at the margin of the wider society. Second, native groups have a long historical background as ongoing societies on this continent. Because of this, they are nations, rather than ethnic minorities in the usual sense of the term. I come from a group called the Dene Nation.

This historical background also carries with it an internal diversity. This is a third element of their situation; it is appropriate to talk of native peoples because there are several of them. The diversity is also increased by the presence of non–status Métis and other categories of people of Indian ancestry. A fourth element is territory. It constitutes an important basis of native communities in their economic, political and socio–cultural dimensions. Fifth, both in absolute and relative terms, the population of people of Indian ancestry is quite small.

I want to give members an overview of the issues which the aboriginal peoples of our country are faced with today. I am not convinced that a new department of multiculturalism and citizenship will address the crisis with which native people are trying to cope. Indian and Inuit leaders often argue that real progress for their people depends upon the satisfactory settlement of land claims and the attainment of self government. But these are far from being the only questions facing native peoples today. There are critical problems in the area of employment and services, as there are with the justice system, and with the Indian Act itself.

Compared to other countries, the native people of Canada are well off, because we are not being slaughtered as they are in Brazil or elsewhere. But we can also learn from them, and we are involved more and more in the international links that are being created. For instance, at the United Nations there is now a working group looking at indigenous rights around the world. A draft universal declaration of indigenous rights is being put together. Canadian native people are trying to organize themselves so that we can have a single voice at the international level.

Another initiative they have been pushing for is an international year for indigenous people. It appears that 1993 may be the year.

Native organizations are concerned about what new legislation means to them and their programs and services. There is an immense task before us if we are to create a climate to which our energies are to be used to heal and develop native communities.

The Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations has outlined a number of steps that the government can take to arrive at the situation. First, forums need to be established to resolve outstanding items on the Canada–First Nations agenda. A process is also required for native people to acquire full control in the areas of education, justice, child care and health. Legislation is required to recognize the continuing and inherent right of the First Nations to govern themselves in these areas.

Finally native people need an early resumption of the constitutional process. We are not asking for special treatment; we are asking to become what we always have been and what we always were—first Canadians and Canadians first.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the member from the Arctic to deviate just a little from her text. When we speak about multiculturalism I wonder if she was present earlier today when members of this House referred to the department of multiculturalism as being one which handed out subsidies to various ethnic groups, song and dance, if you will.

Normally when groups in my riding receive grants for their community projects, as their member I am informed about the projects and have often presented cheques. When it comes to multicultural groups, at least in Saint-Laurent—Cartierville and I understand that the same phenomenon applies to the neighbouring riding of Mount Royal, our present minister personally hand delivers his cheques to the multicultural groups.

We talked about patronizing this morning or vote buying if you will. I would like our member and others to address this subject and to make comments on that.

Mr. Della Noce: She is young.

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, all that I can say with regard to this particular issue—

Mr. Della Noce: Naive.

Ms. Blondin: I am not naive. I am 38 years old. I am a politician. I have equal rights with every other member in this House. I would like to answer this question if the member opposite would give me the opportunity to do so.

I would like to say that it is generally the practice of the various departments in issuing grants and contributions to allow the member to participate in that process. I do not feel that it is morally right, for one, to have the minister handing out and not sharing in that activity with the local member and with other senior executives or senior government members of that particular region. I think there is some concern about the way in which this is done and I think it is something that has to be examined. Otherwise the perception is that it is generally vote buying.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, my colleague from the Arctic has injected into this debate an interesting element, and that is the status of the aboriginal people, the native people in Canada and their role in Canadian society.

A few minutes ago I asked the member for New Westminster—Burnaby some direct questions in terms of whether she considered herself part of the multicultural community and whether multicultural to her meant everybody, regardless of their ethnic origin.

I know my colleague, the member from the Arctic, felt slighted when this government entered into the Meech Lake Accord. One of the reasons she felt slighted and aboriginal people generally felt slighted was that when the Prime Minister and ten First Ministers got together at Meech Lake, one of their purposes was to define Canada in the Constitution. They started to talk about fundamental characteristics of Canada. We know that the main thrust of the Meech Lake discussion was to get Quebec's signature to the Constitution, but in so doing it was necessary for them to define Canada as it is today.

I think it would be useful to try to recall how they defined Canada. They said that English speaking Canadians and French speaking Canadians are fundamental characteristics of Canada, period, full stop. My mother, an immigrant to this country, does not speak fluent French—in fact, she does not speak any French at all—and she does not speak fluent English. So by implication in this particular Meech Lake Accord my mother and the hundreds of thousands of others like her are not fundamental characteristics of Canada.

By implication as well—and the member finished her speech by referring to the fact that she considers herself Canadian first and first Canadian—when the powers that be came together to try to define Canadian culture in Canada they excluded not only people of origins other than French or English; they also excluded the aboriginal people, those who were here first. When I speak of the mindset, the discriminatory not necessarily intentional mindset in Canada, one has to look at things like the Meech Lake Accord and one has to examine the actions of the government with for example—and I mentioned this the other day in the House—the Japanese Canadian redress question.

That was an issue that had to be dealt with by the Government of Canada, by the Parliament of Canada, and that issue was given to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. The only reason that responsibility was handed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism was because Canadians of Japanese origin are considered ethnic, part of the multicultural community, and therefore somehow that issue had something to do with their ethnicity rather than—

Mrs. Browes: You did not deal with the issue at all.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the member likes to interrupt and, as I indicated to her on a number of other occasions, I would be pleased to debate this subject with her at any time.

But getting back to my point, that issue ought to have been dealt with by the Minister of Justice, because it was an issue affecting justice in Canada, not an issue affecting Canadians of Japanese origin because they had Japanese origins. So there again we have the mindset.

My colleague has raised some of the concerns that I have raised. How would she have reacted if the Government of Canada said that the question of settlement of aboriginal or native land claims is the responsibility of the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. Can she tell me what the reaction would have been in the aboriginal community or in the native community? I would like her also to comment whether she considers herself part of the multicultural community and whether she considers herself an ethnic?

Ms. Blondin: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his lengthy and interesting question.

• (1240)

First of all, with regards to the settlement of lands claims, I think everyone knows that particular question lies with the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs and with the federal government. The Prime Minister was there to sign the agreement in principle. I think it is viewed as a major priority for any government, be it Conservative, Liberal or New Democratic Party.

My reaction would have been one of shock, and I think you were anticipating that answer. It would have been unacceptable for the aboriginal groups to have been referred elsewhere to deal with this issue. This particular issue is so important that it requires inner cabinet's input. There are very fundamental issues such as taxation, cash compensation, et cetera.

The other question the hon. member asked was about whether I consider myself to belong to a multicultural mosaic of Canada. Most certainly I do, but aboriginal peoples have a unique constitutional status and that has to be examined as well.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sorry I must interrupt the hon. member. The time for question and comments is now over. Resuming debate with the Hon. Minister of State for Housing.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, over the last five years or so I have told you a number of stories from my own personal background. I am going to tell another this afternoon.

Back in 1976 I decided I would run for mayor of my own municipality, one of the six cities that make up metropolitan Toronto, the borough of East York. I did that for a vast number of reasons. One of those reasons was a growing concern about what was happening to the community, the changes that were taking place, what role the newcomers who were coming to live in their own community were playing in the community. I had been born, brought up or raised and lived all my life in that community. It has been a community that had been good to me and my family. I wanted to make sure that experience could go on for my children and grandchildren. I thought what we had in that community was something very special.

There was a concern, however, about what was going to happen as new people came into the community. Was it going to change the way of life or character of the community? Would it become fragmented in some way, shape or form? Were the newcomers to our community going to change the community and stay off in their own corners, or were they going to get involved in the community themselves and participate in it? That was one of the reasons why I ran for mayor of my community back in 1976, because there are in excess of 60 different cultural and ethnic peoples that reside in my own community.

I had this grand idea that we needed to make sure, no matter what their background, whether they came from the traditional backgrounds of the country, native people or whatever, that somehow we find a way to get all these people involved in the community. I got myself elected and then had to face the great question of what to do now. How would I accomplish what I had been talking about, what I felt, and what I wanted to do.

I happened to be on a bus one morning with a chap by the name of Bromley Armstrong, well known as a Canadian who came originally from Jamaica. Bromley said to me: "Why do you not put together a little committee, a mayor's committee, a multicultural committee, and see if that is not a way of bringing people into the main stream". That is what we did. Out of that bus ride and that conversation with Bromley Armstrong we put together a multicultural committee. It was the first community multicultural committee in Toronto, the first one in Ontario, and perhaps the first one in Canada.

As a result, blossoming from that there is now these municipal multicultural committees in many, many communities right across this country, and certainly in every one of the cities and communities that make up metropolitan Toronto. That committee now is called the East York Race Relations Committee, because we found that we had to focus on other aspects of the whole situation as well.

It did not have any funding. Somebody today in the debate said that we should not be just throwing money around on multiculturalism. That is not necessary. In fact, this committee never had any community funding, and it still does not. It raises its own money. What that did was help to bring together the community, to get people involved, to help them to participate and maintain the kind of community that I had grown up in and loved, even though they came from over 60 different cultural backgrounds from all around the world.

When I ran for Parliament one of the things I wanted very much to do was ensure that this Parliament and the government that I was a part of did everything possible to make sure that all Canadians wherever they may have come from, whenever they may have come here, could participate fully and be involved in Canada with no barriers.

I have been extremely proud of the record of this government in the last five years and the things it has done. The first ever employment equity legislation has been passed by this government during that five-year period. The first ever affirmative action program for visible minorities in the public service has been put in place by this government during the last five years. The first ever Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Multiculturalism was created by this government in the last five years. The first ever Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Human Rights was put in place by this government in the last five years. The first ever Multiculturalism Act was put in place by this government in the last five years.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Redway: The final wiping clean of the slate on the redress for Canadians of Japanese origin was put in place by this government in the last five years. I might say it originated under the department of multiculturalism, not the Department of Justice because it was the former Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, who focused in and put it there. It was carried on, as a result of that, under the multiculturalism provisions.

Now we are debating and have before us the first ever department of multiculturalism legislation in this country. I think that is a milestone and something to be applauded because it is going to help to bring Canadians together, not to divide them in any way. I hope very soon that we are going to deal with that very, very nasty problem that has been hanging out there, the head tax issue. That has to be dealt with and I hope it will be very soon in the life of this Parliament. I hope we can wipe out as well all of the other issues of unfairness with which other Canadians have been treated over the years whether they have originated in the Ukraine or originated in some other country around the world.

Those are measures that I think that are very, very positive. They are certainly not aimed at dividing people or ghettoizing people. They are aimed at bringing people together. That is what this legislation and this department is all about, in my view. It is aimed at making sure that we clear away all the barriers so that all Canadians in this country, no matter where they came from, can participate and become fully involved in Canada itself. Let us get rid of all those barriers.

A week ago Sunday night I had the great honour and privilege to participate in a dinner honouring the dedication of a monument to the Chinese Canadians who came to this country to build the railroad, to build the CPR.

Ms. Mitchell: There is one.

Mr. Redway: Exactly, but the statue was erected in Toronto, interestingly enough. You may have one there, but there certainly is one in Toronto now. Let me tell you that between 1880 and 1885, some 17,000 Chinese came to this country to build that railroad.

• (1250)

Ms Mitchell: And died.

Mr. Redway: Some 4,000 of them died, that is correct, in the building of the railway that tied Canada together.

After the railway was built they were no longer needed to work on the railway. They could not get home, they did not have any money, so they drifted into poverty.

A week ago Sunday night at that dinner in Toronto the descendants of those railway workers—lawyers, doctors, a meteorologist and business people—all were there to pay tribute to their ancestors and to honour their ancestors who had helped to build their country, all our country, Canada. As they rose and we sang our national anthem together, O Canada, I have to tell you that a real thrill ran up and down my spine. Here we had Canadians all participating in this country of ours. That is the name of the game and that is what it is all about. Regardless of from where any of us may originate, the purpose of this legislation is to make sure that everyone can participate and be involved fully and that there are no road blocks in the way.

I have found in my own community in dealing with Canadians, wherever they come from, that they do not want to have to blot out and pretend that they did not come from where they came from or that their ancestors did not come from where they came from. They want to have the right to maintain their own culture, their own heritage and to some extent their own language. They are proud of their heritage and their culture. They are even more proud, fiercely proud, of being Canadians.

And that is exactly what this bill is all about. This bill is not to create a department to divide, not to create a department to ghettoize Canadians. It is about creating a department to allow everyone to participate and to allow all of us to participate fully in being Canadians.

On that note I want to move, pursuant to Standing Order 26(1):

> That the House continues to sit between 1 p.m. and 2 p.m. this day for the purpose of consideration of Bill C-18.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The House has heard the terms of the motion moved by the Hon. Minister of State for Housing. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): According to the provisions of Standing Order 26(1)(6), if 15 members rise in their place to object the motion is defeated. Shall the motion carry?

And fewer than 15 members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There not being 15 members rising in objection to the motion, according to the provisions of Standing Order 26(1)(6) the motion is deemed to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I have two questions for the minister who just spoke. I know he has a very sincere interest in this subject. During the course of his remarks he was speaking very positively, in fact, I would say he was bragging that the government has a number of policies including affirmative action in the public service. He also said at one point referring to descendants of the Chinese Canadian workers on the railway that all Canadians are participating in this country of ours.

I would like to ask him how he can justify the lack of action, the lack of results, in the so-called affirmative action in the public service in light of the figures which I have. The percentage of visible minority people in the general workforce is 6.3 per cent; the percentage of visible minority people working in the public service is only 1.58 per cent; and the target of the federal government for visible minorities was half way between, 3.2 per cent.

There is supposedly an affirmative action program to make sure that visible minority people have their fair share of jobs in our own public service. We are failing drastically. I would like him to explain this and to explain what the government is going to do about it, especially in view of the fact that there is a cut-back in public service jobs and it is going to get worse rather than better. If his colleague behind him would stop talking, I would be glad to present the next question.

The next question has to do with a question I raised this morning. How can he justify the goals of multiculturalism and the goals of this new department which he outlined when the government is cutting back on all funding for citizenship instruction and language training? Does he not think it is absolutely essential to help new immigrants who do not speak English or French and in fact to help many Canadians to become a part of mainstream Canada? That is absolutely essential and it is a federal government responsibility to provide citizenship training and language training so that people can get into Canadian society.

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to respond to my colleague who I know has a sincere and deep interest in Canadians of all backgrounds. First of all, I do not want for a moment to say that the world is perfect in Canada. I have not been saying that. That is why we need a multiculturalism department and that is why we need other steps to assist in bringing about a much better world than we have at the moment.

Ms. Mitchell: What about the public service?

Mr. Redway: I was quiet for the hon. member and I hope that she will give me an opportunity to respond as well. What I am saying, first, is that prior to this government taking office there was no affirmative action program for visible minorities in the public service. There is now such a program and obviously it is pointing out exactly what many of us believed but about which we had no true evidence; that being that we were not perfect in the public service as far as its representation and its reflection of Canadian society was concerned. Now we have the mechanism in place to indicate to what extent the public service does reflect Canadian society and now we can move on to the steps to correct that. That is exactly what is happening. I might say that I have been laying a great deal of emphasis on that in my own department and hopefully before too long we will show some results.

Second, in respect of the question of cut-backs in funding, we all deplore cut-backs in funding of everything. I do not think anyone in this House enjoys seeing funding cut-backs not just on these programs but on a whole range of programs as the hon. member knows. If we did not have the fiscal problem that we do now, it would not be necessary. Obviously this has to fit into an over-all global pattern of budget responsibility. I know the hon. member has opposed the goods and services tax and other things of that sort. She does so normally, saying that we can tax not all people but others like corporations. She also says that we can cut out unnecessary expenditures. So far, at least, I have not heard from her or her colleagues about any viable, logical suggestions on how to get the deficit under control. I realize she believes that it has to be under control too. Unfortunately, everything has to be restrained, and this is one of the things, along with housing and everything else, that has to be restrained if we are going to stop spending 35 cents out of every dollar that we take in paying interest on the national debt.

• (1300)

Mr. Bevilacqua: Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. minister who I thank for defining, at least from my understanding of his speech, that he indeed believes that Canadian contemporary culture is multicultural. I believe he agrees with that. Based on that, I would like to see his reaction to the fact that in Parliament we have Parliamentary standing committees on communications, culture, citizenship and multiculturalism. I wonder why, if Canadian contemporary culture is indeed multicultural, we have departments of culture and multiculturalism.

Second, another question is in relation to the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, specifically as it relates to human rights. In a speech made to the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, the hon. Minister for Multiculturalism stated that in addition to enshrining multiculturalism as a prized characteristic of our national identity, the Act has profound human rights implications. It recognizes the right of all citizens of every racial and cultural background to participate fully in Canadian society bringing to Canada their own style of being a Canadian.

I would like to ask the minister what human rights I, as a Canadian not born in this country, have as a result of the Multiculturalism Act that I did not have before under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Human Rights Act and the Citizenship Act.

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his questions. As I understood it, there were two questions, the first of which dealt with why there should be a separate Department of Multiculturalism when there is a Department of Culture. Am I misinterpreting the hon. member's question?

There are, as the hon. member knows, all sorts of different departments of government. They serve many, many functions. This particular one I see in the light of the hon. member's second question to me, that being the question of what other rights he has now that he did not have before the Multicultural Act.

I see the whole issue as one of clearing away barriers. Whether it be a special committee to deal with that issue or whether it be a department to deal with that issue, I see the whole concept here as clearing away any and all barriers that there are in the way of Canadians, from whatever background, to the full participation and involvement in the fullness of being a Canadian. If the hon. member does not think there are any barriers, I invite him to look around, but I suspect he does understand that and that is really what this whole thing is all about as I see it.

In my own community, as I said, there are over 60 different cultural groups from all over the world. I think of that community as one where a few years ago there were quite severe concerns from people of other backgrounds about people of yet other backgrounds. Now those concerns have not melted away entirely, but they had been reduced very substantially.

I think that this kind of a mechanism, whether it be the Multicultural Act, the multicultural committee or the multicultural department, is a way of clearing away those barriers, barriers that I know the hon. member realizes exists and would like to see eliminated just as much as I and the government want to see eliminated.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to speak on Bill C-18 to establish a department of multiculturalism and citizenship because I think there are some serious problems with it. It is possible that it could be corrected to be useful, but one of the troublesome things about it is its lack of definition of its job. I notice, for example, in clause 4, page 2, that it says that the minister has the powers, duties, and functions extending to him, including all matters, et cetera, relating to multiculturalism and citizenship and it does not really define it any further at all. It does not say one word about race.

I believe that the question of race, race prejudice, racial oppression, racial injustice, is a very serious matter, much overlooked by many of my fellow Canadians and, in fact, one that I did not take as seriously in some past years as I now wish I had because problems that I thought were going away appear to be dreadfully still with us.

Therefore, I think we have to ask ourselves seriously if this bill is for real, is this department proposal for real? Or is it just patronage jobs and top-down propaganda? That is to say, is it really going to focus on opposing, combating and reducing racial discrimination and ethnic discrimination, and if so, how?

One very practical proposal put forward by the New Democrats was that there should be an ombudsman or commissioner, someone who would have statutorily defined duties and powers to whom anyone who felt aggrieved could appeal. Well, that was turned down and it is now sort of mushy, wishy-washy, in a department with a lot of friendly rhetoric but no clear undertaking.

That is not good enough because we have to face the fact that is with us to this very day that Canada as we conventionally call it has racism in its foundation. Canada was self-defined among the French and English arrivals from Europe who chose to kill and dispossess the First Nations of this country and to restrict them to very, very limited ways of earning a living. That is there and that has not changed to this day, not fundamentally.

Now, it is good to be busy about correcting some of the racial wrongs that have been done since then. It is good to correct the matter of the blacks in Canada who have been with us for centuries and are still discriminated against. It is good to correct the matter of the Japanese-Canadians, the matter of the Sikhs, the matter of the Chinese railway workers. When I attended this unveiling of the monument to the Chinese railroad workers that the previous speaker spoke of, I also felt great satisfaction since the idea had been initiated by my motion in Toronto city council in 1979. Certainly more of that is needed and perhaps there should be a monument in Vancouver, if there is not one already.

Ms. Mitchell: There is already.

Mr. Heap: I hear there is already. That is good. But it was appropriate to have it in Toronto where so many of the descendants of the Chinese railway workers are established now.

After founding Canada in part on the dispossession of its First Nations, the aboriginal people have been mistreated from then until now, including through our constitution. Our constitution, when asked to recognize the rights of aboriginal peoples, was persuaded by some of the western provincial premiers to recognize only "existing rights" leaving "existing" of course undefined. What we have learned in the last eight years is that the aboriginal peoples have not been able to make any use of that clause in the constitution. They cannot even get to the bargaining table when their rights are being bargained away.

Nations like the Lubicons have been chiseled out of land rights that were promised to them, the same as the Temagami people in Ontario. There was chiselling and is chiselling on the post-secondary educational rights by a government which has plenty of money for developing certain war projects and therefore has no money for the people of Canada.

There are cramped reserves, poor housing, poor health care services for Canada's First Nations. In the cities, there is much too frequent violence by the police forces and statements, for example, by officials of the Toronto Police Force clearly implying that black people do not have rights and that native people do not have rights.

There is a low intensity warfare being conducted on the homeland of the Innu people. The government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars preparing that; hundreds of thousands of dollars with propaganda to justify it. This is because they are one of Canada's First Nations and they are treated almost as non-persons. This situation cannot be trivialized out of existence by creating a department of multiculturalism or even a Department of Indian and Northern Affairs.

I have referred also to the blacks. There is not time to go into all the matters that this department is in danger of overlooking. We have had black people with us for several centuries in some parts of Canada and generally, they were and are poorly treated compared to white people in Canada.

In Toronto last winter and the year before, there were killings of blacks by Toronto police which have yet to be properly examined. It is shocking that when the Attorney General of Ontario dared to permit manslaughter charges to be laid, he was criticized by the president of the police union for having yielded to pressure. No police official of the Ontario government or of metro called that public servant to order for attacking a decision of the attorney general.

Likewise, another police official said, "Well, if people don't like what we are doing, we'll just let the blacks do anything they want and this will become like Detroit". That was a racist lie calculated to create fear in a city which so far has succeeded in avoiding the worst sort of excesses of a city like Detroit.

There is the situation in Nova Scotia and a recent report about Nova Scotia schools with the headline: "There is racism at all levels: Black, natives face barriers in school system, task force finds". That is in a study by Dalhousie University and, of course, there have been many other witnesses to the same point.

In Parliament, there is a book in our parliamentary library called A History of Blacks in Canada by James Walker. Now, to the credit of the Department of the Secretary of State, this was written partly with a grant from the Secretary of State, but only 500 copies were printed. Attempts to find it in bookstores or in Toronto public libraries have failed. Why is it that there was no funding given to the larger distribution of a careful scholarly work on the history of the black people in Canada?

We also know of a recent complaint by Brenda Lem, a Chinese writer, regarding the difficulty of locating works in public libraries by writers of colour. We are not talking about the past, we are talking about the present because the past is too much with us.

As was mentioned earlier by my colleague, government employment does not set the example that it ought to set. To set up a system for reporting and wait five years for a review of the law is a way to avoid doing anything. The government has the means of getting this information in its own employment or in its Crown corporations without going through such a ponderous process.

We are told by David Vienneau in The Toronto Star that the national labour force participation rate for visible minorities in Canada is 6.3 per cent. The government seems to require only half of that, 3.2 per cent. Even that was failed by the CBC with only 2.1 per cent, Canadian National Railways with 2.7 per cent, Air Canada with 2.9 per cent and Canadian Airlines 3 per cent. It does not matter whether it is public or private employment.

It was very interesting that CHUM Radio in Toronto, which employs 1,591 people, had the lowest over-all grade of 1.2 per cent. To be fair, large companies that received higher grades were Canada Post of 11.6 per cent—the first time I have heard something good for a while about Canada Post—the Bank of Nova Scotia with 10.6 per cent and Atomic Energy of Canada Ltd. with 5.6 per cent.

That is not a good record for the Government of Canada. Therefore, we have to ask questions as to what this bill is really likely to accomplish. Even the multiculturalism sector under the Department of State is having questions raised about it. Out of eight senior appointees, that is the deputy minister, the associate deputy minister, the general director and the directors, only one, the appointee on race relations, is a visible minority, Mr. Ajit Mehat. He was made permanent director only last month. For four years that sector had no permanent director on race relations, no established statement of policy or strategy on how it was to work. That does not suggest that during the last four years this matter had high priority under the present government.

The member for York South—Weston has raised a very interesting point as to whether possibly well-meant efforts to help minority groups might in fact, under present circumstances, do them harm, or more harm than good. I think his point is worth examining although I think it requires more careful examination. He mentions, according to The Globe and Mail in Jeff Simpson's article that "the Tories are just catching up to where we were as Liberals".

This invites one to ask where were they as Liberals when they were the government? Where were they on this question of ghettoizing? I was reminded of an article published in Toronto Life in December 1988 by Elaine Dewar, in which she tells us again—we have heard it before, of course, in this House, about something called:

—the Canadian Alliance for Italian Integration and Culture (Alliance for short). It was created in late 1983 and ran until March 1984. It hit the front pages in 1984—just as the Liberal leadership contest got under way. The Alliance had received a grant of $538,000 from the Special Employment Initiatives Program of the Minister of Employment and Immigration to operate a storefront referral service. John Roberts was the minister responsible. Such funds could only be acquired through the recommendation of an MP—in this case, Roland de Corneille. Ian Waddell, NDP MP, had charged the Alliance's real purpose was to put government money into a Liberal riding before an election. Certain persons associated with the party were involved or employed by the Alliance.

She goes on to name names, but I see that my time is running short. However, you can find the names if you want in the December 1988 issue of Toronto Life.

• (1320)

It is possible that the Tories have arrived at where the Liberals were in making a grant like that. It is also possible that they are even falling farther behind in other ways. The Liberals, at that time, were reducing the funding for English as a second language in places like George Brown College where it was taught with professional qualifications, and handing the funding instead to people with no track record in teaching English as a second language, but with reliable Liberal Party connections. But now the Tories are cutting out their program of citizenship instruction and language training, CILT. They have cut it 50 per cent and announced that next year, 1990, it will be cut totally. This particularly hurts immigrant women.

We have had too many years in which ESL and FSL grants were handed out to some immigrants on the grounds that they were destined for the workforce and withheld from others, mostly women, on the grounds that they were not destined for the workforce. Of course, that means that no housewife does any work. There is no work to cleaning the house, making the supper or raising the kids. It also ignored the fact that many of those women did not get even what this department would call work. They worked in factories in cities like Toronto or they worked as domestic cleaners in the houses of more affluent people. But they were denied the opportunity that was given to some to study the English language. Now the CILT program is to be cut out entirely. There still is the employment-related one, but it is not nearly good enough.

What I hope is that if this bill goes to committee, as it should—I understand the government is talking closure. Perhaps it wants to drive the bill through in case it gets looked at too closely. But I hope it will get a very thorough look in committee. I would like it to focus on the existing forms of white racism, racism by people who are white like me against people who are not. That has never been fully acknowledged in Canada and we have corpses to prove it, not only in Toronto, but in many other places, corpses of people of colour, including some of the First Nations, whose treatment cannot be rationally explained except on the basis of systemic, habitual or institutionalized racism. That is not an easy thing to overcome. It would shake the foundations of some of our deepest patterns in some of our institutions.

There is something this government could do in very short order. It would not correct racism per se, although it would ameliorate it a little bit. It would not end all conflict between ethnic groups, but it would do much in a few years to remove the basis of the conflict, and that is to provide instruction in English as a second language, or in French as a second language, to every immigrant old enough to receive such instruction and requiring such instruction.

We have our jokes about our cousins from Glasgow and other parts of Scotland, but until they ask for instruction in English, they probably would be insulted if we gave it to them.

I would hope both of those points will receive heavy consideration if this goes to committee, and I certainly hope it goes to committee.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the member started to comment about racism and discrimination in Canada. I would like to commend him. At times, it seems to me, he went a little too far in suggesting that some of the very tragic events in Toronto were race related, even though a number of people have gone so far as to suggest that.

I do not think one has to go to that extent with respect to the killings in Toronto of blacks by police officers. One only has to look here in the House of Commons, across the way, if one wants to cite examples of racism and discrimination. There are members from the Conservative side of the House who are actively seeking and circulating petitions asking the Government of Canada not to allow Canadians of Sikh origin to be members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That is the net effect of their objection. They are saying that it is improper and unacceptable for Canadians of Sikh origin to wear their turbans while members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There are people here in the House of Commons exhibiting an abysmal ignorance and an abysmal and shocking degree of discrimination when it comes to talking about participating.

I would like the member to comment. Just a few moments ago, the minister of housing, who spoke one tune when he was on this side of the House—that is as a person outside of cabinet—and is speaking another tune when he is in cabinet, went on for a period of time, to the applause of some of his colleagues on that side of the House, about the first government to do this and the first government to do that. But he did not comment about his colleagues circulating the petitions. He did not comment about what is the actual track record of this government. I would like the member from Trinity—Spadina to expand a bit on the track record of the government.

It is fine to talk about affirmative action and about pay equity, employment equity legislation. It is fine to talk in words, but one has to examine the actions. The bottom line was confirmed by the Secretary of State for multiculturalism just a few weeks ago when he was speaking to Conservatives gathered here in Ottawa at a national convention of their party. He said something to the effect that Conservatives view ethnic communities with distrust and disdain. Perhaps it was the other way around, perhaps it was the ethnic communities that were viewing the Conservative party with distrust and disdain.

But the fact remains that when it comes to general elections the overwhelming majority of Canadians of origins other than French or English vote for the Liberal party. That is because the Liberal party has been leading on the issue of equality. It was the Liberal party that gave Canada the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that enshrines in our Constitution the equality of each and every Canadian.

You have indicated that my time for commenting is expiring, Madam Speaker. I would like the member for Trinity—Spadina to comment further on the track record of the Conservative government when it comes to equality among all Canadians.

• (1330)

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for leaving me a few seconds. I want to comment on what I think is a more serious matter in relation to the Sikhs, and that is the action of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in writing to the then Minister of Employment and Immigration to urge him, apparently successfully, to change the established procedure for determining the status of a refugee claimant. A Sikh from India who had claimed refugee status here had been recommended after due process by the Refugee Status Advisory Committee, then the responsible body, to the Minister of Employment and Immigration as a refugee.

After the Secretary of State intervened, the minister appointed another committee of people who were not contaminated by any direct knowledge of refugee affairs. They were from the department of immigration but they did not know anything about refugees professionally, and they reversed the decision. The first committee of appropriate people had unanimously found this person to be a refugee. The second committee obediently and unanimously found this person not to be a refugee.

At the same time the Secretary of State was found to be complaining because already two or three out of several thousand Sikh refugee applicants had been found to be refugees. Apparently, from what he said in his letter, as published, this was thought perhaps likely to hinder commercial or other relationships with the Government of India. I think that was a much worse signal than anything else I know of that this government has done on the matter of bias against the Sikh people.

There are other examples. There was the letter urging other government people not to meet with certain groups and so on. But to endanger a man's life by such a dubious process, legally a very, very doubtful process if not plainly illegal, on the basis and in the context of such racism was a very bad example for the minister to set.

On the matter of the turbans, I have not seen the petitions. I have read about discussion of the matter in the newspapers and I think it must surely be capable of being resolved reasonably between the Sikh community and the RCMP, and I hope they will be allowed to resolve it.

Mr. Nunziata: Madam Speaker, the member for Trinity—Spadina also mentioned in passing the letter written by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I would like him to comment a little further about a letter that was sent to provincial premiers urging premiers and politicians at other levels of government to boycott, not to attend, events put on by certain groups in Canada.

When questioned about that particular letter here in the House of Commons, the minister did not have a justifiable or reasonable explanation as to why as a minister of the Crown, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, he would be asking colleagues in this House to boycott legitimate groups in Canada, namely several Sikh organizations in Canada which have done nothing wrong and are legal and legitimate. Why would he ask people to boycott them? Would he suggest, or would the hon. member for Trinity–Spadina comment on whether he believes that that might be a further example of a level of discrimination on the other side of the aisle.

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, I am glad the hon. member heard some of what I was saying. I will repeat the rest of what I said on that. Yes, it is an example of discrimination, as I said a few minutes ago, from the other side of the aisle, as he calls it.

I could enlarge on it a little bit. I received a letter from the hon. minister cautioning me after I had met with a certain group. Now it did not forbid or anything like that, but it said "please get in touch with us before you go to speak with such a group". I regret that the matter was treated as though it were confidential. I do not particularly relish the idea of being given reasons why I should not meet with a group and then being told not to tell anybody. I wish he had put the reasons in his letter. I have since met with other Sikh groups and will continue to do so, but I really think the minister ought to clear up his position on that point if the government is going to have a credible Department of Multiculturalism.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Resuming debate, the hon. member for Eglinton—Lawrence.

[Translation]

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the multiculturalism debate today. I have just listened to many very interesting statements and speeches on the topic and subject now under consideration. Personally, I prefer to begin in French and continue in English and maybe later, I might say a few words in Italian, because I consider myself, like some of my colleagues, a symbol of this multiculturalism that we are talking about today in philosophical and practical terms.

[English]

It gives me great pleasure to be able to address the essence and soul of Canada with this Bill C–18, an act to establish the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, even though the designation should be vice versa. To date from this government we have been given merely a callous display of the government's economic philosophy, that is up to today. It is an elementary market economics where laissez–faire prevails, but then only in circumstances decreed by the Conservative agenda as befitting of a continental sweep under which all matters economic must, by force of magnetic or deliberate policies, push and pull Canadian citizens into the orbit of a state whose greatest claim to historical fame is the amassing of unprecedented military and economic power at the expense of numerous nations, peoples and values.

These values need to be re–examined periodically if we Canadians are to keep our sights on a vision that will set us apart from our sister nations as a people whose definition of the human condition is a cut above the others.

It would appear that we lack neither the qualities nor the ingredients for we are at the very least capable of saying the right things. As an example, we pride ourselves on our multiculturalism policy. We have heard much of that today. In fact, today we propose to establish a department to deal exclusively and singularly with all matters multicultural.

Before asserting that we are on the road to salvation or on a road to perdition on the matter, I think it behoves us to cast a momentary, though not casual, glance at what multiculturalism means. I caution, not what the nay sayers in our midst would have it mean, that the aim that the word was intended to stimulate as a goal for which all citizens capable of its achievement could rightly be conferred the adjective "great".

Multiculturalism, so simple a word, so profound its concepts. Cultures, different, unique, each in its own way, none superior or inferior to the other, existing in harmonious, productive interaction; each confident and secure in its values—defined and reshaped in continuous manner, in contact and interplay with others, in a changing environment which hones values tried and true and nurtures on tested, applicable new ones.

The main tenets, the main principles embodied in multiculturalism are familiar to all whose historical perspectives go beyond the mere parochialism of personal experience. For that in a global, international context is surely as inhibiting and as restricting as it is limiting.

Let me make clear that when we speak of multiculturalism we are not breaking new ground, by no means, by no stretch of the imagination. The concept of equality among all men, all women, universal brotherhood, the rule of law in western civilization is not new to Canada. They date at least as far back in history as Alexander the Great in the 4th century BC, pre-Diaspora Israel, and in more recent times to the emperor Caracalla in the 3rd century AD when with a single stroke he bestowed citizenship upon the several and disparate parts of the Roman Empire, thus giving equality before the law, equality of access to decision making without—and this is important—a priori transformation into something else.

Thus we could see in an historical perspective that one could acquire Romanitas without being a Roman. One can become Canadian without having been born here. An individual in the past, as today, could retain his traditions, do business, participate in the local or larger economy, enjoy the privileges of citizenship, fulfil the obligations incumbent upon a holder, and yet not give up his or her identity religious, cultural, linguistic. He or she needed only obey the laws which he or she could shape.

I could easily in that description have referred to our own country Canada—citizenship, the rule of law, tolerance, brotherhood, multiculturalism. It seemed then as now a logical solution to problems emerging when different races with unique religious backgrounds and the modi vivendi that emanate from them, with different needs, aspirations, with peculiar social units and economic organizations for their realization, were brought about and brought together. A lingua franca, though not indispensable, facilitated the functioning of the marketplace and the exchange of both ideas and culture.

Multiculturalism, by its definition, encourages and stimulates that exchange in a non-threatening environment. It does not confuse culture with language, but it recognizes that language both as an extension and as an expression of culture is the vehicle for finding common values that transcend different cultures. Language bridges and opens doors to peoples, to markets, to ideas. It does not set apart nor does it exclude or seclude.

Canadians face the unhappy condition of being governed by a party that has blurred the distinction between culture and language and in fact has come to equate the one with the other, all to great detriment. It has downgraded the word "culture" to a national or racial designation and has caused Canadians to seek security of being in the refuge of assimilating, voluntarily or otherwise, in the so-called cultures of the two main language groups, an exercise, as some of my colleagues to my left have noted, that has had the effect of marginalizing Canada's visible minorities in particular. This ethnoculturalism is not multiculturalism.

Any noble Canadian worthy of the adjective should react vigorously against the deliberate refutation of the realities of a new and expanding Canada. To say one believes in multiculturalism is merely to accept what is; a thriving expression of the ultimate definition of individuality grouped in as small or as large units as per individual preference, living according to values commonly accepted by those units and sanctioned by the acquiescence of a duly constituted larger jurisdiction.

As an example, Europe, whose countries and peoples have histories dating back as far 1000 BC, is now realizing that one builds on common ideas, on common needs, on common experiences and that differences are valuable and can be reciprocally profitable conditions that should be nurtured rather than legislated away.

Where are we going by way of contrast? Legislative, attitudinal or systemic discrimination are too ephemeral in their results, too energy consuming in their efforts, to interest our talents, and we squander opportunity.

Yet, as a country we have the tools to be proactive, and aggressively so, if only we through our government would seek out those with open minds to be the custodians of our emerging culture, to be the proponents of a sociocultural philosophy that would make us the lighthouse of social organization in this world.

Look for a moment at the ministry of culture and its dependent Crown corporations, councils, agencies through which we nurture those English and French elements that some would have us believe are mainstream culture. I notice that my colleague from Scarborough Centre, who is at one with me on these issues, is dutifully paying attention and I thank her for so doing.

Look at the ministry of communications and the implements through which it disseminates bilingual Canadianism. Again, mainstream and exclusive.

What a puny little brother beside these Anglo–Franco giants is this little sop to speak for Canada's official multicultural policy. What a testament to this Tory party's rejection of the validity of multiculturalism as anything more than a trite, token recognition of the existence of an inferior folk who comprise that one–third of Canada's population, the only growing portion of the population whose contribution and role in nation building will persevere in spite of the regressive small minds who refuse to accept the inexorable tide of progress.

I am pained to admit that for the disdain with which the government accords this pitiful and reluctant gesture the new Canada will wrest from its hands those tools of nation building which its small mindedness clutches so jealously. Would that the minister who proposes this legislation could have been more forceful in his cabinet we would have need of such advocacy. He might have convinced his government that the occasion for progress was not of the passing.

The ethnocultural communities do not need a special department to represent them, even if the principle of multiculturalism still does. But those communities will accept this condescending administrative token to their cultural uniqueness and recall with methodical anger the manner in which the minister has thus trivialized that uniqueness as his government goes about destroying our country through language debates and constitutional reform that is expected to enshrine established position.

Mr. Holtmann: That's absolute nonsense.

Mr. Volpe: I know the member opposite will probably be interested in the rest of the speech because it will be a lesson for him to take to his committee as chairman of multiculturalism or as the new cultural car.

How illusory, how unfortunate, how tragic, how foolish to engage in cheap partisan gamemanship without making even the slightest effort to acknowledge that multiculturalism is first and foremost—are you listening—about culture, about Canada, about how Canadians see themselves, how they define their values, how they shape their identity.

To relegate these values and identity to folklorish song and dance is to deny history and to insult the great traditions and heritages; legal, literary, philosophic and artistic contributions of a substantial portion of our population to the history of mankind.

Once culture was thought to indicate a level of learning and sophistication not commonly evidenced; in short the ability to see beyond the meagre horizons of mundane needs, the ability to approach godliness by creating or refining an expression of the human condition, a condition that transcends the individual histories of people everywhere.

• (1350)

Respect for those histories is being subordinated to the pressures that an insecure people impose on others to assimilate, to efface one's identity in return for yet another's as a sign, perhaps, of homage or fealty to some vague, self–proclaimed superior culture in the name of national identity.

Insecurity is a shaky foundation for any identity. One does not acquire Canadianism by becoming anglophone or francophone, by changing one's name, or by denying one's heritage. An early 20th century playwright philosopher, Luigi Pirandello, said it best in Italian when he said: "Cosi è se vi pare", and in English: "You are what others see you to be".

I am proud to be identified for what I am—Italian Canadian, for I am the sum total expression of the experiences of my parents and all of my ancestors, experiences of 3,000 years of historical achievement through which they have learned from and internalized the experiences of great civilizations of this globe—the Oriental, Indian, Hellenic, Hebrew, Egyptian, Arabian and others. Look at the talents and energies that people from these areas bring to our country. Should they apologize for the fact that their historical perspective is measured in millennia rather than in decades?

The focus of our multicultural policy should be to integrate these prodigious experiences and talents into our mainstream. They are in fact our culture. We can do that only if we acknowledge their merit and allow individuals with proven merit from their midst to take leadership roles.

The economy and the arts have witnessed their immense productivity and impact. Politics, bureaucracy and the national media will surely follow—fifth columnists notwithstanding.

Our government should be setting an agenda wherein multiculturalism as the operative ethos permeates all levels of government but at the very, very least the ministries of culture and communication. It is an ethos that would both integrate newer Canadians, showcase their heritages and provide expression for their talents and merits.

We are offered a distant second best with this department, but Canadians of origins other than English or French are accustomed to building on scraps.

[Editor's Note: Member speaks in Italian.]

As the government continues to bog itself in the centuries old language wars the rest of us will continue to construct a Canada in which all Canadians will share proprietorship equally, equality based on the acceptance and promotion of a multicultural ethic.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the member who just spoke to clarify the confusion that certainly is in my mind, and I imagine it is in the minds of other people, about the Liberal position on this Multiculturalism Act.

Earlier today we had I think three Liberal members from the Toronto region who seemed to be opposed to the idea of a multicultural department. In fact if you carry their thinking a little bit further it seemed that they were opposed to multiculturalism, period. In one case they saw this as something that would perhaps reflect heritage issues. A couple of them said that they felt this would ghettoize Canadians who were not from either French or English speaking origins. One member in particular felt that we should not have a separate ministry of multiculturalism but that this should all be under the Department of Communications. He also seemed to suggest that racism and job discrimination against visible minorities would just disappear by some magic. In my party's opinion, this is one of the main needs and should be one of the priorities of a multicultural department.

I would like to ask him whether he agrees with their opinion. I gather from what he said that he does not. He was complaining that the multicultural department was not strong enough, that it was really just token recognition of a third of Canada's population, I think he said. I am confused and I am sure the public is from the point of view of what is the Liberal position. Does he agree with the speakers who spoke earlier?

Mr. Volpe: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for the questions. They were very craftily put with very wise insight into the questions themselves.

I am not sure that we need to trivialize the discussion further by highlighting the fact that there are various opinions on the various aspects and components of multiculturalism and about this bill, because this bill has given rise to an opportunity to debate the issues, to debate all components and aspects of multiculturalism. You quite rightly alluded and pointed to the fact that many of us, unfortunately, have begun to equate multiculturalism with racism or with multiracism. It goes much beyond that.

It is a fact of life that there are many who have a different origin than another and have a different colour than another. None of that should stand in the way of progress and in the way that we deal with each other. None of that should stand in the way of people developing policies and having access to government, access to bureaucracy, having delivery of services, having delivery of a vision of Canada that applies to each and every one of them individually and collectively in the way equally that it applies to all others.

And so when you ask me what is the position of the Liberal Party, it has been one that has been open to the infusion of new ideas. It has been one that has been open to the infusion of criticism.

My own personal view, and I gave it to you, was that this particular bill does not go nearly far enough. I made some suggestions, and I thank you for having listened to it as well, that the minister should take our directions into his cabinet and indicate strongly to all cabinet members that this is not simply an issue of multiculturalism, an esoteric definition that we file away in a library, but that it is in fact an explanation and an indication of the directions that should guide all of our policy makers, be those policies in the economic domain, be they in the cultural domain, or in a social domain.

The most important part is to recognize just what are the needs of Canada, what are the needs of all Canadians. This party has continually worked on making sure that the definition and the system by which we arrive at such conclusions have always received the analysis and the scrutiny that they merit. We are not dealing with trivial matters.

We are dealing with the soul and the essence of this nation. For those of us who are looking for the definition of Canada, we offered it up today. I was glad to be a part of that debate because it gave me an opportunity to shape that definition if even ever so slightly. I thank the member for drawing the public's attention to the fact that the Liberal party has always been in the vanguard of honing that type of definition, of developing that kind of contact and of developing as well the resources and the abilities of politicians and the political system to address the needs that are what they ought to be, and that is to make government function for all those who sustain it, for all those who co-operate in developing that process which creates a government and a political body.

To the hon. member who has attempted to focus a direction and a purpose to where all of these debates would lead, I know that her party favours the kinds of decisions that we have acclaimed today. I know that her party along with members opposite would love the opportunity to continue to debate exactly where we should be going because there are many, many vacuums that have to be filled in this particular bill. While we accept it as a sop—and I said that deliberately—it is but that we must go from there to build and to build even further in order to provide for Canada that basis, the foundation from which we can go into the next century.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It being 2 p.m. the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CAMBODIA

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from Cambodia, a nation plunged again into civil war, a nation just beginning to recover from the 1975–79 slaughter of an estimated two million men, women and children under the barbaric Pol Pot Khmer Rouge Party.

This time, the blood of thousands of Cambodians will be on the hands of China and the west, including Canada. Canada continues to support the Khmer Rouge at the United Nations, has remained silent as China has resupplied and rearmed the Khmer Rouge, supported the return of the Khmer Rouge to power sharing in Cambodia, and gave $1 million in aid to resistance forces in Thailand after various NGOs and United Nations officials admitted the United Nations has oversupplied these camps which, in turn, supply the Khmer Rouge soldiers and the black market.

While I appreciate that the Secretary of State attended and participated in the Paris Peace Conference, Canada's policy toward Cambodia is at least morally wrong and probably politically wrong as well.

CANADIAN CORPS OF COMMISSIONAIRES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct honour and privilege to rise this afternoon to pay tribute to the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires.

These dedicated men and women have served in a branch of Her Majesty's active regular forces, the Canadian forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, or were members of allied nations who served with Canadians in time of war.

I can attest to their outstanding service to the country, in the provision of dignified and purposeful employment for those who have already served their country and wish to continue to do so. Their pride and camaraderie sets an excellent example and the value of this quality to the rest of our country and their respectful rapport with the public has become a time-honoured institution in Canada.

I know I speak for the right hon. Leader of the Opposition and, indeed, for all my colleagues in paying tribute to the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires on their fiftieth anniversary.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, this week, October 2-8, 1989, marks the fifth National Family Week to be celebrated across Canada.

National Family Week gives every Canadian an opportunity to acknowledge the efforts of all family members who show concern and care for each other.

Few among us would deny the importance of the family as a social unit. Although the role of the family has evolved along with contemporary society, it remains the most basic social structure of our time.

In four short years National Family Week has grown from an imaginative idea to a full-fledged nation-wide celebration. Take advantage of the opportunity for the growth and discovery that National Family Week represents.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans referred to the appointment of Don Tansley as a replacement member on the free trade panel studying landing regulations for B.C. salmon and herring.

The Canadian chair of the panel has the right to decide whether or not to reconvene the panel and hear evidence. Can we assume from the parliamentary secretary's comments that further hearings will be held?

There are thousands of British Columbians, 70 per cent of whom are women, many of these of visible minorities, who will lose their jobs if the final decision goes against Canada. As well, Canada will lose its sovereign right to control its own resource.

It is essential that this government stress in all future hearings the importance of controlling our resource. We must maintain B.C.'s well-earned reputation for the quality of our salmon and herring products.

We must protect our investment in the most modern and efficient processing facilities in the world. We must do all within our power to protect the jobs of thousands of British Columbians working in our fish processing industry.

AIR CANADA

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for months, those involved in the economy of Abitibi-Témiscamingue have been trying through CRDAT to meet with Air Canada executives on the future of this carrier in the region.

Without consulting the people of our great region, the President of Air Canada and his gang of high-flyers in their ivory tower in downtown Montreal decided yesterday to send letters and press releases announcing that Air Canada would stop serving Val-d'Or and Rouyn-Noranda, Québec as of February 4, 1990.

As a remote region, we are entitled to receive the best possible service; for us in northern Québec, the DC-9s are what highways and subways are to the South.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to see these employees whom I have known for 20 years leave with their families and children and I urge Mr. Jeanniot to reconsider his position and come and see us in the Abitibi.

BILL C-21

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, as a result of Bill C-21, the government's bill to cut unemployment insurance benefits, Newfoundland will lose $82.7 million; Prince Edward Island will lose $15.5 million; Nova Scotia will lose $42.1 million; and New Brunswick will lose $64.8 million.

The Government says that this money, money that was set aside to help the unemployed buy their groceries and pay their rent, will be redirected to development and training. But there is no legislative provision in the bill that this money will go back to those provinces from which it is taken.

Why does the government not amend this bill to ensure that the $800 million taken from the unemployment insurance fund for development will go proportionately to those provinces where there is the highest unemployment in this country?

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Mr. Speaker, the people in Elk Island recognize that Canada's deficit and national debt are serious problems. We all know that fighting the deficit is not an easy job. We know that we cannot leave this burden for our children to deal with in the future. We must do something now.

Over the past several weeks much has been said in Elk Island about taxation. People have told me that we are taxed too much. If we must change the federal sales tax to fight this monstrous deficit, if we must accept the GST, then let us make sure we cut spending too.

The Canadian Government must make some tough management decisions—cut out the waste, cut out the inefficiencies, reduce spending, and improve the tax system.

Let us work together to reduce the deficit. Let us all work together in this country to build a stronger economy. Let us work together to build a better Canada.

SENATE REFORM

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of the House to a tremendous political development taking place in my province of Alberta. After more than 100 years without any action on meaningful Senate reform, the government and people of Alberta are taking action.

On October 16, Albertans will go to the polls to elect the nominee for the Senate vacancy. Six outstanding Albertans are contesting the position, including my party's candidate, Reformer Stan Waters.

A handful of Tory MPs and cabinet ministers have seen fit to fight against this process and the entire spirit of true Senate reform. But I am confident that the Prime Minister will join the political pioneers of Alberta and endorse this action by appointing, without delay, the first Senator ever to sit with the consent of the people.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, for all the fine words we have been hearing from the Prime Minister concerning how much he and his government are doing for Atlantic Canada, the truth is that the government's policies are short-changing the region and reinforcing regional disparities.

[Translation]

According to a study conducted by the Economic Council of the Atlantic Provinces, federal government funds for industrial assistance have declined steadily since the Conservatives took power in 1984. Furthermore, in 1987, the amount of these subsidies fell below the national average.

In 1980, Atlantic Canada received $2 billion in federal aid compared to $4.4 billion for the rest of the country. In 1987, they received only $631 million while the rest of the country received $8.2 billion in federal aid.

[English]

Is this what the Prime Minister means by regional development, Mr. Speaker? How can the Prime Minister reconcile this sad truth with his repeated statements that the Atlantic provinces have never had it so good?

Well, Mr. Speaker, under this government Atlantic Canadians have never had it so bad, and they have never been short-changed so much. Numbers don't lie.

SOUTH KOREA

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, I pay tribute today to the Republic of South Korea as it celebrates its national foundation day.

It was not long ago that Korea and its impressive capital of Seoul were the very picture of devastation as a result of conflict which tore apart a people and culture as ancient as history itself. The Republic of South Korea has now developed a political and economic growth which is making it the envy of the world.

The Canada-Korea Parliamentary Friendship Group believes that closer co-operation with South Korea as a valued partner in our Asia-Pacific diplomacy is a worthwhile result. As chairman of the group I speak for all members in extending congratulations and best wishes to the national assembly and people of South Korea, and our thanks to Ambassador Park and his excellent staff at the embassy for all of their support and co-operation, with sincere wishes that our countries continue to enjoy good relations in the years to come.

POVERTY

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I rose in the House to acknowledge Family Week and to note that 1.2 million children in Canada live in poverty.

Today I rise to draw the attention of the House to the results of an inquiry into hunger in Regina released yesterday by Mayor Doug Archer. This report noted that in a community with a population of 180,000, 5,500 meals and 6,000 boxes of food a month are distributed by community groups.

It is easy to write off numbers. It is easy to blame the poor for their plight. But the reason they are poor is that they do not have work or money to buy food. Surely, no one here honestly believes that a family would go hungry if it could afford to buy food.

The House must be shocked to learn that 34,000 people in Regina live below the poverty line and are hungry—34,000 people in the heart of the province that is the bread-basket of the world.

INDUSTRY

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, the Times Review, a newspaper in my town of Fort Erie, headlined a story this way, "Fort Erie booming", and continued, "This community is building its way to record heights." Building permits to the end of August totalled a record setting $32,359,000. This tops the town's 1988 figures of $26.4 million for 12 months.

The Niagara corridor is strategically positioned to benefit from the free trade agreement. Half the population of North America is within a one day's drive of the Niagara peninsula. This represents tremendous opportunities. The free trade agreement has helped to stimulate the great growth that we are enjoying.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State responsible for Multiculturalism made what Canadian Macedonians believe to be offensive remarks.

This summer the minister attended a conference in Greece hosted by the Pan Macedonian Organization where he said, among other things, that there is no Macedonian nation.

Does the minister not realize that to deny the distinctiveness of the Macedonian community in Canada is a serious affront to this group? Will the minister apologize for this statement?

CANADIAN CORPS OF COMMISSIONAIRES

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria—Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, today I want to pay tribute to the men and women who continue to serve this country so well in uniform, members of the Canadian Corps of Commissionaires. We, who work in Ottawa are particularly aware of the courteous, efficient presence of the corps. Our government buildings are kept secure by those smartly dressed uniformed men and women.

Hon. members probably know that the corps members must be former members of the Canadian Armed Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or our allied forces.

Today, the Corps of Commissionaires has over 11,000 members in 18 divisions across Canada.

This year marks the fiftieth anniversary of the Ottawa division started in 1939 with just four members. It now has a strength of 2,200, and is the fourth largest non-government employer in Ottawa.

I know the House will join me in congratulating the Ottawa division on 50 years of super service and in sending our best wishes to all commissionaires across Canada.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, this House held a long and serious emergency debate on Canada's state of preparedness to deal with marine spills and particularly those of crude oil. This resulted from the tragic Nestucca and Exxon Valdez spills and the continued deterioration of our marine environment from chronic unreported spills.

Rather than hold a full public inquiry, the Prime Minister chose to spend millions of dollars on a review. The interim report was released yesterday. It is pathetic. Its 17 short pages reveal just how superficial the mandate and terms of reference really are.

The recommendations reveal a process that will neither seek nor find the kind of solutions required to protect our marine ecosystems. The report operates from the premise that existing technology, ships and barges will simply carry on.

On page 3, the panel states that they are comfortable with their mandate which excludes offshore exploration and development, excludes alternative modes of transporting oil and other chemicals and excludes energy conservation.

The review is a fraud. It is a cover-up of the ghastly and grizzly destruction of a marine environment by shipping firms and big oil companies.

There are solutions, Mr. Speaker, but this panel is simply spraying whitewash on the hull of a rusty supertanker on a collision course. The Prime Minister is Canada's version of Captain Hazelwood.

CANADIAN WILDLIFE FEDERATION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, last week, a number of Canadians received a questionnaire as part of a public opinion survey on the environment, sent by the Canadian Wildlife Federation.

Mr. Speaker, I think we all agree that this organization is doing very important and very good work.

However, in question No. 12, Canadians are asked to identify five areas on which the Canadian Wildlife Federation should focus in 1989. One of the fourteen areas listed is the following: "Impact of the Free Trade Agreement on the environment".

Mr. Speaker, I wonder what impact the Free Trade Agreement could have and indeed what connection it might have with the environment, since we know very well that the free trade agreement is about trade. The Federation must have made a mistake. I think it is useful to point out that there is a difference between the environment and the free trade agreement.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Since the return of Parliament last Monday, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Transport have repeatedly refused to refer the Prime Minister's decision to scrap VIA Rail to the Commons transport committee or to the National Transportation Agency. The Prime Minister will know that the Commons transport committee voted almost unanimously this morning to conduct public hearings on the government's plans to terminate VIA Rail.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Six of seven government members voted with the opposition in determining that there ought to be public hearings.

Will the Prime Minister now do the honourable thing and table the government's recommendations on the future of VIA Rail and immediately impose a moratorium on the implementation of those recommendations until the public hearings are conducted by the Commons transport committee and a report laid before the House for consideration by Parliament?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reference levels respecting VIA Rail and other operations were contained in the budget that was tabled last April.

Clearly, there would be nothing at all, given the parliamentary reform that we introduced, that would have prevented the transport committee of the House of Commons to begin last April to consider any changes that they might have anticipated, or otherwise. This is part and parcel of the concept of parliamentary reform that I as Prime Minister am honoured to have introduced in this House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: My friend refers to—I think I am quoting him properly—"the Prime Minister's decision to scrap VIA Rail". He may want to wait for a little while to find out whether that statement is accurate or is fundamentally wrong. Because, no doubt, once he receives the facts that would normally dictate his course of action. I would think that the prudent thing for the member to do would be to wait for the decision of the government which will be announced shortly by the Minister of Transport.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has just told the House that he is honoured to have introduced parliamentary reform.

• (1420)

I would ask him to honour the spirit of parliamentary reform by giving the House a commitment today that because a parliamentary committee comprised of members of all three parties has voted nearly unanimously—has said that this item is important enough and urgent enough to warrant emergency public hearings—that he, the Prime Minister of Canada, will impose a moratorium on the cuts to be announced tomorrow or some time very soon, and that those cuts will not be implemented, either the route eliminations or the 3,000 lay-offs, until the public has had a chance to be heard before the Commons transport committee and the transport committee makes its report to the Parliament of Canada. That is the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I understand the point of my hon. friend. I find it a little difficult to understand his indignation. He was a member of a government that wiped out 20 per cent of VIA Rail without so much as a by your leave to the House of Commons. So while I understand the point he is trying to make, I would ask him to cool the indignation because it is really not going to go over in Canada.

With respect to our obligations to manage the government pursuant to the levels that are set out in the budget, this is precisely what we will do. Any parliamentarian or any parliamentary committee is free, of course, to take a look at the proposals of the government.

Our fundamental obligation to the people of Canada and to the Parliament of Canada is to manage the affairs of the nation in such a way as to bring about a much better economic situation, greater economic growth and better jobs for Canada in a more competitive economy. That is precisely what we are going to do. The budgetary implications are an important part of that plan.

So, if my hon. friend or members of the House wish to examine this, they will of course do so, I am sure very enthusiastically. But the Government of Canada is responsible for the conduct of the economic affairs of the nation. We shall implement these decisions and accept the verdict of Canadians at an appropriate time.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the Commons transport committee wants to examine a live VIA, not a dead carcass, which is what will happen unless the Prime Minister imposes a moratorium.

The lesson from Panama this morning is that those who do not respect parliamentary traditions eventually get the boot. The Prime Minister should pay attention.

I repeat my question to the Prime Minister. This morning, members of Parliament specifically charged with the responsibility of overseeing transportation policy in this Parliament, members of the transport committee from all three parties voted to hold public hearings on the future of VIA Rail because they regard the proposed cuts as an urgent matter requiring emergency public sessions.

If the Prime Minister is going to be consistent, if there is a need to allow the Commons finance committee to hold public hearings before proceeding on the goods and services tax, then surely there is a need to allow the Commons transport committee to hold public hearings before proceeding to slash VIA Rail.

Will the Prime Minister give that commitment today, or admit that his commitment to parliamentary reform is hypocrisy in the extreme?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I have done nothing at all that would prevent any committee of this House from being seized of a proposed government course of action, holding hearings and making whatever decisions and recommendations they would like. In point of fact—

Mr. Tobin: Before you act.

Mr. Mulroney: If my hon. friend will wait for the answer—as I have indicated, the reference levels were spelled out very clearly in the budget documents of April 27. At that very moment the committees of the House could have been meeting to examine any proposed course of action.

My hon. friend says the cut is an emergency. Well, any proposed compression budgégtaires is viewed by the opposition as an emergency because they have been so used to overspending that they do not understand that the time has come for some sanity in the public finances of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Prime Minister. Canadians will find it hard to see how a parliamentary committee could study the future of VIA Rail before it has the details of the government's plans. There is some logic missing here. The Minister of National Revenue has said the government is going to spend more than $200 million a year and hire more than 5,000 tax police, one for every 300 taxpayers, to help collect the government's new goods and services tax.

I want to ask the Prime Minister, therefore, how can he justify hiring these 5,000 tax police, if he is concerned about government expenditure, and at the same time he is firing thousands of people at VIA Rail. Why doesn't he scrap the new goods and services tax and save VIA Rail?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the mandate of this government is to make the country a more efficient place to live in as we look toward the future. That is what tax reform, including the move from the existing federal sales tax to the GST, is all about. It is so that future generations can reach their full potential in being able to create jobs and productivity in this country.

In the last four or five months our department has looked everywhere to utilize existing facilities. In order to dispel the figures that have been floating around—those of between 10,000 and 12,000 person years to administer GST—we have been able to bring that figure down to somewhere between 3,400 to 3,900 additional person years in order to provide a service for the taxpayer, particularly the small business community in this country, to make it easier for them to prepare for a smooth launch in 1991.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, this is a strange vision of efficiency, hiring nearly 5,000 more public servants as tax inspectors and spending $1 billion over five years.

[English]

It is a strange vision of efficiency.

I want to ask the Prime Minister how many of these new tax police will be stationed in barber shops, and taxi cabs, How long will Canadians tolerate this government's spending $1 billion over five years to hire these new tax police to enforce a tax that Canadians don't want? Let's have straight answer.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, that question is as misinformed as the hon. member usually is in this House of Commons.

An Hon. Member: Right on!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: We are not talking about any tax police. What we are talking about are civil servants who are going to be providing information, who are going to be providing service, who are going to be consulting with the taxpayer, with the small business community, in such a way as to make the transition from a bad tax to a good tax easier.

When the hon. member talks about tax police, that is what was in place when the Liberal government was in power, but not since the new taxpayers' bill of rights came into effect.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

VIA RAIL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Last night in committee, the Minister of the Environment indicated it was not his responsibility to do an environmental impact study of the possible closure of VIA Rail. According to him, it was the responsibility of the Minister of Transport. My question is quite straightforward: Did the Minister of Transport do this kind of study?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is of course very close co-operation between the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment on all matters that concern our two departments, on an ongoing basis. As for VIA Rail, I said yesterday that when the Government's decision was announced, we would release a number of comments or decisions regarding various subjects, and at that point the environment would be discussed, and I would advise the Leader of the New Democratic Party to wait for the Government's decision. Then and only then will we discuss the environmental issues.

• (1430)

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, some comments are one thing. A comprehensive study is another. I want to address this question to the Minister of the Environment or the Minister of Transport.

In the election last year their boss, the Prime Minister, said:

> We are prepared to subject every federal undertaking and every undertaking on federal lands to a full environmental impact study.

Was there a full environmental impact study done about the possible closure of VIA? Yes or no. Is the government going to live up to its promises in this area. Yes or no.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I said before that any decision dealing with VIA Rail would have to await the announcement. How can we say at the present time, today, that nothing or something will be done about VIA Rail when the decision is not known?

I would propose to the leader of the NDP that he wait for the announcement. At that time he will be able to make any comment about any consideration regarding VIA Rail.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will try again. The question concerns the relationship between a comprehensive environmental impact study and the government's decision on VIA Rail. Government, clearly in the words of the Prime Minister last fall, in the words of the Minister of the Environment at the end of January of this year, indicated that before a major economic decision is taken in each and every case an environmental impact study will be undertaken and, if necessary, if the environmental conclusion leads to a negative result for this economic decision the environmental concerns would predominate.

I want to ask either minister today: Will they guarantee that such a study will be undertaken before the government makes up its mind on VIA and that environmental concerns will predominate? That is the issue.

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, clearly the leader of the NDP is not familiar with the federal process on the assessment of the environment.

Mr. Broadbent: I am very familiar.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): I would advise him to read the guidelines. The guidelines provide the government with the obligation to conduct an initial study and then for the responsible minister from the initiating department to make a decision whether to request more studies.

When the initiating minister is satisfied with the study which has been conducted he can proceed. This decision has been made by the Minister of Transport. He will announce at the same time as the plan how he will cope with the environmental impact. Let us wait for that.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Cars produce nine times more ozone pollution than a train so he knows that fewer trains equal more pollution choking our nation.

Vancouver, Windsor, Quebec City, and Saint John, New Brunswick already have the worst ozone problems in Canada. Last year federal ozone guidelines were shattered 157 times in Toronto, and 189 times in Windsor.

In light of this clear evidence, will the minister make the environment a first thought and not an afterthought and have a full environmental assessment before any VIA cut-backs?

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, this government and my department have made sure in all circumstances that the environmental review process has been respected in every phase. This is the same in all the megaprojects. The same thing has been applied to the Goose Bay PCB destruction. The same thing has been applied to nuclear waste. With this government we now know what environmental assessment is.

As far as VIA Rail is concerned, the minister has just said that he will satisfy the House with the full respect of the requirements of the environmental review process. He has instructed his officials to make the initial required study.

When he announces the VIA Rail plan he will inform the House and the people of Canada how he will cope with environmental aspects.

When we talk about the railway people must draw a distinction between a railway going across the country without passengers. This is a way of polluting the country for nothing. We must make the right decision now.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): The booby prize goes to the Minister of the Environment who doesn't know what the word environment means. He isn't even willing to protect VIA Rail.

I want to ask him personally whether he knows his own legislation.

[English]

Maybe the Minister of Transport should listen for a moment because his own environmental legislation states that a self-assessment process must be undertaken by the initiating department before irrevocable decisions are taken as early in the planning process as possible.

The Minister of Transport has admitted here in the House today that no environmental assessment process has been undertaken by his department. He said it was going to be undertaken after the decision was made, which clearly breaks his own law.

Given the fact that the Minister of Transport is breaking the law in moving with VIA cuts without having done the proper assessment, will the Prime Minister follow through with his own promise during the election campaign that on any development, any project, any program, we will make its environmental consequences as fundamental a test as we now apply to economic feasibility?

Why doesn't the Prime Minister live up to his own words? Were they mere hollow words when he stated them? Did he say them just to win the election? Was that his real game?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat what was said by the Hon. Member of Hamilton East. It is quite unnecessary, since the House is so used to hearing this sort of thing. I simply want to say and I repeat what I told the Leader of the New Democratic Party, that I think it makes sense to wait for the announcement to be made by the Minister of Transport, to determine the environmental implications of that announcement. When we make our announcement, we will provide information on a number of subjects, including the environment. So I would ask the Hon. Member to be patient and wait for the announcement. I did not say we wouldn't do anything, but if she is patient, she will know exactly what the situation is.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In his Budget Papers, the Minister of Finance said that the Government intended to downsize the Public Service, increase its efficiency and reduce payroll spending. The Minister told us this in his Budget Papers. Yesterday, the Minister of National Revenue announced they would hire an army of federal tax inspectors who will harass small business people across Canada.

How can the Minister of Finance justify his statement while this kind of money is being spent? All those inspectors are going to cost a fortune. How can the Minister of Finance reconcile what he said with what is happening here?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is quite right when he points to the excellent record that we have had in reducing the size of the public service by 12,000 people. In so doing, we have reduced the overhead of the Government of Canada by 10 per cent from what it was in 1984–85. Clearly our record speaks for itself.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, has said that for the new goods and services tax we will need additional resources. He has spoken clearly as to what those resources will be.

I ask the hon. member to consider this one thing. His party is on record as saying we should scrap the existing tax, we should move to a new tax. The member for Ottawa—Vanier said: "a multi-stage type of sales tax sounds to me like an idea which the government should have proposed when it brought in fiscal reform".

This hon. member, his colleague, agrees that we should be moving to a multi-stage type of sales tax like the goods and services tax. I ask him to give me some suggestions as to how they would do it utilizing fewer people than what my colleague has proposed.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. There is a very easy way for the Minister of Finance to avoid hiring all these people and that is to go back to the negotiating table with the provincial ministers and agree on how this tax should be collected instead of trying to go it alone. The fact is that there have been no genuine negotiations with the provinces, and I suggest that the Minister of Finance, in mid-October when the provincial ministers of finance have their meeting— Is the Minister willing to send them a request immediately for opening negotiations in order to avoid having to hire thousands of new public servants?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, just to put these additional resources in perspective, it is at the low end, by far the low end, of the range of other countries that have this similar type of tax. Colleagues on the other side of the House were saying 10,000 to 25,000 additional person-years when in fact it will be less than 4,000. I think my colleague has done an excellent job in controlling the amount.

The hon. member asks if I am prepared to return to the table with the provinces. The answer is yes, if they come up with a proposal that they can agree on and which their Premiers and their governments will agree on. We have said quite clearly that that is the case. But I have discussed this proposal with them for two years, from early in 1987 until early this year, and we have not been able to come to grips with it, and I have responded in this House as to why.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. In earlier exchanges the Minister of the Environment left the impression that an environmental impact assessment had been done on the VIA Rail cuts.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport this question. Is it accurate to say that an environmental impact study was done on the VIA Rail cuts or was it not done?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat what I have already said twice. I believe that we should wait for the announcement day to know exactly which study has been done and what for. I believe that it is normal to wait for the announcement, and we will answer that question on the day of the announcement.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport should remember that in the spring of this year the Prime Minister said categorically in the House that no such assessment had been done.

What I want to find out from the Minister of Transport is the following. Yes, we will find out when all the reports come down, but the people of Canada want to have an understanding in advance as to whether your government has done the correct work by having an environmental impact study done. Will you indicate yes or no? Was such a study done to test the impact on the environment?

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I can only say, wait for the day of the announcement.

CAMBODIA

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Hun Sen Government of Cambodia has established a free market system and a Constitution calling for multi-party internationally supervised elections and even including the abolition of the death penalty. The Vietnamese have left Cambodia and the government enjoys the support of the vast majority of Cambodians.

What more does the Government of Canada want before it begins moving away from the murderous Khmer Rouge and toward the Hun Sen government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Government of Canada in Cambodia is to contribute to a circumstance in which the Cambodian people themselves can decide their own futures.

I listened with interest to the hon. member's personal view that the Hun Sen regime enjoys the widespread support of the people of Cambodia. That is far from clear. There has been a Vietnamese withdrawal. That Vietnamese withdrawal is due in part to the fact that Canada, other western countries, and our allies in ASEAN maintained a very strong position over the last several years. We think this is not the time to break that kind of strong position. No one wants anything to do with Pol Pot or the Pol Pot faction of the Khmer Rouge regime. The reality is that the Khmer Rouge commands authority in Cambodia.

When we have been looking, as we did actively through the Paris Peace Conference this summer, for a means by which there could be a coalition government or an interim authority that could speak for all of the Cambodian people we were seeking to minimize the role of the Khmer Rouge.

I can assure the hon. member that I have been following this matter with our allies closely, including most recently in discussions with the foreign ministers of the other members of the G-7 in New York on Thursday night.

HOUSING

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Housing. The minister has been accused of saying that there is no national housing crisis in Canada. How can the minister justify this statement? Would he clarify these comments for the House?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, the article in the press referred of course to a poll that had been done in which Canadians were asked to identify their two greatest concerns.

In that poll across the country only 22 per cent of Canadians identified housing as one of their two major concerns, whereas in the city of Toronto area where the hon. member comes from some 43 per cent identified housing as a major concern.

It was in fact my comments relating to that poll that were reported in the press and indicated, obviously, my desire to see many, many more Canadians seeing this as a priority and seeing this as a crisis as I do and as the government does.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The GST proposal includes a special office allegedly to safeguard consumers against overpricing of goods and services. With a staff of only 20 and no authority to lay charges or to roll back prices this office will be a sham.

Will the minister admit that this government has no real plans to monitor overpricing and is planning to leave Canadian consumers completely unprotected?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has got it wrong. We are concerned and I think Canadians are concerned that the savings that are clearly there from replacing the existing federal sales tax with the new tax will result in a cost reduction for a number of businesses in Canada. It is very important that these businesses reduce their costs and reduce their prices accordingly.

We have established this office in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and given it the ability to make available, through an information program to Canadians, how the change from the old tax to the new tax will affect pricing so that the intelligent consumer can make intelligent decisions about where and how they shop. This particular office also has the capacity to make public any findings of people who are overpricing, and I think that particular power in itself will address the problem of overpricing.

Ms. Clancy: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. It is clear that Canadian consumers are going to have to be Einstein level to understand this stuff.

The government is going to lead consumers to their fate, and the GST represents an attack on the real consumers of Canada, lower and middle wage earners, and that means women. As consumers women will be taxed for diapers, for drycleaning and for baby clothes. As service sector workers Marjori Cohen of British Columbia predicts that women will lose 100,000 jobs. How does the minister justify imposing such a punitive tax on the women of Canada?

• (1450)

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, first I would not agree with anything like what the hon. member has said. Let me just point out to my colleague that the goods and services tax proposal has some very clear elements in the design which will make sure that people in low and modest income brackets will be better off after tax reform.

Let me remind the hon. member that there is a tax credit. There is a very substantially enlarged tax credit which will be paid to those people who are eligible, up to $25,000, and then it will phase out. There will be a middle income tax reduction. There will be an exemption of food. There will be an exemption of other products as well, such as basic groceries. There will be an exemption of a number of other products as well.

In all these ways we are ensuring that those in low income brackets, including women, will be better off after sales tax reform.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. With the apparent collapse of the scallop fishery which, had the minister listened to his inshore Scallop Advisory Board, might not be happening, will the minister now listen to the many groups who appeared before the Haché committee and listen to the fishermen who say there is cod and pollack to catch and reopen the groundfishery in the Bay of Fundy and Georges Bank so as to salvage the livelihood of the thousands of people who are directly and indirectly dependent on the inshore groundfishery in southern Nova Scotia?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do intend to listen, as I always do, to the concerns of fishermen and their representative groups whether through the exercise of the Jean Haché task force or their direct representation to me.

I think it is important to point out to the hon. member and to the House that the scallop fishery has not collapsed, if I were to repeat the language that the member used. In fact the historical scallop catches in the Bay of Fundy of some 300 tonnes were exceeded last year to the extent of a scallop catch of 3,000 tonnes and 2,000 tonnes already having been taken this year.

These are measures of the successful management of the fishery to the benefit of the fishermen in her region in Atlantic Canada.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I said: "apparent", if the minister had been listening. I can only go by The Globe. However my supplementary question is quite serious.

The minister avoided the total context of the groundfishery as it was put. I direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is chairing the special cabinet committee set up specifically to look at the problems in the Atlantic fishery.

We have the Minister of Fisheries stating that the fishery has been good on the east coast. His attitude is totally opposite to the reality of the tragedy that is occurring in southern Nova Scotia. It is contrary to the people who appeared before that committee, the municipal leaders, the provincial government, and even now we have a hunger strike started out in front.

However, I ask the minister in charge of that committee whether he would convene that special cabinet committee. Will he look at the reality that the direction of the fisheries management plan is doing to the east coast and the livelihood of the thousands of people who are dependent on the Secretary of State for External Affairs convening the special cabinet committee?

Mr. Siddon: Mr. Speaker, I certainly prefer to base my decisions on facts and not on The Globe or whatever other method the member would recommend.

I want to tell the hon. member that, as I do with all fishermen who bring individual concerns to my attention, I met with Mr. Robichaud this morning to discuss his specific personal concerns. This is an example of the kind of human story that we are taking to the special cabinet committee chaired by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I just want to conclude by pointing out that in the Scotia Fundy fishery alone over the past four years the value of landings has increased by 60 per cent. The number of registered fishermen increased by 30 per cent. If we are having some localized difficulties this year, we nonetheless have a good news story to tell.

PROPOSED GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The minister knows that as a result of his GST Canadians will have $3.6 billion less to spend in the service industry. This means, as an earlier exchange showed, that 100,000 Canadian women will lose their jobs in the service sector.

How can the minister justify saying that the manufacturers' sales tax is a silent killer of jobs when his new tax will do nothing but slaughter the livelihood of 100,000 Canadian women?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as usual the rhetoric seems to outstrip the truth by quite a long way.

The service sector is one of the most rapidly growing sectors in Canada, and it is a place where the demands for women to work in the future are going to come from.

Let me say as well that women are going to benefit the most, particularly single mothers who are frequently in the workforce, from the credit that goes to people with incomes of under $30,000. If you put this together with the kind of programs that this government has for women around job training and employment equity so that we are raising their standards of living and improving their skill levels, women are going to be better off.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I shudder to think if the minister really believes that increasing a tax will not decrease women's spending dollars.

Low income families spend over 90 per cent of their income on basic consumption, while families earning over $50,000 spend only 56 per cent. Tax credits, to the contrary, will not cover the cost of this GST to low income families or to women who are low income earners.

Why is the minister forcing low income Canadians and women to bear the burden of his GST?

Mrs. McDougall: Mr. Speaker, let me point out in the first place that it is not in the interests of women that the deficit go up, that interest rates go up, and that the economy goes down. That is not in women's interests.

Over half of the new jobs that have been created since 1984 have women working in them. Their skills are better than they were before and they have better jobs. The sales tax credit is going to benefit women more than any other group. The single parent credit means that the woman gets a credit of $275 and she gets a credit of $275 for her oldest child. We have taken these things into account. If the hon. member insists on telling people this, she is going to raise the alarm level well beyond what it belongs to.

HUNGARY AND POLAND

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that both Hungary and Poland took great risks in implementing more democratic forms of government, and considering the fact that both countries will require immediate and long-term assistance in achieving their economic and political reforms, will the Secretary of State tell Canadians today in this House what assistance Canada is offering to these two countries to help them achieve their economic, social and political goals?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I know all members of the House want to give the utmost of encouragement to the forces of reform and change in both Poland and Hungary.

I am not in a position to reveal the details of the package to the House at this moment because it is still under consideration by the cabinet in meetings that we will be holding this week, but I look forward to being able to make that announcement sometime next week.

I had the occasion last week at the United Nations to meet directly with the foreign ministers of both Poland and Hungary to discuss with them the range of their needs and ways in which Canadians, including private Canadians, including people outside government, can be of help to them in their reform. As the member knows, Lech Walesa will be in Canada as a guest of the Canadian Labour Congress in November. The Prime Minister and others of us will be meeting with him and with other representatives of Solidarity.

EAST GERMAN MIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Everyone has been watching with fascination and interest the mass exodus of some 25,000 East Germans to the west in the past days.

Given that this migration is the largest movement in eastern Europe in 30 years, and given that Canada has responded to the historical developments in eastern Europe, whether accepting 9,000 Poles in 1982; 12,000 Czechoslovakians in 1968 or 37,000 Hungarians in 1956, what action is the minister and her government taking in response to requests made by Canadian organizations that they initiate a program to facilitate the entry of some of those East Germans fleeing their country into the west.

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have met with representatives of the East German community in Canada and have suggested to them that this government is prepared to work with them in signing a master agreement as a priority action for private sponsorships in Canada, which does, of course, involve the government in some cost as well. We are going to do everything we can in working not just with the East German community in Canada but in terms of the kinds of provisions that we can make. We recognize the sensitivity of this situation. We have tried to respond to other eastern European interests in the past two or three years and we will continue to do so.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, many Hon. Members on both sides of the House are aware of the tremendous work done by Child Find. This organization is responsible for returning 59 children to their families, thus ending the nightmare these families were going through.

Six months ago, this organization presented a grant application to enable it to continue its work. The application was rejected by the Solicitor General and it is still under consideration!

My question is for the Solicitor General and, in his absence, the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Why does the Government not act more quickly in reviewing this application? When can this group expect a reply?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the absence of the Solicitor General I could take notice of the question as a former Solicitor General myself who began an initiative to help to search for missing children. I recognize the importance of the concern that we should do anything that we can to assist in finding missing children. I will undertake, on behalf of the Solicitor General, that he will study the requests made by the hon. member and give her a response as quickly as possible.

MINIMUM WAGE

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in a statement this afternoon I outlined the shameful plight of 34,000 people in Regina who live below the poverty line. A single parent in Saskatchewan working for minimum wage of $4.50 an hour lives $11,000 below the poverty line. That parent would have to earn $9.68 an hour the poverty line. That parent would have to

In view of the statement just made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, would the Minister of Labour tell Canadians when they can expect an increase in the federal minimum wage, which is currently $4 an hour?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member that the Department of Labour is continuously examining the question of minimum wage in this country and will readjust it as soon as it is proved to be essential.

PRIVILEGE

Mr. Speaker:I have a question of privilege from the Hon. Member for Manicouagan (Mr. Langlois).

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege further to the comments made by the Hon. Member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte (Mr. Tobin) and the questions he asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) at the beginning of Oral Question Period.

His comments may leave the House under the impression that the Transport Committee this morning discussed VIA Rail as a matter of great urgency and that the Committee's decision to hold public hearings was also made on an emergency basis. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker, since the proposal that the Transport Committee hold public hearings was made by the Vice-Chairman of the Committee in a non-partisan spirit so that Committee Members and the public could express their opinions on VIA Rail.

I would ask the Hon. Member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte to kindly correct his statement so as not to mislead the public and the House, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, the member who just spoke and suggested to the house that the decision was a non-partisan decision is absolutely right. Six of seven Conservative members of Parliament in that committee together with all opposition members voted for these hearings. We decided to hold them because we thought the VIA Rail decision was critical and important for the public and we decided, as part of the motion, to hold them as quickly as possible after the announcement was made. That in my mind is an emergency, Mr. Speaker. I have no apology to make.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: This is not the first time that we are faced with such a situation. The members of a committee have a difference of opinion concerning its activities. This is not a question of privilege.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which concerns Bill C-36. Representatives of 19 important farm organizations across western Canada met yesterday and called on the Prime Minister to withdraw this piece of legislation and to reinstate the full farm cash advance program. I wonder if the deputy Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member, I am sure, knows that that is not a point of order. We are in a position where under the rules it is clear that the government of the day has the right to call the order of business, and the government has decided to do so.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, today the House is being asked to consider a bill to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. Programs under these pieces of legislation have provided producers of storable crops with interest-free guaranteed loans at harvest time.

The amended legislation, as set out in the bill, will maintain loan guarantees for advance payments that will help promote the orderly marketing of agricultural commodities in this country. Farmers will still be able to obtain the financing they need to carry crops from harvest time to delivery. That means that they can continue to take advantage of marketing opportunities and that seasonal price fluctuations can be smoothed out. Under the Crops Act the advances are administered through producer organizations which have entered into agreements with the federal government. This year we have agreements with 55 such organizations. The advance is extended to the farmer by the producer organization and is repaid by the farmer when the crop is delivered. The government guarantees these advances against default by farmers so that their organization and lenders take no risk.

Under the act covering prairie grains, advances are extended by Canadian Wheat Board through elevator companies. The loans are repaid through deductions on payments received by farmers when the grain is delivered. Again in this case, the government guarantees these loans. Neither the Canadian Wheat Board nor the lenders are at risk. Over the summer, consultations with producer organizations have enabled us to put forward this amending legislation with a number of improvements to the legislation that was originally introduced. I want to thank hon. members for their co-operation in allowing that bill to be withdrawn and to be replaced with this one which incorporates a number of those improvements.

To provide better security the acts will guarantee the payment of interest as well as the advance. If a producer is in default, both the principle and any accumulated interest will be covered. As well, any producer organization that administers the advances is accountable for 10 per cent of defaults on principle and interest on an individual basis up to an aggregate of 2 per cent of all advances made by it.

The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act will be further amended so that interest rates will be designated by the minister, rather than by regulation. This is already the case as provided for in the Advance Payments for Crops Act. This change will help get advance payments into the hands of producers more quickly. In addition, the advance limits would be designated by the minister each year up to a level of $250,000. Many producer organizations have requested such action. Previous limits were set at $30,000 for an individual producer; $60,000 for a partnership of two; and $90,000 for a corporation of three or more producers.

These limits were established to control interest costs to the government, but since the government is no longer paying these costs, we can remove these statutory limits and establish new limits set by the Minister of Agriculture.

I would also like to take note here that the Advance Payments for Crops Act is being amended to include oats. We have taken this action since prairie oats are no longer being marketed through the Canadian Wheat Board.

Under the legislation that we are considering today, farmers will still be able to obtain the credit they need to hold crops off the market for whatever period they choose. The principal change is that they will now have to pay interest on the loans taken out. This means that the decision to sell or hold their crop will be based on business principles rather than on the availability of an interest-free loan.

Interest rates will be based on rates negotiated by the Canadian Wheat Board or the producer organizations with the lending institutions. These rates will be significantly lower than what otherwise would be the case if producers or their organizations sought credit independently of these federally secured programs. Farmers acting on their own would generally pay rates anywhere from one to three percentage points higher than that which will be negotiated. It is normal practice for farmers to carry some crop inventories past harvest. Delivery schedules may be staggered or farmers may anticipate that prices will improve later in the year, or it could be to their advantage to delay crop receipts to the next year. These are business decisions and interest charges associated with carrying inventories are expenses regularly faced by Canadian business.

The amendments to the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act will save Canadian taxpayers and the federal treasury about $20 million this fiscal year. Over the next four years the savings will total $100 million.

Everyone is being asked to contribute to deficit reduction. In this case, in a modest way, the Government of Canada is asking the farmers of Canada to contribute in a small way.

Since the government assumed office we have been successful in reducing the deficit from a level of $38 billion in 1984, when we came into office, to a level of $28.7 billion in the last fiscal year, a reduction of almost $10 billion. It is a painful process and it is not easy.

As well, we have slowed the rate of growth of the debt from 24 per cent a year, which was occurring before we came into office in 1984, to a level of less than 10 per cent per year. As the Minister of Finance has indicated, we have reduced the size and the cost of the administration of government. We have reduced the size of the public service. We have taken a number of expenditure reduction measures all in the interest of bringing our revenues and expenditures more into line.

Despite these best efforts, the debt is still outstripping our ability to carry it.

Mr. Milliken: Don't forget the huge tax increases.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is why my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has this past April prescribed some very tough measures in which all Canadians are being asked to share, measures which include this provision which all together will reduce the deficit to approximately $15 billion by 1993 and 1994.

I heard the hon. member say, "Don't forget about the taxes". Well, it really invites me to say something about the Liberal debt that this government inherited, a debt of $200 billion.

Mr. Peterson: What is it now?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, what is it now? I am glad the member asked that. It is about $350 billion, and the $150 billion is interest on the debt that we inherited in 1984. We have not added one plug nickel to the nation's debt on the basis of program expenditures.

Mr. Harvard: You have been in power five years.

Mr. Mazankowski: What we have been left with is a legacy, a mountain of debt which Canadians are now being asked to service and for which Canadians are being asked to sacrifice. Hon. members can chirp over there all they like. It is not our debt, it is their debt. Unfortunately all Canadians have to pay for their mistakes.

Mr. Peterson: You have doubled the debt in a mere five years.

Mr. Mazankowski: Since the fiscal year of 1987–88, our budgetary revenues have exceeded our program expenditures in each and every year. What has been killing us is the cost of servicing the Liberal debt. It is a Liberal debt and it is a Liberal legacy and Canadians will never forget that.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nault: You have raised taxes 30 times.

Mr. Mazankowski: Madam Speaker, all Canadians and even Liberals are going to have to face up to this. We must build for the future. We must reduce the debt. We cannot continue to borrow from the future and that is what this piece of legislation addresses. I know that hon. members opposite will oppose it because they have been so used to spending like drunken sailors that they will not take charge of the situation and we have got to take charge.

While these budgetary cuts will have some impact upon the farm sector, it does not in any way suggest that the Government of Canada is walking away from supporting the farmers of Canada. We have a distinguished record in terms of what we have done in the past.

Federal government support for agriculture has been unprecedented since we have come to office in 1984. Direct federal support to Canadian agriculture totalled some $6 billion in 1987–88. Whether it has been drought, whether it has been grasshoppers, whether it has been floods, or whether it has been depressed commodity prices, this government has been there to respond to the needs of the farmers, and we will continue to do that.

We are asking the agriculture sector to do its share and to help overcome Canada's deficit problems. Farmers, like other Canadians, in the long run will benefit from the action we are taking today to put this country on a sounder financial footing. The changes necessitated by the budget must go forward and that is why we are bringing this legislation forward today.

Yes, the producers will have to pay interest, but the guarantees offered them through their producer organizations will allow them to get the cash they need at a better rate of interest.

I know now that the issue is not the interest rate question as much as the fact that what is needed is the enabling legislation so farmers can go out and apply for cash advances under the provisions of this legislation. So there is, indeed, some urgency to the passage of this legislation.

The acts will still help producers store crops after harvest in order to market them later, and this means more reasonable prices at harvest time for other producers and a better average price throughout the year. Advance payments legislation will, as I said, continue to provide significant benefits to Canadian producers and I would urge the members on all sides of the House to consider the urgency of this so that farmers can, indeed, apply for advances and receive those advances in order to make their marketing decisions and in order to calculate their cash flow in an orderly fashion.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, the minister has certainly outlined the purpose of this bill, a bill that was introduced in the House of Commons back in the late 1950s by the Diefenbaker government. There is no doubt the government of the time had a lot of foresight and recognized the need for legislation such as this, whereby a farmer could borrow money against the crops that are in storage, interest free money that helped tailor the supply of food to market.

I feel bad that the present day members of that party have lost sight of that need, and have lost sight of the need of the farmers particularly in a year like this when harvests were delayed across the northern part of the Prairies with the result that the grades of those crops have deteriorated to the point where they will not return as much to the producer as they would in a normal year.

I take part in this debate today in the hope that the government will reconsider its current trend of abandoning the Canadian farmers. This bill is another example of the complete disregard of this government for our major primary industry, and it is the latest in a series of moves that is throwing Canadian farmers to the vultures of the market-place, a market-place that has been racked by investigations and scandals and charges of insider trading in some commodity exchanges.

Back in July of 1985, the headlines of the London Free Press stated "Ottawa Kisses Off The Family Farm". I had hoped they were wrong because I am a farmer at heart. My son is a farmer. However, when we look at events since then we realize that they were correct. We have seen a grape industry ravaged. A healthy tobacco industry, with the highest quality and the lowest chemical content of any in the world, has been partially destroyed. The two-price wheat system was discontinued in spite of a 1986 recommendation of $10 per bushel for wheat consumed domestically.

We were assured the marketing boards were not on the bargaining table at the free trade negotiations, yet these boards, particularly in the poultry sector, were gutted. Look at what was done with chicken, for example. There are 13 different types of further processed chicken that are no longer classified to be chicken, nine different types of turkey which are not considered to be turkeys that will be allowed into Canada through the Free Trade Agreement and will enter without restriction. The Canadian people and the Canadian farmers now realize who are the real turkeys, the ones who negotiated this agreement. This systematic dismantling of our Canadian farm programs is destroying the Canadian family farm, not by a direct frontal attack but by a series of attacks on the superstructures of the industry. Apparently the government seems to think that agriculture is just another big business. It seems to think if you can produce iron ore cheaper in South America, we can do the same with foods.

The farmers of this nation will never accept the living conditions of those in the Third World countries. They demand better, and if we are expected to compete against the multinational companies that control the world's grain trade we must continue our programs that have made Canadian farmers among the most efficient in the world, who produce the highest quality grains in the world and do it through the marketing systems that we have in place and programs like those that are being gutted here today.

I have to ask the government why it did not raise this hidden agenda four years ago instead of the piece-by-piece dismantling that we have been witnessing since that time. Let us take the Farm Credit Corporation, for example. The 1988-89 corporate plan was tabled late, late in the evening just before we adjourned for Christmas. Of course when we look back, we realize it had to be done after the election, but not seven months late.

Then, of course, the annual report of the Farm Credit Corporation for 1988-89 was due in early June and tabled late on the night we adjourned June 27.

Then we had the cabinet directive to the Farm Credit Corporation of July 1988 that was not tabled even though by law it should have been tabled within the next 15 sitting days of Parliament. The government is treating the members of Parliament like mushrooms that you keep in the dark and feed on a special diet. If the government intends to phase out the Farm Credit Corporation, it should tell us and tell the farmers of Canada because we have to know. Please stop the discrimination of requiring farmers in some provinces to sign covenants that are illegal in other provinces and are not being treated equally.

There are provisions under section 11(1)(e) of the Farm Credit Corporation Act to make compositions, schemes of arrangement, re-writing of mortgages, etc., but it was never the intent of the legislators that we should go so far as to force these people to sign away their future, their heart and their souls. I call on the government to stop these practices, to accept the responsibility and realize that Canadian agriculture cannot be run like big corporations. When one examines some of the actions of the Farm Credit Corporation and looks at some of the situations, one has to realize that at this time it is as much a collection agency as it is a lending agency.

I want to commend the representatives of the four churches for their involvement a week ago yesterday on behalf of Canadian farm families.

This government is slowly but surely dismantling the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Ontario Wheat Growers Marketing Board. When the levels of subsidy are at an equal level there must be free movement of grain according to the free trade deal. This means that probably by late next year we will see cheaper and lower quality United States grains—I am referring here to wheat and barley—coming into Canada and undermining our price structures and quality standards. In fact, the end users certificates that will accompany this grain will not even show the quality or grade of product.

The travesty of this situation is that processors can bring in a few loads of low quality grain and undermine a price structure here in Canada of the high quality Canadian grain, all at the expense of Canadian producers. If this government is going to be the frontman for big business, and if the rural roots are cut off, this primary industry will wither and die.

We have come to be known around the world as a land of plenty, but when I look at what is happening to the resource sector of this country and how this government has allowed these areas to be decimated, I realize that this will impact not just on our present generation of Canadians and our farmers, but also future generations of Canadians and the nation.

Let me give you a few examples. Fishing is a resource industry and on both coasts it is in difficulty. Stocks are depleted on the east coast by overfishing, plants are closing and people have been thrown out of work. On the west coast we lost the dispute requiring Canadian fish to be processed at Canadian plants and our fish farms are being sold to foreign interests.

Our lumber industry has been devastated by the Free Trade Agreement. In 1986, we had over one-third of the total U.S. market. Now we have about one-quarter.

Our oil industry is suffering its worst year in terms of oil wells drilled and completed. This is another resource sector.

The number of oil wells that were brought into production as of the end of September was approximately 1,200. Let us compare that to what has happened in the past. In 1983 that number was 2,606. In 1984 it was 3,900. In 1985 it was 4,723, four times as many as this year. In September, 1989, there were only 157 drilling rigs working in Canada, while 342 were sitting idle. There are only two rigs drilling in all of northern Canada, and none in the offshore. This is a major resource industry and the policies of the government have virtually shut down the oil industry in Canada.

My point is that these resource industries create much of the nation's new wealth and create the basic production from which the growth of our economy emanates and the spin-off from these new wells spreads to the manufacturing sector, the service sector and the total economy. I submit that the health of these resource sectors reflects through the rest of the economy and the whole nation will eventually suffer from the impact.

No nation such as Canada should ever allow itself to become dependent on others for food, particularly a great nation like Canada whose potential is tempered only by climate and distances to markets.

The original bill was designed—the original bill that we are debating here today and which has been in effect for so many years and served us so well—was designed to allow these farmers to store their crops and feed them into the market as the need arose. I want to use this as an example. Many tobacco farmers used this original bill and it worked very well. Normally in the tobacco industry the money was only needed for three or four months, from harvest time until the crop was sold at producer-run or auction exchanges.

When I look at the new bill, we have to check and see if there is an advantage to producers. I worked this through on a $30,000 loan to a tobacco farmer for four months. Using the new legislation, because the farmer will be charged interest, it works out that the farmer will have an advantage of about $45. That will not even cover his costs for paperwork and bookkeeping.

The minister was asking us a few moments ago if we as farmers would do our part to bring down the deficit. I have to submit that we are doing our part and I will bring that out in a few minutes.

Another area where this is going to hit extremely hard is where it will take cash out of the pockets of the farmer. Certainly as we look at the areas of environmental concern and stewardship of our soil, if a farmer is expected to do his part, why is this government so insistent on slashing our programs? I suggest the whole cost of environmental and soil management programs will fall on the farmer's shoulders as the margins of return on investment, management and labour are already pared to the bone.

I respectfully suggest this latest move will impact on our environment and soil conservation efforts because of the additional cost to the farmer of this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-36. This bill is another example of producer abandonment. I call on the minister to reinstate this bill to its previous form and intent or to withdraw it completely. This bill will force producers who are in a financial bind to sell their grain at harvest time in order to get cash to pay the production costs. We do not have to be financial wizards to know what happens to the price at market time when the farmers are forced to sell.

Let me give a few examples of what this program will mean to the producer in terms of stabilizing a price over the period the grain is in storage. I will use corn as an example. These are figures from the Ontario Corn Growers Association. In 1986–1987, the average increased value per tonne from storage was $4.54; in 1987–1988, that same advantage for storing that product and releasing it into the market at a later date was $36.30 per tonne, money that is sorely needed by the producers and this legislation has to be made available to them.

The government is making these cuts on the pretext of cutting expenditures when in fact it is biting the hand that feeds it. The total cost of this program is approximately $20 million to $25 million, maybe $27 million. Yet the government will take in about $995 million, almost $1 billion, in tax on alcoholic beverages. That is the increase in this year's budget.

Even more ludicrous is the fact that these fellows who take $1.8 billion in taxes from the tobacco industry are now withdrawing a program in this sector of the industry that costs the government $1 million. That is quite a return on the investment. The tobacco industry is contributing $1.8 billion and it is only costing the government $1 million. I think the government should reassess its position and withdraw this legislation.

How can this government be so callous? The projected taxes from the tobacco industry are as I just have stated. Add on alcoholic beverages of $995 million, plus an additional increase of $700 million in the sales tax on these items in this year's budget for a total of $3.5 billion from tobacco and alcohol alone and the total budget of the department is $2.35 billion in the coming year.

This reminds me of some of the earlier medical practices where a patient got sick and the early doctors of the day would bleed them a little bit. Of course, if they didn't get better, you bled them a little bit more. That is what the symptoms are here today. I should remind the government that quite often the patients died.

I submit that the discontinuation of these interest free loans and the dismantling of various other programs will mean the death of Canadian family farms because they are already being bled to death.

A few moments ago I spoke about some of the tactics of the Farm Credit Corporation on withholding reports and directives. Thousands of Canadian farmers and their families are in arrears with the FCC. This will further multiply the problem because they are counting on these interest free loans to tide them over.

Recently a constituent of mine received notice of order of sale just before he was to start harvesting his soybean and corn. At a time when he had a cash flow that was going to be available to him within a month or six weeks, this happened to him. I think that we should reassess what is happening with Farm Credit. It has become more of a collection agency than a lending agency.

I mentioned a moment ago that the amount of feed grade wheat is above normal. Consequently, the average price to the producer will be down dramatically. These interest free loans are needed and they are needed now, or else the number of farmers who will be foreclosed on will increase in the next few months.

It seems strange indeed that at the same time the government is cutting back on Canadian producers, the United States producers of soybeans in particular are already pressuring their government to bring in a similar program to stop the exploitation by the very large corporations and the speculators in the commodity exchanges.

In fact, if the Canadian program is being looked at as a subsidy by the U.S., has our government not challenged them on the Commodity Credit Corporation loans or the Export Enhancement Corporation loans? I wonder if the government got assurances from the U.S. that it will bring an immediate end to its export enhancement programs that drive down the price of international grains. The government is forging ahead with this legislation that will create additional hardship on our people.

I have a whole series of letters and requests from various producer organizations across Canada. One is dated October 2 from Prairie Pools Incorporated asking the government not to proceed with this bill. There is another one from a meeting held in Winnipeg yesterday. Several farm organizations asked the government to withdraw this legislation. There are representations from all across Canada on this particular piece of legislation by producers' organizations asking us to put a stop to this madness and to leave the legislation in place which has served us well over the years.

Therefore, I move:

That Bill C-36 be amended by removing all of the words after the word "That" and by substituting the following:

"this House declines to proceed with Bill C-36, An Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act because it opposes in principle, namely, the elimination of interest free loans to producer organizations and producers".

This motion is seconded by the Hon. Member for Algoma.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Chair has received the amendment and it will be taken under advisement as to its admissibility. I will return to the House later with a ruling on it.

• (1540)

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Madam Speaker, it is always a pleasure to stand in this House and debate the great issues of the day, but it is certainly not a pleasure to have to stand up in the House and discuss what is happening to agriculture as a result of the bill that is before us.

It seems that every time I stand here as the member for Prince Albert, I have another reason to remember my predecessor, the former member for Prince Albert, the late John George Diefenbaker. It was my predecessor who in 1957 saw the very obvious need for this kind of legislation and brought it in to great acclaim on the prairies. In fact, that measure was so popular that in the 1958 election, even people who were normally CCF voters supported the Chief because of what he was doing for prairie farmers.

I think it is a real shame that this government, made up of members of the late John George Diefenbaker's party, have turned its back on so many of the legacies that John left behind.

It is doubly unfortunate because it was prairie members and farm members of the Conservative party who got elected on the legacy of John Diefenbaker who in fact kept the Conservative party alive through its years in the wilderness. Now that it has become a government, suddenly it is quite fashionable to forget about the farmers who kept that party alive through the years.

There are a number of reasons why I oppose this bill, one of which certainly is that farmers do not need any more interest-bearing debts. I listened very carefully, or tried to, to what the minister was saying. There were three reasons that he gave, as I understood it, for introducing the bill at this time. One was that there is a real sense of urgency, that we need to get cash advances out into the hands of farmers. Certainly that is true. The crop is largely off in many parts of the country. Certainly it is off in our part of the country. People have been counting on that money, but have not not been able to get it. All of us from rural constituencies have had phone calls, letters and so on asking:"When will the cash advances will be available?".

However, that is no real cause for urgency at all because until this bill is passed, the old bill remains in effect. In fact, if the government had been so anxious to get money into the hands of farmers, it could very well have done it under the old legislation. That in fact is what many farmers across the country have asked the government to do. Therefore there is no urgency at all, other than that imposed by the government itself in passing this legislation at this time.

The second reason that the hon. minister gave, as I understood it, was the need to cope with the deficit. I want to ask the minister, is there not a real cost involved in continuing the cycle of increasing debt, farm foreclosure and rural depopulation? Surely there is a real cost involved in loss of infrastructure, loss of taxes and the cost of relocating all those people and providing goods and services to them in new places when they are forced off the farms into towns and cities across the country. There is a real cost involved in that. All too often those kinds of costs are not figured into this government's equation.

Third, surely when making decisions like this for financial reasons, there should be a careful measurement of the costs and benefits of such a move. The figures that the hon. member who spoke previously alluded to from the Ontario Corn Producers indicate clearly what a cost- effective program this has been.

For example, the figures produced by the Ontario Corn Producers show that in 1986, the value of this program to corn producers was $2,044,826, but at a cost to the treasury of only $1,175,976. It was even much more dramatic in 1987–88 when the Ontario Corn Producers realized a net benefit of $16,000,796 at a cost to the treasury of only $1,121,000. That is a ratio of $15 to $1. For every dollar invested by the government, there is a return to the farmers in net benefit of $15. Surely that is one of the best expenditures this government has ever made. At least I have not seen any better.

The last point with regard to the deficit is that there is a real contradiction involved in the approach of the minister when he says that it is absolutely essential that we save this $27 million and at the same time he brags about the fact that the government has spent $6 billion on agriculture over the last number of years. Surely this is not such a big percentage of $6 billion that it is absolutely critical to wipe it out in that kind of a context.

I think what really got to the point of this whole issue was when the minister indicated that introducing this bill and making farmers pay interest on the cash advances will permit farmers to make decisions based on business principles. That is a very short-sighted and narrow view of what business principles involve. To me, it shows a total lack of understanding of how the whole grain marketing and collection system in this country actually works.

Surely there are important business principles involved in things like orderly marketing. Surely there are business principles involved in being able to store grain and put it on to the market to counter the price cycles so that farmers can sell their grain or their produce when the prices are high rather than when the prices are low. Surely there is a cost to the whole system if that system that has been built up over the last 50 years is suddenly destroyed and we have no other system to take its place.

Let me explain in a little more detail how that works. The way the cash advance program works is that in effect farmers can sell their grain when they take it off. As soon as the crop is in the bin, they are able to get an interest free cash advance and they in effect have sold that grain at that point. That is very important because our grain handling system, at least in western Canada, can only absorb 40 per cent of the annual production of the prairies at any one time.

The whole system in western Canada can only absorb 40 per cent of the grain at any one time. It means that the grain has to cycle through that system two and a half times in the course of a year in order to move all the grain, and the same I understand is true in other parts of the country. That means it is in fact not possible for farmers to make decisions, as the minister would imply, solely on the basis of price because there is not enough capacity to do so.

Over the years we have introduced a very effective system that is the envy of farmers all over the world and that is a quota system which allows the Canadian Wheat Board, for example, or the Ontario Wheat Board to make sales in advance and know what kind of supplies it is getting and be able to call those supplies into the system at the time when it can be shipped.

There is no point, there is no benefit, there is no business advantage to all the grain that is produced in a year being dumped into the system all at once. It has to be sorted into train loads and into terminals and on to ships and so on. It makes a heck of a lot more business sense, as far as I am concerned, to call that grain forward at the time that it can move all the way through the system very quickly, through the local elevators, through the railway system, through the terminals and on to the boats.

Surely an efficient modern system is something we have had a lot of debate about in the House, or other members have, I being new here, debate about how we have to enhance the ability to move grain very quickly through the system in response to demand. This bill effectively undermines that capacity.

It would perhaps be a different situation if we were making moves to increase the handling capacity of the system, but we are not. Our whole emphasis in the last 15 years has been on moving it through quicker with reduced storage facilities. At the time when this legislation was originally introduced, the elevator system was able to handle about 50 per cent to 55 per cent of the grain at any one time. Now it is down to 40 per cent. That 40 per cent is being rapidly eroded by the whole process of elevator rationalization and rail line abandonment which certainly is another related issue.

The government, at the same time that it cut the cash advance program in the last budget, also cut all funds to the rail branch line rehabilitation program. In my own constituency of Prince Albert—Churchill River there are two lines, the Blaine Lake subdivision between Shellbrook and Blaine Lake, and the Paddockwood subdivision which serves the points of Henribourg and Paddockwood. Those are million bushel points. The elevator companies there are perfectly prepared to keep on handling grain up to the year 2000 or beyond because they are viable points. Everybody assumed that this government was going to stick to the commitments it made regularly, that that system which had been included in the year 2000 system would in fact be upgraded.

On these rail lines, the roadbeds were rebuilt, there was new ballast and there were new ties. All they lacked was heavy steel. But this government, by its budget moves, has made it impossible to get that heavy steel down so now there is a threat for those three-million bushel points to be abandoned in the next short period of time.

That kind of a situation is duplicated right across the prairies, which means that we will have even less than 40 per cent capacity in the system. That means that there is an even greater need to call grain forward in an orderly fashion to take advantage of the new rapid through-put kind of system that we are obviously developing.

The second point is that this really starts to open up wide cracks in the whole quota system that has been so successful in this country. We have been able to maintain the kind of marketing system, the Canadian Wheat Board, which I think everybody concedes has maximized benefits to producers far beyond what any other grain handling system in the world has been able to do. Certainly that is the opinion of the vast majority of farmers on the prairies.

That quota system will be very effectively undermined because when producers face the prospect of not being able to haul in all their grain or not being able to get interest free cash advances on their grain, they are going to put all kinds of pressure on to be able to haul that grain all at once. Why, because of lack of capacity in the system, should one farmer be able to haul his grain in September and pay his bills and the next one in December, the next one in March, the next one in June? It is not possible for everybody to do it at once, so there is going to be real pressure exerted from all kinds of grassroots farmers who need that money very badly to start to eliminate the quota system which has been at the foundation of our grain handling and transportation systems.

I guess what amazes me as well is the whole lack of consultation that is characteristic of this government's approach to agriculture. As I mentioned before, this party opposite was kept alive and nurtured through its bleaker years by the farmers of Canada. Farmers assumed that when this government came to office, certainly its policies toward agriculture would be undertaken with the widest possible consultation and that they would have friends in government. How often have we seen that that is not true? Once again that is not true, because, as the previous speaker mentioned, there have been representations from all over the country objecting very strongly to this legislation.

The Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board, certainly an important policy body on the prairies, wrote to the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds last July 13 offering him the unanimous resolution that the Advisory Committee to the Canadian Wheat Board recommend to the federal government that for the 1989-90 crop year the cash advance program be operated as it was in the 1988-89 crop year.

In passing that motion, the committee noted that it also wanted to give recognition to the fact that economic factors continue to create serious financial stress for many producers in western Canada. I can vouch for that being true. I have spoken to many farmers in my constituency and throughout northern Saskatchewan in the last several weeks and months.

Although the yield is not as bad as it was last year because there were better rains, though there was a period of drought and certainly the grains are just awful, there is a large quantity of feed wheat in the system, wheat that is worth only half of what people had expected to get. There is not only the outstanding debt from previous years, but that debt is not going to be dealt with at all in this coming year because of the very poor grades that so much of the wheat came in at.

The National Farmers Union wrote in mid August that a cash advance program is urgently needed for the 1989–90 crop year since farmers need cash flow now to pay their bills.

The prairie pools say that the changes will hurt orderly marketing and undermine the Canadian Wheat Board because it will be more difficult to manage deliveries.

Manitoba's Keystone Agriculture Producers noted a very special situation. It said that the elimination of the interest free provision under both acts would be particularly onerous for grains and oilseeds producers in Manitoba who are virtually obliged to ship their commodities through the port at Thunder Bay. Because that port is closed during the winter months, in contrast to Vancouver and Prince Rupert, many farmers in Manitoba sit all winter with little or no opportunity to market grain, resulting in turn in their having little income with which to pay their bills and support the economies of their local communities.

Certainly I would expect that there are a fair number of government members representing Manitoba farmers. I would hope that they had drawn this very directly to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds who, ironically, is himself a farmer in Manitoba and should know very well what the effect would be on Manitoba.

The letter that I found most interesting, however, dated August 2 and arrived by fax, is addressed to the Prime Minister of Canada and reads:

Dear Mr. Prime Minister,

At a national meeting held in Winnipeg this morning, 19 Canadian grain and oilseed producer organizations were unanimous in calling on your government to withdraw Bill C–36, and to re–institute the two previous acts, which provided for interest–free cash advances, for crops grown in Canada.

In our view, Bill C–36 will destroy the value of the Cash Advance Programs.

Your federal Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Mazankowski, has initiated a major review of agriculture policy in Canada, of which marketing is one aspect. We feel the Cash Advance Programs should be part of this review.

It is urgent to reinstate the 1988/89 Cash Advance Programs, and to allow the farm community with the federal minister, through the policy review process, to design the appropriate marketing systems to ensure equity in the system.

Yours truly,
Roy Cusitar
Meeting Chairman

The interesting thing about this letter is not so much what it says but who signed it. People who have followed the agriculture debate over the years know that there is in some respect a bit of a polarization within the farm community between those who favour the orderly marketing approach, the pooling kind of approach, and those who prefer a more of a free open market kind of approach to agriculture. That tension has been very clear in debates like that on the Crow rate and so on.

This particular letter is signed by groups like the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association, Western Barley Growers Association, Alberta Pulse Growers Association, Focus on Inputs, Prairie Canola Growers Council, Manitoba Canola Growers Association, Saskatchewan Canola Growers Association, Alberta Soft Wheat Grain Association, United Grain Growers, Flax Council of Canada, Atlantic Grains Council, Ontario Corn Producers Association, Manitoba Pulse Growers Association and Western Canada Pulse Growers Association.

What those who follow this debate closely will recognize immediately is that most of the signatures on this particular letter are from people who have historically supported an opening up of free market forces within agriculture. A good number of those groups in fact even supported the free trade initiatives, although there were groups that had misgivings, including the federations of agriculture, the pools and so on. The majority of signators to this particular letter were in favour of the free trade deal and thought it would be a good deal for agriculture. This is the government's very own friends that it is turning its back on.

I would also like to comment briefly on the effect on individual farmers. When a farmer puts in a crop, that is largely done with borrowed money. Today's input costs are so high that there is no way that the vast majority of farmers have the cash on hand in spring when the crop goes in to pay for those input costs, so that crop is put in on credit. What has traditionally happened is that when the crop came off in September, October or November, in the fall, the farmer was then able to take an interest free cash advance, pay those debts and thus be rid of the interest charges on those debts through the rest of the year and, in fact, could manage a cash flow so that the planning process for the next spring could begin again.

What this bill does, by imposing interest charges on those farmers, is in fact make this a very unattractive option for farmers. Certainly I can appreciate that perhaps there would be a slight interest rate saving of 1 per cent or 2 per cent.

• (1600)

But when you are talking of interest rates of 13 or 14 per cent, and with the grab and steal tax coming in, we could well be looking at interest rates in the neighbourhood of 20 per cent. With the added inflation that particular tax measure could very well induce, and with the policy of John Crowe to raise interest rates to compensate for every rise in inflation we could well be looking at interest rates in the 20 per cent range again within a year or two. So farmers are going to save 1 per cent or 2 per cent in interest, but they are just going to get killed by the interest rates. If there is one thing that farmers do not need it is more interest bearing debt.

I would also like to talk a little bit about what this represents in the larger context of farm policy. What is becoming very frustrating, not only to members on this side of the House but to farmers across this country, and I suspect even to some of the government's own backbenchers, is this government's unwillingness to come clean with its real agenda on agriculture.

Within the last very short period of time we have seen a number of measures taken by this government that to me point very much in the same direction. We saw oats being removed from the Canadian Wheat Board's jurisdiction. This was, of course, supposed to be a big bonanza for farmers. As a result, there were much lower sales of oats at much lower prices this year than there had been in the past few years. So the bonanza never materialized.

People were skeptical about that whole maneuver to begin with. Something like 70 to 80 per cent of farmers called on the government to change its decision, not to introduce that Order in Council to take oats out of the wheat board's jurisdiction, including many friends of the government who I met at meetings who stood up and made their views known very forcefully. But oats were removed from the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board. Certainly that led to the clear impression being left in the farm community that the Wheat Board was no longer the major instrument of government policies, if you will, the sacrosanct institution of Canadian agriculture that it had once been. Certainly, removing the cash advances is another blow to that whole system.

Second, there is the whole question of free trade. Although the government spelled out, it seemed very directly, that free trade was not going to be a hindrance to agriculture and certainly was not going to have any impact on orderly marketing, a lot of producers were very dubious about that assertion. I suspect those numbers include the former Minister of Agriculture, the former minister from Elgin who, it is widely rumored, in fact chose not to run again in the last election because of what he feared was going to happen to the orderly marketing system which he strongly believed in. I know he did. I lived in that part of the country in the early 1970s and knew the former minister to be a strong supporter of orderly marketing. I think he just did not want to see what was going to be happening.

It has been argued that some of the things that have happened since the Free Trade Agreement, for example, the ruling by GATT on the import regulations on ice cream and yoghurt and the American countervail on pork, are not the result of free trade, that those kinds of things would have happened anyway. In a narrow sense that is perhaps true. However, I remember very clearly the Premier of Saskatchewan, one of the most ardent apologists, in fact one of the most ardent cheerleaders for this government's agricultural policy, coming to our city of Prince Albert and saying very directly to farmers who were concerned about these things that certainly it is not going to undermine orderly marketing. And even if the jots and tittles, as the Minister of Trade refers to them, do not necessarily spell out in every detail how orderly marketing is going to be protected, it is going to create a climate of harmony, it is going to create a climate of goodwill between the United States and Canada where the type of harassment that we had seen an increasing amount of was not going to be visible any longer.

That has clearly turned out to be only so much hot air, frankly. The harassment has not only not decreased, it has actually picked up, as evidenced by the very destructive ruling from GATT launched by a New York dairy producer and the recent ruling on pork.

As well, we saw under free trade the loss of the two-price wheat system. We were told that was going to be compensated for, and nowhere do I find in the government's financial plans for the future that that particular promise is going to be kept either.

Later this week we will debate again the bill that we gave second reading to under closure, the plant breeders' rights bill, again another bill that opens up the whole industry of agriculture, the whole farm community, to increasing threat from large corporations and increasing corporate control of that sector.

Then I had the pleasure, I guess, of attending the press conference in my own city of Prince Albert when the Minister of Agriculture and the provincial ministers of agriculture announced their new policy on agriculture. There were a couple of very key words in there that certainly anybody who follows agriculture debates heard very clearly, namely, that the new look of agriculture was to be; one, market-driven; and two, self-reliant. It is very easy to find words that to the average Canadian sound as if they represent progress. Who is going to be against markets? Well I guess some people are, but certainly nobody is against self-reliance.

What that obviously has come to mean in the context of the government's other activities is that the historic foundation of agriculture in this country, the family farm, is something that this government is perfectly willing to abandon. Every action this government takes in the field of agriculture makes that more and more clear.

I think family farmers are starting to realize that they are being abandoned, that they are being left behind, that this government is doing whatever it can to hasten the corporate concentration in agriculture, to hasten the industrialization of the agriculture sector. What is really frustrating is that farmers always feel like they are fighting rearguard actions because the government is saying one thing, that, yes, the family farm is sacred, and, yes, it is doing what it can to assist and support the family farm, but all the actions run the other way.

It is becoming very frustrating and very tiring for family farmers to constantly fight these rearguard actions against the government that will not come clean on what its actual agenda is. I am sure there are a lot of members opposite, a lot of farm members in particular, who are starting to realize as well that what this government says is much different from what this government does.

In that regard I would like to offer some evidence that this frustration is not just something that comes out of what might be termed the left wing of the farm movement or out of the Official Opposition or the NDP. This whole frustration with the direction this government is taking in agriculture is shared every bit as much by its own members, its own grassroots members.

I would like to quote from The Western Producer, a paper with a circulation of approximately 130,000 a very important farm paper. My copy is a little bit worn by now because I have been showing it to all my colleagues from other parts of Canada, especially my urban colleagues because they often do not have the opportunity to know what is being said about government programs in the farm press.

I thought this article was very important because it was a report from the P.C. policy convention earlier this last August which was billed in the mainstream media as being very much a love-in; that there was very little dissent, that people were happy, they had vision for the future and they were going to ride the great economic boom well into the 21st century, that all kinds of good things were going to happen and all the delegates there were very pleased with everything they saw.

This headline, first of all, caught my eye. It said: "Rural PCs line up at convention to air their gripes". I went on to read:

> Conservative farm policies were attacked last week by rural delegates attending the Progressive Conservative national convention.
> They said despite official government optimism and self-congratulations, conditions are bad down on the farm. And government policy is driving rural voters away from Conservatives, they warned.
> There was scarcely a word of praise for past government performance or the new theology of market-oriented, subsidy-reduced farm policy being developed and promoted by agriculture minister Don Mazankowski.
> As Mazankowski sat in the audience listening, delegate after delegate came to the microphone to complain about the state of the farm economy.

They complained about prices, high interest rates, uncertainty caused by government policy and the inequities of the drought program.

Russell Lakusta, of Wandering River in northeastern Alberta, complained that he cannot afford to turn his grain farm over to his son.

"Farmers are in very poor shape", he said. "If we don't get federal help, lower interest rates and get to the point where farmers break even—" At that point, his voice broke and the sentence trailed off.

Later the longtime Conservative said he does not find the government particularly sympathetic to the farmer's plight, despite the record of subsidies.

"I still think the government is sorry for the $3 billion they gave us," he said in an interview. "I don't know why. I think if it hadn't been for Grant Devine's election, we wouldn't have gotten that either."

I might add that another billion dollars would be very welcome in the prairie economy but you can bet the last dollar of those billions that it will not buy Grant Devine another election.

Farmer Bill Cole, from Ninette, Man., was equally blunt.

He was angry about the loss of the interest-free advance payment program this year and the way the drought payment was handled. Payments were late, administration too cumbersome and in too many cases, farmers are being asked to pay back thousands of dollars already received in interim payments, he said in an interview.

On his own farm, Cole received a $7 an acre interim payment and then, instead of the additional payment he expected to cover his bills, he received a notice from Ottawa that he had been overpaid by 52 cents an acre. He has to pay it back.

I might add that the appeal process is in total chaos. The structure that has been set up puts all the burden on rural municipalities which in no way have the resources to deal with what is happening in that drought payment. Reeves and councillors are getting calls in the middle of the night, families are being divided because one brother will get a payment when he had a pretty good crop and the next brother gets nothing, is wiped out and driven out of business. It is causing all kinds of stress in the rural community.

• (1610)

In any event, getting back to the words of Cole, he said:

"That program was a disaster", said Cole, a member of the executive in grains minister Charlie Mayer's constituency organization.

This is one of the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds' own constituency executive members. He said:

"I told Charlie last week to his face, you have two chances for re-election: slim and none."

I think that is pretty blunt talk. I do not think you can put it any clearer than that.

Other delegates had other complaints.

A young Quebec farmer said the government should do more to help young people stay on the land.

An Ontario dairy farmer said reducing government regulation is not the answer.

A Prince Edward Island delegate warned that low prices and a lack of government action will send many family farms into the grasp of multinational, vertically-integrated food companies.

A southern Saskatchewan nurse said farmers are turning to alcohol, drugs and suicide because of poor conditions and a lack of government support.

I might stress again that this is not something dreamed up by wild-eyed New Democrats in some back room. This is a report from the debate at the Conservative convention. These are direct quotes.

Mr. Cardiff: Who wrote that?

Mr. Funk: The member opposite asks who wrote that. These are direct quotes from their own delegates and I hope he was there to hear those things said because I think that is very clearly the voice of the whole farm community speaking.

With that I would like to reiterate that the bill we have before us, the bill to charge interest on cash advance payments, is just one more example of this government's agriculture policies that are being rejected from from coast to coast as not only being unworkable but very likely to lead to the demise of agriculture in this country as we know it and to hasten the demise of the most valued institution in rural Canada, the family farm.

This government may think that, as some analysts at their convention said, it does not have to worry about the farm population any more because the Conservative Party has become the party of the upwardly mobile people in the suburbs. If you look at a map of Canada you can see how many constituencies there are that elect rural members in this country. It is not possible for this government to form a government again without rural members. This government may think that farmers cannot remember three years. Farmers can remember a lot longer than that and I hope that the government pays attention to what farmers are saying to them.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville (Mrs. Maheu)—POVERTY—Government Position—People living below the poverty line; the Hon. Member for Saskatoon—Dundurn (Mr. Fisher)—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—Proposed Amendments to Act—Impact of proposed amendments on Unemployed; the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan (Mr. Angus)—TRANSPORT—Subsidies to Via Rail—cuts to Via Rail—Environmental benefits of rail transit.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

ADVANCE PAYMENTS FOR CROPS ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Earlier this day the Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex presented what we call a reasoned amendment which, for people who are listening to us, might need some interpretation. That is an amendment that leaves out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and adds other words.

The Chair has looked at the amendment proposed by the hon. member and finds it out of order. As Beauchesne's 745(4) says:

> An amendment which amounts to no more than a direct negation of the principle of the bill——is out of order.

The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I would like through you to point something out to the previous speaker from Prince Albert. He spoke about the lack of support from this government toward farmers. I want to point out that the minister did say that we had supported government extensively and I want to point out—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Order. The hon. parliamentary secretary may want to participate in the debate at a later stage. Resuming debate, the Hon. Member for Algoma.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, it is interesting that the parliamentary secretary is so much on the defensive, as was the minister, on this bill. They know they have practically zero support. Even the most militant Tories in this country do not support the bill. It is interesting that some 19 principal farm organizations, commodity groups from across the country, met in Winnipeg yesterday and petitioned the Prime Minister by letter after that meeting demanding that the government withdraw this bill. I did the same thing a week or so ago and lo and behold, the Minister of Agriculture withdrew that bill, C-32. Unfortunately, Bill C-36 is no better than Bill C-32 as regards the interest free cash advances.

It is hard to imagine that the Tories are really bringing in this legislation. In 1984 they campaigned that they would double the farm cash advance program, and they did, they increased it from $15,000 to $30,000. We supported that move. But lo and behold, when the Budget came down this year they emasculated the benefits of the program because without the interest free portion to the farm cash advance program the program is almost useless. The value will be for somebody who has a crop worth $.5 million who might gain .5 per cent and utilize it because of the mass volume of the program or for someone who is absolutely destitute and cannot get credit any place else.

Farm organizations across this country uniformly are opposed to this program. We would like to spend some time talking about why they are opposed to it. Clearly, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the umbrella group for most Canadian farmers covering the wide spectrum of dairy producers, of fruit and vegetables producers, the pools, the UPA, the Atlantic farm groups, the Federation of Agriculture from Ontario and the Atlantic Federation of Agriculture all oppose this group. The National Farmers' Union opposes this legislation. As a matter of fact, the group that passed the resolution yesterday and petitioned the Prime Minister said this in a letter to him.

> At a national meeting held in Winnipeg this morning, 19 Canadian grain and oilseed producer organizations were unanimous in calling on your government to withdraw Bill C-36, and to re-institute the two previous acts, which provided for interest-free cash advances for crops grown in Canada.

It is interesting that they sum up that letter by saying:

> It is urgent to reinstate the 1988/89 Cash Advance Programs, and to allow the farm community with the federal minister, through the policy review process, to design the appropriate marketing systems to ensure competitiveness and equity.

It is signed by the representative, Roy Cusitar, of the United Grain Growers in Winnipeg.

• (1620)

It is supported by all these groups: the Ontario Soybean growers, la fédération des producteur de cultures commerciales du Québec, the Western Canadian Wheat Growers Association, the Western Barley Growers, the Alberta Pulse Growers Association, Focus on Inputs, Keystone Agricultural Producers, the Prairie Canola Growers Council, the Manitoba Canola Growers Association, the Saskatchewan Canola Growers Association, the Alberta Soft Wheat Grain Association, the United Grain Growers, the Flax Council of Canada, the Atlantic Grains Council, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, the Manitoba Pulse Growers and the Western Canadian Pulse Growers.

There is uniform support to oppose this legislation in every way possible and we just do not understand why the government is proceeding with it. It is just inconceivable to us that the government continues to push to have this legislation. It has been uniformly opposed. The Deputy Prime Minister talked about the enabling legislation that is needed.

All the Government of Canada has to do is obey the law. It is not obeying the law now. The law now says that they will make available to the Canadian Wheat Board and to other commodity groups funds with the interest looked after by the Government of Canada, and they are not doing that. What I am calling on the government to do is to withdraw the bill or just let it die on the Order Paper and to obey the law of Canada now which is to provide interest free cash advances.

The Deputy Prime Minister talked about farmers paying their fair share of the cuts that the government made in government programs. Farmers are making a tremendous contribution. The infamous budget which was brought down will increase taxes and cut services by $5 billion this year and $9 billion next year, and with the goods and services tax a $5.5 billion increase will be imposed the year after. Those are government figures. It may be $9 or $10 billion, but it certainly is going to be the $5.5 billion if the government implement that program.

In this program last spring the government has cut crop insurance by $200 million, grain and flour transportation by $60 million, rail branchline rehabilitation programs by $48 million, and grain and crop advance payment programs by $54 million. That is $27 million a year.

Most of these cuts mean a reduction in services or a reduction in programs to farmers but there is hardly any program, in my opinion, which has the multiplier effect of a grain and crop advance program. I would like to talk about that a little bit later.

Just to respond to the Deputy Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture saying, "farmers have got to take the blunt axe themselves" let us go on to the other things which they have cut. They have cut the dairy export program by $12 million, the commodity-based loan program by $15 million and the Canadian Dairy Commission by $10 million. So farmers, without being slaughtered on this one, have been slaughtered on a a host of other programs amounting to $400 million, and that does not even get into another $100 million which they are going to have to pay in input costs for the oil and gas excise tax and sales tax. So farmers certainly are taking their chunk of the government's chop.

As we look across the spectrum of Canadian agriculture which is going to be adversely affected by this legislation, we see those organizations which I have mentioned this afternoon such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the National Farmers Union, and the Canadian Wheat Board Advisory group. This is a farmer elected group across the prairies which advises the Canadian Wheat Board on this. The Canadian Wheat Board operates this program in western Canada. They have opposed it, as have the Saskatchewan Canola Growers Association, the Ontario Corn Producers Association, the Manitoba Corn Producers Association, and so on.

The Deputy Prime Minister this afternoon suggested that the program would have some value, or might continue to operate. That really is not the case because this program, at least in eastern Canada, is operated by farm groups like the Ontario Corn Producers Association. The Ontario Corn Producers Association tells me that at its board meeting just last week it was discussing how many farmers would take advantage of the program that the Deputy Prime Minister is talking about. The program in the past has provided benefits to about 1,200 corn producers. Their discussion was as to whether there would be 50 that would even bother taking the benefit, because by the time one pays the administration fee and the other charges, for people who have a very good credit rating there probably is no advantage at all under the program.

So, it is a very big question whether a lot of these associations which have operated the program and done yeoman's service in that regard would even bother. Various organizations have outlined how much harm this program will do. First, the costs are relatively minimal compared to the advantages. It is a relatively inexpensive program compared to many operated by the government, as the Deputy Prime Minister said, costing billions and billions of dollars. So this is a relatively inexpensive program in terms of providing for orderly marketing of Canadian farm commodities, and surely that is the primary goal of the program. It is not just the amount of interest support that is provided, it is the impact on the commodity; the price, the funding and support at a particular moment in time.

Without the program farmers who need the cash will tend to market their commodity as soon as the commodity is harvested. This program allowed them to shift the marketing from the months of October and November into the winter months and the spring months. That had a beneficial effect. It not only kept the price up during the fall months, but it tended to keep the price more stable in the spring months. It not only benefits the farmer but at the end of the day it benefits the consumer. It does not result in having tremendous troughs when there is a surplus of the commodity in the fall and a shortage in the spring. It tends to level that out.

In the prairies we will see, with this bill destroyed, that farmers will rush to make deliveries in the fall, over-taxing a grain-handling system that does not have as much capacity as it needs to operate without this program.

• (1630)

This program is not trade distorting. It does not increase production. It just provides for a much more orderly marketing arrangement. It does not stimulate production. The government, unilaterally, without the agreement of commodity groups—and certainly the dairy producers—last fall signed an accord at the GATT to not increase government support programs. They did some fast juggling in dairy by cutting out dairy support programs by some $20 million or $25 million and then raised the price of milk by 41 cents a hectolitre, which was less than what they had cut out in the budget.

Nowhere in that GATT accord of last April does this program provide for reducing the support programs. Yet this action by the government results in a reduction.

I guess the other concern we have as we look down through the range of government programs which were destroyed in the budget is that many of these programs which the government chopped out—some $500 million over the next couple of years in support to farmers—are programs that were listed in the free trade deal as being subsidies. The free trade deal also provides for negotiation over the next five to seven years of what is a subsidy, what is an acceptable subsidy that does not encounter countervail or dumping duties. When we look at the budget we see the government, one, two, three, four is removing subsidies while the Americans, who they have not even started to negotiate with in earnest, are not removing any of their subsidies. They are not removing their advance payments or load interest programs. Why are we doing it?

We seem to be doing everything unilaterally, hurting farmers and destroying our negotiating position with the Americans in the trade negotiations which will come up over the next few years.

I spoke earlier about the benefits of this program in terms of not having all your marketing take place at harvest time and spreading it out, having orderly marketing over a period of time. I was interested in what the Ontario Corn Producers have indicated as the cost benefits of the program in terms of the price of corn. What they have done is they have calculated the price of corn during the harvest season, October and November, and then compared it with the selling price of corn in the winter, spring and summer months.

It is very interesting to note that the cost benefit in one year, 1987–88 which is the last year for which they have marketing figures in terms of what it cost the government to run the Advance Payments Program and the benefit to the corn producers is something like 15 to 1. That is not bad. Even the parliamentary secretary, who is one of the great white bean growers and knows how to calculate how to make profits, would have to admit that a 15 to 1 cost benefit ratio is very good.

If you calculate what the interest on the advance payment program cost the government for the last year for which we have figures, 1987–88, you see it was $1.1 million. The increase in price during the winter, spring and summer months compared to what it was if everybody had marketed in October and November was $16 million, 15 times as much.

Surely even the Tories can calculate that that is good for the industry. It stabilizes it. You do not have massively low prices in October and November, and you do not have massively high prices in the spring because everybody marketed in the fall. If we look at just that one commodity, which is a big important group, although certainly not the whole of the Canadian agriculture scene, you see the tremendous benefits of this.

If you look across the range of commodities, whether you are talking about fruits and vegetables in B.C., Ontario, Quebec, or Atlantic Canada, or if you talk about soybeans, or about the prairie grain, you get a stability in the industry that is very desirable. If you maintain the price as well, it is certainly desirable.

I am suggesting to the government that it really should withdraw, withdraw, withdraw Bill C–36. It is wrong for a country. It is wrong for farm pricing. It is wrong for Canadian farmers, and wrong for agriculture.

I would like to move an amendment to the motion before us today, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton—Middlesex:

> That Bill C–36, an Act to amend the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. Hovdebo: Madam Speaker, I noticed the statistics show that 3,644 farmers in Ontario took advantage of the advance payments in 1987–88, and a large portion of those were soybean growers, tobacco growers and corn producers.

I would like to ask the hon. member what portion of these farmers who took advantage of it in 1987–88 he thinks would still find it a worth–while procedure, a worth–while program under the new bill? That is question number one.

I have a second question which is very close to it. The new bill allows $250,000 instead of the regular level of borrowing that was allowed. I wonder also how many of those 3,644 farmers who took advantage of this would have any reason to use more than the present level of expenditure.

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's question. He is a person who has taken tremendous interest in agriculture issues. He has worked widely on agriculture issues in the agriculture committee of the House of Commons.

I would suspect that the answer to his inquiry concerning tobacco growers, soybean growers and corn growers would be typical of the estimate that has been made by the board of Directors of the Ontario Corn Producers Association. They estimate that as low as 50 farmers, out of the 1,200 who have been using the program in the past, might use it in the future. I am not sure of the percentage, but you are getting down to something less than 5 per cent of the people who would use it in the future as it is reconstituted with the farmer paying the interest.

• (1640)

What the government is doing with this bill is destroying the program. They can huff and puff and talk about farmers having to bear the brunt of their cost–cutting exercise and all the rest of it, but if you think that the Ontario Corn Producers are going to run a program like this for 50 producers when in the past they have had something like 1,200 producers, I do not think they will. The administration costs and the overhead and everything grows disproportionately when you are dealing with a very small number of producers compared to a widely diverse group.

The second question is about the $250,000 limit. The current limit is $30,000, $60,000, $90,000 depending on the number of partners in the farming operation. In my opinion, the $250,000 limit is a pure smoke-screen. It is one of two things. As the hon. member will recall, the first bill C-32 was bungled and they were so embarrassed by it that they had to withdraw it because the loan guarantee in the bill did not cover the interest. They had to put up some kind of a smoke-screen to cover the embarrassment of it all and raised the limit to $250,000. In my opinion, that is why they did it.

In any event, very few if any farmers will use it. I think that the amount will never approach the previous limit which was something like 17 per cent in the west and 25 per cent in the east. In any event, it is probably designed to help a few really good Tory supporters who can benefit by the marginal gain they will get on interest. As far as the broad spectrum of the average farmer is concerned, it will benefit practically none, because you are only covering 50 per cent of the grain or the commodity in the bin. I do not know too many farmers who will have half a million dollars worth of grain or other commodity in the bin. In my opinion, it will help practically none.

Mr. Cardiff: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the member for Algoma if he is indicating to us that he prefers the level to remain at $30,000, $60,000 and $90,000. It would appear from his remarks that he is asking for that level to remain there. Is that what he is indicating?

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I was responding to the Member for Saskatoon—Humboldt as to the number who I thought would utilize it. In my opinion, there would not be many who would utilize it. What we are asking for—and I want to make this very clear—and what practically every major farm organization in this country is asking for is that the government leave the legislation that is in force now in place, obey the law and provide the money to these farm organizations.

The government should obey the law and give these farm organizations the funds that they are entitled to under the existing Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act and the Crop Advance Payments for Crops Act. That is what I am asking the parliamentary secretary and the government to do. I think if they pay attention to the 19 farm organizations which petitioned the Prime Minister yesterday after the meeting in Winnipeg, that is what they will do.

Mr. Ferguson: Madam Speaker, I want to ask my colleague a questioon. I have just received a communication that CIL Agriculture Lambton Works at Cartwright, Ontario, is laying off 150 employees throughout their organization. Will this bill, if it passes in the present form before this House, have a further impact on the farm economy that is reflected here in these lay-offs or are these lay-offs as a direct result of the free trade agreement?

Mr. Foster: Madam Speaker, I would have to defer to the Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex as I do not know the details of that particular lay-off.

I certainly do know, as the corn producers have demonstrated in the data which they have provided to the parliamentary secretary and to all the rural members in the House, that the benefits of this program go far beyond the cost to the government. You talk about the price of corn being increased 15 times what the program costs to the government. It provides a stable arrangement for marketing. It provides cash flow at the time the profit is taken off.

Clearly this bill will have a very adverse effect on this industry, which the Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex has spoken of, but as well for farmers throughout the country. A very small amount of money brings massive benefits to producers all over the country. I think especially of those who have No. 3 and No. 4 wheat in western Canada due to the wet harvest period in some areas. Many of them will not be able to deliver that grain to the elevator because there is so much abundance of it, at least initially.

They will not be able to get a cash advance because there are tests undertaken as to their financial viability before they will be able to get a loan under this program. In any event, they do not get anything because they are going to be paying the interest and the government is withdrawing its support for those producers who are already hard-pressed with a poor grade of crop.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, one of the principles of the constitution of our country is that there is an accountability to Parliament in that the government is responsible to the House of Commons. Here we are discussing a government bill and out of 38 ministers of the Crown there is not a single one in this House. I object to that. I submit that this is a contempt of Parliament. There should be at least one of the 38 ministers here listening to this important debate on a public bill.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I do realize the hon. member wanted to make a point which he has made. He also knows very well that it is the way of this House that no one mentions the absence or presence of any particular ministers or members who may be attending. The hon. member has made his point. He also knows what we normally do in this House.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Madam Speaker, it is nice to see you in the chair doing your usual competent, no, I would say, sterling job. I am delighted to take part in this afternoon's debate in the House of Commons. I would like to take note of the Minister of Energy, the senior minister of the government from my province. I hope he stays around for this afternoon's debate. You never know, he might even learn something. But I will not hold my breath.

My riding of Winnipeg—St. James is almost 100 per cent urban. Although I do have a few farms, and probably could count them on one hand, I can say I am concerned about Manitoba farmers and all Canadian farmers. I am proud to say that I was born and raised on a farm near that grand community of Glenboro, Manitoba which is probably a little more than 100 miles west of the minister's home community of Steinbach. That community is more famous for cars.

I am concerned about the future of Canadian farms. I certainly do not want to see them disappear. In my opinion farmers are still the backbone of this country and the backbone of our economy. After all, a nation that cannot feed itself certainly cannot survive for very long.

• (1650)

Today we will talk about this system of cash advances made to farmers, that is cash payments advanced against grains stored on the farm. As a number of speakers have already pointed out, this system has been in place for 30 years.

You can ask almost any farmer anywhere in this country and that farmer will say that the system of cash payments has been an unqualified success. Suddenly—I would say precipitously earlier this year—this program was suspended by the government. Of course, under this particular bill, Bill C-32, the government is bringing back the cash payments without a very, very important and vital feature. That feature is the interest free portion of the program.

Of course, this has left farmers puzzled and in limbo ever since this was first announced in the budget of last spring. Why this bolt out of the blue? I think that is what farmers are asking. Farmers certainly were not asking the government to put an end to this interest free portion of advance payments. They were not asking for it. The government went ahead anyway, apparently without any consultation, or with little consultation, which surprises a lot of people.

The Deputy Prime Minister comes from the province of Alberta. I understand that he represents, largely, a rural area with all kinds of farmers. He is the Minister of Agriculture. Yet he has done this. I would say that he certainly has been the point man in this particular exercise. I think farmers across the country have not only been surprised but stunned. In a way it has been carried out in a rather arrogant way.

I knew that I was going to be speaking on this bill today so I deliberately sought out a farmer friend of mine who happens to live in my riding but whose farm is actually about 100 miles outside of my riding. It is about 100 miles west of Winnipeg. The conversation I had with my friend I found rather revealing. My farmer friend made it absolutely clear at the beginning of the conversation that he—and I am sure that he is not an unusual farmer in this respect—is not looking for any assistance or handouts. He does not want to be on the dole in any way. He is very curious about what the government has been doing because he really cannot seem to get a handle on what the government is really doing.

Is this exercise part of some larger scheme, dropping the interest free portion of the program? Is this part of some new philosophy? Is it a by-product of the free trade agreement? After all, we know terms like harmonization, level playing field and subsidy negotiations. This is a subsidy. Lo and behold, the government eliminates this kind of subsidy or any other kind of subsidy is negotiated.

This government is very curious. It seems to sort of throw the game away before it even starts. As my farmer friend asked, if it is not part of a larger package, if it is not part of some new kind of philosophy, is it nothing more than just another austerity measure? If that is the answer, why pick on farmers for this particular kind of saving? If this government is really anxious about saving some money, and if it really wants to eliminate waste, why pick on the farmer? Why strip down this particular program that has been so useful, so efficacious, something that has helped the farmers for three decades in this country? Why pick on this program?

If the government wants to save money and if it wants to eliminate waste, I have all kinds of suggestions. Earlier this afternoon we heard the Minister of National Revenue talk about the possible hiring of 4,000 tax collectors to collect the GST, if it is implemented.

An Hon. Member: Shame.

An Hon. Member: Tax cops.

Mr. Harvard: Tax cops, that is the term, tax cops—tax policemen. That measure alone would cost Canadian taxpayers what, $200 million?

An Hon. Member: Easily.

Mr. Harvard: Easily, and perhaps more. Now, that is just one example. There are all kinds more.

How much money did the government, which is supposedly interested in saving money, spend on promoting that ill-conceived budget of last spring? The last time I saw the figure, it was about $2.7 million. Why pick on the farmer? Why spend all this money on the budget if you are that interested in saving money?

It has already spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in advertising the GST, something which has not been formally debated in this House of Commons. No money has been authorized, none whatsoever, by we parliamentarians.

Earlier this spring we heard about lavish spending in some of the ministers' offices. Just today I learned they were planning to spend over a half a million dollars on what is called an electronic information board at the VIA Rail station in Montreal. Now they are going to have to cancel that because of the cuts to VIA Rail and it is going to cost Canadians about $233,000—$233,000 for something they will never get, something they will never see.

That is the kind of government we have. Yet it is going to go after the Canadian farmer, the backbone of this country, to save what, $27 million? They are strange priorities that this government has.

Let us take a look at the specific proposal. The specific proposal would put an end to interest free advance payments. It has already been noted in the House that 19 producer organizations met yesterday in Winnipeg and appealed to the Prime Minister of the country not to go ahead with the bill. Is the government listening? I do not think so. Let us consider what just one or two of those organizations have said about the interest free portion of advance payments. They have put forward a case, in my opinion, that is blunt, succinct and worth listening to.

I want to read into the parliamentary record if I may, what the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has said about this. I quote:

> The interest free portion of the Advance Payments for Crops Act and the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act are of vital importance to Canadian farmers. Making interest payable on cash advances will increase costs to farmers, and that combined with the increase in administration costs on the part of the government will make cash advances as costly as regular loans from financial institutions.

I am not saying this, nor is any other partisan Liberal in this House. This is what the Canadian Federation of Agriculture is saying. Its statement goes on:

> The amended programs would provide no advantage to producers, in fact their usefulness would be severely limited.

That is pretty precise language. There is no way that you can misunderstand this statement. The statement from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture goes on to say:

> The interest-free portion in both acts encourages orderly marketing. The Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act provides needed cash flow to producers during times of surplus stocks and tight quotas. It permits the Canadian Wheat Board the leverage to time sales to the benefit of the farmers. The advance payments—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I am sure the hon. member will want to continue the next time the bill is being studied.

It being 5 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

THE ENVIRONMENT

ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT ASSESSMENT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation to fully protect the Canadian environment through the institution of mandatory environmental impact assessment procedures which would allow for assessments, prior to the construction of installations, public or private, of projects which may prove to be potentially damaging to the environment.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is with a bit of a sense of deja vu that I rise today in the House of Commons to bring forth Motion 485.

Motion 485 is really the motion form of a bill I brought in over 10 years ago in 1979. Curiously enough, Madam Speaker, you have given this bill the title of 485. The bill title back 10 years ago was Bill 458. We have stuck with the same numbers and I hope that we will stick with the same principle of the bill as we move it from the motion and hopefully then into legislative form.

The motion states:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation to fully protect the Canadian environment through the institution of mandatory environmental impact assessment procedures which would allow for assessments, prior to the construction of installations, public or private, of projects which may prove to be potentially damaging to the environment.

Time is required for any new idea. I recall back in the British Columbia legislature in 1966 I brought forth an idea on the environment that related to the establishment of green belts around cities. I recall it was seen as a little bit revolutionary at that time, and I had to keep pounding on it year after year after year.

Well, six years later the first green belt legislation in Canada in the same form that I presented the private member's bill was introduced. I am most pleased to see the same kind of thing happening here in Canada today. Certainly, patience is rewarded when substance develops from it.

To start to talk about this motion I think that we need to talk first a little about the philosophy—the reason for—and I think that I was reminded about the reason for on a recent trip to Asia from which I just returned. I thought as I looked at the development in the newly developed countries that the development community of those newly industrialized countries could of living, the quantity of life, at least.

I wondered as I looked at the development of these newly industrialized countries how much had been really achieved when one can't drink the water, breath the air, or find a healthy patch of green among the intense density of black and grey of pavement and concrete and among the shiny glitter of new glass and steel jungles.

The newly industrialized countries have both gained and lost as they have developed in the rapid sense of the last few years. It seems they have developed without an adequate sustainable development ethic. A quality of life rather than a quantity of life will next become an ethic that they, too, will embrace as our society has .I wonder if they will be able to afford the redevelopment costs required to meet the demand for the quality, sustainable development lifestyle necessary to ensure the survival of our global environment.

We must, in fact, develop a value that thinks of before-the-fact prevention, that accesses the environmental impact of development before the development occurs rather than after the damage begins. We must add to the rhetoric of sustainable development a practical alternative. That is the purpose of the motion before us today.

I was pleased to receive a letter from the Minister of the Environment which stated: "I am familiar with the bill that you sponsored in 1979 because it was the first initiative that would have made it statutory requirement to conduct an environmental assessment of all proposals falling within the area of federal responsibility. Although we may differ in some details, the essence of my views on EARP reform is very similar to the concepts that you have long proposed.

I am planning comprehensive legislation to reform the federal EARP. The central features of the reformed process will include the integration of environmental and economic matters in all federal projects, programs, and policies; mandatory environmental assessments for all activities, both public and private, within the decision-making authority of federal institutions; more systematic checks and balances within the process to ensure that all proposals falling under federal authority would be properly assessed; better public consultation on government initiatives so that citizens will have a fair opportunity to respond to activities that could adversely affect their environment; and the streamlining of procedures to avoid costly and often confusing duplication".

I was extremely pleased with those words from the Minister, and with this House I wait in anticipation for the results of that legislation.

I have left the motion before us today particularly open in order that members of the House would have the opportunity, in our discussions of this motion to, as the minister said, differ on some details. Yet when it comes to the vote on the motion, we could agree in principle and all may with full and clear conscience vote in favour of this motion thereby truly stating the intent of the House of Commons for compulsory environmental impact assessment for Canada and that it should be brought into law.

Since the government has already agreed to present legislation, this debate has a special purpose because it can give before-the-fact of legislation the government an opportunity to absorb the ideas of the House of Commons. In fact, that is what environmental assessment impact before-the-fact is all about; that we should consider it in advance and then proceed to the development.

In this case, I am calling for before-the-fact discussion of environmental impact assessment legislation that the government itself might examine the debates and choose from the ideas of the members of the House of Commons in fulfilling their own mandate for an improved version of a bill that they might well be drafting at this moment.

Therefore, I think it would be important in my motion to mention some of the details that may perhaps not be mentioned in the bill itself. Naturally, the motion before the House of Commons refers to matters within the jurisdiction of the House of Commons and that is defined in the bill. In the motion it does not say exactly "the federal government jurisdiction". But I think that we should take it to mean that because, in fact, how can we do more than deal within federal jurisdiction.

If we want a further reference to that, my Bill C-458, presented in 1949, states that intention very clearly. On page 3 of the original Bill C-458, it defines specifically what is the jurisdiction. It states that the jurisdiction applies to undertakings carried out by or on behalf of the Government of Canada, by or on behalf of any Crown corporation, by or on behalf of any Crown agency, by any person when the undertaking is supported by whole or in part through contracts, grants, subsidies, loans, or other form of assistance from the Government of Canada, by any person when the undertaking has been approved in principle for which funding has been approved before this Act is proclaimed in force but where no construction has begun, and within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

While the motion may not specifically define it, one of my purposes today is to give that definition, at least as I understand it in relationship to my bill, and that is referring, of course, to federal authority.

Section 3.(1)(a) of the bill further outlines what should be included in an impact assessment and concludes that such an assessment should include a summary that could be understood by the ordinary, reasonable person for public notice and for hearings as well as time limits for decision.

I believe that all of these factors would be important because if there is going to be a public hearing process, certainly any environmental impact assessment will have to be readily understood by a reasonable man, and in the hearings we would like to see time limits for a decision because too many times we have legislation that is created in the environmental field that seems to be designed more to throw sand in the gears then to accomplish a very direct purpose.

Therefore, any legislation, if brought in, should have those kinds of time lines. Of course, it will require compliance and compliance means that a fine that is appropriate to ensure that compliance should be included as well.

How can I say it is now time for such compulsory environmental impact assessment? One only has to look to the government's own view. In the Speech from the Throne in April the government made the concept of sustainable development one of its commitments.

Another example is the new direction in thinking signalled by the Prime Minister's decision to establish a new committee of cabinet, chaired by my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, the purpose of which is to put environmental concerns at the heart of government activity and all government decision.

Of course, this government has taken other action. The accelerated attack on air pollution by further restricting vehicle emissions is notable. The Montreal Protocol aimed at reducing ozone and depleting CFCs is another. The reduction of sulphuric acid rain causing emissions produced here in Canada is another positive step. But all of these things have one thing in common. They are designed to be corrective. They are designed to correct mistakes that perhaps would not have been made if in the development process we had considered in advance the environmental impact. It would have been much cheaper and much safer. Our environment would not be experiencing the damage we are experiencing today if it had been before-the-fact as this now suggests.

There is no doubt that the Canadian people want action on the environment. They want sustainable development, but what does sustainable development mean except a series of rhetoric and words unless we put the legislation behind it to give it meaning and substance and impact.

I feel the fact that this motion calling for this impact assessment is a motion coming out of a Private Members' Bill can be quite a tribute to the House of Commons. If a Member of Parliament, a private member, can bring forth a substantial idea and over time the government can take that idea and expand it into its own, it makes Parliament itself a very worth-while place to be and to participate in.

I will have an opportunity to speak about this again in closing the debate. I have spoken about it for over 10 years in this House of Commons. I congratulate the government for its intention. I look forward to the legislation. I look forward to the support of all Members of the House of Commons to state clearly to the people of Canada, through their vote in favour of this motion, that we will support the principle of compulsory environmental impact assessment for Canada through legislation.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to congratulate the speaker for bringing forward a bill which should be a hallmark of all government environmental legislation. The member has, in his work on the environment committee, as well as his specific work with the Western Canada Wilderness Committee in relation to Carmanah, shown himself to rise above the petty fray of partisan politics in dealing with this issue. It is something that Canadians appreciate, and I know his constituents appreciate it as well.

It is particularly appropriate that this private Members' initiative comes out on a day when there is a revolt in the ranks of the government as it relates to potential environmental issues , namely, the revolt about VIA Rail. The government's cut-back attempt has been back-tracked. A member is shaking his head on the other side, not the member who introduced the motion, but another member saying where is the connection. I think that is the very point of the private members' bill we are discussing now. That is, to every action there is a reaction. It has reached that point. This was recently underlined in a survey published by Southam News in considering Canadians' violent reaction to our government's lack of action in the area of the environment.

VIA Rail is one area where government policy will have a direct negative impact on the environment. Train travel is the most pollution free on a per capita basis and the most effective mode of moving from point A to point B. I found it particularly shocking to learn last night, as we did in the environment committee, that there has been no environmental involvement in the decision to cut VIA Rail. The motion put forward today was actually introduced in a prescient fashion by the member on May 31, 1989. The motion states:

> That in the opinion of this House the government should consider introducing legislation to fully protect the Canadian environment through institution of mandatory environmental impact assessment procedures which would allow for assessments, prior to the construction of installations, public or private, of projects which may be potentially damaging to the environment.

That particular motion speaks of the need to review all government policies. I only have to refer back to the words of the Prime Minister himself during the election campaign when he said in a commitment to the people of Canada that every decision of this government would involve an economic analysis and an environmental analysis. He said, for anyone who cares to read his words during the election campaign, that the importance of environmental assessment would be equal to that of economic assessment. Here is the first time his train has been derailed on the VIA Rail question.

Here we have a situation where clearly there are economic considerations which have been expanded upon ad nauseam in the House of Commons. One might argue that the Minister of Transport does not blink an eye at spending millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money on an ongoing basis to subsidize air travel. That is a commonly accepted practice perhaps in part because most Members of Parliament tend to travel by air and we like to get out of clogged airports.

The same economic arguments that the minister is using to kill VIA Rail have not been balanced off by the kind of environmental arguments that should follow any kind of environmental assessment. In the particular motion we are discussing here, it would necessitate a full federal environmental impact assessment before a travesty like the Rafferty–Alameda dam, before a potential movement in the area of parks construction such as Sunshine, before the Old Man Dam, and before the eight pulp and paper mills that are being proposed for northern Alberta.

As I read the motion of the hon. member, it would permit assessments of private and public projects which may prove potentially damaging to the environment, so I am assuming he would include Carmanah. Even though the timber rights in Carmanah are of specific provincial jurisdiction there is a national interest involved. I visited it myself with my daughter and walked into the valley and had a wonderful experience. I saw more of British Columbia and more of our Canada in nine days than I had seen in a lifetime. Having gone into Carmanah, having seen the valley and understanding the topography, I could not believe that the decision on whether or not to log the hillsides of Carmanah was going to be made on the basis of a study that was conducted by the company.

• (1720)

Canadians want companies and governments to take a step back and be prepared to subject projects to the most rigorous independent examination. In a similar fashion—

[Translation]

Similarly, if we look at Phase II of the James Bay Project, Hydro–Quebec should have done an environmental impact analysis to see whether there had been any environmental problems during Phase I. However, we may be sure that if the onus is on the company to do the study, it will not be done objectively, so that Canadians can trust the results of the study, and this also applies to the Carmanah study being done by MacMillan–Bloedel. Canadians won't trust a study by Hydro–Quebec on the impact of James Bay on the environment. Why didn't the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Bouchard) have the courage to say: I'm the Minister of the Environment and I'm going to ask for an objective analysis, in addition to the one by Hydro–Quebec, an analysis that will not involve anyone with a vested interest in Phase II. The way the Minister reacts to these challenges —What does he do? He says: It is up to the company to decide. It is up to the Minister of Transport to decide whether he wants to do an environmental impact analysis with respect to VIA Rail.

[English]

That is one of the reasons why this particular motion is really necessary for the government to proceed to restore the confidence of the people in our leadership, and to restore the confidence of the people in particular in environmental questions.

I actually sat at the table, when I was travelling through British Columbia, with some people in the forestry industry who told me the reason that the Japanese are so effective at utilizing all their resources is that they are very disciplined and are prepared to recycle while Canadians are not.

That was stated to me by somebody who was responding to my suggestion as to why we are not seeing companies get into the recycled paper business in a much greater fashion. It is because Canadians want that type of product to be available. His response was, "Well, we are not disciplined. We will not recycle." I beg to differ with him.

Canadians are far ahead of the politicians on these matters. What they do want is independent environmental assessments. They want the government to have the tools to step in where a private project clashes with the public interest. They want to make sure that the environmental assessments being conducted are not being carried out by people who have their own partisan economic interest at heart, but rather carried out by somebody who can step away from a moment and look upon them in an entirely objective fashion.

That could be achieved by adopting this particular motion. What we should be doing as a House is wholeheartedly supporting this motion and giving the member every support that we can to ensure that it gets the full support on all sides of the House in order that we can move.

I would suggest that there is a first area where we could utilize this motion, with possibly some amendments. I know under the current private members' discussion that might not be allowed. But if we had a proper reference to committee, and we moved into committee immediately, we could be dealing with some amendments, so that we could deal not only with construction of installations, public and private projects, but also with destruction of installations, public and private projects. In that way we could also capture the essence of the VIA Rail question in this particular motion.

I congratulate the member for bringing it forward. I congratulate his colleagues who jumped ship, or derailed the government's initiative on VIA Rail by agreeing to have public hearings, because I think you are going to see the environmental aspects of the VIA Rail question explored in much greater detail in the pubic hearing mechanism which is now being allowed by the majority vote of the Transport Committee.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I would like to join with my colleague from the Liberal Party in supporting this motion. I would like to support this motion, but I would like to point out to the House that it does nothing really to advance the debate, the big debate in Canada, that is about environmental protection and sustainable development.

I would also like to remind the House that the member for Fraser Valley West, the mover of this motion, has been a member of Parliament for many years and has been a member of this government since it took office in 1984.

People are increasingly frustrated with the combination of nice talk and no action from this government. So, as I said earlier, while I support the motion, I do so with some degree of cynicism. It is my hope that this motion is not just another example of empty words being piled on empty words. In the crisis which confronts us we need far more than words. We need action. I pose the question: what is worse than nice words and no action? Let me answer that. It is nice words and wrong action, which we are seeing increasingly from this government.

The Minister of the Environment promised that there would be environmental assessment on all megaprojects. Where does the Rafferty–Alameda project fit in with that? It is incumbent upon this government to reaffirm its commitment to that process or to come up with a new one. I listened to the member for Fraser Valley West reading in the letter from the Minister of the Environment that there was a process coming. Well we look forward to that, because so far we are getting a lot of words and no action.

A beginning to this whole debate about what constitutes a megaproject should be the definition of a megaproject. The record shows that at present the application of EARP is very limited. Any financial, military, agricultural or forestry decision should be subject to environmental assessment. The GST, for example, should be considered a megaproject and subject to environmental assessment. As it stands, it is environmentally unfriendly. Bicycles are taxed at the same rate as cars. Gasoline and fuel are taxed at the same rate as solar cells. So when we talk about sustainable development, environmental assessment and megaprojects, we have to think about more than just dams and oil wells. We have to think of the big things like the tax system.

In the House yesterday my colleague from Skeena in a question to the Minister of the Environment managed to extract from the minister the admission and I quote "that on budgeting, in particular does not fit in at all with the already existing mechanisms". I put to the House that we have to rethink what is meant by the word "megaproject".

My colleague from the Liberal Party also pointed out the kind of contradictions that are implicit with the decisions made by this government around VIA. The dismantling of passenger rail service in this country is a major problem. I give you an example. There is a lobby pushing right now for a $17 billion overhaul of the Trans-Canada Highway.

• (1730)

Airlines are asking for deregulation, and VIA is being shunted out. Rail transportation, as has been demonstrated in Europe, is the most environmentally appropriate means of moving big quantities of people. We have to take all the environmental costs into account. When we are talking about subsidies and the government's linear thinking on what constitutes a subsidy, we have to consider what are the real environmental costs of the dismantling of VIA Rail.

In order to advance the debate, I would like to put to the House an idea put to me by my colleague from Prince George—Bulkley Valley. It is the idea of an environmental gazette. I know the government now has many documents such as those which are let for contracts so that businesses may see what was coming up and have an opportunity to bid.

The same goes for regulatory reform, with a document produced by the government so that people who are interested in such things can see what is planned by the government and to assess how they can take part.

An environmental gazette follows on from that idea. It puts it back into the public process so that people can understand all federal projects or provincial projects and, as the motion states, even private projects which have to be assessed. They would be in this gazette and the project, with a rating of what the problems or lack of problems might be, would be assessed for the public record.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I would like to put that forth in an honest attempt to try to advance the debate. As I said, I and my party support the motion, but we feel increasingly frustrated that there is lack of action in this area.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, I must admit that I did not expect this debate to be about VIA Rail. I think VIA Rail is taking up a lot of time in the House and I also think we should focus more on the motion itself and on considerations that are more pertinent to the motion presented today by the Hon. Member for Fraser Valley-West (Mr. Wenman).

I would like to start by congratulating the Hon. Member on a motion that is in the national interest, and of course the environment is a priority for Canadians and this Government. However, I must inform the Hon. Member that quite honestly, I have some reservations about his motion because although it is practically a motherhood issue, the motion does give rise to several problems and I am sure the Hon. Member will agree.

First of all, I suppose it helps to represent a region like Abitibi—Témiscamingue or Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean or the Gaspé to realize what a severe impact reckless industrial development during the past decades has had on those regions. A short visit to Abitibi—Témiscamingue is enough to see to what extent industrial development has affected our environment. Thousands of lakes are contaminated, the air we breath is polluted, the ground we walk on is contaminated, all as a result of 50 years of uncontrolled industrial development. In a region like mine that is entirely dependent on our sawmills and our mining industry, I hardly need to describe what our ecology is like today, and that is why a motion like the one before the House is certainly a step in the right direction.

In 1987, we had the Brundtland Report which introduced the concept of sustainable development, broadly endorsed by Canada and our Government.

The Hon. Member's motion is certainly in line with this goal of providing for sustainable development.

The motion before the House today reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider introducing legislation to fully protect the Canadian environment through the institution of mandatory environmental impact assessment procedures which would allow for assessments, prior to the construction of installations, public or private, of projects which may prove to be potentially damaging to the environment.

Madam Speaker, this is an important motion which deserves consideration.

As for setting up an assessment process, we know the Government will shortly be tabling legislation to strengthen the present assessment process which has become obsolete. The forthcoming legislation is the result of wide-ranging consultations that took place in this country between November 1987 and March 1988, during which the Government consulted with the provinces, the territories and numerous experts.

We can therefore expect the new legislation on the assessment process to ensure consideration of environmental impact phenomena when building public or private infrastructures.

Madam Speaker, several provinces, including the province of Quebec, have already passed similar legislation. The Quebec legislation on the environmental assessment process goes back to 1972 and was amended in 1978. Changes were made in the housekeeping provisions for preparing and reviewing impact studies where the Government is involved in issuing permits for projects that are subject to the new process.

Provision has been made for the public to be able to express its concerns to the Department of the Environment with respect to these projects.

The process must be administered in accordance with regulations established by the Government. The latter may exempt a project and issue a permit in order to repair or prevent damage caused by a real or apprehended disaster.

Under this legislation, environment means water, air and land or any combination of one or the other or, generally speaking, the interacting natural systems, including living organisms. But Quebec went quite a bit further, because the regulations on environmental impact assessment and review broaden this definition to include fauna, flora, human communities, cultural, archeological and historical heritage, agricultural resources and the use made of the surrounding resources.

Under the law, the Deputy Minister of the Environment or the Government may issue the authorization certificate.

The technical services of the Quebec Department of the Environment check to see whether the project will be authorized by the Deputy Minister or subject to the environmental assessment and review process. In the latter case, they prepare a guideline for the impact study to be carried out, in consultation with the developer and the other departments concerned.

Later, they have the Environment Department review the impact study and make recommendations concerning the environmental acceptability of the project and the appropriate control and follow-up. Once all that is done, they supervise the implementation of the conditions contained in the decree or authorization certificate.

The Environmental Public Hearings Board is responsible for helping the public review the application. It holds public hearings on the project at the Environment Minister's request and writes a report on the public's concerns for the Minister.

Every citizen is entitled to a healthy environment and to environmental protection, and in accordance with the amendments made to the Act in 1978, may take legal action against a developer if the law is not obeyed.

So I think that the Quebec law might assist the federal Government with the legislation it is preparing to present on the assessment process.

• (1740)

I was just saying that I had reservations about the Member's motion as regards legislation on private installations. I think that the Hon. Member will agree with me that legislating on private installations is impossible without federal-provincial agreements, because private installations often fall under provincial or municipal jurisdiction and federal-provincial coordination would be required in order to legislate.

Our Government is not a dictatorship and we do not impose our views on all the provinces. We will therefore have to cooperate with them in order to come up with satisfactory legislation.

The Hon. Member in his speech referred to the Government's environmental achievements. I think that since 1984, we have made great strides in terms of the environment. I was just saying that because we have inherited 50 years of uncontrolled industrial development, we face a big challenge today.

One of our Government's major achievements was to pass an environment bill last summer which provides very heavy penalties and fines for those in the private sector who continue to pollute our environment.

I think that, first off, imposing heavy penalties and fines— Some industries and companies have already been taken to court under this law. What the people are telling us is that they expect governments to apply existing legislation firmly. I think that the present law provides penalties and fines that will keep industry in line.

So, Madam Speaker, you are signaling me that my time is up. I just want to thank the Hon. Member for giving us the opportunity to debate such an important subject. If his intention was to make the Government aware of the importance of having assessment processes, the message was received loud and clear and the Government will certainly take it into consideration.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, the member for Freezer Valley West is to be congratulated on his fine initiative. It gives us an opportunity, as the member from Témiscamingue just said, to focus on this very important issue and the absence of an important policy instrument on the part of the federal government. It also helps us to remind the government of a promise made during the 1984 election that there would be a legislated environmental assessment and a review process. I am sure that his initiative today will help in prodding the government to find the political courage and the necessary will to deliver at last on this front.

I am intrigued by the intervention of the member for Témiscamingue when he says yes to the public works and the assessment from an environmental point of view on public initiatives but no when it comes to private works or public endeavours. It may be that the member for Témiscamingue will want to review his attitude in the light of what an environmental assessment is all about.

An assessment and review process from an environmental point of view means to find out ways and means to protect and possibly save native lifestyles, wetlands, wildlife, fisheries, rivers, lakes, trees. It means making a choice between modes of transportation, as we are presently debating, between railway versus highway transportation and the like.

Therefore, the division that the member for Témiscamingue makes between the private and public sector is really an artificial one because if you are interested in the environment, not only in its protection but also in making the development sustainable from and environmental point of view, then of course you cannot make that distinction. It becomes an artificial line and, therefore, you would also want to assess a measure not only when Canadian National wants to widen its tracks or build a bridge or over some salmon fishery, but also when it comes to the building of a pulp and paper mill. You would not only want to analyse a gas pipeline built with public funds, but also when it comes to the construction of a new foundry or a new smelter.

In other words, you have to decide which is your perspective. You cannot argue for an environmental review when it is a public initiative, but not when it is private. You may want to argue whether it is a provincial or federal issue, that is only fair. You may want to make sure that when it is provincial it is as good as the federal one, or when it is a federal that it is as good as the provincial one. Sometimes you may want to watch the standards that the two apply. Be it the construction of a tunnel, a bridge, a dam, a railway track or highways, as well as any new venture in the private sector, you would want to approach the matter with the question: "How can I ensure the protection of the environment"? In some cases, if there is a conflict in the long term, you should determine what are the alternatives to this project.

What has catapulted this whole question of reviewing and assessing a project from an environmental point of view has been the decision by Judge Cullen a few months ago. We decided that a cabinet decision which dates back to early 1984 under the Liberal regime was a decision that had to be interpreted as being not voluntary, but mandatory. It is that decision which has really given new momentum to this whole question and importance of environmental assessment.

The member for Fraser Valley West has shown over the years consistent and persistent effort and attitude and somehow is reaping the benefit of history working in his favour. In that sense he has demonstrated that he is a very fine Parliamentarian.

On the other side of the House, as you have heard, there is full support for his measure. We believe that the legislation that is to come down soon, hopefully, should as a minimum include in addition to legislative authority a mandatory process for each federal project and also for policies and programs. It will be difficult, but if we mean business and mean what we say by embracing the notion of sustainable development, it is very crucial.

We would also urge, as a minimum, assessments for environmental impacts and for environmental sustainability of a proposed project. We would urge, as a minimum, a provision whereby a project can only proceed when the environmental assessment is published and publicly reviewed and not afterward, as it has sometimes happened in the past. Before a decision is made to proceed, the assessment not only has to be made known, but be published and a public review possibly take place within 90 days of the publication of the assessment. I am sure that the Member for Fraser Valley West has thought about this component as well. It would also be desirable in the new legislation to have a mandatory debate in this parliament for major projects. It would be difficult in legislative terms to define what is a major project. It will take some ingenuity but that can be resolved I am sure in order to ensure that the parliamentarians of the day, particularly when it comes to a pipeline or a proposed tanker route, will have an opportunity to express their views and give governments an indication as to where the majority of parliamentarians stand on that particular proposal.

Finally, it is essential that in the legislation that is expected that there be included a program for the funding of intervenors. People who may be living in the remote parts of the country may want to speak, for instance, about a proposed dam in northern Alberta, a proposed pipeline in the Northwest Territories. In order to be heard, there is the necessity for them to travel and therefore to be funded.

If you think about environmental assessment and what is really behind this very heavy phraseology and what this review process is all about, in essence it is an assessment as to the impact in the long term, the economic and environmental impact in the long term, which come together usually if they are approached with the long term in mind. It would be the economic impact on native communities when something is being planned from outside those communities. It could be the impact on certain non-quantifiable things such as the beauty of a landscape or, if you like, the quality of life or of wildlife itself. Therefore what we are talking about here is not an abstract notion but a very real one which may not be easily quantified in practicable terms but which must be done if we really mean what we say about sustainable development.

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): Madam Speaker, I welcome the motion of the member for Fraser Valley West.

First, I would like to congratulate him. As some of us will recall, he had the foresight a decade ago to recognize the need for comprehensive federal environmental assessment legislation and introduced his Private Members' Bill, the environmental impact assessment bill.

The member's motion is indeed timely because the government will introduce, this session, its proposed environmental assessment bill. It will require an impact assessment of all proposals for which the federal government has decision-making responsibility, but will respect areas of provincial jurisdiction.

As we know, there has long been a need for legislation that provides for sound environmental management and planning. We can no longer afford to be simply reactive to environmental matters. We must consider environmental aspects when planning every federal proposal. The public has expressed its rising concern over the last decade. Citizens from all walks of life recognize that neglecting the environment threatens them individually as well as casting an ominous shadow over the future of the entire human race.

Canadians have spoken out in various ways, through demands to their elected officials, through participation in environmental groups and through a constant expression of concern in public opinion polls. Our business community is investing in environmentally improved methods. Canadian scientists are also cautioning us of the mounting threat to our way of life and ultimately to our survival.

As is known since it was first elected in 1984, this government has acted with purpose and direction. It passed the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, created a special committee of cabinet and will soon put forward a comprehensive environmental assessment bill.

The government has recognized that our environment is under threat. Many species of Canadian plant and animal life are in danger. Our forests must be systematically replaced after cutting. Our farmlands must be guarded against overuse and misuse, as well as urban sprawl. Our lakes must be protected against acid rain. Our communities must have environmentally sound sewage facilities. The mountains of household waste we generate daily must be disposed of in a manner that causes minimal harm to our environment. Toxic substances must be contained, managed, and disposed of in a safe way.

The challenge is great here at home, but both our federal and provincial governments are rising to this challenge. They are developing a broad system of environmental legislation, regulations and policies.

I would like to move from the general to the specific with a few real examples and some thoughts on their implication. Fifteen million acres of productive land around the world are converted into worthless desert every year. In Canada alone we lose 26 acres of productive farmland every hour to urban sprawl. More than 27 million acres of forest land throughout the world are destroyed every year. In over three decades that is an area equivalent to Canada's entire land mass east of the Manitoba–Ontario border.

The implications are increasingly known. These forests are the lungs of the planet. They are the major regulators of oxygen balance in the atmosphere and exert an important control on global precipitation and moisture exchange. Both on land and in the oceans the largest and most complex species of plants and animals, the highest products of evolution, are facing extinction. The giant redwoods and sequoias of America, the Canadian grizzly bear and the whooping crane, the condor of the Andes, the elephant and the rhino, the blue whale, the giant panda of China, are all seriously threatened.

I have commented on the abuse of our land and water. I would like now to turn to the use of the air we need to breathe in order to live. In the words of the International Conference on the Changing Atmosphere, humanity is conducting an unintended, uncontrolled, global pervasive experiment whose ultimate consequences could be second only to a global nuclear war.

We of the so–called developed world like our mobile and air conditioned creature comforts. We burn gasoline and we use fertilizers and what we reap is carbon dioxide and methane. These accumulate in the atmosphere and trap solar energy reflected from the earth. The result is an increase in surface temperature. What you have heard is referred to as the "greenhouse effect".

Scientists predict an average global warming of about 4 degrees Fahrenheit within the next 45 years. That may not sound like much when local temperatures typically change 20 degrees from day to day, but a global change of 4 degrees within such a short time will alter precipitation patterns and vegetation zones throughout the world with potentially disastrous consequences in some regions.

Global warming will cause world sea levels to rise as the heated oceans expand and glaciers and ice caps melt. The rise in the next 45 years is expected to be about five feet. It will, for example, place permanently under water lands currently home to 25 million to 40 million people. Low–lying cities such as Charlottetown and Saint John could be inundated. Prince Edward Island could be divided into three or four islands and maybe eventually disappear under water.

Still, more ominous is the growing threat to stratospheric ozone, that thin blanket of gases around the earth that protects the human race and other life forms.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

POVERTY—GOVERNMENT POSITION—PEOPLE LIVING BELOW POVERTY LINE—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, it has now been four months since I rose in the House and asked the Prime Minister to do something about the fact that the province of Quebec is the second poorest province in Confederation. On June 15, the Canadian Council on Social Development announced that a quarter of Quebec families lived below the poverty line. Madam Speaker, that is a total of 615,000 households or two and a half times the population of Laval.

Since its investiture, this Government has tried to project the image of responsible management. It tried to convince Canadians that it was the best administrator of Canada's economy.

If we refer to the data submitted by the Council last spring, we see that this Government's economic policies are not the answer to the needs of Quebec and Canada.

Since the Tories came to power, they have constantly added to the load carried by low-income Canadians. The Government has withdrawn from unemployment insurance, leaving this fundamental social program in the hands of business and labour. It has introduced a 9 per cent tax on goods and services, which will have a devastating effect on families living below the poverty line and on families living in this country's remote areas.

This Government's policies have widened the gap between rich and poor in Canada. While there are plenty of opportunities for those who are well off, the future for Canadians at the bottom of the scale is far from rosy.

I am sure the Minister will answer that this Government has created more than 300,000 jobs in Quebec since it came to power in September 1984. Madam Speaker, we are not only concerned with quantity but also with the quality of those jobs. The Government must realize that the kind of job a person has is very important. That we continue to have working poor in Canada is shameful and must stop.

Madam Speaker, 29 per cent of Canadian families living below the poverty line have at least one member who is employed the year round. How can this Government be so confident about its economic agenda when the ranks of the working poor are swelling every day? Can you imagine what the statistics look like when we consider the number of families that depend exclusively, on seasonal employment? Does this Government realize what impact its unemployment insurance and fiscal policies will have on the poorest regions of this country?

Madam Speaker, Canadians are sick and tired of hearing the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance hold forth about the number of jobs that have been created and how wealthy they have made this country, while one-third of our poor families have one member working full-time. People are sick and tired of the disappointments and problems they have to live with under this Government.

The fact is that this Government does not invest in the future of this country. It has cut transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education, for instance. Instead of giving Canada's youth the skills it needs to be competitive on world markets, the Government has decided to invest unemployment insurance funds in tenuous training programs. Basically, Madam Speaker, this Government would prefer to invest in retaining the low-income status of many of its citizens instead of giving them the education they need to become independent and prosperous.

• (1805)

As concerned citizens, we must demand that this Government be fair and equitable. This Government has been anything but that. In the first place, the Conservatives signed the Free Trade Agreement with the United States. They promised to provide the best possible programs to help displaced workers escape the poverty trap. Unfortunately, when the effects of the Agreement became obvious throughout the country, the Conservatives decided that there was no longer a real need for substantial programs.

The Government then decided to withdraw from unemployment insurance. It is obvious that the Prime Minister thought that it was wise for the federal Government to withdraw from an important social program before his dear friends to the south defined it as a subsidy. This policy will take food from people's mouths and invest in training programs that will just put people in routine, dead-end jobs, without breaking the poverty cycle.

To top it all off, Madam Speaker, we have the new goods and services tax. The Minister of Finance said that it would be revenue neutral. He has since changed his mind and decided that it would be a way to reduce the deficit. With this new source of revenue, the Government will squeeze $5 billion more from the Canadian people. Some Hon. Members on the Government side have themselves spoken against this Conservative attack on low-and middle-income people.

Is the Government perhaps trying to mislead Canadians by telling them the tax will be 9 per cent, knowing very well that they intend to introduce a 5 per cent tax which would be accepted as a lesser evil?

In essence, Madam Speaker, my question is about fairness and equity. How can the Government be so sure of its economic performance, when its performance with people is so different? Why are so many workers in Quebec in poverty? How come my province has become the second poorest in the country? More than 50 Conservative Members (from Quebec) sit on the other side of the House, but what good has it done the province? My question is and remains: What does the Prime Minister intend to do to end the widening gap between rich and poor and how will he stop Quebec from having the highest rate of poor families in Canada?

[English]

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I wish to respond in greater detail to a question of June 15 by the Hon. Member for Saint-Laurent.

The question dealt with the government's position on poverty. The best social program is a job, not just any job but a secure and rewarding one. A good job is also the surest ladder out of poverty.

The measures this government is proposing as part of the Labour Force Development Strategy will provide all Canadians, men and women, with the opportunity to acquire skills necessary to get a job and to climb out of poverty. Thousands of women have already benefited from the programs offered under the Canadian Jobs Strategy introduced by this government in September, 1985.

During 1987-88 more than 160,000 women, youths and disadvantaged workers participated in programs under the Job Entry Component of the Canadian Jobs Strategy. The increased emphasis on active spending under the Labour Force Development Strategy will further benefit women by providing them with the opportunity to acquire skills necessary to get a good job.

As part of the Labour Force Development Strategy, we are significantly increasing social assistance recipient programming. With the co-operation and participation of the provinces, up to $200 million, an increase of 33 1/3 per cent, will be available for additional programming directed at improving the employability of social assistance recipients.

This additional $200 million is targeted specifically at those who fall below the poverty line. This money will enable these people to undertake training and skill enhancement necessary to break the cycle of poverty. The new programs we are introducing will allow these people to trade their welfare cheques for a pay cheque.

The increased funding for social assistance recipient programming is significant. That is not all we are doing as part of the Labour Force Development Strategy.

• (1810)

UI coverage will be expanded to workers who choose voluntarily to remain in the labour force beyond age 65. This will substantially enhance the income security availability to seniors.

I emphasize, Madam Speaker, that the changes we are making in the unemployment insurance program are modest in scope. Claimants who need UI benefits will continue to get them. Provincial welfare rolls will not increase significantly because of these changes.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO ACT—IMPACT OF PROPOSED AMENDMENTS ON EMPLOYED

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Madam Speaker, I am asking about a response which I considered to be inadequate some time ago from the minister's office. My accusation in the question was that the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21, fell so far short of what was needed by Canadians as to be something which ought to be withdrawn and would receive very little support not only from the New Democratic Party but from people all across the country.

The response, as is usually the case, did not address the question at all but referred to how much training was going to be done, how those who were unemployed were going to benefit so much from the expanded jobs under CJS and how, in some cases, even people who are on social assistance would be receiving so much benefit because of the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, Bill C-21.

Many of the things referred to by the minister had nothing to do with Bill C–21 which I was addressing specifically. When you talk about the social assistance programs as they are referred to under the unemployment provisions, it does not have anything to do with Bill C–21 other than the source of funding which we will come to in a minute. When they talk about entry and re–entry into the labour force, it does not have anything to do with Bill C–21 because people who are entering and re–entering the labour force after a long period of time would not have any way of accessing the unemployment insurance fund which is what Bill C–21 is about. References to human resource development, which is a rather amorphous term and I assume includes all the foregoing, again has nothing to do with Bill C–21.

Bill C–21 has to do with what has been referred to as the gutting of the unemployment insurance program as it has been known in Canada. It has to do with what has been referred to in parts of Canada as the implementation of a social stock prod that was introduced by the government, substantiated by government members during the travelling of the committee subsequent to the summer recess, on the basis that there was a tremendous amount of abuse of the system as it was presently constituted. This is in spite of the fact that time and time again the minister herself said "No, there is not much abuse, abuse is minimal, this is not why we are putting it in. We are putting it in to improve training so people will be able to access all these wonderful jobs that are available in the community".

Since the exchange in the House, a committee of the House has travelled and almost overwhelmingly the response of the Canadian people has been what we anticipated it to be. That is an almost total rejection of the government's scheme. The extra funds that are being made available for all these wonderful social programs which I referred to a moment ago are going to come from the changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is the substance of Bill C–21, and the saving in funds which the government is going to spend elsewhere comes from increased periods of time in which people are going to have to work in order to qualify for unemployment insurance.

• (1815)

I know I do not have a lot of time but I think it is helpful to talk about some of the people who are going to be most direly affected by these changes. When we talk about people who are going to have difficulty qualifying, we are talking about people on the margins of society, for the most part women. Certainly included in that or perhaps in addition to that are single parent mothers whose children are going to suffer enormously because of those longer qualifying periods. As a matter of fact, studies have shown that over 150,000 Canadians will be excluded altogether from these benefits.

I know my time is getting very, very short. I just cannot accept the minister's answers. These changes are brutal, a total distortion of unemployment insurance, and I guess the best way of describing it is that the government is using these changes as a social stock prod and it is inexcusable.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I want to respond in greater detail to a question of June 15, 1989, by the Member for Saskatoon—Dundurn. The question dealt with changes we are making in the unemployment insurance program.

The hon. member wanted to know about the changes in the unemployment insurance program. The changes we are proposing in the UI program form part of a wider effort this government has taken to ensure that the Canadian labour force is ready for the challenges of the 1990s. These challenges include an increasingly competitive world and trading environment, a diminishing reliance on traditional industries, a rapid growth in the service sector and more sophisticated technology. These are formidable challenges.

If we are to meet these challenges and prosper in the increasingly competitive world environment, we must rely on the skills and resourcefulness of the Canadian people. Labour force development strategy represents a comprehensive approach at equipping Canadians workers with the skills necessary to prepare for these challenges. The government intends to stimulate the commitment of employers and workers to skill excellence through programs that promote and reinforce private sector training. This will strengthen the competitiveness of the Canadian industry.

We will be spending an additional $350 million on training under Section 26 of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This represents a doubling of the current allocation for training under the UI program, thereby giving 60,000 more UI claimants the skills necessary for re-employment.

In addition, we will be undertaking a major reorientation of the national employment service to offer additional help to the unemployed in finding jobs. We will be earmarking $100 million to assist the displaced workers who are experiencing difficulties in finding other jobs.

Self-employment and entrepreneurship programs in other countries have shown promise as elements in the active program strategies to encourage self-sufficiency. In light of this, the government is committing $50 million to allow unemployment insurance claimants with viable business plans to capitalize their UI benefits to partially defray business start-up cost.

We are revising the current program regime of sickness and maternity benefits. The changes we are making in this area represent a breakthrough for Canadian social policy. Our proposals for change will enhance the protection that is currently available by making the receipt of these benefits more flexible and by providing 10 weeks of parental benefits.

We are extending UI coverage to workers age 65 or over. This will substantially increase the income security available to these workers.

• (1820)

Last, Madam Speaker, we will amend the Unemployment Insurance Act to eliminate restrictions on access to benefits during labour disputes.

TRANSPORT-SUBSIDIES TO VIA RAIL/CUTS TO VIA RAIL/ENVIRONMENTAL BENEFITS OF RAIL TRANSIT

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight as part of the adjournment debate to talk a bit more about VIA Rail.

I want to say at the outset that we have all been waiting for the other shoe to drop. We have had the leaks, we have had the first shoe, but now it would appear that the government is busy changing shoes. The parliamentary assistant is looking at me with a queried look on his face.

What they are doing is rewriting the report right at this minute. They are taking routes that the leaked document said were going to be cut and, lo and behold, they are being saved. On the other hand, they are taking routes and services that supposedly were saved in the leaked documents and now they are going to be cut. What a way to run, or should I say ruin, a railroad.

What does this action of rewriting reports at the last minute just to protect the political backside of the Minister of Transport say about this government's ability to make decisions? It should not matter if the contents of the documents leak out. If they have been thoughtfully done, if the analysis has been done, if the environmental assessment has been done, if everything has been checked and double checked, then they should not worry about having to rewrite the document.

They should be able to stand the tests. They should be able to withstand the test of the opposition. They should be able to withstand the test of the government backbenchers on the transport committee who will review whatever documents are produced, and they should be able to withstand the test of the people of Canada if they have been arrived at after the appropriate deliberation and analysis.

But I ask you, Madam Speaker, does this suggest that they are now writing an environmental assessment report so that the appropriate documents can be included with the package whenever it is released tomorrow or Thursday, or are they just rewriting the environmental assessment that they have done, if they have done one? There is no clear indication whatsoever that such a document has been produced or even considered.

This is not the way for any government to make decisions. This is not the way for a government to determine transportation policy for a country as diverse and as large as Canada. This is not the way to make decisions that have a profound impact on the environment, not just of this country but of this planet. This is certainly not the way to make decisions that will ultimately decimate the regions of this country; Atlantic Canada, northern Ontario, the prairies and British Columbia.

When Canadians learn the specifics, whatever the final result of this rewriting is, whether it is at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning outside the Conservative caucus room or in the press theatre—and I understand that Mr. Lawless and Mr. Hanigan are en route to Ottawa to help participate with the minister in telling Canadians the news—I hope that they do two things.

The first thing I hope they do is call their local Conservative member of Parliament and say very clearly that the transport committee of the House of Commons has wisely decided to hold hearings to review these documents and we think it is extremely important that some of those hearings be held out here where we live, away from Ottawa, so that we can tell you firsthand what we think of your decision so that hopefully we can influence that decision even though it will already be an order in council. Orders in council can be revoked.

The second thing—and this one depends a lot on the first as to how they respond to the request from the people of Canada to be heard—is that I hope they will tell the Conservative members of Parliament that if the VIA cuts are not cancelled, then at the next election the taxpayers will cut the Conservative from office.

• (1825)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively to what my hon. friend from across the way had to say about how decisions are made around here. He must be seeing government through a different set of eyes than those I see through from this side of the House.

I can only reiterate what has already been stated repeatedly, both in this House and elsewhere. Many people would have us believe that trains are the most efficient mode of transportation. Energy efficiency depends to a large extent on passenger levels.

In 1980, a study on the energy consumption concluded that buses, not trains, were the most energy efficient mode of transportation based on the energy consumed per passenger mile. Eighty-four per cent of all the intercity travel is by car, and nobody seems to be disputing that figure, 6 per cent is by bus and 3 per cent is by train.

Contrary to all the rhetoric which has been bandied about in recent months, VIA Rail's performance is worsening. It is not improving. My hon. friend is shaking his head no. Let us look at some of the NDP economics.

While 1988 revenues did increase by 13 per cent, on $26 million of revenue, operating costs increased by 15 per cent or $94 million with the result that the government subsidies to VIA for its operation alone had to be increased by $68 million for that year alone. This means that for every additional dollar earned by VIA in 1988, the government has had to disburse an additional $2.62.

We are asking all Canadians to pay this subsidy but only 3 per cent of the travelling public uses this mode of transportation. Continued subsidization of a mode of transportation which costs more and more and quite frankly is not used to the same degree as it was, say, 10 years ago, is not a sound investment in our future, particularly when that investment is being made with the Canadian taxpayers' money. That is why the government announced a new policy approach for VIA and asked the corporation to prepare a new business plan which would reflect its new reference levels.

VIA Rail's corporate plan is currently under consideration. An announcement will be made in due course. We anticipate it will be made within the next few days. The government expects the financial and operational performance of VIA Rail to improve and to function in a more cost effective manner. When money is scarce, it is spent where it is most needed and where it is most likely to produce results.

A cost effective transportation system is essential if Canada is to preserve and to enhance its position in world trade. In order to meet the challenge, we must make the best use of each mode of transportation and a wise use of the Canadian taxpayers' money.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.28 p.m.
